ed to grip it with all his might. He held the office of Vakil-i-dar and posing as an attached servant of the state had won the confidence of the king. As time passed, all the duties of the government devolved upon him. He found a very good assistant in Malik 'Umdat-ul-mulk Qivāmuddin 'Alā Dabīr.
Qivāmuddin had no equal in learning and eloquence of style and held the post of Naib Vakil-i-dar. Nizāmuddin himself was very industrious, discreet, penetrating and talented, and fared well with the task of administration. But his manoeuvres were soon known to the people at large. Several of the leading nobles—some on account of the fear that no immunity could be expected from Nizāmuddin if he became too powerful, and some others through sheer ambition—also began to aspire for power for themselves. But Nizāmuddin was not to be caught napping. He reflected that prince Muhammad who had a talent for command was dead, and Nāṣiruddin Bughra was wasting away his energies in the insalubrious retreats of Bengal. So the only thorn in his side which could prove a source of trouble later on was Kai Khursaau, now in exile at Multan. He, therefore, instigated Mu‘izzuddin to murder Kai Khursau, forwarding the plea that if even a few of Balban’s officers fraternised with him it

9 Ferishtah p. 84. According to ‘Isāmī he was appoint-ted Mir dād (Futūh pp. 181, 182, 191) but Ferishtah seems more correct since all the historians say that Qivāmuddin, the Naib Vakil-i-dar, was his assistant.

The principal duty of the Vakil-i-dar was to keep the keys of the palace gates. Also see Tab. Nas. Raverty vol.
I. p. 694.

10 Baranī has no meaning. The word ‘Alaqa may be a mistake of the copyist for which means that Qivāmuddin was an efficient secretary or that he was son of one ‘Alā Dabīr.

11 Baran p. 131. would not take him a day to push the king aside and usurp the throne.\textsuperscript{12} Kai Khusrau also seems to have made an attempt for the crown for which he had a legitimate claim. He had gone as far as Ghazni to seek assistance from the Mongols but they were busy otherwise and could not help him in marching on to Delhi. The chagrined prince had returned to Multan but his moments were communicated to Muizzuddin who ordered his death.\textsuperscript{13} In short the prey of Nizamuddin’s machinations was summoned from Multan and beheaded at Rohtak on his way to Delhi.\textsuperscript{14} Having got rid of one enemy Nizamuddin tried his hands on others. He charged Khwaja Kha\textsuperscript{15}i Mu‘izzuddin’s minister, with some trivial offence and got him paraded through the city seated on an ass. He ordered a wholesale massacre of the Mughal converts, better known as neo-Muslims, on the charge that they had plotted against the monarch, and banished their families to distant fortresses. But in spite of these excesses, Nizam enjoyed unflinching confidence of the king. In fact Mu‘izzuddin was, for all practicle purposes, playing into his hands. If anybody insinuated nefarious motives to his designs the sultan would forthwith

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{12} Ibid. pp. 132-33.
  \item \textsuperscript{13} \textit{Futu\textsuperscript{h} \textsuperscript{h}} pp. 190-92.
  \item \textsuperscript{14} Barani p. 133; Badaoni, Ranking Vol. I p. 222; Ferishtah p. 84.
  \item \textsuperscript{15} Barani pp. 133-34.
  \item \textsuperscript{16} \textit{Futu\textsuperscript{h}}. pp. 192-94.
\end{itemize}
mention to Nizām: “So and so has told me such and such things about you.” The man would then be called and suffer from the implacable revenge of the wily councillor. In this way Nizāmuddin destroyed many useful ministers and officials. Such was his ascendancy that his wife was designed as “the honorary mother of the sultan and the directress of female apartments.” Owing to his unchallengeable position and unshakable power “the nobles and officers became completely obsequious and subservient to him... and his threshold become the asylum of high and low.”

The nonagenarian Fakhruddin was aware of the dangerous game his son-in-law was playing. On more than one occasion he had reprimanded him saying: “Give up this idea of sovereignty... The imperial purple befits the person of soldiers. You, who dare not strike a green-grocer with an onion stalk, or fling a clod at a jackal, how can you count yourself a man among men and dream of an imperial crown.”

This advice was appreciated more by those who learnt about it, than by the one for whom it was meant. But if Nizāmuddin refused to listen to his father-in-law the foolish sultan at last lent an attentive ear to his father. When the tidings of the ruinous conditions at Delhi reached Bughra Khan in Bengal he hastened to meet his son at Ayodhya, where Mu‘izzuddin arrived to receive him. Nizām did his best to create a rift between father and son and even tried to stop an interview between them. But they met and the tears of the two added a pleasant poignancy to the situation. Nāṣiruddin gave a hundred pieces of advice to Mu‘izzuddin, and at the time of parting, he whispered into his ears: “Be quick and put Nizāmuddin out of the way. If after this he finds an opportunity, he will not leave you on the throne for a day."²⁰

17 Tab. Akb. Trs. by De p. 122.

The advice went home. The first thing Muʿizzuddin did on his return to Kilughari was to order Nizāmuddin to Multan, ostensibly to take charge of the administration there but in reality to remove him from Delhi. Nizāmuddin at once surmised the cause of his sudden transfer and delayed departure.
The courtiers knew that the king wanted to do away with him and secretly obtained his permission to effect Nizām's death. One of these days some deadly poison was administered into his wine and his crafty career came to a sudden close.

The Ascendancy of the Khaljīs.

Nizāmuddin's death paralysed Muʿizzuddin's government.
Despite his intriguing nature, he was an able and shrewd administrator. There was no one fitted to take his place.
Muʿizzuddin was as bad as ever. For some time he had complied with his father's wishes but then "the reins of his heart slipped away from his hands" and once again his concupiscence began to grow boundless. Constant drinking completely wrecked his health, and the little stability that there was in the government was shaken out of it.²¹ It was at this juncture that Jalāl-uddin Firoz Khaljī, governor (Naib) of Samanah and Sarjāndār of the court, was sent for by the king.
On his arrival he was given the title of Shayasta Khan,²² the sief of Baran, and the portfolio of the Minister of War (ʿAriz-i-Mumalik). Malik Aitmar Kachhan and Malik Aitmar Surkhāh, two noblemen of Balban were made Master of Ceremonics (Barbak) and Vakīl-i-dar respectively. Thus an interim arrangement was decided upon and an attempt was made to run the tottering administration. Jalāluddin was a born soldier and had for long fought the Mughals on the ²⁰ Barani p. 156.

²¹ Barani p. 170.
²² Barani alone, p. 170, has Siyāsat Khan. All other historians give the above title.
north-west frontier. He was a man full of experience and was incapable of any wrong action. Soon the Turkish nobles grew jealous of his position. Suddenly the sultan was attacked with paralysis. His condition gradually deteriorated and there was no hope of his recovery. Factions multiplied and recriminations intensified. The situation, however, was eased for the time being by the prompt action of some influential Balbāni nobles, who placed an infant son of Muʿizzuddin on the throne and gave him the title of Shamsuddin. Jalāluddin Shayasta Khan was appointed his deputy (Naib) and important posts and portfolios were distributed among capable officers. In this way kingship "remained in the house of Balban (Turks and did not fall into the hands of some one (of another race)."

This saving of the throne for the Turks was nothing but a gesture on the part of the old aristocracy against Jalāluddin Khalji who had outdone them all in efficiency and ability. The nobility at Delhi was hereafter clearly divided into two camps. The Turkish party was headed by the adventurous Aitmar Kachhan and Aitmar Surkhāh and consisted of old Balbāni barons. The other was headed by Jalāluddin Khalji, whom public opinion did not consider as belonging to Turkish blood. Aitmar Kachhan and Aitmar Surkhāh together with some Turkish nobles decided that such nobles as were not real Turks should be divested of all power and removed from their positions. They prepared a list of such names and the name of

23 T.M.S. p. 56.
24 Barani p. 171 has خورده سال. Ferihstah p. 87 has طفل سعة ساله or a child of three years. Barani and Nizāmuddin give his name. The author of T.M.S. has Kaikaus while Iśāmī and Ferishtah have Kaimurs.
25 Barani p. 171.
Jalāluddin headed the list. Jalāluddin was informed of this conspiracy by Malik Ahmad Chap the chief Ḥājib of the king. Jalāl now felt that it was not safe for him to stay in Delhi any longer and he with his adherents betook themselves to Bahārpur. He called some men from his fief of Baran (modern Bulandshahr) and rallied round him a strong party of relatives and friends.

Jalāluddin’s flight created consternation in the Turkish ranks. Their game was out. They decided to strike the first blow and finish Jalāluddin. To disarm him of all suspicion Aitmar Kachhan and Aitmar Surkhah sent him a memorial addressing him as emperor Jalāluddin. Aitmar Kachhan started with a small band of troopers to decoy him from Bahārpur, carry him off to Kilughari and kill him in the presence of the infant king Shamsuddin. Jalāluddin had scented the plot from before and as soon as Kachhan arrived at the former’s mansion he was pulled down from his horse and instantly beheaded by ‘Alāūddin. The murder of Kachhan further inflamed feelings of animosity on both sides. Jalāluddin’s brave and gallant sons now rode post haste to Delhi with a company of fifty horse, forcibly seized the infant king and carried him off to Bahārpur together with the sons of Malik Fakhruddin. Aitmar Surkhāh started in their pursuit and overtook them near Bahārpur. A hand to hand scuffle ensued in which Ikhtiyāruddin, the eldest son of Jalāl, fell from his horse and

26 Ibid. p. 172.
27 Futūḥ. p. 197., T.M.S. p. 56.
28 Barani has Bahārpur, Firishtah Bahādurpur, Badaoni Bahāpur and ‘Iṣāmī Bhokal Bahārī. The place lies on the Jumna some six or seven miles east of old Delhi and south west of Kilughari.
29 Futūḥ. p. 198.
30 Barani has 50, Tab. Akb. and Firishtah 500.
31 Firishtah p. 88. The narrative of Badaoni is slightly different.
Surkhah dealt upon him two or three blows with his sword. Luckily none of them proved effective and this gave time to Ikhtiyāruddīn, who drew his sword and struck off the head of Aitmar Surkhah.\(^{32}\)

The abduction of the young king was too much for the public of Delhi to stand. The citizens rose in a body, poured out of all the thirteen gates\(^{33}\) of the city and assembled at the Badaon Gate. They determined to march to Bahārpur and rescue the emperor’s son from the clutches of the Khaljis. A sub-conscious loyalty had developed in their breasts for the Ilbāris who had ruled over them for the last eighty years, and the people abhorred the very idea of being ruled by the Khaljis. But before they could leave the walls of the city Malikul’umra stood at the Badaon Gate and stopped them from proceeding further. His sons were in the custody of Jalāluddīn and in the interest of his own kith and kin he did not want any struggle with the latter. He, therefore, put down the tumult and dispersed the crowd. The majority of the people turned back, but a large number of Turkish Amīrs and Malik finding both of their leaders killed and their cause lost went over to Jalāluddīn. Their forces swelled the ranks of the Khaljis.\(^{34}\)

With the Turkish party crushed, the infant king in his possession, and the paralytic Mu‘izzuddīn in the throes of death, Jalāluddīn was now all powerful. A couple of days after Shamsuddīn’s abduction Jalāl sent to Kilughari a man \(^{32}\) T.M.S. p. 59 Ferishtah p. 88.

\(^{33}\) Barānī has twelve gates but Amīr Khusrau (Qirānus Sādāin, Elliot vol. III p. 524) has thirteen. Sharaũuddīn Yazdi, the author of Mulfūzat-i-Timūrī, points out that the old Delhi of Mu‘izzuddīn had ten gates but three others were opened from Siri (‘Alāuddīn’s city) to Jahānpanāh (Tughlaq’s city). Thus Delhi had thirteen gates and not twelve. Ibn Battūtāh gives the names of several of them.

\(^{34}\) Zafarul Vālī p. 753.
named Tarkesh,\textsuperscript{35} whose father had been killed by Mu'izzuddin, to avenge his father's death by finishing the dying sultan. The man entered the palace, wrapped the king's body in a carpet, delivered a few kicks at it, and flung it into the Jumna. The river bore away the last of the Ilbārī sultans (19th Muḥarram 689, Wednesday, February 1st, 1290).\textsuperscript{36} The crown was almost thrust on Jalāluddin's head but he hesitated to adorn the diadem all at once. He seated Shamsuddin on the throne at Bahārpur and proposed to Malik Chhajjū, nephew of Balban, to undertake the duties of Regent and the guardianship of the young king. On his behalf, he requested for the districts of Tabarhind, Deopalpur and Multan.\textsuperscript{37} Malik Chhajjū on the other hand asked for the fief of Kara, yielding Regency and Vazirship to Shayastā Khan. Jalāluddin assented to the proposal and assigned Kara to Chhajjū who immediately left for his fief. For some time Jalāluddin used to bring Shamsuddin into the darbār and place him on the throne, himself discharging the duties of Regent and Vazir, but everybody knew that such an arrangement was not to continue for long. Friends and foes all hailed the rising star and Jalāluddin left Bahārpur with the puppet king and a large concourse of people. He arrived in Kilughari and crowned himself king. Shamsuddin was thrown into prison where he died after some time.\textsuperscript{38}

The citizens of Delhi, however, looked upon his accession with great resentment. Delhi was full of men of rank and wealth, writes the contemporary chronicler Ziyāuddin, "but no voice of congratulation hailed the installation of Jalāl-\textsuperscript{35} \textit{Futūh}. p. 200.

\textsuperscript{36} Mu'izzuddin ruled for three years and some months. Also see \textit{T.M.S}. p. 59.
\textsuperscript{37} Badaoni, Ranking, vol. I p. 229.
\textsuperscript{38} Shamsuddin's reign lasted for three months and some days. \textit{T.M.S}. p. 61; Ferishtah p. 88; Badaoni, Ranking, vol. I p. 229.
uddin.” So apprehensive was the new king of their hostile attitude that for a long time he did not venture to enter the metropolis. The popular feeling was against the Khaljís whose ascendancy had put an end to the government of the “Turks.”

Origin of the Khaljís.

The resentment of the public was due to the belief that the Khaljís were a race different from that of the Turks. But in reality it was not so. Ziyauddin Baraní writes that when Kaiqubád fell seriously ill and there was no hope his recovery, the officers of Balban assembled together and decided to enthrone a young son of Mu’izzuddin, and carry on the administration through a council of regents “lest the sovereignty should be lost to the Turks.”

The historian also writes that because Jalâluddin “belonged to a different race (اصل)” he did not have any confidence in the Turks, nor did the Turks put their trust in the Khaljís. After Jalâluddin had left Delhi, established his headquarters at Bahárpur, defeated the Turks under Aitmar Kachhan and Aitmar Surkháh and captured the young son of Mu’izzuddin, a large number of Turkish nobles (دار اصل خلنجینان ترکان) went over to him and the Khaljís gained numerical superiority. On the day of the death of Mu’izzuddin the government of the country “passed from the family of the Turks (در اصل ترکان) to that of the Khaljís (در خلنجینان ترکان). Nobles, soldiers and merchants all alike were amazed, and they wondered at the way the Khaljís had seated themselves on the throne in place of the Turks and the kingship passed from the Turkish race to another race.”

---

39 Baraní p. 171. 40 Ibid. p. 173. 41 Ibid. pp. 175-76.
The above statements of Barani bear out two facts. Firstly, that there were two parties at Delhi, one under Aitmar Kachhan and Aitmar Surkhāh, and the other under Jalāluddin Khaljī. Either of them wanted to gain ascendency at the court, and to rule in the name of the young son of Mu‘izzuddin, who was lying on his death bed. Naturally, each party distrusted the other, and tried to outmanoeuvre each other’s plans. Secondly, that the Khaljīs were of a different race from the Turks. Beyond this Barani does not say anything. He does not point out the race to which the Khaljīs belonged.

But later historians have tried to elucidate the point. Nizāmuddin Aḥmad is perhaps the first among them. According to him the Khaljīs were the descendants of Quliq Khan, a son-in-law of Changiz Khan. Quliq was not on good terms with his wife but dared not break away openly from her father, the Mongol emperor. At last he found a welcome opportunity to overthrow his allegiance to Changiz, when with his family and followers numbering about 30,000 men, he migrated to the dales of Ghaur and Jurjīstān. There he remained undisturbed, and his people came to be known as Qalji from Qalij or Qulij; but later on, on account of constant use, the word changed into Khaljī. When the rulers of Ghaur conquered India, the Khaljīs followed in their train in large numbers and took service under the sultans of Hindustan. Among these Khaljīs were the ancestors of Sultan Jalāluddin of Delhi and Sultan Maḥmūd of Malwa. Nizāmuddin further adds that according to the author of the Saljūq-nāmah the Khaljīs were descended from Turk, son of Japhet, son of Noah. 42

But Nizāmuddin’s conclusion is hardly worth credence, because in an earlier context he writes that the Khaljīs fought in the Khvarizm Shahī armies, and, therefore, their existence before Changiz Khan’s times cannot be doubted. The hypothesis finds support from Ferishtah who says that the Khaljis are often mentioned in the histories of Ghazná, and it is certain that they existed anterior to the time of Changiz Khan. But, perhaps, to reconcile himself to Nizámmuddín’s statement he adds that it is likely that Qalij Khan may himself have been of the tribe of the Khaljis, and Jaláluddín of Delhi and Maḥmúd of Malwa may have descended directly from him. Badaoni, on the other hand, vehemently criticises the Qalij Khání ancestry saying that this theory “has no real authority” and as a matter of fact there is no connection whatever between Qalij and Khalj.” Both Ferishtah and Badaoni think the second statement of Nizámmuddín, which mentions Turk, son of Japhet, as the progenitor of the Khalji race, as the more reasonable. Ḥājiuddabír writing about the Khaljis of Malwa says that they were descendants of Qalij Khan, son of Afrásiyáb, who was son-in-law of Changiz Khan; but he does not say anything about the ancestry of Jaláluddín of Delhi.

Barani’s indefiniteness on this issue appears inexplicable. His father and uncle had been in the service of Delhi sultans for a considerable time. He himself was an intimate friend of many an influential government servant. Besides this he had consulted many contemporary and earlier works. He was thus in a position to possess accurate information with regard to the origin of the Khaljis. Therefore, he either deliberately avoided to throw light on this point, or thought it to be a matter of little consequence, or was perhaps unable to ascertain the truth. Anyhow the fact is that he was not conversant with ethnological studies, because he displays a similar vagueness about the origin of the Tughlaqs. But his statements do bear out that the Khaljis were not welcomed by a certain section of the nobles, because they came of a race different from that of the Turks. Later historians like Nizāmuddin, Badaoni and Firishta do not advance the position any further. Their statements are based only on legends and not on any definite conclusions of historical research.

43 Ferishtah p. 88.
45 Zafarul Váli p. 197.

A critical study of the subject, however, conclusively points to the Turkish origin of the Khaljīs. Khalj is the name given to the land lying on either side of river Helmand in Afghanistan, and the inhabitants of that region were known as Khaljīs. Various nomadic tribes had settled in Khalj from very remote times and under such circumstances it is impossible to assert with absolute certainty that the Khaljīs belonged to a particular tribe or race. Ibn Haukal, an Arab geographer of the 10th century A.D. ascribes Turkish origin to the Khaljīs. According to him they were settled from the old in the regions between Hindustan and Sijistan, and that they are rich in cattle and their habits, customs and dress are like those of the Turks.”

Many other writers like Istakhrī, the author of Ḥudud-ul-‘Alam and Divān-i-Lughat-ul Turk also think that the Khaljīs were Turks, who from long past resided in Khalj in Afghanistan. Besides these there is the authority of Fakhruddin, the author of Tarīkh-i-Fakhruddin Mubārak Shahī who finished his work in 1206 about a century and a half before Barani’s Tarīkh was completed. Fakhruddin gives a list of sixty-four Turkish tribes in which he includes Turk, Ghuz, Khalji, Tatar, Ughus, and Qai etc. He gives valuable information on Turkish tribes which shows that he had intimate knowledge about them. Minhāj Sirāj, the author of the Tabqāt-i-Nāširi says that the Khaljīs served in the army of the Khwarizm Shahī emperors of Transoxiana and took part in various wars of Ghaur and Ghazna. According to Raverty also Khaljīs were not a “hypothetical” tribe as Elliot is inclined to think, but were a Turkish tribe who having inhabited in Afghanistan for a very long time had been so much assimilated with the people of the locality that they were considered more as Afghans than as Turks. Barthold, one of the greatest modern authorities on Central Asia, also thinks the Khaljīs to be a Turkish tribe, who, as early as the fourth century A.D., had settled in the southern Afghanistan.

---

46 Ibn Haukal wrote between 902 and 968 A.D.
48 Also see proceedings Indian History Congress 1938, pp. 297-303.

Thus it can safely be concluded that the Khaljīs were Turks, but having been long in residence in Afghanistan had assimilated the habits and customs of that country. Some of them came to India as soldiers in the armies of the conquerors from Ghazna and Ghaur and many more arrived as refugees during Mongol upheaval in Central Asia and Afghanistan. Here they were regarded to be different from the Ilbārī Turks who belonged, so to say, to the blue blood. The sovereignty of Delhi had been the monopoly of the Ilbārī Turks for about a century, and a change of dynasty appeared to the people of Delhi a violent break from the conditions to which they had now adjusted themselves. In other words it is in the conservatism of the populace that we should find an explanation of the surprise at the accession of the Khaljīs, and not in the 51 Elliot Vol. VIII p. xviii.

53 Encyclopaedia of Islam, p. 875.
racial differences between the Khaljis and the Ilbâris. Both belonged to the same stock. 54

Importance of the Khalji Revolution.

The Khalji Revolution was fraught with far reaching consequences. It not only heralded the advent of a new dynasty: it ushered in an era of ceaseless conquests, of unique experiments in statecraft, and of incomparable literary outburst. In the veins of the Khaljis did not flow the royal blood. They belonged to the proletariat and their accession to power delivered a death-blow to the pseudo-belief that the sovereignty was a monopoly of the privileged. The Khalji revolt is essentially a revolt of the Indian Muslims against the Turkish hegemony, of those who looked to Delhi, against those who sought inspiration from Ghaur and Ghazna. The revolution resulted in the supercession of a commoner’s government over that of the blue-blood’s and shocked to their marrow many a high-browed Turk to whom other Musalmans, Indian-born or otherwise, were made of a stuff inferior to their own.

A change of dynasty was not a new thing to the Indian people. The frequent and quite unexpected dynastic revolutions had killed in them all sentiments of goodwill for any house or dynasty; and even if they developed loyalty for some particular house they were never reluctant to transfer it to another, if circumstances so required. Thus the supercession of Khaljis over the Ilbaris was not of much consequence to the people at large.

Neither inheritance, nor election, nor even intrigue had secured the throne to Jalaluddin. It was by a coup de main that the throne had passed from the Ilbâris to the Khaljis, and it was through sheer force that they maintained it. Neither the support of the people, nor of the nobility, nor 54 Ferishtah clarifies the position when he says:

باداشعی از ترکان که غلامان سلاطین غور بودند بسله خلكیان انتقال یافت
even of the clergy was sought. Whatever the Khaljis did or undid for the country, they at least showed to the Muslim world that the state could not only exist but vigorously function without any religious support,—an unprecedented phenomenon indeed.

What is of striking importance during the regime of the Khaljis (and especially of 'Ala‘uddin) is a continuous series of unprecedented conquests in the annals of Indo-Muslim history. For the first time the Khaljis carried Muslim arms into the remotest corners of the country. Constitutionally the Khaljis were empire builders, for they brought to knees independent kings at home and kept an eye on defence against external aggression. Had it not been for 'Ala‘uddin’s prompt and stern measures India would have passed into the hands of the Mughals two centuries earlier than it actually did.

Some of the reforms of 'Ala‘uddin, again, are unique experiments in medieval times. They succeeded quite well what if their success was short lived. But the force that was the mainstay of the Khaljis proved a canker in their body-politic and a contemporary saint was tempted to declare that “the empire of 'Ala‘uddin (the greatest of the Khaljis) had no stable foundations.”
CHAPTER II

JALALUDDIN FIROZ SHAH KHALJI (1290—1296)

Jalaluddin ascended the throne on the 3rd of Jamadi-us-
Sanî 689 (13th June 1290)\(^2\) and assumed the title of Sultan Jalâuddin Firoz Shah Khalji.\(^2\) As stated above he made Kilughari the seat of the government as he dared not enter

\(^1\) Miftâhul Futûh, Elliot Vol. III p. 536.

T.M.S. Trs. p. 58 has Rabiul Akhir 689 or April-May 1290. Baranî and Ferishtah have 688 and 687 H. respectively. According to T.M.S. Text p. 59 Mu‘izzuddin was murdered in 689 and so also says Badaoni Ranking Vol. I p. 228. Again all the known coins of Shamsuddin Kaikaüs are dated 689 H. (N. Wright). The earliest known coins of Jalâuddin are also of 689 H. (Catalogue of coins in the Indian Museum, Calcutta Vol. II no. 175). Thus it is certain that Khusrau’s date which is supported by numismatic evidence is correct and Baranî and Ferishtah are wrong.

Also see Thomas: “Chronicles” p. 141 note

Lucknow Museum Catalogue no. 177.

No contemporary historian throws light on the ancestry of Jalâuddin. Hâjiuddabîr describing the Khalîjîs of Mandu says that Afrasiyâb, a son-in-law of Changiz Khan, had three sons, the youngest of whom was Tolak Khan. Tolak had two sons Nâshiruddin and Firoz, the latter of whom served under Balban and seized the throne from the son of Kauqubâd. Zafarul Vâli p. 197.

This narrative is legendary.

Beale: Oriental Biographical Dictionary, p. 137 says that Qaem Khan was the father of Jalâuddin. The actual name of Jalâuddin’s father is difficult to find. That Jalâl’s father held the title of Yoghresh Khan is attested by a number of historians.

T.M.S. p. 57.

\(^2\) Zafarul Vâli, p. 755.
Delhi. The palace of Mu‘izzuddin was completed and decorated with fine carvings and inscriptions. A peerless garden on the banks of the Jumna was added to enhance the beauty of the buildings. The sultan desired the elite of the town to construct spacious mansions there. Markets were opened and the place looked like a "New City."^3

A grand darbār was held. The scions of royalty and comrades in arms during the Revolution were meted with royal bounty. Ikhtiyāruddin, the eldest son of the sultan, obtained the title of Khan-i-Khānān and the districts near about Delhi as fief.5. Hisāmuddin, the second son was made Arkān Khan and the youngest Qadr Khan. Malik Ḥusain, the sultan’s uncle, received the title of Tājulmulk. The two nephews ‘Ala‘uddin and Mu‘izzuddin (better known as Almās Bēg) became Amīr-i-Tuzak and Akhūrbeg respectively. Malik Khāmosh, gained the title of Yoghresh Khan, and the post of ‘Āriz-i-Mumālik (Minister of War). The Vazārat was confirmed on Khvaja Khatīr; he had held this office under Balban and Mu‘izzuddin Kaiqubad. The renowned Malikul‘umra too continued to hold his post of the Kotvāl of Delhi. The other noblemen who received honours were Malik Ahmad Chap, who became Naib Barbak, Malik Khurram, who became Vakil-i-dar and Malik Naṣiruddin Kuhrami, who became Ḥājib-i-Khās. Malik Fakhiruddin Kūchī was made Dādbēg or dispen-

^3 Barānī p. 176. says that Kilughāri was given the name of Shahr-i-nau but that is wrong. It was already known as Shahr-i-nau and Mināḥār Sirāj speaks of it as such. Tab. Naṣ. Text pp. 317, 318.
^4 T.M.S. p. 57 and Ferishtah p. 89 give this name.
^5 T.M.S. p. 56.
^6 T.M.S. p. 56 gives this name.
^7 ‘Īsāmī and Yahya give his name as خوش حامش and respectively. Jalāluddin had two brothers Shihāb and Khāmosh. Futūh p. 220.
^8 Zafarul Vālī p. 755.
ser of justice; Malik Hirmanār, Amīr-i-Shikār; and Malik Naṣiruddin Ranah, Shahnāh-i-Pil. Malik A‘izzuddin, another nephew of Jalāluddin became Akhūrbeg-i-Maimna. Some other prominent men like Tājuddin Küchī, Malik Kamāluddin Abdul M‘aālī and Malik Nuṣrat Subah also obtained high posts. As time passed the Khaljī government gained strength. The kindness of Jalāluddin won the confidence of the people and visitors from Delhi were very much impressed with the splendour and magnificence of Kilughari. By and by the people of Delhi, willingly or unwillingly, submitted to the new king; and great and small all went out to Kilughari and paid homage to Firoz Shah.

Character of Jalāluddin.

The new king’s character is clearly reflected in an incident which occurred early in his reign. After Jalāl had been firmly seated on the throne, writes Baranī, he rode one day into Delhi and visited the Red Palace of Balban. The old memories of how he had stood before the throne in years gone by filled his eyes with tears. He got down from his horse at the outer gate of the palace and bowed in obeisance. When Malik Ahmad Chap reminded him that the palace now belonged to him and he should not behave in the way he did, Jalāluddin burst into tears and remonstrated: “You know that nobody among my ancestors has been a king, so that the pride and dignity of kingship might have been inherited by me. Sultan Balban sat here on the throne and I served him. The awe and dignity of that monarch has not left my breast. . . . . This palace had been built by Balban during his Khanship and it is his property and that of his sons and relatives....”9 The 9 Baranī p. 178. The discussion between Ahmad Chap and Jalāl is interesting in so far as it raises the issue whether a palace built by a sultan was his private property or that of the state. In fact there was no distinction between the private property of the sultan and the royal exchequer in medieval old king could not think of sitting on the throne while his colleagues, who, like himself, had served under Balban, remained standing before him. He only took his seat among the nobles and putting his turban to his eyes wept bitterly.\(^\text{10}\)

The touching scene silenced Aḥmad Chap. It also confirmed Jalāluddīn’s generosity and kindheartedness. But the strange behaviour of Firoz did not redound to his credit as the master of an empire so recently won in teeth of so great an opposition. On many other occasions, about which mention would be made presently, the sultan behaved most tactlessly. Both his age and his temperament were responsible for his extreme gentleness. The only punishment he could inflict upon robbers was to send them to some distant place. The only way in which he could castigate rebellious nobles was to cry in their presence and drink with them to remove all cause of misunderstanding. The king was incapable of harbouring any ill-will. Two persons, Sīrājuddīn Sāvī and Manda Ahīr, had given him some cause of resentment during his Khanship. They began to despair of their lives when they heard he had become king. They came to the king, their heads hanging low, their faces all repentence. To the utter surprise of everybody present the sultan not only pardoned them for their misconduct in the past but rewarded them profusely. Sometimes the old king behaved like a child. Once he was tempted to add the title of Almujāhid fi Sabilullah (The Fighter in the Way of God) to his name. Any other sultan would have done so without creating any fuss. Jalāluddin, however, asked Malika-i-Jahān to instruct the barons to suggest to him to do so in open court. But when they actually did so Fīroz at once confessed to them that he himself was responsible for that request and refused to take the title. Such a tactless sovereign was surely a misfit on the throne of Delhi. How Jalāluddīn fell a victim to his nephew’s treachery forms one of the most tragic episodes of medieval history. Never was a man more unsuited to wear the crown than the founder of the Khaljī dynasty. To him kingship was a fraud and its magnificence a few days’ unstable splendour." He actually cursed his enemies not so much for plotting against him as for compelling him to strive for the throne." Careless of fame, he was content with the status of a nobleman than that of the king, for the former was free from all turmoil.

\(^{10}\) Barānī p. 179.

Failure as a king, Firoz was a perfect gentleman and one of the most pious Musalmans of his times. Fortune as well as merit had raised him to the highest pinnacle of greatness, still his elevation had not made him proud. God-fearing and indulgent, affectionate to his family and affectionate to all, he behaved with his nobles not as a king but as a friend.
Jalāl’s span of kingship was short but he had ruled his subjects as a father in a family. He declared himself incapable of tyranny. If his simplicity and his kindness were ridiculed by the worldly people, his age and benevolence were revred by all.

Refractory element was not slow to take advantage of his leniency. Plots began to be hatched against the crown in and outside the capital, and only a couple of months after Jalāluddìn’s accession Malik Chhajjū rose in open revolt.

The Revolt of Malik Chhajjū (1290).

It was Sh’abān 689 (August-September 1290) that Malik Chhajjū Kishli Khan, governor of Kaṇa, unfurled the standard of revolt. Lack of initiative on the part of Jalālud-

11 Baranī p. 179.
12 Ibid. p. 179.
13 T.M.S. p. 63.
din as well as the support that had been promised to him, encouraged him to try to wrest the throne of his forefathers. A large number of Rāvats and Paiks had flocked to his standard. Amir Āli Sarjandār, governor of Avadh, had lent him unflinching support and even a number of Jalālī Amīrs like Malik Tajuddin Kūchī, Malik Muḥammad Qutlagh Khan and Malik Nuṣrat Subah were not lacking in sympathy for him. A section of the nobility and populace of Delhi also considered him a rightful claimant to the throne on account of his relationship with the late Ghayāsuddin Balban. Malik Chhajjū therefore declared independence, assumed the title of sultan Mughisuddin, struck coins and got the Khutbāh read in his name. He collected a large force and advanced upon Delhi.

The news of this formidable revolt lashed Jalāluddin into action. He appointed his eldest son Khan-i-Khānān as vice-regent at Kilughari and himself marched out to crush the rebellion. After crossing the Jumna he divided his troops. One portion of the army was sent in advance under the command of Arkali Khan and the other proceeded under his own command about ten of twelve kos behind his son's.

By forced marches Arkali Khan arrived on river Kalaibnagar, Kāli Nahar of the modern maps. The enemy had 14 According to Ḥāji-uddabīr Arkali was given the command of 12,000 troops Zafarul Vāli p. 755.

15 Ferishtah p. 90.
16 Barani calls it कलाट. ტა. Amīr Khusrau, Yahya and Badaoni call it Rahāb. In all probability it is the present Kali Nahar which joins the Ganga near Kanauj. It would have been unwise on the part of Malik Chhajjū to march north of the Ganga from Kara to cross after some distance both the Ganga and the Jumna to strike at Delhi. He surely marched from Kara on a route in between the two rivers. The river on which the battles were fought cannot, therefore, be Ramganga, as some writers have suggested. Ḥāji calls this river kalat means a castle on the top of mountain. Elliot, Vol. III p. 138, (note) gives the meaning of Kalaib nagar as a natural stronghold.
already reached the other bank and had seized the boats lying on the river. In spite of this initial precaution of Chhajjū Arbali Khan managed to cross Kāli Nahar, which was then in spate, and fell upon the enemy. The “rice-eating” Hindustani foot-soldiers, who formed the advance complains of the rebel were taken by surprise and completely routed. Malik Chhajjū fled towards Chupala. The imperial troops plundered his camp for two whole days and then started in his pursuit. Soon they overtook him and Chhajjū was compelled to give battle. During the engagement the centre of the army was commanded by Arbali Khan himself. He was helped by his two cousins Alā‘uddin and Qutlugh Tighīn, the latter of whom could “split a spear with an arrow.” The right and left wings were put under the charge of Mir Mubarak and Malik Muḥammad respectively. Malik Chhajjū rallied his scattered troops and fought a desperate battle which lasted for a whole day and “during which the sword found no rest.” At night when Chhajjū heard that the sultan was himself coming to join Arbali Khan his heart gave way. He fled away “concealing his departure by the beating of drums, as if he was preparing to renew the combat on the morrow.” The remnant of his troops sought refuge in unconditional surrender. They were pardoned.

It was Bairam Deva Koela, Raja of Koel (Aligarh), who had informed Malik Chhajjū that the army of the sultan was about to join that of the prince and the rebel had escaped unscathed for a second time. Arkali Khan was very much enraged at the behaviour of the Raja. He recrossed the Kali Nahar and attacked Aligarh. Bairam Deva was killed in a fight and Arkali began the pursuit of Chhajjû once again. At last Malik Chhajjû was captured from a fortress in which he had taken refuge. Flushed with victory Arkalî Khan returned to his father.

18 He was younger to Almās Beg. Futūḥ p. 220.

Sultan Jalâluddin after sending the vanguard under Arkalî had for some time followed him closely behind. He had then proceeded towards Bhojpur in Farukhabad district on the western side of the Ganga. After staying there for some time he had crossed the Ganga and ruthlessly punished some Hindus in the land of Kabar (modern Rohilkhand). On his return to Badaon he was joined by Arkalî Khan. The sultan was very much pleased at the brilliant achievements of his son and appointed him governor of Multan. He held a court to deliver judgement on the rebels when he was horrified to see Malik Chhajjû and other great Maliks like Amir ‘Ali Sarjân-där, Malik Alghachi, son of Malik Târghi, and Malik Tâjvard being brought before him in fetters and chains, their heads hanging low, their garments soiled. He ordered the prisoners to be unfettered, bathed, and dressed in clean garments. The ungrateful rebels hung their heads in shame when they pondered how treacherous they had been to such a good king. To the astonishment of the countries, however, Jalâluddin consoled and cheered them up, saying that they had acted rightly in supporting a prince of the dynasty they had served in the past. He treated them with exemplary kindness and offered them cups of wine as if they were his guests. Ahmad Chap did not fail to remained the king that it was contrary to the principles of good government to treat the rebels with such generosity. Such a treatment would tempt many others to try for the throne and create fresh trouble. The king’s reply was 20 Badaonî writes on the authority of Yahya. T.M.S. pp. 63-64.

---

21 Baranî pp. 183-84.
22 Ibid. p. 184.
short and simple. "Oh Ahmad, I also know what kings have done to the rebels (in the past). But I am an old Musalman and am not habituated to shedding the blood of the Musalmans. I am now past seventy and have not killed a single Muḥadi (believer in the Oneness of God)." In short the rebels escaped scot free. Malik Chhajjū was sent to Multan where every comfort was provided for him. His fief of Kāra was given to the charge of ‘Alāūddīn. The trouble having ended the sultan was back in Kilughari on the last day of Muharram 690 (2nd February 1291).

Crimes and conspiracies.

At the capital Jalaluddin engaged himself in internal administration. He was so disinclined to cause pain that many times thieves and Thugs were seized and brought before him but he set them free on promise that they would not commit theft again. On one occasion more than a thousand Thugs were captured. But in place of punishing them severely the king ordered that they should be carried in boats to Lakhnauti and be left there, lest they should continue to harass the countryside (of Delhi).

The treatment meted out to the partisans of Chhajjū and the Thugs encouraged some enterprising barons to indulge in loose talk at convivial parties. The sultan even got an inkling of the affair but overlooked it saying that the people who

---

25 Baranī has بیارت اند نقاب تطاع الطیق. As Hodivālā (p. 266) aptly remarks "This is perhaps the earliest reference in Muslim historical literature to the "Thugs" in the specific sense which the word has now acquired." It is here not used in the general signification of a cheat or swindler but for a peculiar class of highway robbers.

26 Baranī pp. 189-90.
planned under the spell of intoxication should not be taken seriously. One of these days a grand drinking party was held at Malik Tājuddin Kūchī’s, a nobleman of some consequence. As the cups went round, some one opined that the Khaljīs were a worthless lot with the possible exception of Ahmad Chap. 27 At least Jalāluddīn was quite unfit to rule, and the crown would well adorn the head of Malik Tājuddin Kūchī. They all swore allegiance to their host, one promising to kill the sultan with a hunting knife, another with a sword. When the intelligence of the incident reached Jalāluddīn he sent for them and reprimanded them severely. Taking out his sword he threw it before them saying, “If any one of you is man enough he shall take up this sword and come face to face with me.” The tension of the situation was relieved by the sweet-tongued Nuṣrat Subāh, the Sardāvāt ār, who himself had uttered some nonsense at the meeting. He told the sultan that they could never think of plotting against a king who was so dignified, generous and patient, and who treated them almost as his own sons; nor should he think of their destruction as he could not find such faithful and loyal Maliks and Malikzādās such as they. The king was silenced, his anger was subsided, and he pardoned them all but for a token punishment to some. 28

Conspiracy of Sīdī Maula (February-March 1291). 29

These tall talks under a fit of drunkenness were nothing compared to the organised conspiracy of some noblemen under the eegis of one Sīdī Maula. Sīdī had first come from Persia to Ajodhan in the service of Shaikh Farīduddīn

27 Ibid. p. 190.
28 Barānī p. 192.
29 Jalāluddīn returned after crushing Chhajjū’s revolt on 2nd February 1291 and started for Ranthambhor on March 22nd 1291. According to almost all historians the Sīdī Maula episode occured between these two events.
Shakargunj. According to Ferishtah Sidi was a Darvesh (saint) and had come to Delhi in the beginning of Balban’s reign. He recited the Namāz but never visited the Jama’ Masjid and did not pray in congregation. He practised great austerity, ate frugally and denied himself all the pleasures of the senses. He led the life of celibacy and kept no maid-servant or slave. He did not accept anything from the people but spent so lavishly that they suspected him of possessing knowledge of alchemy and natural magic (Kimyā va Simyā). He built a great Khānqāh at Ajod Gate where people flocked from all quarters. He used to pay for what he bought by the queer way of telling the man to take such and such amount from under such and such brick or coverlet, and the tankahs found there looked so bright as if they had been brought from the mint that very moment. So many people dined at Sidi’s table every day that if Barānī is to be believed two thousand man of flour (maida), five hundred man of meat and an equal quantity of ghi (rogan), two to three hundred man of sugar and a hundred to two hundred man of vegetables used to be consumed in his kitchen every day. So much money was spent and so many kinds of dishes were served at the monastry as even the greatest nobles could not afford.

This finds corroboration in the fact that the plot was discovered and suppressed after Khan-i-Khanā’s death and according to Badaonī he died shortly after Chhajjū’s revolt.

31 Ferishtah p. 92.
33 Barānī p. 209.
34 Barānī p. 209. Badaonī Ranking vol. I p. 234, gives a story according to which Jalāluddin once went in disguise
The activities of Sidi showed beyond doubt that he was not a saint in the real sense. He aspired for name and fame and honour. He freely associated with Amīrs and Malikṣ and flirted with politics. When he was leaving Ajodhan for Delhi, Shīkh Farīd, cognizant of Sidi’s nature, had warned him against seeking name and renown or associating too much with noblemen. During Balban’s strict rule it was not possible for him to spend recklessly and openly give “five thousand or ten thousand tankahs to reliable men.” With the coming of the weak and licentious Mu‘izzuddīn, Sīdī’s expenses knew no bounds and he began to attract people. During Jalāluddīn’s reign the congregations began to swell in numbers and great and small, nobles and commoners, began to pay him homage. Even Khan-i-Khanān, the eldest son of the king, become his disciple. The fact appears to be that since Jalāluddīn was past seventy and could die any week, his two elder sons had set their hearts on the throne and tried to strengthen their position even while the king was alive. Thus two parties seem to have been formed at the capital,—one under Khan-i-Khanān, who associated himself with Sīdī and the other under Arkali, who naturally turned hostile to the saint.

35 So openly was Khan-i-Khanān drawn towards Sīdī that the latter used to address him as his son, 36 and there is every reason to think that Khan-i-Khanān financed the establishment of Sīdī Maula. The Turkish Amīrs who had not forgotten their enmity with the Khaljīs also flocked to Sīdī’s Khānqāh. Jalāluddīn’s kindness indirectly encourage the underground activities of these people. Qāzī Jalāl Kāshānī, a very influential and intriguing man closely attached himself to Sīdī’s monastery and saw for himself that he expended even more than was reported.

37 Ferishtah, p. 93.

\[\text{حلال الدين كا شانى كه مرن فتنة ادگنیز و از اعیان باشنا باود-}\] to Sidi Maula and used to pass days and nights with him. Kotvāl Biranj and Hathiya Pāık, the latter of whom was a well reputed wrestler and now had fallen on bad days, joined Sidi. Some other nobles who had lost their jagārs and stipends under the Khaljīs also began to frequent the Khānqāh of Sidi. Soon the number of his followers reached the staggering figure of 10,000.

As time passed people were not slow to understand that the nocturnal meetings of Qaẓī Jalāl Qāshānī, Qaẓī Urdu, and many others at Sidi Maula’s mansion one day would surely bring about some trouble. Kotvāl Biranjtan and Hathiya Pāık even planned an open revolt and decided to assault sultan Jalāluddin on a Friday when he went to Jama’ Masjid for prayers. After finishing Jalāluddin their plan was to declare Sidi as Khalifa and marry him to a daughter of sultan Nasiruddin. Qaẓī Jalāl Qāshānī was to receive the title of Qaẓī Khan and the jagār of Multan. Jagārs and offices were to be distributed among the sons of the nobility of Balban. As generally happens one of the persons present there turned approver and plainly told the sultan of all that had transpired at Sidi’s place. All the conspirators were instantly arrested, beaten and fettered, and then dragged to the presence of the king. The more Jalāluddin asked them to make confessions the more they professed their innocence. It was not the custom in those days to extort confession by torture, and

38 Ibid p. 93.
40 It appears that the death of Khan-i-Khanān about this time had weakened the party. Ferishtah, however, leaves the impression that he died after Sidi’s execution. Ferishtah, p. 94.
41 Badaoni, Ranking vol. I p. 234.
42 Barani p. 211. Here the historian most probably compares the days of ‘Alāúddin when torture was commonly practised.
therefore, it was decided to test their veracity by ordeal of fire. A fierce fire was lighted at Bahārpur and the king proceeded there accompanied by his nobles and the accused. All the learned and important men of the city assembled there, and the people of Bahārpur only added to the crowd. The sultan ordered that the accused should be made to sit in the fire and if they were truthful they would escape unscathed. But the Ulamā dissented. Ordeal by fire, argued the jurists, was contrary to reason and forbidden by law. The quality of fire was to burn, and it made no distinction between the guilty and not-guilty. Moreover Sīdī and his henchmen could not be declared guilty since the accusation levelled against them by only one man had not been confirmed by witnesses.

The persistent refusal of the accused to confess anything exasperated the sultan. There was no way of proving their guilt, but to all appearances a conspiracy had been hatched and Jalaluddin was determined to punish the offenders. Qāzī Jalāl Kāshānī was transferred as Qāzī of Badaun. The sons of nobles understood to be partisans in the clique were exiled to various places and their property was confiscated. Biranjtan and Hathiya Pāik, who had taken the responsibility of killing the king were severely punished. Sīdī Maula, fettered and chained, was brought before the king. His very presence threw Jalāl into a rage and he addressed Shaikh Abu Bakr Ṭūsī of the Haidri order, who was present there with his disciples, to avenge him of Sīdī Maula. Bahri, a follower of the order, attacked Sīdī with a razor and hamstinged him. They shaved off his whiskers to the chin and stabbed him in the side with a sack-makers needle. Meanwhile Arkali Khan

---

43 Baranī p. 211.

44 The order of the Haidri Qalandars was founded by Shaikh Najmuddin Ṭūsī. The Qalandars shave off their head and face and even eye-brows. It is, therefore, customary with them to keep a razor. Consequently Bahri was able to whip out a razor and attack Sīdī.
who entertained ideas of hostility towards Sidi beackoned to an elephant driver who drove the animal over the victim and crushed him to death.

The death of Sidi Maula was too much for an orthodox Maulana like Ziyūddin Baranī to stand. He had visited the Shaikh a number of times and had had the privilege of dining at his mansion.⁴⁵ Therefore he associates some unpleasant happenings to such an unjust execution. According to him on the day of the Shaikh’s death a black wind-storm covered the sky and from that day the Jalālī government lost its stability. Shortly after, the rains stopped. Delhi witnessed one of the most terrible famines. The price of grains rose to a san or tankah and the people forgot the taste of bread.⁴⁶ Peasants⁴⁷ of Sivalik flocked into Delhi and in batches of twenty or thirty flung themselves into the Jumna. The sultan and his nobles tried their utmost to ameliorate the distress but could do little.⁴⁸ Next year so havy were the rains that people hardly remembered ever to have witnessed the like of them. It was only after constant prayers that conditions became normal in about two years' time.⁴⁹

The closing remarks of Baranī lead one to the inference that Sidi was unjustly punished and died a martyr’s death. But that is not so. It is true that the sentence of death was hastily awarded and a thorough inquiry was not made, but that a conspiracy was hatched against the sultan in which Sidi was seriously implicated is clearly attested in the narrative of Baranī himself. The revolt of Malik Chhajjū, the gauntlets thrown at Malik Tājuddīn’s, and the open talks that Jalāluddin was a misfit on the throne, had sufficiently ⁴⁵ Baranī p. 209.

---

⁴⁶ Futūḥ. p. 212.
⁴⁷ Baranī has Hindus.
⁴⁸ Futūḥ. p. 212.
⁴⁹ Futūḥ. p. 213.
exasperated the sultan. Following upon these came the blood-curdling conspiracy, in which Jalāluddin was to be killed, Sidi was to marry a royal princess and become Khalifā. No other king would have tolerated all that happened at Sidi’s for months together. The politician-cum-saint would have received the same doom at the hands of any other king. Jalāluddin was quite justified in ordering Sidi’s execution.

Abortive Expedition to Ranthambhor (1291 A.D.).

Soon after Sidi’s execution sultan Jalāluddin marched with a large force towards the fortress of Ranthambhor on Thursday 18th Rabī‘ al-Awwal 690 (22nd March 1291). Since Ikhtiyāruddin Khan-i Khanān, the eldest son of the sultan had died, Jalāluddin left his second son Arkali Khan as viceroy (naib) at Kilughari. The king left Śirī for Lohravat and proceeded to Chandaval where he stayed for some time. In 50 According to Yahya, three days after Sidi’s death a pit 10 yards (gaz) long and three yards wide was dug out and a great fire kindled for the purpose of throwing into it the remaining adherents of the Maula. But Arkali Khan interposed on their behalf and they were released.

---

T. M. S. p. 67.

It is quite probable. Arkali’s staunch enemy having been executed no useful purpose could have been served by killing his followers.

51 For the situation of the fortress see chapter viii note 8.

52 This is the date of Amir Khusrau, Elliot, vol. III p. 540. Oriental College Magazine Lahore, Text, November 1936 p. 28. Barani wrongly has 689.

53 Barani p. 213.

54 Elliot vol. III p. 540 wrongly has Sohrail. Oriental College Magazine Text of Miftāḥ al Fubūḥ, Nov. 1936, p. 28, correctly has Lohravat. The village then lying to the west of Śirī is not traceable now. It was here that Naṣiruddin Khusrau lost the throne to Ghazi Tughlaq in 1320.

55 It lay south-west of Delhi on the road to the Deccan.
two more marches they reached Rewari\(^56\) lying about fifty miles south west of Delhi. The march was continued and they arrived at Narnaul a town lying south west of Rewari. They crossed the sandy tracts of Rajputana where “the people had their mouths shut through thirst and a hundred camels were laden with water to satisfy the necessities of the army.” After a fortnight’s march they arrived on the borders of Ranthambhor. A reconnoitring party was sent in advance to collect information while the soldiers busied themselves in plundering the neighbourhood of Jhain.\(^57\) During these operations the Turks used poisoned arrows and killed many.\(^58\)

It was then decided to attack the city of Jhain itself. A force of 1,000 strong was despatched under officers like Malik Khurram; Malik Qutlagh Tighin; Ažam Mubarak, Amir of Narnaul; Āḥmad Sarjandār; Maḥmūd Sarjandār; the chief huntsman Āḥmad; and Abaji Akhūrbeg. Alarm soon spread in Jhain. The Rai sent one Gurdan Saini with a force of 10,000 Ravats to check the advance of the Turks. Gurdan Saini was a great general and had led several expeditions into the country of Malwa and Gujarat.\(^59\) But after a severe engagement he was killed and the Hindus fled pell-mell.\(^60\) The chieftain of Jhain took shelter in the hills of Ranthambhor and three days after this signal victory Jalāluddin entered Jhain. He greatly admired the beautiful figures, carvings and exquisite colours on stone and wood in the Raja’s palace. He also visited the temples ornamented with elaborate work in gold and silver. But his aesthetic tastes were overshadowed by his iconoclastic fervour. He ordered their destruction and thus "made a hell of paradise."61 Two large bronze images of Brahma, each weighing "more than a thousand man," were broken into pieces and the fragments were distributed among officers for throwing them at the gates of Jama’ Masjid at Delhi.62 A plundering party was despatched under Maḥmūd Sarjandār to sack Malwa also, after crossing the rivers Chambal and Kuwari.63 The expedition was a success. Temples were destroyed and the royalists returned with plunder and loot.64

\(^{56}\) It was the jagir of Malik Naib during the reign of 'Alāūddin.

\(^{58}\) "But only one man was killed among the royal troops.”

\(^{60}\) Ibid. pp. 33-34.

The Rana of Ranthambhor,65 says Barānī, together with the Rais and Muqaddams and their families shut themselves up in the fort and prepared to stand a siege. Jalāluddin ordered construction of war engines like Maghrabi, Sabāt and Gargach66 to encircle the fort. He proceeded to Ranthambhor to reconnoitre the fort personally but returned to Jhain the same day. He plainly told his officers that he would not be able to capture it.67 A large number of soldiers would be killed even in raising a pashīb and constructing gargach and

---

61 Elliot vol. III, p. 542.
63 Also Barānī, p. 213.
64 Elliot, vol. III p. 542.
65 Futūh pp. 216-17.
67 Barānī p. 213.
the sultan was not prepared to waste so many lives nor dared he see face to face the widows and orphans of the dead. The strange argument of the sultan prompted Malik Ahmad Chap to waste some lessons on statecraft. "Whenever a conqueror has determined on some expedition no consideration had deflected him from attaining his object. If Your Majesty returns without taking the citadel, the Raja of this place will become proud and your kingly dignity will be lowered in the breasts of men." But the non-virile sultan had made up his mind to return. Boasting that "he did not value even ten such forts above a single hair of a Musalm-an," he struck the camp and arrived at the capital on the 3rd of Jamadiul Akhir 690 (June 2, 1291).

Mongol invasion 1292.

The disgraceful retreat from Ranthambhor was followed by another disaster. In 691 H. (1291-92 A.D.) ‘Abdullah, a grandson of Halaku Khan of Persia, advanced with a force of 150,000 Mughals. On receiving the news sultan Jalal-

---

68 Baranî, pp. 214, 215.
69 Ibid. p. 213.
Elliot vol. III p. 543.
71 The account of this invasion by ‘Ishâmî is misleading. He puts it in the beginning of Jalâl’s reign and says that Malik Khâmosh and not the king commanded the Indian army. Futuâh. pp. 203-08.
72 Baranî p. 218.
73 Baranî has  عبد الله نبی علی نامب shah means a relation, a grandson. Hallu is surely a mistake for Halaku conqueror of Persia and grandson of Changiz.
74 Baranî, p. 218, has ten to fifteen tumans. Ferishtah p. 94, has ten tumans. A tuman consisted of 10,000 horse.
uddin marched out of the capital to encounter the Mughals.\textsuperscript{75} By forced marches he arrived on the confines of Sannam,\textsuperscript{76} where the Mongol vanguard had already arrived. The river Sindh separated the two armies and preparations to fight a decisive battle were made on both sides.\textsuperscript{77} Meanwhile small skirmishes were desultorily fought between detached parties of the rival forces in which the enemy was worsted.\textsuperscript{78} One day a portion of the Mongol army crossed the river and joined in a fearful battle with the royal vanguard. According to Baranī the enemy was completely defeated and a large number of them were slain. About a thousand Mongol officers, commanders of a hundred horse (Amīrān-i-Sadah), fell into the hands of the Indian army. About this time negotiations for a truce were started and after some formalities a meeting was arranged between 'Abdullah and Jalāluddin. They met on terms of cordiality and presents were exchanged on both sides. ‘Abdullah returned to his native land but Alghu, or Ulugh Khan, who was also related to Changīz, together with some high officers remained in this country and accepted Islam. Jalāluddin married one of his daughters to Alghu and he and his 4,000 adherents\textsuperscript{79} came with their families to the capital.

\textsuperscript{75} According to 'Isāmī the Indian army consisted of 30,000 horse. \textit{Futūh} p. 206.

\textsuperscript{76} Baranī has \textit{ barrām } following on Baranī has \textit{ barrām}. But in all probability it is Sannam on the north west frontier. 'Isāmī also has Barrām and says that the engagement was fought near river Sindh. \textit{Futūh} p. 205.

Badaoni, has Sanām, \textit{Ranking} vol. I p. 236.

\textsuperscript{77} The Indians were always on the defensive. Either on account of fear or for a point of strategy Indians never took to offensive in fighting the Mughals. Even the war-lord ‘Alāʻuddin never attacked the mongols first.

\textsuperscript{78} Baranī, also \textit{Ferishtah} p. 94.

\textsuperscript{79} \textit{Ferishtah} p. 94.
city. They were granted facilities and allowances by the king. They fixed their colonies in Ghayāspur, Indarpat, Kilughari and Taluka, which were known as Mughalpura. They mixed up with the people of the country and came to be known as neo-Muslims.

The narrative of Baranī leaves the impression on the reader's mind that the Mongols lost against the royaltists and were granted a treaty by the king. But the fact is that Jalāluddin had not dared face the 150,000 Mongols in a major encounter and had hurried to make a settlement, giving the Mongols very favourable terms. True, he had defeated the Mongols on many former occasions but in his old age he had lost all vigour and virility and during the seven years of his rule he was an extreme pacifist.

Some minor campaigns of Jalāluddin (1292-95)

The Mongol trouble having concluded, Jalāluddin turned his attention to state affairs. He gave the governorship of Lahore, Multan and Sindh to Arkali Khan, ostensibly to check the Mongols. About the end of 691 H. (1292 A.D.) he led two minor campaigns and was successful at both. First he advanced on Mandor and took it in the very first assault. He pillaged its environs and returned with a large amount of booty. His second attack was directed against Jhaīn which he had once before raided during his march to Ranthambhor.

80 All these lay in the suburbs of Delhi and on the west bank of the Jumna. Indarpat was in north, Kilughari in middle and Ghayāspur in south. In Ghayaspur lies the tomb of Nizāmuddin Aulia. Taluka (تالک) cannot be identified.

81 Mughalpura is still the name of a village near Delhi and is indicated in the map prefixed to Thomas: Chronicles. According to Badaoni Ghayāspur and Mughalpura are synonymous, Ranking vol. 1 p. 236.
82 Baranī p. 219.
83 Firishtah p. 94.
84 Tab. Akb., wrongly has Mandu.
These victories of Jalāluddin were followed by a brilliant feat of 'Alāūddin at Bhilsa and then at Devagiri. The last days of Jalāluddin were eclipsed by the brilliant achievements of 'Alāūddin in south India, who henceforward played the chief role in the arena of Indian history.
CHAPTER III
‘ALAŪDDIN AS PRINCE (1290-1296)

Early Life

‘Alaūddin, also known as ‘Alī or Garshāsp, was a son of Shihābuddin Masʿūd Khaljī, a brother of Jalāluddin.¹ Shihābuddin had four sons—‘Alī, Almās Bēg, Qutlugh Taghīn and Muḥammad.² We have some knowledge of the later life of ‘Alī (‘Alaūddin) and Almās Bēg, but hardly any of the other two others. Qutlugh Taghrīn has only once been mentioned as having fought against Malik Chhajjū.³ Muḥammad was the father of Sulaimān, otherwise known as Ikat Khan.⁴ It appears that Shihābuddin had died quite a long time before Jalāluddīn’s accession because he is not even once mentioned in the history of the latter’s reign, and also because his eldest son ‘Alī was brought up under the affectionate care of his uncle Jalāluddin.⁵

The details of ‘Alaūddin’s childhood and youth are buried in obscurity. It is strange indeed that the chroniclers never cared to write about the early life of a prince whose brilliant career marks him out as one of the greatest personalities of Medieval India. No contemporary historian gives the date of ‘Alaūddin’s birth. Only Ḥajiuddabīr (an early seven-

¹ Not much known about him except that he was a brave warrior (Deval Rani p. 54) and that like his brother Jalāl he also had been in the service of Balban.
² Futūh. p. 220.
³ Miftāhul Futūḥ, Elliot, III, p. 538.
⁴ ‘Isāmī and Ferishtah mention both the name and the title. Barānī mentions only the title of Ikat Khān.
⁵ Barānī p. 234, Ferishtah p. 89.
teenth century historian) says that ‘Alāʾuddīn was thirty four years of age when he marched out to the conquest of Ranthambhor (1300-1301). If this date be taken to be correct, ‘Alāʾuddīn was born about the year 1266-67. As a child he does not appear to have received regular lessons in reading and writing. But in his youth he had been given sufficient training in the use of arms, riding and other sports. His early victories clearly indicate his having received excellent training in swordsmanship and other manly exercises.

‘Alāʾuddīn gave a good account of himself during the Khalji coup d’etat. On Jalāʾuddīn’s accession ‘Alāʾuddīn, who was nephew as well as son-in-law of the sultan, was appointed Master of Ceremonies (Amīr-i-Tuzuk) while his younger brother Almas Beg, to whom another daughter of the sultan was married, was made Master of the Horse (Akhūrbeg). Within a short time of his elevation ‘Alāʾuddīn made a singular exhibition of his military talents in the campaign against Malik Chhajjū. The trouble soon put down, but the incident brightened the future prospects of ‘Alāʾuddīn. He was appointed governor of Kara (1291).

‘Alāʾuddīn in Kara (1291-96).

This appointment proved to be a turning point in the prince’s career. At Kara the conditions were far from peaceful. No doubt Malik Chhajjū’s revolt had been crushed, but not so the spirit of the disaffected Amīrs. They regarded 6 Zafarul Vālī p. 785.

7 Vide Chapter I.
8 So has Baranī. The author of T.M.S. says that he was appointed Akhūrbeg-i-Maimna. Ferishtah simply says that ‘Alāʾuddīn was admitted into the corps of high class nobles.
9 Baranī does not say when the princesses were married to ‘Alāʾuddīn and Almas Beg. Ferishtah (p. 89) says that they were married after Jalāʾuddīn had settled down in Kilughari. ‘Īṣāmī (Futūḥ, p. 231) calls ‘Alāʾuddīn the elder son-in-law.
Jalāluddīn as a usurper and a weakling, and one, who with a little organised effort could easily be removed from the throne. They had been at the back of Chhajjū’s revolt, and now suggested to the new governor in the very year of his arrival in Kara, the possibility of recruiting a large army and making a bid for the throne. They also emphasised that money was very essential for that purpose; because the rebellion of Malik Chhajjū had failed for want of sufficient resources in gold and silver.

‘Alā‘uddīn’s Domestic unhappiness.

This tempting advice did not fall upon deaf ears. ‘Alā‘uddīn himself thirsted for a diversion from the miseries of an unhappy home. Eversince his marriage with Jalāluddīn’s daughter, he had not been happy with her. As a royal princess she tried to dominate over her husband. The sudden rise of her father had made her exceedingly vain. Her impudence greatly distressed ‘Alā‘uddīn but he was avers to bringing the disobedience of his wife before the sultan. All the same he smarted under a sense of humiliation10 and used to consult his associates how to end his troubles. Ḥājiuddabīr elucidates the cause of misunderstanding between ‘Alā‘uddīn and his consort. He says that ‘Alā‘uddīn had two wives,—one, the daughter of the sultan, and the other Māhrū, a sister of Malik Sanjar, later known as Alp Khan. Intelligence of the fact that ‘Alā‘uddīn had another wife enraged the king’s daughter and she began to pry into the affairs of her husband.11 One day when the

10 Futūḥ p. 221.
11 Zafarul Vālī has البِحَجَة for Māhrū. It is really strange how, if Māhrū was a wedded wife, Jalāluddīn’s daugher had no previous knowledge of the fact. Later events, however, clearly show that Māhrū was legally married to ‘Alā‘uddīn. At his accession she become the chief queen, Malka-i-Jahān, and her son Khizr Khan was declared heir-apparent.
amorous couple were tête-à-tête in a garden, Jalāluddīn’s daughter arrived on the scene and began to belabour Māhrū with her sandal. ‘Alāūddīn could hardly bear this insult and in a fit of violence he assaulted his uncle’s daughter with his sword but luckily she escaped only with a few minor injuries.\textsuperscript{12}

This incident was duly reported to the Sultan but he took no notice of it.\textsuperscript{13} Not only that, the behaviour of his mother-in-law had made ‘Alāūddīn miserable still. The Malika-i-Jahan had got scent of his ambitions and kept a close watch upon him. She warned her old and vacillating husband about ‘Alāūddīn’s alleged intentions of establishing an independent principality in some remote corner of the country.\textsuperscript{14} She even encouraged her daughter to behave arrogantly towards her husband. At Kara ‘Alāūddīn breathed a sigh of relief. Here he was away from the indifference of the Sultan, the dominance of the Malka-i-Jahān, and the priggishness of his imperious wife. He began to ponder over his past and to plan out his future. His one idea was to keep away from the two shrews. It is difficult, however, to assign to the princess and her mother the entire blame for ‘Alāūddīn’s domestic unhappiness, because he himself was not without faults. He was hard-hearted and uncompromising.

Meanwhile Sultan Jalāluddīn’s prestige had suffered a setback. There had been conspiracies among Turkish Amīrs against him and he had not been able to subdue the city of Delhi. He had neither the capacity to punish the rebels nor the generosity to reward his partisans. His retreat from Ranthambhor was disgraceful enough; but his conclusion of a temporary truce with the Mughal invader was worse still.

\textsuperscript{12} Zafarul Vālī p. 154.

\textsuperscript{13} According to Ibn Baṭṭutah the sultan’s indifference towards ‘Alāūddīn’s family troubles very much strained the relations between the king and his nephew.

\textsuperscript{14} Firishtah p. 94.
Particularly his giving his daughter in marriage to Alghū must have produced a very bad impression on the nobility and populace of Delhi. In distant Kara, the rendezvous of the discontented Amīrs, the stories of the sultan’s disgrace and defeat must have been repeated with added warmth to ‘Alāūddin who himself must have felt humiliated at the cowardice of his uncle and father-in-law. But he did not give expression to his resentment as Malik Aḥmad Chap so often did. He continued to protest his obedience and loyalty.

‘Alāūddin’s raid on Bhilsa 1292.

Towards the end of the year 691 A.H. (1292 A.D.) ‘Alāūddin requested the Sultan’s permission to invade Bhilsa. The latter had just accomplished the conquest of Mandor, capturing it in the very first attack. He had also raided and plundered Jhain for the second time. The request of ‘Alāūddin at that time was, therefore, quite welcome to him, and he readily gave his consent. ‘Alāūddin left Kara and cleared the road to Ujjain on which lay the town of Bhilsa. His sudden arrival there created much consternation in the city. The frightened inhabitants concealed their idols in the bed of the Betwa, to save them from population at the hands of the Musalmans, but the prince had them hauled out of the river. After breaking a number of temples and capturing enormous booty ‘Alāūddin proceeded to Delhi to pay his respects to the sultan. He carried with him a variety of articles of plunder together with a massive idol, which was loaded 15 Bhilsa lies on the river Betwa. It is a railway station on the G.I.P. Ry. 34 miles north-east of Bhopal.

16 Mandor lies 4 miles north of Jodhpur. A mosque then built there is still in existence and contains a broken inscription. At the time of this invasion Mandor was in possession of Songra Chouhan Sāmant Singh. (Marvār kā Itihās Hindi by B. N. Reau. p. 15).
on a cart. Jalāluddīn was immensely pleased at the results of his nephew's adventure. He ordered the captured idol to be laid at the Badaon Gate to be trampled upon by the faithful and rewarded 'Alāūddīn with the post of Minister of War (‘Āriz-i-Mumālik) and added Avadh to his iqṭa' of Kara.

At Bhilsa 'Alāūddīn had heard of the fabulous wealth of Devagiri. He had made up his mind to invade the kingdom once he had assembled an adequate army at Kara, but he nursed his ambition secretly. Now when he saw the king so kindly disposed towards him and the revenues of Avadh added to those of Kara, he begged for another favour from the Sultan. "Chanderi and its neighbours" he represented "are free (from payment of revenue) and are ignorant (heedless) of the army of Delhi. If it be your pleasure I shall employ new troops and retainers with the revenues of my fiefs so as to attack these places and bring countless booty . . . and deposit everything in the Imperial Treasury." The unsuspecting monarch, who had no idea of the extent of 'Alāūddīn's ambitions, nor even of the intensity of his estrangement with his wife and mother-in-law, gave the requisite permission to raise a new army; and tempted by the prospects of a rich booty he remitted the revenues of Kara and Avadh. 'Alāūddīn returned to Kara and began to make preparations to invade Chanderi. This was the opportunity for which he had thirsted for so long a time. He had now both men and money. His plans had begun well.

18 Tab. Akb. and Ferishtah have two brass idols.
19 Barani p. 220.
20 The total revenue of a province is known as mahāsil, and what is left after defraying the expences of administration is known as favāzil. The latter is sent to the Imperial exchequer, but 'Alāūddīn was permitted to withhold both. Barani. p. 220.
21 Barani. p. 221.
The Kingdom of Devagiri.

The great Maratha kingdom of Devagiri lay between north India and the Deccan peninsula. To the north of Devagiri stood the mighty Vindhyas and to the north and northwest of it were situated the kingdoms of Malwa and Gujarat. In the east and south were situated the kingdoms of Telangana and the Hoysalas respectively, and in the west were the Western Ghats. Protected by the Vindhyas on the north it remained outside the operational sphere of the foreign invaders who incessantly poured into northern India from the eighth to the thirteenth century, carrying away untold wealth from towns and temples alike and leaving misery and desolation behind. But at the close of the thirteenth century conditions changed, and the piercing eye of the ambitious Alauddin found a passage and a pretext for its conquest.

At that time the kingdom was ruled by a Yadava king named Ram Chandra. The Yadavas claimed for themselves an ancient pedigree. Their bards spoke of them as descendants of no less a personage than Lord Krishna himself. Formerly Yadava rulers were feudatory chiefs of the Chalukyas, but about the end of the twelfth century Bhillama Yadava was successful in throwing off their yoke, and in seizing the whole country north of the river Krishna. But the credit of raising the minor kingdom to one of the greatest powers of the Deccan goes to Singhana, who ruled in the first half of the thirteenth century. He successfully invaded Malwa and 22 Devagiri or Deogir of Muslim chronicles is the modern Daulatabad in the Hyderabad state, 19.57N, 75.15E.

---

23 Bhillama's reign commenced in 1185 and not in 1187 A.D. as assumed by Dr. Fleet. This fact is revealed by the discovery of two contemporary inscriptions. The earliest record which mentions Devagiri as the capital of the Yadavas belongs to the reign of Jaitpala, a predecessor of Singhana and is dated Saka 1119 (1196 A.D.)

Gujarat, conquered lower Konkan, and snatched away the southern Maratha country from the Hoysala chief. He died after a long and brilliant reign in 1247, and was succeeded by his grandson Krishna II. When he died, in 1260, the crown devolved on his brother Mahādeva, who ruled until 1271, when Ram Chandra, son of Krishna II, succeeded him. And it was this monarch who, in his old age, and after a long and successful reign had to face the unexpected invasion of 'Alāūddin and to make an abject surrender to a foreign foe. 'His early years were prosperous enough. His armies invaded both Malwa and Mysore and he was unquestionably the greatest king in Peninsular India. A hectic splendour, too illuminated his reign. In it flourished the minister Hemadri or Hemadpant. In it also appeared Dyandev, the first of the great Maratha poets of the Pandharapur school.'

Thus during the course of the thirteenth century the kingdom of Devagiri had witnessed all round progress under the two capable Yadava kings, Singhana and Ram Chandra.

It appears that the Yadava Empire in the time of Singhana was as extensive as that ruled by the ablest monarchs of the preceding dynasties. The full titles of a paramount sovereign are given to Singhana in his inscriptions, such as "the supporter of the whole world," "the love of the earth" (Prithvivallabha) and "king of kings". (Bhandarkar: Early History of the Deccan, p. 194.) The early history of the family is to be found partly in epigraphic records, and partly in the introduction to Hemadri's Vratakhand. The Puranic genealogy is perhaps given most fully by Hemadri. (J. F. Fleet: Dynasties of the Kanarese Districts, Bombay, 1836, p. 511.)

26 Hemadpant was also a great builder. The Hemadpanthi architectural style of south India is named after this Hemadpant, the Brahman counsellor of the Yadava kings of Devagiri.

"For twenty five years Ram Chandra had ruled prosperously. The valour of his armies guarded his far flung frontier. The wisdom of Hemadpant secured the prosperity of his subjects and filled the treasury of the monarch."27 Apart from territorial acquisitions Devagiri had also been enriched by its booming trade and commerce which are apt to flourish in a country enjoying perpetual peace internally. No foreign raiders had robbed the treasures of the country, and 'Alāūddīn had learnt at Bhilsa that Ram Chandra had inherited a huge treasure accumulated by his ancestors.28 The social practices of the times and especially the use of various kinds of gold ornaments by the Hindus had made gold a household commodity, while the treasuries of the kingdom were full of precious metals and precious stones.

Such was the wealth of Devagiri which had fired 'Alāūddīn’s imagination and had whetted his appetite for a conquest unique in the annals of Indo-Muslim history.

This book assigns only twenty-three years to Ram Chandra’s rule, but he had ruled for twenty-five years, from 1271 to 1296, when ‘Alāūddīn invaded Devagiri.
28 Ferishtah p. 95.
CHAPTER IV

'ALÀÜDDIN'S EXPEDITION TO DEVAGIRI

After making adequate preparations 'Alàüddin left Kaça for Devagiri with 8,000¹ horse on Saturday the 19th of Rabiul-Akhir 695 (26th February 1296).² He kept his real intentions a secret and gave out that he was marching out to the conquest of Chanderi³—a Rajput fortress in Central India, about a hundred miles north of the Vindhya mountains. Malik 'Alàülmulk, uncle of Ziya Barànì, was the prince's confidant in his project. He was appointed to look after the administration of Kaça during the latter's absence as well as to send fabricated news to the sultan about the movements of the prince. 'Alàüddin went as far as Chanderi openly, and therefrom his movements became obscure. From Chanderi he dashed on to Bhilsa. He had taken special care to see that no time was wasted on this march and had scoured all the roads in his last expedition to Bhilsa.⁴ He tackled the Vindhya mountains with great assiduity. Marching through irregular hills and crossing swift flowing rivers⁵ he arrived at Ellich-

¹ With his increased revenues he was enabled to recruit 3 to 4 thousand horse and 2 thousand foot. Barànì p. 222, Ferishtah p. 95.
² Khzāín. p. 5.
³ At present Chanderi is only a small village lying about 20 miles west of Lalitpur, Jhansi Division. In 1293-5 the town of Chanderi was situated very close to this spot. It is curious indeed that between 1304 and 1307, in 'Alàüddin's own times, Chanderi shifted to its present site. Arch. Sur. Ind. Report 1924-25, p. 168.
⁴ Barànì p. 222.
⁵ Muslim Chroniclers emphasise that 'Alàüddin selected a short route "through the jungle." This does not seem to be correct. The points on his march indicate his taking to the then known route to the Decan, which, all the same, lay through numerous jungles.
pur. His plan from the very start was to return from the expedition as soon as possible. Indeed, in those circumstances the time-factor was of great importance. ʿAlāʿuddīn could not have stayed in the Deccan longer than warranted by his professed intention of the campaign to Chanderi lest he should have aroused opposition of powerful Hindu kings in the Deccan as well as of the barons at Delhi. He had undertaken the expedition without the king’s permission, and his failure to return to Kaṭa in time would have given a handle to his enemies to misrepresent him. He, therefore, marched straight to Ellichpur without taking rest or disturbing rulers on the way. At Ellichpur, however, he halted for two days to allow the troops to shake off the fatigue of the long and toilsome journey, and to reorganise his forces for now Devagiri was not far. To lull the suspicions of the neighbouring towns ʿAlāʿuddīn set a rumour afloat that he was a disaffected nobleman of the court of Jalāluddīn, and had come to seek service with the Raja of Rājmundri in Telingāna, a vassal of the Yadava king.

After a forced march ʿAlāʿuddīn crossed a pass known as Ghati Lajaurā or Lasaurā, about twelve miles west of Devagiri. The valley was governed by Kānhaṇī, a brave Hindu chief who owed allegiance to Ram Chandra. Kānhaṇī summoned his friends and prepared to fight. In his sīfe there lived two ladies of high rank well versed in the art of warfare.

6 Ellichpur lies in Berar. At the time of ʿAlāʿuddīn’s invasion it was a northern outpost of the Yadava dominions. Throughout the Medieval times it was a flourishing centre of trade and commerce. Ellichpur became the chief military station of Berar under the Mughals.

Also see Chahār Gulshān, Bankipur Ms. fol. 85.

7 Ferishtah p. 95.

8Lajaurā, Lasaurā or Lasaur lies s. w. of Devagiri very close to the latter. Also see the map attached to J. N. Sarkar’s A short history of Aurangzeb.
When these chivalrous women heard of the invaders they joined Kānhaṇ with a large retinue. In the battle that ensued these ‘tigresses’ charged the enemy with such fury that he was compelled to fall back some distance. In the second charge, however, the latter advanced with greater determination and the southerners were defeated. The vanquished army retreated precipitately; its rout was complete and its losses heavy.⁹

‘Alāūdīn had, no doubt, won the battle, but he had at the same time seen the mettle of the southerners. Before marching forward to his main objective Devagiri he addressed his officers and men and brought home to them the idea of the rough work that lay ahead. “In a country,” said he, “where women do not retreat before us... I do not know what men would do to us on the field of battle.”¹⁰ He not only frightened his troops with likely dangers but also tempted them by visualising to them the wealth that they would obtain in plunder and spoliation. The soldiers one and all swore for the second time, to fight and win. This done, ‘Alāūdīn proceeded onward.

So far no Muslim army had ventured into the south. Great consternation overtook the king and the inhabitants of the country. To add to Ram Chandra’s intrepidity his son

⁹ Futūḥ. pp. 223-24. ‘Isāmī wrote about eight years before Barānī finished his history, and at many places the former gives better information than the latter. In this expedition particularly ‘Isāmī is more to be trusted because:

(a) He wrote at Devagiri itself.
(b) He wrote after listening to many trustworthy accounts (See Authorities).
(c) His narrative written before Barānī’s is quite corroborative of the latter. ‘Isāmī seems to be a good connoisseur of facts.

¹⁰ Futūḥ. p. 223.
Singhana Deva\textsuperscript{11} had marched southwards on an expedition with the choicest contingents of the Maratha forces. This was in accordance with the military traditions of the past.\textsuperscript{12} Ferishtah’s statement that Singhana was away on a pilgrimage is not plausible, as there was no reason for his taking the best troops of the kingdom with him. Mr. Aiyangar also thinks that when ‘Alaūddin made his plans he had definite information that the main army of Ram Deva had marched towards the Hoysala frontier under his son.\textsuperscript{13} The old king saw no alternative now—when the enemy was already marching into the city—but to throw reinforcements into the citadel and stand a siege. The fortress of Devagiri is situated on an isolated cone-shaped hill 640 feet high. The steepness and height of the rock required a minimum of defences. But walls, bastions, and a moat cut 50 feet deep into solid rock, made up for the little deficiencies left by nature.\textsuperscript{14} But for some time past the Yadavas had felt too powerful to care for their own defence, so that at the time of ‘Alaūddin’s invasion the moat was lying dry and unprotected, and the garrison was \textsuperscript{11} Deval Rani pp. 85, 86, has Singhana Deva. Again both Amir Khusru and ‘Isāmī give the name of the second son so Bhilam, (Futūh. pp. 226, 326). But Sir W. Haig (Camb. Hist. of India, vol. III) and some other writers give the names of the two sons as Shanker Deva and Bhīm Deva. Ferishtah’s Sankhal or Sankhan and Bhīm are wrong. The correct names are Singhana and Bhillama, so common in the royal genealogies of the Yadavas.

\textsuperscript{13} Aiyangar p. 77.

\textsuperscript{14} The fortress still stands, peerless in beauty and strength, but the capital of the Yadavas is now only a village ten miles from Aurangabad.

short of provisions.\textsuperscript{15} Incidently, however, a few merchants from fear of the invading army had left some bags, and these had been seized and put into the fort.

Ram Chandra had retreated into the fort but the lower city, especially the part which was later known as Katakah,\textsuperscript{16} was left at the mercy of the invader. It was thoroughly sacked and every single house in it was put to plunder.\textsuperscript{17} Influential Brahmans and chief merchants of the city were taken prisoner. 'Ala'uddin also captured thirty to forty elephants and a thousand horse from the stables of the Maratha king.\textsuperscript{18} In the meantime the crafty Turk circulated yet another rumour. He declared that his army was only a vanguard of the twenty thousand Imperial horsemen who were following behind. Ill-equipped with men, weapons and provision, Ram chandra could not have stood a siege for long in any case; now he gave up all hope of success. At last he sent messengers with terms for a treaty, accompanied with a few threats. He remained the reckless adventurer that Singhana might return any time and it was prudent on his part to leave the city before the latter came. He also pointed \textsuperscript{16} \textit{Futuh}. pp. 226, also 357. Katakah was walled and fortified by Muhammad Tughlaq when he shifted his capital to Daulatabad. There he built three concentric lines of defence: Daulatabad, the seat of the sultan and his army; Katakah; and Devagiri fort itself. In Mughal times Daulatabad came to be known as Ambarkot, Katakah as Mahakot, and Devagiri as Balakot.

\textsuperscript{15} Ferishtah p. 95.

Ibn Battutah, vol. IV, p. 46.

\textsuperscript{17} \textit{Futuh}. pp. 227-28.

\textsuperscript{18} Barani p. 223; Ferishtah p. 95.
out to Alâûddîn that his retreat would lie through many Hindu kingdoms and could certainly be cut off. Alâûddîn also thought it prudent to accept whatever was offered and make haste for Karâ. He patched up a truce, levied a war indemnity, and promised to leave the capital within a fortnight after releasing all the prisoners of war. But the terms of the treaty were yet to be fulfilled, when events took a different turn.

The Battle of Devagiri

When Singhana heard of the catastrophe which had befallen the capital, he hurried back to relieve his father in distress. On his arrival within three koses from the capital, he received a message from Ram Chandra saying that a truce had been concluded with the invader, that the enemy was a very tough fighter and that any further attempt of fighting him would bear no better results. Daring and energetic as he was, the youthful prince turned a deaf ear to his father's warning, and marshalled his forces to fight Alâûddîn. ¹⁹ He sent a threatening message to Alâûddîn saying that if he wanted to escape from the dangerous 'whirlpool' in which he had entangled himself, he must hand over all the wealth he had looted and immediately return to the north. Alâûddîn, who had only recently dictated terms of treaty to Ram Chandra flew into a rage at this imprudent and impertinent action of his haughty son, and ordered the messengers of Singhana to be paraded between the ranks of his army with their faces blackened. ²⁰ He then started preparation for the next encounter.

¹⁹ Isâmi's statement that Singhana submitted without giving a battle is wrong. Futûh. pp. 228-30.
²⁰ Ferishtah p. 96. It was against usage to insult messengers. At a later time when the ambassadors of the Ilkhan sultan Aljaitû of Persia came to India, they also met with insulting treatment at the hands of Alâûddîn. Vâsîf denoun-Alāˈūddin left Nuṣrat Khan with a thousand horse to look after the investment of the fort thus making the junction of the father’s and the son’s forces impossible and himself arrayed the remnant of the army to give battle to Singhana.
The Marāṭha forces outnumbered those of the Muslims and in the battle that ensued they infused terror into the hearts of ʿAlāʾi troops. Finding his master in extreme danger Nuṣrat Khan left the fortress, without any orders from ʿAlāˈūddin, and hurried to join the latter. This tactical action on the part of Nuṣrat turned the tide of the victory on the side of the Muslims as his contingent of one thousand was mistaken by the Marathas for the alleged twenty thousand horse about which ʿAlāˈūddin had spread a false report. A panic seized the troops of Singhana Deva and they fled pell mell from the field of battle. ʿAlāˈūddin renewed the siege of the fortress with still greater vigour. He put to death many merchants and Brahmans he had taken prisoner and paraded some of the near relations and nobles of Ram Deva in front of the fortress.
Ram Chandra for whom the calamity was as terrible as it was unprecedented consulted his courtiers about calling the neighbouring Hindu Rajas to his aid, but before they could arrive at any decision they discovered that the two or three thousand bags which they had brought into the fortress during the first siege did not contain grain but salt. This discovery broke the nerve of everybody inside the citadel.

Ram Chandra sued for peace again, but this time ʿAlā-ˈuddin was adamant. He had scented the reason why the Maratha king was so importunate to secure a treaty as quickly as possible and delayed negotiations until the envoys of Ram Chandra confessed that the defenders were almost on the verge of starvation. At last a truce, the terms of which were dictated by the victorious prince, was patched up. ʿAlāˈūddin ces the unconstitutional action of the king of Hindustan in strong terms. See Chapter XIII.

was to receive a much larger war indemnity than was agreed to on the previous occasion. According to Ferishtah it consisted of “six hundred man of gold, seven man of pearls, two man of precious stones like rubies, sapphires, diamonds and emeralds, one thousand man of silver and four thousand pieces of silk and sundry articles the details of which are beyond comprehension.”

The contemporary historian Ziyā Barani does not give any such list. He only says that ‘Alāūddin brought so much wealth from the Deccan that despite the squandering of it by his successors much of it remained till the time of Firoz Tughlaq. Amīr Khusrau, another contemporary, describes at length in his exaggerated poetic way, the treasures brought by ‘Alāūddin, but he too does not give any figures. Consequently it is doubtful if Ferishtah derived his exact knowledge of the war indemnity from some reliable source. It may only be a computation of his fertile mind. In short, the exact amount of the wealth cannot be ascertained from the meagre data available.

Besides the huge war indemnity, Ram Chandra promised to send yearly revenues of Ellichpur province to ‘Alāūddin at Kaṭa. He also gave his daughter in marriage to ‘Alāūddin. Although contemporary historians do not mention this fact, yet ‘Īsāmī, Vassāf, Muḥammad Bihāmad Khan and Ḥajiuddabīr allude to it. ‘Īsāmī even gives the name of the princess as Jahatiapali or Jhatiapali, a word which, however, has no meaning. At another place he says that she was the 21 Ferishtah p. 96.

22 Barani p. 223.
24 Vassāf p. 312; Tārikh-i-Muḥammadī, Allahabad University Ms. fol. 122.
mother of Shihābuddin ‘Umar Khalji, whom Khusrau placed on the throne after ‘Alāūddin’s death.

‘Alāūddin on his part released all the prisoners of war and struck tents. He left Devagiri twenty five days after he had entered it full of hopes and fears. On his way back to Karâ he stormed the fort of Asīrgarh which was then held by Chouhan Rajputs. But his main objective had been Devagiri and that kingdom he had been able to reduce to the position of a vassal state, and obtain such an immense treasure as to astound his contemporaries. Brigg’s remark on his brilliant achievement is worth quoting. “In the long volumes of history,” says he, “there is scarcely anything to be compared with this exploit, whether we regard the resolution in forming the plan, the boldness of its execution, or the great good fortune that attended its accomplishment.”

---

26 Futūh. pp. 335, 344.

The fort which is believed to have been mentioned in the Mahabharata consists of three separate line of fortifications known as Asīrgarh proper, Kamargarh and Malaigarh.

CHAPTER V

MURDER OF JALALUDDIN KHALJI

Early in the year 695 H. (1296 A.D.) Jalaluddin had marched with his army to Gwalior. No definite dates have been given about Jalaluddin's march to and stay at Gwalior. Firishtah furnishes some details but his statements contradict themselves. Barani simply says that Jalaluddin went on an expedition to Gwalior in 695 H. and stayed there for some time. At Gwalior "rumours" began to reach him that 'Ala'uddin had obtained success at Devagiri and was returning to Kara. It appears that Jalaluddin had started for Gwalior about the same time 'Ala'uddin had left for Devagiri. From Kara 'Ala'ulmulk was constantly transmitting fabricated news to the sultan to the effect that the prince was busy reducing refractory kingdoms and would soon send a petition to the king. It is doubtful if 'Ala'ulmulk himself knew much about the extraordinary exploit of 'Ala'uddin.

In short, it was at Gwalior that Jalaluddin first learnt that 'Ala'uddin had marched to Devagiri, had sacked it, and was returning to Kara with a rich booty. The sultan was immensely pleased at the news of his nephew's victory and to share his joy with his boon companions he held drink parties. Meanwhile news about the vast treasures 'Ala'uddin was bringing from the Deccan was confirmed by successive reports. It was rumoured that the treasures far exceeded

1 Firishtah pp. 95-97.
2 Barani p. 223.
3 Barani (222) simply says that the news was sent by 'Ala'ulmulk to the court. He does not mention Delhi or Gwalior, but it was obviously sent at Gwalior where the sultan was staying.
those possessed by any monarch of Delhi in the past. The very idea of the immensity of the captured wealth made Jalāluddīn a little thoughtful. The prince had acted in an independent manner. He had not obtained the king's permission to invade Devagiri. Jalāluddīn held secret consultations with his most intimate barons like Malik Aḥmad Chap, Malik Fakhruddīn Kūchī, Malik Kamāluddīn Abul Maʿāli and Malik Naṣīruddīn Kuhrāmī. He asked them to opine on the course of action to be adopted in such circumstances. Should he stay where he was and wait for ‘Alāūddīn to come to him, or march out to meet him on his way to Kārā. or should he go back to Delhi?

Sane suggestion was not wanting. Malik Aḥmad, the Naʾīb Barbak, and sister's son of the sultan, who was known for giving the most practical advice said: "Elephants and wealth when held in great abundance are the cause of much strife. Whoever acquires them becomes so intoxicated that he does not know his hands from his feet. 'Alāūddīn is surrounded by many of the rebels and insurgents who supported Malik Chhajjū. He went into a foreign land, without leave, has fought battles and won treasure. The wise have said, 'Money and strife; strife and money,' that is, the two things are inseparable from each other. My opinion is that we should march in all haste towards Chanderi to meet 'Alāūddīn and intercept his return. When he finds the Sultan's army in the way, he must necessarily present all his spoils to the throne whether he likes it or not. The Sultan may then take the silver and gold, the jewels and pearls, the elephants and horses, and leave the other booty to him and his soldiers. His territories should be increased and he should be taken in honour to Delhi ... but if he is permitted to go to Kārā with the treasures amounting to those of ten kingdoms, we shall all be ruined. I also know that for years Malik 'Ala‘uddin has been in trouble with his wife and the Malka-i-Jahān. And no loyalty should be expected from one who has been in trouble.’

4 According to Ḥajiuddibīr his full name was Shihābuddīn Aḥmad Chap. Zafarul Vāls p. 754.

Ahmad Chap’s harangue pricked the Sultan ‘like a thorn.’ In fact he had spoken so frankly ‘before any body else had said anything,’ that his sincere utterance was misconstrued. The Sultan chid Ahmad saying he had done no thing against ‘Ala‘uddin to estrange him and he was falsely accusing his son-in-law. Jalāluddin then addressed other nobles and asked them for advice on the point. Malik Fakhruddin Kūchī did not like to incur the Sultan’s displeasure. He knew that even a word spoken against his nephew was unwelcome to Jalāluddin. He, therefore, began with what he thought would please the sultan, although he knew that what Ahmad Chap had said was all correct. ‘No responsible person,’ began the cunning Fakhruddin, ‘on whose word full reliance can be placed has come to the court from ‘Ala‘uddin’s camp. It is not certain whether the rumours are false or true. There is a famous maxim that ‘socks should not be doffed till water be sighted.’ If we march with an army and intercept him on the way, his men would be frightened to hear of the arrival of the Imperial army. One and all would they run away and hide themselves in the jungle and all the treasure that he is bringing would be lost. We should (only) keep a force in readiness, and until we find anybody refractory it is not justified to march against him. But the month of Ramzān is approaching and melons as (sweet as) sugar-candy have arrived in Delhi. It appears right to me that Your Majesty should return to Delhi with your army and pass the month of Ramzān there.’

5 Barani pp. 224-25.
6 Barani pp. 226-227.

The language of this passage is defective but a literal translation has been given. The last two sentences of Fakhruddin Kūchī specially stand out as a proof of his cunning.
Malik Ahmad Chap who was loyal and sincere to a fault could no longer stand the hypocrisy of Fakhruddin and addressed him in very harsh words. But the Sultan silenced him by saying: "I have brought him ('Alāūddin) up in my lap, and he is so much indebted to me that even if my sons go against me he cannot." Nothing could prevent Jalāluddin from adopting a course of action which his love for his nephew dictated. He left Gwalior for Delhi and arrived at Kilughari soon after.

Meanwhile 'Alāūddin, after a long but quick march was back in Kaṣa on the 28th of Rajjab 695 (2nd June 1296).\

There is some difference in the narratives of contemporary historians about the time which 'Alāūddin spent on his expedition to Devagiri. Baranī at one place (refering to a letter of apology 'Alāūddin sent to his uncle) says that the prince wrote that he had been away on the expedition for more than a year. Baranī writing long after the occurrence of the event, probably means a long period of time and not definitely a period of more than one whole year. Following upon Baranī, Ferishtah tries to explain how the alleged period of one year was spent by 'Alāūddin (Ferishtah pp.96-97). Other contemporary evidence, however, shows that the expedition was so planned as to be completed within a short period of two or three months.

Firstly, 'Išāmī clearly says that 'Alāūddin had planned to return within a couple of months Futūḥ. p. 222. As has been discussed above 'Alāūddin in no case could afford to spend much time in the Deccan.

Secondly, Baranī says (p. 222) that 'Alāūddin had secured the roads to Devagiri during his raid on Bhilsa. He went by forced marches straight to Devagiri without giving rest to his troops or disturbing petty chieftains on the way.

Thirdly, the rumours which sultan Jalāluddin received at Gwalior in quick succession were to the effect that 'Alāūddin had arrived in Devagiri, had raided it and was on his way back. It appears, therefore, that 'Alāūddin did not spend much time in Devagiri. Ferishtah says he stayed there only for 25 days.
Ever since he had left Kara about three and a half months back there had been no correspondence between him and the Sultan. He was naturally afraid that those who knew of his designs would surely have poisoned the ears of the King in his absence. Not a few barons at the court had learnt of his ambitious schemes. Ahmad Chap alone had clearly stated his suspicions and had been rebuked for his frankness. According to Yahya, however, some treachery of Alauddin had leaked out and had made him very cautious in dealing with the old king. As soon, therefore, as he arrived in Kara he addressed an epistle to his uncle professing therein his love

Fourthly, during his return from Devagiri Alauddin was also in a great hurry, (1) because he had to avoid any skirmishes with the Hindu kingdoms which lay on the way (except that he attacked the fortress of Asirgarh) and which were probably invited by Ram Deva to help him. (2) Because he was afraid of his enemies conspiring at the court against him. (3) Because the rainy season was fast approaching.

Fifthly, when Qutbuddin Mubarak Shah invaded Devagiri in 1317-18, he arrived on the borders of the kingdom in two months’ time (Khusrau: Nuh Sipehr Elliot Vol. III, p. 557). It is, therefore, not surprising that Alauddin’s march to Devagiri took him less than a couple of months.

And lastly we have the authority of the contemporary Amir Khusrau who gives definite dates of departure from Kara (26th Feb., 1296) and that of arrival back at Kara (2nd June, 1296). From Khusrau’s dates it is evident that Alauddin started just after the inconvenient winter season was over and returned just before the rains started. No doubt the time for the expedition had been excellently chosen.

The casual remark of Barani that Alauddin spent one whole year on the expedition does not seem to be correct and lacks corroboration in other contemporary writings. Discussing the siege of Ranthambhor Barani again writes that the siege of the fort lasted for one year (p. 279) while Khusrau gives definite dates. Barani’s dates are generally faulty.

8 T.M.S. p. 68.
and loyalty and begging pardon for undertaking an expedition without the latter's permission. In this letter he exhibited his fears about the plot of his enemies against him during his absence in a remote country. In the end he promised to make over to the Sultan all the treasures and elephants he had brought from Devagiri if the latter just sent him an assurance, under his own signature, to the effect that he had pardoned his nephew for all his faults. Even while ‘Alauddin was writing this treacherous communication, he was planning to fly with all his treasures towards Lakhnauti in case Jalaluddin marched with an army towards Kara. In anticipation of such an emergency he had despatched Zafar Khan towards the east to arrange for a large flotilla for crossing the Saru (Sarju).

Jalaluddin received ‘Alauddin’s letter only a few days after his arrival at Kilughari. Most of the nobles and other prominent men of Delhi had come to know that Alauddin was playing a treacherous game. They had learnt of Alauddin’s scheme of establishing himself independently in Bengal, but they were avert to apprising the foolish sultan of the true state of affairs for fear of receiving an unjust treatment at his hands. Jalaluddin wrote a very sweet and comforting reply to his nephew granting pardon for his imperfections and repeating his unbounded love for him. He then entrusted the conveyance of the despatch to two of his most confidential and trusted servants Malik ‘Imadulmulk and Malik Ziyauddin. When these two nobles arrived in the camp of ‘Alauddin they were stunned to see how their innocent master was being fooled by his seditious and ungrateful nephew. In vain did they try to send a warning to the Sultan for ‘Alauddin had put them under strict guard.

9 Barani p. 228. ‘Alauddin could move only eastward. On the west was the sultan and in the south were a number of powerful Hindu Rajas.
Meanwhile 'rains began to descend from the heavens.' 'Alāʻuddin sent another deceitful letter, this time to his brother Almās Beg who held the post of Akhūrbeg at the court. In that he wrote that he had been disobedient and disloyal to the king and was so mortified at his action that he might put an end to his life any moment. He also said that his fears could only be allayed if the Sultan himself came to Kāra alone and fetched him to the court. Almās Beg at once handed over the letter to the Sultan, who was overcome with grief at the unnecessary fears of his nephew and son-in-law. Jalāluddin immediately despatched Almās Beg to Kāra to comfort 'Alāʻuddin and promised to follow him soon. Almās Beg reached Kāra in a week's time and on his arrival 'Alāʻuddin ordered drums of joy to be beaten.'

Within a short time of ordering Almas Beg to Kāra the king started with some of his trusted nobles and a thousand horsemen to meet his nephew. At Damhai he took boats for himself and a few of his companions, while Ahmad Chap was ordered to march at the head of the army by land. At a time when rivers were in spate everywhere, and rain poured in torrents, writes Ziyāuddin, death was "dragging Jalāluddin by the hair" and taking him to his assassin.

It was on the 17th of Ramzān 695 (Friday July 20th 1296) that the boats were sighted at Kāra. 'Alāʻuddin with his treasures and elephants had left Kāra, crossed the Ganga for the other side, and had established his headquarters at Manik-

\[11\text{ Barani says that 'Alāʻuddin and his associates were doing all this to beguile the Sultan. They knew how simpleminded and greedy he was.}\]

\[12\text{ See last footnote of the Chapter.}\]

\[13\text{ Damhai is modern Dubhai lying 60 miles south-east of Delhi. It is now in Anūpshahr tehsil, District Bulandshahr. Imperial Gazetteer Vol. XI, p. 341.}\]

\[14\text{ Barani p. 231.}\]
pur. Thus he had avoided that part of the Imperial army which was marching by land, and which could not easily cross the river from Kara to Manikpur. As the canopy of the Sultan came in sight 'Ala'ddin sent his brother Almas Beg to persuade Jalaluddin to leave behind even the small retinue accompanying him.\^15 Almas Beg took a boat to meet the Sultan and as they met, he used a thousand delusive arts to disarm him completely. He induced Jalaluddin to order the party to stay behind while he himself was rowed across to the other bank. There were only two boats now, carrying the sultan and some of his selected nobles such as Khurram the Vakil-i-dar, Malik Fakhruddin Kuchi, Malik Amaji Akhurbeg, Malik Jamaluddin (Barani has Kamaluddin) Abul Ma'ali, Malik Nasiruddin Kuhrami, Malik Ikhtiyaruddin, the deputy Vakil-i-dar and Turmati the tashtdar.\^16 The traitor Almas made yet another request: "(Your Majesty) may please order that the few nobles and select followers who are sitting in the boats should take off their arms, lest it should happen that when they reach the bank my brother's eyes may fall upon them and he may get scared." Even this senseless request did not arouse the suspicions of the foolish Sultan, as his love for his nephew as well as the greed for gold had completely blinded him.\^17 He ordered the nobles to lay down their arms and they obeyed. When, however, the boats came near the bank

\^15 Barani says that the Sultan took with him some followers and a thousand soldiers when he marched to Kara. At Damhai the army of one thousand was left under Ahmad Chap to march by land. The Sultan travelled by boat with a few followers only, but Barani says that when he reached Kara he had, besides some of his nobles a thousand soldiers coming by boat. There is some confusion is Barani's Tarikh about the number of troops that went to Kara with Sultan Jalaluddin.

\^16 This list is given in T.M.S. p. 69.

Barani does not give the names.

\^17 Barani p. 230.
Sultan Jalāluddin and his companions could hardly believe their eyes. They saw the forces of ʿAlāʿuddin arrayed, armed to the teeth. The elephants and horses were in full harness and formations of soldiers were stationed at various places. Jalaluddin’s party clearly saw that Almās Beg had entrapped the Sultan by his winning and plausible tongue. Malik Khurram, the Vakil-i-dar, however, refused to take things passively and asked Almās Beg how it was that he had made all of them throw down their arms while the forces of ʿAlāʿuddin were ‘encased’ in armour and seemed to be ready for battle. To this the traitor replied that his brother wanted to accord a royal reception to the Sultan, and that the gorgeous wealth brought from Devagiri would be laid at his feet in all ceremony. To the various questions that were asked by the frightened and nervous nobles and the over-credulous Sultan, Almās Beg gave evasive replies.

The unsophisticated Sultan bent his head over the Qur’ān and continued his journey “as a father goes to his son’s house without any fear or suspicion in his mind.”

But the nobles clearly saw danger before them and in utter despondency, began to read the Sūrā-i-Yāsin. And so the melancholy party proceeded to meet their doom.

At last the bank was reached. To all appearance ʿAlāʿuddin was happy to receive his uncle. As the boat touched the bank ʿAlāʿuddin came forward with his nobles and fell at the feet of the Sultan. Jalaluddin raised him up and addressed him in very affectionate terms, “... I have brought you up from infancy” the Sultan reminded ʿAlāʿuddin, so that now you look grown up. Have I brought you up and raised you from post to post only to assassinate you? You have always been to me dearer than my own sons, and are so

---

18 Barani p. 253.
19 Sūrā-i-Yāsin is recited at the time of difficulties, distress and death.
even now. The world may change but not my relationship with you, and my love for you cannot grow less.'

Having addressed his nephew thus, Sultan Jalāluddīn took 'Alāūddīn's hand in his own and led him towards his boats. Just then Nuṣrat Khan gave the fatal signal. Mahmūd Šālim of Samanah assaulted the Sultan with his sword, but the blow fell short and cut his own hand. Writhing with pain he struck another blow and wounded the old king. Perplexed and pained at the sudden assault the Sultan ran towards his boat crying. "Oh 'Alā, what hast thou done." Ikhtiyāruddīn Ḥūd, another hired assassin ran after the Sultan, threw him on the ground, severed his head from the body and brought it to his ungrateful and treacherous nephew. Needless to say that except Malik Fakhruddīn all those who accompanied the sultan were either drowned or put to the sword.

20 Baranī p. 234.
21 Ibid. p. 236.
22 Ferishtah and Nizāmuddīn Ahmad say that when the Sultan was on his way to Karā 'Alāūddīn went to the hermitage of Hazrat Karak a renowned saint of Kara, and paid his respects to him. The hermit raised his head and replied i.e. anybody who opposes you in your enterprise will die. The prophecy came true shortly afterwards. Shaikh Karak is buried at Karā and his tomb is still held sacred by Musalmans.

Also see Beale: Oriental Biographical Dictionary p. 364.
23 Fakhruddīn Küchī was raised to the position of Dādbeg-i-Hazrat at the accession of 'Alāūddīn. Baranī p. 248, Ferishtah p. 102.

There is no reason to accept Badaoni's statement that "Malik Fakhruddin Küchī fell into their hands alive and was murdered." Ranking Vol. I, p. 243.
This heinous crime was committed on 17th Ramzan 695 (Friday, July 20, 1296). 24

24 When did the idea of murdering the sultan enter ‘Ala-uddin’s mind? It is certain that after his return from Devar-giri he never thought of making an attempt on the king’s life, although his instructions to Ram Chandra to send tribute to Kara instead of Delhi hint at a contemplated revolt. But his letters to the sultan do betray his fears from an inmical section of the nobility at court. He had, therefore, made full preparations to fly to Bengal in case men like Ahmad Chap could impress upon the king the need for firm action. But when he saw the Sultan coming to Kara “unattended” he decided to murder him, for he told Almaš:

(Barani p. 230). The author of Ma‘asir-i-Rahiimi (p. 320) puts this idea in clearer terms: He writes:

Thus the resolve of murder was an eleventh hour decision. But once the crime was commited ‘Ala-uddin never regretted having done it. It may be said to his credit that he never justified his action against his uncle as shamelessly as Aurangzeb did against his father. He simply wanted the people to forget it. Barani openly condemns the act; Khusrau does not dilate upon it.
CHAPTER VI
ACCESSION OF 'ALĀŪDDIN

"Blood was still dripping from the severed head of the martyred Sultan," writes Baranī, "when the Imperial canopy was raised upon the head of 'Alāūddin, and he was proclaimed Sultan." While the proclamation of his accession was made by officers riding on elephants, the head of Jalāluddin, like that of an ordinary criminal, was paraded on a spear in the streets of Kařa and Manikpur. It was later on sent to Avadh to be exposed there to the public view.¹ At Kařa 'Alāūddin began to distribute titles and honours among his partisans. He conferred upon his brother Almās Bēg the title of Ulugh Kān, on Malik Hizabruddin that of Zafar Khan, on Malik Sanjar that of Alp Khan and on Malik Nuṣrat Jalērī that of Nuṣrat Kān. Nor did he ignore the less important men, and he raised to higher ranks most of the loyāl and faithful Maliks and Amīrs. But the young king could not afford to waste much time on these formal proceedings, as the Capital of the empire was still in the hands of the sons of the late Sultan. Consequently, he started feverish preparations to seize Delhi and influential officers were advanced large amounts to enlist fresh troops. For some time rains as also the fear of Arkali Khan's possible advance from Multan, to avenge the murder of his father, deterred 'Alāūddin from marching on to Delhi immediately. He was considerably afraid of Arkali Khan who was known as the "Rustam of the Age" and whose military talents he had seen during the revolt of Malik Chhajjū. But when he heard that Arkali Khan was not coming to Delhi his joy knew no bounds. Fully convinced of the worthlessness of the successor of Jalāluddin and his inability to raise a fresh army because of the impoverishment of the Delhi treasury, ‘Alāūddīn made up his mind to march towards the Capital in the midst of the rainy season.

¹ Baranī pp. 236-37.

Events at Delhi after Jalāluddin’s murder.

Just after the assassination of Jalāluddīn, Malik Aḥmad had returned to the capital and astounded everybody with the news of the terrible tragedy. There was no time for Malka-i-Jahān to shed tears over the death of the King, for the loss of even a little of it would have meant the passing of the throne to her husband’s murderer. She was a woman of ambition, and therefore, even without consulting the nobles, she proclaimed her youngest son Qadr Khan as king with the title of Sultan Ruknuddīn Ibrahīm. The Queen mother and her son left Kilughari and took up residence in the Kaushaki-Sabz (the Green Palace). She began to rule in his name, received petitions and issued orders. At Multan, Arkali Khan felt bitterly against the injustice of his mother for setting his claims aside. He had had some dispute with her even in the life time of Jalāluddīn, but now he was so much incensed at 2 Barani has treated Malka-i-Jahān too severely. He calls her the “silliest of the silly” and attributes her choice of the younger son to her ambition to rule in his name. A little reflection, however, would reveal that the problems at the capital after the murder of Jalāl were very knotty indeed. The government could not be carried on for long without a king. Arkali Khan was far away and his arrival from Multan would have taken some time. Malka-i-Jahān as well as some of her nobles knew it well that ‘Alāūddīn would spare no time in marching to Delhi if somebody was not proclaimed king instantly.

Moreover, Qadr Khan was an offspring of old age and had been much loved by Jalāluddin and Malka-i-Jahān.

Barani pp. 176-177.

her action that he stayed back at Multan, and did not even come to Delhi to claim the throne. Arkali was brave no doubt, but he was peevish and harsh by temperament, and was not quite beloved of his parents.4

It were these developments which had impelled ‘Alāʾuddīn to start for Delhi at once. So heavy were the rains that year that “Ganga and Jumna had become vast rivers and every (paltry) stream looked like a Ganga or Jumna.” The roads had become impassable through mud and mire. Yet ‘Alāʾuddīn struck the tents. He exhorted his officers and nobles to do their best to raise a large army, and not to be mindful in fixing high salaries. In addition, a small minjīq5 was constructed and at every halt five man of gold coins were hurled from it.6 This reckless squandering of wealth had the desired effect and people “military and non-military” flocked to him in large numbers. When ‘Alāʾuddīn arrived near Badaon his army had swelled to 56,000 horses and 60,000 foot. Here he detached a contingent from the main force, and placing it under Zafar Khan ordered him to march on to Delhi by way of Kol (modern Aligarh), while he himself marched at the head of the main army through Badaon. He had instructed Zafar Khan to march at a rate corresponding to that of his so that the armies might converge on the Capital at the same time.

Soon after ‘Alāʾuddīn reached Baran (modern Bulandshahr) where more troopers were enrolled. Nuṣrat Khan addressed a meeting in the open space of the Masjid of the 4 Badaonī.

5 Minjīq is a warlike engine, a catapult or a machine to raise weights.

6 Barani p. 243 has town and exhorted all high and low to join their standard. He openly declared that a hundred times of what he was squandering would be realised by him if Delhi fell into their hands; and if, perchance they failed in their attempt, it was better that the wealth obtained from Devagiri was disbursed among the people rather than it fell into the hands of their adversaries. The capture of Delhi, however, was not so difficult as 'Alaüddin had thought. Even while he was halting at Baran, some influential Jalāli nobles like Tajuddîn Kūchî, Amâji Akhûrbêg, Amîr 'Ali Divâna, 'Uşmân Amîr Akhûr, Amîr Kalân, 'Umîr Surkha and Hiranmâr, who had been sent out to oppose the advancing hosts had changed sides. For this treacherous and shameless conduct each of them had received 20, 30 and even 50 man of gold from 'Alaüddîn, who as a matter of policy displayed extreme generosity on such occasions. The soldiers who had come with these nobles were also given 100 tankâhs each. The renegade barons used to say publicly: "the people of the City certainly find fault with us and declare that we have been guilty of base ingratitude ..., but these inconsiderate persons do not perceive that in reality the kingdom of Jalâluddîn came to an end the day he set out from the palace of Kilughari and of his own free will went in hot haste to Karâ, and there put his neck and those of his intimate associates in jeopardy. What can we do but join 'Alaüddîn'? The desertion of the veteran Jalâli nobles caused such an irreparable breach in the Delhi camp that the cause of Sultan Ruknuddîn Ibrâhîm was doomed to failure. Of the nobles at Delhi a section had already ceased to sympathise with the Queen mother on account of her injustice in setting aside the claims of Arkali Khan, while another wavered between allegiance to the sons of the late king and his nephew.

7 Baranî p. 224.
8 Ibid. p. 224.
9 Ibid pp. 245-46.

At such a critical moment, when the Jalālī party had completely collapsed, and Malka-i-Jahān saw no chance of success, she sent for Arkali Khan from Multan. "I was wrong in placing your younger brother on the throne" she wrote to him, "while you are still living, for none of the Maliks and Amīrs stand in any awe of him. and most of them have deserted to Sultan Alāūdīn, so that sovereignty is passing out of our hands. Make haste, therefore, if you can ... and mount the throne . . . ," Arkali Khan lost no time to understand that the situation had become altogether hopeless. Moreover the rancour in his heart against his mother dissuaded him from going to Delhi and taking up a dying cause. He sent an evasive reply: "As the nobles and their retainers have all gone to the enemy, what would be the good of my coming . . . ?

When the intelligence of the final reply of Arkali Khan reached 'Alāūdīn, he ordered the drums of rejoicings to be beaten. Scattering gold and collecting followers he reached the river Jumna where he won over many more nobles of the late sovereign by filling their palms with gold. For some time, 'Alāūdīn's progress was impeded, the river being in spate. But as soon as the flood subsided he crossed the Jumna at the ford of Baghpat, and encamped on its bank.

---

10 Barānī p. 245.
11 Baghpat is given in Fuller's Ms. Barānī's text has Kath. Baghpat lies in north of Delhi on Jumna. It is in Meerut Distt.

12 Barānī p. 246 has جون - در صحرا جون which may be read for جون in shikast. It has often been mentioned in Persion histories and is correctly written as Jūn in the Tājul Māāsir. Jūn means river Jumna. The gate of the city opening on the river side was known as the Jūn gate and the plain of Jūn was the tract of land lying between the river and the gate of Jūn.
Ruknuddin had little hope of success, still he arrayed his ranks to give battle to his cousin. But just on the eve of the engagement, the left wing of his rickety forces openly deserted to the enemy and his fate was sealed for ever. Finding his own life in jeopardy he left the capital secretly through the Ghazni Gate with the queen-mother and some well-wishers like Ahmad Chap and Alghū. The wretched plight of the royal family drew sympathy from all high and low and for a few days the people of Delhi felt very unhappy.

'Ala'uddin's accession at Delhi.

'Ala'uddin entered the capital in triumph on the 22nd Zilhijjah 695 (20th October, 1296). The great nobles of the city, the justices of the peace, the custodians of the keys of the fort and other dignitaries of consequence, came out to wait upon him, ‘whereupon the earth assumed a totally different aspect.’ The newly crowned king assumed the title of Abul Mu'azzaar Sultan 'Ala'ud-duniya-va-din Mu'hammad Shāh Khalji. He took up his residence in the Kaushak-i-Lal or the crimson palace where sultan Ghayāsuddin Balban had formerly resided. According to the time honoured custom the khutbah was read and coins struck in 'Ala'uddin's name.

---

14 Futuh pp. 237-38.

15 This date has been given by Amīr Khusrau. Khażān Allahabad University Ms. p. 7., Habib's Trans. p. 7) Barani does not give the exact date but simply says that 'Ala'uddin was crowned towards the end of the year 695 A.H. There were two formal accessions of 'Ala'uddin. The first was at Kara just after the murder of Jalāluddin on the 16th (Khusrau) or the 17th (Barani) of Ramzān 695 H. and the second at Delhi after 'Ala'uddin had completely overcome all opposition.

16 This was built by Balban about the year 1265 A.D.
To commemorate the auspicious occasion liberal gifts were bestowed upon the people at large, and for some time wine and beauty and music and mirth became the order of the day. Pavilions were erected in the bazārs and wine, soft drinks and pān were distributed free. The army was given six months’ salary as a reward, the Shaikh and ‘ulama were awarded gratuities, and all high and low partook of the royal bounty. Such a lavish distribution of wealth and unstinted generosity helped the people to forget the assassination of the late king.¹⁷

Like a far-sighted statesman ‘Alāūddin gained the support of the Jalālī officers by conferring upon them high offices of the state. A coalition ministry of some notables of the old regime and his own favorites nobles was set up. Khvāja Khaṭīr, the well-known Khvāja Jahān (Prime minister) of Jalāluddin, was confirmed in his former office. Qāzī Sadr-i-Jahān Sadruddin ‘Ārif was appointed Qāzī-i-Mumālik (Chief Justice), Malik ‘Umdatulmulk was appointed Dīvān-i-Inshā (Secretary of State); and of his sons Ḥamīduddin and A‘izuddin, the former was enrolled among the supervisors of the Court, and the latter was appointed Superintendent Correspondence Department. Saiyyad Ajal was allowed to continue as Shaikhul Islam and Khatib, Nuṣrat Khan Jalesri was appointed Kotvāl of Delhi, while Malik Fakhruddin Kūchī was made Dādbeg-i-Ḥazarat (Judge of the Capital). Malik Abājī, a nobleman of Sultan Jalāluddin, was appointed Superintendent of the Royal Stables (Akhūrbeg), and Malik Hiranmār was given the post of Junior Chamberlain (Naib Bārbak). Hizabruddin Zafar khan,¹⁸ who later proved worthy of his honourable charge, was appointed Minister of War (‘Āriz-i-Mumālik). Malik ‘Alāulmulk, the uncle of the historian Ziyāuddin, was appointed governor of Kara, while his father Muyīdumulk was appointed Mayor of Baran. Malik Jūnā continued in his old post of Naib Vakī-i-dar.¹⁰

¹⁸ Badaoni has Badruddin. Yahya names him Yūsuf and says that he was a sister’s son of ‘Alāūddin T.M.S. p. 71.

India in 1296.

The city and the court wore a happy aspect but the condition of the country at large gave a cause for anxiety. India was then passing through a crisis. (In the north-west the Mughals were sending out harassing expeditions every year. Another restive element were the Gakhars in the Punjab. Multan and Sindh were held by Arkali Khan, who ruled virtually as an independent king. Towards the south-west of Sindh lay the prosperous kingdom of Gujarat ruled by the Baghela Rajputs. Adjacent to Gujarat were situated the various kingdoms of Rajputana, all independent of one another and of the Sultanate of Delhi.) No Muslim ruler had been successful in completely defeating or subjugating any of them. On the other hand the existence of states like Chittor and Ranthambhor was an open challenge to the prowess of Delhi Sultanate. In Central India Malwa, Dhār, Ujjain and the vast tract of Bundelkhand was still out of the pale of Muslim domination and enjoyed perfect independence. The whole tract now comprising Bihar, Bengal and Orissa was in the hands of Hindu Rajas or independent Muslim kings. In Bengal Nasiruddin Mahmuḍ, a son of Balban, and after him his successors, had been ruling independently. In the Doab, the most fertile part of the country, (the entire strip of territory from Meerut to Pilibhit together with the sub-montane region of Kamaon in the north, was in the hands of intractable feudal barons, Hindu and Musalman. In the territories of Avadh, Benares and Gorakhpur, the suzerainty of Delhi was not yet fully established. South of the Vindhya mountains, again, Muslim armies had not yet conquered any kingdom. Alāūddin had marched into Devagiri but as soon as he had returned to the north, the Yadavas had by and by recovered their lost prestige and power. The other mighty kingdoms of Warangal, Dvaramudra, and those ruled by the Cholas, the Cheras and the Pandyas had never heard of a Muslim invader.

Problems before Alauddin.

Such was the state of the country with its problems of unification, administration and defence that the new king was called upon to tackle. The sons of Jalaluddin were still living and could gather formidable strength any moment. Therefore, the foremost problem confronting Alauddin was of overthrowing the surviving scions of the late king. Then there was the task of reconciling a nobility which had been accustomed to plotting against the crown. No less important was the task of defending the frontiers against the Mughal invaders, who had set their heart on the conquest of Hindustan, and on one or two occasions had penetrated as far as Delhi itself. Again, the sultan had to conquer the independent states if he wanted to consolidate his power and perpetuate Muslim rule in the country. One of the chief characteristics of the sultanate period was that with the advent of a new dynasty, the process of conquest had to be repeated once again. Thus Gujarat, Chittor, Ranthambhor, the Deccan and Bengal, all had to be conquered repeatedly. In fact the subjugation of Rajputana is the test by which every king of Delhi should be judged. At the time of Alauddin’s accession, most of northern India and the whole of the Deccan was beyond the sphere of Muslim domination. Therefore, the conquest of the whole of Hindustan was the greatest problem and the highest ambition of the king. On the top of it all was the problem of placing the administration on an efficient and stable footing. The big landlords were a thriving menace. There being little contact between the local administration and the Central government, because of lack of responsible officers, the local magnates like Khūts and Muqqadams were left to enjoy a large measure of independence. The sultan had to think out ways and means of bringing them under control, and utilising their services to the best interests of the state.
CHAPTER VII
MULTAN GUJARAT BENGAL

After fully establishing himself at Delhi, 'Alá'úd-dín addressed himself to the task of overthrowing the surviving sons of Jalá-lúddín. Ruknúddín Ibrahim had, after leaving Delhi, joined his elder brother Arkali Khan at Multan. There they lived in a state of independence in a far-off province, and could any day become a source of immeasurable danger by claiming the throne. 'Alá'úd-dín, therefore, determined to put an end to this peril once for all. As he had been crowned only recently he did not consider it wise to march to Multan in person and deputed his two trusted generals Ulugh Khan and Zafar Khan to conduct the campaign. With a strong force of thirty to forty thousand they proceeded to Multan in Muham-ram 696 (November 1296). Arriving there, they invested the town at once. Arkali Khan had had the forebodings of the calamity and had made adequate preparations to encounter it, but the Kotvól of the town in conjunction with other local patricians, unable to bear the hardships of a protracted siege, deserted to the other side only after about a couple of months' investment. Arkali lost all hope of success and importuned Shaikh Ruknúddín of Multan to intervene on his behalf. The Shaikh arranged terms of a truce between the contending parties. He took the princes to the camp of Ulugh Khan, where they were received with dignity. The news of the victory was despatched to Delhi where great rejoicings were held.

The victorious generals left for the Capital accompanied by the two captive princes, their families and nobles. At Abuhär² they were met by Nuṣrat Khan who carried express orders of the king about punishments to the various prisoners.

Arkali and Ibrahīm, Malik Ahmad Chap and Malik Alghū, son in-law of Jalāluddin, were mercilessly blinded. Their families were separated from them and their goods and slaves seized. Later on Arkali and Ibrahīm, together with the two sons of the former, were handed over to the kotval of Hansi.
He put them to death summarily.³ The Malka-i-Jahān, whom ‘Alā’uddin considered to be his arch enemy, Malik Ahmad Chap and Malik Alghū were imprisoned by Nuṣrat Khan in his own mansion at Delhi.⁴

Soon after the conquest of Multan Nuṣrat Khan was appointed the Vazīr (1297). He confiscated the lands and property of the nobles of Jalāluddin, and of those Amīrs and Maliks who had been lavishly rewarded by ‘Alā’uddin in the early days of his accession. He devised such novel methods of extorting money and seizing property, that in a surprisingly short time he was able to deposit a large amount in the Imperial treasury. About the same time ‘Alā’uddin sent for his faithful servant and adviser Malik ‘Alā’ulmulk, uncle of the historian Ziyā Baranī. Alā’ulmulk arrived at the Court with a large retinue of nobles and Amīrs, and presented to the king all the elephants and treasures which the latter had left with him at Kara. As he was excessively corpulent and was not ² Abuhär is near Hansi. Hansi is now a tehsil in Hisar district. It was an important military centre during the early Muslim period. A large number of inscriptions of ‘Alāuddin have been found here, showing the importance of the town at that time.

Ferishtah p. 102.
Baranī p. 249 is not quite clear on the point.

⁴ The fate of these wretched prisoners is not recorded in history but can easily be surmised.
fit for active service he was detained at Delhi as its Kotvāl while the fief of Kara was entrusted to Nuṣrat Khan, who had of late become very unpopular at Delhi because of his extortionist devices.

The years 1297, 1298 and 1299 also witnessed two invasions of the Mughals first under Kadar and then under Deva and Saldi. They were successfully repelled. The defeat of the Mughals established the authority and augmented the prestige of the new king still further, and he became more and more ruthless. On the advice of his brother Almās Bēg he punished all those Jalāli Amīrs who just for a handful of silver had deserted the cause of their patron and joined his successor. Many of them were deprived of their eye-sight, while others were thrown into prison and their entire property was confiscated. Only three of them viz. Malik Quṭbuddin ‘Alvi, Malik Naṣiruddin and Malik Amīr Jamāl Khaljī, who had not accepted the murderer’s gold or deserted to him, escaped this inquisitional maltreatment. All others were exterminated root and branch. Thus the backbone of the old Turkish aristocracy was broken. The Sultan founded his own order of nobility which was absolutely and unreservedly obedient to him. Incidentally he was able to add a crore of rupees to his hoard of wealth.

Having suppressed the so-called refractory element, ‘Alā-ud-din began to think of subjugating the independent parts of the country. After the expedition to Multan he had not been able to send out any major expedition. In 1299 his armies were free to embark on a career of conquest. The fair and opulent kingdom of Gujarāt attracted his immediate attention.

The Kingdom of Gujarāt.

The kingdom of Gujarāt was one of the most fertile regions of India in the Middle Ages. In the production of agricultural wealth it stood perhaps next only to the Doēb.
In its towns brisk and lively trade flourished under peaceful conditions. Its chief port of Cambay carried on trade and commerce with northern countries like Arabia and Persia. Long before the Muslim conquerors had penetrated into northern India, Arab traders had settled in this region. About the city of Cambay Vassāf writes: “Its air is pure, its water clear and the circumjacent country beautiful and charming both in scenery and buildings.” 5 Marco Polo, the adventurous Venetian, who visited the country a century before Vassāf also speaks of Cambay as a place possessed of immense wealth and riches; 6 and both these are corroborated by Ibn Battūtah who writes at length about its wealthy merchants.

Early history of Gujarāt.

The early history of Gujarāt is shrouded in obscurity. The Mauryas are known to have been its first rulers. The Vallabhiṣ ruled it from the fifth to the eighth century A.D.; then came the Chandava dynasty, which was succeeded by the Chalukyas or Solankiś. It was in the reign of Bhīm Deva I (1022—64 A.D.) that Mahmud of Ghazna sacked the celebrated temple of Somnath. 7 The next important ruler of Gujarāt was Bhīm Deva II (1178—1242). He defeated Muḥammad Ghauri in 1178, but could not effectively resist Quṭbuddūn Aibak who invaded the kingdom twice, in 1195 and 1197-98. In the later raid Quṭbuddūn plundered Anhilvaṇa (modern Patan and Nahrvala of Muslim historians), the capital, and returned with a large amount of booty. 8 7 See M. S. Commissariat: A History of Gujarat Vol. I, pp. lvi—lxxv. For the total destruction of Somnath by Mahmūd of Ghazna and the erectin of another edifice of the same name see M. Nāẓīm: Life and Times of Mahmūd of Ghazna.

---

8 Ḥasan Nīzāmi: Tajūl Maʿāṣir, Elliot Vol. II.
The last of the Solanki kings died without a male heir, and the kingdom passed into the hands of the Baghelas who were related to the former through matrimony. The Baghela Rajputs ruled for more than half a century (1242-1299), but were constantly troubled by Muslim invaders. It was during the reign of Rai Karan that ‘Alaūddin despatched a large force for the conquest of Gujarat.

Expedition to Gujarat (1299).

The command of the expedition was entrusted to the two redoubtable generals Ulugh Khan and Nuṣrat Khan. Nuṣrat marched from Delhi on the 20th of Jamadiul Avval, 698 (24th February, 1299). Ulugh Khan was ordered to march from Sindh, join the force under Nuṣrat and converge on Gujarat. Ulugh attacked Jaisalmer during his march, and joined Nuṣrat Khan somewhere near Chittor. The joint force marched through the Chittor country, and after crossing river Banas captured the fort of Radosa. This fact is corroborated by Jina Prabha Sūri who says that the then lord of 9 Muslim historians differ about the date of this expedition. Baranī puts it in the beginning of the third year of ‘Alaūddin’s reign, which means the early months of 1299. Amīr Khusrāw (Khazain, Habīb Trs. p. 35) gives the above date. Jina Prabha, the author of Chandra Prabha, who was an eye witness, also gives Ullu (Ulugh) Khan’s invasion in Sam. 1356, A.D. 1299 (Ind. Ant. 1897, pp. 194-5). Vassaf too, has Zilhijjah 698 (August 1299). It is, therefore, certain that the expedition was sent in 1299. Fereishtah and Ḥajiuddabir, who date it in 1297-98 are wrong.

10 Tarikh-i-Ma’sūmī p. 44., Fereishtah p. 102.

11 Tarikh-i-Ma’sūmī p. 44., For details see Chapter VIII.

12 This fact has been mentioned in the poem Kanhad de Prabandh written by one Padmanabh at Jalore in 1455. The subject matter of the poem is the siege of Jalore by ‘Alaūddin. The account seems quite trustworthy as the author wrote in a country which had suffered from the invasion and would have surely possessed many sources of information including the traditions current in that part about the raid. The Ms.
Chittakuda (Chittor), Samarsingh, protected the Mevar country by punishing the invaders, meaning obviously that a portion of the Mevar country was unsuccessfully raided by the generals of ‘Alaūddin on their march towards Gujarat. On his arrival in Gujarat Ulugh Khan pursued the usual course of loot and plunder. The beautiful and opulent city of Anhilvara was thoroughly sacked. Raja Karan Baghela, who had succeeded Sārang Deva only a couple of years back, was taken by surprise and fled in confusion towards Devagiri. His women and treasures including his chief queen Kamlā Devi fell into the hands of the enemy. One part of the army started in pursuit of the king, and the other in search of gold marched towards the temple of Somnath. It had been rebuilt was first discovered by Buhler in the 19th century. Comm. sariate: Gujarat, Vol. I, p. 12 K. M. Munshi: Gujarat and its Literature pp. 102-105.

13 Buhler says that Chittor had to pay a fine (or undergo punishment) while Ojha interprets that “Samar Singh the ruler of Chittakuda protected Mevar by punishing him (the invader)”. The passage doubtless is defective and is liable to both the interpretations but Mr. Ojha seems more reasonable as the country was saved (obviously by defeating and driving out the raiders) and the enemy could not ravage it. Ind. Ant. 1897 pp. 194-95.

Ojha: Rajputānā kā Itihās (Hindi) Vol. II p. 476.

14 According to Yahya, Karan had a standing army of 30,000 horse and 80,000 foot. T. M. S. Text p. 76.

15 Tradition attributes the invasion of Gujarat to the curse of the wife of Mādhava, the Prime Minister of Karan. Mādhava had a beautiful wife Rūp Sundāri. Karan fell in love with her and taking advantage of Mādhava’s absence for some time from the capital forcibly seized her. She cursed Karan that as he had separated her from her husband his queen would also be separated from him. Forbes: Rāsmālā p. 278.

by Kumārpāla (1143-74), after the first one of the same name had fallen to the iconoclastic zeal of Māhmūd of Ghazna in 1026. The wealth of this renowned temple was seized, its idol broken and carried to Delhi where it was thrown to be trampled under the feet of the faithful.\footnote{16} All the contemporary Persian writings as also the Jain account of Chandra Prabha agree on the point that the sack of Gujarāt was thorough.
Jina mentions that Ulugh Khan and Nūsrat Khan destroyed hundreds of towns like Asavalli (Asaval, a village near Ahmadabad), Vanmanthali (Vanthali) and Sūrat, and looted a numer of monasteries, palaces and temples in Gujarāt.\footnote{17}
Baranī

\footnote{16} “Somnath, known to the Jains as Chandra Prabha, occupies an elevated site on the north-western corner of the city of Patan, on the western coast of the Gujarāt Peninsula overlooking the sea and close to the walls. In its present mutilated state it may be difficult to convey and very distinct or correct idea of Somnath.....the whole of the buildings are most elaborately carved and ornamented with figures single and in groups of various dimensions.” J.A.S.B. 1843 p. 73.

The Arab geographer Damishqi gives a description of worship in Somnath. The best account of the temple and its wealth in the time Māhmūd of Ghazna has been given by Ibn Asīr, the author of Kāmilūt Tavārikh. The temple, he says, was a place of pilgrimage for the Hindus who congregated in thousands on occasions of eclipse. The shrine was endowed with more than 10,000 villages. The idol was washed with the water of Ganga which was brought all the distance from the north and in the temple were amased jewels of the most exquisite quality and incalculable value.

\textit{Damishqi: Arabic text} pp. 170-71. Alberuni’s India, Vol. II p. 104.

After the destruction of the temple by Ulugh Khan in 1299, Chudasena king of Jūnagarh (1270-1333) again restored the edifice as is evidenced by Khegnan’s Gīrūr inscription.

\textit{Ind. Ant.} Vol. 54, 1925 Suppl. p. 32.

Also see “Somnath as noticed by Arab Geographers”.

\footnote{17} \textit{Ind. Ant.} 1897 pp. 194-95.
confirms the ravaging and looting of Nahrvala and the whole of Gujarāt, while ʿIsāmī declares that the soldiers, not satisfied with plundering what they could lay their hands upon, dug out and carried away the treasures hidden underground by the Gujarāt people.

Nūṣrat Khan marched with a contingent to plunder the beautiful and wealthy port of Cambay (Kambāyat of the Muslim chronicles). He exacted an immense booty in bullion, jewels and other valuables from the merchants (Khvajās) and other rich men of the city. It was here that the slave Kāfūr, who later played a prominent part in the Deccan campaigns, was forcibly snatched away from his master who had bought him for a thousand dīnārs.

After thoroughly devastating and spoiling Gujarāt, and then leaving an army of occupation, the victorious general returned towards Delhi. The booty comprised of Kamla Devi, the beautiful queen of Rai Karan, a large number of prisoners of both sexes, Kāfūr Hazārdinārī, and a large amount of gold, jewels and other valuable articles. Besides, each soldier had plundered sufficient wealth for himself.

Mutiny of troops near Jalor.

In the course of the return journey to Delhi the army halted at Sakarne, 9 kos from Jalor where the one-fifth

18 Barānī p. 251.
19 Futūh p. 243.
20 Barānī pp. 251-52.
21 Alp Khan was appointed governor of Gujarāt and reigned there from 1300 to about 1314 A.D. when he was recalled to Delhi and killed through the machinations of Malik Kāfūr. The author of the Mirāt-i-Ahmadi describes in detail the beauty of the Jama' Masjid of Alp Khan at Patna.

Also see Beyley: Local Muhammadan Dynasties, Gujarat., p. 38.
22 Vāṣāf bk. IV, p. 448.
of the loot (Khums) of each soldier was demanded as the share of the state. Dispute arose regarding the surrender of some articles, and various kinds of brutal punishments were inflicted upon the soldiers regardless of position or rank to extort confession from them with regard to their individual gains. If the author of the Tarikh-i-Mubarak Shahi is to be believed they were put under bellows and made to drink saline water; the use of rods and fists was also not spared. This inhuman treatment whipped a large section of the army, mostly Neo-Muslims, into open revolt. The leaders of the rebels, according to İṣâmi were Muḥammad Shah Kahbru, Yalhaq and Burraq, and according to Yahya, Iljak, Kasri, Begi, Tamghān, Muḥammad Shah, Tīmūr Bugha, Shādı Bugha and Qutlugh Bugha. Their names also indicate that they were all Mughal converts. They had seized a richly share in the plunder of Gujarāt, and apprehending that a large part of it shall have to be surrendered to the central treasury, they had decided to conceal their possessions. The fiendish cruelty of the royal generals gave them the necessary excuse for rebellion. One morning they murdered Malik Aʾizzuddin, Amīr-i-Ḥajib (Secretary) to Ulugh Khan and brother of Nuṣrat Khan. Next, they attacked the camp of Ulugh Khan, but he had gone out for a wash, and escaped a certain death. The soldiers instead killed a nephew (sister's son) of the Sultan, mistaking him for their prey. Ulugh Khan escaped to the tent of Nuṣrat Khan and the two generals with their unfailing presence of mind ordered drums to be beaten. Loyal soldiers, who had no share in the mutiny, put on their armour under the impression that some neighbour-

---

24 T.M.S. p. 76.

25 Probably Gabru of the Hammīra-Rasau, in which he is called the brother of Muḥammad Shah. Ḥajjuddabir says that Muḥammad Shah had 3,000 horse under his command. Ẓafarul Vāli p. 790.

26 T.M.S. p. 76.

Futūḥ p. 244.
ing Hindu ruler was upon them and assembled in front of the tent of Nuṣrat Khan. The Mughals were overtaken by consternation and fled. The sagacity of the imperial commanders had saved the situation and the trouble was over within four days. Muḥammad Shah and Kahbru sought shelter with Rana Hammīra of Ranthambhor, while Yalḥaq and Burrāq went to Karan,\(^{27}\) the vanquished king of Gujarat then staying in Nandurbar\(^{28}\) as a guest of Ram Deva of Devagiri. The mutiny of the troops had proved abortive; even so it had terrified the royal generals, and they quietly proceeded towards Delhi\(^{29}\) without demanding on the way any more of the one-fifth for the state.

The chief conspirators in the rebellion had escaped, but a different fate awaited their families at Delhi. The moment ‘Alāuddīn heard of the outbreak he ordered the wives and children of the mutineers to be seized and imprisoned. But the heartless Vazīr Nuṣrat, not satisfied with the punishment the Sultan had already inflicted upon these innocent victims, committed other barbarous acts on his arrival at the capital. To avenge the death of his brother he seized the wives of the murderers of A‘izzuddīn, and delivered them to the embraces of the scavengers of Delhi, while their little children were ordered to be cut to pieces in the very presence of their mothers. The barbarities shocked the sentiments of the contemporary chronicler, who asserts that the seizure of “wives and children for the fault of men dates its commencement from this period” and that such punishments have “never been allowed by any code of religion.”\(^{30}\)

---

\(^{27}\) Futūḥ, p. 245.

\(^{28}\) Vide chapter VIII.

\(^{29}\) They seem to have marched via Mathura where Ulugh Khan built a mosque. Epig. Indo-Moslemica, 1938, pp. 59-61.

\(^{30}\) Baranī, p. 253.
The Year 1299 A.D.

While Ulugh Khan and Nuṣrat Khan were busy reducing Gujarat, Sultan Aláūddín was confronted with a foreign invasion. Saldi a Mughal chief had invaded the north-west and occupied the fort of Sivistan. Zafar Khan was appointed to lead an army against him. The brave warrior defeated the Mughals and sent many of them as prisoners to Delhi. In the meantime Gujarat was conquered. Thus 1299 proved to be a very fortunate year for the Sultan. Multan had been conquered a couple of years back. Saldi, an adventurous Mughal had been defeated and the prosperous kingdom of Gujarat had been annexed. Aláūddín's undertakings all turned out well, one after another, and despatches announcing victories were pouring in from all quarters. Every year two or three sons were born to him... the whole of his state affairs, in short, were satisfactorily managed agreeably to the utmost wish of his heart. In his magazine he beheld vast treasures, ... numerous elephants and 70,000 horses. He also found two or three vast countries firmly bound under his rule, and the idea of any adversary or rival in the kingdom never crossed his mind."

The Wild Projects of 'Aláūddin.

Intoxicated with all these incentives to pride 'Aláūddín thought of the most extraordinary and fantastic schemes and began to “conceive of impossibilities and absurdities.” One of his plans was to found a new religion, so that like the Prophet his name also might be carried down to posterity. Prophet Muhammad had, the Sultan would argue with his boon companions, four comrades Abu Bakr, 'Umar, Usmān and 'Alī, and so had he, four equally brave and loyal generals — Alp Khan, Nuṣrat Khan, Ulugh Khan and Zafar Khan. He could, with the force of his arms, and those of his daring and faithful servants, establish a religion which would continue to flourish long after he had passed away from the land of the living.\textsuperscript{32}

Another plan of 'Alāūddin was to repeat the role of Alexander, and carry his conquests far and wide. As Edward Gibbon aptly remarks "So long as mankind shall continue to bestow more liberal applause on their destroyers than on their benefactors, the thirst for military glory will ever be the vice of the most exalted characters."\textsuperscript{33}

The praises of Alexander transmitted by a succession of poets and historians have kindled the imagination of many an ambitious prince, and 'Alāūddin is only one of them. He used to consult his intimate companions on the plan of leaving a viceroy at Delhi to carry out the administration, and himself marching out and bringing to his feet both east and west as the Greek emperor had done. He even caused himself to be styled Sikandar Sānī (Alexander the Second) in his coins as well as in the public prayers.

Although everybody in and outside the court could see that the Sultan talked about these projects out of sheer arrogance and stupidity, yet being afraid of his bad temper they could not but express their approval. Their hypocrisy led the king to imagine that his schemes were simple and prac-

\textsuperscript{32} It is useless to speculate upon the nature of the religion 'Alāūddin had in mind. Probably the Sultan himself did not think about it beyond his expressions of a wish to introduce a religion. He wanted to do something which would immortalize his name as the Prophet's had been. Beyond this wish, however, 'Alāūddin had neither the determination nor the intuition to found a religion. But the people in general were apprehensive of his inordinate ambition, and knowing that he had repeatedly expressed a wish to found a new religion they believed that that new religion must be quite different from the Muhammadan faith, and that its enforcement would entail slaughter of a large number of Musalmans.

\textit{Baranī} pp. 262-64.

\textsuperscript{33} Gibbon: \textit{Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire}.
ticable. In one of the drinking parties, however, in which the Sultan used to elaborate his awry schemes, Malik ‘Alā‘ūlulk, ‘whose bulky person could not take the trouble of visiting the Sultan more than once a month’, also happened to be present. In course of conversation he fearlessly told the Sultan that religion was a matter of revelation from God, and could not be founded on the basis of human intellect or wisdom. He argued that world conquerors like Changiz had tried hard to propagate their creed by shedding the blood of Muslims at large, but they had failed to subvert the faith of Islam. Moreover, argued the Kotvāl, if the people heard that the king was thinking of encroaching upon their religious beliefs, they would, one and all, turn away from his allegiance, and tumult and sedition would arise on every side. As to the plans about world conquest ‘Alā‘ūlulk expressed his admiration at the idea but added that conditions were not so favourable as they had been in the time of Alexander. The kingdom of Delhi did not have such a stable foundation as the Greece of Alexander. Again the Sultan did not have counsellors and intellectuals such as Aristotle, who would manage the affairs of the state during the absence of the sovereign.34

The Sultan listened with rapt attention to the peroration of ‘Alā‘ūlulk. He promised not to talk in future about founding a religion. “But”, asked he, “When so much wealth and elephants and horses have come into my hands, if I make no conquests, and subdue no territories, and content myself with the kingdom of Delhi only, of what use will all these resources be to me, and how shall I acquire a reputation for wonderful achievements?"

In answer to this, ‘Alā‘ūlulk suggested two alternatives. Firstly, there was a vast field for conquest in Hindustan itself. The strong and independent kingdoms of Ranthambhor, Chittor, Chanderi, Malwa, Dhar, Ujjain and the provinces of Bihar and Bengal,35 were still unsubdued in the north, while to the south of the Vindhya, the field was open for innumerable enterprizes. Secondly, the Sultan could effectively check the inroads of the Mughals by strengthening the strongholds on the north-west and by appointing trustworthy commandants. And when the whole of Hindustan had been conquered and the Mughal menace ended for ever, the Sultan could, if he so wished, embark upon a policy of extra-territorial aggrandisement and send his armies abroad.

34 The whole dialogue between ‘Alā‘ūdīn and ‘Alā‘ūlulk shows the vague and fantastic notions Barānī had about the history of Greece. Barānī pp. 264-71.

The counsellor also brought home to the king’s mind the necessity of refraining from drinking to excess, and from the constant pursuit of field sport. Excessive drinking, said he, caused delay and interruptions in the smooth working of administration, and it produced a very bad effect on the general public, who were surely induced to revolt if the king was negligent. ‘Alâulmulk also suggested that if he could not altogether give up drinking he should take wine in small quantities, but all alone without holding convivial parties.

This bold and candid piece of advice impressed the Sultan; he could now clearly discern the impracticability of his grandoisne schemes. ‘Alâulmulk was generously rewarded with a “garment wrought in gold with pictures of tigers, a woven belt, half man gold, ten thousand tankâhs, two caprisoned horses and two villages”, and he was raised head and shoulder above the other nobles of the state.36

By the irony of circumstance ‘Alâûddîn received a yet more practical lesson from the invasion of Quâlugh Khvâjâ, which occurred about the close of the year 1299. This invasion, which was one of the greatest that occurred in ‘Alâûddîn’s 35 The text has ‘from the east bank of the Saru (Sarjû),’ which means practically the whole of Bihar and Bengal.

36 Barani p. 271.
time, would be treated in detail in another chapter, suffice it here to say that the victory of the Sultan over his enemies was as miraculous as it was glorious, and awakened him from his unpracticable dreams. He now determined to finish independent kingdoms by subjugating them and unify the country by giving it a uniform administration.

Hereafter 'Alá‘uddin embarked upon an unceasing round of conquests. Mightiest thrones tumbled before his troops, and the most powerful Rajas bowed to his authority. From 1300 to 1310 he waged incessant wars in northern India; the most bloody of them, as can well be expected, were fought in the historic land of Rajputana. He also sent a successful expedition of Malwa. But the most humiliating episode of 'Alá‘uddin’s life occurred in Bengal, wither, in all probability, his army met with a crushing defeat.

The Expedition to Warangal via Bengal (1302-3).

The year which witnessed Chittor campaign, Barani (p. 300) also saw the despatch of an army to Warangal under the command of Malik Júna, son of Gházi Malik and Malik Jhújhu, governor of Kaña and nephew of Nuṣrat Khan. Choicest troops were placed at the disposal of the commanders and they were ordered Barani (p. 300) puts the invasion of Chittor, the expedition to Warangal and the invasion of the Mughals under Ṭarghí in one and the same year. He also says that 'Alá‘uddin received the news of Ṭarghí’s invasion while he was on his way back from Chittor. The situation at the capital, therefore, after the king’s return from Chittor was very serious and he could not have thought of sending an expedition “consisting of the choicest troops” at a time when the Mughals were preparing to attack Delhi. In all probability, therefore, the expedition was sent before 'Alá‘uddin marched to Chittor and Ferishtah also writes so. Amír Khusrau gives the date of the march to Chittor as Monday the 8th of Jamadi-ul-Akhir 702 (January 26th., 1303). Thus Malik Júna must certainly have left Delhi about the beginning of 1303 or in the last months of 1302 A.D.

Khazáin Allahabad University Ms. fol. 30 b.
to take the eastern route via Bengal and Orissa. The sultan as a prince had himself marched into the Deccan peninsula; but he had then taken the Ellichpur route which was shorter than the one via Bengal and Orissa. "For some obscure reason", writes Col. Woolseley Hiag, "this expedition marched on warangal, the capital of the Kākatiya rajas, by the then unexplored eastern route, through Bengal and Orissa." This "obscure reason" becomes manifest when we cast a glance at the contemporary events in Bengal.

The province was passing through a period of turmoil in the year 702 A.H. (1302—03 A.D.). Sultan Nāşiruddin, son of Balban, had ruled in Bengal almost independently with his own khutbah and coinage when his son Kaiqubād was the sultan of Delhi. The province was not affected by the Khalji revolution, nor did Jalāluddin, after his accession in 1290 interfere with the affairs of that distant region. Nāşiruddin Maḥmūd either died before 1291, or his son Ruknuddin Kaikaūs assumed kingship even while his father was alive. Col. Haig, however, thinks that Nāşiruddin Maḥmūd died in the year 1291 and "was succeeded by his next surviving son Ruknuddin Kaikaūs, who, though he used the royal title and coined money in his own name owed allegiance to 'Alāūiddin Khalji of Delhi." Numismatic evidence shows that Ruknuddin reigned from 691 to 695 A.H. (1292 to 1296 A.D.) as no coins of his bearing a date later than 695 A.D. have been found to exist. Nothing is known about his life or the year of his death, until 38 Barani pp. 299-300.

---

Ferishta p. 111.
40 Thomas:
The "Initial coinage of Bengal." J.A.S.B. 1867, pp. 1-73.
Thomas: Chronicles pp. 148-49.
we find Shamsuddin Firoz establishing himself at Lakhnauti in the year 701 A.H. (1301—2 A.D.). In fact the history of Bengal of this period is shrouded in obscurity and it is difficult to know whether Ruknuddin died in 701 A.H. or was ousted by his brother Shamsuddin Firoz who established himself in Western Bengal.\textsuperscript{42} Not much is known even about Shamsuddin except that his coins which range from the year 701 to 722 A.H. (1302 to 1321 A.D.) indicate his possession of Lakhnauti during that period. His coins minted at Sunargaon establish his possession of the eastern provinces of Bengal also.\textsuperscript{43} It is significant, however, that Shamsuddin felt strong enough to style himself as “Sultan” as is clearly manifest from his coins. It is quite probable that the outbreak of the various rebellions of Ikat Khan, Ḥāji Maula and 'Umar and Mangū, as also Sultan ‘Alāūddin’s pre-occupation at Ranthambhor, might have induced Firoz to assume independence. This view is supported by an inscription on the Madrasa of Zafar Khan in Hugli District.\textsuperscript{44} It is dated 713 A.H. (1313-14 A.D.) and mentions Shamsuddin Abul Muẓaffar as the reigning monarch. ‘Alāūddin could never have tolerated Bengal to become independent of the Delhi Sultanate. In fact he had an eye on Bengal even before he became king. On his return from Devagiri he had despatched Zafar Khan to make preparations for the occupation of Bengal in case he failed in his plans against Jalâluddîn.\textsuperscript{45} Again, when Zafar Khan's popularity had excited the envy of the Sultan the latter had thought of giving the former a large force and ordering him to seize and govern Bengal.\textsuperscript{46} Preoccupation with other affairs had left him no time to prosecute his designs. But when Firoz's conduct became intolerable, he made up his mind to send an army in 1302-3 A.D. Thus the object of the campaign was two-fold—to punish the recalcitrant Firoz,\textsuperscript{47} and, if possible, to effect the conquest of Warangal.

\textsuperscript{42} Thomas: Chronicles p. 193.

\textsuperscript{43} Many a veteran numismatist like Thomas (\textit{J.A.S.B.} 1867 p. 45), Lane Poole (\textit{Catalogue of Indian coins in the British Museum, Muhammadan states} p. 10) and Nelson Wright determine the period of Firoz’s reign from 702 to 722 A.H. But in a hoard of coins of Bengal kings recently discovered from Kalna, District Bardwan, there are four silver coins of Shamsuddin Firoz struck at Lakhnauti bearing the date 701 distinctly inscribed round the margin.

\textsuperscript{44} This inscription is copied and translated by Blochmann in his “Notes on the Arabic and Persian inscriptions in the Hoogli District” \textit{J.A.S.B.} 1870 pp. 280-88. The title on the inscription confirms that Firoz Shah must have been firmly established in western Bengal.

No detailed account of the expedition has been given by Ziyâuddîn or Ferishtah. From their narratives it is not even clear if the army ever reached Warangal. Ferishtah, while describing the second expedition to Warangal under Malik Naib Kâfûr, says that on a previous occasion an expedition had been sent to Warangal through Bengal but since it had come back confused and shattered without accomplishing anything, a second expedition was sent to that country under Malik Kâfûr.\textsuperscript{48} He does not say where the catastrophe befell the \textsuperscript{45} Baranî pp. 228-9.

\textsuperscript{46} Ibid. p. 254, has

\textsuperscript{47} In 1302 A.D. when the expedition was sent, Chittor, Jalor, Sevana, Malwa, Bihar and Bengal and so many kingdoms in north India itself were out of the pale of the Muslim government. Why then did 'Alâûddîn think of the conquest of Telingana all at once while most of north India was yet un conquered? Moreover, 'Alâûddîn conquered the Deccan kingdoms from 1308 A.D. onwards, when he had subjected almost the whole of northern India. Thus the expedition of 1302 meant to accomplish the conquest of Warangal was in fact sent to Bengal as will be clear hereafter.

\textsuperscript{48} Ferishtah p. 118.
imperial army. Baranî, however, says that the army reached Arangal (Warangal) but as rains had set in nothing could be accomplished.\(^49\) Baranî’s meagre information about this expedition may be due to the reason that the unpleasant affairs of Bengal might have been kept secret by 'Alā’udīn. As early as in 700-701 A.H. (1300-02 A.D.) the sultan had to face a number of revolts. He was much upset. While at Ranthambhor, he made a secret of the rebellion of Hāji Maula. Under such circumstances and in keeping with his habit he should have kept secret any risings or reverses, and hence the silence of Baranî. Moreover, Ziyā Baranî was ignorant of the local history of Bengal. He all along thought that Bengal was peaceful under the rule of Nasîr al-Dîn Maḥmūd, son of Balban, throughout the reigns of 'Alā’udīn and his successors, until the time of Ghayās al-Dîn Tughlaq, who, on his march towards Bengal found Nasîr al-Dîn in Tirhuṭ and reinstated him.\(^50\) The historian has clearly confused Nasîr al-Dîn son of Shams al-Dîn Fīroz with his grandfather of the same name. He would thus have us believe that the same Nasîr al-Dîn ruled for forty three years. Such a contention is untenable against overwhelming numismatical and epigraphical evidence. Had Baranî been a little more informed about the contemporary events in Bengal some further information about the expedition, which was, in fact, directed mainly against Bengal and only incidently against Warangal, would have been given by him.

In short the enterprize failed altogether and Malik Jūna and Malik Jhūjhu returned with their shattered forces to join the Sultan at the capital, but were stopped in the vicinity of Badaon as Qutb al-Dîn Khvājâ was investing Delhi. In Bengal Shams al-Dîn Fīroz remained firmly secure as ever and wielded authority until 722 A.H. (1321 A.D.) while Warangal does not seem to have been affected at all by the expedition.

\(^{49}\) Baranî p. 300.
\(^{50}\) Ibid. p. 451.
CHAPTER VIII
JAISALMER AND RANTHAMBHOR

Speedy success in Gujarat whetted 'Alāūddīn’s appetite for further conquest. He turned his attention towards the Rajput states, all of which were independent of the sultanate of Delhi. The Rajputs were the flowers of Indian chivalry. If they could be subdued, the prestige of the Imperial arms would be immeasurably enhanced, and in proportion the prospects of future expansion.

Attack on Jaisalmer.

As early as 1299 Rajputana had tasted of the 'Alāī arms. The bardic lore of Rajputana gives two invasions of Jaisalmer\(^1\) by the Khalijīs, the first one in 1286, in the time of Jalāluddīn, and the other in 1295 by Sultan of 'Alāūddīn. The unlearned bards to whom the facts about these invasions were known through tales carried down from generation to generation wrongly assign the first invasion to 'Alāūddīn and the second one to Jalāluddīn.\(^2\) This is simple anachronism and no “wilful perversion” of facts as Col. Haig is prone to think.\(^3\) But only on the ground of this mistake it cannot be said that Jaiśalmer was never invaded in the time of 'Alāūddīn.\(^4\) True, contemporary Muslim chronicles make no mention of an invasion of Jaisalmer, yet there is positive mention of one in the bardic literature. The first invasion came off in 1286 in

---

1 Jaisalmer is everywhere encircled by desert. It is an oasis in which wheat, barley and even rice are produced. Tod, vol. III, pp. 1261-62.

2 Nainsī: Khayat (Hindi) vol. II, pp. 298-305.

4 Ibid. p. 532.
which 3,800 Rajputs died on the battle field and 24,000 women perished in the flames. Jaisalmer was occupied by a Muslim garrison, but its occupation did not last longer than a couple of years.

The second invasion of Jaisalmer came off in the time of its Bhatti chief Dūdā who was elected to occupy the throne because, probably, the royal prince had died fighting the Musalmans or had retired to some secluded place.\(^5\) Dūdā ruled for ten years and even extended his raids to Ajmer and carried off the horses of the Sultān\(^6\) from Anāsāgar (lake) where they used to be watered. This outrage provoked another attack upon Jaisalmer and the same tale of woe and misery was repeated. 16,000 women sacrificed themselves in the fire of Jauhar while Dūdā with Tilak Singh and 700 of his clan fell on the field of battle.

The date of ‘Alāūdūn’s invasion of Jaisalmer given by the bards is doubtful as ‘Alāūdūn had not even ascended the throne in 1295 A.D. But Tarikh-i-M‘āsūmī, probably the only Persian history which refers to this invasion, mentions that the army of ‘Alāūdūn raided Jaisalmer on its way to Gujarat (1299) and the date of M‘āsūm is quite acceptable in view of the fact that the Rajput bards were not very keen on citing dates and even where they have done they are liable to be incorrect. Mīr M‘āsūm says:

\[
\text{اذلسطان علالدین حکمی رسید که الح خان به تسکیر گکننرد شده بانصف لشکریش دو زرا جیسپریم عازم گکننرد شود حمزه الح خان بالشکریان به جیسپریم رسید ان تلاد فلمنک نموده کنار بسیار بقتل رسانید و دریست سوار در تلعتة جیسپریم گذشت بدلیگر لشکربا عنکر (؟) گکننرد منافق شد.}
\]

\(^5\) Also see Indian Historical Quarterly 1935 pp. 150-52.
\(^6\) Khayat has Firoz Shah which means Jalāluddin but in this case obviously ‘Alāūdūn is meant.
\(^7\) Tarikh-i-M‘āsūmī Text p. 44.
Conquest of Ranthambhor (1301).

The attack on Jaisalmer was a mere raid as compared to the invasion of Ranthambhor. In fact Ranthambhor was the first state to be selected for the trial of strength with the Rajputs; firstly, because of its proximity to Delhi; secondly, because of the failure of Jalāluddin to capture it; and thirdly, because of its reputed impregnability. Added to these were a handy excuse and a justification. The Mughal rebel Muḥammad Shah and his brother Keburu, the leaders of the mutiny near Jalor, had been given shelter by the Rana of Ranthambhor. Though no contemporary historian gives this fact as a cause for the invasion but circumstantial evidence supported by later writings unmistakably does strengthen the hypothesis.

At the time of ‘Alāūddīn’s invasion Ranthambhor was ruled by the Chauhan prince Hammīr Deva, a direct descendant of the renowned Prithvī Raj. Muslim invaders had repeatedly tried to establish their authority in Ranthambhor but 8 Ranthambhor now lies in the S. E. corner of Jaipur state. It is situated on a rocky plateau 1578 ft. above sea level. According to Amīr Khusrau it was situated at a distance of two weeks' march from Delhi and was surrounded by a massive wall 3 kos in circumference.

---

See Jour. of Indian Art 1915-16 p. 36 footnote.
Deval Rani p. 65.

9 Hammīr Kavyās mention Hammīr’s giving shelter to Muhammad Shah as the cause of ‘Alāūddīn’s invasion. This is corroborated by Iṣāmi.

10 An important record stone found in Kota state chronologically mentions the Chouhans of Ranthambhor—Prithvī Raj, Vagbhata (Bahada), Jaitra Simha and Hammīr. Hammīr is described as having defeated some Arjuna in battle, wrested Malwa and then built a three storied golden palace named Pushpaka, which, it has been suggested, may be identical with the present state palace of Jaipur at Ranthambhor.

without success. It was attacked by Quṭbuddin Aibak in 1209, and was captured by Iltutmish in 1226, but it regained its independence soon after. In 1291 Jalāluddīn Khalji marched against it but finding the fortress impregnable gave up the idea of capturing it. But ‘Alāūddīn was made of a different stuff. He ordered his two generals Ulugh Khan, governor of Bayana and Nuṣrat Khan, governor of Kaṣa, to invade Ranthambhor with the forces at their command. The joint armies moved towards the Rajput stronghold and on their way captured and plundered Jhain without encountering any resistance. Before arriving in Ranthambhor Ulugh Khan sent a message to the Chouhan prince that his master bore no grudge against the Rai and if the latter either put the fugitives to death or surrendered them to him, the imperial armies would return to Delhi. He further argued that when his suppliants had not proved faithful and loyal to those who had given them life and honour, how could they be expected to behave otherwise towards their new patron? In the end Hammira was asked to be ready for consequences in case he refused to act in accordance with the instructions contained in the letter.13

But Hammīr was not to be cowed down. He declined to betray his guests into the hands of those who were determined

---

11 According to Hammīr Kavya (Bid. Ind. Text English preface p. 29) the imperial forces consisted of 80,000 cavalry and a very large infantry.

12 ‘Īsāmī writes that when Ulugh Khan took Jhain it got a new name of “Shahr-i-Nau.” Badaoni corroborates him and says, “It (Jhain) is known under the name of Nau Shahr.” Neither Jhain nor any site bearing its changed name Nau Shahr is traceable on the maps now. A small place “Naigaon”, however, which exactly means Shahr Nau lies at a short distance east of Ranthambhor. This may probably be indentified with the Jhain of Barānī.

Futūḥ p. 261.
13 Futūḥ. p. 263.
to kill them. He sent word that he did not want to court the sultan's enmity, but he was not afraid of it either. To the gallant Chouhān the promise of shelter to the Mughal nobles as well as the ancient glory of his house formed the severest justification for accepting the challenge of the Muslim generals.

No sooner did Ulugh Khan receive Rānā Hammīr's reply than he ordered his army to march to the destination. The army erected their camps in the neighbourhood of the fortress and ordered construction of entrenchments and batteries (Gargach)\(^\text{14}\). By this time Hammīr Deva had completed his preparations for defence. Yahya estimates that the Rāi had under his command 12,000 cavalry, famous elephants and innumerable footmen.\(^\text{15}\) According to Amīr Khusrau the Raja had about 10,000 fleet-foot horses.\(^\text{16}\) The Rajputs unceasingly sent forth missiles and projectiles from the fort.\(^\text{17}\) By chance Nuṣrat Khan was struck by a missile and died of his injuries within a short time. The Muslim camp went into a mourning at the loss of such an able commander. Upon this the valiant Rajputs, mistaking the silence in the imperial camp as a sign of its having been overtaken by a sense of defeat, relinquished their defensive position, and sallied forth from the fort and \(^{14}\) Arrada, gargach, minjiniq and pashib frequently occur in the description of warfare in the medieval period. The first three are stone throwing machines, although it is difficult to give their exact points of distinction. Pashib was a raised platform constructed by sand other materials to escald the walls of the fort.

---

\(^{15}\) T.M.S. p. 77.

\(^{16}\) Deval Rani p. 65.

\(^{17}\) Barani (p. 272) has sang-i-maghrabi. In all probability sang-i-maghrabi, or western stone, was some kind of missile used in warfare in 'Alāūddin's days. It is difficult to agree with the view that the sang-i-maghrabi were cannon balls as suggested in the Islamic Culture, 1938, pp. 405-18.
attacked the besiegers. Ulugh Khan could not withstand the impact of the onslaught and precipitately fell back on Jhain. That 'Ala'uddin had underrated the strength of the Rajputs, was clear to everybody. Ulugh Khan duly reported to the sultan the death of Nusrat Khan, and the retreat of the army from Ranthambhor. 'Ala'uddin now decided to march in person.

Ferishtah says that the Rāi attacked with 200,000 men. The figure seems exaggerated.

A number of Hamir Rāsas depicting the life-story of Rana Hammir of Rastambhapura (Ranthambhor) have been written from time to time. The earliest Rasa is by the Jain euridite Nyaya Chandra Sūri (C. 1450 V.S., 1393 A.D.) written at Gwalior. Almost all Rāsas give the same facts about the life of their hero, with a few minor differences here and there. According to these Mahākavyās Rana Hammir was the son of Jaitra Singh and his queen Hira Devi. After giving the prince excellent advice about the business of the government, the old father retired to jungle to live a life of recluse and conferred the government on Hammir, in Sam. 1330 (1283 A.D.). Rana Hammir gave shelter to a fugitive Mahim Shah who had incurred the displeasure of sultan 'Ala'uddin because a queen of the sultan, Chimna Begum by name, had bestowed her affections on the Mughal nobleman. (According to Muslim historians Muhhammad Shah had fled from the Muslim camp after the Jalor mutiny). Sultan 'Ala'uddin demanded the surrender of the fugitive but the Rana refused to surrender him. Consequently the Sultan invaded Ranthambhor. At that time Rāna Hammir was twenty-eight years old.

According to the Mahakavya of Jodhrāj (composed 1828 A.D.) "the fort is very strong and inaccessible. . . . Five large tanks strengthen the defences of the fort. . . . . . It is guarded by a body of 600 Nagās, all veteran soldiers. . . . . Its supply of provisions and ammunitions is immense."

In his defence against the forces of 'Ala'uddin Hammir was helped by Rao Randhir, an uncle and subordinate of the Rāna. Two princes of Chittor, Kanh and Balansi also came to the help of their uncle Hammir, but Sarjan Sah, a merchant of the Sharaogi (Bania) sect of Buddhists, promised 'Ala'uddin help in the capture of the fort. Sharaogi was inmical to the Rajput prince and he made up his mind to avenge the death of his father at the hands of the Rāna.
Attempt on 'Alāūdīn’s life

Soon after the sultan left Delhi with a large army for Ranthambhor. He halted at Tilpat for some time during which he used to go out hunting. One day when he had gone in a neighbouring village called Badah, he ordered arrangements to be made for big game shooting (nargah). While such preparations were going on the sultan seated himself on a basket chair (morha). All of a sudden he heard some men shouting “Lion, Lion”, and a shower of arrows rained on him. Completely confused, he at once got down from the morha with which he shielded himself. Two arrows, however, struck his arm, and the fell down unconscious. This treacherous and cowardly attack had been planned by his nephew Sulaimān Shah, surnamed Ikat Khan, a son of his younger brother Muḥammad. Ikat Khan held the post of Vakil-i-dar. It occurred to him that just as ‘Alāūdīn had obtained the throne by murdering his uncle, so also could he kill his uncle and occupy the throne. With this intention he had come to the hunting ground with some followers,—most of whom were neo-Muslims,—and had attacked the king. Fortunately, ‘Alāūdīn was wearing a thick garment stuffed with cotton and the arrows had not struck any vital part of his Secretly he threw hides into the provisions stored up in the fortress and thus polluted them. Muslim historians also affirm that the fort capitulated on account of scarcity of provisions. According to the Hammīr Kāvyās Rāna Hammīr was not killed on the field of battle but when he began to despair of victory he severed his head with his own hands and offered it to god Mahadeva.

20 It is a plain about 12 miles east of old Delhi and south of Kilughari.

21 Baranī p. 273. Nargah was the name of the sport in which an animal was encircled from all sides and then shot at.
body. He had only became unconscious. Ikat Khan arrived on the spot and tried to sever the head of the king. But some of the loyal retainers had guessed everything, and they hedged 'Aláúddín round from all sides and began to cry loudly that the Sultan was dead. The foolish and inexperienced Ikat, partly because he was unable to dismount and lay hands on the sultan, and partly because he was in a hurry to seize the throne, readily believed the welcome shouts of the paiks. He dashed off towards Tilpat, entered the royal pavilion and seated himself on 'Aláúddín's throne. He proclaimed to the people that he had slain the king, and they readily believed him for they thought that had he not done so, he would hardly have ventured to mount the throne. "A great tumult and uproar consequently arose throughout the imperial camp, and everything began to turn topsy turvy. The elephants were caparisoned with haudás and brought before the royal pavilion; the household servants came out, and every one stood in waiting at his proper post." 22 Ikat Khan, after giving an audience to the courtiers and men wished to enter the royal haram, but Malik Dínár, the chief custodian, together with his men barred his way, and insisted on Ikat's bringing the sultan's head before he could be permitted to enter it.

As Sulaimán was pondering over the strange demand of the Malik, "the head of 'Aláúddín all too soon appeared, set alertly as ever on its shoulders, as the living sultan showed himself to the army on a neighbouring knoll." It had so happened that when 'Aláúddín had been wounded by the arrows most of his men had fled helter skelter. Only a few of his loyal bodyguards (paiks) had remained with him. When Sulaimán had gallopped off towards Tilpat, the sultan's attendants dressed his wounds and nursed him. Soon did 'Aláúddín regain consciousness, but the loss of blood had made him extremely weak and nervous. He thought that some influential barons must have lent their support to the young man, otherwise he could not have dared to make such an audacious assault. Consequently, he decided to abandon his camp, and proceed straight to his brother Ulugh Khan at Jhain and consult him on the future course of action. But Malik Ḥamīd-ud-dīn, who held the post of Amīr-i-Koh (Director of Agriculture) advised the king to proceed to the royal camp immediately. "No sooner will the insignia of royalty become visible to the people and the courtiers", argued he, "and the safety of your august person become known to them, than will they repair to your threshold—and in the twinkling of a moment the head of the traitor Ikat Khan will be cut off and fixed on the point of a spear. Should the night, however, elapse without it being made known to the people that your majesty is safe, it is probable that some one may join the wretch, and the insurrection become much more formidable than at present." The suggestion appealed to the sultan and he set out for the camp immediately. On the way whosoever from amongst his men saw the sultan alive, at once joined him, so that, by the time he arrived near the encampment he had a following of five to six hundred horse. 'Alāūddīn ascended an eminence and showed himself to the people. All the courtiers forthwith repaired to the royal presence. Finding that all was over for him, Ikat Khan fled towards Afghānpūr. Malik A‘izzuddīn and Malik Naṣīruddīn Nūr Khan, two prominent nobles were sent in pursuit and overtaking him in the vicinity of Afghānpūr they chopped off his head. The traitor’s head was fastened to a spear-point and was paraded in the camp. It was later sent to Delhi where also it was paraded throughout the city and then finally it was sent to Ulugh Khan at Jhain. Qutlugh Khan a younger brother of the rebel was also beheaded instantly. The sultan, whose rage knew no bounds, put to death all those who had the least

22 Barani p. 274.

23 Baranī p. 275.
knowledge or connection with the revolt, confiscated their property, and sent their wives and children as prisoners in various forts.

The Fort of Ranthambhor besieged.

The trouble of Ikat Khan having ended, 'Ala'uddin arrived at Ranthambhor by forced marches and pitched his camp on the Ran, a hillock facing the one on which stood the great citadel. With the arrival of the sultan the siege was pushed on with full vigour. Leather bags were distributed to the soldiers to bring sand and stone-ballast and fill up the ravine that separated the two hills. But the Rai kept himself fully informed of the strategy of the royalists and foiled all attempts of the enemy to fill the ditch. Moreover fire was constantly kept up from the fort in reply to the fire of the projectiles hurled by the besiegers and vast numbers were killed on both sides.

The Revolt of 'Umar and Mangu.

While the siege was thus dragging on indecisively intelligence reached the sultan of another revolt. Taking advantage of his absence from the capital his two nephews (sister's sons) 'Umar Khan and Mangu Khan, governors of Badaon and Avadh respectively, started an insurrection in Avadh. The exact motive of this rebellion is not known. Very likely, the cruel nature of the Sultan had spurred the disaffected element in the country to rise against him. Add to this the unsettled procedure of succession in those times. Further, the rebellion of Ikat might have given an incentive to the two princes to try their luck as well. The sultan at once deputed some experienced nobles and the trouble was soon got under. The two raw youths were captured and sent to Ranthambhor, where, in the very presence of the sultan, their eyes were 24 Futuh, p. 265.

sliced "as pieces of melon". Their families and followers were exterminated.

The Insurrection of Ḥāji Maulā.

Following close upon the abortive revolt of ‘Umar and Mangu, intelligence arrived in the imperial camp of a serious outbreak in Delhi. This insurrection was one of the numerous attempts of the Ilbarites to regain the sovereignty. The chief conspirator was one Ḥāji, a prominent slave of the former Kotvāl of Delhi, Malik Fakhruddin. Ḥāji Maulā was a man of "the most sanguinary, audacious and depraved disposition." At the time of revolt the Ḥāji was the superintendent of the crown lands at Ratol, and Tirmizi was the Kotvāl of Delhi. Tirmizi seems to have been of a very harsh and uncompromising nature, and the people of Delhi were utterly disgusted with him. At that time he was engaged in the repair of the Badaon Gate, and to supervise the construction had taken up his residence in a small house close by. Also in those days temporary huts had been pitched in the plain of Sirī where a new fort was under construction and the Kotval of Sirī ‘Aláūd-dīn Ayāz, was staying there. Thus both the kotvāls were busy, one at the Badaon Gate, and the other at Sirī and the sultan was far away in Ranthambhor. At this very time reports of the distress of the soldiery at Ranthambhor were constantly arriving, and it was rumoured that the troops were ever intent on relinquishing their jobs but for fear of the sultan’s severe punishments. Considering the moment opportune and fancying that in their distress the people in the camp and at the capital would lend him their support, Ḥāji Maula rose in open rebellion. In the scorching heat of a noon in 26 Ḥāji Maulā was the chief Shahnah of Delhi in the time of Sultan Jalāluddin. Ferishtah p. 107.

---

27 Ratol or Rataul lies 15 miles north-east of Delhi and is included in the Baghpät Tehsil of Meerut District.
the month of Ramžān 700 (May 1301), when most of the people were taking a siesta, and very few people were passing to and fro in the streets, Ḥājī Maulā accompanied by four armed men went to the residence of Tirmizi and called him to come out. He declared that he had been deputed by the sultan to deliver him a message. The kotvāl without suspecting any danger came out of his house, and was instantly beheaded. Everybody present there was quite bewildered when Ḥājī Maulā produced a forged warrant from under his arms, and told the people that he had killed the kotvāl by the order of the king. He then ordered all gates under the charge of Tirmizi to be shut up. The news of the kotvāl’s murder spread like wild-fire, and the towns folk were so frightened that “the door of every house throughout the city was kept closed.” After disposing off Tirmizi the Ḥājī attempted to kill ‘Alāuddin Ayāz, the kotval of the new fort, under the same pretence of a royal warrant. But Ayāz had come to know of the Ḥājī’s treachery and when he was called by the Ḥājī to come out and listen to a royal command, he refused. At the same time he had the gates of the new fort strongly secured.

Ḥājī Maulā was now all powerful in Delhi. He released all the prisoners of the state, some of whom joined him. To give strength to his cause and to gain fresh supporters, he ransacked the royal treasury and squandered its money among the populace at large. He distributed arms and horses to his followers and “whosoever became his ally had his lap filled with gold.” Nonetheless Ḥājī Maulā’s position was not safe. He was an imposter, a usurper who had no claim to the throne. He, therefore, hunted out a puppet who could play the nominal king, while he himself could enjoy the real power. The choice fell on a Saiyyad named ‘Alvī, who, according to Barañi, was known as a descendant of Shah Najaf, and on his mother’s side was related to Sultan Shamsuddin Iltutmish. This innocent man was forcibly abducted from his residence by the Ḥājī, and placed on the throne. All the nobles and great men of the capital were compelled to come and pay him homage. The people in general were terribly afraid because Ālāuddin’s revenge was implacable. Owing to the dread of the miscreants, the people of Delhi gave up food and sleep, and passed their days and nights in greatest anxiety. Ālāuddin had been apprised of the revolt only three days after its outbreak. He had kept the fact secret from everybody, but as a precautionary measure had sent Malik Ḥamīduddin to Delhi. But when the reports of the insurrection and of the accession of a puppet king at Delhi began to pour in, he sent his brother Ulugh Khan to punish the rebels. But before Ulugh Khan arrived in Delhi, the trouble had almost been got under by Malik Ḥamīduddin. Ḥamīduddin accompanied by his sons and relatives had forced his way into the Ghazni Gate, and entering the city had marched to the Bhandarkel Gate. A short skirmish had ensued between him and the rebels. Ḥājī Maula was defeated, but his power for mischief was not totally destroyed. By chance some followers of Zafar Khan had arrived at the capital from Amroha to present a petition to the court. They joined the royalists. The Ḥājī’s party was utterly destroyed. The gallant Amir-i-Koh dragged the Ḥājī down from his horse and sat upon his chest. In spite of the constant shower of arrows he did not stir from there until he had done the Ḥājī to death. He then went to the Red Palace, and struck off the head of the worthless ‘Alvī. It was fixed upon a spear, paraded through the streets of Delhi, and then sent to the sultan at Ranthambhor.

Malik Ḥamīduddin then rounded up all the confederates

28 Ḥamīduddin was present in the royal camp at the time of Ikat Khan’s revolt. He, therefore, surely accompanied the sultan to Ranthambhor. From Ferishtah’s narrative it appears that the Amir was present in Delhi when the revolt broke out. It appears that Ḥamīduddin was sent to Delhi either when the revolt of ‘Umar and Mangu broke out or at the very start of the insurrection of Ḥājī Maulū.
of Ḥāḏī Maula, from whom he recovered all the money they had received from the traitor, and restored it to the royal exchequer. While this inquisitorial process was going on Ulugh Khan arrived from Ranthambhor, and put to death all the rebel captives “making a torrent of blood to flow.” Determined as he was to extirpate the rebels as also to set an example for the people, he put an end to the line of Malikul Umara Fakhruddin, the former kotvāl of Delhi. The descendants of the kotvāl had no concern with the revolt; their only fault was that Ḥāḏī Maulā had been their man in days gone by.

The Capitulation of Ranthambhor.

The investment of Ranthambhor had proved to be a long drawn out affair. During this while a general like Nuṣrat Khan had perished, attempts on the sultan’s life had been made, and the empire had been convulsed with rebellions; and yet ‘Alāūddin’s determination to take the fort had not faltered in the least. The army was reduced to extreme distress, but not a single soldier dared to desert the camp for fear of the sultan’s imposing a fine of three years’ pay upon him.\(^{29}\) While the open country around had altogether been ruined, a spirit of despair had begun to overtake the Imperial troops. Cut off from the capital, the soldiery was certain in its belief that they were destined to perish under the impregnable walls of Ranthambhor. In secret ‘Alāūddin would deliberate with his confidential nobles about the causes of the successive revolts and the seriousness of the situation, but outwardly he showed as if nothing of importance had happened, and pressed the siege with great vigour. The soldiers, finding it impossible to fill the whole ravine, concentrated on filling a small portion of the moat with bags filled with sand and stone and succeeded in reaching the outskirts of the fort. But the Hindus kept throwing fire and missles and succeeded in keeping the enemy away from the battlements for two or three weeks more. At last provisions fell short in the fortress and soon famine raged to such an extent that one "grain" of rice could be purchased only for two "grains" of gold. "Man can bear every affliction but that of a starving stomach," says Amīr Khusrau, and the valiant Rajputs could not bear the pangs of hunger. In the imperial camp, on the other hand, gold was distributed freely among the troops to give them fresh incentive to fight. When nothing remained in the fort except hardship, despair and starvation, the heroic act of Jauhar was performed. A blazing fire was lit and the ladies of the Rai, headed by Ranga Devi,30 the chief queen of Hammīr, perished on the pyre. The remnant of the Rajput soldiery, their nobles and king donned saffron garments and dashed forth to engage the enemy in a last combat. They fought desperately for there was not the least desire to save a single life. The battle raged fiercely and blood flowed on every side. Muḥammad Shah and Kehbru, grateful to the last to the Rajput king for his hospitality and sacrifice, fought side by side with their patron. At last the great Rana Hammīr fell, fighting gallantly on the field of battle, as yet in the prime of his life.31 'Isāmī asserts that none of the Rai's family was captured alive.32

\(^{29}\) Barani p. 279.

The gallant fight and death of Rana Hammīr has been attributed by some writers to his persistence (Hammīr hath);33 but it must be admitted that Hammīr is one of those gallant 30 Har Bilās Sarda: Hammīr. p. 44.

31 A memorial tablet at Gadhala, District Shivapur, also says that the hero of Hammīr Mahākāvyā was slain in 1301 A.D.
32 Futūḥ. p. 267.
33 Ten beautiful paintings of 19th century depicting the capture of Ranthambhor as described in the Hammīr Kāvyas are contained in the Journal of Indian Art, 1915-16.
sons of Rajputana who died fighting the Muslim invader to save the ever-cherished independence of thier motherland. Once he had given shelter to Mughal noblemen, he could never betray them into the hand of their enemy. Hammīr fought with sublime courage, and upheld the noble traditions of the chivalrous race to which he belonged.

Ranthambhor had capitulated on Tuesday the 3rd of Zilqada 700 (July 11, 1301). Its fall had been accelerated by the defection of Ranmal and Ratanpāl, two ministers of Hammīr. Ranmal, who had gone to ‘Alāūddīn to settle terms on behalf of the Rajputs, agreed to desert to the sultan, and obtained a written undertaking from him granting him complete amnesty. Ranmal showed the document to his Rajput friends and some of them together with Ratanpāl left the beleagurd garrison for the royal camp. But after ‘Alāūddīn had captured the fort he punished the faithless Rajputs, Ranmal and others, saying that when they had not proved true to their old patron how could they be expected to be faithful to him. But just the contrary was the treatment he accorded to Mīr Muḥammad Shah whose wounds he ordered to be dressed. Even in pangs of death, the valiant soldier spurned any offer of attention. He openly insulted the sultan for which he was trampled under the feet of the elephant. But the sultan could never forget the bravery and loyalty of the Mughal noble and gave him decent burial.

The surrender of Ranthambhor witnessed the usual zeal for iconoclasticism and plunder. A number of temples, chief amongst which was the temple of Yahar Deo (Har Deva) were 34 Khazain. Habīb trs. p. 41.

35 Zafarul Wālī p. 807.
36 Ferishtah, p. 108.
Har Bilas Sarda: Hammīr pp. 38-42.
The defection of the ministers has also been mentioned by Chandra Sen Sūrī in the Hammīr Kāvya.
F. 8
razed to the ground. Many “temples and houses in the city were destroyed” and “the centre of Kufr became the abode of Islam.” The fortress of Ranthambhor together with the territory of Jhain was entrusted to the care of Ulugh Khan and the Sultan returned to Delhi.

Death of Ulugh Khan.

Almās Bēg governed Ranthambhor for about six months after which he started for Delhi. On his way to Delhi he suddenly died. ‘Īsāmī attributes the death to poisoning and writes that when Ulugh Khan had heard of the almost fatal injuries to the king, during the revolt of Ikat Khan, he had remarked that if the sultan was dead, his brother was alive to fill the vacant throne. ‘Alāūddin learnt about it from one of his confidential servants. He grew suspicious about his brother and ordered that the latter should be poisoned. Ḥajiuddabīr, on the authority of Husām Khan’s Taḥqīt-i-Bahādur Shahī, also says that Ulugh Khan was poisoned on his way from Ranthambhor to Delhi. Ziyā Barānī says, “Ulugh Khan for four or five months during the sultan’s absence, enlisted a large force, to effect an invasion of Telingana and M‘abar, but he fell a victim to cruel fate and was over taken by death about the time of his approach to the capital. They brought him dead to the city and buried him in his mansion. The calamity made the sultan very sad. He gave away many charities for the soul of the dead.” Thus Barānī not only does not mention poisoning to be the cause of Ulugh Khan’s death; his last sentence goes even to prove the king’s innocence. But taking into account the vindictive and unpropitiating temperament of ‘Alāūddin, it is not improbable that he may have been instrumental in his brother’s death.

37 Khazāīn Allahabad University, Ms. fol. 27 a & b.
38 Futūh pp. 272-73.
39 Zafarul Vālī p. 811.
40 Barānī p. 299.
Measures undertaken to ensure Further Conquests.

After his return from Ranthambhor, 'Ala-ud-din spent his time in hunting in the suburbs of Delhi. He did not enter the City, perhaps because he had been very much terrified by the various revolts that had recently occurred in the capital. Though contemporary writers do not refer to the fear complex, and attribute the sultan’s reluctance to enter the capital to a sense of displeasure and dis-satisfaction on his part towards the inhabitants who had displayed a disloyal behaviour; yet it is clear that 'Ala-ud-din assured himself of the security of his life before entering the City where so many efforts to dethrone him had been made in quick succession. Even his predecessor Jalaluddin had refrained from entering Delhi in the same circumstances. 'Ala-ud-din sentenced many prominent men of Delhi to exile, and punished every conspirator who had escaped the cruel justice of Malik Hamiduddin and Ulugh Khan. The king then set to stamp out the very root of sedition. He confiscated a large number of fiefs, prohibited the sale and use of wine, and even restricted the normal intercourse of barons and influential men. All these measures so varied and so severe in their character will be studied in another chapter, suffice it to say here that the regulations had the desired effect, and in future no serious revolt occurred in Delhi. Secure at home, the sultan could once more think of subjugating the independent kingdoms.

\[41\] Ibid. p. 283.
\[42\] Futuh p. 269.
CHAPTER IX

CONQUEST OF CHITTOŘ

Success at Ranthambhor was an incentive to fresh conquests in Rajputana. As mentioned above, ‘Alāūddin despatched an army towards Bengal and himself started on the conquest of Chittoř—the most renowned citadel in Rajasthan.¹

The fortress of Chittoř had been built by the Maurya Raja Chitrāṅg or Chitrāṅgad. From the 8th century onward it was the capital of the Guhilās of Mewār. For a short time it was occupied by the Parmārs, when the Parmār Munja of Malwa snatched it from the Guhilās. Thereafter it had a chequered history in which Gujarat played a prominent part. Ultimately Chittoř again passed into the hands of the Guhilā Rajputs and remained with them for a century and a quarter until the year 1303 A.D.—when the terrific assault of ‘Alāūddin Khalji put an end to its political independence and peaceful life.

Early Muhammadan Raids.

Rajputana being quite close to Sindh, Muhammadan invaders frequently descended upon it. Like other fortresses of Rajasthan, Chittoř had also repulsed a few raiders before the

¹ “The fortified hill of Chittoř is an isolated mass of rock rising steeply from the plain, three miles and a quarter long and some twelve hundred yards wide in the centre. The circumference at the base is more than eight miles and the height nowhere exceeds four or five hundred feet.”

V. A. Smith: Akbar the Great Mogal pp. 82-83.

For a picturesque description of the fortress see Tod. Vol. III, pp. 1812 ff.

Also E. Terry: A Voyage to East-India, p. 77.
year 1303. According to the Chāch Nāmah it was subjected to a siege soon after Chāch had ascended the throne of Sindh in 631 A.D. Later in the time of Jaitra Singh (1213-1233 A.D.) Mewār was invaded by Ilutmish some time between 1222 and 1229. But Persian chroniclers are silent about it,² though they refer to Ilutmish’s expeditions against Jalor, Mandor and Ranthambhor. The reason for this omission may be the sultan’s defeat in the campaign, a fact which is repeatedly mentioned in Rajput inscriptions and bardic literature.³ After Nagod had been ravaged by Ilutmish, Chittor became the permanent capital of Mewār. According to Ferishtah Mewār was next invaded by sultan Nāširuddin Maḥmūd of Delhi whose rebellious brother had sought refuge there. For eight months the rebel was ruthlessly pursued in the hilly regions. Again, in 1299 Ulugh Khan while on his way to Gujarat tried to attack the Mewār country, but as stated above, he was repulsed. At length in the year 1303 Chittor was subjected to one of the greatest seiges in its history.

The Siege

On Monday the 8th of Jamādius Sani 702 (January 28th, 1303)⁴ Alāūddin marched at the head of large army to conquer Chittor. Amir Khusrau, historian and poet laureate accompanied the sultan on this expedition. He has left a graphic description of the citadel, its siege and final surrender. On his arrival in Chittor the sultan pitched his tents between the two rivers Gambheri and Berach, while the troops encircled the whole town, the right and left wings of the army encamping on either side of the fort. The sultan planted his flag on a hillock, known as Chattravardi or Chittori on which he held his court and directed the operations of the siege personally.

² Mr. Ojha deals with this expedition in detail.
³ Rajputana ka Itihās, (Hindi) vol. II, pp. 463-68.
⁴ Khazāin, Habib Trs. p. 47.
At the time of ‘Alāʻūddin’s invasion Rānā Ratan Singh, son of Rānā Samar Singh and grandson of the valiant Jaitra Singh, was the ruler. He had ascended the throne in C. 1301 A.D. According to Amīr Khusrau the Rana of Chittor was the most exalted of all the Hindu rulers, and all the kings of Hindustan acknowledged his superiority. Describing the awful grandeur of the fortress the poet says that the citadel, which was cut out of a huge rock, was wonderful, and despite the onslaughts of the minjūq, it was not affected in the least. The brave Rajputs, under their gallant leader Ratan Singh offered a heroic resistance for full eight months, but then they gave way. No trustworthy account, contemporary or even later, of the various siege operations, tough battles and stratagems that would surely have occurred during these eight months, is available to us. The fact that the siege was a prolonged one emphatically proves that the garrison were bent upon defending their fortress to the last man. It is not known if the neighbouring princes came to the rescue of Ratan; but considering the constant rivalries and callous indifference of the kingdoms of Rajputana towards one another, it can easily be 5 In an inscription dated Sam. 1358 (1301 A.D.) found at Chittor and published in the Rajputana Museum Report 1920-21 the name of the ruling prince is given as Rāval Samar Sinha. Thus Ratan Singh, his son, seems to have ascended the throne some time after 1301 and just before ‘Alāʻūddin attacked the kingdom in the early months of 1303 A.D.

6 Deval Rani pp. 66-67.

7 Barani the chief authority of the period only drops a line about the surrender of Chittor. He says (p. 299)

سلطان علال الدين از شهر بارز لشکر کشید و درچیتور رفت
چیتور دامخصر کرد و زودتیران حصار را بکشاد واز انجا
بارز در شهر آمد.

Most of the contemporary and even later historians say very little about it. ‘Īsāmī and Yahya say something like Baranī and do not give any details.
surmised that the newly crowned king of Chittor had to fight single handed. An inscription dated Sam. 1517 (1460 A.D.) and preserved in the Udaipur Museum, however, mentions Mahārānā Lakshmī of Sesodia, one of the vassals of Chittor, to have died with his seven sons fighting the Musalmans (under 'Alāūddīn). This alone shows that the battle before Chittor was terrible, a fact corroborated by Muslim historians.

Before the final surrender of the citadel the Rajput ladies of the fortress lighted the fire of Jauhar in a subterranean cavern which still exists, and perished into the devouring flames to save themselves from enslavement or dishonour. Col. Tod gives a picturesque description of the heart rending scene in which a procession of chivalrous Rajput women, headed by the fair Padmini, queen of Ratan Singh, threw themselves into the fire of Jauhar. "The fair Padmini closed the throng," writes the author of the Annals, "which was augmented by whatever of female beauty or youth could be tainted by Tatar lust. They were conveyed to the cavern and the opening closed upon them, leaving them to find security from dishonour in the devouring element."\(^9\)

The frightful rite of Jauhar having been performed the Rajput warriors fought the Muslim invaders desperately. For long all attempts of the invaders to climb the fort by constructing a pashib met with a failure. But then Chittor capitulated after an open engagement on Monday the 11th of Muḥarram 703 (August 26th, 1303).\(^10\) The heroic resistance of the Rajputs had exasperated the sultan who (just as Akbar did two and a half centuries later) ordered a general massacre of the population. In a single day, says Amīr Khusrau, some

---

\(^8\) Arch. Sur. Rep. 1925-26, p. 149.

\(^9\) Annals, vol. I, p. 311.

\(^10\) Khazāín, Habib Trs. p. 48.
thirty thousand Hindus were “cut down like dry grass.”" 11 After this inhuman massacre the callous sultan “remained in Chittor for some days” and “committed every act of barbarity and dilapidation which a bigotted zeal could suggest, overthrowing the temples and other monuments of art.” 12 Chittor was rechristened Khizrabād after the name of the king’s eldest son Khizr Khan to whom the citadel was assigned. A red canopy, usually bestowed upon heir-appa rents, a robe embroidered with gold and two standards one black and the other green were given to the prince. Thereafter ‘Alāūddin quickly returned to capital probably because he had an inkling of a Mughal invasion.

There is some discrepancy in the accounts of historians about the fate of Ratan Singh. Amir khusrau says that life of the Rānā was spared by the sultan, and is corroborated by “Isāmī.” 13 But this does not seem probable. When ‘Alāūddin could order a wholesale slaughter of 30,000 Hindus in a single day he would surely not have spared the life of the Hindu King, were he one of the survivors after the heroic defence. According to Nainsī Ratan Singh died fighting sultan ‘Alāūddin. 14 Tod also writes that the ruling prince (whose name he incorrectly puts as Bhīmsi) was killed on the field of battle 15 It is doubtful that the Rānā outlived the capitulation of Chittor as nothing is known about his later life.

The Legend of Rani Padmini

These are in a nutshell the facts about the invasion of Chittor by ‘Alāūddin Khalji. But a very interesting legend

11 Ibid. p. 49.
13 Futūh p. 272. gives the name of the Rai of Chittor as Sonarsia (Samar Singh). Probably ‘Isāmī did not even know of the unfortunate Ratan who had only ascended to be de-throned by ‘Alāūddin.
has grown in this connection. Malik Muhammad Jaisi, a poet of the sixteenth century wrote an epic “Padmavat” in the year 1540 A.D. in which he attributes the invasion of Chittor to Sultan 'Ala-ud-din’s desire to obtain possession of Padmini, the beautiful queen of the Raja of Chittor. According to Jaisi, Padmini or Padmavati was a princess of Ceylon and Ratan Singh, king of Chittor, having learnt about her beauty from a parrot went to Ceylon in a mendicant’s garb to woo her. As he was passionately in love with her he stayed there for twelve long years. At last Ratan Singh succeeded in winning his love and taking her with him came back to Chittor. A mendicant Raghava by name once had a glimpse of Padmini while she was giving him alms and he swooned at the sight of so superb a beauty. Raghava carried the tale of the extraordinary charms of the queen of Mewar to the sultan of Delhi, and 'Ala-ud-din enchanted by the description of Padmini sent a message to Ratan Singh asking him to send Padmini to the royal harem. Ratan Singh was greatly incensed at the behaviour of the sultan of Delhi, who in turn laid siege to the fortress of Chittor. But 'Ala-ud-din - could not take the fort even after fighting for full eight years. Finding that the fortress was impregnable and the Rana unbending 'Ala-ud-din reduced the demand and promised to return to Delhi if he could only have a look at the reflection of the fair Padmini in a mirror. He then returned from the fort and Ratan Singh as an act of courtesy accompanied the sultan up to the gates of the citadel, although his two brave commanders Gora and Badal had warned him about the Turk’s vile intentions. As Ratan Singh was leaving the sultan at the gate he was treacherously imprisoned and forcibly carried away to Delhi. The people of Chittor were all aghast at the shameless treachery of the sultan. Soon after a royal order 16 This is unbelievable. Ratan who successfully fought the Muslims for eight years could never have consented to satisfy such a humiliating and absurd request of 'Ala-ud-din.

reached them saying that Ratan Singh could be released only on the condition that Padmini was sent to the royal haram. The Rani who heard about the tortures Ratan Singh was being subjected to at Delhi at once conferred with Gora and Badal and decided to go to Delhi. In 1,600 covered litters were accommodated Padmini and some of the bravest Rajput warriors, all armed to the teeth, and it was given out that Padmini and her companions and maids were going to the royal palace. When this party arrived at Delhi, Padmini asked for a favour from the sultan and it was to have a last interview with her lord Ratan, from whom she was to part for ever. ʿAlāʿuddīn, overjoyed at his success, readily granted the interview. The palanquins bearing the brave Rajputs entered the place where Ratan Singh was imprisoned. No time was lost in rescuing him and he and the queen took the road to Chittor. On their flight they were escorted by the brave Rajput warriors under Badal, while Gora gallantly opposed the royal forces which the bewildered sultan had sent to intercept the fugitives. In the battle between the royalists and the Rajputs Gora was killed. The engagement gave ample time to Rana Ratan Singh to reach Chittor safely where great rejoicings were held on his arrival. There he heard about the treachery of Devapala of Bhelnar (Kumbhalgarh), who had tried to seduce Padmini from Chittor in his absence. Ratan Singh invaded the kingdom and killed Devapala but he himself was also wounded in the engagement. Shortly after his return to Chittor Ratan died of the wounds he had received while fighting Devapala, and Padmini and another queen Nāgmāti performed the rites of Sāti. In the meantime the sultan again arrived in Chittor and the standard of Islam was hoisted on the soil.

This story of Malik Muḥammad Jaisi in which romance, adventure and tragedy are all beautifully intermixed, very soon gripped the popular mind and here, there and everywhere the story of Padmini was told and retold. The Persian chroniclers who did not very much care to distinguish between fiction and fact readily accepted it as true history so that after the time of Malik Muhammad Jaisi the Padmini episode is mentioned as a historical fact in many historical works including those of Ferishtah and Hajjuddabir.

Ferishtah writes the account of Chittor at two places. At one place he says that sultan 'Ala'uddin, after a siege of six months conquered the fort of Chittor, and handed it over to Khizr Khan, whom he declared as heir-apparent. He does not even mention the name of the prince then ruling at Chittor. At another place, while describing the events of the year 704 H. (1304 A.D.) he writes that Raja Ratan Singh, who had been in imprisonment since the invasion of Chittor, effected his escape in a strange manner. Among the women (Zanān) of Ratan was one Padmini, whose beauty and skill had tempted the sultan to crave for her possession. He told the Rana that if he wished to be released he should deliver Padmini to the sultan. Ratan Singh agreed to the proposal and sent for Padmini but his relations disapproved of the dishonourable proposal and thought of poisoning Padmini to save her and her race from infamy. But a daughter of Ratan Singh who was known for her intelligence and dexterity struck at such a plan that she rescued her father from the sultan's imprisonment without his stooping to adopt any dishonourable course. Ferishtah then almost reproduces Jaisi's story of the brave Rajputs going in palanquins and effecting the escape of the Rana. Later on he says that from the day Ratan Singh was safely back in Chittor he began to raid his country occupied by the Musalmans. At last the sultan thought it useless to retain possession of Chittor and ordered Khizr Khan to evacuate it. It was then given over to the nephew (sister's son) of the Rana.17

17 Ferishtah pp. 111, 115.
Another important historian who writes about Padmini is Ḥajiuddabir.\textsuperscript{18} He was a contemporary of Ferishtah. His narrative of Padmini episode is varied and he gives more than one version of the story. He says that after the conquest of Chittor its Hindu Raja was kept under imprisonment in a hilly retreat of Chittor itself and ‘Alāūddīn sent him a message from Delhi guaranteeing him liberty if he delivered his wife, who was possessed of certain qualities,\textsuperscript{19} to the sultan. Such women, says Ḥajiuddabir, are called Padmini in Hindustan. Another version, writes the Arabic historian, is that ‘Alāūddīn had demanded the surrender of Padmini before leaving Chittor and had promised the Rana’s\textsuperscript{20} release in return. Thus says he, it is possible that while the sultan was returning to Delhi the Raja may have accompanied him. He may have requested the Sultan to let him stay in the Mewar country so that he might induce his wife to go to his haram and entrust her to the care of whomsoever the sultan ordered, and then himself come to Delhi under protection of the sultan’s guards. ‘Alāūddīn in the temptation of the woman left him there and himself went to Delhi. The Raja sent secret instructions to his trusted nobles and servants and they, 2,500 in number, arrived in palanquins, fought, and rescued him. Having heard of this ‘Alāūddīn bestowed Chittor upon a niece (sister’s daughter) of the Rana who was married to the sultan; but she was soon killed by the Raja’s minister, whereupon the Hindu Raja come back to his country and established his power there. This state or affairs continued till 941

\textsuperscript{18} Zafarul Vāli pp. 786-88.

\textsuperscript{19} Haji does not here use Padmini as a proper name but as a title of a woman possessed of certain special qualities.

\textsuperscript{20} He does not mention the name of Ratan Singh.
A.H. when Bahādur bin Muḥaffar of Gujarat conquered Chittor. 21

Relying on the local traditions of the Rajputs and their bardic literature (of the eighteenth century), Col. Tod repeats the story of Padmini in glowing words.

It is necessary to make a close study of the various narratives of Padmini to find out the truth about the story. Various absurdities and inaccuracies in the epic of Jaisi clearly show that it is not a historical fact. Firstly, it was not possible for Ratan Singh, who had reigned only for one year when Alāūdīn's invasion of Chittor occurred, to go to Ceylon and stay there for twelve years in quest of Padmini. Then the king in Ceylon contemporary to Ratan Singh was Prakaramabahū IV and neither Govardhan of Jaisi nor Hamir Sank of Col. Tod. 22 Again Jaisi's epic mentions that war between Alāūdīn and Ratan Singh continued to wage for eight years. This statement lacks corroboration in any writing contemporary or later. Jaisi, moreover, gives Padmini as the cause of the invasion of Chittor but Ferishtah and Hājīddabīr, who adopt the story, do not give the acquisition of Padmini as an incentive or pretext for the invasion.

The narrative of Ferishtah, who wrote seventy years after Malik Muhammad Jaisi is also full of discrepancies. In the description of the capitulation of Chittor he does not even mention the name of the ruler of Chittor, obviously because he depended on the contemporary authority of Amīr Khusrav, who also misses to mention the name. Later on Ferishtah talks of the escape of Ratan Singh by a stratagem, but he was not certain whether Padmini was a daughter or a wife.

21 Zafarul Vāli p. 788.
22 Ojha: Rajputana Ka Itihās Vol. II. p. 461.
Ind. Ant. 1930 p. 236.
of Ratan Singh. His description of later events in Chittor is also not trustworthy for sultan ‘Ala‘uddin was not the man to tolerate an escaped prisoner ravaging his son’s territories, much less ordering Khizr Khan to evacuate Chittor. Ferishtah describes the evacuation of Chittor by Khizr in his narrative of the events of the year 704 H. (1304 A.D.) and says that it was bestowed by the Sultan on a nephew (sister’s son) of Ratan Singh. This date for the evacuation of Chittor is incorrect as other evidence shows that Khizr left Chittor long after the year 1304. Moreover could Ratan Singh bear his nephew occupy the throne of Mewar when he himself had come back to his country successful and alive?

The next writer Ḥajiuddabīr’s account of Padmini is very confusing. The historian himself was in doubt about what he was writing. He never mentions the name of Ratan Singh and refers to Padmini as a woman possessed of certain qualities and not as a particular person. Then he attributes the stratagem of release to the scheming mind of the Rai and not to Padmini’s intelligence. Again, according to him the Rai was not kept imprisoned at Delhi and the historian is not sure whether the demand for Padmini was made before the capitulation of Chittor or after Ratan Singh had become a prisoner in the hands of the sultan. The most surprising fact

23 At one place Ferishtah (p. 115) writes

"بسم بانشات رسمانیا کا ہرمیان زنام راجه چیتور رنی ست پیدمنی نام"

Which obviously though not literally means that she was one of the wives of Ratan Singh. At many places after this he writes the word zan but later on writes that a daughter of the Rai (whose name he does not give)

"دختر راک کہ بفھم و عقل مشھر خویش و تبعیجہ خوSEN بود" thought of the strange plan of the escape of Ratan, went to Delhi, and rescued her father.

about Hajjuddabir’s narrative is that he does not mention the name of Khizr Khan, who according to contemporary writers, was appointed to the charge of Chittor after its capitulation.

Thus the stories of Ferishtah, Hajjuddabir and other later Persian historians and the bards of Rajputana, except in certain minor variations, closely resemble one another and seem to have been drawn upon the Padmavat of Jaisi. So that while Jaisi had 16,000, Ferishtah has 700 and Hajjuddabir only 500 litters that went to Delhi. Malik Muhammad Jaisi and Ferishtah say that the Rana was imprisoned at Delhi while Hajjuddabir thinks that he never went to Delhi and was left a prisoner under guard in his own kingdom so as to induce Padmini to go to ‘Ala’uddin. According to Jaisi it was the queen Padmini, according to Ferishtah it was a daughter of Ratan, and according to Hajjuddabir it was the Rana himself who planned the strange stratagem for his escape. Thus except for a few variations the story of Padmini in all the bardic and historical books resembles in broad details that of Jaisi’s Padmavat. But it is doubtful whether even Jaisi ever meant to write about the life story of a princess of Chittor, while writing the Padmavat. At the end of his book Malik Muhammad writes, “In this narrative Chittor stands for the body, the Raja (Ratan Singh) for the mind, Singhaldvip (Ceylon) for the heart, Padmini for wisdom... and sultan ‘Ala’uddin for lust (Maya).”

---

24 Most of the historians later than Ferishtah mention Padmini episode in their histories. Bahrulamvaj (Bankipore Library Ms.), a general History of India written in the 18th cent. also mentions it.

25 नागमती यह दुनिया-वंचा। बांधा सोह न एहि चित बंधा।
राष्ट्र दूत सोई संतानू। माया अलाउदी गुलतानू।
प्रेम कथा एहि भावि विचारहु। दूसर लेख जो वृन्दे पारहु।
From this remark of Jaisi it becomes clear that he was writing an allegory and not narrating a true historical event. May be that the selection of this particular theme may have been inspired by the tragic Jauhar of Chittor in Jaisi’s own times when Bahadur Shah of Gujarat invaded Chittor in the year 1534. But once Jaisi had written the romantic story the Muhammadan historians of India, who not unfrequently copied verbatim from the Persian histories also, adopted this story in extenso. The Padmavat was completed 224 years after the death of ‘Alaūddīn and 237 years after the eventful siege of Chittor, and not a single historian or chronicler, Persian or Rajasthani, ever wrote about Padmini before the Padmavat of Jaisi was completed.

But one fact causes some hesitation in rejecting the story altogether. “The Mewar tradition which accepts the story is a very old one, handed down from generation to generation,” and if Padmini episode was a mere “literary concoction” why did it gain so wide a currency in Rajputana? Dr. Ishwari Prasad, History of Medieval India p. 226. The answer to this, however, is not far to seek. Tradition is not a very authentic source of history and it is not easy to say how old the Mewar tradition is, and whether it is really older than the Padmavat of Jaisi. The bardic chronicles were written long after the completion of the Padmavat and even Ferishtah’s Tarīkh, and it cannot be said with certainty whether the bards based their accounts of Padmini on oral tradition, or on the Padmavat itself. It is quite probable that Jaisi may have struck at the plot of Padmavat from the “terrible battle” of Chittor as Dickens struck at the plot of “A Tale of Two Cities” from the extra-ordinary times of the French Revolution. As to the wide currency it gained in Rajputana it may be said that once such stories are in the air they are repeated everywhere with added incidents and suggestions. The romantic story of Padmini got so much currency in India that not only Ferishtah and Ḥajīuddabīr but even the great scandal collector Manucci relates its incidents in connection with Akbar’s invasion of Chittor, and says that Padmini was the queen of Raja Jaimal who was rescued from royal imprisonment through the stratagem of litters.27

Jaisi Granthāvali, Padmāvat p. 341.

26 Dr. Ishwari Prasad, History of Medieval India p. 226.

Against these confused and varied accounts is the testimony of the contemporary historians, poets and travellers, Barani, ‘Īsāmī, Amīr Khusrau, Ibn Battūtah, and the authors of Tarikh-i-Muhammadī and Tarikh-i-Mubarak Shahī, who never allude to the Padmini affair at all. All these historians and chroniclers cannot be accused of deliberately entering into a conspiracy of silence on the Chittor episode. Amīr Khusrau who accompanied the sultan to Chittor has very fearlessly and even exaggeratedly given the details relating to the siege. How can it be said that such an incident as that of Padmini, if it really happened, escaped mention from his pen? The story of Padmini is to be found in Jaisi’s Padmavat, in traditional lore, and in those chronicles the accounts of which have borrowed it from the Padmavat and the traditions. Tradition is no doubt a source of history but it is surely the weakest one, and until it is corroborated by contemporary evidence—literary, historical, epigraphical and numismatical—it cannot be accepted as true history. In the case of Padmini the antiquity of the tradition which furnishes the story is not known, while the story itself is a long one. But it cannot be accepted simply because it was so popular and for so long a time. To say that where so much is alleged something must be true is not the historian’s job.

Setting aside the traditional narratives of the story the true facts are that Sulṭān ‘Alāūddīn invaded Chittor in the year 1303 and after a hard fight of about eight months captured it. The brave Rajput warriors died fighting the invaders;

the brave Rajput women perished in the flames of Jauhar. Among those who perished was perhaps a queen of Ratan Singh whose name was Padmini. Except these bare facts all else is a literary concoction and lacks historical support.

Later History of Chittor.

Khizr Khan ruled over Chittor for some years, but not in peace. The valiant Rajputs could hardly bear a foreigner ruling in their land and constantly harassed the royal troops garrisoned at Chittor. At times they grew so daring as to throw the Musalmans down the battlements of the fortress, and it became impossible for the prince and his deputies to stay there. According to Ferishtah the sultan thought it useless to retain Chittor and ordered Khizr Khan to evacuate it. But it can well be imagined that the sultan would not have given up the fortress in such an easy way. In fact, the gallant Rajputs who put an edge on the tooth of a mighty emperor like Akbar two and a half centuries later, rendered impossible the stay of Khizr Khan in Chittor and 'Ala-uddin ordered Khizr Khan to vacate it. Chittor was handed over to Maldeva, brother of Kanhari Deva Chouhān, the Songara chief of Jalor. Maldeva had saved 'Ala-uddin from a fatal accident during the siege of Jalor and as a token of gratitude the sultan bestowed upon him the governorship of Chittor some time between the years 1313 and 1315. Maldeva remained all his life a tributary to the sultan and sent him pre-

---

28 Ferishtah p. 115.
30 There is some discrepancy in Ferishtah’s statements about the time of Khizr Khan’s evacuation of Chittor. While describing the events of the year 704 A.H. (1304 A.D.) Ferishtah writes, “At length finding it of no use to retain Chittor the sultan ordered prince Khizr Khan to evacuate it and to make it over to the nephew of the Raja.” But this date sents, and always joined the imperial standard in the field with 5,000 horse and 10,000 foot.\textsuperscript{31}

The Rajputs, however, were never willing to submit to a puppet of the sultan and created difficulties in the way of Maldeva. Maldeva’s greatest enemy was Hammîr, Rânâ of Sesoda, whose grandfather Lakshman Singh had died with his seven sons including Arsi Singh, father of Hammîr, fighting in the battle of Chittor. After Ajai Singh, the only uncle of Hammîr who had survived the memorable battle, Hammîr became the Rana of Sesoda estate and constantly waged war to obtain Chittor. Maldeva tried to conciliate him. He married his daughter to Hammîr and ceded certain parts of Chittor to him, but the brave Rânâ was determined to regain the whole of Chittor. At last his efforts were crowned with success and after the death of Maldeva in about 1321 A.D. Hammîr became master of the whole of Mewar, and assumed the title of Mahârânâ. In an inscription of Mahârânâ Kumbhâ’s time, dated 1438 A.D.; Hammîr is said to have killed a large number of Musalmans and earned renown.\textsuperscript{32} Hammîr’s descendants have ruled Mewar to the present day.

is wrong. An inscription dated the 10th of Zhilhijjah 709 (13th of May 1310) in Chittor mentions ‘Alâûddîn as the ruler. It reads:

\begin{center}
شهر يار جهان مهكد شاه - أفتاق زمان و ظلال الله\\nبد المظفر سكندر ثانی - شد مسلم بر传输 جهانیانی\\nمکشر ذکر الحکمران موسوم قربان - سال بذل هفتصد و نه از عصران\\nتا دون بعید قبته عالم - باد ملك شاه بني أمدم \end{center}

Thus it is certain that Chittor was not evacuated by the imperialists till the year 1310. Ferishtah himself describing the events of the year 1311-12 says that “the Rajputs at Chittor threw the Muhammedan officers over the walls and asserted their independence”, which clearly means that until that year the imperial garrison was present in Chittor and it had not been handed over to Maldeva till then.

\textsuperscript{31} Ferishtah p. 115.
\textsuperscript{32} J.B.B.A.S. Vol. XXXIII, p. 50.
CHAPTER X
MALWA SEVANA JALOR

The conquest of Malwa (1305).¹

The capitulation of the mighty kingdoms of Ranthambhor and Chittor, maintains Amîr Khusrau, opened the eyes of the Rajputs to the irresistibility of the Turkish arms and they all submitted to ‘Alâûddîn without risking a battle. Rai Mahlak Deva of Malwa, however, “forsook the path of loyalty” and prepared to defend his country against the Muslim aggressor.²

Muslim arms had penetrated into Malwa long before ‘Alâûddîn invaded it in 1305 A.D. In 1231-32 A.D. Sham-suddin Iltutmish had marched against it, captured the fort of Bhilsa and sacked Ujjain, in the course of which he broke the famous temple of Mahâkâlî.³ But this was merely a plundering raid, and as soon as Iltutmish returned to Delhi Raja Dêwapâla continued to rule there as before. A tiny expedition was also led during Jalâluddîn’s reign, but in the time of ‘Alâûddîn it sustained a terrific assault and the kingdom was annexed to the Delhi Empire.

According to Amir Khusrau⁴ Rai Mahlak Deva of Malwa possessed thirty to forty thousand cavalry and an innumer-¹ This expedition has not been mentioned by Baranî. Khusrau describes it in Khazâin and refers to it in Deval Ranî also.

² Khazâin. Habib Trs. p. 43.
³ For details see Ojha: Rajputânâ kâ Itihâs (Hindi) vol. I pp. 201-203.
⁴ Khazâin. Habib Trs. p. 43.
Deval Ranî Text p. 67. able infantry.® Mahlak’s foster brother and commander-in-chief of the forces was Koka Pradhāna, an accomplished statesman and a brave warrior. Seeing their recalcitrant attitude ‘Alāūddīn appointed a select body of 10,000 troops under the able commander ‘Ainul Mulk Multani® to march against Malwa. On their arrival the royal forces created consternation in the country. In an engagement Koka was killed on the field of battle where “so far as human eye could see, the ground was muddy with blood.” 7 His head was sent to Delhi to be trampled under the feet of the horses below the palace gates. Koka’s death precipitated the flight of Rai Mahlak Deva to Mandu.

‘Ainul Mulk Multānī administered the country well and peace was soon established. A short time after he marched with his forces against Mandu which, according to Khusrau was “the key to the conquest of Deccan.” A contingent of Mahlak Deva, under the command of his son, encountered the invaders but it sustained a defeat and the prince was slain.
The fort of Mandu was beleaguered. Meanwhile a traitor from the town pointed out to the Muslim general a private passage and he entered the fort in the darkness of the night.
Mahlak Deva and his garrison were taken aback at the sudden appearance of the enemy inside the fortress and in the confused flight that followed the Rānā was killed and the royal army gained mastery of the city, 5th of Jamāḍī-ul Avval 705
(November 23rd. 1305).®

5 Yahya, Ferishtah and Hājiūddabīr all say that the Raja had 40,000 horse and 100,000 foot.
6 ‘Ainul Mulk was a master of pen as well as sword. Deval Rani pp. 67-68.
7 Khazāīn. Habib Trs. p. 44.
8 Khazāīn Habib Trs. p. 46.
The author of T.M.S. gives the date of the conquest of Malwa as 700 A.H. (1300-01 A.D.) but he is incorrect. The contemporary Khusrau gives the above date.
Soon after the fall of Mandu, the cities of Ujjain, Dhārnagri and Chandī were reduced and their chiefs were forced to recognise the suzerainty of the sultanate. 'Ainulmulk sent a detailed account of his exploits to Delhi where rejoicings were held for full one week and sweets were offered to the public on all the seven days. Both Malwa and Mandu were entrusted to the charge of 'Ainulmulk Multānī as a reward for the brilliant success he had achieved and the eminent services he had rendered.

Capture of Sevānā (1308).

After the conquest of Malwa 'Alāūddīn sent his brilliant generals Malik Naib Kāfūr and Nuṣrat Khan to the south and himself seized an opportunity to attack Sevānā. Sevānā was then in possession of a Parmār Rajput chief Sītal Deva. Sītal Deva had witnessed the mighty citadels of Ranthambhor and Chittor succumb to the onsluaths of the Khalji warlord, but still he refused to submit to the Delhi sultan. Sītal Deva was a powerful and energetic ruler. He had defeated many Raīs in battle and a number of Rajput Rāvats acknowledged his suzerainty.

An inscription incised on a soft white stone refers to the construction of a mosque during the reign of Muhammad Shah 'Alāūddīn in the country of Koka (Koka Desa) in 711 A.H. (1311 A.D.). This inscription which belongs presumably to Chandī shows that Koka was either very popular or a very powerful minister and the country was known by his name and not by that of its ruler Mahlak Deva.

See Indian Historical Quarterly vol. I 1925 pp. 653-56.

A portion of the iron pillar now preserved in the museum at Anand High School, Dhar, is believed originally to have been set up at the principal temple in Mandu (perhaps a Vaishnava one), and was broken by 'Ainulmulk Mutānī in his raid of the city in 1305.

Ferishtah p. 115.

11 Sevana is a town situated 50 miles to the S. W. of Jodhpur.
The sultan marched on the 13th of Muharram 708 (July 2, 1308)\(^\text{12}\) to chastise the ruler of Sevana. On arrival there, he began the investment of the fort. The right wing of the royal army was stationed on two sides, east and west, of the battlements; the left wing on the north; and the centre was entrusted to the command of Malik Kamāluddīn "the wolf." A constant shower of arrows was kept up from the minjīq but success was not in sight for a long time. The royal forces resorted to many stratagems, but all in vain.\(^\text{13}\) The Hindus defended the fort stubbornly, threw fire and stone from the battlements and for months together "breath was choked by the sounds of the Turkī flutes and Hindī bells." After great difficulty the imperial forces succeeded in escalding the battlements of the citadel. Sītal Deva tried to fly to Jalor,\(^\text{14}\) but ran into an ambush and was done to death (23rd Rabiul Avval 708; November 10, 1308). According to Khusrau, Sītal Deva possessed an elephantine stature, and when his huge head was presented to the sultan all were astonished to see it. The administration of Sevana was entrusted to Kamaluddīn Gurg and ʿAlāūddīn himself returned to Delhi.

Capitulation of Jalor (1311)

Rai Mahlak Deva's recalcitrance was imitated by the Chouhan Raja of Jalor,\(^\text{15}\) and a similar treatment was meted \(^{12}\) Alld. Uni. Ms. fol. 34 gives this date. The Ms. of Elliot also had the same date, but Prof. Habīb's Ms. has 11th of Muharram 710 H (1310 A.D.).

\(^{13}\) Futuḥ. p. 307.

\(^{14}\) Ferishtah incorrectly says that Sītal Deva sent a golden effigy of himself to the sultan and begged for pardon which was granted. Probably, but mistakingly, Ferishtah attributes the story of Ballāl Deva of Deccan to Sītal Deva, who according to Khusrau, ʿĪsāmī and Yahya was killed during the capture of Sevana.

\(^{15}\) In ancient times Jalor was known as Jabalipura. In out to him. Kanhar Deva of Jalor, also known by names of Saligram, Gokalnath and Krishna III, was the son of Söm Singh a dependent of the Solanki Bhim Deva of Gujarat. After sultan ‘Alaüddin had consolidated his authority in Marwar Kanhar Deva’s semi-independent status was construed as contumacy and his country was invaded.

Nainsí describes two sieges of Jalor by ‘Alaüddin. The first occurred at the time of the royal army’s return from Gujarat in 1299 and the second in 1311. As the sultan himself did not lead the forces to Gujarat, the details given by Nainsí about the siege of 1299 may not be quite accepted, as he always refers to the king’s presence there; but Ferishtah also mentions two expeditions to Jalor. While describing the events of the year 704 H. (1304 A.D.) Ferishtah writes that as the imperial generals Alaf Khan (Alp Khan) and Nusrat Khan were returning from the conquest of Malwa they arrived at Jalor and Nahar Deo (Kanhar Deva) taking lesson from the fate of Kóká offered his submission to the sultan without even a show of resistance. The other invasion according to Ferishtah came off in 1308 and was the outcome of a very curious incident. One day while Kanhar was present in the court he heard ‘Alaüddin say that there was no one among the Hindu Rajas who could dare challenge the might of his arms. The remark pricked Kanhar’s sense of pride and he picked up the guantlet retorting “If I wage a war and do not come out successful, I may be killed.” This effrontry enraged the sultan and he ordered an invasion of Jalor, while Kanhar had already slipped to Jalor to make preparations for war. Haji 1210 Ilutmish had captured it but after a short time it regained its independence. The fort which crowns a hillock is about one thousand feet high. It is situated about 50 miles south east of Sevana.

17 Reu: Marwar ka Itihás (Hindi) p. 11.
18 Ferishtah p. 118.
uddabir almost repeats the same story. The behaviour of Kanhar Deva, however seems very striking. It is really strange that at one time he flies to Delhi to pay homage to the king of his own accord, professes unflinching obedience for four years and then suddenly adopts such an insolent attitude that he puts himself and his subjects in extreme jeopardy. Neither the reasons given by Naiinsi nor by Ferishtah and Hajiuuddabir are convincing. The real cause of the invasion was in all certainty the determination to put an end to the independence of Jalor as was done with the other states of Rajputana.

In short, the army marched towards Jalor in A.D. 1311. The name of the commander of the expedition is not known but he does not seem to have been a brave general. The Rajputs defeated the royalists in a number of engagements

---

19 Zafarul Vāli pp. 788-89.

20 An interesting, though uncorroborated, reason has been given by Naiinsi. He says that a princess of 'Alāūddin's haram fell in love with Vikram, son of Kanhar Deva, who was on attendance at the court in place of his father. The sultan and the ladies of the haram first threaten the girl to change her mind, but finding her adamant 'Alāūddin insisted on Vikram to marry her. The young Rajput could never think of marrying a "Turk" girl and left for Jalor promising to return with a wedding party (bārāt) after some time. The sultan suspected a ruse on the part of Vikram and kept a Rajput prince of the house as hostage. As was expected Vikram never returned to marry the girl and the sultan was so much incensed at his treachery that he invaded Jalor.

21 According to Ferishtah (p. 118), Gul Bihisht, a concubine of 'Alāūddin captained the force. She fought valiantly but all of a sudden died of a short illness. Her son Shahin continued the warfare but was killed in an engagement not long after. It seems ridiculous that a concubine was put in command of an army constituted of brave Turkish officers and men, and they willingly served under her. No contemporary historian gives this fact, and the story which appears to be nothing more than a concoction of Ferishtah's imagination, should be summarily rejected. and the latter beat hasty retreats. It is certain that the battle of Jalor was terrific, and perhaps a prolonged one. According to the Gujarati epic romance Kanhad de Prabandh, the contest continued for some years, and the imperialists met with a number of reverses in their first attempts to take Jalor.

The news of the humiliating retreats put the sultan to his mettle and he sent a strong force under the veteran Malik Kamāluddīn Gurg. On his arrival in Jalor, Kamāluddīn pressed the siege with unabated vigour. At last Gokalnath, his son Vikram Deva and their followers were killed in a close combat and the fortress fell. Maldeva, a brother of Kanha Deva, survived the massacre that followed the fall of Jalor.
Later on, he was able to secure the good will of the sultan, who as shown before, appointed him to take charge of Chittor from Khizr Khan.

Nainsi’s date (Sam. 1368, 1311-12 A.D.) of the fall of Jalor is in conflict with that of Ferishtah (708 H., 1308 A.D.).
In 1308 the conquest Sevana was undertaken and a large army was sent to the Deccan also. It is, therefore, very probable that Jalor was attacked at a later date. Again Nainsi’s date finds corroboration in the Tirtha Kalpa of Jaina Prabha Sūri who says that in Sam. 1367, 1310 A.D. ‘Alāūddin destroyed the temple of Mahāvīra at Sanchor, a place near Jalor. The desecration of this temple must have been a part of the larger enterprise, namely the invasion of Jalor. Mr. Reu also concludes that Jalor capitulated in 1311 A.D. To commemorate this victory ‘Alāūddin had a mosque erected in the famous fort of Songir at Jalor which is still in existence.

---

23 Also see Ishwari Prasad: *A History of the Qarauna

25 The building now known as Topkhānā was originally a mosque said to have been built by ‘Alāūddin.
After some time the Rajputs recovered their sway over Jalore and it continued till nearly the end of the 14th century.

With the capitulation of Jalore almost all the leading states of Rajputana had been subdued one after another. Jaisalmer, Ranthambhor, Chitto, Sevana and Jalore, and the kingdoms adjoining them—Bundi, Mandore and Tonk had all been invaded. Jodhpur (Marwār) also appears to be under the Sultanate. Although there is no specific mention of its capture by ‘Alāuddin, yet in an inscription at Pandua (in Jodhpur), dated Sam. 1358 (A.D. 1301), Alavadi (‘Alāuddin) of Joginipura (Delhi) is mentioned as the ruling king.

Thus by the end of the first decade of the 13th century, the whole of Rajputana, the glorious land of Indian chivalry, lay bare at the feet of the emperor of Delhi. But complete subjugation of Rajputana was impossible, and ‘Alāuddin’s success there was of a dubious nature.

The Character of Rajputana Campaigns and the Causes of Rajput defeat.

Ever since the sultan had embarked upon the conquest of Ranthambhor in 1300, till the fall of Jalore in 1311, his armies had constantly fought in Rajasthan. It was below the dignity of the sultan to recall his forces once the siege of a fortress had been begun, and the valour of the Rajputs could not brook the insult of giving way to the enemy. The result was that bloody battles were fought before each and every fortress. To enumerate the various wars in Rajputana, then, is to repeat the horrors of blood and slaughter, of gallant fight, of glorious martyrdom. Sometimes before a single citadel the contest prolonged for years, and ended in a general massacre of its population accompanied by the gruesome destruction of the womenfolk in the fire of Jauhar.

Unluckily the Rajputs who spurned life without freedom, possessed valour without the spirit of union. Individual fortresses offered stubborn resistance, but singly none of them was a match against the sultanate of Delhi. Had even two or three Rajput princes combined against the sultan, they would surely have succeeded in defeating him. But secure in their mountain fortresses, each one of them was content to mind his own affairs and exult in his own pride, while ʿAlāʿuddīn raided and subdued one kingdom after another. The case of Sevana and Jalore is a glaring example of the callous indifference of the Rajput chieftains towards one another. While the fall of Sevana was imminent the ruler of Jalore, living only about fifty miles from there, was unmoved, with the result that after a couple of years Jalore was also taken in another assault.

Another reason of the Rajput defeat was their forts. They were generally contracted on the top of some hillock and were designed to protect women, children and cattle when the brave defenders sallied out to encounter a sudden invasion. And although it was difficult for the invaders to ascend step by step the steep cliffs of the hillock, yet the citadel, when subjected to a siege, was always rendered separate and secluded from the plains below. Thus the corns and revenues of outlying districts automatically fell into the hands of the enemy. During investment not all the people of the vicinity escaped in time to seek shelter inside the citadel; a large number of them were left on the plains below. Their distress though made them hate the enemy, did in no way dispose them loyal to their rulers inside the Citadel.

The conditions inside the fortress, again, were not very satisfactory. During an investment the crowd far exceeded the number of the normal inhabitants, and there were no special arrangements for extra provisions and vegetables.
The enemy lying at the base of the hill on which the fort stood, could easily cut off the convoy, and it was always the dearth of provisions that rendered defence impossible. The mighty fortresses of Ranthambhor, Chittor and Jalor—all surrendered to famine. Again, medieval conditions of sanitation were no preventive against outbreak of epidemics. To add to this, caste considerations and orthodoxy reigned supreme. The enemy was alive to these weaknesses of the Hindus and took full advantage. The instance of Ranthambhor is worth repeating. Through the services of some traitor, hides were thrown inside the grain cellars, provisions were thenceby rendered "desecrate" and the fortress surrendered.

The Rajputs were still steeped in their age long traditions of warfare and had little opportunities of developing their military strategy. They had little or no connections with Central Asian countries and were quite ignorant of the revolutionary changes the Mongols had introduced in the art of warfare. Every now and then the sultans of Delhi had to fight the Mongol invaders and were quite conversant with their tactics of ambuscade, camouflage and feigning retreats. They possessed engines of war like arrada, gargach and minjīq. The Rajput fought with huge elephants, in open engagements. Their government was based on feudal principles and fixed quotas of soldiers were provided by the various dependencies in times of war. During an investment such reinforcements could not always arrive because of enemy activity and the beleagured had to fight single handed.

Moreover, the resources of a Rajput Raja were limited. His country was barren; there was dearth of crops and of water. His only fortune was the hilly nature of the country. How could the Rajput princes then succeed against the sultans of Delhi who possessed the Punjab and Avadh, the most fertile regions of the country, and who could depend upon an unlimited supply of provisions and reinforcements?
Then, the Rajput only knew how to die. To him death on the field of battle was the greatest bliss, the greatest honour. Chivalry was crammed into his very marrow; he hated trick and treachery. As to the Turk, bravery was his first, trickery his second, nature. To him death was the greatest misfortune. He wanted to live in this world and enjoy the fruits of victory. So victory he must have, whatever the means he adopted to obtain it. Thus, while the Rajput flung himself into the battle, the Turk moved after calculating the enterprise. The Rajput fought desperately, the Muslim diplomatically. Diplomacy with the Rajputs was zero, with the Muslims it was the very secret of their success.

But the success of the Sultan in Rajputana was short lived. The Rajputs who had a country to love and an honour to maintain never gave way to ‘Alâüddîn’s governors. If the day was irrecoverably lost they well knew how to deliver themselves and their families from the insulting invader, and as soon as the deluge of the invasion had ebbed they reclaimed their territories. The result was that ‘Alâüddîn’s hold over Rajputana was precarious. The occupation of Ranthambhor after Ulugh Khan left it not more than six months after its capture, is uncertain. Khizr Khan had to vacate Chittor in ‘Alâüddîn’s life time. Bardic literature enumerates continual struggles between the Muslims and the Rajputs. Obviously Rajputana had not completely submitted, and one or the other kingdom in that land of born warriors was always successfully defying the authority of the Sultanate of Delhi.

Achievements of ‘Alâüddîn in North India.

But the adventurer who had raided Devagiri just for possessing gold and silver and had murdered his uncle to wear the imperial diadem, was something more than a vile robber or murderer. He had shown his true mettle in Rajputana where he had fought in the sandy deserts of Jaisalmer and the rocky land of Chittor and Ranthambhor, not simply to conquer, nor only to exhibit the prowess of his arms, but to unify the country under his suzerainty. No greed of gain had hunted him there. With the fall of Jalor not only the whole of Rajputana but the whole of north India had passed into the hands of the sultan of Delhi. In the north-west his armies had marched into Ghazni\textsuperscript{28} and in the north-east his power had been felt in the far-off land of Nepal.\textsuperscript{29} From a petty sultan of Delhi ‘Alāūddīn had become the emperor of Hindustan by dint of his merit and the burning zeal of his heart. His far-flung dominions were ruled by provincial governors or \textit{muqta}s appointed by him, and all of them served him loyally and obediently.

Side by side the conquest of north India, ‘Alāūddīn embarked upon the conquest of the southern peninsula. There his armies were constantly engaged from 1308 to 1312. The hero of these campaigns was not the emperor himself but his favourite general Malik Kāfūr, who marched out from Delhi and pulled down all the kingdoms of the south one after another. But before making a study of the campaigns into the south, it is necessary to know in detail about the \textit{Mughal} invasions to India which have been briefly referred to at many places in the preceding chapters.

\textsuperscript{28} Vide Chapter XI.
\textsuperscript{29} Vide Appendix A.
CHAPTER XI

THE MUGHAL INVASIONS

The military enterprises of 'Alāūddīn were frequently interrupted by the invasions of the Mughal marauders from the north west. From times immemorial a race of barbarians had inhabited the secluded and wild region north of Gobi desert in China. In the 12th century it produced a "scourge of God". And within a couple of centuries after the birth of Changiz Khan¹ the Mughals or Mongols² became so irresistible and invincible that their very name inspired terror in the east and the west alike. Like a huge inundation their innumerable hosts spread from their mountain home in central Asia³ towards Russia, Turkey, Persia, Afghanistan, and India. Gibbon compares their rapid conquest "with primitive convulsions of nature, which have agitated and altered the surface of the globe".⁴ Powerful empires or petty states, all ended in smoke before these free-booters. Strong and cultured monarchies as the Khvarizm Shahī of Turkestan and the Caliphate of ¹ Changiz Khan was born in 1154 A.D. at Dilum Boldak near the river Oman.

² The word Mongol is derived from "Mong" meaning brave and courageous. Mughal is used by Muslim historians, while Mongol and Tartar are used by European writers. "It denoted, in the first place a group of tribes or nations who composed the armies of the northern invaders, with little or no reference to their racial origin; and secondly, at the time of Babar, it was regarded as something scarcely better than a term of contempt." (Intro. Tarikh-i-Rashidi Elias and Ross, pp. 88-89.

³ For a graphic description of Changiz's atrocities in Central Asian towns see Vambery: History of Bokhara pp. 119-139.

⁴ Gibbon: Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, Modern Lib. vol. II, p. 1201.
the Abassides were put to an end, the last Caliph Almustāsam Billāh being pounded to death.\(^5\) “No invasion in historical times can compare in its accumulated horrors or in its far reaching consequence with that of the Mughals.”\(^6\) They annihilated populations and destroyed civilization.

In the early days of their history the Mughals lived a miserable nomadic life, breeding cattle and horses, and stood very low in the scale of civilization. The contemporary writings of Ibnul Asir, Juveni, Rashiduddin as well as Carpini and Rubruquis specify the Mughals as possessed of “yellow skin, high cheek bones, a flat, broad face, black wary hair and slanting eyes......small chin, broad fleshy lips, sparkling eyes......big ears and round skull.”\(^7\) The climate of their country had made their skins sunburnt and yellow.\(^8\) They were essentially a dirty race, their filthiness being abominable. The men rarely bathed, the women never, and consequently the most common disease among the Mughals was scabies. They ate all kinds of flesh not excepting human.\(^9\) The mongol was a mixture of extraordinary contradictions. He was exceptionally dull when allowed to be so, but could bear excessive hardship when he was \(^5\) The gallant resistance of Muhammad of Khvarism and his son Jalāluddin even extracted the admiration of their bitterest enemy Changiz.

\(^8\) Howorth: History of the Mongols, Part IV, p. 42.

\(^9\) Amīr Khusrau, who once fell a prisoner into their hands, gives a very striking description of the Mongols.

Cīrānus S‘adāīn, Persian Text, pp. 93-95.

\(^10\) Vincent of Beavois says that the Mughals were accustomed to eat their bitterest enemies, and to suck their blood. (Yule: Ser Marco Polo, Vol. I, p. 30).
required to exert. A great glutton when edibles were procurable, he could go on without food for days together.\footnote{11} He was possessed of enormous endurance and could ride for forty hours at a stretch, but otherwise he loved to be inert. The women worked hard and possessed a fairly good position in society.\footnote{12} They performed household duties, went with men for hunting and even took up arms in the field of battle.\footnote{13} The main occupation of the Mughals, which accounted for their vigour and virility were sport, military exercise and actual fighting.

It was Changiz, "the Great" and "the Accursed", who turned the indolent and uncivilized Mughals into a fighting nation. He trained his troops under a discipline of "Draconian severity" and within the span of a century the Mughals ruled both in Asia and in Europe. Besides, Changiz Khan gave the Mughals a code of law known as Yasa and a number of maxims known as Bili. The Yasa was applied with unflinching severity and within the life time of Changiz Khan many of the flagrant evils among the \footnote{11} Carpini writes that in one of the Mongol sieges in China when the army was without food, one man in ten of their own force was sacrificed to feed the rest (Howorth, Pt. IV, p. 53). He gives a horrid account of the dirty feeding of the Mughals. He says that they ate dogs, wolves, foxes, rats and horses.

\footnote{12} Female morality among the Mughals was very low. Kidnapping was common. Motherhood, however, was respected and the chief wife carried on the entire management of the household.

\footnote{13} Howorth History of the Mongols Pt. IV, p. 44. Indian historians also speak of women and children accompanying the Mughal raiders into India, but they are nowhere mentioned to have taken part in the warfare.
Mughals—murder, robbery and adultery—became quite rare. In short this great conqueror and law-giver exploited the qualities of valour and perseverance of the quiescent Mughals and transformed them into the most distinguished warriors of the world.

Thuswise Chingiz Khan made a nation out of dust. He gave the Mughals a huge empire and large armies well disciplined and trained in the art of warfare. In fact he overhauled and organized all spheres of social as well as military life of the Mughals. He divided the inhabitants of a locality by the number of their tents; towns and cities among the early Mughals being unknown. A collection of ten tents was called aouls, that of ten aouls was called ulus or otaks and that of these ten obog or clan. This order in social life was also preserved for military organisation. From one single individual to a division of ten thousand horsemen all were kept under strict control and supervision. The smallest unit of the Mughal army consisting of ten horsemen (or fard) was called urban. Ten urbans made a doh or a division of one hundred. Ten dohs formed a minjan and ten minjans a tuman—a division of 10,000 horses, so often alluded to by Persian historians. On each of these units were appointed officers; a tuman in the early days of Mughal conquest was commanded by a prince of the royal blood. The Mughal military organization was 14 Prawdin: The Mongol Empire, p. 90.

15 Changiz Khan used to say: “Man’s greatest pleasure is to defeat his enemies, to drive them before him, to take from them which they possess, to see those whom they cherished in tears, to ride their horses, to hold their wives and daughters in his arms.” Juveni, Translation in Vladimirov. The life Changiz Khan, p. 160.

This betrays the true spirit of nomad war-lord and shows how gladly the nomad barbarians would have listened to such sermons and flocked to his standard.

16 Also see Petis de la Croix: The History of Changiz Khan the Great, pp. 81-2.
based essentially on cavalry, the greatest wealth of the Mughal being a horse; and horse stealing among them was considered to be the highest crime punishable by death. The equipment of a Mughal warrior consisted of a javelin; a hook, to pull the enemy from off his horse; bow and arrows; and a sword. The Mughal was a born fighter; the environment as well as tradition made up for his deficiency if there was any. From the very early days of Changīz, brothers and cousins and friends fought side by side, and a defeat even in a sham fight was considered to be a disgrace.\textsuperscript{17} The exercises were actual fighting except for the profusion of blood.

Mobility was a great quality of the Mughal army. As the Mughals had hardly anything that did not decay, their armies were not burdensome. Their equipage consisted of bare essentials and they carried no paraphernalia with them. They carried their felt tents—"all grimy and greasy, and ready at any moment to be taken down by the women of the tribe... Of forts, walls, or streets there could have been no sign."\textsuperscript{18} A modern authority on Mughal strategy aptly remarks that the Mughals had "grasped the essentials of strategy, while their tactical mechanism was so perfect that a high conception of tactics was unnecessary."\textsuperscript{19} Therefore, when Baranī says that the Mughals, who came prepared for big battles sometimes vanished in one night, there is nothing surprising. The mobility of the Mughal army was proverbial. Both in their attack and their retreat they baffled their adversaries more by their movements than by their fighting power. It was dangerous to give them chase for as they fled they shot back over their heads and did much persecution upon their

Thus the Mansabdāri system, developed by the Mughal rulers of India, had its seed in the military organization of Changiz Khan.

\textsuperscript{17} Michael Prawdin: \textit{The Mongol Empire}, p. 44.
\textsuperscript{18} Introduction to the \textit{Tarīkh-i-Rashīdī} Pt. III p. 59.
pursuers. "They understood the art of feigning retreat, of envelopment and of surprise, and, as battle after battle was fought against nations employing different methods of warfare, the sum of their experience had made them invincible."\textsuperscript{20} Marco Polo describes in detail how in their fights the Mughals never got into a regular mêlée, but kept perpetually riding round and shooting at the enemy; and as they did not count it any shame to run away in battle, they would sometimes pretend to do so, killing in stray attacks and then wheeling round and returning to the charge in perfect order and routing their enemy.\textsuperscript{21}

And the rapaciousness of the Mughals after a victory was unbounded. The complete destruction of the chief cities of Transoxiana clearly shows the inhuman callousness of these free-booters. "Their uniform plan was to convert cities into desert and to leave no human being that could rise in their rear. By the barbarities of their massacres, in which age, and sex, and conditions were alike disregarded they spread horror and dismay around them".\textsuperscript{22} On one occasion they put to death a man by dropping molten silver into his ears; and such horrible crimes were committed by them in the sack of Bokhara, Samarkand and Balkh as can hardly be imagined. Juveni relates that in the sack of Tirmiz a captured woman begged for mercy promising the man who was to kill her a pearl of high value which she had swallowed. The cold blooded Mughal ripped open her body and as the pearl was really found in it an order was immediately given to open and examine all the bodies.\textsuperscript{23}

\textsuperscript{20} Sykes: \textit{History of Persia}, II, p. 85.

\textsuperscript{21} Howorth: \textit{History of the Mongols} Pt. IV, pp. 84-85.

\textsuperscript{23} Such barbarous punishments to which the Muslim historians of Central Asia give exaggerated colour, were not uncommon in those days. The treatment accorded to the vanquished Mughals by 'Alaúddin was in no way better than Killing a person by breaking his back-bone was a common practice among them. Of the prisoners of war the Mughals derived the greatest utility. The healthy prisoners were used for hard work and as screens to the invading divisions, while the women were captured as prize of war. Such was the horror inspired by their invasions in European countries that till the other day in some of the churches in eastern Europe the litany included "From the fury of the Mughals good lord deliver us".24

In the 13th and 14th centuries the Mongols had established their power from the Black Sea to the China Sea and from Siberia to Indus and Seistan. They used to fight either amongst themselves or to invade foreign lands in the hope of plunder and conquest. The number of these hordes, which, like swarms of "ants and locusts" issued forth for conquest were multiplied by the fears of the invaded and the rhetoric of poets and historians. From the days of Iltutmish to those of Jalâluddîn, the rulers of Hindustan had to concentrate all their energies to encounter them. But in vain. It was only 'Alâüuddîn who could successfully repulse some of the most terrific Mughal invasions to this country.

However, before discussing these invasions in detail it would be proper to throw a glance at the contemporary history of Central Asia to examine the causes underlying the so many assaults directed against India. Changîz Khan died in 1226. After his death the empire was divided among his sons. Oqtaï became the Great Khan with China and Zungaria, a region that for exact boundaries later became a bone of contention. The descendants of Jûji, who had died in the life-time of Changîz, obtained the Khanate of Qiperchaaq and Tûlî was what the Mughals gave to their enemies. In spite of their inhuman punishments the Mughals were tolerant of other peoples' religions. Religious scruples did not prompt them to commit atrocious crimes.

put in charge of the home clans of Mongolistan. Chaghtai was to rule the kingdom of Transoxiana and Halagü Khan, son of Tüli and grandson of Changız, founded the line of Ilkhan rulers in Persia. Tüli’s son Mangu Khan ousted Qqtai’s son Kuyük from the Khanate and himself became the Great Khan in 1244; and fratricidal war broke out between the houses of Qqtai and Tüli. Mangu died in 1259 and was followed upon the throne by the famous Qublaï Khan, another son of Tüli. Qublaï’s staunchest enemy was Qaidû, grandson of Qqtai who never recognized the claims of Tüli’s descendants on his ancestral dominions. Qaidû found a very faithful ally in Dava Khan, ruler of Transoxiana or Mavar-un-Nahr. Dava was a descendant of Chaghtai. Chaghtai had died in 1241 and was succeeded by his grandson Qara Halagü who ruled until 1265. At his death the great Qublaï Khan appointed Mubarak Shah, son of Qara Halagü to rule Transoxiana, but he was ousted by prince Borak, a great grandson of Chaghtai. He was followed upon the throne by Tuka Timür, who in his turn was ousted by Dava, son of Borak. Dava in collaboration with Qaidû fought constant wars against Qublaï and his descendants on the east and the Ilkhanos on the west, both of whom had descended from Tüli. Now it is with these two houses, the Ilkhans of Persia and the Chaghtais of Transoxina, that we are most concerned; because whenever they found some respite from their fratricidal warfare in Asia they launched upon invasion of India. Thus we find that all the Mughal expeditions of India were sent either from Persia or from Mavarun-Nahr. Either of the two houses wanted to wrest land from each other’s territories. And Dava Khan of Transoxiana, who was mostly unsuccessful against his adversaries, wanted to try his luck in India as well, and constantly sent out expeditions to this country. ‘Alúddin’s contemporaries among the Ilkhans of Persia were Ghazán Khan (1294-1304) and his brother sultan Banda Aljaitû (1304-16). In Tranoxiana his contemporaries were Dava Khan (1272-1306) and his sons Kondjuk (Kuyûk), Kubak and Taliku.

Dava was a determined enemy of Hindustan. He was successful in snatching Ghazni from the Ilkhans and made it a base of operations against India. He reigned for thirty six years and all the time he lived, he sent armies to invade India.
India had already been subjected to a number of Mughal invasions in 1241, 1245 and 1257. In 1285, Arghûn, the Ilkhan of Persia (1248-1291), had sent his armies to India and this invasion was long remembered in this country as Prince Muhammad, son of sultan Balban, was killed on the field of battle, while Amîr Khusrau was taken prisoner. In the time of sultan Jalâluddin the Mughals again attacked India, and as described above, the sultan, unable to defeat them completely, bought a humiliating peace from them. But all these were minor invasions as compared with those that occurred in the time of 'Alâûddin; and it was the good fortune of India that the most tremendous assaults were delivered to this country when a strong monarch like 'Alâûddin was the ruler.

Kadar's raid of the Punjab (1297-98)²⁶

The first raid of the Mughals occurred only a short while after 'Alâûddin's accession. Dava the ruler of Mavar-un-Nahr sent an army of 100,000 strong under the command of Kadar.
The raiders poured into the countr' from the north-west, burnt

²⁶ Barnî gives the date as 696 A.H. Amîr Khusrau says that the two armies engaged on the 22nd of Rabî'ul Akhir 697 (9th February 1298). Ferishtah also has 696. It can clearly be inferred from the account of Baranî that this raid occurred some time after the conquest of Multan. Baranî does not give the name of the commander of the expedition. 'Işâmi does not mention it at all.

Baranî p. 250.
Khazain, Habib Trs., p. 23., Ferishtah p. 102.
down the villages of the Gakkhrs, descended into the plains of the Punjab, and began to ravage the environs of Lahore. Their advance, as usual, struck terror into the hearts of the people and 'Alāūddīn despatched a large army under his generals Ulugh Khan and Zafar Khan. A battle between the royalists and the Mughals was fought near Jullandhar, in which the invaders were worsted. Some 20,000 of them died fighting and quite a large number of their officers were taken prisoner. They were put to death in the most cruel manner. Ulugh Khan sent the report of the victory to the sultan together with the heads of the Mughal soldiers, their women and children who had been captured and executed.

This victory in the very early days of his accession enhanced 'Alāūddīn's prestige and stabilized his position on the throne.

Saldi expelled from Sivistan (1299).

In the year 1299 while Ulugh Khan and Nuṣrat Khan were busy with the reduction of Gujarat the Mughals under the command of Saldi reappeared on the frontiers of Hindustan. This invasion has been described by Baranī, Išāmī and Ferishtah; but curiously enough Amir Khusrau does not mention it at all. According to Ziyā Baranī, Saldi and his brother invaded the north west part of the country and took 27 Amīr Khusrau names the site of the battle as Jaran Manjūr; and describes the battle as having been fought near the bank of river Sutlaj. Deval Rani p. 60. Baranī definitely says that the battle was fought within the environs of Jullandhar, which lies between rivers Sutlaj and Beas. Ferishtah says it was fought near Lahore, which may also mean Jullandhar. Deval Rani p. 60; Baranī p. 250., Ferishtah p. 102.

28 Khazain, Habib Trs. p. 24; Ferishtah, p. 102, has 12,000.

29 Ferishtah says that Dava Khan ruler of Mavar-un-Nahr and his brother Chaldi (Saldi) took Sivstān. Baranī does not mention the name of the general but simply says “Saldi and his brother.” But Dava was all along busy in Central Asian politics and would only have sent one or two generals on so possession of Sivistan. Sultan 'Alawai din ordered 'Zafar Khan to march post haste to Sivistan, invest the fortress, and expel the invaders. The Mughals were soon subjected to a close investment, and although they hurled constant shower of arrows on the royalists they were soon overpowered by 'Zafar Khan, who did not even use minjihq or other heavy engines of war. The valiant general with a large number of prisoners of both sexes returned to Delhi. Saldi and his brother were also among the captured.

The ease with which 'Zafar Khan had won this victory excited the admiration of the people, and the jealousy of the sultan. 'Alawai din was simply amazed at the hardihood, valour and resourcefulness of the brave general and began to look upon him with suspicion. His brother Ulugh Khan nursed similar feelings against 'Zafar Khan, because the latter's achieve-from Sivistan is meant the north west portion of Sindh known as Sehvan.

31 Mir M'asum incorrectly says that Nusrat Khan, who had been appointed governor of Sindh after the defeat of Arkali Khan, marched against the Mughals and gave them a crushing defeat. Nusrat Khan was then busy in Gujarat.

Tarikh-i-M'asum Text pp. 43-44.
32 Barani p. 253.
ments had thrown into shade the former’s success in Multan and Gujarat. At that time Zafar held the charge of Samanah, and mostly stayed there, for the Mughals were a source of constant danger. ‘Alāūddin now thought of either recalling him to court to remain in constant attendance upon him or to send him away to Bengal which he should subdue and govern. The malicious sultan was even prepared to blind or poison Zafar Khan. But new developments in the political situation gained his object with less cruelty, and with a greater ease and naturalness.

Invasion of Qutlugh Khvājā (1299).

Towards the close of the year 1299 Qutlugh Khvājā, son of Dava, left Transoxiana with twenty tumans (or 200,000 Mughals) for the invasion of Hindustan. The humiliating defeat suffered by the Mughals in Sivistan prompted Qutlugh to come with full preparations; and this time they were bent upon the conquest of India. The invading hosts crossed the 33 This statement shows two facts, (i) that ‘Alāūddin had no authority in Bengal and (ii) that in the sultanate period also Bengal was a punitive province as it was under the Mughals. Barani p. 254.

34 Barani (p. 254) has تتلع خواجه ېسر ذر دالعين. lain means accursed, but there was no king by the name of Zua or Zuda in Transoxiana in the time of ‘Alāūddin. The words, therefore, appear to be ېسر دو دالعين to mean “Qutlugh Khvājā son of Dava the accursed.” Dava was a direct descendant of Changiz Khan. Abul Fazl gives his genealogy like this:—Dava Khan, son of Baraq Khan, son of Bisutava, son of Mavat Khan, son of Chaghtai, son of Changiz.

35 This invasion is not mentioned by Amīr Khusrau in Khazain but he makes a passing reference to it in Deval Rani (p. 61). The above number of Mughal invaders is given by Barani but at another place he gives the strength of the force as one lac. (Barani 254, 256).
river Sindh, and by forced marches arrived near Delhi, without disturbing the territories they passed on their way, in spite of the fact that they were actually harassed by the commanders of the frontier posts like Multan and Samanah. The imperialists would retire into their strongholds in the day but would emerge at night and hover at the flanks of the invaders. But the latter were unmoved by these tactics, because they wanted to conserve their energy for the final struggle.

At the rapid advance of the Mughals the inhabitants of the capital as also of the adjoining districts became very panicky, more so because Delhi itself was the objective of the enemy this time. Everybody from far and near flocked into the metropolis. Such a large crowd congregated within the city that men could not find room in the streets, the market places and the mosques. To make the matters worse the approach of the caravans and merchants was interrupted by the Mughals who were hovering on the outskirts of the city. The inhabitants of Delhi were reduced to extreme distress as the prices of commodities had become excessively high.

The moment ‘Aláúddín was informed of the invasion he issued urgent instructions to the provincial governors to send reinforcements to the capital. Without waiting to ponder over the gigantic task that lay ahead of him, he began feverish preparation to encounter the invader. Malik ‘Aláulmulk, the Kotval of Delhi, who had full knowledge of the vast equipment of the Mughals and their objective, dissuaded the sultan from any hurried action. “Ancient monarchs”, said he, “have invariably abstained from hazardous conflicts in which it is impossible to say as to which side victory is likely to incline. In case of conflicts between equally powerful chiefs, when the kingdom is staked on a single throw of the dice, monarchs have exercised their utmost discretion and have warded off the event

36 Barani p. 255.
as long as they could... Why does Your Majesty then purposely and wilfully, and without paying any heed or attention enter a perilous crisis? You may delay in engaging these Mughals.... Our army is composed principally of the soldiery of Hindustan, who have spent their lives in warfare with the Hindus only, and have never yet joined in battle with the Mughals, and are consequently ignorant of their cunning system of tactics, their sallies their ambuscades and other stratagems'\textsuperscript{38}. Malik 'Alāūlulk continued his harangue in which he tried to impress upon the mind of the king the benefits of delaying an engagement until the enemy fell short of provisions and then pursuing him when he went about searching for food and fodder. The peroration of the Kotval betrays the seriousness of the situation. Not only had the Mughals come determined to capture Delhi, they had even brought with them fodder and provisions to last for some time, lest they should waste their strength in securing them. Hence, they did not plunder even in the environs of Delhi. Without detaching even a dozen warriors from their main army they stood with their united strength before the capital of Hindustan ready for an encounter.

'Alāūddin had always given heed to the mature advice of the experienced Kotvāl but could not agree with him on the present occasion. He called together all the high officers of the army and in their presence addressed 'Alāūlulk. It was meaningless, said he, to assume a menacing attitude towards the Mughals and yet avoid an engagement with them. How could he hold the sovereignty of Delhi if he shuddered to encounter the invaders? What would his contemporaries and those adversaries who had marched two thousand kos to fight him say, when he hid himself 'behind a camel's \textsuperscript{38} \textit{Ibid.} p. 255-57.

back". And what verdict posterity would pronounce on him? How could he dare show his countenance to anybody, or even enter the royal haram if he was guilty of cowardice and endeavoured to repel the Mughals with diplomacy and negotiations? In the end the Sultan exclaimed: "Come what may, I am bent upon marching tomorrow into the plain of Kili where I propose joining in battle with Qutlugh Khvājā. . . . Oh 'Alā‘ulmulk, to thee have I confided the post of Kotvāl and the charge of my seraglio, and treasures, together with the whole town. Whichever of us two, whether he or I, prove the conqueror, salute the victor with the keys of the gates, and of the treasures, and lay them before him, and become his obedient servant and vassal." 40

After thus giving vent to his feelings, which indicate the true spirit of a statesman-cum-warrior, 'Alā‘uddin marched with the royal forces and encamped at Kili 41 where Qutlugh Khvājā had arrayed his men on the opposite.

Battle with the Mughals.

The army was stationed in a very secure position at Kili. On the one side was the Jumna and on the other side were thorns and bushes and in between these two stood the royal forces. 42 'Alā‘uddin drew up his army in the traditional style. Malik Hizabruddin Zafar Khan, the governor of Samanah, the Punjab and Multan was entrusted with the command of the right wing, and with him were attached some Rajas of Hindustan—a group of veteran warriors. Ulugh Khan was 39 This phrase has been used by Barani at many places during the course of this conversation. Hiding behind a camel's back or rather hump كوهان شتری simply means avoiding a battle.

---

40 Barani p. 258.

41 Kili lay north of Delhi, not very far from it. Keene: History of Hindustan, vol. I, p. 76.

42 Futūḥ p. 249.
put in command of the left wing, with orders to reinforce any other wing which showed signs of weakness in the course of the battle. The king with Nuṣrat Khan and 12,000 men commanded the centre. Twenty-two elephants were stationed in front of each division as bulwark against a terrific assault by the enemy. Having thus dispositioned his troops the Sultan personally reviewed the whole army, and ordered that nobody should move from his place without his orders.

The Mughals also arranged their men in the same manner. Qutlugh Khvājā was in the centre, whereas Hajlak and Tamar Bughā commanded the left and the right wings respectively. Ṭarghī, another Mughal general, commanded a major division. Isakīlbā, Kījya, Utnā also held ranks in the Mughal army.

Zafar Khan was so restless to fight the enemy that, even before the Mughal army could arrive near Delhi, he had sent a personal challenge to Qutlugh Khvājā to meet him in a duel. Having ordered his rank and file to be ready for an assault on the Mughal left, he delivered it. Hajlak and his men were gripped in a hand to hand fight with Zafar Khan. Simultaneously Dīlīr Khan, son of Zafar Khan, made a furious charge on the Mughals and created a consternation among them. Tamar Bughā could not withstand this attack and fell back. The Mughal army, broken and routed, was hotly pur-

43 Futūh p. 250.
Ferishtah p. 104.

44 According to Ferishtah, (p. 103) the royal army consisted of 3,00,000 horses and 2,700 elephants, but the figure seems inflated as the sultan would not have been so much worried about this invasion had he possessed such a large force in readiness.

45 Futūh pp. 246-60. ‘Īsāmī gives the most detailed account of the invasion.

46 Futūh pp. 247-49.
sued by the royalists while Tamar Bughā’s men continued to shower arrows behind their back on their pursuers—a practice in which the Mughals were past masters. An assault by the enemy on the centre of the royal army was met by the Sultan, who repulsed it and killed a large number of them.\(^{47}\) In this conflict the king rescued a large number of Indian soldiers whom the Mughals had captured as prisoners of war. 'Alāūddin, however, did not pursue the retreating enemy.

Death of Zafar Khan.

On the right, however, Zafar Khan was hard pressed by the Mughal veteran Hajlak. He had not received any reinforcement from the king nor had he received any orders of withdrawal; and the enemy all the while was gaining ground. Ulugh Khan, who kept an ill-will against Zafar Khan on account of the latter’s popularity, did not move to help him in distress.\(^{48}\) At last Zafar Khan, left to himself, ordered his men to make a desperate charge upon the enemy. Hajlak could not withstand it and hurriedly retreated. Zafar Khan killed a large number of Mughals while pursuing the flying enemy for eighteen kos.\(^{49}\) But the pursuit of the vanquished army was imprudent, or at least unfortunate. During their retreat about 10,000 Mughals had fallen in ambush under the leadership of Ţarghī. They now determined to cut down the royal troops on their way back from the pursuit. As soon, therefore, as they saw Zafar Khan returning, they left the ambuscade and stood arrayed for battle. The valiant Zafar found himself at bay, his wits all at an end. He had about a thousand horsemen with him, while the Mughals were ten times more. He held an emergent consultation with some of \(^{47}\) The sultan offered his soldiers one gold tankah for each Mughal head. Deval Rani p. 61.

---

\(^{48}\) Zafarul Wāli p. 797.

\(^{49}\) This distance is not given in the Bib. Ind. Text of Baranī, but Major Fuller’s Ms. has it.
his officers like 'Uśmān, the Akhūrbēg, and 'Ali Shah, the Rānā-i-Pil. All of them unanimously decided to give a last desperate battle thinking that even if they escaped alive from the clutches of the Mughals by not giving them a battle, they would surely be punished by the sultan for their cowardice.

The result of the impending battle was foregone conclusion. The Mughals encircled the royal forces and delivered fatal blows on them. Nonetheless, Zafar Khan was successful in breaking the encirclement. He fought here, there, and everywhere, but still no help was forthcoming either from the Sultan or Ulugh Khan. The battle raged fiercely, and if 'Īsāmī is to be believed, when 5,000 of the Mughals had been killed Zafar had lost 800 men only. With the remaining 200 horsemen Zafar Khan fought on till the last, and even when his horse had been cut down he fought on foot. The contemporary chronicler gives a graphic description of Zafar's bravery. "His horse died under him", says he, "and that renowned and unmatched warrior began the struggle on foot. Having strewn his shafts on the ground before him he charged with great violence, and every shaft brought one Mughal cavalier down." But Zafar Khan spurned such an offer and fought as valiantly as ever. Finding it impossible to capture Zafar Khan alive the Mughals pressed upon him from all sides and killed him in a close combat. The gallant soldier had fallen victim to an unequal fight excited by his own unbounded zeal. None of the royalists returned alive from that pursuit that day.

---

50 Baranī pp. 160-61.
Retreat of the Mughals.

The Mughals had killed Zafar Khan but they had seen the mettle of the army of Hindustan. Under the cover of the night they departed to a distance of thirty kos from Delhi. From thence they returned to their country by continuous marches without stopping on the way. The contemporary chronicler mentions with pride that the dread of the attack of Zafar Khan remained in the breasts of the Mughals for years and when their cattle would not drink water they would ask, ‘What! Have you seen Zafar Khan that you do not drink water’? After this victory the Sultan returned from Kili. By the irony of circumstance, nobody praised the hero of the battle, Zafar Khan, for his sacrifice and gallantry. On the contrary the Sultan blamed him for fighting recklessly and pursuing the enemy without his orders. In his heart of hearts Aláüddin was happy at the death of Hizabruddin and considered his death another welcome event, only next in consequence to the defeat of the Mughals.

The Mughal deluge having receded, the Sultan embarked upon the conquest of Rajputna. He sent an army to Ranthambhor in 1300 A.D. and himself went to the scene of action after some time. The Mughals kept quiet for some time.

51 'Išāmī, however, says that they hovered about Delhi for a few more days without daring to give a battle and then retired. Futūh pp. 258-260.

52 Amīr Khusrau writes that Qutlugh Khvājā died on his way back to Transoxiana (Deval Rani p. 61). It is quite correct because after Dava’s death in 1306 Kuyük, Kubak and Taliku, ascended the throne of Transoxiana one after another while this warrior son is not mentioned to be living to claim the throne.

53 Barani p. 261.
54 Futūh p. 258.
firstly because they had seen the strength of the Indian soldiers and secondly because they were busy with their internal affairs in Central Asia. All this time 'Alaūd din was planning further conquests. Towards the close of the year 1302 A.D. he despatched an army towards the Deccan via Bengal and himself proceeded to the conquest of Chittor in February 1303. While 'Alaūd din was at Chittor the Mughals regained strength enough to invade Hindustan again.

The invasion of Targhī (1303).

Hardly a month had elapsed since Sultan 'Alaūd din's return from Chittor, when the Mughal general Targhī invaded India with 120,000 horsemen. The situation at the capital was very critical indeed. In the siege of Chittor the royal army had suffered terribly, and what little stores and equipment had been saved in the warfare were lost on the return 55 At this time Qaidu and Dava were busy fighting Qublai Khan and his successors. After Qutlugh's expedition into Hindustan Dava and Qaidu marched to fight the Mughal Khaqān but they were defeated. Qaidu did not outlive his defeat for long and died in 1302. The great Khans contemporary of 'Alaūd din were Aljāitu (1294-1307), Kubak (1307-11) and Buyantu (1311-1320). See Lane poole: Muhamm adan Dyn asties p. 215.

56 Baranī says (p. 300) 12 tumans or 120,000 horse, but shortly after writes which means, "Targhī the accursed advanced with 30 to 40 thousand horses". The former figure seems more correct because (i) On this occasion also the conquest of Hindustan was the aim of the Mughals. For such a great undertaking a large force was needed. On a previous occasion like this 2,00,000 horsemen had come. (2) 30 to 40 thousand horses would not have caused so much anxiety to 'Alaūd din. The consternation at the capital shows that the calamity was as great as ever. Firishtah also has 1,20,000 horsemen. Futūh (p. 276) has 2,00,000.
march to Delhi,—a march conducted through the dreary desert of Rajputana and at the height of the rainy season. So that when the Mughals were approaching Delhi ‘Alaūddin’s forces were not fit to be mustered, they had not renewed their kits even. The army which had been sent to the east had not yet returned. Still ‘Alaūddin did not lose heart. He sent orders to provincial governors in the east and the west to send reinforcements to the capital and prepared to fight the Mughal invader.

Ṭarghi had determined to see that the disaster sustained by Qutlugh Khvāja’s forces was not repeated. He, therefore, had gathered definite information that the Sultan had marched to a distant fortress while another force, under veteran generals, had gone on a distant expedition. By forced marches and without disturbing the territory on his way Ṭarghi arrived on the confines of Delhi. Sultan ‘Alaūddin gathered together whatever troops he had in the capital, and arrayed his forces in the plain of Siri. As it was impossible to fight the Mughals in an open engagement with so small an army, ‘Alaūddin decided to exhaust the patience of the besiegers by strengthening his defence lines. On the east of Siri lay the river Jumna and on the south-west was the old citadel of Delhi, although by the time of Ṭarghi’s invasion it had not been repaired. In the south lay the dense jungle of Old Delhi. The only vulnerable side, therefore, was the north, where the Mughals had pitched their camp. Sultan ‘Alaūddin ordered large trenches to be dug up round the encampment and strengthened them by constructing walls of wooden planks around them. In those times when artillery and other modern siege implements had not come in vogue, palisades, trenches and ramparts served best for purposes of defence. In each trench were stationed five huge elephants “incased in armour”, one division of cavalrymen and a guard party to keep a constant watch. Those prompt measures of the Sultan prevented the Mughals from forcing an entrance into the royal camp. While the Mughals used to move about the trenches in search for passage or recess through which they could suddenly fall on the royalists, the Sultan kept his troops ever alert and vigilant and constantly under arms for a combat, although he was determined to avoid an engagement till succour arrived from other quarters. In vain, however, did he hope to receive reinforcements from Multan, Samanah and Deopalpur for the Mughals had completely blockaded all passages of the capital from the east and the west. The army under Maliks Jūna and Jhūjhu had returned from Bengal completely shattered and ruined. The passage of even this dilapidated force had been stopped by the Mughals, while the organized armies of some feoffees of the east had failed to join the king at Sīrī and had been compelled to stop at Kol and Baran.

Meanwhile the Mughals had begun to raid the environs of Delhi. They had so completely encircled the metropolis that supplies of water, forage, firewood and all other necessaries of life had been stopped from coming into it and an acute scarcity of grain was felt. The Mughals on the other hand used to march in groups to places like the Chabūtras of Sub-hānī, Mori and Hudhi and even up to the Hauz-i-'Alāī and lay hands upon grain and other stores of the market. Sometimes they even raided the city of Delhi itself and looted the royal granaries.

Minor skirmishes were desultorily fought on two or three occasions, but neither party could gain any decisive advantage.
The patience of Targhī, who had come prepared only for a victory, had been well-nigh exhausted, and finding the lines of 'Alāūddīn's entrenchment impenetrable he retired after a stay of about a couple of months.58

57 The position of 'Alāūddīn's entrenchment at Sīrī has been discussed in detail in J.A.S.B. 1866 pp. 199-218.
58 Barānī p. 302.
Futūh p. 277 has forty days only.
The flight of the Mughals seemed miraculous indeed. Baranī describes the situation in the following words:—“This occasion, on which the army of Islam had received no injury from the Mughal force, and the city of Delhi had escaped unharmed, appeared one of the miracles of the age to all intelligent persons; for the Mughals had arrived in great force early in the season, and had blockaded the roads against the entry of reinforcements or supplies; and the royal army was suffering under the want of proper equipment, while they were in the most flourishing and hearty condition”.

It is not difficult to surmise the cause of so quick a retreat of the Mughals. Although Baranī attributes it to the supplications of the poor and the prayers of Shaikh Niẓāmuddin Auliā, the venerable saint of the time, yet the real reason of the Mughal retreat lies in something else. It lies, firstly, in the prompt action of the Sultan who would not yield to the enemy on any ground whatsoever, and who undertook such defensive measures as even to baffle the Mughal veteran. Secondly, it lies in the fact that the Mughals on account of their preoccupation in Central Asia, referred to above, could never permit themselves to stay in Hindustan for long. Consequently, if they could not overcome the armies of Hindustan within a short time they would surely and suddenly return to their home land in Central Asia.

Steps taken to prevent further Mughal Inroads.

Targhi had returned, but the Mughal menace was not over for all time. Their successive invasions impressed upon the mind of the Sultan the gravity of the Mughal danger. For some time, therefore, he refrained from any further conquests and concentrated on the problem of defence. The palace of Sirī having been almost completed, he transferred his headquarters there. Subsequently Sirī came to be known as the capital. Old citadels were repaired and new ones constructed on the regions through which the Mughals generally passed into India. A strong wall was also built around the city to check the invaders from entering the town. The army, too, was reorganised and new enlistments were made. Experienced officers and well-equipped soldiers were garrisoned in each of the forts on the north-west frontier. They were to resist the invaders on their march towards the capital city.

---

59 Baranī p. 302.

The defensive measures effected by 'Alāûddîn by no means stopped the Mughals from pouring into India occasionally, but now the Sultan was ever prepared to receive them. In future whenever the Mughals invaded India they were successfully defeated, their women and children were taken prisoner and they themselves were trampled under the feet of the elephants or struck by the sword.

Invasion of 'Ali Bêg, Tartaq and Ŕarghî (1305).

The Mughals had suffered defeats at the hands of the army of Delhi on many occasions; the insult rankled deep in their hearts. Ŕarghî could never forget the humiliating retreat of Qutlugh Khvâjâ. He had got an opportunity to avenge the insult in 1303 but even then he had achieved but little. But all these defeats did not dishearten Ŕarghî; on the contrary they whetted his thirst for revenge. When, therefore, 'Ali Bêg and Tartâq advanced towards Hindustan Ŕarghî accompanied them. This invasion was in no way less

---

60 For details see chapter XVI.

61 'Isâmî mentions another invasion of Ŕarghî between 1303-1305.

No other historian corroborates him and his version seems to be wrong. Futûh pp. 283-84.

62 Ziyâ Barâni and 'Isâmî call him Tartak, Amir Khusrau Tartâq and Badaoni Taryâq. Ferishtah has Khvâjâ Tarpâl which Briggs changes into Khvâjâ Tâsh.
formidable in nature than those of 1299 and 1303. The Mughals, about 50,000 in number, crossed the hilly region lying north-west of the Indus, crossed the Indus itself and by forced marches advanced towards the east. According to Amir Khusrau, Targhi, “who had once or twice fled away from the attacks of the victors...was at last shot by an arrow” and killed in a fray even before the invading army penetrated into the Doab. That probably is the reason why Barani does not even mention the name of this prominent general among those who led the expedition. ‘Ali Beg and Tartaq moved on, inflicting barbarous cruelties wherever they passed. Having learnt that the capital was strongly defended, and knowing as they did that the Mughal army had failed in capturing it on many earlier occasions, they decided to by-pass it and march straight on the Doab and Avadh, the most fertile and prosperous tract in the country. “The confounded inhabitants...rushed to the fords of the Ganga”, says Amir Khusrau, “and smoke rose from the towns of Hindustan. People fled from their burning houses... and threw themselves into rivers and torrents”.

When the report of the enormities of the invaders and the desperation of the people reached the Sultan, he appointed Malik Naik, Master of the Horse (Akhurbeg-i-Maisrah).

63 This is the figure of Amir Khusrau (Khazain, Habib Trs. p. 26) Barani has 30 to 40 thousand. According to Barani ‘Ali Beg was a descendant of Changiz Khan.

64 Khazain Habib Trs. p. 26.

66 Khusrau says that Malik Naik was a Hindu. Barani also names the commander as Malik Naik. ‘Isami correctly reads Malik Nanak. ‘Alauddin had a paik Manik by name who had saved him at the time of Ikat Khan’s assault (Barani p. 273). But the general who fought the Mughals was surely Malik Naik as mentioned by two contemporary authorities with a strong force of thirty to forty thousand to deal with the invaders. The royal army met the Mughals in the vicinity of Amroha and inflicted upon them a crushing defeat on Thursday 12th Jamādūs Sānī 705 (December 30, 1305). A large portion of the Mughal army was “put to sword, scattered and dispersed”. Twenty thousand horses belonging to the Mughals were seized by the victors and the Mughal corpses lay right and left. The two Mughal generals were captured alive and sent to Delhi in chains and fetters. Exultant with joy ‘Alā’ūddin ordered a durbār to be held on the Chautrā-i-Sub-ḥānī, where he sat in all his kingly glory to receive the prisoners of war and decide their fate; his victorious army standing in double rows from the royal seat to Indrapat. Large was the crowd which had assembled to witness the scene. The price of a flask of water rose to twenty jītals and half a tankah. The Mughal prisoners of war were led through this mass of humanity and were presented before the royal throne. By the order of the Sultan they were paraded in the city on camels, after which they were beheaded; and their heads were used in the construction of towers outside the fort. According to Ferishtah 8,000 heads of Mughal prisoners were used instead of stones and bricks to build the towers of Sirī, which were then under construction; and his statement is confirmed by Amīr Khusrau who writes: “They (the Mughals) give blood to new buildlings.”

Baranī and Khusrau. Ferishtah says that Malik Naib and Malik Tughlaq were sent.

Deval Rani p. 61.
Futūh p. 297.
Baranī p. 320.
Ferishtah p. 114.

67 This is the date of Khusrau a contemporary; Ferishtah has 704 A.H.

68 Baranī p. 320.
As to the fate of ‘Ali Bêg and Tartaq, accounts vary. According to Baranî all Mughal prisoners, together with their chiefs, were crushed under the feet of the elephants. Amir Khusrau, however, says that ‘Ali Bêg and Tartaq were granted amnesty. He further adds, ‘In course of time one of them died, without any harm having been done to him, and the other remained alone. The emperor was so successful in sport that he took their lives in one game after another.’ The last sentence of this passage is not very clear, but ‘Išâmî makes a statement which corroborates it as well as throws fresh light on it. He says that ‘Alâûddîn pardoned ‘Ali Bêg and Tartaq, gave them robes of honour and provided for them all necessaries and amenities of life. After a short time, however, Tartaq, while under a fit of drunkenness, was heard to enquire about his crown, armour and army. When the Sultan came to know of it, he ordered his head to be chopped off immediately. ‘Ali Bêg also met the same fate after one or two years."

Invasion of Kubak and Iqbālmand (1306).

In the following year the Mughals again reappeared on the frontiers of India, when Dava Khan sent Kubak to

---

70 Khazain Habib Trs. p. 28.

71 Futâh p. 298. Vassâf, a foreign contemporary who wrongly puts the invasion in 708 H. (1308 A.D.), also states that ‘Ali Bêg accepted Islam and that he was given the rank of a nobleman by ‘Alâûddîn.

Vassâf text pp. 526-27.

72 Kubak was also a son of Dava Khan, but as the Kubak who invaded India was captured alive and then killed by the orders of the sultan, he seems to be different from Dava Khan’s son, who ascended the throne of Transoxiana in 1307-8. The name has variously been written by Indian historians. Baranî writes him Kunk or Gung, Amir Khusrau Kapak or Kabak, ‘Išâmî Kubak and Firishtah Gung.
avenge the deaths of 'Ali Bég and Tartāq.73 He crossed Indus with a large army and marched on to Ravi burning, murdering and pillaging. Another contingent of the Mughal force, which was commanded by Iqbalmand moved southwards and arrived near Nagor74 creating havoc in that part of the country. 'Aláúddin appointed Malik Naib Kãfür to oppose the invaders and crush them out in a battle. To encourage his soldiers 'Aláúddin ordered that every one of them shall receive one year's salary as bonus. Experienced generals like Malik Tughlaq, the Shahnãh-i-Bãrgan and the fief-holder of Deopalpur, and Malik 'Alam were also sent with Malik Naib Kãfür. On the eve of their departure the Sultan praised and flattered Malik Naib very much to encourage him to give a gallant fight.75 The royal army made for the threatened region making “no distinction between the darkness of the night and the light of the dawn till they had reached their prey”. Malik Tughlaq, who led the vanguard, one day suddenly sighted Mughal scouts, and he immediately informed Malik Kãfür about the location of the Mughal army. Shortly after the rival forces stood face to face on the banks of the river Ravi,76 but 73 Deval Rani p. 62.

74 Khazain p. 29.
Ferishtah pp. 115-16.
75 Futãh p. 311.
76 In Khazain Khusrau says that the battle was fought near the river of 'Ali (Ab-i-'Ali), but in Deval Rani he makes it clear and says that the Mughals crossed from Multan and began to ravage the region of Ravi. Baraní calls the place of combat as “Khekar” while Ferishtah has Nilãb. ‘Isãmi has Hind-i-'Ali.
neither party was willing to open the attack. At last the Mughals advanced blowing conch shells and making immense noise. Kubak delivered the assault on the centre of the royal army, commanded by Malik Naib Kāfūr, and scattered it. But soon Malik Kāfūr rallied his men and fought so gallantly that in a very short time Kubak’s men were completely routed and made to fly. Kubak was taken prisoner just at a moment when he was on the point of being killed by some Delhi soldiers. The prisoners of war, who included women and children, were sent to the Sultan at Delhi.

Malik Tughlaq and Malik Naib now marched to encounter that Mughal force which had successfully advanced as far as Nagor. Intelligence was brought to them that the Mughal army was commanded by two generals Iqbālmand, and Tai-Bū. The royal generals marched on and suddenly fell upon the enemy. The Mughal commanders, probably having heard of the defeat of Kubak and also having their right wing attacked by the Indian army fell back and fled northwards “by the same passage across the Sind (Indus)”.

The work of the imperialists was now rendered easy. They pursued, overtook and completely routed the Mughal force. The victorious army returned to the capital accompanied by a large number of prisoners of war. Ferishtah says that this was a strange event, for out of fifty or sixty thousand Mughals not more than three or four thousand were left alive. Sultan ‘Alā’uddin, enraged at the persistent audacity of the Mughal invaders who poured into the country year after year, ordered them to be thrown under the feet of elephants and a tower to be constructed of their skulls in front of the Badaon Gate. Their women and children were sold in Delhi and the rest of Hindustan.

This invasion has been differently described by various writers, contemporary and later. Amir Khusrau’s account in Khazainul Futūh, being a mixture of verbosity and rhetoric, is a little confused. But it can be made out that Kubak, Iqbálmand and Tai Bū were commanders of the different contingents in one and the same campaign.\textsuperscript{77} This fact, again, is definitely mentioned in \textit{Deval Rānī}.\textsuperscript{78} ‘Īsāmī who gives the most detailed description of Mughal invasions, treats it as the last in the time of ‘Alāūddin. ‘Īsāmī, however, does not refer to any other commander except Kubak.\textsuperscript{79}

According to Ziyāuddin Barānī, however, Kank, another general whose name he does not mention, and Iqbálmand invaded Hindustan on three occasions and in different, if not successive, years. His description of the three Mughal invasions is as follows:— In the first invasion under Kank or Gung the Mughals were defeated by the army of Islam at Khekar. Gung and many other Mughals, including women and children, were taken prisoner. Gung was trampled under the feet of an elephant and a tower of heads of the Mughals was raised before the Badaon Gate. On another occasion and in another year some commanders of the Indian army fought the Mughals in the Sivalik hills. They cut the retreat of the Mughals and occupied the territory through which the enemy was to pass. It so happened that the Mughals, who were returning after over-running the Sivaliks, arrived at the river bank (the name of the river is not given) with their “horses and themselves both parched with thirst and disordered. The army of Islam thus gained the most advantageous opportunity, and the Mughals with their fingers in their mouths, begged for water.”\textsuperscript{80} They were \textsuperscript{77} \textit{Khazain} pp. 29-31.

\textsuperscript{78} \textit{Deval Ranī} pp. 62-63.
\textsuperscript{79} \textit{Futūh.} pp. 310-314.
\textsuperscript{80} The details show that Barānī is clearly referring to the retreat of the Mughals from Nagor who must have passed through regions scarce of water.
attacked. A glorious victory fell to the lot of the imperialists and the Mughals were killed mercilessly. In another year Iqbalmand headed another Mughal expedition to Amir 'Ali but he was completely defeated after a light skirmish with the imperial army. Iqbalmand was slain and some thousand Mughals fell a prey to the sword.

The above narrative is evidently loose and faulty. It was written long after the actual event and, therefore, there is every probability of discrepancies creeping into it. The author does not give the names of the Indian commanders who fought the Mughals on these three occasions. He does not mention the name of the Mughal commander, who according to him, was in command of the second of these invasions, nor even does he give the dates of the expeditions. These inaccuracies were adopted by Nizamuddin and Ferishtah. Ferishtah follows his predecessor in broad details; but he gives only two invasions. According to him one of them was encountered on the banks of the Indus; but the place of the other has not been indicated by him. He simply says, "A long while after this (i.e. the invasion of Kubak) a Mughal, named Iqbalmand, came to Hindustan with a huge army and wrought much damage. But Ghazi Malik Tughlaq marched against Iqbalmand and after slaying him sent many Mughals to Delhi to be trodden down by enormous elephants."

The narrative of Khusrau, who treats the invasion under Kubak, Iqbalmand and Tai Bu as one and the same is most trustworthy. He wrote in the life-time of Alauddin; whereas Barani wrote very much long after. Moreover he confirms his statements of Khazainul Fatih in Deval Rani, which shows that he was certain of what he was writing in this connection. His statements are corroborated by 'Iṣāmī also who does not mention any other invasion of the Mughals after that of Kubak in the time of 'Alāūddin. Many other facts also reveal that Kubak's was in all probability the last invasion. Dava Khan, the arch enemy of Hindustan, who after his accession to the throne of Transoxiana in 1272, had repeatedly sent expeditions to India, died in the last months of the year 1306. After his death the internal affairs of Transoxiana fell into confusion, and within three years three Khans successively sat upon the throne. Conditions became so unsettled there that Ghāzī Malik, warden of the marches at Deopalpur, every year led expeditions to Kabul and Ghazni and plundered and ravaged those places. In these circumstances it is incredible that after the death of Dava Khan the Mughals would or could have poured into India again. Thus with Kubak's expedition the last spark of Mughal aggression died out. The Mughal menace which had made his predecessors tremble on their thrones was put to an end by the mighty resolve of 'Alāūddin. His reformatory measures, his huge army and above all his consummate generalship relieved the empire of a calamity that was continually haunting the rulers and people of Hindustan. Not only did the Mughals cease their aggression on Hindustan, Ghāzī Tughlaq, who like Sher Khan of former days was appointed at Deopalpur with a strong force under him, every year led expeditions to 'Kabul, Ghazni, Qandhar and Garmsir, plundered and ravaged those regions and levied tribute from their inhabitants. The Mughals had not the courage to come and defend their own frontiers against him.'

81 It may be Ab-i-'Ali of Khusrau.
83 Ferishtah p. 116.

---

84 Barani pp. 322-23. Ziyāuddin's remark is very significant. He says:

ءے راسال در ایام زمستان (Ghāzī Malik) با لشکر خاص خود ازدیپلیپور بیورن آمدی و تا سرحد عالی غمل ببنتی - مغل را
Barani and Firishtah speak of plundering raids of Malik Tughlaq only. But a letter in the Aijaz-i-Khusravi of Amir Khusrau, and translated and published by Sir H. Elliot shows that the Mughals had successfully been defeated by Tughlaq Malik and that Khutba in the name of Sultan Alauddin was read in a mosque of Ghazni. The letter which has no date is a part of the Arz-dast of one Hajib Badr to the address of Khizr Khan, son of Alauddin. It would not be out of place to give the full letter as translated by Elliot from Book IV of the Persian text of Aijaz-i-Khusravi.

"The servant Badr begs to state, for the information of his highness prince Khizr Khan....that according to royal orders he marched with an army, reached Indus, crossed the river on boats and proceeding onward arrived at Ghazni in winter. The season was exceedingly cold. The Mughals of that place were in great alarm from fear of the Musalman army. But when the purport of the royal firman was read to them, they became comforted, expressed their obedience and were happy. As the king had ordered that the Khutba of his name should be read in Ghazni all the Muhammadans who had concealed themselves in the mountains and ravines, as well as the elders and the principal Musalmans of Ghazni, who were looking with the eye of expectation towards Delhi, assembled in the Jama Masjid of the city, and on Friday the

جراع بر کردۀ طلب کردن و مغل زا ماجال نمانده بود که بر
سرحد خود بر طریق گشت بیانید-

It is obvious that there was no peace on the north-west frontier during 'Alauddin's rule. Ibn Battuta mentions an Arabic inscription of Ghazi Tughlaq on the Jama Masjid of Multan, which ran: "I have encountered the Tatars on twenty-nine occasions and defeated them and hence I am known as Malikul Ghazi."

Khutaba was read in the name of Sultan ‘Ala-ud-din. The noise of acclamations of joy and congratulations rose high from all quarters. The vest of honour, which was sent by the king, for the reader of the Khutba, was put on his shoulders. One of the walls of the mosque, which was decayed and fallen down, was newly raised.

On the same Friday jewels and gold were showered by Badr which he had brought from Delhi and Musalmans picked them. The Mughals saw this from the top of the walls of the Masjid, and spoke something in their own tongue. In these days some of the infidels have embraced the Muhammadan Faith.”

This letter, in spite of the fact that it is of no great historic authenticity, corroborates the idea that ‘Ala-ud-din’s arms had penetrated into Ghazni and the Sultan’s Khutba was read there.

Causes of the defeat of the Mughals.

Before closing this chapter it would be interesting to study why the Mughals, who once terrorised both the east and the west, and who even in the time of ‘Ala-ud-din waged mighty wars in Central Asia, were always successfully defeated by the armies of Hindustan. The defeats and retreats of the Mughals in India were due to many reasons. Firstly, the idea of world conquest, which had been the driving force of the Mughal empire, was given up on account of the wars among the various descendants of Changiz Khan. The Mughals who invaded India were sent by the Khans of Transoxiana. They had rebelled against the Great Khans of China and were mostly busy with their internal troubles in Central Asia. Dava Khan, the arch-enemy of Hindustan fought some forty battles in Central Asia itself, and consequently could not give all his attention and energy to the conquest of Hindustan. As Professor Habib rightly point out, the discord among the Mughals and their own internecine warfare saved the kingdom of Delhi which could not have withstood a united attack of the Mughals.\textsuperscript{86}

Secondly, the numbers that invaded India seem to be exaggerated. Women, children and old men—all accompanied the invaders, and although as such the number of the invaders was inflated, their military efficiency was marred. On many occasions ‘Alāūddin took prisoner a large number of women and children and sold them in the market of Delhi or put them to the sword. Thirdly, the qualities of the early Mughals which had given them magnificent successes in the early days of their history were now extinct. The agility, the mobility and the qualities of patience and endurance no longer marked the Mughals who invaded India, and it is strange indeed that on the occasion of the two sieges of Delhi in 1300 and 1303, ‘Alāūddin exhausted the patience of the Mughals and they retired without giving tough fights such as were needed for the conquest of an empire.

Fourthly, Dava Khan, who ruled for thirty two years, could send organised expeditions to India in spite of his engagement in Central Asia. His death in 1306 brought about disorder in Transoxiana. Within a period of two or three years three Khans—Kuyuk, Kubak and Taliku, ascended the throne. Even after that the affairs were not set right and Kubak had to abdicate. He was reinstated in 1321. In these circumstances Mughal invasions to India could not be organised and sent at regular intervals. On the contrary Ghazi Tughlaq used to harass the Mughals themselves.

And lastly, the main cause of the Mughal defeat lies in the fact that they had come to fight with a king who himself was a war-lord. The patience, integrity and the military genius of ‘Alāūddin as well as his courage and perseverance are clearly manifested in his talk with Malik ‘Alā-ul-mulk who tried to dissuade him from fighting Qutlugh Khvājā. Alā-ūddin thought it his bounden duty to fight the foreign foe. He effected various reforms, he raised a huge army and through studied determination always repulsed the Mughal inroads until they stopped altogether.

\textsuperscript{86} Khazain, Habib Tr. p. 25.
CHAPTER XII

KINGDOMS OF THE DECCAN
DEVAGIRI AND WARANGAL

By the end of the first decade of the 14th century Sultan 'Ala'uddin had accomplished the conquest of almost the whole of north India, had checked the tide of Mughal aggression, and had effected reforms in civil and military spheres. Under his stern administration peace, if not plenty, prevailed. The barons, the traders as well as the peasants were kept under strict control so that all opposition to his despotism was paralysed. A large army consisting of 4,75,000 well-equipped soldiers was regularly paid and well looked after by the state; and relying on its strength the emperor embarked upon the conquest of the Deccan peninsula.

On a previous occasion Devagiri had provided 'Ala'uddin with a large amount of treasure. The greed of gold and the lust for glory—the two incentives of all conquerors—now prompted him to invade all the kingdoms of the Deccan one after the other. Once the plan of conquest of the south had been thought of, a pretext, if a pretext was necessary, was also got at hand. Ram Chandra of Devagiri, who had submitted to 'Ala'uddin in 1296 and had promised to send yearly tribute, had not forwarded anything to Delhi for some time past. Consequently Malik Kafur was ordered to lead an 1 According to Barani 'Ala'uddin sent a fresh army to the Deccan besides the one maintained for controlling the north-west frontier. According to Ferishtah the total strength of the army was 475,000.

Ferishtah p. 114.
Barani p. 326.
Southern India at the beginning of the XIV Century
Places marked with asterisk were visited by Malik Kāfūr expedition into Devagiri and recover arrears of tribute. But this expedition of 1308 was only a prelude to a number of others like it. It is necessary, therefore, to have a glimpse of the then political condition of the south to understand them in their proper perspective.

To face page 180

Kingdoms of the Deccan at the dawn of the XIV century.

At the time of Malik Kāfūr’s invasion the Deccan peninsula was divided into four big and wealthy kingdoms. Devagiri lay south of the Vindhyas, and to its south-east was situated the kingdom of Telingana, with capital at Warangal. It was ruled by Kakatiya or Ganapati rulers. To the south of Devagiri and south-west of Telingana was situated the kingdom of Dwarsamudra ruled by the powerful Hoysalas. To the extreme south lay the mighty kingdom of the Pandyas, known to the Muslim chroniclers as the country of M‘abar.

We have already discussed the power and possessions of Devagiri in chapter IV. As to the kingdom of Telingana, it flourished under the able rule of Ganapati who ascended the throne in 1199-1200. Ganapati’s reign was long and he made extensive conquests on the coast from Nellore northward to the frontiers of Orissa. After him his wife Rudrāmbā Dēvī, a princess of Devagiri who ascended the throne in 1260-61, ably ruled the kingdom for full three decades. It was during her reign that Marco Polo, the famous Venetian traveller visited Motupille, a famous port of that kingdom, now lying in the Guntur district of the Madras Presidency.² Marco Polo calls queen Rudramba

² Motupille, on the mouth of river Krishna, perhaps separated Telingana from M‘abar. Marco Polo writes: “When you leave Mabar and go in a northerly direction, you come to the kingdom of Mufili.” It was then a big centre of trade and commerce. It is now only a village in the Krishna District, Madras.

"a lady... of much distinction... a lover of justice, of equity, and of peace."

3 But for his compliments her's is an empty name in the dynastic list of the Kākatiyas of Warangal. She continued to reign till 1292 when her daughter's son Pratap Rudra Deva attained majority and she abdicated in his favour. It was during the reign of Pratap Rudra Dev (Ladder Deo of Muslim chroniclers) that Telingana was invaded by the armies of Delhi under Malik Naib Kāführ.

To the west and south-west of Telingana was situated the kingdom of the Hoysalas with its capital at Dwarsamudra (modern Halbeid). 4 Since the decline of the Chola empire the Hoysalas from the north and the Pandyas from the extreme south continuously fought diplomatic as well as military battles at the expense of the Cholas. In a record 5 of the time of Nara Simha II (1224-1234) the Hoysala empire is said to have extended upto Nangili on the east, Kongu (Salem and Coimbatore) on the south, Alvakheđa (south Canara) on the west, and Heddore (Krishna) on the north. The Hoysalas continued to carry on conquests and Vikrampurā, the southern capital of Someśvara, son of Nara Simha, has been identified with the modern Kannanur, near Trichnopoly. 6 The glory of the kingdom was eclipsed when after Someśvara the two claimants of the throne, Nara

4 The derivation of the name of Dwarsamudra is not clear. Mr. Rice would connect it with Devarpuri mentioned in a legend which traces the Hoysalas to a mythical person Sālā. Mr. Krishna Shastri believes that the Hoysala capital must have been so named after its founder who was called either Dhara or Dora. The modern name Halbeid (old capital) was perhaps applied to it after the seat of government was transferred thence to Tiruvannamalai by Ballāla III.
Simha III and Vira Ramnath separated, the former ruling the ancestral dominions with capital at Dwarasamudra and the latter the southern portion of the empire. It seems, however, that Nara Simha either ousted or outlived Vira Ramnath. In 1292 Nara Simha was succeeded by Ballāla III (Ballal Deo of the Muhammadan historians) and he reunited the whole of the Hoysala empire in 1302.7

To the extreme south lay the kingdom of the Pandyas. In the 12th century the Pandya kingdom had suffered irreparable damage owing to internal strifes, and the consequent intervention by the Cholas—Rajadhirāj II and his heir apparent Kulottunga III—from the north, and by the Ceylonese king from the south. But then, in the 13th century, the Pandyas began to assert themselves and under Mārāvarman Sundra Pandyas I and II, who reigned from 1216 to 1239 and 1239 to 1255 respectively, the Pandyas recovered much of their lost prestige. The next Pandya king Jatavarman Sundara Pandya, who ruled up to 1274, was a warrior of great repute and reduced the whole of the Chola empire. He invaded the Malabar country and defeated and killed the Chera king. He also fought with the Hoysala king Somesvara. Jatavarman had two or three brothers who ruled as independent sovereigns in different principalities of the Pandya empire but were subordinate to 7 There are a good number of inscriptions to corroborate Ramnath's aggressive attitude. About the year 1290 he appears to have led a campaign against Dwarasamudra itself but the Pandya Mahāvarman Kulasekhara (1268-1311) did not permit Ramnath to do much harm to his brother. Ramnath's son Vishvanath succeeded him in 1293-4 and ruled up to 1302 when the whole of the empire was united under Ballāla III. Arch. Sur. Rep. 1909-10 pp. 157-159.

---

Also Epig. Carnatica, Inscriptions in the Mysore District, Part I, 1894, Inscription no. 121.
the chief king Jatavarman Sundara.\textsuperscript{8} One of them went by the name of Vikram Pandya, another by that of Vira Pandya. Both of them lay claim to conquests.\textsuperscript{9} A record of Vira Pandya states that he took Ilam (Ceylon), Kongu and the Solamandalam (the Chola country).\textsuperscript{10}

The greatest king among the Pandyas, however, was Mārāvarmana Kulasekhara (Kales Devar of Muhammadan historians) who ascended in 1268\textsuperscript{11} and ruled almost upto 1311 when the Musalmans invaded the Pandya kingdom. During his long and prosperous rule Marco Polo visited the \textsuperscript{8} Robert Sewell in his article entitled “The chronology of the Pandya Monarchy” entertains doubt as to how more than one prince of equal authority ruled over one country. He says that there is no published inscription nor there is any indication in the writings of Amir Khusrau and Vassyä that the kingdom was divided among a number of brothers. (Ind. Ant. Vol. 44, 1915.)

\textsuperscript{9} Aiyangar pp. 53-54.

\textsuperscript{11} Of the Pandya inscriptions one (no. 55 of 1904) confirms Prof. Kielhorn’s calculation of A.D. 1268 as the initial date of the reign of Mara. Kulasekhara I; another (no. 702 of 1904) shows that in A.D. 1264-65 the Pandyas were in possession of Kannanur near Trichnopoly, which was the Hoysala capital of the Chola country. Arch. Sur. Rep. 1904-05 pp. 129.
port of Kayal lying in his dominions. He dwells at length on the wealth and prosperity of the country and calls Kulasekhara by the name of Asciar. Mārāvarmana Kulasekhara is also known by the title of Konerinmaikondan, or the king who had no equal, and is recorded to have ruled both over Chola and Pandya countries. He is also described as ruling from Madura, which was formerly a capital of the Hoysalas. This fact shows that the conquests of Kulasekhara were wide and extensive. It was he who sent an expedition to the island of Ceylon and defeated the Ceylonese king Prakarma Bāhū. There are also references found of diplomatic intercourse between China and M'abar (Ma-pa-rh).

Mārāvarmana Kulasekhara had two sons Sundara Pandya III, legitimate, and Vīra Pandya, illegitimate. According to Muslim historians the king thought Vīra Pandya more fitted to succeed him and actually nominated him as his successor. Thus, while Vīra was associated with 12 One of the inscriptions in the Rammad Dist. states that Kulasekhara constructed the walls of the temple at Tinnevelly from the booty obtained from the Kerala, Chola and Hoysala kingdoms. Arch. Sur. Rep. 1926-27 p. 203.

---

Aiyangar: Invaders p. 58.

Abul Feda distinctly names Cape Comorin as the point where Malabar ended. Vāṣṣāf also writes that it extended to Nilavar (Nellor). Rashiduddin writing about 1300 A.D. speaks of M’abar, which was apparently another name for the Pandya country, as extending from Kulam (Quilon) to Nellor. This statement had been corroborated several years ago by an inscription of Sundara Pandya found at Nellor. Further confirmation is afforded by a number of Tamil records discovered in the southern portion of the Cuddapah distt.

Also Yule’s note in Ser Marco Polo, vol. II, p. 315.
the administration of the government from 1296, his brother had to wait till 1302-3, when he was also permitted to participate in the affairs of the state. As Vira Pandya was openly favoured by Kulasekhara, Sundara naturally grew jealous of him. The climax was reached when by the end of 709 A.H. (May 1310 A.D.) Sundara killed his father and the two brothers began to wage a war for the possession of the throne. In a battle Sundara was worsted and begged the Sultan of Delhi to help him to secure the crown. This, it is alleged, brought about Kāfūr’s invasion of the Madura country.

Thus at the time of Malik Kāfūr’s invasion south India presented a sorry spectacle of discord and internecine warfare. The boundaries of the four principal states used constantly to change because of the constant conflict between the Yadavās, the Hoysalas, the Kākatiyas and the Pandays.

Wealth of the Deccan.

In spite of the frequent warfare among the various kingdoms, no foreign conqueror had robbed the Deccan of its wealth which had been accumulated for centuries. A great many historians and travellers testify to the enormous wealth in the Deccan. Marco Polo describing the treasures of M’abar says, ‘When the king dies none of his children dares to touch his treasures. For they—say! ‘as our father did gather together all this treasure, so we ought to accumulate as much in our turn.’ And in this way it comes to pass that there is an immensity of treasure accumulated in this kingdom.’ The Venetian traveller describes at length the jewellery the king wore about his person as well as the ways in which they used to obtain "very fine and 14 Vassāf Text p. 531.

15 Yule: Ser Marco Polo, II, p. 323.
great pearls” in M’abar. Nobody was permitted to take outside the kingdom pearls of high value. “This order has been given” says Marco Polo, “because the king desires to reserve all such for himself; and so in fact the quantity he has is something almost incredible.” The fact that an enormous amount of wealth was squandered by the Pandya kings on endowments to temples and in securing horses of foreign breed is attested by contemporary inscriptions and writings of Vassāf and Polo. The latter further adds that the Pandya king “maintains great state and administers his kingdom with great equity, and extends great favour to merchants and foreigners, so that they are very glad to visit his city” (of Cail or Tinnevelly).

Another writer who speaks about the wealth of the south is Shihābuddin Abul Abbās Ahmād, the author of Masālikul Absār. According to him gold had been flowing into India for a number of centuries and had never been exported. Amir Khusrau, Barānī and Fērishtah are all unanimously of opinion that the gold and treasures ‘Alāūddin and his general Malik Kāfūr brought from the south were enormous. Not only ‘Alāūddin but some years later Muḥammad Tughlaq also obtained immense booty from the Deccan. On one occasion the loot from a single temple amounted to a sum that was carried on 200 elephants and several thousand bullocks. Even after the immense amount of wealth ‘Alāūddin and Muḥammad bin Tughlaq carried away to the north, Bahmani and Vijayanagar kingdoms in the south still possessed vast treasures. The Arab traveller Abdurrazzāq who visited Deccan in the 14th century bears testimony to the power and prosperity of the Vijayanager kingdom. “

16 Yule: Ser Marco Polo, II, p. 323.
17 Vassāf p. 529.
18 Yule: Ser Marco Polo, II, p. 357.
19 Elliot, III, p. 583.
country is for the most part well cultivated and fertile. In the king's treasury there are chambers with excavations in them, filled with molten gold, forming one mass. All the inhabitants of the country, whether high or low, even down to the artificers of the bazar, wear jewels and ornaments.

Ferishtah also asserts that even the poor in the Deccan put on gold ornaments and the high class people used to eat in gold and silver plates.

Such was the wealth of the Deccan which tempted the sultans of the north to lead plundering expeditions into this prosperous land. Both Mahmūd of Ghazna and Muḥammad of Ghaur had an eye on the Deccan. Muḥammad proceeded to Gujarat and sacked it successfully but Muḥammad was repulsed from there. Anyway neither of these two conquerors could march into the Deccan, but the idea of conquering the south and obtaining its wealth had gained fascination for ambitious conquerors. It was 'Alāʿuddīn Khaljī who for the first time had penetrated into the Deccan in 1296.

Second Expedition to Devagiri.

It has already been seen how Ram Deva, the Yadava ruler, had submitted to prince 'Alāʿuddīn in 1296. Since then he had sent yearly tributes to the court of Delhi, where the raider of Devagiri reigned as an emperor. But for two or three years before 1308 Ram Chandra had stopped sending any tribute. The actual reasons for this behaviour of the Maratha king are not known, but they can well be conjectured. It was a sheer chance that a freebooter had been successful over the Yadava king and even over his valiant son Singhana in 1296, but since then he had never been

---

20 Mutlūs Sadāin, Elliot, IV, pp. 106-7
21 Ferishtah, p. 120.
22 Baranī, p. 326.
Khazāin., Habīb Trs. pp. 69-73.
heard of in the Deccan again. For ten years Ram Deva sent the yearly tribute regularly. Thereafter he took advantage of the long distance between Devagiri and Delhi as also of the preoccupation of 'Alāūddin with the Mughals and the Rajputs, and withheld the tribute from 1305 or 1306 onwards. According to 'Isāmī, Ram Deva's loyalty was unflinching, but his son,23 with the people of the land, tried to assume independence even against his father's wishes. Ram Chandra was so incensed that he appealed to 'Alāūddin to punish his son.24 But the events of the expedition do not corroborate his statement. The reason of the invasion given by Baranī—that Ram Chandra had withheld the tribute for some years—seems to be most convincing.

Ram Chandra had calculated wrongly. Sultan 'Alāūddin could not bear to let go the handsome revenue from Devagiri which multiplied his accumulated treasures every year. Consequently in 130825 he deputed Malik Naib Kāfūr, the hazārdinārī slave captured in Gujarat in 1299, with a large force to invade Devagiri and realise the arrears of tribute from Ram Deva. Malik Kāfūr's 30,000 horses were 23 'Isāmī always makes mention of only one prince, Bhillama; but it was chiefly Singhana who always opposed the Muslims from the north and carried on conquests in the south.

---

24 Futūh. pp. 274-76.

25 According to Ferishtah this expedition was sent in 1306, according to Amīr Khusrau in March 1307 (Ramzān 706 A.H.) and according to Baranī some time in 1308. Ferishtah adds that the conquest of Sevana was accomplished in the year in which the expedition to Devagiri was sent. Amīr Khusrau also describes the conquest of Sevana just after this expedition (Khazain Habib Trans, p. 53). Sevana was captured in 1308 according to Ferishtah and in 1310 according to Khusrau. The dates are perplexing. It appears that the contemporary writer Baranī is correct and the year 1308 is most convincing as it falls nearest to the date of the conquest of Sevana.
reinforced by the armies of Khvājā Ḥājī, ‘Ainul Mulk Muntani and Alp Khan, the governor of Gujarat. These joint forces were to chastise the delinquent Maratha chief, to realise three years’ tribute from him and to obtain possession of Deval Rani the younger daughter of Rai Karan Baghela, ex-king of Gujarat then a fugitive in Nandurbar.

According to Firishtah, Kamla Devi, the wife of Raja Karan, who had been forced into the imperial haram after the fall of Gujarat and who had now been reconciled to her lot, requested ‘Alāūddin to secure her daughter Deval Devi from the custody of her father. Kamla Devi had two daughters by her former husband. The elder one had died but the younger one, who was an infant of six months at the time of the invasion of Gujarat, was left with Raja Karan. Kamla’s motherly instinct was roused when she heard of an army being sent to Devagiri, where Karan had taken refuge, and she requested the Sultan to obtain Deval Devi. In this way the ex-queen of Gujarat proved to be the cause of much misery and humiliation to her former husband.

Eversince the kingdom of Gujarat had been overrun by the Muhammadans Rai Karan had taken refuge with the Yadava king of Devagiri—another victim of the invincible arms of ‘Alāūddin. Ram Chandra had treated the fugitive well and had given him Baglana, a portion of his own territory, to rule. Rai Karan established his capital at Nandurbar.

26 For her age see Chapter XVIII note 7

27 This incident has not been mentioned by Ziyā Baranī. Nizamuddin mixes the two expeditions of Gujarat of 1299 and 1308 into one and says that Deval Rani was captured when Karan lost Gujarat. Amīr Khusrau describes the capture of Deval Devi under a separate expedition but does not give any date for it. Firishtah, however, gives this expedition in detail and describes it in the events of the year 706 (1306 A.D.).

28 Ibn Battūtah describes Nadurbar (Nandurbar) as a small town inhabited by the Marathas.
and began to rule there in peace. Singhana Deva, son of Ram Deva, had all this time cherished to obtain the hand of Deval Devi, a Rajput princess, but Rai Karan even in his exile was reluctant to agree to this mesalliance and had constantly refused the offer. Meanwhile, Malik Kāfūr marched southwards and was joined by Alp Khan and ‘Ainul Mulk Multani. After crossing Malwa Kāfūr sent a message to Rai Karan to deliver his daughter or be ready for an encounter with the imperial armies. Karan Beghela spurned the humiliating alternative and prepared for defence. Malik Naib Kāfūr desired Alp Khan to march with his forces through the mountains of Baghala and obtain possession of the peerless princess while he himself proceeded towards Devagiri. For two months Karan stood at bay and baffled all attempts of Alp Khan to force a passage. Singhana Deva finding the Baghela king in pressing circumstances renewed the offer of marriage and sent his younger brother Bhillama to escort the bride to Devagiri. The Rajput king, in his helpless state, sent the princess to Devagiri with a small escort under Bhillama.

But fate had decreed otherwise. As the bride was on the way to her new home, Karan was being hard pressed by Alap Khan and in a severe engagement was totally defeated. Leaving his baggage and tents on the field of battle he also fled towards Devagiri hotly pursued by the enemy. One day while the royalists were pursuing Raja Karan, about three hundred Muslim soldiers after obtaining permission from their commander went out on a visit to the famous caves of Ellora. Suddenly they saw a body of troops advancing towards them and mistaking them for a contingent of the retreating enemy fell upon them and a tough fight ensued. These troops were not a force of Rai Karan but the escort of Deval Rani, the destined bride of Singhana. An arrow pierced her horse and she fell upon the ground. The rowdy soldiers at once surrounded her, but on being told that she was the much-sought for Deval Devi, they took her to their general. The capture of Deval filled the heart of Alp Khan with joy and the princess was despatched to Delhi to be admitted into the royal haram to live upto a tragic and unfortunate end.

Deval Rani had been captured and the forces of Alp Khan marched to join Malik Naib in punishing Ram Deva. Malik Kafur arrived in Devagiri plundering and ravaging on the way and in the capital itself. It appears that Ram Chandra was not at all prepared for an invasion and stood to resist the invaders only with a feeble army. He was totally defeated in the battle that ensued. His son, unwilling to surrender to the enemy, fled away from the field of action with a few followers.

Ram Chandra sued for peace. Malik Kafur captured some elephants and treasure and sent Ram Deva, his family and relations to Delhi to make submission to the Sultan personally.

'Alauddin was overjoyed at the success of his commander. He received Ram Deva kindly and provided for him princely comforts at the capital. After a stay of six months Ram Chandra was permitted to return to his kingdom and was honoured with the title of Rai Rayan and a canopy. Added to these distinctions the Yadava prince was given one hundred thousand gold tankahs and the 29 The tragedy of her later life is described in chapter XX.

---

31 Hajjuddabir says that Ram Chandra met Malik Kafur because he had confidence in 'Alauddin, but Kafur arrested him and seized whatever he had. He took him to Delhi and told the king what he had done. The sultan chid him for misbehaving with a vanquished prince and honoured Ram Deva. Zafarul Vali, p. 155.

This version may not be discredited. 'Alauddin's instructions to Kafur on the occasions of later expeditions clearly show that 'Alauddin apprehended some unbecoming behaviour on the part of Kafur towards the vanquished princes.
district of Navasari was added to his dominions.\textsuperscript{32} Ram Chandra was back in Devagiri by the end of the year 1308.

Ram Chandra felt very grateful to ‘Alâ’uddîn for his considerate behaviour and thenceforward he was ever subservient to the Delhi Sultan, never disobeyed his orders and until he died he sent tributes to the capital regularly.\textsuperscript{33} The treatment accorded to Ram Deva was not without ulterior motives. On the contrary this was a great diplomatic move of ‘Alâ’uddîn. He had now an unflinching ally in the south who would surely help the Sultan in his further plans. As would be seen later Ram Chandra gave invaluable help to Malik Kâführ during his march further south.

\textit{The Campaign of Warangal (1309-10).}

The expedition to Devagiri was a grand success indeed, and Sultan ‘Alâ’uddîn turned his attention to the kingdoms lying farther south. As Dr. Aiyangar aptly remarks ‘‘‘Alâ’uddîn’s object in these various invasions of the Deccan and the farther south appears to have gone no further than making them the milch-cow for the gold that he was often much in need of for the efficient maintenance of his army to keep Hindustan free from internal disturbance and invasion by the Mughals from outside.’’\textsuperscript{34} That this was actually his policy is clear from the instructions he gave to Malik Kâführ on the eve of the expedition against Warangal.

\textsuperscript{32} Barani p. 326. Ferishtah p. 118.

\textsuperscript{33} Barani p. 326 has \textsuperscript{34} Aiyangar: Invaders p. 87.

According to Amir Khusrau it was on the 25th of Jamâdiul Avval 709 (31st October, 1309) that the Sultan ordered Malik Naib Kâfar “to lead his lucky horses” towards the south and reduce the kingdom of Telingana with its capital at Warangal (Arangal of the Muslim historians). In spite of the fact that Muslim arms had no two previous occasions won brilliant victories in Devagiri, the Sultan quite realised that south India was an alien land. And, therefore, before sending Malik Naib to the south ‘Alâüddin gave him some very valuable instructions. He told him that he was going to an unfamiliar country and should, therefore, not be very much self-willed and obstinate. He should work in cooperation with Malik Sirajuddin, the ‘Arîz-i-Mumâlik, and other important officers. He should treat the troops leniently and avoid any cause of resentment or revolt. He was advised to connive at minor acts of misconduct and disorderly behaviour of the soldiers. If any soldier wanted a fresh horse or a loan it was to be given to him. In short, he was neither to be so lenient to the commanders, nobles or soldiers as to render them impertinent and disrespectful, nor was he to let his severity turn them into his enemies. As to the treatment to be meted out to the king Warangal, Malik Kâfar was advised to capture the fort and overthrow the Raja; and if Rai Pratap Rudra Deva (Laddar Deo of Muslim chronicles) consented to surrender his treasures and elephants and also agreed to pay a yearly tribute thereafter, the royal commander was not to insist for more, lest the Rai should be forced into desperate resistance. If he was successful in securing all the treasures and elephants of Warangal, he should not insist that the Rai should come to wait on him and “for the sake of his own name and fame, he should not bring the Rai with him to Delhi.”

Having received these instructions, Malik Kāfūr left Delhi with the Red canopy and a large force under his command. He first went to Rabri (Rewari), his own fief, and then took the road to the south. He marched on the old route through Chanderi, crossing many fast flowing streams like Chambal, Kuwari, Sindh and Betwa\(^{36}\) and traversing hilly tracts. On the way many rajas and governors joined the forces of Kāfūr. The army reached Irijpur,\(^{37}\) otherwise known as Sultanpur, after fifteen marches. As Malik Naib was already acquainted with the road to Devagiri he marched straight towards that kingdom en route to Warangal. The army arrived at Khandā\(^{38}\) in the first week of December 1309 (Rajjab 709) where it stayed for a fortnight. In the next march the royal forces reached a place called Nikanth\(^{39}\) by Amīr Khusrau, and said to be lying on the borders of Devagiri. From there they marched quietly, for the Vazīr Kāfūr, "acting according to the emperor's orders, protected the country from being plunder-

\(^{36}\) Khazain has Jūn (Jumna), Chambal, Kunwari, Binās and Bhoji. Jumna is a mistake, for there was no need to cross it while going south. Chambal and Kunwari (Kuwari of the map) are well known rivers. Banas is an off-shoot of Chambal, but here probably river Sindh is meant which the army must have met after Chambal on its southward march. Bhoji is undoubtedly modern Betwa, which flows near Bhilsa and Chanderi.

\(^{37}\) Irij lies 65 miles south-east of Gwalior. It should not be mistaken for Ellichpur.

Also Hodivala pp. 252-53.

\(^{38}\) Prof. Aiyangar was inclined to identify it with Khandar, somewhere in north of Bidar, but on later thought considered it to be Khandwa. But according to Amīr Khusrau when the army left it after a stay of 14 days, it crossed the Narbada. Khandwa lies in south of Narbada and not to its north, and therefore, Khandā cannot be Khandwa. The place is difficult to identify.

\(^{39}\) This place is difficult to identify. It lay somewhere between Daulatabad and Sirpur.
ed by the troops, because they were passing through the territories of the Rai Rayan Ram Deva, an ally of the Sultanate of Delhi. Ram Chandra on his part looked to all the conveniences of the imperial army while they were marching towards Warangal on a path "narrower than a guitar-string and darker than a beauty's lock." He established markets on the way through which the army passed so that the soldiers might buy the necessaries of life for themselves at rates fixed by the Sultan at Delhi. He even reinforced the Muslim army with some of his Maratha forces, and made adequate arrangements for provisions and other necessaries of the advancing forces. He himself went for some distance with Malik Kāfūr, and then returned to Devagiri.

Amir Khusrau gives a list of names of places, now difficult to locate, through which the royal army passed. For certain, it passed through Basirgarh (Wairagarh) which was in the doab of the two rivers Yashr (Basihar) and Buji. On emerging from Devagiri and entering the borders of Telingana Malik Kāfūr began to ravage towns and villages on his way. Before marching straight to Warangal, he invested the fort of Sabar (Sirpur) lying northwards in the kingdom of Telingana. The besieged fought 41 Ferishtāh p. 119.

42 Prof. Hodivala says that there can be little doubt that Basirgarh is a misreading for Bairagarh i.e. Wairagarh. The Alld. Uni. Ms. fol. 40(b) has Bairagarh ببراکر. The town is situated very close to the left bank of the Wain Ganga on a tributary of that river called Kobragari, about 80 miles S.E. of Nagpur.

The names of the two rivers are obviously corrupt. One of them must be a tributary of Wain Ganga or the river itself.

Also see Hodivala p. 254.

43 It is situated 19.32 N. 79.45 E.
valiantly, but unable to resist the terrific onslaught, preferred for their wives and children the consuming flames to dishonour, and for themselves a glorious death on battlefield to abject surrender. The governor (Muqaddam) of the fort was probably killed in action, and his brother called Ananîr by Khusrau, was left in charge of the fort on promise of obedience in future. By January 1310 (Sh'abân 709) the army reached in the vicinity of Warangal. A contingent of a thousand horsemen was detached and sent forward as a reconnoitring party. It took possession of the hill of Hanmuakonda (An-Makinda of Khusrau) from where all the buildings and gardens of Warangal could be seen further south.

The fort of Warangal was made of stone, but it was encircled by a thick earthen wall which was perhaps stronger than the stone edifice itself. Its construction had been begun in the time of Ganapati Deva and was completed by his talented wife, the famous queen Rudramba Devi. It was one of the strongest forts in southern India. Malik Kâfûr twice examined the fortress before he pitched his tents round it, and ordered the commencement of the siege. Amîr Khusrau describes the siege in his usual graphic style. "It was on the 15th of Sh'abân (January 18th, 1310) that Khvâjâ Nașîrulmulk Sirâjuddaula personally arranged the troops with a lighted lamp. Every division was sent to its appointed place in order to surround the fort and to protect the besiegers from the fire of the besieged... Every tuman was assigned one thousand two hundred yards of land; the total circumference of the fort, as enclosed by the tents, was twelve thousand five hundred and forty six yards."44 On the other side brave Rayâs were appointed to all the towers (kangûrâs) of the fort. Stones were collected and those who did not have stones threw down upon the besiegers.

44 Khazain, Habîb Trs. p. 63.
bricks and small scimitars. As the besiegers were reflecting on the way by which the fort, which was surrounded and secured by a ditch all round, could be stormed, Vinayak Deva (Banik Deo of Khusrau) a governor in the kingdom of Telengana, one night attacked the Muslim army from the rear and created consternation in the royal camp. Many soldiers were killed on both sides but finally the Hindus were worsted and the attack proved abortive. Meanwhile Malik Qara Beg, of the left wing, carried on a raid in the neighbourhood and captured some elephants.

The work of filling the moat round the fort was begun with feverish activity. To guard against a sudden attack from the enemy, orders were given to the soldiers to fell trees and construct a barricade. By throwing mud and stones and other things the ditch was filled at one place and the Muslim army could reach the bastions of the fort. Malik Naib called a council of officers, and all the generals unanimously agreed that the construction of pashib for scalings the walls of the fort was a hard task. They decided to engage the enemy in a hand to hand fight before constructing a pashib. By the middle of February a breach in the outer walls was effected by the sinewy “diggers.” After persistent efforts for a whole week the imperial general got possession of the outer fortress of mud and then began the investment of the inner fort of stone, by crossing another ditch that lay between the two lines of fortification.

At Delhi the Sultan was anxiously following the progress of the expedition to Warangal. The posts which had been establish all along from Delhi to Warangal, and through which ‘Alá’uddín used to get intelligence about the royal army, were disorganised obviously owing to enemy activity. Consequently no news about Malik Naib reached the Sultan for more than a month. ‘Alá’uddín in his extreme anxiety sent Qazi Mughíšuddín of Bayana to Shaikh Nizámuddín Aulia, a venerable saint of the day, to request him to prophesy about the success of the army. Nizāmuddīn gave a very encouraging reply by saying that he not only expected success that time but also hoped for further victories in future. The Sultan was overjoyed at the observation of the Saint, and by a strange coincidence of circumtances, the news of Kāfūr’s victory at Warangal reached the capital the same day.⁴⁵

When the siege had been sufficiently prolonged and the condition of the people inside the fortress had become very critical, Pratap Rudra Deva made overtures to Malik Kāfūr with terms of a truce. He promised to present treasures, precious stones, elephants, horses, and other valuable articles and also to send yearly tribute of the same value to Delhi. He also sent a golden image of himself with a golden chain round its neck to symbolise his humility and unconditional surrender. Malik Kāfūr, adhering to the advice of ‘Alāūddīn, demanded of the Rai his entire wealth and threatened a general massacre of the population of the city if he was found keeping anything hidden for himself.
Rudra Deva finding himself helpless consented to the terms of the treaty forced upon him, and surrendered all the treasures which had been accumulated during the course of many generations. According to Baranī, Pratap Rudra Deva gave 100 elephants,⁴⁶ 7000 horses and other precious articles and promised to send an equal amount of tribute in future years.⁴⁷ Among the precious stones which the Rai surrendered was the famous Koh-i-Nūr, which according to many later writers, including Khafi Khan, was brought by Malik Kāfūr from the Deccan.⁴⁸

⁴⁵ Baranī pp. 330-32.
⁴⁶ Firishtah p. 119 has 300 elephants.
⁴⁷ Baranī p. 330. According to Khusrau the money promised by the Rai was 10,000,000,000 rupees; but this is only an imaginary figure.
⁴⁸ See Lane Poole: Aurangzeb p. 150. Travernier’s
Now, in spite of the exaggerated accounts of Baranī and Khusrau with regard to the terms of the treaty, the inner fortress never seems to have capitulated to the Muslim invader; nor did Pratap Rudra himself go to make submission to Malik Kāfūr. Only his envoys, who went to settle the terms of the treaty, bowed before the royal canopy. 40  ’Iṣāmī also says that after the settlement of peace terms a robe of honour embroidered with jewels was sent to Rudra Deva inside the fort. 50

By the middle of March, 1310, Malik Kāfūr returned towards the north through Devagiri, Dhar and Jhain. So enormous was the booty captured by him that a thousand camels “groaned under the weight” of the treasures. Before he arrived in Delhi the news of his victory had already reached the Sultan. On receipt of the intelligence of the victory festivities were held and the happy tidings of the success were read from the pulpits of the mosques. The victorious Vazīr was received in a decorated darbar under a black pavilion before the Chabutra-Nāşiri on 24th Muḥarram 710 (June 23rd, 1310). 51 The treasures brought from the Deccan were displayed before the Sultan, who was greatly pleased with his favourite general and rewarded him generously.

49 Khazain., Habīb Trs. pp. 74-75.
50 Futūḥ p. 283.

51 Allahabad University Ms. (fol. 56) has Zilq’ada 710 A.H. which is equivalent to March-April 1310. The date given above from Prof. Habīb’s translation of the Khazain seems more correct as Kāfūr must have taken one or two months to reach Delhi.
CHAPTER XIII
THE FAR SOUTH
DWARSAMUDRA AND M’ABAR

On return from Warangal Malik Kāfūr had many a thing to tell about the Deccan. He had been well acquainted with the peninsular India and apprised the Sultan of the rich kingdoms lying farther south—the kingdoms of Dwarsamudra and M’abar. He told ‘Alā’ūdīn that while he was in Warangal he had heard that the king of M’abar possessed 500 large elephants, and expressed a keen desire to lead an expedition into that far off kingdom. Alā’ūdīn was more eager than his Vazīr to see his banner unfurled in the remotest corners of India, and had already determined to send Malik Naib at the head of another expedition. The motive of the despatch of the expedition appears to be the same as that of the two previous ones, namely, the possession of treasures and elephants; but Amīr Khusrū says that “now with a sincere motive” the emperor thought of sending an expedition to the south “so that the light of the shari‘at may reach there.”

On the 24th of Jamadiul-Ākhir 710 (20th November 1310) Malik ‘Izzuddaulah Naib-Barbak Kāfūr started with a large army towards M’abar, which lay on the sea and which was “so far from Delhi that a man travelling with an expedition can only reach it after a journey of twelve

1 Khazain. Habīb Trs. p. 80.
2 Habīb’s Trs. of Khazain has 26th of Jamadul Ākhīr Elliot’s and Alld. Uni.’s Mss. have 24th. Baranī simply says “by the end of the year 710 A.H. months.” The army marched southwards by the bank of Jumna and halted at Tankal or Natgal, a village on the river. They halted there for a fortnight and when all the soldiers had arrived and got enrolled they resumed their march southwards. They traversed difficult roads and arrived at a place named Kaithun after which they crossed Narbada and two other rivers smaller than that. At the end of this march the imperial commander received envoys of Pratap Rudra Deva, who had sent twenty three elephants as a present for the Sultan. The army halted at Gurgam (Khargon) where a muster of troops was held and the elephants of the king of Telingana were sent to Delhi. The river Tavi (Tapti) was crossed and Devagiri was reached on the 13th of Ramzan 710 (February 4th, 1311). Here Malik Kāfūr halted for some days to obtain spears and arrows and other weapons of war “for overthrowing Bilal Deo and other deos (demons).”

According to Baranī when Malik Naib reached Devagiri Ram Deva had died. Ferishtah follows Baranī in this statement. But the statements of Amir Khusrau and 3 The village is not traceable on the maps now available. Baranī, however, suggests the same route as selected on previous occasion and says that Malik Naib first marched to Rewari and then went straight to Devagiri.

---

4 Kaithun or Kanhūr has been identified by Prof. Aiyangar with Kanhūn in Rajputana, “a little aside of the road from Ujjain to Delhi”. Invaders, p. 101.

5 Prof. Aiyangar first identified Gurgam with Kharegam of the maps a little way S.W. of Indore (Invaders, p. 101) and then was inclined to place it somewhere between Burhanpur and Tapti and left the exact situation undecided. (Introduction to the Trs. of Khazain p. xxx.). Prof. Hođivala thinks it to be Khargon which lies on the Kundi river, a tributary of Narbada in 21.50 N 75.37 E. He gives the names of numerous writers of medieval period who have referred to this town. Hođivala, p. 256.

6 Baranī p. 333.
‘Īsāmī point to the fact that Ram Deva was living when Kāfür passed Devagiri en route to Dwarsamudra. Khusrau describes in detail the help rendered by the Yadava king to the Imperial general. ‘Īsāmī also says that Ram Chandra was invited to Delhi by ‘Alāūdīn in prince Khizr Khan’s marriage with the daughter of Alp Khan, and the latter attended it. This marriage was performed on the 23rd of Ramzan 711 A.H. (February 4th, 1312). It is obvious, therefore, that Ram Deva died some time after this event. Moreover at another place Firishtah himself says that Malik Naib was sent to the Deccan again in 712 A.H. (1312 A.D.) because Singhana Deva had assumed independence in the life-time of his father. It is clear, therefore, that Ram Deva was alive at the time of the expedition to Dwarsamudra and died some time in 1312 A.D.

Rai Rayan Ram Deva helped the Muslim general in every possible way. He ordered that everything needed by the imperial army should be placed in the market, a thing he had done at the time of the invasion of Warangal. Amir Khusrau says that the Hindus did not quarrel with the Muslim soldiers, nor did the latter create any trouble, and the transactions in the market were carried on peacefully. Ram Deva deputed Parasuram Deva (Paras Deo Delvi), his commander-in-chief on the southern frontier, to help the Muslim army on its southward march. Parasuram rendered all help and assistance in the conquest of “Bir and Dhur Samandar.” Malik Kāfür left the Amanabād of Devagiri for the Kharabād of Paras Deva. They travelled on hills and in dales and crossed streams “some roaring, others softly melodious.” In five stages they reached the bor-

---

7 Futūḥ p. 316.

8 Khazain. The Allahabad University Ms. fol. 61(b). ders of the Hoysalas after crossing rivers Godavari, Sini and Bhima.⁹

While Kāfūr was marching into the capital of the Hoysalas, king Ballāla III had gone father south with his force.
It has been mentioned before that Mārāvarman Kulasekhara had two sons Sundara Pandya and Vīra Pandya. Vīra was very much liked by the king and was nominated as his successor. Sundara Pandya could not tolerate such open favouritism. In a paroxym of rage he killed his father and crowned himself at Mardi (Madura).¹⁰ This unfilial act resulted in a bloody warfare between the two brothers.
With the help of his cousin, Vīrā Pandya defeated Sundara, who fled northwards and begged assistance form Alāūddin at Delhi or from his general Kāfūr who was then present in the Deccan.¹¹ It was this unsettled condition which had prompted Vīra Ballāla III to march with an army and gain by the disaffection of the two brothers. Just then the news of the invasion of his own territories by the Muhammadans fell upon his ears like a thunderbolt. He hastened to protect his own country not to speak of invading another’s.
Kāfūr had learnt at Bandri¹² about everything that was happening in the southern kingdoms of the Hoysalas and the Pandyas. He held a council of war and working according to its deliberations started with 10,000 chosen horses on 23rd Ramzan (February 14th, 1311) and crossing hills and torrents appeared before the citadel of Dwarsamudra¹³ (Dhur

⁹ The position in the text is transposed. Therein the rivers are given: "Sini, Godavari and Bhinur (Bhima)".
¹⁰ Aiyangar, p. 97.
¹¹ Vāṣṣāf, p. 531.
¹² Prof. Aiyangar identifies Bandri with Pandharpur and adds that it seems to have been then a frontier station between the Yadava and Hoysala dominions. (Invaders, p. 102.)
¹³ Two records dated probably 1310-11 A.D. refer to a Hassan Taluq nos. 51 and 52.
Samandar of Khusrau) on Thursday, 5th Shavval, 710 (February 25th, 1311). Vira Ballāla, who had returned to the capital in time, sought the advice of his commanders and ministers at a time of such dire distress. They unanimously exhorted him to fight rather than to submit. It would be impossible to re-establish the prestige of the kingdom, they argued, after the shock of a humiliating peace. Seeing the Hoysala prince in distress Vira Pandya also sent an army to reinforce Ballāla’s forces, but the latter was pessimistic from the very beginning. He fought short skirmishes but refrained from giving a final engagement to the invaders. In the meantime he sent one Gaisu Mal to “find out the strength and the circumstances of the Muslim army.” Having come to know that the enemy was a tough fighter and rulers like Ram Chandra and Praṭap Rudra had submitted to him, he sued for peace. According to Amīr Khusrau one Balak Deva Nayak accompanied by plenipotentiaries visited the camp of Malik Naib and offered submission to Kāfūr. Malik Kāfūr’s terms were clear. “The order of the Caliph (i.e. ‘Alā‘uddīn) concerning Bilal Deo and all other Rais is this: First I am to place before them the two negatives of the oath of affirmation. May be, their hearts may be illuminated. But if...they fail to see the light, I am to offer them the alternative of having the yoke of tribute (Zimma) put on their necks. If they reject this also and refuse to pay tribute, then I will simply relieve their necks of the burden of their head.”¹⁴ Ballāl Deva accepted the second alternative and promised to send an yearly tribute. Much treasure, which was taken out from the cells for a whole night, and a number of large elephants were presented to the imperial commander.¹⁵ Vira Ballāla came in person to Malik Kāfūr and made his submission.

¹⁴ Khazain. Habib Trs. p. 91.
¹⁵ Barani says that Malik Kafur captured 36 elephants and all the treasures of Dwarsamudra.
After the settlement of the peace terms Malik Naib stayed at Dwarsamudra for a week after which he asked Ballāla Deva to lead him on the way towards M’abar, a way with which the royal commander was completely unacquainted. The defeated Hoysala chief had but to agree to what the victorious general said, and prepared to lead Malik Kāfūr towards the destruction of a sister state.\footnote{Embassy from Persia (1310-11).}

At the time when Malik Kāfūr was carrying fire and sword into the south, an embassy from the Ilkhan Sultan Aljaitu Khuda Banda of Persia reached the court of ‘Alāʾūddin. The message they brought from their suzerain was that the sultans of Delhi had always been on good terms with the Mughal Khāqans, Chaghtai and Oqtai. But it appeared strange that since the accession of Aljaitu, Sultan ‘Alāʾūddin had neither sent any congratulatory message nor any communication to cement old relations of friendship. It was time that the old friendship should be revived.\footnote{In that message Aljaitu also suggested, in very sweet words, that a daughter of the sultan of India may be given in marriage to the ruling Ilkhan of Persia. ‘Alāʾūddin, who by now possessed vast treasures and who had made unprecedented conquests in north and south, considered the marriage proposal of Aljaitu as a deliberate insult to his dignity and imprisoned all the eighteen persons that comprised the embassy. His temper was not soothed simply by imprisoning these people; he later on ordered them to be crushed under the feet of the elephants. By such flagrant undiplo-
}

\footnote{Embassy from Persia (1310-11).}
mantic act, says Vassäf, he threw "the pearl of his good name into the river of Nile." 18

March towards M'abar (1311).

From Dwarsamudra Käfur started for M'abar 19 on the 18th Shavväl 710 (10th March, 1311). According to the author of Futûhus Salâtîn the vanquished Hoysala now accompanied Malik Käfur on his expedition into the far south, and guided the path of the imperial general in an unknown country. The land through which the royal army marched was very unpropitious and hilly so much so that "the pointed stones tore the horse's hoofs;" and every night the soldiers slept on ground "more uneven than a camel's back." After five laborious marches they reached the frontier of M'abar. According to 'Išâmi a reconnaissance party consisting of great generals like Bahram Kara, Katla Nihang, Mahashed Sartiha and Abaji Mughal was attached with the royal forces. Every day one of these five commanders used to go in advance with a few persons who knew the language of that country, and used to bring news to the imperial commander about the affairs in the enemy territory. Suddenly Abaji Mughal thought of deserting the royal army and taking service under the Rai of M'abar. He even thought of killing Malik Käfur. He settled with some people that they would take him to the Rai of M'abar and secure for him an 18 This incident has only been mentioned in Vassäf (p. 528). No Indian historian refers to it. But since it concerns the affairs of Persia, Vassäf should be relied upon. Indian historians may have overlooked such a petty incident while describing the brilliant victories of Malik Käfur in the Deccan.

19 Pandya country was known to the Muhammadans by the name of M'abar. It extended from Quilon to Nellor, nearly 300 farsangs along the sea coast.
honourable job there. But as he was marching ahead of the main army his troops came in conflict with a detachment of the M'abar army. Abaji confused and perplexed, hurriedly retreated and joined Kāfūr. When the imperial general came to know of these developments he put Abaji in chains and continued to proceed onward.\(^\text{20}\)

The army marched on, and on crossing the two passes Tarmali\(^\text{21}\) and Tabar (Toppur) they arrived in the city of Mardi, the inhabitants of which place were massacred. Then starting from the river Kanobari they advanced to BIRDHUL.\(^\text{22}\) At the approach of the Muslim army the Rai of the place, VīRA Pandya, fled towards Kandur (identified with Kannanur).\(^\text{23}\) But he did not feel secure and fled even from there towards the jungles. Malik Kāfūr was all the time chasing the Rai wherever he went. About 20,000 Musalmans of south India, who had fought on the side of the Hindus, now deserted to the imperialists and were \(^{20}\) When Kāfūr returned to Delhi after his victory in M'abar Abaji Mughal was beheaded by the orders of the king. Futūḥ, pp. 288-91.

\(^{21}\) Elliot has Sarmali; the Allahabad University Ms. has Talmali. It is difficult to identify it now.

\(^{22}\) Prof. Aiyangar thinks it to be the headquarters of VīRA (Bir) Pandya. Yule (Ser Marco Polo, II, p. 319) on the authority of A. Burnell suggests that it is Virachellam of the maps, which is in south Arcot and about fifty miles north of Tanjore. Abul Feda in Taqrīmul Buldān also calls Birdaval as the capital of the country of M'abar (Alqal Qāshindi pp. 38-9). There are old and well known temples there, and relics of fortifications. It is a rather famous place of pilgrimage. But place names like Birdhul, Jalkota, Sarmali and Kham are corrupt and difficult to identify.

\(^{23}\) Kannanur lies about 8 miles north of Trichnopoly town and was the Hoysala capital in the Chola country. For a detailed discussion about its identification see Aiyangar: Invaders p. 72 and Hodivala p. 257.
spared. With the help of these people the army tried to know the whereabouts of the flying king, but severe rains compelled them to fall back upon Birdhul. The chase of the fugitive, however, was not given up and the army restarted from Birdhul in his pursuit. "Torrents of rain fell from above and the army passed through places completely covered with water." Intelligence was brought that the Rai had fled to the city of Kandur. The imperial army dashed towards the town but Vira Pandya had fled even from there. Malik Kafur laid hand upon 120 elephants on which he found some treasure also. In fact the real aim of Malik Kafur was to destroy his enemy Vira Pandya than to help his friend Sundara. In vain, however, did he massacre the people of Kandur for the Rai had long before fled from that place. It was thought that he had fled towards Jat Kutna.

Malik Naib marched in that direction but thorny forests forbade any persistent pursuit, and he again returned to Kandur where he searched for more elephants and treasure. Meanwhile they had learnt much about the temples and treasures of the places lying in the vicinity of Kandur. They came to know that at Barmatpuri (Brahmapuri) there 24 Describing the first expedition of Devagiri in 1296 Barani says that before that time the people of the south had never heard of the Musalmans. He says (p. 222).

---

لخچ دیوگیر ورتی از اوگات ی از زمان ملک ی خبر اسلام
نشنیده و هیچ گزی زمان مرحوم را یکنیزی نماییده

But this is incorrect. The fact that Kafur was joined by some Muslim subjects of the Hindu king clearly shows that at Kannanur near Srirangam there was a settlement of Muhammadans. Muhammadans had come to south India as peaceful traders long before they had penetrated into north India as invaders.

25 The Allahabad University Ms. has Jalkota. Prof. Aiyangar suggests that it can mean a water fortress, or an island protected by deep waters round it. Invaders, p. 111.

26 See Appendix B.
was a golden temple and that the elephants of the Rai had collected there. The temple was raided and 250 elephants were captured. The temple, like “the paradise of Shaddād, which after being lost, those ‘hellites’ had found” or the “Golden Lanka of Ram”, was assaulted and its idol Lingi-Mahadeva was broken. The foundations of this golden temple, which for centuries had been the object of worship of the Hindus were dug up. “The swords flashed where jewels had once been sparkling...and the heads of the Brahmans and idol-worshippers came dancing from their necks to their feet at the flashes of the sword”.

Such is the poetic description of the destruction of the golden temple of Brahmastpuri (Chidambaram). The temple of Srirangam was also sacked, since all the temples near Kannanur (Kandur) were sacked, and this presumption is confirmed in a work called Koyiloluhi. The book is a record of gifts made, and repairs effected, to the temple of Sriranganatha in Srirangam. It is written in Tamil prose and gives almost a continuous thread of south Indian chronology from the 13th to the 16th century A.D. Its evidence is based on inscriptions on copper and stone and it forms a great source of historical value. This book mentions that at the time of the sack of Srirangam, obviously under Malik Naib, it was under the charge of Arya Bhattas or northern Brahmans. They were overpowered and all the wealth of the temple including the idol of the god was taken away by the Muḥammadans. There was a woman who did not take her food without having darshan of the idol every day. She followed on the skirt of the retreating army in guise of a mendicant and ultimately reached Delhi. There the idol of Ranganatha was given to a princess of the royal 27 Khazain. Habib Trs. pp. 103-05.

---

28 Ind. Ant. 1911 pp. 131-44. Article on Koyiloluhi by K. V. Subrahmanya.
household because she had taken a fancy for it. The woman finding the idol in safe custody returned to Srirangam. From there some people, under the guidance of the woman, went to Delhi, pleased the Sultan with their music, and brought the idol back. But the princess was not prepared to part with it; and the idol had been returned to the south- erners only without her knowledge. She marched to the Deccan under an escort to seize the idol. It was at Tirupati that the people bearing the idol heard that the princess and her escort were following them. Not feeling safe the party broke up, leaving the idol in charge of three men, a father, his son, and the latter's maternal uncle. The fear of Muslim army made the three Hindus hide in a glen under an unfrequented hill. The princess, however, marched straight on to Srirangam and finding the temple deserted died of a broken heart. Sixty years passed. The father and the uncle died and the son grew up to be an old man of eighty. Feeling his end drawing near he showed himself to some hill-folk and told them the long story of how he was there. By then the power of the Hindu kingdom of Vijayanagar had been sufficiently established and the idol was re-installed in the temple of Srirangam in 1370-71.

This romantic story is described about one single temple, but a very large number of them were destroyed and their wealth looted by Kāfūr. The temples of Birdhul to which the army marched from Brahmastpuri were also thoroughly sacked. The destruction wrought by Malik Kāfūr can well be imagined from the fact that in search of Vira Pandya the Muslim army went from place to place, and to some places many times over, and in their disappointment and rage at not finding the fugitive wherever they went, they destroyed edifices and killed people mercilessly.

29 Aiyangar, pp. 113-16.
30 In Deval Rani also Khusrau dwells at length upon the destruction of various temples in M'abar. (Deval Rani
The royal army marched on. On the 15th of Zilq'ada (April 16th, 1311) they arrived in the city of Kum (Elliot: Kham), and after some days they reached Madura, where Vira was supposed to live. The Rai along with his family and treasures had fled away from there again and only two or three elephants were left in the temple of Jagnar (rather Sokkanatha). Kāfūr’s disappointment was terrible and in his impotent rage he set fire to it. By now his patience had been exhausted. He had relentlessly searched the Rai for weeks and months; in towns, in jungles and in hills, but everywhere in vain; and now finding that he had become master of so much wealth and had captured so many elephants, he decided to march back. Before marching homewards he ordered all the spoils to be arranged and classified. His gains consisted of 512 elephants (Barani has 612), 5000 horses of pp. 70-73). The temples were reservoirs of effluence and wealth. Hindu Rajas and other rich people presented them with gold and jewels and endowed villages for the maintenance of their establishments. Thus wealth multiplied in a temple without being spent on a large scale. The result was that whenever the Muslims attacked a place they sacked its temples in particular for despoiling them of their wealth. But in the rage of warfare fanaticism was naturally fanned and besides looting the wealth of the temple the invaders destroyed the very edifices and often threw their stones and idols at such places as could be trampled under the feet of the Musalmans.

31 Probably Kadambavanam, a city now in ruins but remains of old fortifications exist. The particular locality now a days is called Kadambar Malai and lies about 11 miles from Pudukotta along the Trichonopoly road.

32 Aiyangar (p. 100) contends the interpretation of Elliot that Jagnath is Jagannath or it was a temple dedicated to Jagannath or Vishnu. He says that Jagnar is a corruption of Sokkanath, which is an alternative name of Shiva or Sundresh, the patron deity of the town of Madura. The great temple of Sundeshvara is still a beautiful edifice in the town. See Khazain. Trans. Into. p. xxxii.

Hodivala p. 257.
various breeds like 'Arabi, Yamani and Syrian (Barani has 20,000 horses, 96,000 mans of gold), and 500 mans of jewellery of every description. With these rewards of his enterprise he broke his camp on Sunday the 4th Zilhijja (April 25th, 1311) to the extreme joy of everybody. They marched towards Delhi on the same rough paths on which they had marched down to the conquest of the south. They arrived in Delhi after an arduous journey of six months. Sultan 'Alā-ūdīn accorded a deserving reception to his victorious general and his troops. He held a Durbar in the palace of Hazār Situn in Sīrī on the 4th of Jamadus šani 711 A.H. (Monday, October 18th, 1311 A.D.) , where Malik Kāfūr presented before the Sultan all he had brought from the Deccan. Such was the wealth captured in south, says Barani, that since the capture of Delhi by the Muḥammadans at no time had so much treasure been seized. On such occasions 'Alā-ūdīn did not fail to exhibit his generosity. He gave four, two, one and half a man gold to his nobles and Amīrs.

33 Khazain, p. 106. Khusrav does not exaggerate. Both Vassāf and Marco Polo bear testimony to the fact that from places like Qatif, Lahsa, Bahrain and Hormuz, a very large number of horses were imported into M'abar. Since the southerners did not give them proper diet, but dressed gram and milk, they died soon, and new ones were imported (Vassāf p. 302). Marco says about M'abar: “Here are no horses bred; and thus a great part of the wealth of the country is wasted in purchasing horses.....merchants of Kis and Hormuz.....and Aden collect great number of destriers and other horses” and bring them to M'abar (Yule: Ser Marco Polo, II, p. 324).

The Hindus did not know cross-breeding which had been a secret art of the Arabs. That is why they had always to import good-breed horses.

34 Khazain, Trs. pp. 105-7.

35 Khazain, Trs. p, 180 has 14th of Jamadius Sani, which is a slip because 14th was not Monday but Thursday. Elliot’s and the Allahabad University Mss. have 4th of Jamad, which is correct.
Ballāla Deva had accompanied Malik Kāführ to Delhi. The Hoysala prince, after escorting Kāführ on his march to M’abar and helping in its speedy destruction, had accompanied Kāführt to Delhi. The sultan was very much pleased with Ballāla’s assistance and loyalty. He gave him a special robe of honour, a crown and chattr and also presented him with a purse of ten lac of tankahs. The Hoysala chief stayed at Delhi for some time and then came back to Dwaramudra, his territories having been restored by the Sultan.

It is strange indeed that Amīr Khusrau and Baranī, while describing the scence of the special reception arranged for Malik Naib Kāführ, do not make mention of Ballāla Deva, who must have been an important figure there. But Isāmi describes how Ballāla was received by Ālāūddin.36 That this prince also visited Delhi, as the Yadava Ram Chandra had done a couple of years back, is corroborated by an inscription, the translation of which reads: “When the Pratapa—Chakravartti Hoyisana Vira—Ballāla Devarasa was ruling a peaceful kingdom” . . . the Turkish invasion occurred, Ballāla went to Delhi, and on the occasion of his coming back from there (date specified May 6, 1313) “he released the taxes old and new . . . . etc.”37

The Third Expedition to Devagiri (1313).

Next year (712-13 A.H.; 1312-13 A.D.) Malik Kāführ was once more appointed to march into the Deccan. Ram Deva, the oldest and most faithful ally of Sultan Ālāūddin, had died some time in the year 1312 and was succeeded by his son. Ever since the Muslims had penetrated into the Deccan Singhana had been their avowed enemy. After the humiliating submission of his father in 1296 came another catastrophe, and Deval

36 Futūh p. 290.
Rani, his betrothed, was snatched away from him. This latter event rekindled the flame of animosity in Singhana’s heart. So great was his resentment that, if ‘Iṣāmī is to be believed, even Ram Chandra was compelled to request ‘Alāūddīn to help him in controlling Singhana against assuming open hostility to the Delhi government. In 1312 or 1313 Singhana succeeded to the throne after the death of his father, and as could well be expected he stopped all connections with the sultanate and began to rule independently.

Mean while Raja Pratap Rudra of Telingana, who had either been too much frightened or was unflinchingly true to his plighted troth, sent a score of elephants and a letter to ‘Alāūddīn stating therein that he was prepared to pay the yearly tribute he had promised to whomsoever the emperor appointed for the purpose. Malik Naib Kāfūr, who according to Ferishtah, was afraid of, and inimical to, the Malka-i-Jahān and her son Khizr Khan, requested the Sultan to send him to the Deccan to receive the tribute. He also promised to punish the refractory Singhana and clear the Deccan of disaffected elements. ‘Alāūddīn consented to the proposal of Malik Naib and appointed him to govern Devagiri after crushing the insolent Yadava prince.

Once again did Malik Kāfūr march into the Deccan crushing right and left any prince who raised his head. First of all he marched to Devagiri and engaged Singhana in a terrible battle. The valiant Maratha, who all his life was opposed to acknowledging the suzerainty of Delhi, could not

---

38 Futūḥ p. 274.
39 Ferishtah p. 122. Also Barani (p. 334). Khusrau does not mention anything about it because Khazainul Futūḥ had been completed in 711 and this event came off later.
40 Ferishtah p. 122.
41 Futūḥ p. 326.
stand the tempo of the attack and was killed in action. ‘Iṣāmī’ s statement that the prince evacuated Devagiri without giving a battle lends itself to great doubt because Singhana was never heard of again so long as Malik Naib remained in the Deccan. Even after Kāfūr’s return to Delhi, Harpal Deva, son-in-law of Ram Deva, and not Singhana is mentioned as the ruler of Devagiri.

Having retaken the Yadava territories Malik Naib attacked a few other cities far and near in the territories of Telengana and Hoysala, and inspired such terror into the hearts of the Deccanies that even the last remnants of opposition to the Delhi government were wiped out. When everybody had submitted Malik Kāfūr returned to Devagiri and fixed his headquarters there, and it was on account of his integrity and strength that the prestige and power of the sultanate were ever felt in Deccan until the death of the Sultan.\(^{42}\) Malik Naib sent some years’ tribute from Telengana and Carnatic kingdoms to the capital. He remained in the Deccan until about 1315 when ‘Alāūd din, who had fallen seriously ill, called him back to Delhi.\(^{43}\)

\(^{42}\) An inscription of ‘Alāūd din Khalji has been found in a village called Nalatward in the Muddebihal Taluka of the Bijapur district. It is dated 715 A.H. (1315-16 A.D.) and its language and epithets used for the king are the same as those used at Delhi in contemporary inscriptions. (Arch. Sur Rep. 1929-30 p. 190). The inscription is published and translated in the Epig. Indo-Moslemica 1927-28 pp. 16-17.

\(^{43}\) Barani does not mention this expedition to the south, but while describing the events of last days of ‘Alāūd din he says that when the emperor fell seriously ill he called Malik Naib from the Deccan and Alp Khan from Gujarat (p. 368). This proves that in 1314-15 Malik Kāfūr was in the Deccan and must have gone there some time before. ‘Iṣāmī, however, writes about the death of Ram Deva, about Singhana’s (whom he always calls Bhilam) recalcitrance, and about Malik Naib’s going to the Deccan and curbing all the refractory element there including the newly crowned king of Devagiri. (Futūḥ Causes of the success of 'Alā'ī Expeditions.

The various invasions of Malik Kāfūr, for the time being, destroyed peaceful conditions in the Deccan peninsula. All the prominent kingdoms of the south—the Yadava, the Kākātiya, the Hoysala and the Pandya—succeeded to his terrible onslaughts. Incalculable wealth was carried off to the north and places and shrines venerated by the Hindus for centuries were desecrated, looted and razed to the ground. Perhaps nowhere during his march did Kāfūr meet a really tough resistance.

The causes of the success of the royal army in the Deccan are not far to seek. The southern kingdoms of Devagiri, Telengana, Hoysala and the Pandya, like the Rajput states of the north, were constantly fighting against one another.44 When 'Alā'ūddin had marched to Devagiri in 1296, Singhana Deva had gone towards the Hoysala frontiers with his forces; when Kāfūr marched against the Hoysala country, its king Ballāla Deva was absent in farther south trying to snatch a portion of the Pandya country; and the two princes Sundra Pandya and Vira Pandya were constantly fighting with each other. Not only that, in place of uniting and helping one another in face of a foreign foe they assisted the invaders against their own neighbours. Thus Ram Chandra helped Malik Kāfūr in the conquest of Telengana and Vira Ballāla escorted the imperial army farther south in M'abar. Sundara Pandya even begged Malik 44 See also Aʿījāz-i-Khusravī Vol. I p. 18, and Vol. II p. 175.

Kāfūr’s assistance against his step-brother and proved to be a source of untold misery to his own countrymen.

The defeat of the southern princes was not wholly due to their disunity. The army of ‘Alā‘uddin, on account of his various military reforms, was efficient, well-equipped and organised. The sultan, moreover, had particularly instructed Malik Naib to be generous and considerate to his men in a far off and unfamiliar land. The Turk was a tough fighter and in him were combined zeal for religion and greed for plunder. In discipline, strategy, and tactics the northerners were far superior to the southern armies. Even in physical prowess the soldiers of the south could not be a match to those of the north. Marco Polo bears testimony to the poor quality of the soldiers of south India in the 12th and 13th centuries. “The people of the country”, says he “go to the battle all naked, with only a lance and a shield, and are most wretched soldiers . . . .” The traveller continues to say that they were mostly vegetarians, ate rice and were very orthodox people. They were more particular about regular baths and untouchability than about fighting.

This may be said to be a very harsh estimate of the soldiers of the south, yet there is no doubt that they could not successfully fight the armies who used to put the Mongols to flight. Moreover ‘Alā‘uddin never meant to annex the far-off land beyond the Vindhayas. For him his southern expeditions were financial ventures. His mobile forces swooped down upon the southern kingdoms, denuded them of their wealth and then came back triumphantly.

---

45 There is one happy instance in this dark picture where the Pandya prince Vira sent a detachment to reinforce the army of Ballāla Deva, when the latter was fighting Malik Kāfūr.

47 Futūḥ p. 275.
Nature of Deccan Conquest.

By an irony of circumstance Deccan has proved an effective stepping stone for many a general and prince. ‘Alā-ūddin, Mahābat Khan, Shahjahān and Aurangzeb all began their careers in the Deccan. Similarly Kāfūr’s campaigns in the south have immortalized his name in the history of the Sultanate period. Vassāf does not exaggerate when he says that the brilliant achievements of Kāfūr in the Deccan eclipsed the victories of Maḥmūd of Ghazna in Hindustan.48 Really speaking the motives behind the campaigns of Kāfūr in the south were the same as those of Maḥmūd in the north. It was the fabulous wealth of the Deccan, above everything else, that prompted him to invade the kingdoms beyond the Vindhya; and in securing the treasures of Warangal Malik Naib took possession of all possible wealth—“Everything that the Rai’s country possessed...... even the last nail in the fort”.

When all the wealth which could possibly be obtained in the Deccan was captured, there was no use annexing the kingdoms to, and inviting fresh troubles for, the Sultanate of Delhi. The constant and repeated wars in Rajputana had brought home to ‘Alā-ūddin the disadvantages of an annexationist policy. He was not prepared to repeat his mistakes of Rajputana in the Deccan. Moreover, the conquest of the south was never complete. No doubt the wealth of Devagiri, Warangal, Dwarsamudra and M’abar was looted or obtained through terms of treaties, yet neither Singhana, nor Pratap Rudra Deva accepted complete defeat. Singhana made constant efforts to regain independence and there is great doubt if the fort of Warangal ever capitulated. The Hoy- sala prince no doubt was completely defeated and he surrendered all wealth to save his sacred thread (zunnār), but Vira Pandya ever avoided a pitched battle with Kāfūr, who only ravaged Pandya country without being able to defeat its king. In these circumstances the annexation of these kingdoms would have proved a liability to the Delhi sultanate. Moreover the difficulties of Muḥammad Tughlaq clearly show that it was not at all safe to annex the Deccan. But even without annexation ‘Alāūddin’s ambition was fulfilled. Great kings like Ram Chandra and Ballāla Deva came to Delhi, they paid their respects personally to the sovereign, their treasures were taken away. The glory of the empire was enhanced and the treasury of the state was filled with the wealth of the Deccan.

48 Vassāf p. 527.

Malik Kāfür’s success in the Deccan was short lived. The third invasion of the Yadava kingdom by Malik Naib, his raids into many towns of other kingdoms like Telingana and Carnatic, and his fixing his headquarters at Devagiri clearly show that as soon as the victorious armies of the north used to turn their backs upon the vanquished kingdoms of the south, the latter used to assume an attitude of indifference if not of open hostility towards the sultanate of Delhi. The result was that when Malik Kāfür was called to Delhi towards the close of ‘Alāūddin’s reign, Deccan was again seething with disaffection and it was left to Mubarak Khalji and Muḥammad Tughlaq to reconquer south India once again.

Extent of ‘Alāūddin’s Empire.

It would be proper to conclude this chapter with a survey of ‘Alāūddin’s empire. On the north-west, river Indus may roughly be taken as the boundary line of the Indian empire. Beyond the Indus the land was constantly disputed between the Mongols and the Indians.\(^{49}\) Deopalpur was in the charge of Ghazi Malik, Multan and Sivistan were first under Zafar Khan and later under Malik Kāfür. In northern India the whole tract of land now comprised of the Punjab, Sindh and the United Provinces was under the direct control of the Central government. The various states of Rajputana could never be completely conquered and may conveniently be classified under tributary kingdoms. On the east Turkish empire does not seem to have extended beyond Benares and Jaunpur (Sarju). Bihar and Bengal were ruled by Harasimha and Shamsuddin Firoz respectively, both independent of the Sultanate of Delhi. The portions now comprising of Orissa and the Eastern States Agency were not visited by any Muslim army of 'Ala‘uddin or of his predecessors. Most of Central India with important places like Chanderi, Ellichpur, Dharnagri, Ujjain and Mandu were under direct control of governors appointed by the central government. Gujarat was a province of the empire and was ably governed by Alp Khan till the last years of 'Ala‘uddin. Yadava, Hoysala, and Kākatiya kingdoms were tributaries. They were not occupied by Muslim governors, with the partial exception of Devagiri where Kafūr established his headquarters for some time. Beyond Dwarsamudra Malik Kafūr carried on predatory raids but the Pandya princes never acknowledged Muslim suzerainty and never paid any tribute.

\(^{49}\) Vide Chapter XI.

50 Vide Chapter X. Barani (p. 323) says that some provinces like Ranthambhor, Chittor, Mandalghar (Mandalkher in Chittor) and Jalor came under the control of provincial governors and iqta‘dārs (obviously both Hindu and Muslim).

51 Vide Chapter VII.

52 Vide Chapter XVIII.

53 Vide Chapter XIII.
CHAPTER XIV
ADMINISTRATION

In the Sultanate of Delhi the Sultan was the apex of the administrative machinery. He was the commander-in-chief of royal forces and was the supreme judicial and executive authority. He was the leader of his co-religionists (Amīrul Mauminīn). The character of government was autocratic.

According to most of the jurists and historians the Imām or Khalīfā was the head of the Muslims. He was the defender and maintainer of the faith, “the protector of the territory of Islam, the supreme judge of the state, and the chief organiser and administrator of the commonwealth”.1 Since the Caliph was the head of the Muslim state his authority was acknowledged in far-off lands ruled by Muslim monarchs. The early Sultans of Delhi, like Iltutmish, professed to derive their position, privileges, and status from him. Such was the awe and reverence associated with the name of Khalīfā that the name of Al Musta’sim Billah continued to be inscribed on the coins of Jalāluddīn Khaljī till the year 1296, although the above named Khalīfā had been murdered by the Mughals in 1258.2

The sultan of Delhi, working upon the model of the Abba-sid Caliphs, attempted to propagate and protect the true

---
1 Ahkāmus Sultanīyah, pp. 3 and 16. Cited in Qureshi: The Administration of the Sultanate of Delhi, p. 23.
2 Khālid bin Shahin uz Zahīrī, a writer of the 15th century, says that no king of the east or the west can hold the title of sultan unless there be a covenant between him and the Khālifā. Arnold: Caliphate p. 101-102.
religion by conquest, by an efficient system of administration, and by extention of justice to high and low. Thus in theory, the powers of the sultan of Delhi were very extensive indeed. For his actions he was responsible only to God, whose viceregent on earth he supposed himself to be. The duty of his subjects was to obey him, and to suffer, if need be, without remonstrance. “Under such circumstances, the sultan of Delhi was in theory an unlimited despot, bound by no law, subject to no material check, and guided by no will except his own. The people had no rights only obligations; they only lived to carry out his commands.”

In practice, however, the position of the Muslim sultan of Delhi was full of difficulties. He had to rule over an alien people different from his co-religionists in faith as well as social and political outlooks. Consequently in his desire to propagate Islam he could not altogether ignore the beliefs and sentiments of non-Muslims, if he aimed at the establishment of a stable government. An incessant Jihād against the non-believers was not possible in this country. It is true that during the process of conquest atrocities were committed, but in times of war suffering is inevitable. With the establishment of peace and order no organised persecution of Hindus was possible. As early as Muhammad bin Qasim’s campaign in Sindh it was thought politic by the leader of a few thousand Arabs to refrain from persecuting the Hindus in the name of a holy war and thus arousing swarms of them against him. Political exigencies demanded religious toleration. Internal revolts, the indefinite law of succession, the existence of various independent kingdoms all over the country, and the recurring Mughal invasions from the north-west, demanded the presence of a practical king rather than a vacillating or bigoted monarch. It is because of these considerations that strong rulers like Iltutmish, Balban, `Alāūddīn and Muḥammad bin Tughlaq never put religion above politics. Moreover, the 'Ulamā’ also acted according to the wishes of the reigning king. If the throne was occupied by a bigot they advocated intolerance, otherwise they meekly subordinated their opinions to those of the strong monarchs like `Alāūddīn and Muḥammad bin Tughlaq.

---

3 Ashraf: Life and Conditions of the People of Hindustan p. 129. Also see Bashir Ahmad: Administration of Justice in Medieval India.

Contemporary opinion also spoke in favour of the autocratic position of a medieval monarch in general and of `Alāūddīn in particular. Amīr Khusrav and Ziyāuddīn Barānī considered the sultan as the naib or the Khalīfah of God. He was Zil' illah or the shadow of God on earth. In Khazāinul Futūh Amīr Khusrav gives the sultan titles like “the sultan of the world”, “the sultan of the monarchs of the earth”, “the conqueror of the age” and the “shepherd of the people”. These phrases, in spite of their being exaggerated epithets allude to the prevalent conception that the king was the state and that it was an age of royal absolutism. `Alāūddīn like Louis XIV of France regarded himself to be all in all in the state, L'état c'est moi. According to Ziyāuddīn Barānī a king was to be severe or kind as the emmergency required. He was to establish the true religion, distribute impartial justice and see that not a single person in his kingdom remained unfed and unclothed.

`Alāūddīn struck a new note in the conception of medieval kingship. Under him the temporal power eclipsed the ecclesiastical. His discussions with Qāzī Mughīs on the one hand clearly show the impracticability of following the advice of the bigoted ‘Ulama in matters of state politics, and on the other the attitude of a medieval despot. “I know not”. emphasised the king, “whether these laws are sanctioned by our faith or not, but whatever I conceive to be for the good of the state, that I decree”.8 ‘Alā’uddīn thought that religion had nothing to do with politics. The business of the king was to administer the state while Shara’ was the concern of the Qāzīs and Muftīs.9 In direct contrast to his predecessor Jalāluddīn and his successor Qutbuddīn, ‘Alā’uddīn possessed all the qualities that go to make a successful despot. He possessed an iron will to enforce his commands; he made the nobility and the clergy submit to his wishes, and refused to tolerate laxity in matters of administration. He concentrated all authority in his hands and personally supervised every department of the government. He was the Commander-in-Chief of his army and personally led expeditions to kingdoms far and near, although he also sent expeditions under his able generals. He was the highest court of appeal, and through his judiciary and espionage, tried his best to administer impartial justice.

\[\text{6 Barānī pp. 35, 168.}\]
\[\text{7 Ibid. p. 147.}\]

The Nobility.

The nobility were the props on which the king’s authority rested. The nobles were drawn from many races—Turks, Pathans, Indians and Persians. Some of them like Aibak, Iltutmish and Balban rose from the lowest rung. They started as slaves and achieved to eminence and even secured the throne, just through personal merit. Thus, theoretically, there was no limit to the acquisition of the highest position by a nobleman. Consequently all through the Turkish period a struggle for possession of real power continued to rage between the king and his barons. In fact the sultans of India could not evolve a governmental machinery to which the nobles could adapt themselves or under which they could feel secure. If the sultans were suspicious of the nobles’ strength, the nobility were also in constant dread of the sultans, on whose goodwill depended their prestige, their honour and even their life. Under weak rulers like Jalāluddin and Qutbuddin Khalji the nobles dominated the government while under strong monarchs like Balban and 'Alāūddin they were dominated by the king. Under strong rulers the nobles were a source of strength to the king, but during the reign of weaklings they became a real danger to the sovereign and the state.

8 Ibid. pp. 295-96.
9 Barani p. 289.

Under Ilutmish the nobles had acquired great strength. His “Corps of Forty” (Chahalgānī) counted for much in state affairs. In fact the Turkish aristocracy had even put the crown into commission and Balban became apprehensive of their strength. He tried to crush them, but his success was only partial. With Jalāluddin’s advent to power the nobles regained their slightly impaired power, firstly, because Jalāluddin tried to win their support during the Khalji revolution, and secondly, because the king was by nature extremely kind. Even so, he indicted his nobles very severely. “Except holding drink parties, seeking pleasure in women and wine, except gambling and dicing, and except plotting against the king,” said the disgusted sultan, “the nobles had no other business.”

But 'Alāūddin’s approach to the problem of nobility was different from that of his uncle’s. The mutiny of troops near Jalor in 1299 and the revolts of Ikat Khan, 'Umar Khan and Mangu Khan, and the insurrection of Ḥāji Maula at Delhi in 1300 and 1301, coming one after another as they did in quick succession, very much alarmed the sultan. Even while his attention was wholly engrossed with the siege of Ranthambhor, he discussed with his trustworthy nobles like Malik Ḥamīduddin, Malik Aʿizzuddin, son of ‘Alāʾ Dabīr, Malik ‘Ainul Mulk Multānī and other wise and experienced ones the causes of the political upheavals. After several days’ deliberations it was unanimously concluded that there were four basic causes for the unhappy state of affairs. Firstly, the sultan neglected his people, and did not care to know whether they were prosperous or otherwise. Secondly, the unrestricted use of wine encouraged people to hold drink-parties in which they invited their boon companions. It was at such entertainment that conspiracies against the state were hatched. Thirdly, free intercourse and association of barons, their matrimonial and other connections brought them so close to one another that if any one of them was in difficulty, “a hundred others on account of their connection, relationship and attachment to him became his confederates.” And lastly, wealth made people contumacious and disloyal, haughty and proud.

---

10 Barani pp. 191-93.

On his return from Ranthambhor in 1301 not only did ‘Alāʾuddin put down the rebels, he made up his mind to destroy the very bases of such revolts. Ilbarīs had interested themselves in Haji Maula’s insurrection, the Mongol nobility had never reconciled to the Khalji government. The sultan decided that the best way to clip the wings of the refractory element was to impoverish it. The reclamation of crown lands, the enhancement of revenue, and other fiscal measures, which will be described shortly, affected the nobility to a very large extent. The barons were ordered to

---

11 Ibid. p. 282.

The sultan until then had been intent on wars and conquests and had hardly turned his attention towards improving administration.
refrain from visiting one another or holding convivial parties. Further, they were prohibited from contracting matrimonial alliances without the previous permission of the crown. These orders were strictly enforced. In fact 'Alá'íddin reduced the noblemen to the status of slaves and imposed upon them all the three conditions of slavery, viz., the sultan was to inherit the noble; no marriage could be arranged without the sultan's permission, and the sons of noblemen became slaves of the king in their turn. The Maliks and Amírs, on account of the fear of the intelligence service, behaved most cautiously and carefully. Even when they congregated in the royal palace they dared not speak to one another, and expressed themselves through gestures.

The narrative of the contemporary chronicler may be exaggerated. Even so there is no doubt that the noblemen in the time of 'Alá'íddin were not allowed to raise their head. Their suppression facilitated the work of administration. So long as 'Alá'íddin enjoyed sound health, his argus eye and iron hand steered the course of the state well. But the moment his health began to decline trouble brewed up on all sides. A weakened order of nobility could neither check the atrocities of Káfúr, nor could it impart dignity nor stamina to administration, and a tragic collapse began to loom large on the political horizon.

Officers of the State

After the sultan the head of the administration was the Vazír. On the civil side the Vazír was responsible to the king about the administration of the provincial governments. He was directly incharge of the Finance department. He appointed 'amils for the different parts of the empire to collect revenue and deposit it into the royal exchequer. On the military side the Vazír commanded the imperial forces and led expeditions into different kingdoms.
On his accession ‘Alāūdīn appointed Khvājā Khaṭīr to the office of Vazīr. Khvājā Khaṭīr was a man of experience and wisdom and had served under Balban and Jalāluddin. A great civil administrator, he was, however, not a militarist. Failing to come up to the expectations of his master, who was building a military state, he was superseded by Nuṣrat Khan in 1297. Nuṣrat was a great military leader. He led successful expedition to Gujarat and died fighting at Ranthambhor. He was also well known for his monetary extortions from the people. Another Vazīr mentioned by Ferashtah is Saiyyad Khan, “the notorious,” about whom not much is known. It is difficult to say as to when Malik Tājuddin Kāfūr Hazārdinārī was appointed naib of the sultan. He was more a Vazīr of the king than of the state.12 His only qualifications were that he was a great military leader as also a favourite of the sultan. Thus in ‘Alāūdīn’s time Vizarat was conferred on military leaders and this is not surprising because ‘Alāūdīn had to fight the Mughals and at the same time conquer new lands.

Beside the Vazīr the other principal officers of the state were Qāzī-ul Quṣṭ or Lord chief justice, Mīr ‘Arz or Lord of petitions and the Mīr Dād, an officer whose duty was to present before the Qāzī any big officer or noble against whom a complaint had been instituted. On the financial side, next to the Vazīr were the Divān-i-Ashraf or the Accountant General, and the Mustaufī or the Auditor General of imperial Finances. They were responsible to the Vazīr for state finances and kept an account of all the items of income and expenditure. The chief officers on the military side were the ‘Āriz-i-Mumālik or Minister of war and the Bakhshi-i-Fauj or paymaster of the forces. The Mīr-i-Kohī was the Director of Agriculture, and Malik Ḥamīduddīn held this office under ‘Ala‘uddin. But there was no line of demarcation between the civil and military services and an officer of the civil side was given charge of military expeditions and vice versa.\textsuperscript{13}

\textit{Provincial Administration.}

Before making a study of the system of administration at the centre it may be mentioned that the administration in the various provinces was a replica of that of the central government. The empire was parcelled out into a number of provinces each of which was put under the charge of a governor. According to Žiya Baranî there were eleven provinces besides the territories of the central government.

2. Multan and Sivistan (Sehvān) under Tājul Mulk Kāfūr.
3. Deopalpur under Ghażi Tughlaq.
4. Samanah and Sunnam under Akhurbeg Tātak.
8. Chandari and Iraj under Malik Tamar.
10. Avadh under Malik Bukan (?)
11. Ka‘a under Malik Naširuddin Sautelah.\textsuperscript{14}

We have already discussed the extent of the authority of the central government over these provinces. The governor of a province was a sort of a king in miniature. As was the king at Delhi, the provincial governor was the chief executive and judicial head of the province. Each \footnotesize{\textsuperscript{13} For a detailed list of junior and senior officials in revenue and other departments see Qarauna Turks Vol. I p. 260-66.}

\footnotesize{\textsuperscript{14} Baranî p. 323.}
governor had his own provincial force and was required to send a fixed quota of troops whenever required to do so. The governor held court, administered justice, and looked after other spheres of administration. He collected the land revenue of the province and after deducting the amount assigned to him, he sent the surplus to the imperial exchequer. Under weak kings the provincial governors behaved almost as independent rulers but under strong monarchs like Balban and Alāūddin they dared not assume a contumacious attitude with impunity. That veteran generals like Ghazi Malik, Malik Kafur and Alp Khan loyalty served the government for so long, is a proof of the strength and vigilance of Alāūddin. It was only when the emperor was dying and the grip of the central government was becoming lax that trouble arose in some provinces of the empire.

Administration of Justice.

"According to the ancient political ideal, which both the Hindus and the Muhammadans accepted, the Sovereign is the fountain of justice, and it is his duty to try cases personally in open court." The sultans of India like Iltutmish, Balban, Alāūddin and Muhammad Tughlaq followed this ideal and personally administered justice in open court. The sultan himself constituted the chief court of appeal and everybody had access to him to demand and obtain justice. Iltutmish is said to have hung a chain of justice for people who sought redress and his reign was noted for jurists well 15 E.g. in 1299 during the conquest of Gujarat Ulugh Khan was ordered to join in the conquest of Jaisalmer. During the invasion of Targhi provincial governors were called to defend the imperial capital. Alp Khan was ordered to march to assist Naib Kafur in the latter’s expedition to Devagiri in 1308.

16 J. N. Sarkar: The Mughal Administration, p. 106.
versed in law.\textsuperscript{18} Ziyāuddin Baranī praises sultan Ghayāsuddin Balban for his love of justice and says that he never showed any partiality towards any of his subjects even if they were his own kith and kin. 'Alāūddin was as relentless and unflinching in administering justice as Balban. Unfortunately no traveller like Ibn Baṭṭūtah visited his court, and the contemporary historians do not describe the manner in which the sultan administered justice in open court.

Next to the sultan, the head of the judicial department was Sadr-i-Jahān Qāzīul Quzāt or the Lord Chief Justice of the empire. Under the Qāzīul Quzāt served naib Qāzīs or 'Adls and they were assisted by Muftis who expounded the law and gave opinion on complicated cases. There was another officer Dādbeg-i-Hazrat\textsuperscript{19} whose office corresponded to the office of Mir 'Adl of the Mughals. He was a judge of the capital (Hazrat) as distinct from judge of the camp (Qazī-i-Lashkar).\textsuperscript{20} There was also Mir Dād whose duty it was to produce before the court any influential person against whom a suit had been filed, but who was too powerful to be controlled by the Qāzī.\textsuperscript{21} A similar system of gradations of judicial officers obtained in the provinces where the governor, the Qazīs and other junior officers administered justice. In smaller towns and villages, however, the headmen and the panchayats used to settle disputes and decide cases.

Besides these judicial officials, princes, Vazīrs, commanders of armies and other high officers of the state decided cases which did not involve expert knowledge of the \textsuperscript{18} Baranī p. 111. See also Wahed Husain: \textit{Administration of Justice during the Muslim Rule in India}. p. 22.

\textsuperscript{19} Malik Fakhruddin Kūchī was appointed to this office in the first year of 'Alāūddin’s reign. Baranī p. 248.

\textsuperscript{20} Footnote by Major Fuller in his translation of Baranī’s \textit{Tarikh}. \textit{J.A.S.B.} 1870 p. 187.

\textsuperscript{21} \textit{History of Qarauna Turks}, I, p. 269.
law. Thus cases regarding land revenue were heard by the governor or his Finance minister, the Dīvān, and such cases did not fall under the jurisdiction of the Qāzīs. Justice was administered quickly and promptly without any circum-locutory proceedings. There were no pleaders or lawyers in those days and the judges mostly worked upon the doctrine of Qayāṣ or private judgement after considering the statements of the witnesses.

In the early years of Sultan ʿAlāʿuddīn’s reign Sadr Jahān Ṣadruddīn was appointed the Qāzī-i-Mumālīk or the Chief Justice. Although he was not very much renowned for his learning, his experience was so wide and his judgement so keen that none dared to resort to cunning or falsehood in his presence. After him Qāzī Jalāluddīn Balvachi was appointed naib Qāzī, while Maulana Ziyāuddīn of Bayana, who was the Qazī-i-Lashkar, was appointed to the office of Sadr Jahān. Qazī Ziyāuddīn, in spite of his erudition, did not possess the dignity required of the chief judge of the capital. But the last Qazī, Maulana Ḥamīduddīn Multānī, whom ʿAlāʿuddīn appointed in the closing days of his reign, was altogether worthless. Baranī remarks that the judgeship of Delhi, the capital city, which was a very responsible office to be entrusted only to a learned and capable person, was given to a “servant” of the sultan’s household. The king appointed Ḥamīduddīn in consideration of his past services, unmindful of the fact that such a post should be given only to a man who was incorruptible, and who possessed qualities of simplicity and renunciation.
Naturally with Ḥamīduddīn at its head the judiciary lost its lustre and prestige. Prominent among the provincial

---

22 Bashir Ahmad: Administration of Justice in Medieval India p. 117.
23 Baranī p. 351.
24 Ibid. p. 352.
Qâzîs were Saiyyad Tâjuddîn of Badaon and his nephew Saiyyad Ruknuddîn of Kârâ. Baranî, who knew both of them personally, praises them for their inspiring personality, their dignified bearing and their other excellent qualities.

The Qâzîs were treated with great respect and consideration, and they could punish even the most powerful officers of the empire. Baranî lays great emphasis on the purity of character as an indispensable qualification for a judge. Not only learning but fear of God and abstinence from all evil things were essential qualities in a Qâzî. Sultan 'Alâ'uddîn was very particular about seeing his high judicial officers behave well even in their private life. He did not hesitate to sentence to death a Qâzî who had taken to drinking. The police and intelligence service were so efficient that offending judicial officials could not escape punishment. It may be noted in this connection that in spite of the great respect in which the Qâzîs were held, theologians in general did not wield too much power. They were allowed to decide judicial cases only and arbitrate purely on religious matters, while the real power in all other matters was vested in the sultan. The Qâzîs themselves did not maintain a very high standard of character and efficiency. Amîr Khusrau and Ziyâuddîn Baranî, both have to say much against them. In Mutâla-i-Anvâr Khusrau observes that the Qâzîs were quite ignorant of the principles of law, while Ziyâuddîn, repentent in his old age, confesses that theologians, a class to which he himself belonged, used to stretch the meaning of the Quranic texts to carry out the wishes of the sultans. Even so, the testimony of Maulana Shamsuddîn Turk, a theologian who hailed from Egypt, seems to be too harsh an indictment on the theologians of the day. The Maulana learnt that “ill-

25 Ibid. p. 352.
26 Badaoni, Ranking, I, p. 187.
27 Baranî p. 446.
fated wiseacres of black faces’’ sat in mosques with abominable law books and made money by cheating both the accuser and the accused, and the Qāzīs of the capital did not bring all these facts to the notice of the king.” 28 It appears that the Maulana wrote all this to ‘Alāūddin only to cast aspersions on the character of Qāzī Ḥamīduddin of Multan to whom he was deadly opposed and about whom Baranī also holds a very low opinion. 29 But as the Sultan was not negligent in administering justice to people, it is obvious that the judiciary was in a fairly good condition.

Punishments.

The punishments inflicted by ‘Alāūddin as also by other sultans of the age were barbarous. Neither the dignity of high office nor piety nor wealth could save a man from the clutches of law. Even a shahnāh of the position of Malik Qabūl Ulugh Khānī, who possessed lands and cavalry, once received twenty stripes for suggesting to the sultan to raise the price of grain by half a jītal. Flogging was very common, and on one occasion a man received one thousand stripes. 30 Decapitation, mutilation of limbs and putting an offender into fetters, were common forms of punishment. Ferishtah gives a graphic picture of the horrible punishments of the times of Firoz Tughlaq. “It has been usual,” says he “…to spill Muhammadan blood on trivial occasions, and for small crimes, to mutilate and torture them by cutting off the hands and feet, and noses and ears, by putting out eyes, by pulverising the bones of the living criminals.

28 Ibid. p. 299.

29 From the fact that Maulana Shamsuddin Turk mentions the name of Qazī Ḥamīduddin it follows that the former came to India in the later part of ‘Alāūddin’s reign, because according to Baranī Ḥamīduddin was appointed Qazī of the realm in the last years of ‘Alāūddin.

30 Fāvāidul Fāvād Lko. Text pp. 53-4.
with mallets, by burning the body with fire, by crucification and by nailing the hands and feet, by flaying alive, by the operation of ham-strings, and by cutting human beings to pieces.”

Tortures were inflicted for extorting confession. 'Alāūddin was extremely severe in punishing the guilty; and for offences like smuggling wine into the city or drinking in public the offenders were imprisoned in abominable “wells” dug for that purpose. So horrible were these prisons that many people died in them and those who escaped alive were completely shattered in health. There were no regular jails and prisoners were incarcerated in some old forts. Brokers in horse trade, found guilty of contravening the sultan’s orders, were banished to distant fortresses. Amir Khūr'd, the author of Sairul Auliā, describes the abominable conditions prevailing in such jails. He says that once his father Saiy-yad Kāmāl was imprisoned by sultan Muḥammad bin Tughlaq in Bhaksi jail, near Devagiri. It was reported about that place, says he, that no prisoner used to come out alive from it as it was full of rats and snakes. The fraudulent shopkeepers who were found guilty of giving short weight were forced to make up the deficiency from flesh chopped from their bodies. Stoning to death for adultery, hanging of the body of the dead for days together on spear head, and parading it into the city were of common occurrence.

Police and Secret Intelligence.

An efficient police and intelligence system is the inevitable concomitant of effective administration. The sultan organised the police department on a very efficient basis. The kotvāl was the most important officer of the police. His powers were extensive and his post very responsible. He was justice of peace and custodian of law and order. He advised the sultan on important issues, and was entrusted with the protection of the haram in the absence of the sultan from the capital.\(^3^4\) Under Balban and ‘Alā-ūddin the kotvāls wielded great influence with the king. Malik Fakhruddin, the veteran kotvāl of Delhi, used to tender advise to Balban on important matters. Nuṣrat Khan the first Kotvāl of ‘Alāūddin was very much feared by the people. After him Malik ‘Alāulmulk was given the post of kotvāl. ‘Alāulmulk’s candid talks with the king clearly indicate that the status of the kotvāl was very high.

32 Barānī p. 313.
33 Sairul Auliā, Trans. p. 190.

‘Alāūddin reformed the police department, created some new posts, and appointed efficient men to them. The post of Divān-i-Riyāsat was created to maintain strict control over the trades-people. The Shahnāh or the magistrate of the Market was also an officer of the same sort. Another officer, Muḥtasib, has been mentioned by most of the contemporary writers. He was the chief custodian of public morals and he enquired into the conduct of the people. Besides this he also controlled the market and examined weights and measures. Thus the control of the police was comprehensive and complete.

But if the police made the people correct in their behaviour the rigorous spy system scared them immensely. The appointment of secret agent was not a novel step, firstly, because a secret service is the very basis of despotic government, and secondly, because the predecessors of ‘Alāūddin had all resorted to espionage. Mahmūd of Ghaznā had a very efficient intelligence service in the Divān-i-Shughlī-Ishrāfī-Mamlūkāt, in which persons of both sexes served as spies.\(^3^5\)

---

\(^3^4\) As ‘Alāulmulk was given the charge of the haram at the time of Qutlugh Khvāja’s invasion.

\(^3^5\) Nazim: Sultan Mahmūd of Ghazna p. 144.
uddin Balban also had a very efficient intelligence department so that even the movements of his own son, Bughra Khan, were regularly communicated to him. ‘Alāʾūddin, however, seems to have organised espionage to great perfection. He appointed a number of informers known in the official language as munhīs. They were of different grades and kept the Sultan informed about the most trivial matters relating to persons high and low. The munhīs could even enter the houses of the people and trouble them for slight offences.³⁶ Ziyā-uddin Baranī bears witness to the rigour with which the intelligence department worked. “No one could stir without his (‘Alāʾūddin’s) knowledge, and whatever happened in the houses of the Maliks and Amirs, officers and great men, was communicated to the Sultan in course of time . . . . The fear of spies led barons to cease speaking anything aloud in the Hazar Sitūn, and if they had to say anything they said through gestures. Day and night did they tremble in their own houses on account of the activity of the patrol. Nor did they do anything nor utter a single word which could subject them to reproof or punishment.”³⁷

Thus the Secret service department became a terror to the people and the activities of the munhīs aroused feeling of fear and hatred. The nobles, the traders and the common people, all stood in dread of the king’s reporters. ‘Alāʾūddin’s market control was successful because of the strict vigilance of this department.

Postal System.

The administration of the Sultanate was greatly facilitated by an efficient postal service which connected different parts of the empire. A detailed account of the postal system prevailing in the time of Muḥammad bin Tughlaq has been given by Ibn Battūtah and the author of Masālikul Absār.

³⁶ E.g. Baranī p. 286.
³⁷ Ibid. p. 284
Yahya, the author of Tarikh-i-Mubarak Shahi, also refers to it. From the writings of Baṭṭūṭah and Baranī it appears that the postal organisation had much improved in the reign of Muḥammad Tughlaq as compared with that of ‘Alāūddin.38 Ziyāuddin writes that whenever the king sent an expedition to some place he established posts between the capital and the destination of the army. From Tilpat which was the first stage from Delhi, horsemen were stationed at a distance of half or three-quarters of a kos and at every post officers and clerks were appointed. These officials sent reports to the king every day or every third day as they received news from the marching or besieging army. At times, due to varying circumstances, the postal service was greatly disturbed and once when Malik Naib Kāfūr was engaged in reducing the fort of Warangal, ‘Alāūddin could not received any news about the army for more than forty days.

Baranī does not make mention of dava or dhava (footmen) and aulāq (horsemen) appointed on various posts, about whom Baṭṭūṭah speaks in detail, but his silence does not mean that such postmen did not exist in ‘Alāūddin’s days. Describing the regulations about prohibition of drinking, Baranī states that spies as well as barīds,39 posted at the gates of the city and near about, kept a strict watch over smugglers.40 It was on account of the efficient working of the posts that ‘Alāūddin could be informed of Hájjī Maulā’s revolt just on the third day of its occurrence.41 Another reference 38 The postal service of Muḥammad bin Tughlaq is too well known to be repeated here. For its details see Ibn Battutah, Vol. III, pp. 95-6., Masālikul Absār, Elliot, III, p. 581.

39 Barīd is an Arabic word and means messenger or runner.

40 Baranī, p. 285.

41 Ibid. p. 278.
to the efficiency of the postal service is found in the fact that Khusrau Khan was carried from Devagiri to Delhi in a week's time by orders of sultan Qutbuddin. These facts as well as the story references of Barani clearly show that postal service in the days of 'Ala-ud-din was quite efficient and must have been of great help to the Sultan in enforcing his various regulations.

42 Ibid. p. 400.
CHAPTER XV
FISCAL AND REVENUE REFORMS

'Ala-ud-din was perhaps the first sovereign of the Turkish line to have taken a keen interest in fiscal and revenue reforms. His predecessors from Quṭbuddin Aibak to Jalāluddin Khaljī either did not get the time, or did not possess the initiative to delve into this complicated branch of administration. They had utilized the existing machinery. At least such is the conclusion to which the silence of Minhājus Sirāj and Ziyāuddin points. Of these two writers the latter was certainly interested in agrarian problems even though superficially.

No doubt 'Ala-ud-din's revenue reforms were as distasteful to the nobility and landowners as those others in other spheres of administration, but they were in consonance with the general spirit of administration. The reasons which prompted the sultan to take drastic measures to realise the largest amount of revenue from land and other sources of income are quite obvious. The number and intensity of Mughal invasions in his reign, and the internal menace of the refractory nobles and princes made him into "an absolutely ruthless ruler." Therefore, whatever measures he undertook, either in the civil or revenue administration, or for social welfare, his one object was to bring about security against internal as well as external troubles. The first step towards resumption of royal grants and other landed property was undertaken to clip the wings of a contumacious nobility, for, according to the political philosophy of the Sultan it was "wealth" that bred disobedience and vanity. His other measures, concerning the measurement of land, fixation of the rate of land-revenue and its realisation were undertaken to ensure subsistence for a huge army which he had recruited to repulse the Mughal invasions on the one hand and extend his dominions on the other.

1 Also see Moreland: Agrarian System of Moslem India pp. 26-7 and Qureshi: Administration of the Sultanate of Delhi, p. 103.

Abolition of Land-Grants.

'Alāʻuddīn ordered resumption of all landed grants which the nobility, government officials and other rich individuals held as gifts, grants or rewards from the state. It was an old custom to reward nobles, learned men and theologians with grants of land. The grants were not hereditary, but ordinarily the descendants were left unmolested with their possession. These land-holders in course of time became lazy and proud as they had a certain income to fall back upon. Sultan Balban had determined to take harsh measures against the nobility who possessed such lands, but the appeal of Malik Fakhruddīn restrained him from proceeding to extremes. Thus Khans andMaliks were saved from being shorn of all their property. Nevertheless they lost much of their former prestige and power and meekly submitted to that strong sovereign.

At the time of his accession 'Alāʻuddīn had to bestow gold andlands upon barons and influential people to secure their sympathy and support. But the moment he found himself firmly seated in the regal saddle, he punished all such turncoats on the charge of their being disloyal to their former king Jalāluddīn. Besides other punishments which included blinding and execution, they were deprived of all the wealth that they had received from 'Alāʻuddīn. Even their household goods and private properties did not escape confiscation. Their houses were appropriated for the royal use and their estates were annexed to the crown lands. In 1297 these steps were confined only to a certain section of Maliks and Amirs; but on the king's return from Ranthambhor the scope of their application was considerably widened. They were now directed against all the rich people of the state, nobles, traders and even petty zamindars, in short whosoever possessed any property. The king ordered that all the estates, villages and other lands which the people held as milk (property), in'am (remuneration or reward) and vaqf (gift), should forthwith be resumed and turned into the khalsa or crown lands. It is probable that all assignments were not confiscated, but their management was taken over by the government. The state officials were asked to treat the people as tyrannically as possible, and try to extort money from them on any and every pretext, so that nobody should be left in possession of much wealth. These instructions were literally carried out and people were compelled to surrender their property. After a short time, says the contemporary chronicler, matters had gone so far that in the houses of the nobility and the Multhanis (merchants) not much money remained. All pensions, grants of land and endowments were confiscated, and the people had to earn their livelihood by the sweat of their brow. In such circumstances 'no one even had time to pronounce the word 'rebellion'.

The orders regarding the resumption of crown lands, which were meant to impoverish the nobility, were followed by others which affected the chief-men (Muqaddams), petty

2 Barani pp. 250-51. The system of granting lands, however, was never given up in the time of Alauddin. Malik Qabul Ulugh Khani got an estate after his appointment as shahnah of grain market (Barani p. 305). Barani also mentions that the nobles who had no landed property got rationed grain (p. 309) in times of scarcity which clearly indicates that there were nobles who had landed property. But the sultan preferred paying in cash, e.g. Amir Khusrau got a fixed salary. Also see Qureshi: Administration p. 119.

3 Barani p. 283-84. The language of this passage is awfully defective but the sense is quite clear.
zamindârs (Khûts) and even ordinary peasants (balâhar). The sultan asked his councillors to suggest ways and means for suppressing the Hindus, whose wealth was as much a "source of rebellion and dis-affection" as that of the nobility. The complaints of 'Alâúddîn about Khûts and Muqaddams were not that they put on white garments and rode horses. They evaded to pay any of the prevalent taxes like Kharâj, Jaziyah, Kari and Charai. Not only that, they even charged extra share as their collection labour (Khûti) and whether called or not they never came to the Dîvân and paid no heed to revenue officials. The king’s advisers suggested to him to rescind all the privileges of the landlords (Khûts and Muqaddams) and to enforce one law regarding the payment of revenue for both landlords and tenants, and not to leave anything as collection charges (حقوق خزّانة) so that "the revenue due from the strong might not fall upon the weak." As to the Hindus, much wealth should not be left with them so as to enable them to ride horses, wear fine clothes and indulge in sumptuous and luxurious habits. It follows from his statement that formerly the revenue due from the strong used to fall upon the weak. In other words the land holders used to exact as much as possible from the peasant and give only the due share of the revenue to the state. Consequently they appropriated to themselves much more than their own share. This surplus income naturally made them rich and even overbearing. As Mr. Moreland aptly remarks, it appears on the study of Barani that the population consisted not of two elements but of three—Moslems, Hindus, and the 'herds' or peasants... the question really at issue was how to break the power of the rural leaders, the chiefs and the headmen of parganas and villages.... That the Hindu chiefs with constant desire for independence were very domineering in their behaviour is quite clear from the complaint of Jalaluddin against them. They chewd pān unmindful of anything, dressed in white and moved among the Musalmans with comfort and ease. Although Barani lends communal colour to it and says that Sultan Jalaluddin could not tolerate such behaviour on the part of the Hindus as they were the arch enemies of the religion of Muṣṭafā, yet it is clear that the Hindu middle class was economically well-off and in no way inclined to show an attitude of servility. ‘Alāūddin, who had crushed the nobility ruthlessly, was not expected to leave other ‘refractory’ elements unsubdued, and he took measures to see that nobody in his dominions continued to be so rich or powerful as to be a source of danger to the state. But the statement of Žiyāuddin Barani that the sultan undertook a series of measures to crush the Hindus expresses the sentiments of the orthodox historian, rather than those of the matter of fact sultan.

4 Khût and balâhar appear to be vernacular vocables which Barânî so frequently uses in his Persian. From the trend of the text it appears that a Khût was a sort of zamindâr or revenue collector and balâhar was peasant, so that the latter paid revenue to the former. Barânî’s text has (p. 287) درین دادن خزّان (را) بابلا سران The 1, is given in the British Museum Ms. but not in the Bib. Ind. text. Thus a balâhar gave the revenue to a Khût who deposited it into the royal exchequer. Prof. Hodîvala’s interpretation (pp.277-78) is quite convincing when he says that Khût appears a decapitated form of Sanskrit Gramkûta or village headman. Barânî also uses it in the same sense.

5 Barânî p. 291.

6 Ibid. pp. 287-88. Land revenue is known as Kharâj.

By another ordinance the emperor fixed the government share at fifty per cent of the produce and laid down the method of assessment. ‘Alāūddin was the first Muslim king in India

---

7 Moreland: Agrarian System p. 32 footnote.
8 Barani pp. 216-17.
who fixed the revenue on the actual measurement of land. The system of measurement was known to the Hindu kings and was in practice in the south, but it seems to have fallen into disuse in the north. It was now revived. Not being as good a historian as Abul Fazl, Baranī does not give the details with regard to the method and instruments of measurement. He, however, speaks of revenue collection according to “bisvah”⁹ which is known even to this day. From this may be inferred that a uniform system of measurement was introduced. Under this system all the land occupied by the rich and the poor was brought under assessment at the uniform rate of fifty per cent. This measure automatically reduced the chiefs practically to the position of peasants. Their surplus income, which they were suspected of levying stopped, half of the produce was sent to the imperial treasury, and from the remaining half grazing and other sundry taxes were paid, leaving a bare minimum to them. Thus it is certain that the chiefs who had been accustomed to live a life of ease and comfort were reduced to a deplorable position; and if Baranī does not exaggerate, the Hindus, who had the monopoly of agriculture, were impoverished to such an extent that there was no sign of gold or silver left in their homes, and the wives of Khvāts and Muqaddāms used to seek jobs in the houses of the Musalmans, work there, and receive wages.¹⁰

The demand of fifty per cent of the gross produce was a very harsh measure indeed. Under Hindu sovereigns the state demand was one-fourth to one-sixth. The revenue rose to one-third or fell as low as one-sixth of the produce as the emergency required.¹¹ Under Muslim sovereigns like Ilutmish and Balbon also the rate does not seem to have risen above one-third. The demand of 'Alāūddin for one-half, therefore, could not have been welcome either to the landlords or the peasantry. But this demand was not unlawful as Muslim Jurists permit fifty per cent. as the maximum revenue. Moreover, the Sultan's orders about prohibition and closing of gambling dens meant a considerable loss to the royal exchequer. 'Alāūddin made up the deficiency by raising land revenue to the permissible maximum. The revenue was accepted in cash as well as in kind, but since the Sultan accumulated grain in state granaries he preferred to take the revenue in kind from certain fertile regions near the capital.

⁹ Baranī p. 288.

After the realisation of land revenue and other taxes which will be described hereafter, the peasants were compelled to sell their surplus grain to the travelling merchants (caravaniāns), who were assisted by government officials in obtaining it. In short, if the revenue regulations of 'Alāūddin were meant to crush high landlords, they were in no way less prejudicial to the interests of the peasantry.

Beside the land revenue 'Alāūddin levied house tax and grazing tax. According to Ziyāuddin all milk producing 12 Aghnides, p. 378.

---

13 Barani p. 284.
14 The text of Barani reads p. 287.
animals like cows and goats were to be taxed. Baranī neither mentions limitations of, nor exemptions from, the grazing tax. But according to Ferishtah, animals up to two pairs of oxen, two buffaloes, two cows and ten goats were free from taxation.\(^{15}\) The taxable minimum (nişāb) in Muslim law is thirty heads for cows and buffalos and forty for goat and sheep.\(^{16}\) Considering this nişāb, the figure of Ferishtah is quite normal: but since neither Ferishtah’s source of information is known nor does Baranī talk of any exemption, Ferishtah’s figures cannot be literally accepted. It seems probable that ‘Alāüddin exempted only such animals as were indispensable for cultivation, but not cows, buffalos and goats to the number of a dozen as they gave milk, went for pasture and were a source of income to their possessor.\(^{17}\)

Another tax realised was karī (کری) or Karhī (کرھی). Nothing definite is known about this tax. It appears that the word is a derivative from the Sanskrit word kar (कर) which means tax. Baranī does not give any details about it and it can safely be presumed that karī was one of the various minor taxes which from time to time have been realised in Hindu and Muslim periods of Indian history.

Jaziyah was levied from non-Muslims as the cash equivalent to “the assistance which they would be liable to give if they had not persisted in their unbelief, because living as

---

\(^{15}\) Ferishtah, p. 109.

\(^{16}\) Aghnides, pp. 251-52, 253-54.

\(^{17}\) See zakāt taxes.
they do in a Muslim state, they must be ready to defend it.\footnote{18} Moreover, the main object in levying the tax is the subject of the infidels to humiliations . . . and . . . during the process of payment, the žimmî is seized by the collar and vigorously shaken and pulled about in order to show him his degradation. . . .”\footnote{19} As time passed Jaziyah could not be levied in such spirit and became a tax, pure and simple. Jaziyah was not imposed upon women and children, the insane and the imbecile.

The Sultans of Delhi charged ten, twenty and forty tankahs as Jaziyah from the poor, the middle class and the rich respectively.\footnote{20} ‘Aláûddîn realized Jaziyah from his Hindu subjects, but he does not seem to have imposed it in the spirit of orthodox jurists cited above. Complaining about the contumacy of Khâts and Muqaddams the Sultan said, “they themselves did not pay any of the taxes—Kharój, Jaziya, Kari and Charai.”\footnote{21} This clearly shows that Jaziyah was one of the major taxes prevalent. The vanquished Deccan princes sent annual tribute to the imperial capital. What they sent may be termed as Jaziyah, but it was more of a political tribute rather than a tax levied from non-Muslims. Of the same nature were the tributes from the Rajput states.

Contemporary chroniclers do not give the figures of the revenue collected from Jaziyah, but they do not give figures \footnote{18} Aghnides p. 399.

\footnote{19} See Yüsuf in Aghnides pp. 406-7, 530. Compare in this connection Qazi Mughî’s inveighing to Sultan ‘Aláûddîn about the status of the žimmî. So far as the status of the žimmî in Muslim law was concerned the information of the Qazi was correct.
\footnote{20} ‘Affîf: Tarikh-i-Firûz Shahî, Bib. Ind. Text, p. 333.
\footnote{21} Barânlî p. 291.
for kharāj and other taxes either. It is, however, reasonable to think that the income from Jaziyah was considerable since it was levied from so vast a population of non-believers.22 Jaziyah was realised only from non-Muslims and was naturally cancelled by conversion to Islam. Thus, though conversion to Islam meant glorification of the faith it also meant loss of income to the state. Consequently the Sultans who were more intent on acquiring money, and not very much religiously inclined, must have disfavoured conversion. It is obvious that such kings cannot receive so favourable a treat at the hands of the orthodox 'ulama as sultans like Firuz Tughlaq, who, strangely enough, was enthusiastic both about Jaziyah and conversion at the same time. To astute administrators like Balban, ‘Alāūd Din and Muhammad Tughlaq replenishment of the royal exchequer was of greater importance than conversion of infidels. They suffered the non-Muslims not necessarily because they were broad-minded or cosmopolitan in outlook but also because they gained by non-Muslims remaining non-Muslims. ‘Alāūd Din succeeded as king, what if he invited the anathema of the priestly class.

Khums, as the word signifies, was one-fifth share of the state in the spoils (ghanāim) of war. The four-fifths share was distributed among the soldiers. Sultan ‘Alāūd Din, who was always much in need of money and also disliked people to grow opulent, disregarded the law and appropriated four-fifths to the state treasury. This scale continued to obtain till Firoz Tughlaq reverted to the old practice of appropriating one-fifth of the booty to the exchequer.

Zakāt is a religious tax levied only from the Muslims. By paying zakāt and thereby sharing his property with the needy, a Muslim purifies himself of avarice. Thus the payment of zakāt is an obligation between God and man and it cannot be collected by force. But since it is an act of piety to pay zakāt and since it is based on a clear injunction of the Qurān it must be realised by the Imam. Zakāt is not levied on primary necessaries of life like dwelling houses, clothes, utensils, slaves and animals used for ploughing or riding. It is charged only on “apparent property” such as gold and silver, herds and merchandise, and only when such property exceeds a certain taxable minimum (nisāb). The Muslim jurists have been very liberal in fixing the nisāb. On non-apparent property the owner has an option to pay whatever he likes without being coerced in anyway. Generally speaking zakāt amounted to 1/40th of the property.

---

22 In the time of Aurangzeb Jaziyah from Gujarat alone brought a very large amount of revenue. See Elliot relevant vols.

In India zakāt ceased to be a religious tax imposed only on the Muslims, though an orthodox sovereign like Firoz Shah included it in the list of state taxes. Here zakāt was levied in the shape of import duties, and grazing fee on all milk producing animals or those which went for pasture and was realised both from Muslims and non-Muslims. Accord-

23 Aghnides p. 297.

25 Dr. Qureshi (Administration, p. 93) states that “zakāt was levied by the sultans of Delhi, though the chronicles do not expressly mention this fact. The reason for this silence seems to be that they were writing for Muslim readers, to whom the levy of zakāt by an Islamic administration would be too obvious a fact to be mentioned”. The argument is not convincing. Zakāt tax was perhaps the most difficult to assess and still more difficult to realise. It was levied on “apparent property”. Now, we know that in medieval times people used to hide their possessions lest the sultan should come to know of their wealth. It was so especially in ʿAlāʾuddin’s times. Thus no zakāt could be realised on property carefully enclosed in the four-walls of a house or buried underground. Moreover it is human nature to avoid payment of a tax until it is almost forcibly realised by the state, and ing to the Islamic law import duties for Muslims were 5 per cent and for non-Muslims 10 per cent of the commodity.²⁶

Revenue Officials.

A large number of graded officillas were appointed to carry on the revenue administration. The credit of the success with which the orders of the Sulatn were enforced, and full share of the revenue realise, goes to the deputy vazir (Naib vazir) Sharf Qayini.²⁷ For several years this officer made strenuous efforts to apply the ordinances of the sultan to most parts of northern India. He was successful in introducing the system of measurement in the district about Delhi like Pālam, Revari, Afghānpur, Amroha, Badaon and koel, as also in the divisions of Deopalpūr, Lahore, Samanah and Sunam in the west, upto Katehar (Rohilkhan) in the east and portions of Malwa and Rajputana (e.g. Bayana and Jhain) in the south, but not in Gujarat, Malwa and Avadh. Thus it is clear that the system of measurement, 50 per cent revenue, and grazing tax, were enforced in the central part of the country and some other provinces in north and west but not in the whole of the empire. Nevertheless ²⁶ Aghnides p. 318.

²⁷ The Calcutta text of Baranī has (p. 288) شرف قادری but Major Fuller's Ms. has شرف قادری. The latter is the correct form and is well known in Persia.
even this was a great achievement for ʿAlāʾūddīn and his deputy minister Sharf Qayinī, to whose accomplishments and efficiency Baranī pays a well deserved tribute.

Sharf Qayinī took drastic steps to remove the maladministration in the revenue department. The conversion of large areas into crown lands, and their direct relations with the state necessitated steps for realisation of revenue in full. “One of the standing evils in the revenue collection consisted in defective realisation which usually left large balances to be accounted for. As the revenue system was yet in the making and the machinery for assessment and collection was yet undeveloped, unrealised balances were probably inevitable.”

Moreover, the lower revenue officials, whose number must necessarily have been increased with the increase in the area of crown lands, were corrupt and extortionate. ʿAlāʾūddīn determined to do away with these evils. He created a department known as the Divān-i-Mustakhrāj. The Mustakhrāj was entrusted with the duties of inquiring into the arrears lying in the name of collectors, and of realising them. He freely punished the āmils and kūrkūns to realise the balances in full. Equally drastic measures were taken to stop corruption among patvāris and other lower officials of the revenue department. Realising that the low salaries of the officials tempted them to accept and even extort bribes, the Sultan increased their salaries so that they could live in comfort and respectability. But this did not improve matters and corruption among the lower officials continued. The Sultan ruthlessly punished all those found guilty of corruption. The punishments seem to have been severe indeed, for ʿAlāʾūddīn told Qāzī Mughīs that he had brought to book thousands of clerks and collectors.

28 Tripathi, Some Aspects of Muslim Admini. p. 262.
29 Baranī pp. 288–89, 292.
30 Ibid. p. 296, has 10,000, but the figure may not be accepted literally.
had reduced them to beggary and had made their flesh sore. The strict vigilance of 'Alāūddin over the conduct of the patvaris and amils, the inspection of their revenue books by superior officers and the sultan himself, and the ruthless punishments with which they were visited for accepting bribes and falsifying accounts, brought the lower offices of the revenue department into disrepute. The revenue officials regarded their office worse than ‘plague’, as for five hundred or one thousand tankahs they were kept in jails for many years. Barānī hyperbolically says that one would not give his daughter in marriage to a revenue official, while the office of the superintendent was only accepted by one who had no regard for his life, for these officials passed most of their days in jail frequently receiving blows and kicks.31 At last the stern punishments of 'Alāūddin had their effect. Ziyāuddin affirms that it was no longer possible for any one to take even a tankah from either a Hindu or a Musalman by way of bribe or extortion.32

Before closing the discussion on revenue administration it may be pointed out that 'Alāūddin neither abolished the iqta' nor the Khudī system. He only abrogated the privileges of the landlord class, crushed their contumacy and compelled them to lead a life of frugality if not of destitution. By his excessive demands he in no way benefited the peasantry for which Ziyāuddin bitterly criticises the monarch. It is certain that 'Alāūddin's regulations were an outcome of political exigencies yet it was not impossible for him to be less tyrannical to the tillers of the soil, to the merchants and to his own revenue officials whose flesh he made “sore”. Everything in 'Alāūddin's administration smacked of force; and if Shaikh Bashīr pointed out that 'Alāūddin's government had very shallow foundations, he was not incorrect. Economic prosperity and not force is the foundation of a stable government. But 'Alā'uddīn wanted to improve his countrymen so that the word "rebellion" should not pass their lips.

31 Ibid. p. 289.
32 Ibid. p. 289.

But Barani's invectives that 'Alā'uddīn's measures were meant to crush the Hindus as such are quite baseless. Noblemen, traders, cultivators all bore the burnt of 'Alā-udder's regulations, but since agriculture was confined mainly to the Hindus they suffered most. Land was the main source of state revenues then, as it is now, and the sultan increased it to the maximum possible. The result was the grinding down of the peasant class, while the Khāts and muqaddams were reduced to the status of low peasantry, shorn of their time-honoured privileges.
CHAPTER XVI
SOCIAL AND MILITARY REFORMS

The main aims of the Sultans of Delhi in general and of ‘Alā’ūḍdin in particular were the conquest of independent kingdoms of India and of repulsing the Mughal invasions. The number of Mughal invasions in the time of ‘Alā’ūḍdin was the largest compared with the times of his predecessors and successors. So formid able were the on slaughts of the Mughals that on more than one occasion it appeared as if the empire would be lost to them. In such circumstances the reorganization of the state army was a great necessity and ‘Alā’ūḍdin took various measures to improve the strength, administration and morale of the army.

The sufferings of the Muslim army at Ranthambhor and Chittor, which were reduced with the utmost difficulty, the unsuccessful expedition of Malik Jūna in the east and about the same time the appearance of Mughals under Targhī in Delhi itself, brought to the mind of the sultan the dire necessity of putting the armed forces on an efficient footing. In consultation with his trusted nobles he decided that the then existing fortifications should be repaired, that new ones should be built at strategic points, and that all of them should be strongly garrisoned. It was also decided to order fresh recruitment and raise a large army to fight external and internal foes.

The army consisted chiefly of cavalry and infantry; elephants were also used in times of war. The Dīvān-i-‘Arz (Muster Master) kept a descriptive roll of every soldier. ‘Alā’ūḍdin introduced the system of branding horses,\(^1\) so that at the time of review no horse could be presented twice or replaced by a worse one. A strict review of the army of \(^1\) Barānī.

the state was occasionally made and the horses and arms of the soldiers were examined. 'Aláúddín maintained a large standing army on a permanent basis, and did not disband his troops as soon as a conquest was accomplished or a foreign invasion repulsed. According to Ferishtah the Sultan maintained a standing army of 4,75,000 horsemen well equipped and accoutred. The salary of a soldier was fixed at 234 tankhas per year or 19½ tankhas per month, and if the soldier had two horses he was given an additional allowance of 78 tankhas per year or 6½ tankhas per month for the maintenance of the additional horse.

The passage in Barani² relating to the salary of a soldier is defective and has aroused much controversy. In the passage quoted below 'Aláúddín says:

دولیست سی و چهار تنکه بمرتب دهم و هفتاد، هشت تنکه
بانوانوسی دهم و دواست و استعداد بر اندازه آن از مرتب
طلبم ویک اسیه و استعداد بر اندازه یک اسیه از مرتب

Martab means a beast of burden, murattab means one who gives or arranges and martab may also be a derivation from مرتبه which means position or dignity. Therefore, it is difficult to fix the meaning of the word martab. In the above passage, however, martab or murattab stands for a soldier whose salary was fixed by the sultan at 234 tankhas.
In those times raw men were not recruited and given training by the state. Only professional soldiers were enrolled. It stands to reason, therefore, that a soldier possessed (at least) one horse. But if he possessed two horses he was given an extra allowance of 78 tankhas for the additional horse. Thus a man with two horses, who was technically known as do aspah got 234 tankhas as his personal salary as a soldier posses-

² Barani p. 303.
F. 17
sing one horse and 78 tankahs for maintaining the second horse. Since he received allowance for an extra horse the sultan insisted upon his maintaining the additional horse. Ordinarily a soldier getting 234 tankahs was required to keep only one horse, and was technically known as yak aspah. It is obvious that no extra allowance was paid to a yak aspah or to one who had more than two horses.

So the above passage of Baranî may be translated as follows:

"I give 234 tankahs to a martab (murattab) or soldier, and give 78 tankahs (more) to a do aspah (or two-horse soldier.) I expect the do aspah to maintain two horses and their corresponding equipment. (But if he is not a do aspah and an ordinary soldier) I expect him to maintain one horse and its corresponding equipment."

This idea is repeated in another passage of Baranî where he says that the salary of a soldier and the extra allowance of a do aspah were quite sufficient for them.

\[\text{The idea again finds confirmation in the following passage in which Qazi Mughisuddin enjoins upon the king to live the life of an ordinary soldier,}^{4}\ \text{and spend only 234 tankahs on himself and his family.}\]

\[\text{\text{\text{\text{\text{The passages of the contemporary chronicler cited above leave no doubt that the salary of an ordinary trooper (ahl-}\text{-}}}}}\]

---

3 Ibid. p. 319.
jihād) was 234 tankahs, while the one who possessed two horses got an extra allowance of 78 tankahs. Dr. I. H. Qureshi,⁵ however, is inclined to agree with Ferishtah that there were three grades of soldiers getting 234, 156 and 78 tankahs respectively. The passage in the Lucknow text of Ferishtah reads:

"مواجب سالیانہ سِیاستی را بہبہ فرہمی مقرر ساہخت - اول دویسے وسی و جبہار تِنکہ دوم پیک صد و پنچہاد وشک تِنکہ
سوم هفتاد و وہش تِنکہ و جُوں عَمال بدیس دستُور عمل نموند
چَهہار لِک و هفتاد و پنچہ ہزار سوار بِقلم در آمَد،"

Dr. Qureshi thinks that the three grades of cavalrymen were murattab, savār and do aspah and got 234, 156 and 78 tankahs respectively. He quotes a passage from Barani⁷ to show that savār was superior to do aspah, since while the former drove away a hundred Mughals before him the latter imprisoned only ten.

"شکرِ اسلام بر اشکرم غفل چِنُم چیرہ گشت که یکادو
اسبہ دے مغول را رَشثہ در گردن اندائختہ می اورِ ایک سوار
مسلمان صح سوار مغول را پیش کرَدہ می دوائید،"

Now, to begin with, as has already been pointed out, the meaning of the word martab or murattab is very doubtful. There is nothing to show that he was a superior officer in the army. Had he been one, Barani would have given his rank or at least would have said so. On the contrary a martab is nothing more than an ordinary soldier (ahl-i-jihād) as both got 234 tankahs. Barani nowhere mentions a savār as a second grade officer or that the lowest grade soldier was known as do aspah. In the above passage Barani simply uses the word savār in the sense of a horseman. He does not specifically mention that a savār was in any way superior to a do aspah. He simply means to say that the Indian soldiers became so dominant that a do aspah could bring ten prisoners of war and a soldier or cavalryman could drive before him a hundred Mughals. It is more difficult to arrest ten than to drive away a hundred men, and the passage quoted above does not prove the superiority of savār to do aspah. It is only a hyperbolical way of asserting the supremacy of Indian soldiers and the passage should not be taken literally.

⁵ Administration of the Sultanate of Delhi, pp. 234-35.
⁶ Ferishtah p. 114.
⁷ Barani p. 320.

To conclude. The salary fixed for a soldier by ‘Alāūddin was 234 tankahs a year or 19½ tankahs a month. For maintaining an extra horse he got 6½ tankahs more. There were, however, no gradations of soldiers on the lines suggested by Ferishtah.

The salary of the trooper was pretty meagre, but ‘Alāūddin seems to have been very particular in keeping his soldiers contented. His instructions to Malik Tājuddin Kāfür while the latter was marching on an expedition to Warangal clearly show the keen interest ‘Alāūddin took in the welfare of his soldiers. He used to lavish largesses on his generals and troops whenever they returned from the Deccan. But the king could not give his soldiers a high salary. He was also opposed to assigning them lands for their maintenance. Consequently he cheapened the necessaries of life, controlled the market, and undertook other economic measures which will be studied in the next chapter. These reforms were undertaken primarily for the benefit of the soldiery, and indicate the interest the sultan took in the well-being of the army on which depended the fulfilment of his ambitions and the defence of the state.

Social Reforms.

Curiously enough some of the social reforms of ‘Alāūddin were also an outcome of political exigencies and not of any philanthropic motives. One of the notable steps was the prohibition of sale and use of intoxicants. He enforced prohibition not because drinking was harmful to the people at large but because its use made people assemble in gatherings, lose themselves and think of revolt. It was with the intention of putting an end to any incentives to rebellion that the Sultan ordered prohibition.\(^8\)

Wine is prohibited in Islam. Nevertheless wine drinking was perhaps the greatest vice of Muslim sultans and nobles in medieval times. 'Aláúddín himself drank hard, and was advised by Malik 'Aláulmulk to stop drinking to excess and holding convivial parties if he wanted to be a successful monarch.\(^9\) It is not known as to what extent 'Aláúddín followed the advice of his sagacious courtier, but with the successive outbreaks in his kingdom he determined to put a stop to the use of wine and other intoxicants. First he only ordered prohibition of the sale and purchase of wine, but afterwards prohibited the use of hemp, toddy (bagh) and other intoxicants as well.\(^{10}\) Gambling and dicing were also

---

\(^8\) 'Isámi gives an interesting story in connection with the prohibition. He says that one day when the Sultan was sitting with his boon companions like Malik Qirá Beg, Malik Qirán and others, one of the nobles present there obediently told him how the people were suffering on account of the famine that year, while the king was making merry. The Sultan was greatly moved with this remark and from that day he gave up wine, prohibited it among other people and undertook various reforms. (Futúh pp. 305-7). The story seems to be nothing more than hearsay.

\(^9\) Baráni pp. 270-71.

\(^{10}\) Baráni p. 284 has باغنی بینگ و قمار - شراب Bagni or Buggni is described in Persian dictionaries as a kind of light and intoxicating beverage, which can be classed with nabiz or a lawful drink. Steingass says that Bagni is malt liquor or beer. "'Aláúddín, inspired by a recent convert's burning zeal for total prohibition appears to have classed Bagni with the unlawful and intoxicating drinks and gone further than the theologians." (Hodivala pp. 276-77).
prohibited. In short ‘Alāūddīn prohibited all those things which encouraged convivial assemblies and in which people expressed themselves freely. There is no doubt that it was in such congregations that “evil politics” was discussed and conspiracies against king and government were hatched.¹¹

‘Alāūddīn began by excommunicating from the capital vintners, drunkards, gamblers and vendors of toddy and hemp. High officials were ordered to mount on elephants and proclaim aloud in every market and street of Delhi, and at all the gates on the outskirts of the city that the use and sale of wine were strictly prohibited. As an act of goodwill the king himself gave up drinking wine. All the beautiful glass and porcelain vessels of the king’s place were smashed and piled in heaps before the Badaon Gate. Gold and silver vessels were melted and coined into money.¹² Large quantities of wine, which were stored in the palace cellars, were poured out into the streets. The people were also ordered to throw away any wine they possessed so that the streets of Delhi were “filled with mud and mire as in the rainy season.”

As soon as the orders were enforced the respectable people at once gave up drinking, but the habitual drinkers as also those whose livelihood depended upon the sale of wine resorted to illegal means to continue the sale and use of wine. They erected small stills or pans (bhatthī) and distilled wine from sugar. The product was sold in the black-market and drunk in secrecy. Not only was liquor fermented in the capital city by such illegal means, it was also smuggled into Delhi in leather bags, hidden under bundles of grass or fuel and by many other devices. But ‘Alāūddīn’s orders were never enforced partially. As soon as he came to know that wine was secretly sold he ordered the offenders to be severely punished. Their wine was seized and given to elephants of the royal stables, and the culprits were beaten with sticks, fettered and thrown into wells specially dug for the purpose in front of the Badaon Gate. In these monstrous holes many offenders rotted and died while those who got released after some time were so much shattered in health that they were almost half dead and took much time to regain their lost strength.

¹¹ The conspiracy at Malik Tājuddīn Kūchī’s residence against Jalāl may be cited as an instance, Barānī pp. 190-91.

¹² Ferishtah, p. 109.

The intelligence department (barıds and munhiyāns) strictly supervised over everything that happened inside the capital and their very existence made the people renounce wine. Those who could not give up liquor in any case used to go into villages ten or twelve kos from Delhi and drink there, but inside the capital city or its environs like Ghayāspūr, Indarpat and Kilughari or even in villages four or five kos from it, the sale and purchase of wine was not at all feasible.

The orders of the sultan had been carried to such an extreme to which perhaps even he himself did not want. He simply wanted that country wine, which is very intoxicating should not be drunk freely, openly or in large assemblies. As soon, therefore, as he came to know that wine drinking had been given up by the nobility and the respectable people of the city, and that the incorrigible must drink in spite of the severe punishments accorded to them, he relaxed his orders to some extent. He permitted private distillation and drinking in secret. In short, people were required to carry their wine like gentlemen and not to hold drink-parties. Nonetheless no public selling or use of wine was permitted.

According to Baranī, ʿAlāʿuddīn’s orders about prohibition had the desired effect, and “from the day that the use of wine was interdicted in the City, treachery and rebellion (كنکا چھاگی بلخاؤک) began to diminish and thought of rebellion left the minds of the people.”
Prohibition of Incest and Adultery.

It was discovered that certain Shia sects like the Carmathians and Ismaelias indolged in free licence and incest. According to Ferishtah such sects were found in some countries like Sham (Syria) but were never known to have existed in India. As soon as Alauddin came to know of these shameless people he ordered them to be severely punished. The saw of punishment cut them down after searching them in towns and cities, so that incestuous tribes were altogether extirpated.

Prostitution was also stopped and all professional women of the city were compelled to marry within a prescribed period of time. This stopping of the immoral trade was one of the most important steps of Sultan Alauddin, as it preserved public morals. Similarly the sultan also put down adultery by enforcing a regulation according to which the adulteress was stoned to death and the adulterer was castrated.

Charlatanism was discouraged and punished. "Blood sucking magicians," says Amir Khusrau, were severely punished by being stoned to death. Although Barani does not make mention of any steps against sorcerers and magicians,

---

13 Barani (p. 336) calls them Ibahityan and Bodhkan and ascribes the event of their punishment to the closing years of Alauddin.

15 Khazain. Allahabad University Ms. fol. 10(a). Habib Trs. p. 11. Barani does not mention compulsory marriage for prostitutes. Ferishtah's statement based on the Muhlikats of 'Ainuddin Bijapuri that the king classified prostitutes under three grades and fixed their fees, should be rejected as Khusrau, a contemporary, definitely states that Alauddin discouraged prostitution.

16 Barani p. 296.

17 Khazain. Habib Trs. p. 12.
yet his assertion, that in ‘Alāūddīn’s time nobody had the courage to profess knowledge of “alchemy or magic” from fear of the Sultan, is significant. It is quite probable that in those days of superstition and universal belief in witchcraft, people may have been terrorised by certain magicians and quacks and ‘Alāūddīn put an end to their nefarious trade.

Except for prohibition of wine, which probably was undertaken with a political motive, the other reforms of ‘Alāū-dīn were surely meant for the benefit of the public at large and the tranquillity of the country. That the sultan realised the evils of adultery, prostitution and sorcery and took steps to stop them shows that he was not only a military ruler but also a social reformer.
CHAPTER XVII

ECONOMIC MEASURES

‘Alá’ud-dín’s passion for incessant conquest and constant invasions of the Mughal free-booters from the north-west had rendered maintenance of a large army unavoidable. Besides the army, the expenses on a large staff of state officials, civil and military administration, and on slaves\(^1\) involved heavy liabilities on the royal exchequer. The wealth accumulated in the time of Sultan Jalá’ud-dín,\(^2\) the treasures secured from the raid on Devagiri in 1296 and the yearly tributes collected from the various provinces and dependencies of the empire were insufficient to meet the financial burden. Even the raising of the revenue to fifty per cent. of the produce, the levying of different kinds of cesses, and the conversion of the drinking vessels of gold and silver into coins\(^3\) failed to meet the requirements of the state. It was calculated that if the king recruited a large number of troops on a moderate salary, the entire state treasure would be exhausted within five or six years.\(^4\) Moreover, from 1303 onwards a large number of buildings were constructed. ‘Alá’ud-dín, therefore, decided to cut down the salary of soldiers; but to prevent their falling a victim to economic distress\(^5\) he decided to reduce the prices

---

\(^1\) According to Ferishtah ‘Alá’ud-dín had 50,000 slaves.

\(^2\) Jalá’ud-dín was not an extravagant monarch. He did not waste money to maintain a magnificent court nor did he undertake any grand conquests which might have entailed a large expense. According to Taríkh-i-Haqqi (Bankipore Ms. Fol. 200) he was not liberal.

\(^3\) Also Baraní p. 188.

\(^4\) Ferishtah p. 109.

\(^5\) Baraní p. 303.

\(^5\) Ibid. p. 304.
of commodities of daily use. With this end in view, he instituted various regulations and promulgated orders which brought down the cost of living. These regulations, which may be termed as Economic Reforms of 'Alāʿuddin Khalji, form a conspicuous feature of his administration.

Shaikh Naṣiruddin, the author of Khairulmajālis (written in 1352-53 A.D.), has given a very interesting anecdote in connection with these regulations. He writes that once Qazi Ḥamīdduddin held a grand feast and invited him (the saint) to dinner. When all the other guests had left and the Shaikh was the only person left with Ḥamīd, the latter related an incident of the days of 'Alāʿuddin. He said that once he found sultan 'Alāʿuddin sitting close and pensive, his head bare, his mind perturbed. Malik Qīra Bēg asked the sultan to unfold the reason of his quiet contemplation and oppressing silence. The sultan replied: 'Listen! It has often crossed my mind...that in this world of God, where so many men reside, I have been chosen to rule (over them). It behoves me, therefore, that I should do something the benefit of which may be enjoyed by everybody (بهم خلق). I know that whether I distribute all the treasures that I possess or give away all the lands and villages to the people, I would not be able to benefit the whole section of them. Just now, however, an idea has struck my mind and I shall talk it over to you. I have planned to cheapen the foodstuffs and the benefit (of this step) will reach everybody. Grain would be made cheap in this way. I will send for all the naigān (roving merchants) who bring grain into the City. I shall give them money from the treasury to buy and bring grain (into the City). (In lieu thereof) I shall give the traders apparel and money to support their families.' Orders were accordingly given and grain began to arrive from all sides.

---

6 See the chapter on Administration.
The saint then comments "such was sultan 'Ala'uddin that people used to pay homage to his tomb, put sacred thread on his grave, beg for boons and their wishes were fulfilled." This may be called Sufic interpretation of 'Ala'uddin's Market Control. The incident has not been mentioned by any historian contemporary or later. It is recorded in a book on saints written about fifty years after the enforcement of market regulations. Even if it be accepted as true, since the Qazi's conversation with Sultan took place at a private interview, the philanthropic motive of the Sultan as depicted by the author of Khairulmajalis, may have been only a passing whim of his mind. Barani, the contemporary historian, definitely states that 'Ala'uddin introduced market regulations for the benefit of the imperial troops. The army was only a portion of the humanity (Khalq-i-Khuda) whom the king was trying to make happy. Moreover, the prices were controlled in Delhi alone, and nothing was done for the benefit of the people elsewhere. Again, the peasants and the traders were also as good Khalq-i-Khuda as the soldiers, but the regulations of 'Ala'uddin, as would appear from the following pages, proved to be highly injurious to their interests. Even to the soldiery the benefit of the cheapness of the prices did not amount to much. If the prices for the necessaries of life were lowered the salaries of the soldiers were also curtailed, and it is difficult to conclude that the troops really gained from the new arrangement. Ziyauddin's humorous expression that a rumour got afloat in Delhi that "a camel could be had for a dang, but wherefrom the dang" clearly explains the position. The revenue regulations of the sultan impoverished the agriculturists. His reduction of salaries of soldiers did not improve the lot of government servants. In these circumstances the control of price was the outcome of an imperative necessity rather than of a philanthropic motive. Moreover, the harshness and violence with which the market regulations were enforced, tell a story very different from that related by Shaikh Naşiruddin.

---

Khairulmajalis Prof. Habib's Ms. fols. 290-92.

In fact high prices mean a high standard of living. 'Ala'uddin did not want to pay high salaries. He did not want people to be rich lest they should be refractory and turbulent. Naturally, if he wanted to pay lower salaries he had to lower the prices of commodities. 'Ala'uddin may not have known such principles of Political Economy, but one thing is certain that his reduction of salaries and his revenue regulations directly, and his market control indirectly, impoverished his subjects. Ziyāuddin Baranī is quite correct when he says that the sultan lowered the prices of commodities, firstly, because he wanted to reduce the salaries of the soldiers to relieve pressure on the imperial exchequer, and secondly, because he wanted to keep them contented with their meagre pay.

The reign of 'Ala'uddin was full of bloody warfare, a state which tended to increase the prices of commodities. Moreover, war involves dislocation of traffic, and the almost primitive means of transport of the 13th and 14th centuries must have been surely affected by the then conditions. A glaring instance of it is to be found during the invasion of Targhī (1303 A.D.) when the Mughal invader stopped all caravans from entering Delhi by capturing the roads around it as well as the fords of Jumna. Such a situation would have created intense scarcity of food grain in the capital and would have raised the prices of things exorbitantly. 'Ala'uddin tried to overcome the difficulties of transport and of high prices by accumulating food stuffs in the capital on the one hand, and by fixing their prices on the other. For this, the sultan undertook certain measures which are interesting to study as they show that as far back as the 14th century the principles of enhancement of taxes, of price control, and of rationing during a state of war, were as much comprehensible as they are to-day.
Food Control.

The prime necessity of man is food to which the sultan gave his first and fullest attention. To begin with, he regulated the prices of food-grains and fixed them at very low rates. The prices fixed were as follows:

- Wheat: 7½ jital per man.
- Barley: 4 jital, ,,.
- Gram: 5 jital, ,,.
- Rice: 5 jital, ,,.
- Mash (Urad): 5 jital, ,,.
- Moth: 3 jital, ,,.

It is extremely difficult to calculate these prices in terms of modern currency and weights since the data necessary to determine the proportion of the coins and weights of those times with the modern ones are not available. The purchasing power of money since the 14th century has considerably changed. Consequently, it is not easy to determine exactly as to what extent man in the 14th century was better or worse off than he is to-day.

Ferishtah, however, states that in ‘Alāūdīn’s times a tankah, whether of gold or silver, was equal to one tola in weight, and that a tankah of silver was equal to fifty jitals. The weight of jital, a small copper coin which continued to be current in Ferishtah’s time also, weighed according to some one tola and according to some others 1½ tolas. The tankah of ‘Alāūdīn, adds Ferishtah, was equal to one tola consisting of 96 rattis, and so also it was later found by Babur. Therefore, the tankah of ‘Alāūdīn was exactly equal in weight to the present day rupee. So far as the jital is concerned, Mr. Nelson Wright thinks that “an equation of 48

---

8 This list does not exhaust the names of all food-grains. Obviously the prices of other cereals like pulses and peas would also have been controlled in the same way.

9 Nelson Wright p. 72.
jitals to the tankah would be more in keeping with probability than one of 50 jitals’ which ratio is given by Ferishtah. Mr. Wright further adds “the fractional silver issues of 7th century point emphatically to a tankah of 48 jitals. To that extent Ferishtah’s statement which after all was made some centuries later must be regarded as indirectly corroborative rather than implicitly correct. The jital then may be taken as equivalent to two ratties of silver.”

Thus if we take a tankah equal to a rupee, a jital could be equal to 1½ of our modern pice.

7½ jitals, says Barani, bought one man of wheat. The man of Firuz Tughlaq’s time was of 40 sers and a ser is stated to have been of 70 misqal. Taking the weight of misqal at the even average of 72 grains, the ser would range at 5040 grains and a man would amount to 201, 600 grains, 35 lbs. troy and 28.8 lbs. avoirdupois. Ferishtah, however, says that the man of Alauddin’s time consisted of 40 sers, the weight of a ser being 24 tolas. Thus according to Ferishtah, a man of Alauddin’s times was equal to 12 sers and according to Thoms’ calculations it was equal to 14 sers of today. Thus if 7½ jitals bought one man of wheat, one jital would buy 5½ sers (of 24 tolas each). Calculated in modern money one pice (¼ jital) would buy 1½ ser of 80 tolas each. Thus a present day rupee would buy about two present day maunds of wheat in Alauddin’s time. All other prices may be calculated on this basis.

Now, though the prices fixed by Alauddin were quite low yet it is difficult to agree with Barani that they were the lowest compared with those that were prevalent in the reigns of his predecessors and successors. In the time of Balban, baked bread used to sell at two sers a jital; and, therefore, wheat.

10 Ibid.
would have been cheaper still. Price level on the whole went up in the time of Muhammad bin Tughlaq, but it again dropped to the previous level of 'Aláuddin under Firóz Tughlaq. The following table would illustrate this point:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Commodity</th>
<th>Price under Aláuddin</th>
<th>Under Firóz</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Wheat</td>
<td>7½ jital</td>
<td>8 jital</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barley</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Paddy and pulses</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sugar</td>
<td>100</td>
<td>120 &amp; 140</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

It is possible that 'Afif exaggerated when giving the prices of the time of Firóz, because Shaikh Naširuddin Chiragh says in Khairulmujālis, which he wrote in Firóz's reign, that 'Aláuddin's days were cheaper. Yet we find that prices were still cheaper in the time of the Lūdīs. The author of Tarīkh-i-Dāūdī mentions that in the reign of sultan Ibrahim Lūdī the prices of commodities were cheaper than those obtained in the reign of any other sultan except in 'Aláuiddin's last days. He further adds that whereas in 'Aláuiddin's time the cheapness of price was maintained by resorting to coercion and force, in Ibrahim's reign prices remained low without anything like that. Thus what is really of importance in 'Aláuiddin's reign is not so much the cheapness of the prices, as "the establishment of a fixed price in the market, which was considered one of the wonders of the age."

The Grain Market.

Having fixed the prices of food grain, the sultan established grain market and government grain stores wherever... the people and the merchants could obtain foodstuffs. The grain market was run by two types of merchants. Firstly, those who had their permanent shops in Delhi and may be called retailers or distributors, and secondly, the caravaniāns or travelling-merchants who brought grain into the city and sold it to the shopkeepers as well as to the people. Before the enforcement of market regulations the shopkeepers as well as the caravaniāns made as much profit as they liked. But with the promulgation of the new orders fixing the prices of food grains at a lower level and for all time—irrespective of the vagaries of weather—the merchants were left with very little marginal profit. The result was that while the shopkeepers in Delhi looked with disgust at the new regulations, the caravaniāns stopped coming into the City. But 'Alāūddin was determined to see his scheme carried out to a successful end. He ordered that the travelling-merchants should get themselves registered with the Shahnah of the market. Malik Qabūl, the superintendent of the Grain Market, apprehended the leaders of the travelling-merchants and kept them under surveillance until they agreed to bring grain regularly to the market from places outside Delhi and sell it at scheduled rates. They were asked to take up residence with their women and children in villages on the Jumna within the direct jurisdiction of the superintendent. They had no other alternative but to obey. They signed agreements, collectively and individually, to maintain a regular supply of grain to the market. Thus the danger of supplies falling short in the grain market was eliminated.

(To obviate the difficulties of caravaniāns in obtaining grain at prices which would ensure them a margin of profit 'Alāūddin issued a royal rescript to all the magistrates and collectors (shahnagān and mutţarrifān) of the country lying in the doāb and other regions near the capital city, requiring them to give written undertakings to the crown to the effect that they would try to obtain as much grain from the cultivators as possible. They were ordered to realise 50% of the produce as land tax from the agriculturists with the utmost rigour. They were also asked to compel the latter to sell their surplus stocks to the travelling merchants on the fields, at a rate fixed by the king. It was the duty of the revenue officials to prevent regrating of corn by husbandmen and to see that they were left only with bare sustenance.\(^{14}\) For breach of this regulation the officers were held responsible and were called to account. Thus all the available grain flowed into the market which remained well stocked. Black-marketing did not and could not exist, and profits were wiped off.

_The Grain Stores._

Besides the husbandman and the roving merchant there was yet another factor from which interruption in supply could be apprehended. This was weather on which depended crops.\(^{15}\) (As a counterblast against its vagaries) the sultan

\(^{14}\) Baranī says that a peasant could not even lay aside ten _man_ of grain (p. 305). The following two statements of Baranī testify to the severe orders of the sultan:

(1) خراج ميان دولاب ولولیت صد کرویه برنهگی چنان بشود طللبند (نطلبنند) که ریت غله برسرکشت بلست کاروانیان بفروشند (305 p).

(2) سلطان فرمان داداپس تاز دیوان اعلی از رعایا خراج چنان بشود طلب نمایند که ایشان را غله ازکشت درخواند اوردن و احتکار کردن میکنند و هم برسرکشت بنحو افزار غله بلست کاروانیان بفروشند (307 p).

\(^{15}\) Cf. the famine in Jalāluddīn's time when price of grain rose very high.
established government grain stores. These granaries were kept well stocked. There was scarcely a mohalla, says Barani, where two or three royal stores filled with foodstuffs did not exist. These were different from grain shops. They were godowns where grain was stored in reserve to be released in times of emergency. If the crops were spoilt due to scarcity or irregularity of rainfall, or if the primitive agencies of transport were not able to bring sufficient grain into the capital the accumulated grain was taken out, handed over to the travelling merchants, who carried it to the grain market, where it was sold to the public at the regulated prices and in quantities fixed for individual purchasers.

Rationing.

(\(\text{In favourable seasons the people could buy as much grain as they liked. But conditions were not the same in seasons of drought and famine. In seasons of drought, grain could not be sold to the people of Delhi in indefinite quantities, the more so because the people of the vicinity also flocked into the capital city. Consequently it was rationed. In seasons of scarcity each household was given half a }\text{man} \text{ of grain per day. Ferishtah's statement is a little different. He says that in times of drought every purchaser was required to buy just the quantity he needed, and if somebody bought even half a }\text{man} \text{ more than his needs, he was severely punished.}\))

\[16\] Barani's statement is more acceptable on the ground that half a man (approximately 6 or 7 sers) per day was a reasonable quantity in those days for a normal family with one or two servants. Rich persons of the town who had no villages or fields to fall back upon in unfavourable seasons were also given a fixed quantity of grain for their requirements.

\[17\] Ferishtah p. 112.

Barani clearly says (p. 309)
But in those days there were no ration cards nor were people numbered or counted for obtaining grain in fixed quantities. It seems that whosoever went to the bazār was given a reasonable quantity of grain. Barānī says that during the seasons of drought poor and helpless people crowded in the bazārs and sometimes got crushed to death. In such cases, where the officers were found derelict in discharging their duty, they, as well as the superintendent of the market, were taken to task by the king. The chronicler does not say much about the poor people or if there was any provision for the free distribution of grain in times of scarcity. It appears, however, that no such concessions were given to anybody as the prices of food grains were already sufficiently cheap. The system of rationing was a novel idea of ‘Alāūddīn, and Barānī asserts that on account of the various regulations of ‘Alāūddīn no famine occurred in Delhi even when there was drought and people thought famine to be unavoidable. At least in Delhi the people lived a life of contentment, undisturbed by any fear of scarcity.

Ferishtah’s statement that the prices fixed for Delhi were obtained in other parts of the country as well, is very doubtful. Firstly, it was very difficult in those days to fix a uniform price of food grains and other articles all over the empire. Even in the 20th century, with all the elaborate system of transport and communications, a uniform system of price control has not been possible in India. In the 14th century conditions were still more unfavourable. Secondly, Barānī always talks only of the capital city while describing

---

18 Ibid. p. 309.

19 According to Dr. Moti Chand rationing was resorted to ameliorate conditions of famine in ancient India. (Journal of the U.P. Historical Society, vol. XIX December, 1945). That may be so, but ‘Alāūddīn’s scheme was quite novel so far as Muslim rule in India is concerned.

20 Ferishtah p. 112.
rationing and price control, and his statements are more trustworthy than Ferishtah's. Baranī was living in 'Alāūddins days, Ferishtah was not.

The Market Officials.

Such an elaborate system of market control under which prices of articles were fixed, the merchants registered, and profiteering and speculation strictly forbidden, could not be worked without a large and efficient staff of officials. 'Alāūddin appointed Malik Qabûl, who was a trustworthy servant of Ulugh Khan and whom Baranī credits with wisdom, discretion, and trustworthiness, as shahnah or superintendent of the market. He was granted a large estate and was given a large body of cavalry and infantry to help him in the discharge of his duties. His powers were extensive and he was put in charge of all the travelling-marchants of the city. He saw to it that they regularly brought grain to the grain market, sold it at rates fixed by the crown and that nothing was hoarded or sold in the black-market. He used to report to the Sultan about prices prevailing in the market and also about the general condition of the bazār. His reports were verified through other sources which would be mentioned below, and if there was even a little difference between the reports of the superintendent and other officials of the bazār, a thorough enquiry was conducted to find out the cause of discrepancy and the defaulters were severly punished. The shahnah, who held a high position and big estates, was in constant dread of the sultan, and was liable to be taken to task for any delinquency. He tried his utmost to see that nothing happened in the market against the orders or wishes of the sultan lest the wrath of the king should fall on him. In spite of his high authority in the market, Malik Qabûl could not suggest a single amendment or change in the king's orders. When once or twice in seasons of drought he requested the sultan to raise a little the price of grain, he was awarded twenty cuts. Consequently the superintendent could not afford to be anything but an extremely harsh and strict officer. He moved about in the grain market whipping the fraudulent merchants publicly. The strictness of the shah-nah compelled the market people to be honest in their dealings.

Other officials of the grain market were the barid-i-mandi, who reported the quality of the wares, and the munhiyāns who may be compared to the secret service police of to-day. These officials were inferior to the shahnah-i-mandi in status, but they submitted their reports separately and directly to the sultan and not through the shahnah. Thus the shrewd monarch received reports of the market from three different sources and scrutinized them carefully. This compelled the market officials to be correct in their accounts and honest in their dealings. The traders also could not deviate from the market regulations, since they would not receive any favour from a single officer.

The Cloth Market.

Next to food, the other important item of price control was cloth. In fact the sultan established separate markets for all the commodities needed by the soldier. There was a horse market, a slave market, markets for cattle and for sweets, spices, fruits, weapons, shoes etc. Ziyāuddin Barānī describes in detail the condition of the Cloth Market, the administration of which was regulated on the lines of the Grain Market. Just as Malik Qabul was appointed shahnah of the Grain Market, one Yāqūb was appointed as Divān-i-Riyāsat to control the Cloth Market, but his jurisdiction extended to other markets also. The Sultan had given him the post of Divān-i-Riyāsat in addition to his duties as Nāzir (Superintendent Dārogah) and Muhtasib (Censor of Public Morals) of the empire.21

21 Barānī p. 317.
Thus his powers were very extensive indeed, and although Malik Qabūl was all in all in the Grain Market, he was in reality subordinate to Yāqūb in rank, since Baranī at one place says that Yāqūb appointed shahānaḥs for each of the various market in the town. The Divān-i-Riyāṣat was "not only trustworthy and upright but also ill-tempered, hard, close, cruel and coarse." The respect and obedience he commanded on account of his position as well as temper, and the severe punishments he freely inflicted upon the bazār people, improved the tone of transactions in the markets.

(The Cloth Market was located in the building known as the Sarai ‘Adl. It was established "inside the Badaon gate) in the direction of Kaushak-i-Sabz, which for years had not been used." The Sarai ‘Adl was open from early morning till late in the night, the hour of the last prayer. The public, therefore, could buy wares any time during the day. It was the only market in the town which dealt in cloth, since no trader was permitted to sell his goods secretly or at prices higher than those fixed by the sultan. Those who dared to contravene this regulation were severely punished and their goods lapsed to the crown.) Ziyāuddin gives a long list of silk and cotton cloths, the prices of which were fixed by the crown. It is difficult to ascertain the prices of cloths now because the measure and currency of those days cannot be calculated in modern money, and also because in many cases the contemporary chronicler does not give measure of the cloth whose price he mentions. He simply mentions the name of the stuff and its price without mentioning any specific measure. But it is well-nigh certain that cloth was not cheap in those days. While wheat was sold at 7½ jītals per man; a chādar, obviously of ordinary size, was sold at 10 jītals. Long-cloth of good quality, twenty yards in length, was sold for one tankah. It is the only thing for which Baranī gives a measure. Shaikh Naṣiruddin Chirāgh, writing in Khairulmujālis says that in the time of 'Alāūddin a quilt (lihāf) could be made in one or two tankahs. He gives the details of various stuffs needed in its preparation. The upper piece (fard) could be had for 20 jītāls, border of ordinary quality for 30 jītāls, cotton and lower piece (astar) for 12 jītāls. Carding and sewing meant a further cost of 4 to 6 jītāls. Compared with to-day cotton cloth was fairly cheap. But at another place the Shaikh writes that in those days a whole feast could be arranged in one tankah. Compared with food, therefore, cloth of even ordinary quality was not cheap in those times.

---

22 Ibid. p. 318.

The prices of silk cloths were very high indeed. Delhi Khazz was sold for 16 tankahs, almost a whole month's pay of a soldier; Silahti, an ordinary cotton cloth, which is known to this day and which was cheap in the time of Akbar, was sold at 6 tankahs. The fact that 'Alāūddin controlled the price of cloth and gave advance to merchants to import goods into Delhi, shows that cloth was still dearer before the Sultan issued the regulations. (Baranī relates that a regulation was introduced whereby people were stopped from buying silk stuffs at cheap rates in Delhi and selling them at prices four or five times higher outside Delhi.) This clearly means that outside the metropolis the price of cloth was still higher. The following cloths and their controlled prices have been given by Baranī:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Delhi Khazz silk</th>
<th>16 tankahs</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Orange colour raw silk</td>
<td>6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Half Silks, mixed with hair</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shirīn Bāft fine</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&quot; &quot; middling</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>&quot; &quot; coarse</td>
<td>2</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

23 Blochmann: Ain-i-Akbarī, p. 95.
Silāḥī fine.......................... 6 tankahs.
“ ” middling........................ 4 "
“ ” coarse.......................... 2 "
Red striped stuffs..................... 6 jītals.
Common stuffs........................ 3½ "
Red lining of Nagor................... 24 "
Coarse lining.......................... 12 "
Long-cloth fine......................... 1 tankah for 20 yards.
“ ” coarse.......................... 1 tankah for 40 yards.
Chādar................................. 10 jītals.

The control of prices of cloth brought to the forefront the same problems which had cropped up in the case of food grains. The merchants were reluctant to sell their goods in Delhi, since they were not allowed as much profit as they were accustomed to. Moreover, they bought their goods in far off places at prices which surely were not controlled, they incurred expenses in transporting them to Delhi, and then they were expected to sell their articles in the capital at prices fixed by the Sultan. In the case of agricultural produce \(^{24}\) Alāūddin could compel the cultivators in the doāb and other regions to sell grain to the travelling-merchants at regulated rates, but he could not compel manufacturers of far off places like Devagiri and Multan, and places beyond Multan in the north west,\(^{25}\) to sell to merchants goods at fixed rates. Consequently the Sultan provided more facilities to cloth merchants than to those who imported grain into Delhi. So far as the registration was concerned every merchant whether Hindu or Muselman who traded in Delhi\(^{25}\) was ordered to get his name registered with the Divān-i-Riyāsat. He was also required \(^{24}\) E.g. Devagiri silks, horses, swords and other sundry articles were brought from far off places.

\(^{25}\) Baranī says “merchants of the empire” but this seems to be an exaggeration. ‘Alāūddin was only concerned with Delhi where the prices were controlled.
to sign an agreement stipulating that he would bring a fixed quantity of goods in the city and sell them at controlled rates. The Sultan advanced money from the state treasury to the Multānī merchants to enable them to purchase commodities elsewhere and to sell them in the Sarai 'Adl at the controlled rates. The money advanced by the sultan amounted to about 2,000,000 tankahs. Ziyāuddin does not say if the merchants were expected to return the same to the public exchequer. It would appear that as the money was advanced for buying commodities at higher rates outside, and selling them at cheaper and controlled rates in Delhi, the merchants could not be expected to return it. But the observation of Barānī that the king determined the prices of various goods leaving a fair margin of profit to the merchant26 leads one to infer that the government money was returned by the merchant after his goods had been sold out. Ibn Batūtah’s statement makes the point clear. He says that the sultan abolished all taxes on merchandise, advanced money to merchants and told them: “with this money buy bullock and sheep, and sell them; the price that they will fetch must be paid to the treasury, and you shall receive allowance for selling them.”27 Thus it would appear that the Multānī merchants and other traders who were induced to trade in Delhi were not traders in the true sense of the term, selling goods at profitable rates; but they were virtually agents of the government. They were advanced money to buy goods abroad and sell them in Delhi, and they received remuneration for this service. It may be surmised that such transactions must have caused an immense loss to the state.

To put a stop to black-marketeering, restriction were imposed on the sale and purchase of high class fabrics. Silks were sold at high prices outside Delhi and there was danger of people’s buying costly stuffs in the capital at controlled rates and selling them at prices four or five times higher outside. Thus the evil of profiteering at the cost of the state loomed large. Some cases of profiteering on the part of public men were brought to the notice of the sultan, who was not slow to issue orders to counteract it. Accordingly nobody was allowed to buy costly stuffs as tāshīh and Tabrezī, Delhi faiselle silks (khazz), kamkhoobs, shashtari, hariri, Chinese, Bhīram and Devagiri silks, cloths embroidered with gold threads and other similar articles, without first obtaining a permit from the Dīvān-i-Riyāsat. The Dīvān issued permits to Maliks and Amirs and other well-known persons with whose credentials he was satisfied. The purchaser had to give a written receipt in acknowledgment of the article bought by him and in this way any possibility of profiteering in the black market was eliminated.

26 Barānī p. 316.

Horse Market.

Rules were also framed to regulate the sale of horses, cattle and slaves. In medieval times cavalry was the most important branch of the army and horses were much valued. In Central Asia, among the Mughals, horse stealing was punished with death. In South India large amount of money was spent by Hindu Rajas to procure horses from countries like Arabia and Qipchāq. In North India horses of good breed were mostly imported from Arabia, Persia and Afghanistan, but the Mughal activities interrupted the course of trade and the price of horses rose high. But ‘Alāūddīn could not allow a high price for any commodity needed by a soldier, and the price of horses was also regulated. Horses considered fit for military service were divided into three grades according to their quality and breed. The price of the best

28 Barani p. 311.

اسامی (؟ اسپهبانی) که بنام حشم در دیوان بگذ رنده

29 Barani p. 313, has insert Persian quotation from note 28. By Dīvān here is meant Dīvān-i-'Arz اسامی is meaningless. It is in all probability اسپهبانی quality horse ranged from 100 to 120 tankahs, that of the second from 80 to 90 tankahs, and of the third from 65 to 70 tankahs. The horses which were not passed as fit for military service by the Divān, and which were known as tatbūs (ponies) were priced from 10 to 25 tankahs. To maintain these low prices Alāʾūdīn had to treat the horse brokers and middlemen very severely. He ordered that no dealer or his agent should be permitted to frequent the market with the intention of buying a horse for reselling it at a higher price. But it was not very easy to bring them under control. Dallāls or middlemen are even to-day one of the most cunning and unmanageable section of the mandī people. In those days, declares Ziyāūdīn, “brokers and middlemen were a most arrogant, rebellious and audacious class of people.” They were wont to take commission both from the purchaser and the seller in every transaction, and had so complicated the business that no transaction could be effected without their mediation. Virtually, they were the “Kings of the market.” Consequently it was with some difficulty that the sultan could bring the brokers to book. He instituted very harsh measures to put an end to the nefarious dallāls, who for years had earned their livelihood on high bidding and speculation. Those who still persisted in their old ways were incarcerated with life long imprisonment. It was no longer possible for the merchants and brokers to prevaricate or speak lies, and the price of horses fixed by the sultan began to obtain in the city.

Alāʾūdīn used to send for inspection after every six weeks or two months horses of every variety to ascertain that each variety was sold at the price specified for it. If any variation was detected the brokers had to suffer penalties and punishments. Fear kept the brokers vigilant and prevented them from trading upon the simplicity of customers. In this way the king was successful in establishing fixed prices for horses of every variety.
(On lines similar to these were fixed the prices of slaves and cattle.) In medieval times slaves of both sexes, like any other commodity, were sold in the market and the sultan fixed prices for them also. The standard price of a working girl was fixed at from 5 to 12 tankahs, and that of a good-looking girl from 20 to 30 and even to 40 tankahs. If a very beautiful slave girl of a very high price, say of 100 or 200 tankahs, was offered for sale in the market, nobody dared to buy her for fear of the munhiyôns (secret police), lest the king should be informed that a particular person was rich enough to pay so high a price for a slave girl. The prices of boys were fixed from 20 to 30 tankahs. The slave-boys were classified according to their looks and working capacity. As was the case with the horse market, in the slave market also it was not possible for the dealers and monied men to go about showing or seeing slave boys or girls or tampering with their prices. The punishments inflicted on brokers for contravening the orders of the king were very severe and Barani exaggeratedly, though not untruthfully, says that such penalties were inflicted on the brokers that even life became distasteful to them, and they longed for death.

Similar regulations were introduced in the cattle market also. A good beast of burden which was sold for 40 tankahs in the reign of Muḥammad Tughlaq or of Fīrūz, used to be sold for 4 or at the most 5 tankahs in the time of ‘Alāūddīn. A cow for slaughtering was sold at a tankah and a half while a milk cow was sold at 3 to 4 tankahs. The price of a cow or buffalo in milk averaged from 10 to 12 tankahs.

So much about the large markets. It has been pointed out before that ‘Alāūddīn fixed the price of each and every commodity however trifling. It was a matter of policy also. It was useless to control the price of foodstuffs if sweets or things prepared from them were not controlled. The prices of different commodities are interconnected. For example, if the prices of wheat, ghi and sugar are controlled, and the price of sweets is left uncontrolled, the control is not complete. Thus the prices for harisah, reorí, sugar-candy, puddings, vegetables, bread, combs, slippers, shoes, cups, pitchers, goblets, needle, betelnuts and even betel were fixed.

Means of enforcing orders.

It was not easy to force all these regulations down the throats of tradesman—wholesale dealers as well as retailers, who for long had been enjoying liberal profits. But the state exigency forced the king to see that his orders were faithfully carried out. Upon effective enforcement of his orders depended the efficiency and happiness of his armed forces, the safety of the state against foreign aggressors and the glory of the crown through conquests.

A schedule of the prices of different commodities was prepared and a reasonable profit was allowed to the seller. Since this margin was determined according to the wishes of the king without any consultation with the merchants, it may safely be surmised that it was not very high. The schedule was forwarded to the Diván-i-Riyāsat, whose duty it was to enforce it in the market. Malik Yáqūb, the Diván-i-Riyāsat, or the Inspector General of all the markets in Delhi, appointed shahnahs or magistrates for various markets dealing with various commodities. The shahnahs had full jurisdiction over their markets and were directly responsible to the king. The status of a shahnah was high as can well be imagined from the instance of Malik Qabūl. Each shahnah received a copy of the schedule of rates for his market. The superintendents were instructed to enquire from the purchasers what they had paid for a particular ware, and were to note down their statements to verify if the prices charged were not in contravention of the scheduled ones. If the market people were found to be selling things at higher prices they were at once taken to task. The appointment of a shahnah for each market was extremely conducive to keeping prices low.

30 Barānī p. 316.

The powers vested in the market officials were very extensive. They coerced, whipped and tyrannized over the traders in every way. But in most cases bazār people were themselves responsible for the harsh treatment meted out to them. Even in the 20th century the traders in corn and vegetable mandis are sometimes so contumacious and refractory that it becomes difficult to control them. They treat the simple villagers harshly, and not unusually force them to sell corn and vegetables at cheap rates. The ignorant village people, who come to large towns in the hope of making some profit, fall an easy prey to the tall-talks of the non-chalant brokers, whose advice is sometimes conveyed through sweet words, at others in threatening gestures. Even the educated shop-keepers of to-day do not refrain from charging a higher price than the one fixed by the government, and it is the fear of huge fines and rigorous imprisonment that deters them from illegal profiteering. In short, the town-traders exploit the ignorance of both the village and town people to their best advantage. As pointed out above the conditions in the 14th century were far worse. Ziyāuddin calls the businessmen of his day as being shameless and cunning. They tried to defraud people by whatever means they could. He declares that they were the greatest liars among the seventy two sections of the people (living in the world). Describing the dallāls of his day he says that prior to enactment of government regulations they determined prices and defrauded both the buyer and the seller. It was a saying of the kings of old, continues the chronicler, that it was easier to clear a jungle or to subjugate distant lands than to bring under control the refractory bazār people. Selling at high prices and giving short weights were their common habits, and they did all this in spite of the barbarous punishments inflicted upon them for the slightest offence.

31 Barani p. 343.

Alāūddīn ordered most severe punishments for contravention of his orders regarding price-control. Even in these days a fine of a few thousand rupees is levied or rigorous imprisonment for some months is awarded to a shopkeeper who is found to have sold an article for even a few annas above the controlled rate. Six centuries back the traders were perhaps as persistent in their cunning, while the punishments more severe. It was ordered that the Nāzir Yāqūb should ill-treat and administer lashes to guilty traders. In cases of short-weight he used to cut off flesh from the haunches of traders, equal to the deficiency in weight. The harshness of Yāqūb was talked about everywhere among the young and the old. Every day the Nāzir used to inquire about the transactions of the bāzārs several times, and on the discovery of the slightest discrepancy he whipped the traders mercilessly.ș

Notwithstanding his harshness the merchants continued to cheat the customers, and it was found that short-weight trick was commonly practised when little boys came to purchase things in the market. To detect the mischief the sultan used to call young slave-boys from his pigeon houses, give them some jītals and send them to the market place, asking one to bring bread, another to bring halvā, a third yakhnī, a fourth reorī a fifth melon, a sixth cucumber and so on, and when these boys returned after their purchases the sultan sent for the Divān-i-Riyāsat and had the articles brought by the boys weighed in his presence. If any thing was found to be deficient in weight it was given to the Divān-i-Riyāsat, who at once proceeded to the shop from where the articles had been brought. A quantity of flesh equal to the deficiency in weight was cut from the haunches of the fraudulent seller, and he was kicked out of his shop. Such drastic punishments seem to have been meted out only to habitual offenders. The horrible punishments introduced by 'Alāūddīn continued to be awarded for some time, says the historian, till at last the tradesmen became quite submissive and discontinued giving short weights. Not only that, they were so much terrified with these drastic measures that sometimes they gave much more than the actual weight.

32 Barani p. 318.
33 Ibid. p. 318 wrongly has diram which coin probably then did not exist.

Now, this was the other extreme. If profiteering and selling short weight and cheating the purchasers in various ways deserved discouragement, the extremely severe punishments which led the shopkeepers to weigh more than the actual quantity indicates a lack of far-sightedness on the part of the king. How long could trade flourish under conditions in which the shopkeepers worked without getting sufficient profits. The market regulations of 'Alāūddīn did not permit enough profit to the tradespeople and consequently lent no encouragement to trade and commerce. The king did not permit even the least flexibility in prices and if hope of gain is lacking there can be no incentive to trade. Moreover, the regulations which hardly benefitted the traders were forced down their throats. Even after giving due consideration to the exaggeration in which Barani is prone to indulge, the facts that such severe penalties were inflicted on brokers in horse, cattle and slave markets, that even life became so distasteful to them and they longed for death, and deficiency in weights was made up by slicing off an equivalent quantity of flesh from the person of shopkeepers, clearly show that the market people must have been disgusted. That there was no encouragement to trade is clearly borne out by the fact that the merchants carrying on trade in food stuffs as well as other commodities were compelled to take up their abodes in Delhi. They had to sign agreements making them individually and collectively responsible for one another’s good conduct, and the authority of state officials extended even over their wives and children.\textsuperscript{34} It can well be surmised how the merchants would have chafed under the rigorous regulations of the monarch and how they would have rejoiced to see such a state of affairs come to an end.

Not only trade and commerce but agriculture was also affected. It has been pointed out at length in the preceding chapter how the revenue regulations of the king as well as his economic measures were harmful to agriculturists. Here it may be pointed out once again that these regulations rendered the condition of peasantry almost hopeless. Mr. Moreland thinks that the revenue regulations of the sultan were meant to crush the rich middlemen and not the poor peasants or the “herds” as such, but one fails to understand how the poor peasantry could be happy under the market regulations. It is conceivable that the realization of 50 per cent. of the land produce in kind was not meant to oppress the peasants but to store grain in the capital city. Yet when a husbandman paid half of his hard earned produce in land tax, some portion of the remaining in other sundry duties, and then was compelled to sell his grain at cheap rates to travelling merchants, who on their part were helped by government officials in obtaining their stocks, it does not speak well of the general condition of the peasantry of those days. There is no doubt that the cultivators were relieved of the drudgery of taking their grain into grain markets of big cities lying in the vicinity of their fields, and were saved from falling a victim to the seductions of the profiteering middlemen and speculators, still they could never be happy in selling their grain at a cheap price fixed by the government without having the choice of selecting a market for themselves and trying for a profit. The temptation of making profit, which is the greatest incentive to production, was completely checked by ‘Alāūdīn’s market regulations and the peasants seem to have lived a life of monotony and low standard, if not of squalor. The motive of the sultan may not have been to crush the poor peasants against whom he could possibly have no grudge, but the exigencies of the state required him to take such steps under which the interests of commerce and cultivation were sacrificed to those of the army. A peasant is not always a hoarder; he will not hoard if he is given a fair price for his produce. Just for the sake of safety he stores up some grain as security against bad seasons, but even that was denied to him, and every man of available grain was transferred to the Grain Market of Delhi. The stores of the sultan continued to increase so that Ibn Batūtah ate the rice which had been stored by sultan ‘Alāūdīn. The rice had become dark in colour but had preserved its taste. This fact alone shows that the government had hoarded a large quantity of grain, much above the needs of the state, so much so that it was available even three decades after the death of the king.

\textsuperscript{34} Barani pp. 306-7, 310-11.

It is obvious that neither agriculture nor trade and commerce could flourish under the regulations of ‘Alāūdīn. But the fostering of agriculture and trade were not his motives either. To him the prime necessity of the state was the maintenance of a huge army, sufficient to repel Mongol invasions as well as to subdue independent chiefs of India. There is no doubt that the benefits of market regulations were enjoyed by the civil as well as the military population of Delhi,—a fact about which Baranī does not forget to make a special mention, still the agriculturists of the doab and of tracts in the vicinity of Delhi, of Jhain and of Bayana, suffered privations for the benefit of the people at the capital. The tradesmen also did not gain much and worked under compulsion. But ‘Alāūdīn was not learned enough to philosophise on the benefits of a far distant future and to foster trade, commerce and agriculture. He thought he was called upon to act and he acted vigorously. He invariably sacrificed civil interests to those of military. In the reign of no other king were the Mughal invasions so persistent as in the time of ‘Alāūdīn. In the reign of no other king of the sultanate period were conquests made on such a large scale. Under these circumstances if all his reforms and regulations were directed towards the benefit of the army, it is not at all surprising. And how many renowned Turkish kings of India could afford to keep the happiness and prosperity of the peasants and traders above those of the army? Necessity, religious zeal and personal ambition, rendered the glory of conquest much more appealing to them than the glory of making such laws as would make the peasants rich and traders richer. ‘Alāūdīn was no exception. It is, therefore, not surprising that he put military necessities above civil ones and raised such a strong and contended army, that, whether at home or in foreign kingdoms, it always defeated its adversaries.

35 Baranī p. 304.

The most remarkable feature of the economic regulations is the success with which they were carried out. Appointment of shahnahs for the various markets, appointment of barīds, and the secret and efficient service of the munhiyans, all independent of one another and all responsible to the king, improved the tone of administration. No officer, however highly placed, could neglect his duties or play false, because the sultan was constantly informed about everything through his secret service agents. The Divān-i-Riyāsat, inflicted drastic punishments on the basār people and did not permit any breach of the orders of the government. Coercion, compulsion and terrorization were the methods adopted by the officers with regard to market administration. But the character and conduct of the market people, as described by Barani, justified to a considerable extent the harsh means the sultan resorted to. If the chronicler is to be believed,
'Ala'uddin had undertaken the economic measures after consulting his trusty and experienced councillors and ministers.
He had asked their opinion as to what he should do in order that the means of livelihood might be made exceedingly cheap
"without introducing capital punishment, torture and severe coercion." But he had to banish brokers and torture trade-people to see that his orders were carried out once they had been issued. Had the traders been more honest and the king less severe, perhaps the tortures inflicted on the bazār people would have been avoided.

Except for the traders themselves, the people of Delhi at least benefitted by these regulations. Prices were rendered cheap and stable. In times of scarcity there was no danger of famine in the capital city. The terrible famines of the time of Sultan Jalāluddin and Muḥammad Tughlāq are not heard of in the reign of 'Ala'uddin, because the capital at least was never short of food; and if famine occurred in some isolated or distant part of the country it surely escaped the notice of the contemporary chronicler.

'Ala'uddin's market regulations died with him. "The rules, the inquiries, the strictness with which the orders were carried out, and the punishments inflicted on the market people came to an end with the death of 'Ala'uddin, and his son Quṭbuddin could not enforce all the thousand regulations of the 'Alāi' reign." This was but expected. After the death of 'Ala'uddin there was neither the will of the succesor nor was there any necessity of enforcing them. Quṭbuddin was not so fond of conquests as of concubines, and the military traditions of 'Ala'uddin lost their lustre at the hands of

36 Barānī p. 319.
his successor. Moreover, the Mughal storm had subsided, and there was no need of maintaining a large force to encounter their incursions. Consequently, there was no need of controlling prices for recruiting a large army on small salary. Market Control was a temporary measure, resorted to in a state of exigency. When that exigency was over the regulations were also permitted to fall in disuse.
CHAPTER XVIII

LAST DAYS OF 'ALAUDDIN

Notwithstanding the various measures the sultan had undertaken for strengthening his state and notwithstanding the brilliant victories Malik Kāfür was achieving in the south as late as the year 1313, the government of 'Aluīddin was gradually losing in strength and stability. As the health of the king was deteriorating with advancing age, his passion for centralization of power in his own hands was increasing. Like Aurangzēb in his old age, 'Alūūddin also would listen to no advice, would tolerate no opposition. In contrast to his early years when he had able counsellors like Alāulmulk, Nuṣrat Khan and Ulugh Khan, he had only favourites and flatterers now at the close of his reign. In addition to this he had become extremely peevish and suspicious. It is, therefore, not surprising that it was during his last days that the appalling massacre of the neo-Muslims took place. Conversion of jagirs into crown-lands had already rendered many a Mughal destitute. Some of the ex-service-men had obtained employment under high officials and barons, but most of them had been left unemployed. These disgruntled souls accused the Sultan of tyrannising over the people, of forcibly seizing money, of imposing prohibition and instituting various kinds of heavy taxes. They had also shown resentment at the execution of Abaji Mughal during Kāfür's expedition to M'abar. Confident of the support of the neo-Muslims in the army and the approval of the people in general, who would obtain deliverance from the tyranny of the Sultan, 1 they plotted to assassinate the king. The plot was discovered and the rage of the Sultan flared up. It was ordered that on an appointed day all the Mughals should be killed wherever they were found, and "their wives and children should be handed over to their assassins." The orders were carried out to the very letter and some twenty to thirty thousand Mughals, most of whom had no knowledge of the plot, were ruthlessly massacred. Although not without reason, still, the neo-Muslims were extirpated with horrible barbarity and nothing can justify the inhuman way in which the whole section of them—innocent or guilty—were exterminated.

1 Futūh. p. 291.
2 Barānī, p. 365.

Such tyranny on the one hand and the disgraceful attachment to his favourites on the other, had affected the Sultan's prestige. His infatuation for the eunuch Kāfūr had made the latter the most powerful man in the country; and as the king's health rapidly declined this mean and ungrateful wretch committed innumerable crimes to serve his own selfish ends. With the removal from office of Maliks Ḥamīduddin and Aʿizzuddin and with the assassination of Sharf Qayīnī, the departments of Revenue (Divān-i-Vuzrā), Finance (Divān-i-Risālat) and Correspondence (Divān-i-Inshā) were altogether, ruined. Talented officers were removed from service and in their stead unworthy clerks and despicable sycophants disgraced the honourable offices allotted to them. A nincompoop-like Bahāuddin Dabīr was made 'Umdatul Mulk. If one or two able men like Malik Qīrān, the Amīr-i-Shikār, and Malik Qīrā Bēg commanded some respect, they neither held a high office nor power at the court. Thus, while the king had concentrated all power in his own hands, no wise person was left to offer opinion on knotty problems.

---

3 Ibid. pp. 235-36.
4 This is Barani's figure. Ferishtah has 14 to 15 thousand. Ferishtah, p. 120.
5 Barani pp. 334, 337.
6 Ibid. p. 337.
Weddings of Khizr Khan and Shadi Khan.

The decline of the government became rapid after the marriages of the royal princes. In 1312 Shamsul Haqq, surnamed Khizr Khan, the eldest son of the king, was married to the daughter of Alp Khan, governor of Gujarat and brother of the Malka-i-Jahân. But Khizr Khan was never happy with this marriage. He had fallen in love with Deval Rani, daughter of Rai Karan of Gujarat. The strange circumstances under which she had been captured in the south have been related before. Since then she had lived with her mother Kamla Devi in the royal palace where Khizr Khan fell in love with her. This fact was soon discovered; but since Māhrū, the darling of ‘Alāūddin’s younger days, was keen on marrying her son to the daughter of her brother, it was decided to separate the two. Deval Devi was sent to the Qasr-i-Lal with her friends. Tongue-tied with bashfulness, Khizr Khan did not say a word in protest, and Malka-i-Jahân after making elaborate preparations and inviting Rajas and governors from distant parts of the empire married her eldest son to the daughter of Alp Khan on 23rd of Ramzān 711 (February 4th, 1312).

Khizr Khan, however, could not forget his object of love. He kept away from his wife and used to meet Deval secretly. His health began to deteriorate and Māhrū grew anxious about her son. Thinking it advisable not to risk the life of her son for the sake of her brother’s daughter, Malka-i-

---

7 According to Khusrau Deval Rani was only six months old at the time of the first invasion of Gujarat, 1299. (Deval Rani p. 82). He confirms this statement by saying at another place that she was eight years when captured (p. 93). According to Ferishtah she was four years when she was separated from her mother in 1299 (Ferishtah pp. 116-17). There is no reason to accept Ferishtah’s statement against that of the contemporary Khusrau.

8 According to ‘Isami Ram Deva of Devagiri was invited to this function. Futuḥ. p. 316.
Jahān obtained ‘Alāūddīn’s permission to marry Khizr Khan to Deval Devi.

About this time Ram Deva of Devagiri died and his son assumed an attitude of hostility. Malik Naib Kāfür was despatched to crush the rebel. During his absence in the Deccan Alp Khan and Malka-i-Jahān gained ascendency at the court. Māhrū began to make preparations for the marriage of her second son Shadi Khan with the second daughter of her brother. The king was keeping indifferent health, but Malka-i-Jahān was bent upon celebrating the nuptials. She sent out invitations to governors and nobles in far-off provinces. Malik Kāfür also came to the capital, where prince Shadi was married to the daughter of Alp Khan with great eclat. On this occasion Deval Devi was also given in marriage to Khizr Khan, whose days of torturous separation were over. These marriages took place some time during the years 1313 and 1314.

Meanwhile the health of the Sultan began to take a turn for the worse. The last three years of his life were full of bitterness and anguish. His inordinate ambition and his passion for glory had entailed hard and strenuous work. Added to this were his irregular habits and his extreme sensuousness. All this had severely told upon his bodily vigour. Naturally his hand began to lose control of administration. His favourites on the one hand and able and worthy men on the other began to entertain ideas of enmosity. Alp Khan and Kāfür were ranged in opposition. To all outward appearances the former was gaining strength. He had given proof of his talents on various occasions. He had administered the province of Gujarat for the past fifteen years and was very popular with the people there. He was the real brother of the chief queen of the realm and was also in the good books of the sultan. He had two royal princes as his sons-in-law,

---

9 Firishtah p. 122.
the elder of whom had been declared heirapparent to the throne by the Sultan, who to ensure Khizr Khan’s accession after his own death had obtained written promises from all the barons of the state. Thus the position of Alp Khan at the capital was quite strong. Naturally, Malik Naib Kafur, who wielded great influence with the king, felt alarmed at this state of affairs. Captured in the sack of Gujarat in 1299, he had all along enjoyed the affections of the Sultan and had risen from post to post until he became the Vazir. He was commander of the forces that went to the Deccan several times between 1308 and 1313. So brilliant were his achievements that ‘Ala’uddin, highly impressed with his capabilities, appointed him viceroy of the Deccan, with headquarters at Devagiri. It was on the occasion of the marriage of the royal princes that he was called to Delhi, where he found the royal consort, her brother Alp Khan and prince Khizr Khan in great ascendancy. An ambitious general like Kafur, who of late had been the only guiding spirit of the king, could now know well that he was lost if he did not stir betimes.

Murder of Alp Khan.

The malady of the king was getting more and more serious. He was suffering from dropsy and other physical disorders. On account of his disease and other mental in-

10 Barani pp. 367-68.

\textit{Nurisaniy\textsuperscript{'}a, \\ دستخط ازان کل ملک دران دستد.}

11 Vide chapter XII.

12 According to Barani, ‘Ala’uddin was suffering from dropsy (\textit{استسقا}) and according to Khusrau from fever. Ferishtah, however, writes that the sultan had developed a very dangerous disease on account of excessive sexual indulgence (p. 122). It is probable that he was suffering from dropsy for a long time and when he was about to die had developed fever also, which is very natural.
firmities that follow in the train of advancing years, he had become weak and peevish. When Malik Naib returned from the Deccan the sultan related to him the tale of his woes,—how he had been neglected by Malka-i-Jahān and Khizr Khan. Mährū, complained the ailing king, was ever busy with marriages and other ceremonies in the haram, while Khizr Khan, having obtained his most cherished Deval was ever immersed in music and mirth and cared little about the king or the court. Here was a golden opportunity for Malik Kāfūr, who was as mean as he was talented, to poison the ears of the Sultan against all those whom he considered his arch enemies. One day when Kāfūr was in a private audience with ‘Alāūddīn he bitterly complained against his alleged enemies and said that they wanted to put an end to his life simply because he was favoured by the king. They only waited for the sultan’s death when they would assassinate him. As ‘Alāūddīn gave Kāfūr a patient hearing, the latter continued his plaintive rhetoric and accused Alp Khan of being the source of all the trouble. He said that Alp Khan had influence with the queen and the royal princes and that was the reason why he was reluctant to go back to his iqṭā’ in Gujarat. He was simply waiting to usurp all power as soon as the sultan’s eyes were closed for ever. If Alp Khan could be killed, concluded Kāfūr, there would be no fear for him from the princes.¹³ Despite ‘Alāūddīn’s kindness to Kāfūr, says ʻĪsāmī, he refused to listen to the false accusations levelled against the faithful governor, and said that he did not suspect anything from him.¹⁴ But Malik Kāfūr knew how to do away with Alp Khan since the king was bed-ridden and was unable even to move. One day when Alp Khan was entering the royal apartments Malik Naib and ¹³ Futūḥ pp. 329-30.

¹⁴ Ibid. p. 330.
Malik Kamāluddin seized him and murdered him in cold blood.\textsuperscript{15}

Alp Khan's death cleared the way for Malik Naib's unchallenged ascendency—his position had been unassailable even before. The king was now seriously ill and Naib Kāfūr himself transacted all business of the state in the king's name. Prince Khizr Khan was the next victim of Malik Kāfūr's maliciousness. The critical condition of the king had alarmed everybody in the palace. In spite of proper and regular treatment he was not showing any signs of improvement. Fervent prayers were offered for his recovery and his loving son Khizr Khan took a vow to go on foot on pilgrimage to the shrines of the saints at Hastanapur when his father recovered from his malady. Curiously enough 'Alāūddin showed some signs of recovery and the prince in fulfilment of his promise went on foot to Hastinapur. In his great joy he went to the place of pilgrimage accompanied by a troupe of musicians and dancers. Malik Kāfūr, who was in the look out for a pretext, cunningly misrepresented the intentions of the prince and told the king that while he was lying ill Khizr Khan was going on pleasure trips.\textsuperscript{16} He forthwith wrote a royal \textit{fīrmān} in the name of the king saying therein that since Khizr Khan would surely have been troubled at the death of his maternal uncle and father-in-law, it would be better for him to go out for sport in place of returning to the capital. It was, therefore, ordered that Khizr Khan should proceed to Amroha and should not return to Delhi until he was asked to do so. In the mean time he should send without any objection all the insignia of royalty.

\textsuperscript{15} \textit{Futūh} p. 331. \textit{T.M.S.} p. 80.

Malik Naib also sent Malik Kamāluddin Gurg to Jalor to finish Alp Khan's brother Malik Nizāmuddin Ulugh Khān who was the governor of that place (\textit{Ferishtah} p. 123).

\textsuperscript{16} \textit{Deval Rani} pp. 236-37.
the chattr and durbash, which would be returned to him on his return.\footnote{Deval Rani p. 236. To Amīr Khusrau, a devout disciple of Shaikh Nizāmuddin Aulia, all this calamity befell Khizr Khan because he had failed to pay his respects to the shaikh while going to Hastanapur. According to Ibn Battutah Khizr Khan showed open resentment at the execution of Alp Khan which was done by the orders of the King. Alāūd-dīn did not like this attitude of Khizr Khan and sent him to Gwalior. Ibn Battutah vol III p. 188.}

When the royal order reached Khizr Khan he was taken aback. With a sad heart he surrendered all the insignia of royalty to Malik Ḥisāmuddīn and himself proceeded to Amroha. There was no peace of mind for him now. He could not make out why his father was so much incensed with him. Suddenly he decided to go back to Delhi and beg pardon for all his faults from the king. Day and night did he travel to reach the capital, writes the poet-historian Khusrau, and on his arrival there apologized to his father. Alāūd-dīn was extremely delighted to see his son beside him. He embraced him and pardoned him for all his shortcomings. Shamsul Haqq went to the royal haram, met his relations, and forgot his past privations.

Khizr Khan had been brought up in the school of love and not of adversity. Born with a silver spoon in his mouth he displayed the indolent security of hereditary princes. Naturally he could not understand the machinations of Malik Kāfūr. Malik Naib on his part was bent upon clearing his path of all possible rivals for real power. Once more he began to poison the ears of the sultan against the royal prince. He said that while the sultan was seriously ill the prince had come back from Amroha without receiving any orders and was planning with Malka-i-Jahān to seize the throne. Alāūd-dīn, who had seldom permitted anybody to tutor him with impunity, had, owing to infirmity of age and disease, become a tool in the hands of his favourite Vazīr Hazārdīnīrī. He was led to believe that the prince was wasting all his time in the haram and did not care to nurse his ailing father. On this charge he was sent to be imprisoned in the Gwalior fort. If Amīr Khusrau is to be believed, the king wept bitterly when he bade farewell to his son, and said that fate and not the king was punishing him.

It is pitiable to think how this man of action had become a fatalist in his old age and how his implacable justice had given way to things which to all appearances were wrong. Having obtained repeated assurances from Kāfür that no harm would be done to the prince, ‘Alāūddīn bade good bye to his son.

Khizr Khan was sent as a state prisoner to Gwalior where his beloved Deval joined him to share his distress. Khizr Khan’s mother, the Malka-i-Jahān, the well-beloved Māhrū of ‘Alāūddīn’s days of youth, also could not escape the rapacity of the cruel eunuch and was kept a state prisoner in the Red Fort of Delhi. While Kāfür had gained unrivalled ascendency at the capital, while he was killing generals like Alp Khan and imprisoning princes like Khizr Khan, in short, while he was playing almost the king, the affairs of the empire were drifting towards a chaos. The last phase of ‘Alāūddīn’s reign is characterized by a succession of revolts in the various provinces. Upon receiving the news of the murder of their favourite governor Alp Khan, the army of Gujarat unfurled the standard of revolt. Under the command of their leaders Haider and Vazīrak they resolved not to submit to any im-

---

18 Deval Rani p. 250.

19 According to Baranī (p. 372) Malik Kāfür had obtained from the king a firmān setting aside the claims of Khizr Khan to the throne and giving it to his younger son Shihābuddīn. With this deed under his arms Kāfür reigned after ‘Alāūddīn’s death in the name of Shihābuddīn, a boy of five or six years. For details see chapter XX.

20 For the last days and death of Khizr Khan see chapter XX.
perial firman.21 Malik Kamāluddin Gurg was sent to Gujarat to quell the insurrection, but instead of being able to suppress the infuriated soldiery, he himself was ruthlessly killed. The affairs in Gujarat continued to be chaotic until the death of ‘Alāūddīn. Insurrections broke out in Chittor also where Maldeva, the puppet of ‘Alāūddīn, was constantly harassed by Hammīr, the ruler of Sesoda. In the Deccan Harpal Deva, son-in-law of Ram Deva, assumed independence at Devagiri and destroyed many royal outposts. The intelligence of these insurrections used to set the dying king’s body afame with rage. All his life-work seemed to be undone. Whatever he had conquered seemed to be lost. His eldest son was far away at Gwalior, his beloved wife was kept away from him and he was leaving the country more disturbed than he had found it. He had lived an extremely busy and tiresome life and from the disorders of dropsy and also perhaps from the fatal effects of the poison administered by Malik Kāfūr,22 ‘Alāūddīn found refuge in a silent death on the 7th of Shavvāl 715 (January 6th., 1316).23

21 Futūh pp. 332-33.
22 Barani p. 369.
23 This is the date of Amīr Khusrau (Deval Rani p. 259) ‘Isami has 11th Shavvāl (Futūh p. 336) Hajuddabīr has 6th (Zafarul Vali p. 828) but makes confusion with the year which he says to be 711 A.H. Barani (p. 369) has 6th Shavvāl but does not give the year. Vassaf (p. 647) gives 716 A.H. as the year of ‘Alāūddin’s death.
CHAPTER XIX
AN ESTIMATE OF ‘ALĀŪDDIN

Before closing the study of ‘Alāūddin’s reign, it would be proper to review his career as a man, and his achievements as an emperor. Ascending the throne at the age of thirty he had reached the apogee of power at forty-five through unrivalled skill, studied tact, and phenomenal energy. From nothingness he rose to be one of the greatest rulers of medieval times. With the help of a strong and disciplined army he pulled down native princes and stamped out sedition from the land. By a systematic tariff policy he controlled the fluctuating market, and with an efficient administrative machinery effectively governed the country for two decades.

Contemporary historians speak little about the king’s personal features, but they throw sufficient light on his character and qualities. The sultan was almost without any literary education, though like Akbar and Ranjit Singh after him, he confirmed by example the Tennysonian dictum ‘that only those who cannot read can rule.’ But though unlettered, ‘Alāūddin possessed sufficient commonsense, experience and wisdom which multiplied with age. Learned historians like Amir Arslān Kulāhī, sincere nobles like ‘Alāulmulk, and orthodox ‘ulamas like Qāzi Mughīšuddin were always ready to tender advice to him on important matters. ‘Alāūddin’s early association with the veteran Malik ‘Alāulmulk, who guided his feet to the throne, must also have con-

1 Ziyāuddin states that the sultan was utterly devoid of any education and could neither read nor write (Barani p. 262). Ferishtah’s assertion that in his later years he himself used to read the reports of the secret agents, is open to doubt, for the sultan could have got them read out by some one instead of personally perusing them.
tributed to his store of worldly wisdom, which he possessed in a considerable degree. Alāḍīn took pride in his counselor-generals Alp Khan, Nuṣrat Khan, Ulugh Khan and Zafar Khan. In his later years he was influenced by the evil genius of Kāfūr. There is, however, no reason to think that the sultΔ was under the influence of any one of these.

The life-story of Alāḍīn shows that he was a self-willed man, and did not listen to anybody’s advice when he was determined on something; still, it is also true that he consulted his noblemen on perplexing problems and listened to their suggestions patiently.

The lack of love of learning, which imparts to a man elements of humanity and kindness, may be responsible for the callousness and cruelty inherent in Alāḍīn’s nature. Every sentiment of kindness and clemency became extinct in the emperor’s heart when anything harmful for the state was done. His punishments of the families of the mutineers at Jalor filled the heart of even a medieval chronicler like Barānī with shame and disgust. He writes that owing to his inherent cruelty, arrogance and harsh temperament, the sultan inflicted tyrannical punishments after the fashion of the notorious pharaoh, and neither tie of blood nor attachments of near relationship detered him from inflicting severest penalties. His barbarous punishments of tradesmen, the atrocities of Nuṣrat Khan on the people of Delhi, and the callousness of the sultan in killing his kith and kin, are simply appalling. The assassinations of Jalāluddīn, Ikat Khan, ʿUmar Khan and Mangu Khan and the secret poisoning of Ulugh Khan, testify to the almost inhuman nature of the king. It is true that the recurring rebellions of the rich and the wickedness of the government officials gave him sufficient justification to be stern but at the same time it cannot be denied that his punishments bordered on barbarism.

2 Barānī pp. 335-36.
The sultan possessed a vindictive nature. If once he became prejudiced against anybody, he spared no efforts to destroy him. If once he incarcerated somebody, he never thought of releasing him, and a large number of innocent men used to be punished simply because the king thought them to be guilty.\(^3\) Nothing can be more disconcerting than the punishments of the Jalālī nobles who had, after the murder of their patron, sought protection under the banner of the rising star. So long as ‘Alāūddin needed their support he humoured them into submission, honoured them and distributed among them offices and wealth; but once he was secure on the throne he confiscated their lands, imprisoned some and killed others. The grossness of his nature impelled him to commit such heinous deeds without the slightest qualms of conscience.

Such a man needs must be free from all sentiments of conjugal love. His life story clearly bears out the fact that he was not romantic. Although he had a number of wives like Jalāluddin’s daughter, a sister of Alp Khan, Badshah Begam, a daughter of Mu‘izzuddin Ka‘īqubād also known as Malka Māhik and mother of Quṭbuddin Mubarak Shah, Kamla Devi and the daughter of Ram Deva, yet he does not seem to have been at any time under feminine influence as such. ‘Alāūddin could not pull on with Jalāluddin’s daughter, and Māhrū, for whom he is said to have forsaken his uncle’s daughter, passed her last days in painful isolation and imprisonment. All other consorts of the sultan are names not even worth mentioning in the king’s biography. In medievals when woman, wine and song were the order of the day, ‘Alāūddin led a life, free from unbridled debauchery. Although during the narrative of his reign we do hear of wine parties in the royal palace as also of the infatuation of the sultan for Kāfūr Hazārdinārī, yet the indulgence of the sultan vanishes into nothingness in comparison with that of Muḥizzuddīn Kaiqubād, Quṭbuddīn Mubarak and even Jalāluddīn Khaljī. ‘Alāūd-dīn took some wine in his early days, but later on he not only renounced it himself but prohibited its use among the people. ‘Alāūd-dīn’s orders against wine drinking, adultery and prostitution clearly indicate the emperor’s bent of mind.

\(^3\) Barānī p. 338.

A casual study of Baranī’s Tarikh would leave on the reader’s mind the impression that ‘Alāūd-dīn was, if not irreligious, at least unreligious. But that is not true. Although he had not read the Qurān since he was not educated, and although it is also true that he was not punctilious about observing the fast of Ramzān or saying the daily prayers, and was probably the only sultan of Delhi who never went to the Friday prayers and did not permit religious considerations to interfere in state administration, yet he was a true Musalman. He had great faith in his religion and never permitted any irreligious thing to be said or heard.4

‘Alāūd-dīn had great respect for contemporary saints. Although he did not personally meet Niẓāμuddīn Aulia, he reposed great confidence in the Shaikh’s supernatural powers and craved for his blessings through his nobles. During his last days he had become greatly devoted towards Shaikh Niẓāμuddīn. Almost all the members of the royal household were disciples of the Shaikh. When ‘Alāūd-dīn came to know of the departure of Maulana Shamsuddin Turk without meeting him, he was sorely disappointed.5 According to Ziyāuddīn the sultan offered a large amount of money in charity after the death of Ulugh Khan. This may have been mere hypocrisy since, as shown above, Ulugh Khan had fallen a victim to the sultan’s suspicions. Be it as it may, the above facts clearly show that the king behaved like a good Musalman in his private life. The orthodox and the almost bigoted historian Ziyāuddin Barani’s standard for a Musalman was almost impossible. If ‘Alāūddin could not come up to that standard it was not his fault. If he divorced religion from politics he had sufficient reasons for doing so. Most of the successful Muslim rulers of India divorced religion from politics. To Amīr Khusrau, ‘Išāmī, and foreigners like Shamsuddin Turk and Vāsāf, ‘Alāūddin was a true Musalman. ‘Išāmī goes as far as to assert that the sultan worked on the principles of the shari‘at, and exhibited Islam in his actions.5 Comparing ‘Alāūddin with Muḥammad bin Tughlaq, ‘Išāmī says that in the time of ‘Alāūddin the empire became intact on account of his justice, the people were obedient to the king, and there was prosperity in the kingdom,—conditions lacking during Muḥammad’s rule.6

4 Baranī p. 339.
5 Baranī p. 299.

Reference may here be made to the charge of bigotry levelled against ‘Alāūddin. A thorough study of the sultan’s character clearly shows that religious considerations did not prompt him to oppress the Hindus in any way. Under his vigorous administration intriguing nobility, profiteering merchants and contumacious landholders suffered terribly, while the middle class traders and poor peasants also could not escape the privations that followed in the train of his rigorous laws. If the bulk of the population of the country as well as most of the landholders and cultivators were Hindus, it was but natural that the Hindus would suffer most from his tariff and revenue regulations. If the kingdoms ‘Alāūddin attacked belonged to the Hindu Rajas, if at the time of warfare their Hindu subjects suffered, and if the war indemnity, taken from the vanquished Hindu princes was called jaziyah in official terminology, it was not at all due to the fact that

5 Futūḥ p. 569.
6 Ibid. pp. 569-70.
'Aláúddín was a bigot. There is no instance to prove that 'Aláúddín oppressed some people simply because they were Hindus and favoured some because they were Musalmans. If traders suffered, it was not that only Hindu traders suffered, if the revenue regulations were oppressive to the people, they were not enforced against the Hindus only, and if the nobility were suppressed it was not that only the Hindu nobles were suppressed. In fact 'Aláúddín’s treatment of the nobility was perhaps the most severe and there were very few, if any, Hindu noblemen in 'Aláúddín’s days. It must, however, be remembered that in the early days of Muslim rule in India the sultans had to establish their power and rule on a race different from theirs in religion, society and culture. Naturally they could not trust them with high administrative jobs. Moreover, the sultans themselves occasionally sought advice from learnedmen—maulvis and mullas—who were generally orthodox and not infrequently bigoted. Constant wars, of course of a military and political character, were fought with Hindu Rajas and a subconscious feeling of animosity existed between the Turkish ruling class, consisting of the sultan and his bureaucracy, and the conquered people. Under such circumstances it is too much to expect from early Turkish sultans like Iltutmish, Balban and 'Aláúddín to be very liberal towards the native population and throw open posts to the people of all religions. That is why we hardly find many, if any, talented Hindu officers being appointed to high administrative posts in 'Aláúddín’s time. In the Mughal period things were different. Under Akbar and his successors almost the whole of India had come under Muslim domination and the Hindus could safely be trusted with high posts and treated equally with the Muslims. Thus if Balban and 'Aláúddín were not inclined to give equal opportunities to the Hindus it was but natural. Besides this, there is no proof that 'Aláúddín oppressed the Hindus because of their religion.
The ruling passion of the sultan was ambition. He thirsted for immortality. To transcend the victories of Alexander and to found a religion which would not let die his name in the annals of mankind, were the two burning desires of his soul. His unpractical notions were aggravated by the stimulation of wine, flattery of friends, and the great good fortune that attended all his enterprises. But luckily Alāūddīn always lent a ready ear to sincere advice, and his almost mad schemes were toned down by the faithful counsellor Malik ‘Alāulmulk. After the nobleman’s remonstrances the king gave his whole attention to defeating the Mongols and conquering independent kingdoms of India. But one thing is certain. Be it ‘Alāūddīn’s conquests, his architectural enterprises⁸ or his economic reforms—in every act of his is exhibited the Sultan’s unbounded ambition, a desire to do something superb and leave an immortal name.

Nature, however, had crammed ‘Alāūddīn with a sense of practicality. Without blinding him to reality, his ambition had made him an astute diplomat. He made full preparations before embarking upon any enterprise. The precautions he took to see that the news of his raid into Devagiri did not reach the imperial court, compel admiration. Whether he was fighting the native prices, or encountering the Mongol invaders, the Sultan always exhibited a patient caution. ‘Alāūddīn had built up an empire, he had not inherited one and all his life he had to taste both the “bitter and sweet” of life. Experience had taught him to do everything after cool and calculated deliberation.

His caution, however, was not the result of any fears. In fact ‘Alāūddīn possessed the strength and the will to carry his way once he had determined on a certain course of action. He had waded through blood to the throne but the circumstances which encouraged him to secure it confirm beyond doubt that he was a promising general. It is alleged that 'Alāʾūddin himself was not a great general and his victories were due to his able commanders like Alp Khan and Naib Kāfūr. But this view is wholly incorrect. While yet an unknown figure, 'Alāʾūddin had distinguished himself in the fighting against Malik Chhajjū (1292) and in raiding Bhilsa (1292). Thereafter his astounding success against the powerful Maratha army of Devagiri established his reputation as a military commander. Just after his occupation of the throne 'Alāʾūddin himself could not safely leave the capital and therefore sent Ulugh Khan and Nusrat Khan to occupy Multan and conquer Gujarat. But in 1299 'Alāʾūddin successfully defeated Qutlugh Khvājā and in 1303 repulsed perhaps the most formidable Mughal invasion under Targhī. The way in which he argued with Malik 'Alaulmulk before marching against the Mongols, clearly shows the spirit of gallantry and sportsmanship the king possessed. The entrenchment 'Alāʾūddin prepared to defend himself against the Mughals during Targhī's invasion shows his ingenuity as a strategist. The most formidable battles, as can well be expected, were fought either against the Mughals or in Rajputana and in most of them the sultan showed his organizing capacity, his diplomacy and his military skill. When Ulugh Khan was compelled to retreat during his siege of Ranthambhor, 'Alāʾūddin himself marched against it and reduced it simply through his persistent exertions and superior military genius. In 1303 'Alāʾūddin was successful in reducing Chittor, which had not been taken by any previous sultan and which put an edge on the teeth of even a strong emperor like Akbar. The victory at Chittor was followed by a death-grappling struggle with the Mughals in which also the king gained an astounding success. From 1303 onwards 'Alāʾūddin effected certain administrative reforms and could not move out of the capital but the work of conquest was carried on by his generals like 'Ainul Mulk Multānī and Naib Kāfūr. In 1308 Kāfūr marched to the south and ‘Alaūddīn himself marched to Sevana. Thus from 1290 to 1308 ‘Alaūddīn was constantly fighting, always to court victory. When Kāfūr began his meteoric career in the south, the sultan found ample opportunity to take rest from camp life and construct buildings of beauty, grace and grandeur. ‘Alaūddīn’s military genius is exhibited in so far as he made his commanders obediently carry out his orders and conquer for him. In an age when strife and disaffection were rife and a military leader almost invariably aspired for the throne, brilliant generals like Ulugh Khan, Nuṣrat Khan, Malik Kāfūr and Ghazi Malik showed unflinching obedience towards the king. To make such people undertake conquests in his name shows the superiority of ‘Alaūddīn’s military talents, his born military leadership and the fact that he was a general of generals.

⁸ See Appendix C.

‘Alaūddīn’s hardships of military life were relieved by his constant pursuit of field sports. The king was very fond of big game shooting. His absorbing interest in field sports as well as pigeon-flying and hawking was so well known that some of the plots against his life aimed at killing him while he was busy in sports. The emperor was very fond of flying hawks and a large number of these birds and some slave boys, who used to fly them, were maintained by the state. The sultan also spent his leisure hours in the company of boon companions. In his early days he used to drink hard, but the stern realities of the political situation as well as the sincere admonitions of Malik ‘Alaūlmulk put a check upon his excesses. The royal cellers were emptied and drinking vessels were broken to pieces. Nevertheless, the king could not give up drinking completely. But as time passed he bent towards sobriety; he drank little and never gave himself up to the devil. In spite of his harsh disposition ‘Alaūddīn had a soft corner for his companions like Tājuddīn ‘Irāqī, Khudāvand Zādā Chashnīgīr, Ruknuddīn Dabīr, Aʿizzuddīn Yaghn and Nūr Khan. He never used to get tired of their repartees and witticism. In matters of women, wine and song ʿAlā’uddīn was neither an uncompromising moralist nor a slave of the senses.

The sultan’s pursuit of innocent pleasures did not relax his vigilance over matters of state. All important papers were placed before him and his argus eye kept a close watch upon the various branches of the government administration. It is as an administrator than anything else that ʿAlā’uddīn stands head and shoulder above his predecessors. His accomplishments as a warrior were dwarfed by his achievement as an organiser. His administrative genius is best exhibited in the various novel methods and schemes he formulated to govern the country as he desired. Direct recruitment of soldiers, the systems of branding and cash payment, the control of the market, rationing and issue of permits, the enrolment of merchants and the dozen other measures prove beyond doubt the ingenuity of the king’s mind. ʿAlā’uddīn was an administrative entrepreneur; he conceived novel ideas and struck on new grounds. As pointed out before, all his counsellors like Zafar Khan, Nuṣrat Khan, Ulugh Khan and also probably ʿAlā’ulmulk had all died before 1302, while Alp Khan was staying far off in Gujarat until about 1314, and it was surely the inventive genius of ʿAlā’uddīn which struck at the idea of the so many measures cited above. ʿAlā’uddīn, for the first time, introduced measurement of land, local government, and laws about collection of revenue. These did not exist before. Although himself unlettered ʿAlā’uddīn obtained reports about the market from a number of sources and punished the culprits and delinquents. His ingenuity for superb administrative talent is exhibited in his sending small boys, who easily eluded suspicion of shopkeepers, to the market-place to test the honesty and veracity of the merchants.

9 Barani 357-58.
... Not only in matters of civil administration but also in military sphere 'Aláūd-dín worked more with his mind than with an unreserved bravery. The accounts of his various wars with the Mughals clearly show the sultan’s capacity for organizing defence; not a few times by deluding the enemy or exhausting his patience. 'Aláūd-dín’s grasp of the art of war compensated for the alleged lack of personal bravery.

Aláūd-dín was an imperialist through and through, but notwithstanding his desire for incessant conquest and expansion of his dominions, he was well aware of the dangers of adopting an uncompromising annexationist policy. The annexation of Ranthambhor, Chittor and Sevana had brought innumerable difficulties in their train, and 'Aláūd-dín was shrewd enough not to repeat his follies in the Deccan. He defeated the Deccan princes, levied rich tributes upon them, but at the same time left them with their possessions. By this policy he made friends of foes. The cordial way in which he received the rulers of Devagiri and Dwaramudra and gave them honour and titles and left them in possession of their territories, goes to prove 'Aláūd-dín’s grasp of the existing political condition of India.) The annexation of the south by Muhammad bin Tughlaq was followed by insurmountable difficulties. 'Aláūd-dín’s policy shows the superiority of his political acumen. He clearly saw that there was no use in annexing what could not be consolidated. 'Aláūd-dín’s Deccan policy left a number of faithful allies in the south who not only remained loyal and obedient to him but helped him in some of his military enterprises. In the north, however, places like Malwa, Ujjain, Dharanagri and Gujarat, where Muslim influence had penetrated even before 'Aláūd-dín’s conquest, the sultan did not hesitate to annex and carry out his imperialistic ambitions to the very end.

In his conquests, in befriending enemies and in administrative reforms 'Aláūd-dín can be compared to one of the greatest emperors of India, Akbar: (So far as the policy of territorial aggrandizement is concerned) both (Alāūddīn) and Akbar believed in the principal that might is right. Like Akbar after him (Alāūddīn also firmly believed that “A monarch should ever be intent on conquest otherwise his neighbours rise in arms against him.”)

Again like a shrewd diplomat ‘Alāūddīn followed the policy of befriending his enemies as Akbar adopted in case of the Rajputs. Some of the Rajput states which had always fought the Muslim rulers in India became Akbar’s best supporters. In the same way some of the Deccan kings, in whose country ‘Alāūddīn’s generals had carried fire and sword became his loyal supporters. ‘Alāūddīn was perhaps the first Muslim ruler who left Hindu kings in their positions provided they paid tribute. In certain spheres ‘Alāūddīn showed great originality, and some of his military and revenue reforms were adopted by prominent kings long after. Sher Shah adopted most of ‘Alāūddīn’s military reforms, such as direct recruitment, branding of horses and cash payment. Measurement of land and assessment of land revenue on the basis done by ‘Alāūddīn are also found in Todarmal’s system, in the time of Sher Shah and Akbar. (The only objectionable thing in ‘Alāūddīn’s administration is that it was based exclusively on force. While the various revenue, administrative and economic reforms of Sher Shah and Akbar were only done to benefit the people, ‘Alāūddīn took harshest steps just in the name of defence of the country and even for his own glory.

By the irony of circumstance ‘Alāūddīn also contemplated to found a new religion as Akbar actually did two centuries later. But ‘Alāūddīn was not so cultured as Akbar was. His ruling passion was ambition and he thought of founding a religion which would immortalise him, and not for uniting the various diverse classes, castes and creeds under one banner. Akbar’s motives in founding the Din-i-Ilâhî were humane and honourable, whereas ‘Alâûddîn’s were only selfish and egoistic.

10 Ain-i-Akbari p. 399.

What could this monarch achieve for the Turkish Sultanate in India during his rule of a score years? It is generally believed that ‘Alâûddîn left nothing of permanence. According to the contemporary Shaikh Bashir Dîvânî, ‘Alâûddîn’s government had no stable foundation and the Khalji dynasty was easily supplanted because of the inherent weaknesses of the ‘Alâî rule. There is no doubt that ‘Alâûddîn’s administrative system had its defects. His government was one man’s rule, and as Sir Jadunath aptly remarks “a government of personal discretion is, by its very nature, uncertain.”11 ‘Alâûddîn’s rule was based on force, not on will of the people. The king was only feared and obeyed but not loved or respected. The sultan neglected the economic prosperity of the state and just to benefit his military (and as a concomitant non-military) population, he killed every incentive to trade and commerce. Under his regulations the traders had neither freedom of movement nor hope of profit. He put the peasantry to utmost exertions. His vigorous spy system made people’s life distasteful, and the suppression of baronage left the government in a paralytic state where the emperor’s eyes were closed. But all these accusations do not seem to hold water when a careful and critical analysis of his solid achievements is made. ‘Alâûddîn had achieved much. His imperialistic policy had turned a small kingdom, as the sultanate of Delhi was, into an empire comprising of the major portion of India. He was the first ruler whose political hegemony extended over a major portion of the Deccan peninsula. He dealt a death blow to the Mughal aggrandisement which not only stood in the way of the expansion of the Turkish arms, but threatened the very existence of Muslim rule in this country.) If some of the kingdoms ‘Alāūddīn conquered became independent about the time of his death it did not mean that ‘Alāūddīn’s achievements were mean. He had curbed the power of the Hindu Rajas in the far off south, and had it not been for his success in that region, a debauch like Quṭbuddīn could never have marched to Devagiri and slayed alive Harpal Deva. ‘Alāūddīn’s work at least had permanent results if his conquests were not permanent. It was ‘Alāūddīn who had exhibited to his successors the vulnerability of the states beyond the Vindhyas. (His system of administration had enabled him successfully to rule the country for two decades, and its value is judged by the fact that most of his administrative measures served as models for later monarchs. Baranī aptly enumerates the glorious features particular to ‘Alāūddīn’s regime, which are not to be found in the rule of any other king. The first special feature of ‘Alāūddīn’s times is the cheapness of the necessaries of life and fixed rates of grains in seasons of plenty and scarcity; the second is the unbroken chain of victories which the king and his commanders obtained, and it appeared as if victory preceded a military enterprise; the third is the crushing of the Mongols; the fourth is that a large force remained calm and contended on a small salary; the fifth is that contumacious landholders were suppressed; the sixth is that roads and highways became safe, and those who used to rob were made to guard them; seventh, that the traders were compelled to be honest; eighth is the abundance of strong buildings; ninth, that Hindus were compelled into obedience and Muslims had become true, abstemious and just; and the tenth is the congregation of artists and learned men such as had not been found to exist in any other reign.)
CHAPTER XX

QUTBUDDIN MUBARAK SHAH (1316-1320)

The Interregnum

The death of ‘Alāūddīn left Kāfūr the master of the situation. After shedding a few crocodile tears,1 he buried the emperor’s dead body in a mausoleum built by the sultan himself in front of the Jamā Masjid (Quwwatul Islam mosque).2 Next morning he sent for the nobles and officers of the state and showed them the will of ‘Alāūddīn nominating Shihābuddin ‘Umar for the throne. ‘Īsānī writes that as the condition of ‘Alāūddīn became very critical Malik Naib suggested to him to set aside the claims of Khizr Khan and nominate ‘Umar Khan for succession. On account of extreme weakness and insensibility the sultan could not give any reply, and as generally happens, his silence was interpreted as his consent, and prince ‘Umar Khan was declared heir-apparent.3 The nobles submitted to the dictates of the document bearing the king’s seal and ‘Umar Khan, a child of about six years, was raised to the throne as sultan Shihābuddin ‘Umar Khalji.4

Shihābuddin was the most agreeable puppet Kāfūr could ever find. Despite his being a eunuch, the Naib married the infant king’s mother, who was a daughter of Ramdeva,5 and began to rule in Shihāb’s name. Malik Naib’s excellent martial qualities had marked him for a great conqueror, but

1 Futūh p. 341.
2 Barani, p. 369. For the location of the tomb see Appendix C.
3 Futūh pp. 335-36.

319
surely he was lacking in statecraft. Without first strengthening his position he began to rule with all the excesses of a king. He was under the presumption that all the nobles of ‘Alāūddīn were with him and in place of tactfully befriending them, he alienated them by his atrocious and unbecoming acts.

On the very first day of his accession to power, Kāfūr sent Sumbal to blind Khizr Khan at Gwalior.6 He gave him ‘Alāūddīn’s ring, which he had removed from the dead king’s person,7 to facilitate his work. He promised the Barbēgī of the court as a reward for the heinous crime.8 Sumbal reached Gwalior in no time. Because of the royal insignia he was enabled to reach his prey without difficulty.9 Poignant were the tears that rolled down the prince’s cheeks as he sat down to lose his sight. “The eyes that could not bear the touch of antimony”, says Amir Khusrau, “now bore the tortures of a blinding needle.”10

On the day Sumbal was despatched to Gwalior, Shādi Khan, a brother of Khizr Khan, was blinded in the Kaushakī-Sirī. His eyes were sliced from their sockets “like pieces of melon.” Khizr Khan’s mother was also sent as a prisoner to Gwalior and was deprived of her ornaments and valuables.11 Shortly after Mubarak Khan, another son of ‘Alāūddīn, was imprisoned at Delhi. All the other sons of the deceased monarch, viz. Farīd Khan, ‘Usman Khan, Muḥammad Khan and Abu Bakr Khan also fell into the hands of the Regent.12

7 Futūḥ p. 341.
8 Baranī p. 373.
9 Futūḥ p. 338.
10 Deval Rani p. 263.
11 She was already under detention when ‘Alāūddīn’s eyes closed. Now she was sent to Gwalior. This is confirmed by the fact that she was at Gwalior with her son Khizr Khan when he was murdered in 1318.
12 Futūḥ. pp. 341-42.
Feeling secure at the score of the royal princes, whom he had either imprisoned or blinded, Kāfūr began to rule with a sense of security. He used to seat the child-king on the throne on the terrace of the Hazār Sitūn for a showboy, and address nobles and officers after the fashion of ‘Alāūddīn, making the high officials and barons stand in his presence. In the day he carried on the business of the government and at night used to gamble and dice in the company of his friends.\textsuperscript{13} When closetted with confidential associates he used to discuss ways and means of removing ‘Alāūddīn’s scions and officers. Little did he know that his movements were spied by those whose destruction he was planning.

The situation came to a crisis when the Regent attempted to blind Mubarak Khan whom he had already imprisoned. He had hired some footsoldiers (paiks) to blind the prince, but when they approached Mubarak, he took out a jewelled necklace from round his neck and throwing it before them reminded them of the duty they owed to the sons of the late king. Impressed by Mubarak’s harangue they not only left him untouched\textsuperscript{14} but determined to finish the traitor. In the execution of this act they had the connivance of high military officers who used to see the Regent waking up all the night in bolted chambers discussing in secrecy. Four paiks whose names are given as Mubshar, Bashīr, Saleh and Munīr,\textsuperscript{15} one day went \textsuperscript{13} In a parallel passage Nizāmuddīn Ahmad and Ferishtah suggest that he played Chaupar. Prof. Hodivala (pp. 283-84) says that it may be Pachisi, firstly because Pachisi is a very popular and antiquated game, and secondly because kaori is not made use of in Chaupar while its use is necessary in the latter game. But from Kaori bākhtan may be meant dicing and gambling for which the term is very commonly used in India.

\textsuperscript{14} Ferishtah p. 124.

\textsuperscript{15} Futūh pp. 342-43. Ferishtah also gives the name of two, Mubshar and Babhīr.

F. 21
to the chambers of Kāfūr and murdered him, only thirty five days after his usurpation of power.16

After the assassination of Malik Naib, Mubarak Khan was brought out of confinement and appointed Regent to Shihābuddin. By his devotion to duty and attention to the affairs of the state, Mubarak won the barons over to his side. No sooner than his position was made secure he blinded Shihābuddin and sent him to Gwalior two months after his assumption of regency.17 He also crushed the power of the paiks who had slain Malik Naib and on that account had become arrogant and proud. They openly boasted of having brought about the death of Malik Kāfūr and the accession of Quṭbuddin. As such they expected preferential treatment from the Regent and the nobles. Soon after Quṭbuddin ascended the throne he ordered the execution of Mubhar and Bashīr. The other contumacious paiks were also taken to different places and beheaded.

Accession of Quṭbuddin Mubarak Shah (1316)

Mubarak Khan ascended the throne at the young age of seventeen or eighteen on the 20th Muḥarram 716 (14th April, 1316).18 As was the custom, his accession was followed by great rejoicings, and titles and honours were conferred on the dignitaries of the state. The title of Zafar Khan was 16 Barānī and Ḫāṣīmī have 35 days. Firishtah only 25. As Alāūddin died on 7th Shavvāl (January 6th, 1316) and Kāfūr was killed 35 days after the former’s death, he must have been murdered on or about the 12th of Zil qada 715 (February 11th, 1316).

---

17 Barānī p. 377.

18 This is the date given in _T.M.S. Khusraw_ has 716, _Nūh Sipehr_ Elliot vol. III. Ḫāṣīmī also has 716. Barānī wrongly writes 717 and the mistake is repeated by Nizāmuddin, Badaoni and Firishtah. Numismatical evidence confirms the year 716 as correct, as the earliest coins of Quṭbuddin were struck in 716. conferred upon Malik Dinār, the Shaḥnah-i-Pil (Keeper of Elephants). Muḥammad, an uncle of the sultan, became Sher Khan. Malik Fakhruddin Jūnā, son of Ghāzī Malik, was made Amīr Akhūr (Master of Horse). Maulana Ziyūddin, son of Maulana Bahāuddin 19 Khattāt, who was Mūbarak Shah’s teacher in caligraphy, was given the post of Sadr Jahān and the title of Qāzī Khan, and a dagger worked in gold and jewels was presented to him. Malik Qīra Beg was entrusted with a number of responsible offices. 20 The king also raised to high positions his favourites and slaves and conferred upon them big jāgīrs. But the most surprising elevation was of Ḥasan, an obscure slave of Gujarat, on whom the king bestowed special honours. He was given the title of Khusrau Khan, and the emoluments and jāgīrs of Malik Naib were bestowed upon him; and after some time, in the very first year of his reign, Qutbuddin raised him to the position of Vazīr.

An Era of Reaction.

With the passing of time a stable government gradually dispelled the anarchic conditions that had followed ‘Alāūddin’s death. Repose and contentment began to appear among men. Whereas the new king was ease loving and generous by nature, his confinement and early privations had made him still more kind-hearted. The beginning of his reign, therefore, heralded the birth of a liberal era. On the day of his accession he had ordered the release of all prisoners. Men exiled for various offences were ordered to be returned home. This wise about seventeen or eighteen thousand prisoners were set free. He also granted a reward equal to six months’ salary to the army and increased the stipends and allowances of the officers and the learned, and “the people 19 Ferishtah has Shihābuddin.

20 Barānī p. 381. Later on the historian says that Qīra Beg held fourteen important appointments, p. 396.
had tankahs and jitals ringing in their pockets once again.” A large number of jāgīrs, which had been reclaimed into the Khālsā by ‘Alāūddīn, were returned. Heavy fines and taxes were abolished and extortionist devices like flogging and incarceration were prohibited in the Revenue Department. The sultan ordered that applications of the suppliants should be submitted to him,—a practice which had become obselete for some time. He personally perused the petitions and wrote orders on them.

In short, the new king inaugurated an era of reaction. Most of the regulations of ‘Alāūddīn fell into disuse. The strict vigilance of the conduct of the people was given up. They could now afford to be affluent with impunity, and naturally, began to amass wealth. Market regulations ceased to be enforced. The constant dread of the spics, the impossibility of obtaining favour or mercy and the fear of barbarous punishment no longer haunted the minds of the people. The dread of the king’s authority left the breasts of the people and they ran after pleasures, unbridled. Since the youthful monarch was always drowned in pleasure and dissipation, the people in general also followed in his footsteps. The demand for beautiful girls and beardless boys, says Baranī, made them a scarce commodity, and their prices rose to 500 and sometimes even to 2,000 tankahs. In spite of the fact that Quṭbuddīn did not rescind the restriction on drinks, wine was fearlessly smuggled, secretly distilled and freely drunk. Prices of grain and cloth rose high and the Multānī merchants rejoiced at the death of ‘Alāūddīn. They now sold articles at rates highly profitable to them, and cheated the public in every way. Bribery and corruption

---

21 Baranī p. 382.
22 Ibid.
23 Baranī p. 384.
25 Ibid. p. 385.
were openly indulged in, and it was a red letter day for clerks and Munshīs while the wages of labour increased fourfold.\textsuperscript{26} With the reduction in the rate of land tax the lot of the zāmin-dārs and peasants was automatically improved. In contrast to the days of 'Alāūddīn, now they ate better food and wore better clothes.\textsuperscript{27} To sum up, the kindness and liberality of the king as well as his own easy habits made the people happy and the agony of the days of 'Alāūddīn began to be dispelled from their minds.

\textit{Conquest of Gujarat 1316.}

We have seen how the assassination of Alp Khān had incited the people of Gujarat into rebellion. Under their leaders Haider and Vazīrāk the Gujaratis had killed the royal commander Kamāluddīn Gurg, and thenceforward the province had ceased to recognise the imperial authority. According to the author of \textit{Futūḥus Salātīn}, Malik Naib, during his regency, had contemplated to reestablish the royal authority in Gujarat. He had summoned 'Ainulmulk Multanī from Devagiri to attack Gujarat, but while the latter was marching northwards he heard about the death of the Regent and stopped in Rajputana.\textsuperscript{28} Consequently, it was left to Qutbuddīn to reconquer the province.

In the very year of his accession, therefore, Mubarak Shah sent a large force under Malik Tughlaq to join the forces of \textsuperscript{26} Barānī p. 385.

\textsuperscript{27} Barānī has Hindus for agriculturists. Their well-being was unbearable to the orthodox Maulana and he feels painted to write that "the Hindus who had become destitutes of food and cloth in 'Alāūddīn's days now dressed in fine linen and rode on horses". Barānī p. 385.

\textsuperscript{28} \textit{Futūḥ} pp. 339-40 'Isāmī says that 'Ainulmulk received the news of the Naib's death at Chittor and stayed there.
‘Ainulmulk Multānī near Chittor, and attack Gujarāt.\textsuperscript{29} The royal forces arrived in Gujarāt, but the rebel leaders were not daunted by the arrival of the imperialists, and marshalled their forces outside the city (of Neharvala).\textsuperscript{30} Ainulmulk was not only an experienced general, he was a great diplomat too. He wrote secret letters to junior officers of the rebel army asking them to kill their two generals Ḥaider and Vazīrak, and submit to the sultan. There was no sense, wrote ‘Ainulmulk, in the fighting of the two forces professing the same religion.\textsuperscript{31} At the end it was emphatically pointed out that ultimately the rebel leaders must be killed, but if the Gujarāt forces deserted them many an innocent life would be saved from destruction. The ruse worked well, and as the beligerant forces encountered each other, many Gujarātī officers deserted to the side of the imperialists. Ḥaider and Vazīrak fought valiantly but the desertions of the treacherous officers very much impaired their strength. Not being able to bear the brunt of the onslaughts of the royal army, they fled from the field of battle. They were relentlessly pursued but they succeeded in effecting their escape\textsuperscript{32} and seeking shelter with some Hindu chiefs and Zamindars in far off provinces.\textsuperscript{33}

After conquering Gujarāt ‘Ainulmulk returned to Delhi and was profusely rewarded.\textsuperscript{34} Malik Dīnār, who had been given the title of Zafar Khān, and whose daughter had been married to the sultan, was appointed governor of Gujarāt. Through the sincere efforts of his able and sagacious noble the whole of the province was brought under complete control. He administered the country so well that within three \textsuperscript{29} Futūḥ. p. 349.

\textsuperscript{30} Ibid. 350.
\textsuperscript{31} Futūḥ. p. 350.
\textsuperscript{32} Ibid. p. 351.
\textsuperscript{33} Baranī p. 388.
\textsuperscript{34} Futūḥ p. 352.
or four months of his arrival people forgot the good old days of Alp Khan. Zafar Khan realised a large amount of money from neighbouring chiefs and zamindars and sent it to Delhi.\textsuperscript{35}

Gujarat, however, was not destined to enjoy a long tenure of peace. A plot against the sultan’s life while he was on a march to the Deccan shook him to his very being and after his return from there Qutbuddin became extremely cruel and reckless. He openly executed Zafar Khan, his father-in-law and governor of Gujarat, without any rhyme or reason. Zafar’s death was enough to sap the imperial hegemony in Gujarat. Hisamuddin, a brother of Khusru Khan,\textsuperscript{36} was next given the charge of the province. The mere fact that the sultan looked upon him with some favour, turned his head, and this ungrateful wretch began to hatch evil designs. He collected his cousins, relatives and supporters, who were quite prominent in Gujarat, and raised the standard of revolt. The powerful barons and officers of Gujarat, however, caught him and sent him to Delhi. In place of taking any severe steps against Hisamuddin, Qutbuddin only gave him a place near him at the court. This attitude of the king frightened the noblemen of Gujarat and created bitterness and hatred in their hearts for so licentious a sovereign. After Hisamuddin, the governorship of Gujarat fell to the \textsuperscript{35} Tab. Akb. p. 177, Ferishtah. p. 125.

\textsuperscript{36} Barani p. 369 has درادر مادر خسرخان. Later on he says اب بادر خسرخان. Tab. Akb. at one place styles him as brother of Khusru Khan and at another as brother on the mother’s side. Ferishtah also has دادر مادری. It is therefore certain that Hisamuddin was a cousin or step-brother of Khusrau. He does not seem to have been his real brother but most certainly not his maternal uncle as Elliot has suggested. Elliot vol. III, p. 218. Amir Khusrau also calls him as brother of Khusru Khan at many places.
lot of Malik Vaḥīduddīn Qureshi, who was given the title of Sadrul Mulk. Vaḥīduddīn belonged to a highly respectable family and was one of the invaluable and rare nobles of the realm.\footnote{37} Sadrulmulk arrived in Gujarat and on account of his great qualities dispelled the vicious atmosphere created by the machinations of Ḩisāmuddīn. Quṭbuddīn was very much impressed by the administrative talents of Vaḥīd Qureshi, and after the suppression of Malik Yakhakhi’s revolt at Devagiri he called Vaḥīduddīn to Delhi, gave him the title of Tājulmulk and entrusted him with the offices of the Naib-i-Vuzrāt and Dīvān-i-Vuzrāt.\footnote{38}

\textbf{Expedition to Devagiri 1318.}

After the death of Malik Naib Devagiri was lost to the sultanate of Delhi, and Harpal Deva, son-in-law of Ram Deva, had assumed perfect independence. According to Yahya, Quṭbuddīn had made up his mind to proceed against Devagiri in 1316 but his nobles dissuaded him from going into so far off a country immediately after his accession.\footnote{39} In 1318, however, the sultan marched towards the Deccan with a large number of officers and men. He had determined firstly to conquer the lost kingdom of Devagiri and secondly to secure treasures from the Rai of Telingana\footnote{40} and other Deccan princes. In utter disregard of the fact that the emergency needed an experienced and strong man at the capital, the sultan gave the title of Vafā Malik to Shāhin, an obscure mediocrity and a \footnote{37} Barani p. 397.

\footnote{38} An inscription of Mubarak Khalji from Jalor, Jodhpur State, engraved in Tughra style and perhaps inscribed on a mosque mentions the name of Tājulmulk, the governor of Gujarat. The date on the inscription is 5th Muharram 718 (Thursday, March 9th, 1318). \textit{Epigr. Indo-Moslemica} 1937-38 pp. 49-50.
\footnote{39} \textit{T.M.S.} p. 83.
\footnote{40} \textit{Futūh.} pp. 352-53.
father in-law of the king, and appointed him viceroy at Delhi during his absence.

The southward march was confronted with little difficulties. Many an expedition had been led before and the way to Devagiri was very well known. The first halt was made at Tilpat where many more troops joined the sultan. From there Qutbuddin marched in all pomp and splendour and by forced marches arrived near Devagiri in about a couple of months’ time.\(^{41}\)

When the imperial army arrived on the borders of his kingdom, Harpal Deva and Raghava, minister of the late king Ram Deva, fled to the hills. There Raghava collected an army of 10,000 strong. Qutbuddin marched straight into Devagiri and occupied it without encountering any opposition. Khusrau Khan was sent with a powerful contingent to pursue the fugitive king and minister. Qutbgh, an officer of Khusrau’s forces, was successful in seizing some of Raghava’s adherents, from whom they were enabled to ascertain the strength of Raghava’s army as well as its location. Khusrau Khan attacked the Maratha minister in a defile and completely routed his forces. “The Hindus, who had pretended to independence, were either slain, captured or put to flight.”\(^{42}\) Raghava himself was most severely wounded but escaped capture. After this signal victory Khusrau Khan returned in all haste to Devagiri as the king had summoned him urgently. On his way back the Vazir received intelligence that Rana Harpal Deva had not submitted until then and had taken up a position in the hills at the head of a powerful army. The Khan went in his pursuit but was two or three times vigorously attacked by the Hindu Raja. At last Harpal Deva was severely wounded in a stiff engagement and was taken captive. Qutbuddin was overjoyed at this victory of

\(^{41}\text{Futuh. p. 353.}\)
\(^{42}\text{Nüh Sipehr, Elliot vol. III. pp. 558-59.}\)
his favourite general and received him “with a hundred flattering distinctions.” The rebels were severely punished. Harpal Deva was inhumanly flayed alive and his body was hung on the gates of Devagiri.\textsuperscript{43}

Rains detained the sultan at Devagiri for some time during which he brought the whole of the Maratha country under his sway.\textsuperscript{44} The sultan established outposts in “Gulbarga, Sagar and Dharsamudra and other places?”\textsuperscript{45} and appointed suitable officers to them. Malik Yaklakhi, who had served for a long time as Naib-i-Barid-i-Mumâlik under ‘Alâûddin, was made the Governor of Devagiri.

\textbf{Asaduddin’s Revolt 1318.}

By the beginning of Rajjab 718 (September 1318) the rainy season was at an end, and Khusrau Khan was ordered to lead an expedition into the kingdom of Telingana.\textsuperscript{46} The sultan himself turned towards Delhi. His haram was with him, and as was his disposition, he was always immersed in music and mirth. The king had, moreover, recently given posts of distinction to his favourites to the resentment of the senior nobility. A plot was hatched to put an end to the Sultan’s life. Asa-uddin, a son of Malik Khâmosh Yoghresh Khan and cousin of ‘Alâûddin, was the originator of this conspiracy. Asad was a man brave, cliquish and influential.\textsuperscript{47} He won over to his side some enterprising desperadoes, and they decided to kill the king when he was about to cross the Ghati of Sâkûn and to place Asaduddin on the throne.

\textsuperscript{43} Barâni p. 390.
\textsuperscript{44} Quṭbuddîn built a mosque at Devagiri which was still in existence in Ferishtah’s days. Ferishtah p. 125.
\textsuperscript{45} Ferishtah p. 125.
\textsuperscript{46} Barâni p. 390.
\textsuperscript{47} Barâni p. 393.
Luckily for Quṭbuddin, when he was coming down the valley of Sakun, Arām Shah, son of Khurram Khajūri, the Vakil-i-dar of Jalāluddin’s days, apprised the king about the plot. Quṭbuddin at once stopped where he had arrived and ordered the arrests of Asaduddin, his relatives and all other conspirators. An inquiry was held; the arrested were found guilty and instantly executed. After the fashion of his father, Quṭbuddin sent orders to Delhi to kill all the children of Yogh-resh’s family, about twenty-nine in number, all of whom could possibly have no knowledge of the plot, some being mere infants. The wealth and emoluments of Yoghresh were confiscated to the state and the ladies and young daughters of his house were turned out into the streets to beg their living. Quṭbuddin’s suspicions were not alleviated even with this cold blooded massacre. He determined to extirpate root and branch all those who had any connection with the royal house. When he arrived near Jhain he despatched Shadi Khatta to Gwalior to assassinate Khizr Khan and other princes who were imprisoned there. Later on, soon after his return to the capital, he ordered the execution of Zafar Khan, his father-in-law and governor of Gujarat. The next victim of Quṭbuddin’s implacable revenge was Vafā Malik Shāhīn, who had been left as viceroy at Delhi during the king’s absence in the Deccan.

Although the punishments inflicted were severe and indiscernise, yet the discovery of a couple of billion coins struck in 718 H in the name of one Shamsuddin Maḥmūd Shah

---

48 T.M.S. p. 84.
49 Baranī p. 393.
50 J. A. S. B. 1910 pp.566-67
Rogers: Catalogues of the Coins in Government Museum, Lahore, Introduction.
N. Wright: Sultans of Delhi, pp. 109-10.
serious character. Not only Asaduddin at Devagiri but people at Delhi were also implicated in it. The coins clearly indicate the presence of a pretender at Delhi in whose name they were struck. And who was this pretender? Asaduddin, Shāhin, or a son of Khizr Khan, “whose elevation to the throne was, according to Ibn Battūțah, the object of the conspiracy?”

Describing this revolt Ibn Battūțah writes that some nobles (he does not make mention of Asaduddin’s name) tried to rise in revolt against sultan Qutbuddin, and place on the throne a ten year old son of Khizr Khan. The fact that Khizr Khan had a son by Deval Rani is attested by Ḩājiuddabīr, but not by any contemporary historian. According to Baranī, Khizr Khan was about the same age as Mubarak Khalji. Again, he had married Deval Rani in 1313 or 1314. By no stretch of imagination, therefore, could Khizr Khan have had a son of ten years in 1318. Moreover, Khizr Khan had been deprived of his sight and was living a secluded life in a dungeon of Gwalior Fort “getting only food and clothing.” Under these circumstances it is certain that Khizr Khan or his son, if there was any, had no share in the plot. The statements of Amīr Khusrau in his immortal maṣnawi also lead to the same inference. Therefore, the title on the coin referred to above must either have been of Asaduddin or of Vāfā Beg. Asad was all along with Qutbuddin in the Deccan and was executed there. Since the coin was struck at Delhi it must have been in the name of Malik Shāhin, who was at Delhi and was executed by the king soon after his arrival there.

51 Camb. Hist. of India vol. III p. 121.
53 Zafarul Vāli p. 841.
54 Baranī p. 373.
55 Ibid. p. 393.
Assassination of Khizr Khan 1318.

Shadi Khatta, the Sar-i-Silahdār, arrived at Gwalior from Jhain. He was deputed to assassinate Khizr Khan, Shadi Khan and Shihābuddin, the three sons of Ḍalūddin, and to bring their families to Delhi. These princes had already been blinded and were permitted only bare sustenance. According to Amīr Khusrau, who does not say anything about Asaduddin’s revolt, the Sultan sent a message to Khizr Khan beginning with a sympathetic introduction but ending with a preposterous request. “You have lost sight of the eye and health of the body”, wrote Qutbuddin. “You know I have not been instrumental in all this...but now the oppressor (Malik Naib) is dead. If you were thrown into imprisonment, time for your release has arrived. I will make you governor of a province, an honour you amply deserve. You should, however, not burn in the fire of love for Deval Rani who is after all your slave. I hear that she has attained to such an elevation that you lay your head at her feet. Even if she was as beautiful as the Moon, she was not worthy of your worship. We wish that she may not be left with you. As she has been given to you by the Royalty, it is desired that she may be sent back to us. When your infatuation (lunacy) for her is a little abated she would be sent back to you to serve you as a slave.”

56 Barani p. 393. Deval Rani p. 275. At another place Khusrau (Deval Rani p. 278) says that he was a low-born Hindu. Ferishtah p. 125.
57 Barani p. 393.
58 Deval Rani pp. 273-75.

On the authority of Husām Khan, Hajiuddabir writes that when a son was born to Deval Rani Khizr Khan was asked to divorce her, because it was a custom that when a princess got a child she was divorced from her husband. Khizr Khan loved Deval Rani passionately and refused to separate her. This reason for Qutbuddin’s demand for Deval Rani has not been given by any other historian and seems absurd.

Zafarul Vāli pp. 841-43.
The demand filled the helpless prince's eyes with tears and heart with rage. He remonstrated saying that since he had lost everything in the world except his beloved, it behaved the king to leave at least Deval to him. In the end Khizr Khan declared that he would prefer death to her separation. In short the king who sought a pretence to kill his step brother ordered the death of Khizr Khan. Consternation and then despondency spread in Gwalior Fort as the arrival of Shadi Khat'a was made known. Khizr Khan took a touching farewell from his companion and prepared to die. Amīr Khusrau and Ibn Battūtah give a graphic account of the execution of the princes. The Egyptian traveller learnt all about it at Mecca from Qāzī Zainuddin Mubarak of Gwalior who happened to be an eye witness to the execution. According to the Qāzī, Khizr Khan's mother, who was present in the fortress, was locked up in a room. Khizr Khan's spirits quailed at the sight of the sword and he started wailing aloud. But soon the fatal blow silenced him for ever. Shadi Khan was all fire at the cruel doom decided for the innocent victims. In his rage he leapt upon the executioner and threw him on the ground. But all in vain. Very soon he and Shihāb "drank of the same cup", each being killed by turns. The wails and cries of the royal ladies added to the poignancy of the situation. In a turret of the fort known as the Vijaya Mandir were buried the dead "just as gems are hidden in stones."

A word about the unlucky Deval. Her life after the death of her husband is tantalisingly obscure. Barani only says that all the ladies staying at Gwalior were brought

---

59 Deval Rani p. 275.
60 Ibn Battūtah vol. III, pp. 192-93.
61 Deval Rani pp. 284-85.
62 Ibid. p. 287.

Khizr Khan's mother remained alive long after his death and Ibn Battūtah met her at Mecca in 728H (1328 A.D.).
to Delhi. He does not say what happened to Deval Devi, nor does Khusrau. Hajjuddabir, however, says that Qutbuddin married her against her will and everybody condemned this action. Ferishtah also says that Qutbuddin took into his haram Deval Devi, the wedded wife of Khizr Khan. This may not be improbable. Qutbuddin had little moral scruples and the taking possession of the wives of a dead prince by the ruling monarch was a common practice in those days. With the murder of Qutbuddin at the hands of Khusrau Khan the affairs at Delhi became chaotic. According to Barani, Khusrau Khan married the wife of Qutbuddin. He does not say that she was Deval Devi. Obviously she must have been the chief wife of Mubarak Shah. Some later Persian writers and a few modern historians, however, suggest that she was the ill-starred Deval Devi, perhaps because of the tragedy associated with her name. But their surmise is not supported by any contemporary evidence. In fact nothing is known of the end of this princess to whom the fates seemed to be deliberately inimical.

Qutbuddin and Nizamuddin Aulia.

So vindictive was the sultan’s nature that since Nizamuddin Aulia was a pir of Khizr Khan, Qutbuddin began to entertain a feeling of animosity towards him. He even abused the Shaikh openly and ordered his nobles to refrain from visiting him. Through sheer discourtesy he declared a reward of a thousand tankahs for one who would cut the saints’ head. He even did not acknowledge the salutations of Nizamuddin when they once chanced to meet at the tomb of

---

63 Barani pp. 393-94.
64 Zafarul Vâli pp. 841-44.
65 Ferishtah p. 125.
66 Barani pp. 410-11.
67 Ibid. p. 394.
68 Ibid. p. 396.
Shaikh Ziyāuddin Rūmī. He began to patronize Shaikhzādā Jām, who had for long been an opponent of Niẓāmuddin, and even called Shaikhul Islam Ruknuddin from Multan.⁶⁹

Thus, after the Devagiri expedition, all the qualities of generosity and large-heartedness which were characteristic of Quṭbuddin at the beginning of his reign, disappeared, while his grosser nature gained an upper hand of his self. Gujarat and the Deccan had been brought under control and there was no independent chief or king in the country strong enough to challenge his authority. While this security, external and internal, had made Quṭbuddin proud, Asad’s abortive conspiracy had made him ruthlessly cruel. Now he would not listen to any advice, nor would he trust anybody. There is no doubt that the plot was responsible for making him ruthless and unscrupulous, but his disgraceful habits were themselves responsible for the conspiracy. And though he extirpated the guilty as well as the not-guilty, he did not improve his own conduct. On the contrary his debauchery increased with time. Like the profligate Elagabalus of Rome (3rd century A.D.) the passions of the sultan could not be satisfied with “a long train of concubines” or a number of beardless boys. He preferred to dress himself in female attire and ornaments embroidered with laces and adorned with gems,⁷⁰ and occasionally went about dancing in the houses of the nobility. The king used to enjoy the sight of young eunuchs and ribald and dissolute women come stark naked to the court and cut indecent jokes with high officials like ‘Ainulmulk Multānī and Qira Beg. Toubah, a clown— from Gujarat, openly used to abuse the noblemen and insult them with obscene pleasantries.⁷¹ In short, the court of Quṭbuddin presented licence and obscenity in its utter nakedness. It was his sheer luck

⁶⁹ Baranī p. 396.
⁷⁰ Gibbon: Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, vol. I, p. 128.
⁷¹ Baranī p. 396.
that the Mongols did not knock at the gates of India and the revolts against the sultanate were quickly suppressed.

Revolt of Malik Yaklakhī at Devagiri.

About the time that Qutbuddin sent Malik Vahīduddin Qureshī as governor of Gujarāt, intelligence arrived that Malik Yaklakhī had risen in revolt at Devagiri and had assumed the paraphernalia of royalty.\(^2\) The sultan was all rage and at once ordered some prominent nobles\(^3\) to march to Devagiri, imprison Yaklakhī and send him alive to Delhi. A large force with a number of officers like Malik Talbaghā Yaghdā, Shādi Satilā, Qutlugh the Amīr-i-Shikār, Malik Tājulmulk and Khvājā Ḥājī marched southwards to quell the insurrection.\(^4\)

After about two months the royal army reached the destination. Malik Yaklakhī was exceedingly proud and neglected to strengthen his position. He little knew that his army was not loyal to him and the officers and men whom he had imprisoned during his revolt were definitely inimical to him. Thus when the actual warfare started many of his officers and men deserted to the royal camp. To crown it all Talbaghā of Nāgor, Nasīruddin and Shams, who Yaklakhī trusted as his supporters, one day arrested him and his followers when they were dead drunk.\(^5\) Then they sent Yaklakhī and his companions in chains to Delhi where his ears and nose were chopped off\(^6\) and his partisans severely punished. The

---

\(^2\) T.M.S. p. 84.

\(^3\) According to Ḥosāmī and T.M.S. Khusrau Khan was sent to suppress the revolt of Yaklakhī, but that is wrong. Both Barānī and Ferishtah only say that some prominent officers were sent. Khusrau Khan was already present in farther south, reducing Warangal and raiding cities in M’abar. Futūḥ. pp. 353-54.

Barānī p. 398.

\(^4\) Futūḥ. p. 356.

\(^5\) Ibid. pp. 357-58.

\(^6\) Barānī p. 397.
governorship of Devagiri was conferred on Malik ‘Ainul-mulk Multānī, and the deputy governorship on Malik Mujir-uddīn Abu Rījā. Malīk Tājulmulk, son of Khvāja ‘Alā Dābīr, was appointed as the latter’s secretary. In a short time they brought the country under perfect control.

Khusrau Khan in Farther South.

It has been said before that when Quṭbuddīn had left Devagiri after crushing Harpal Deva he had nominated Khusrau Khan to lead an expedition into farther south. Khusrau Khan accordingly marched into Telingana and on his arrival there the Raja and officers of the country fled away. The invader obtained some loot, and about one hundred elephants fell into his hands. Barānī, always deficient in the description of battles is altogether silent about the engagements which Khusrau Khan fought in the Kākatiya country. But Amīr Khusrau gives a graphic, and at places, an exaggerated account of the exploits of Khusrau Khan. The advance of the imperial army was marked by ravages committed equally by the Hindu and the Turkish soldiers. Every inhabited part on the route was made desolate. When the army arrived in Warangal the Hindu inhabitants fled confused. The royal forces encamped “three bow-shots” from the city. Khusrau Khan ascended an eminence from where he reconnoitred the fort. The Hindu horsemen of the Rai numbered more than 10,000 whereas the foot-soldiers were beyond computation. Despite their numerical superiority the souther-

77 Barānī p. 398 has مکین السین ابوزجا Mukhīr has no meaning while Mujīr means protector against oppression. Hājiuddabīr, Zafarul Vāli p. 157, gives the correct name Mujiruddin, writing on Barani’s own authority. Obviously his Ms. of Baranī had the correct spelling of the name which is Mujiruddin Abu Rija.
78 Barānī p. 398.
79 Ibid. p. 398.
ners were overwhelmed in the battle by the small Muslim cavalry.\textsuperscript{80} Some booty of gold and jewels fell into the hands of the imperial army which pursued its enemy to the gates of the citadel and burnt down all the gardens and groves so that the "paradise of idol-worshippers became like hell." Next morning Khusrau Khan attacked the outer walls of the fortress which were breached. A large number of Hindus were slain and many others taken prisoner. Anil Mehta, the principal commandant of the fort fell in this engagement. After taking the outer walls Khusrau began the investment of the inner fortress. He ordered Khvājā Ḥājī, the ‘Āriz, "to distribute the army to the proper posts, to dig the trenches, and spring a mine." These preparations alarmed Pratap Rudra Deva and he sent messengers to sue for peace. He agreed to surrender five districts and promised to pay a large tribute including more than 100 elephants, 12,000 horses, gold, jewels and gems beyond compute. Flushed with victory the imperial general subjected the Rai to many indignities before accepting the truce, but in the end he relinquished most of the ceded and conquered territory except the fortress of Badrkot "which the Khan had object in demanding."

After defeating the Raja of Warangal, Khusrau Khan marched towards M‘abar. According to both Baranī and Iṣāmī he attacked Masulipatam (Patan of the Muslim historians, lying near Motupille on the mouth of Krishna) and there robbed a wealthy merchant Khvājā Taqi by name.\textsuperscript{81} Sirāj Taqi was a very rich man and having learnt that a Muslim army was coming on, had not fled. Khusrau robbed him of his jewels and wealth and killed him. ‘Iṣāmī’s version that Khusrau Khan asked Sirāj Taqi to surrender his daughter \textsuperscript{80} Nūh Sipehr, Elliot vol. III p. 560 gives the number of Muslim cavalry at 300. So vast a difference between the strength of the two forces is incredible.

\textsuperscript{81} Baranī pp. 398-99.

\textit{Futūḥ}. pp. 459-60.
to his embraces, and the old Musalman preferring death to such a humiliation committed suicide, does not seem to be improbable.

Khusrau Khan marched on (up to the mouth of the river Krishna) and attacked Maithli (Motupille). Twenty elephants and a diamond weighing six dirhams fell into his hands. Having captured this booty he entered the country of M'abar. Heavy rains detained Khusrau Khan in M'abar. He had quite a large army and some captured booty. On his way to M'abar he had entertained evil designs against his master. He was an upstart and possessed an evil disposition. As in the case of 'Alāūddīn, the wealth of the Deccan had aggravated his ambitions. It has been said before that when he was settling terms of treaty with the Kakatiya Raja, Khusrau Khan had insisted on the occupation of "Badrkot, a fort as high as heaven, which the Khan had an object in demanding." He had planned to kill those nobles whose confidence he did not enjoy and to rule over M'abar with the support of his forces. But Khusrau's designs were soon known to many a well-wisher of the state and Malik Tamar, sief holder of Chanderi, Malik Mal Afghān, Malik Talbagha Yaghda of Kara, Malik Tīgīn and Malik Ḥaji, the Naib-i-Āriz, one day openly asked Khusrau to return to Delhi before his foolish plans were known to the king. As these nobles had large contingents under their command, Khusrau Khan dared not oppose them and prepared to return. But the nobles who apprised the king of Khusrau's evil designs did not even receive the attention they deserved. The sultan only ordered that Khusrau Khan should at once be sent back to Delhi. From Devagiri Khusrau was taken in a palanquin post 82 Futūh. p. 359.

83 T.M.S. p. 85.
haste to Delhi where he arrived in a week’s time. For the time being his grandiose schemes were shattered to pieces.

At Delhi the sultan was extremely delighted to see him, and regarded the loot of some gold and jewels and the hundred elephants as quite large a booty. The disappointed Vazir finding the sultan so joyous at his exploits began to whimper and complain against Maliks Tamar and Talbagha, who had stood in the way of fulfilment of his designs in the Deccan.
The sultan, blinded by the infatuation he had for Khusrau, severely punished these well-wishers of the state without even letting them have their say. Malik Tamar was thrown in to prison and his Jagirs were given to Khusrau. Malik Talbagha, who had exposed the Vazir a little too openly was publicly insulted, his fief was seized and he was imprisoned.
These acts of flagrant injustice disgusted the courtiers and many of them resigned their honours and jobs on one pretext or another. The outcome of it all was that no one dared in future to apprise the king of Khusrau’s machinations for fear of similar punishments.

Death of Qutbuddin.

After such a quick fall of his enemies the work of the Vazir became easy. The cruel treatment meted out to Maliks Tamar and Talbagha and the ascendency of Khusrau had induced many a selfish noble to side with him. 86 Many other victims of the Sultan’s licence or wrath also clung to him Bahauddin Dahir, who had been ordered to send his wife to the royal haram sought the protection of Khusrau and became one of his best supporters. 87 One day Khusrau pleaded to the king that while he was so kind to him as to send him on distant expeditions, the officers accompanying him did not obey him. They had large forces at their command and since he

86 Barani p. 401.
87 Ferishtah pp. 126-27.
Zafarul Vali p. 845.
had none of his people with him they could overlook his orders with impunity. If, therefore, he could call some relations and friends from Gujarat he could be very successful in future campaigns. The request was granted and a large number of Khusrau’s friends and relatives arrived in Delhi. On their arrival he took them into his confidence and gave them horses and robes and wealth. Thus, according to Ferishtah, he was enabled to marshall a corps of 40,000 Barvaris, all his loyal supporters. He used to consult the leaders of these Barvaris and some other trusted adherents such as Yūsuf Şūfī and the sons of Qīrat Qīmar about his intended revolt. About this time the sultan went to Sarsava and the Barvaris decided to kill him while he was busy in sport. But Yūsuf Şūfī and some others warned Khusrau that if they attacked the king so openly, the royal army would fall upon them and cut them down. On the contrary if the king was killed in his own palace, and the antagonistic nobles imprisoned, the way to the throne would be rendered very easy. At last it was unanimously decided to finish the king in the palace of Hazār Situn. In the meantime the sultan returned from Sarsava and the crafty Vazīr begged for another favour from him. He left the palace so very late every night, said he, that he was deprived of the company of his relations who had left their native place only for his sake. If, therefore, they could be allowed to enter the palace at night they could come and see him

88 Barani has, p. 402, Behalvāl may be either be Naharvala, capital of Gujarat, or Bhīmal about 50 miles west of Abu. Since Barani always spells Naharvala correctly it is probably Bhīmal, then ruled by Parmar Rajputs. It may be recalled that Khusrau’s brother Hisamuddīn had collected followers at Patan to rebel against Delhi sultanate. So the ground for Khusrau’s rebellion had been in preparation for some time past.

89 Ferishtah p. 127.
90 It is a small town in the Saharanpur district of the United Provinces.
91 Barani pp. 402-3.
there. Qutbuddin ordered that the keys of the palace gates should be left with Khusrau’s men so that they could enter the palace any time they liked. This is Barani’s version. Ibn Battūtah, however, says that it was customary in those days that when a Hindu accepted Islam, the sultan used to present him with a robe of honour and a gold ornament. According to his narrative Khusrau Khan informed the sultan that some of his relations wanted to embrace Islam but felt shy in waiting upon him in the day time. The king allowed them to come and pay respects at night. Whatever the pretence, Khusrau was successful in securing entrance for his men into the palace at night.

In delivering the keys of the palace gates the sultan handed over his own death warrant to the Barvaris. Every night, after it was quite quiet, about three hundred well armed Barvari’s used to enter the palace and move about here and there. The people saw these armed ruffians freely enter the palace at dead of night, but they dared not inform the sultan of their movements for fear of his wrath. But intelligent people understood everything and whispers of the intended revolt of Khusrau went round the palace. Qazi Ṣiyāḥūddîn, the Vakil-i-dar, however, could not bear to see such a state of affairs. He had been tutor to the king in calligraphy and so could speak to him pretty plainly. One day he openly told the sultan of what was going on in the palace. “I rely on the mercy of Your Majesty,” began the veteran officer, “and will say what I see every day. The Barvaris enter the palace every night and everybody knows that their intentions are wicked. The life of Your Majesty is in danger. During the regime of the late sultan Ṣulṭân ʿAlāūddīn if somebody drank water more than usual, the sultan was at once informed of it. It is strange indeed that while such a great noise is being made in the palace and your life itself is in jeopardy, Your Majesty is quite neglectful. I request you to inquire into the matter. If there is something fishy, you may take steps to punish the miscreants. If you find the allegations unfounded, your love for Khusrau will only be increased.” The sultan at once lost his temper and scolded the Qāzī in unbecoming terms. In place of holding an inquiry, he repeated to his favourite all that the Qāzī had said. Khusrau at once began to shed crocodile tears. “Since Your Majesty bestows upon me your favours”, said Khusrau, “the great nobles are anxiously trying to bring about my death.” Quṭbuddin consoled the cunning Vazīr saying that he was the only person in whom the sultan reposed his implicit trust.

Late on the same night as Qāzī Ziyāuddīn, the superintendent of the night guard was taking his rounds, and very few persons had remained in the palace, Randhol, a relation of Khusrau Khan, entered the palace with a few Barvarīs and accosted him. He offered the Qāzī a pān and while they were talking, Jahariya, another Barvari, shot an arrow at the Qāzī and killed him on the spot. This cold blooded murder created consternation in the Hazār Sitūn, which was now filled with Barvarīs. Quṭbuddin heard the noise from his chamber and asked Khusrau Khan to go out and see what the matter was. The clever intriguer came out on the terrace, shouted a few words to show that he was scolding somebody, and then returned to the king’s presence saying that some horses had been let loose and people were trying to catch them. Just then Jahariya dashed towards the king’s private apartments and killed its chief guards Ibrahim and Is-hāq. Then alone did Quṭbuddin realise the situation and he tried to escape into the haram. But Khusrau was too

93 Barānī p. 405.
94 Barānī p. 406 has  دبي مخشور خان. Niya means grandfather as well as maternal uncle.
95 Barānī pp. 406-07
96 Barānī p. 407, Ferishtah p. 128.
cunning to lose him at that stage and caught him by the hair. The king had drunk hard that night and due to his intoxications and physical strength he easily threw the traitor on the ground and sat tight upon him. Jahariya reached the spot, which was indicated to him by the shouts of Khusrau pinned under the weight of the sultan. He struck off the head of Quṭbuddin and threw it down the battlements of the palace. A few servants of the king, who had been left on the upper storey, also fell to the daggers of the Hindus. According to the author of the Tarīkh-i-Mubarak Shahi Quṭbuddin was murdered on the night of the 5th of Rabiul Avval 720 (April 26th, 1320).

An Estimate of Mubarak Shah.

The way in which Quṭbuddin met his death goes to show how depraved and foolish he was. The qualities of generosity and kindheartedness with which he was rewarded by his early hardships disappeared on his attaining to unlimited power. He had received little education and from whatever little experience of life he had, he had refused to learn that unbridled debauchery led to disaster. The grosser appetites of man dominated his self and he practised every vice that goes to debase human nature. It need hardly be mentioned that the king did not say the daily prayers and did not observe the fast of Ramżan.

Quṭbuddin's arrogance knew no bounds. In his pride he ordered barbaric punishments, and the tortures inflicted 98 Amīr Khusrau gives the date to be Jamadi-us Sani 720 (July 1320). The text of T.M.S. p. 86, wrongly has 721 H. but the translator's Ms. had the correct year 720 H. (T.M.S. Trs. p. 86). Ferishtah also wrongly has 721. Tab. Akb. and Badaoni have 720. Later events lead us to the conclusion that the date of T.M.S. is preferable to that of Khusrau's Nūh Sipehr. Also see the last footnote in the next chapter.

upon Harpal Deva and the relations of Yoghresh bear witness to his perverted mentality. So haughty and malicious was he that he refused to acknowledge the salutations of a pious man like Shaikh Nizamuddin Aulia; and while great monarchs like ‘Alâüddin addressed themselves only as “Yaminul Khilâfat” (Right hand of the Khalîfâ) or “Nâsîr-i-Amîrul Mauminîn” (Defender of the faithful),99 Qutbuddin took the title of Khalîfâ to himself. He declared himself “Al Imâm-ul-Âzam, Khalîfâ-i-Rabbul ‘Almîn”, “Khilâfat-ul-Lah”, and “Amîrul Mauminîn”.100 Not only was he keen on adopting pompous titles, he had in fact a passion for the novel, the beautiful. His coins and inscriptions stand out for their boldness of execution and variety of inscriptions. His coins are round and square, of gold, silver, billon and copper. The square coin was for the first time introduced by him in 718 H.101 The engravings on his inscriptions are “typically ornamental naqsh”, in sulüs and in tughrâ “of intricate type”.102 He patronized scholarship, was fond of music and composed verses too.103 But the fact that the fear of royalty vanished completely, and the prestige of the Delhi sultanate lost its lusture during his regime, prove Rogers: Catalogue of Coins. p. 46.

100 Nelson Wright pp. 107-109.
“Chronicles” pp. 179-81.
Lane poole: Muhammadan States pp. 44-48.

Ibid. 1931-38 p. 48.
Ibid. 1937 pp. 49-50.

103 Barani p. 382.
Tab. Akb. p. 76.
that he was a worthless king. It was his good luck that so long as he ruled no Mongol invasion threatened the peace of the country, no famine devastated the land, military enterprises were successful and rebellions were quickly suppressed; yet his ways disgusted the nobility and encouraged rebellions. Qutbuddin well deserved the doom meted out to him.
CHAPTER XXI

NAŞİRUDDIN KUSRAU SHAH (1320)

Quṭbuddin’s murder saw the accession of Khusrau Khan to the throne. Khusrau was not a Khalji. He belonged to the Barvārī or Parvārī caste of Gujarat. Žiyāuddīn, indignant at the very idea of a convert’s accession, hurls every sort of abuse on the king and his tribe. And since his short reign was not popular, the invectives of the historian become relentless. Thus he declares Khusrau to be “faithless and cunning, dishabile and of low origin (بداصل).

"A low born menial" and abuses of this kind are repeatedly inserted in Barani’s narrative. But these are merely personal aspersions on Khusrau and do not throw any light on the tribe or caste to which he belonged. Depending on Barānī, ‘Īṣāmī, Yaḥya, Nizāmuddīn and other later Persian chroniclers aver that Khusrau Khan belonged to a low caste of Gujarat. Following on their narratives European scholars like Briggs and Thomas think the Parvāris to be worse than scavengers. Briggs declares that “the Parwari is a Hindoo outcaste, who eats flesh of all kinds, and is deemed so unclean as not to be admitted to build a house within the town.” Since Briggs had thought that Parvār must be the same as Parvārī, and

1 The word is variously spelt by medieval historians. Barānī writes Barvār (بهر) and Barvārān (بهر). Badaonī also has Barvār. Khusrau has Barado (بارو), ‘Īṣāmī Parāo (پراو) and Yahya Barāo. Nizāmuddin and Firishtah have Parvār (پر). Hājiuddabīr spells it Rao.

2 Barānī p. 390.
3 Ibid. p. 391.
Molesworth defined Parvārī as an individual of low caste, chiefly employed as village watchmen, gate-keepers, porters and said to be synonymous with Dhed and Mahār;”⁵ Thomas was not slow to conform to Briggs’ opinion.⁶ W. Haig also did not choose to differ from his predecessors and writes that the corps of 40,000 Barvārs organised by Khusrau Khan about which Ferishtah makes a mention “was largely composed of and exclusively commanded by members of his own despised tribe.”⁷

On the contrary some other European scholars have declared Khusrau Khan as belonging to the high caste of Rajputs. Thus James Bird⁸ and Bayley⁹ think that Barvār or Parvār is nothing else than Parmār (Rajputs) and confound Parvār with Parmār.

Now, neither of the conclusions arrived at by the European writers is convincing. No contemporary historian has specifically stated the real caste or tribe of Khusrau Khan. Barani, and following upon him some later historians repeatedly abuse Khusrau and in the course of their personal aspersions add one of low origin. On the contrary there are facts which go to prove that the Barvaris were a people of strong mettle and independent disposition. Amīr Khusrau, a contemporary authority, praises the Barvaris for their gallantry and sacrifice. He says that they were men brave and courageous, and were employed by the Rajas of Hindustan for whom they were always prepared to lay down their lives. Baranī also testifies to their readiness to lay down their lives while describing Targhi’s insurrection in Gujarat in the time of Muhammad Tughlaq. He says that in the battle near Kadi Pattan about one hundred rebels attacked the sultan’s body guard like the brave Baravān-i-Fida’īyān, who carried their lives on the palm of their hands”.

⁷ Cambridge History of India vol. III p. 123.
⁸ History of Gujarat, Translation of Mirāt-i-Ahmadi p. 167.
⁹ Local Muhammedan Dy. Isties, Gujarat p. 41 footnote.

Hisāmuddin, according to Baranī, planned a revolt against Qutbuddin Mubarak with the help of all the renowned Barvārs of Gujarat. “The renowned Barvārs” cannot belong to a low caste because a low caste cannot be renowned in Hindu society. Firishtah at one place clearly says that Khusrau Khan belonged to the Pahalvāns of Gujarat. Ibn Battūtah also praises the Barvārs and says that “Khusrau Khan gathered a troop of Indians chosen from among the bravest and greatest, his brother the Khan-i-Khanān was among them”. In these circumstances it is impossible to believe that they belonged to the low caste of Dheḍ and Mahār. The victories of Khusrau Khan in south India and the gallant fight he and his relations put against Ghāzi Tughlaq clearly show that he did not belong to a low caste.

But if the above inference is correct it can also not be said that the Barvār was so high a caste as the Parmār.

---

10 Tughlaqnama Aurangabad text p. 19 verses 338-39:

11 Baranī p. 519 has

12 Baranī p. 397 has

13 Firishtah p. 124 has

No historian, contemporary or later, says so. Ḥājiuddābīr who wrote in Gujarat and had a special knowledge of the history of that part of the country joins Barānī in giving a low origin to Khusrau Khan. Professor Hodivala rightly observes that "The real name of the tribe or caste to which Khusrau Khan belonged cannot be ascertained."¹⁵ All that is known is that he and his Barvārī associates were brave and courageous, clever and unscrupulous.¹⁶

Early Life.

Khusrau Khan seems to have been converted to Muham-madanism in early childhood and given the name Ḥasan. When ‘Ainulmulk Multānī sacked Malwa in 1305 Ḥasan and his brother fell into his hands. At the imperial court Ḥasan was chosen for the body of the personal slaves of sultan ‘Alā‘uddīn¹⁷ and assigned to Malik Shādī, a nobleman, under whose care he grew up.¹⁸ When Quṭbuddīn Mubarak Shah ascended the throne he became highly enamoured of the youthful Ḥasan and in the very first year of his reign he bestowed upon him the title of Khusrau Khan, the office of Vazarat and all the dignities and jagīrs of Malik Kāfür. In elevating Khusrau Khan Quṭbuddīn had refused to gain from the experience of ‘Alā‘uddīn who had conferred extraordinary distinctions upon ¹⁵ Hodivala p. 369.

¹⁶ For discussion on the caste of the Barvārīs see Hodivala pp. 369-71.

¹⁷ Barānī p. 381.

¹⁸ The author of Tarikh-i-Muhammadī (completed 842 H.) writes that Khusrau Khan was brought up by Malik Shādī of the court of ‘Alā‘uddīn. Tarikh-i-Muhammadī Allahabad University Ms. fol. 126 his favourite Malik Kāfür. As seen above Khusrau Khan proved as much an anathema for the Quṭbī as Malik Kāfür had been for the ‘Alai’ regime.

After the gruesome murder of Quṭbuddin, Khusrau Khan sent for all the high officials of the State like Malik ‘Ainulmulk Multānī, who had then arrived from Devagiri,19 Malik Vaḥīdduddin Qureshi, Malik Fakhruddin Jūnā, M. Bahāuddin Dabīr and the sons of Qara Beg. He kept them under semi-imprisonment that night and compelled them to promise allegiance to him. While the usurper was busy in establishing his power, Randhol, Ḥisāmuddin, Jahariya and many other partisans of Khusrau entered the royal haram and began to perpetrate horrible crimes. At the outset they finished all the possible claimants to the throne one after another after effecting a thorough search with the help of torches.20 Farid Khan Abu Bakr Khan and three other young sons of ‘Alāūddin namely ‘Ali, Bahā and ‘Usmān were murdered in cold blood.21 The mothers of Quṭbuddin and Shihābuddin were also killed and many an inmate of the haram was ravished. Such ghastly punishments were inflicted upon the innocent, says Ziyā Barānī, “as no infidel could perpetrate even in the land of infidelity”.22

Not being confronted with any opposition whatsoever, the regicide ascended the throne and styled himself as Sultan Nāṣiruddin Khusrau Shah. He conferred titles and honours on the people, raising to high positions many of his favourites and those who had helped him in securing the throne. Besides, he ordered the execution of some of the nobles risen to eminence during Quṭbuddin’s reign. Randhol was given the title of Rai Rayān and the house and property of Qāzī

19 Ferishtah p. 128.
21 Ibid pp. 23-32.
22 Barānī p. 408.
Khan. The wife and children of the Qāzī saved themselves by effecting their escape on the previous night. Ħisāmdūn, the sultan’s brother, was married to a daughter of ‘Alāuddīn and the title of Khan-i-Khanān was bestowed upon him. Bahāuddīn Dabīr received the title of Ħamānd Mulk and the son of Qirat Qīmār was made Shayastā Khan. Among others who obtained titles were Yūsuf Sūfī who became Sūfī Khan, Ikhtiyāruddīn Sumbal who became Ħātim Khan and Malik Kamāluddīn Sūfī who was made the Vakil-i-dar. Khusrau did not forget to keep in good humour all those who hated him. Thus ‘Ainulmulk Multānī was made ‘Alīm Khan and Malik Fakhruddīn Jūnā was appointed Akhūrbeg. The Vazārat was entrusted to Tājulmulk and Vaḥīduddīn Qureshi, and the offices of Malik Qarā Beg were entrusted to his sons. Everybody, willingly or unwillingly, submitted to the new regime and the new king was proclaimed from the pulpits of the mosques as the Leader of the Musalmans (Amīrul Maumni).

According to Maulana Ziyāuddīn, however, the accession of Khusrau ushered in a reign of untold misery for the true believers. On the fifth day of his accession, says he, idol worship was begun inside the palace. Khusrau Khan usurped the (chief) wife of Quṭbuddīn and the Barvāris took possession of Muslim girls. Copies of the Quran were torn to pieces and used as seats for idols which were placed in the niches (mehrābs) of the mosques. In short infidelity was in the ascendant and the followers of the true faith were subjected to humiliations unprecedented in the history of the sultanate. The sultan thought of enhancing the power and dignity of the Hindus and a large number of them gathered round him.24 Treasures were thrown open and money was freely distributed to them. All this the chronicler writes 23 Šubāḥ Sādiq. Bankīpore Ms. fol. 1673.

24 Baranī p. 411.

F. 23
with the passion of a staunch Muslim who could not tolerate a convert ascending the throne; particularly one whose accession was accompanied by cruel punishments inflicted on Muslim women and children. But the narrative of Baranī suffers from gross exaggerations. It is not surprising that some Barvāris worshipped idols inside the palace and tore up copies of the Quran since they had known the Muslim conquerors breaking temples and burning religious books of the Hindus. In a spirit of revenge the Barvāris did all this, and the sultan on account of his obligation to them for securing him the throne did not interfere with what they did. Yahya is quite correct when he says, "The Hindus (rather Barvāris) confident of their position as the relations of Nāṣiruddin Khusrau Khan, subjected the Muslims to cruelty..." But the assertion of Baranī that Khusrau Shah tried to establish Hindu Raj is wholly incorrect. Khusrau had been converted when he was a mere boy, so that even his Hindu name has not come down to us. In the wars that he fought in the Deccan he was as cruel to the Hindu kings and inhabitants as any other Muslim conqueror. There he broke Hindu temples, and Amīr Khusrau graphically describes the humiliations to which the king of Telingana was subjected by him. Not only Khusrau, but his brother and a number of other relatives also had accepted Islam. These facts clearly show that Khusrau always regarded himself as a Musalman and there is not a single instance to prove that his behaviour or inclination was anti-Islamic. Baranī nowhere says that 25 T.M.S. p. 87. The so-called cruelties of Nāṣiruddin were multiplied by later writers. Thus Ibn Battutah writes that he prohibited cow-slaughter and ordered the Musalmans to paste the walls of their houses with cow dung,—a Hindu practice. Nizāmuddin Ahmad goes a step further and says that Khusrau ordered destruction of mosques Tab. Akb. p. 187). It is really strange how these atrocities escaped the notice of Baranī, 'Isāmī and Amīr Khusrau. In all probability Battutah and Nizāmuddin indulge in gross exaggerations.

Nāṣiruddin persecuted Muslims simply because they were Muslims. On the other hand he admits that so long as Nāṣiruddin reigned his khutbāh was read from the pulpits of the mosques and the title of Amīrul Mauminīn was struck on his coins.²⁶

A glance at the list of the newly appointed officers, again, would clearly show that almost all of them had held various offices in the reign of his predecessor. There is scarcely any doubt that some of them were raised for being Khusrau’s allies, but one thing is evident that except Randhol and one or two others, all the Barvāris dropped into the back-ground after Nāṣiruddin’s accession. The new king relied on the trusted nobles of Delhi; and he was so anxious about their good-will and co-operation that he even resorted to a coup d’ état to secure their support. At the capital he had not done anything prejudicial to the interests of the Musalmans. In the provinces also he left the Muslim governors undisturbed, and as later events show, most of them were quite satisfied with the revolution that had come about at Delhi. It is impossible that the governors of Multan, Samanah and Ajmer would have helped Khusrau Shah in the establishment of a Hindu Raj against Ghazī Tughlaq who had proclaimed himself as the champion of Islam. Moreover, the army of Delhi, which consisted mostly of muslim soldiers, could never have fought on the side of Khusrau Shah against Ghazī Malik had they in the least considered Khusrau to be inimical to Musalmans. If at the time of actual warfare a portion of the royal army deserted to the Tughlaqs it was simply because Nāṣiruddin’s cause was foredoomed to failure and not because they had deserted a champion of Hinduism and gone over to a champion of Islam.²⁷ It is, therefore,

²⁶ Nelson Wright: p. 104.
²⁷ Cf. in this connection the desertion of Delhi noble to ‘Alāūddin’s camp a quarter of a century back. They had left the sons of Jalāluddin not because they were worse Musalmans than ‘Alāūddin but because their cause was sure to fail.
evident that Nāṣiruddin was in no way prejudiced against the Muslims, and the accusation of Baranī that under his regime neither the honour nor the religion of Muslims was safe, is quite wrong.

Nāṣiruddin had obtained the throne by murdering Quṭbuddin and assassinating all the royal princes. Naturally his conduct had made him unpopular among his subjects. Although the majority of the people at Delhi had reconciled themselves to the new government, a certain section of the nobility was bitterly opposed to the rule of the regicide. Day and night did they plan to overthrow the usurper. Prominent among these nobles was Malik Fakhruddin Jūnā, who was ever in search of an opportunity to fly away from Delhi and join his father Ghāzi Tughlaq, Warden of the Marches at Deopālpur. The veteran warrior was very indignant at the wrongs that had been done to the family of sultan ‘Alā’uddin and “writhed like a snake” to wreak vengeance upon Khusrau Shah. But he could not rise in open revolt against him so long as “the light of his eyes”, Malik Jūnā, was there at the capital.28 Fakhruddin used to write to his father about the state of affairs at Delhi and messages between the two were constantly exchanged through the services of one ‘Ali Yaghdī. Ghazi Tughlaq exhorted his son to reach Deopalpur from where they could organize opposition against the king and Malik Jūnā one day astounded the court by riding off with a few chosen followers to Deopalpur.29 He was careful to take the son of Behram Aība with him on his flight. Khusrau Shah at once sent a force under the 28 Tughlaqnāmah pp. 62-64.

29 Amīr Khusrau says that Malik Jūnā had received many favours from Nāṣiruddin but on one occasion he became dissatisfied for some reason and finding an opportunity fled away. He is supported by Yahya in this statement. Tughlaqnāmah p. 40 son of Qirat Qīmār in pursuit of the fugitive, but the latter eluded the pursuers and safely reached Sirsuti (modern Sarsa). On his arrival there he found that his father had already garrisoned its fort by sending Malik Sarbata there.

T.M.S. p. 88.

Relieved of the anxiety about his son, Ghayāshuddin set to work for the overthrow of his avowed enemy. He sent letters to governors of various provinces requesting them to assist him in overthrowing Khusrau who was guilty of being an infidel and faithless to his patron. It was an appeal made to the Muslims because to the Tughlaqs the cause of Islam seemed to be in danger. “The slogan of revenge for religion, so common yet so effective in the history of the Muslims, was now started.”30 ‘Alī Alkaüs, the Amir of Deopalpur and Behrām Aiba, governor of Uchch joined Ghazi Malik, but Malik Maghlati governor of Multan refused to side with him. The diplomat Ghazi instigated the people of Multan to rebel against their governor and Maghlati was killed by his own men.31 Muḥammad Shah, the Amir of Sivistān, had been imprisoned by his own nobles but a letter from Ghazi became a “talisman of his release.” The people set him free and he set to work for the cause of the Tughlaqs.32 Malik Hoshang, sief holder of Ajmer showed signs of genuine support but in reality his “feet of determination was lax.” ‘Ainulmulk, the governor of Malwa, Dhar and Ujjain at first hesitated but then promised to help the Ghāzi.33 But Malik Yakhakhi was not content with sending a curt refusal to the Tughlaqs. He marched out to fight the Ghāzi but was killed by his own men.34 Ac-

30 Tripathi: Some Aspects of Muslim Administration, p. 56.
31 Ibid. p. 64.
32 Ibid. p. 67.
33 Ibid. pp. 68-70.
ccording to 'Isāmī, Gul Chandar and Sahaj Rai, the Khokhar chiefs, also joined the banner of the Tughlaqs. 35

Thus did Ghazi Malik, after welcoming his supporters and setting aside his enemies, prepare for a final struggle for the throne. It is not possible, on the study of Baranī, to impute motives to Ghāzi Malik's sincere efforts to overthrow Nasiruddīn, but undoubtedly he had given the war a religious colour. To his fervent appeals for help in the holy cause the Muslim governors of Multan, Sīvīstān and Samanah, and many other nobles of Delhi had sent a b'unt refusal. Their action clearly shows that they did not trust Ghāzi Malik's high-toned appeals. Moreover, the Ghāzi had sent the circular letter to the governors of the provinces on the western frontier only. Had he sent the appeal to the governors of all the Indian provinces, perhaps his disappointment would have been greater. It was only Behram Aiba who had wholeheartedly supported the Ghāzi, and his motives in taking the decision are not far to seek when it is remembered that Malik Jūnā had taken Aiba's son with him when he had escaped from Delhi. How could Ghayāsuddīn have been a saviour of Islam when most of the governors and people of northern India and the greatest Musalmans of the day Shaikh Nīgāmuddīn Aulia never recognised him as one? The truth appears to be that in spite of his emphatic professions the motives of Malik Tughlaq in fighting for the throne were quite secular and he had risen against Nasiruddīn only after his son had sent him full information about the conditions at Delhi and had joined him at Deopalpur.

Events at Delhi also had taken a new turn. From the very beginning Khusrav had great apprehensions from Ghayāsuddīn, and it was on account of him that he had given particular attention to Malik Jūnā and had appointed him to the high office of Akhūrbeg. Ever since Malik Jūnā had fled from the court the real intentions of the Tughlaqs had become all the more manifest. Nāṣiruḍdin set to organise his forces for future emergency. Intelligence of the happenings in the various provinces caused by the diplomacy of Ghāzī Malik had reached his ears and the deaths of Maliks Maghlatī and Yakhakhi had sufficiently alarmed him. Although Khusrau had fought many battles in the Deccan yet he was no match for the veteran warrior Ghāzī, who had struck terror into the hearts of the Mongol invaders. Khusrau Shah gave the command of his forces to Sūfī Khan. With the troops he already had, and some others whom gold had secured for him, he prepared to fight the Tughlaq adventurer. A portion of his army, some 40,000 strong, marched under the command of Khan-i-Khanān, the king’s brother, to check the advance of Ghāzī Malik from the very start. They marched to Sīrsuti but failed to capture it. Then they proceeded onward to Deopalpur to give battle to Ghayāsuddīn there. The rival forces met in an open field somewhere near Dabhali or Dalili, then a village between Sīrsuti and Deopalpur. After a short skirmish the royal forces were utterly routed and they fled pell-mell. Their youthful commander fled from the field of battle leaving behind elephants and horses and treasures to be seized by the victors. A large number of the vanquished were taken prisoners. The intelligence of this terrible disaster was conveyed to the king. It broke his spirits and frightened his partisans.

After the conclusion of this battle Ghāzī Tughlaq reorganised his forces for the final encounter. By now his financial resources had become quite satisfactory. While at Deopalpur, he had come to know of a caravan of horses and goods meant for the sultan of Delhi and had waylaid
it.  Again in the battle fought near Sirsuti he had obtained much loot. So far as his fighting force was concerned, it consisted of the brave warriors of the northwest who had served him for several years in the past and on whose fidelity he could put implicit trust. The right wing of his forces was commanded by Bahāuddin, his sister’s son, and in support of this young general was deputed Bahram Aiba of Uchch. The left wing was commanded by Malik Jūnā and with him were deputed Shihāb Ghaurī and Mīr Shādi, two other veteran warriors of repute. The centre was commanded by the brave Tughlaq himself. With his forces thus marshalled Ghāzi Tughlaq arrived by forced marches near Delhi and encamped in the vicinity of Raziya’s tomb in Indrapat.

Khusrau Shah on his part also prepared to fight a last desperate battle. He brought out all the treasures from Kilughari and Delhi, gave his soldiers two and a half months’ salary in advance, and tried all means to prevent any sort of disaffection from spreading among his troops. But so confident had the people become of Ghāzi’s victory that many a soldier who had accepted Khusrau’s gold gave up all idea of fighting and went home. Indeed the demoralised army of Delhi was no match to the sturdy soldiers who followed in the wake of Ghāzi Malik “and to whom the present war seemed to be nothing short of a Jihād.” In his extreme despondency and nervousness Nāṣiruddin burnt all records and account books of the imperial treasury. He held a council of war and consulted his supporters regarding the course of action to be adopted. It was decided to fight to a finish. The sultan marched out of Sīrī with his nobles and followers and encamped near the Hauz-i-‘Alāi. ‘Īsāmī details the marshalling of Khusrau’s army. The sultan, the Khan-i-Khanān and Maldeva, Raja of Chittor, took up positions in the centre. Sumbal, who had received the title of Ḥātim Khan and the post of Amīr-i-Ḥājib, commanded the right wing with Sūfī Khan as second in command. The left was in the charge of Shayasta Khan, Talbagha Nagori and Randhol. Having thus organised his forces Nāširuddin took up a position of great advantage, not far from Indrapat where the Ghāzi had pitched his tents. Behind him stood the gigantic fort of Delhi on which he could rely for provisions in case of emergency, and in front of him were a large number of groves and gardens to save him from terrific assaults. But the advantage of his position was marred by the betrayal of ‘Ainulmulk, who took the road to Dhar and Ujjain on the eve of the day of battle. His desertion broke the heart of Khusrau Shah who saw around him naught but despondency.

37 Tughlaqnama, p. 77.

It was on a Friday that the belligerent armies came in conflict on the plain of Lohravat, a village now untraceable but then surely situated between Delhi and the Hauz-i-Khāš. Khusrau Shah himself commanded his troops. According to Yaḥya a short but stiff engagement was fought in which the royalists hurled back the forces of Ghāzi Malik. But in this battle Malik Talbagha Nagori, one of the staunchest supporters of Nāširuddin, was killed; and Shayasta Khan, son of Qirat Qīmār, fled away from the field of battle, although he did not forget to plunder the camp of Ghāzi during his flight. In spite of these losses Khusrau Khan held on till the evening, fighting gallantly and desperately all the time. His stubborn resistance moved Ghāzi Malik to a quick and determined action. He collected his troops and exhorted 39 ‘Isāmī does not say who he was, but in all probability he was king of Chittor whom ‘Alāūddin had installed there after Khizr Khan’s evacuation. Maldeva died in 1321.

---

40 Futūh pp. 374-75.
41 T.M.S. p. 91.
them to fight with all the might they could muster. His stirring appeal had the desired effect and about three hundred of his loyal and chosen horses fell fiercely upon their adversaries. The force of this charge made an irreparable breach in the ranks of Nāṣiruddin. The Delhi army sustained a crushing defeat and fled in confusion.

Khusrau Khan had lost the battle. Realising that all was over for him now, he left the battle field and escaped towards Tilpat. A whole day’s battle had exhausted him completely and he craved for some rest. As night came on he concealed himself in the garden of Malik Shādī, his patron of yore. All night long he stayed there but the next day they seized him and struck off his head. This is Barani’s version. Amīr Khusrau also gives a similar account while Ibn Battūtah gives a little different and more detailed account. He says that Khusrau successfully concealed himself in the garden of Malik Shādī but when he could not bear the pangs of hunger he gave his ring to the gardener to fetch him some food. The ring was detected and its owner caught. Ghazi Malik first treated Khusrau kindly but later on ordered him to be beheaded at the same spot where he had got Quṭbuddin murdered, and his corpse to be thrown down the palace from where he had thrown the deadbody of Mubarak Shah. According to Amīr Khusrau Nāṣiruddin was killed on Saturday, 1st Sh‘abān 720 (September 6th 1320).\[42

---

42 The date given by Amīr Khusrau appears to be quite correct. Numismatical evidence shows that Ghayāsuddin Tughlaq ascended in 720 and not in 721 H. as Yahya and Fehristah say. Nelson Wright, pp. 112-15.

According to Barani Nāṣiruddin reigned for four and a half months. He, therefore, ascended the throne some time in Rabī‘ul Awaal so as to complete four and a half months in the beginning of Sh‘abān. It is, therefore, evident that Yahya’s date of Nāṣiruddin’s accession (5th Rabī‘ul Awwal 720, April 20, 1320) and Amīr Khusrau’s date of his death (1st Sh‘abān 720, September 6th, 1320) are the most probable.
Thus died Naṣiruddin Khusrau after a restless reign of four months and some days. He had lived a life of great vicissitudes. Captured in the sack of Malwa, he began his life as a slave. From that low position he rose from post to post and ultimately attained to the highest dignity of sover- reign through favouritism, through cunning and through his own merit. The orthodox Baranī, to whom this low born infidel was nothing short of a devil upon earth, hurls every short of abuse upon Khusrau Shah. But other historians like Amīr Khusrau, Yahya and even the orthodox Badaoni give him just praise. He secured the throne by such crafty yet admirable means that he deserves our praise for his planning intellect and dexterity. Once he had gained possession of the crown he tried to preserve it with all the might he could command. It was not his fault that his reign was so short. His only fault was that he had trusted too much to a nobility and a soldiery who were accustomed to worship the rising sun and desert a weak cause. Deceived by his followers and deserted by his troops, he stood on the field of battle till the last hour of the fight, and directed the remnant of his army with perseverance that deserves our applause. The last days of Khusrau call forth for a pardon of his early life. He had lived a life of scandal but died the death of a soldier.
APPENDIX A

'ALĀŪDDIN AND NEPAL

B. Durga Prasad has published a silver coin\(^1\) struck in Nepal in the time of 'Alāūddīn Khaljī. He obtained it in Benares along with another copper coin of Nepal of the Lachchhavi dynasty of the 1st century A.D.

The coin weighs 151 grains, about six grains less than the weight of a silver tankah of the time of 'Alāūddīn. It is 1.25 inches in size. On the obverse the legend in Arabic reads on the margin “Sikandar us Šāhī Nāsīrul Amīrul Mauminīn Yāminul Khilāfat” and in the middle within a small Ashtakon or double square there is a small winged lion of the Nepal type. On the reverse within a triple circle the Arabic legend reads “Al Āzam Assulaṭān Abul Muzaffar Muhammad Shah Alāūd Dunya va Dīn”, with a small couch in the margin. In the middle, within a small circle, the words “Sri Sri”—with two crescents and stars above each and a floral design below, are inscribed in Nagri characters of the 13th century. The Arabic characters of the legend are rather crude, and it appears that although the diecutter copied the legend from an original coin of the sultan yet he did not know Arabic and has committed several mistakes in engraving the Arabic characters.

The title Sri Sri and the two crescents with small dots representing the triplicate, the Shankhu (Chonch) and the circle of the beads are exactly in the later silver coins of Prithvi Nārāyan Sāh Deva and Shri Gurvan Yadha Vikram Sāh Deva of Nepal. B. Durga Prasad further adds that the tantrik Ashtakon and the winged lion with raised tail are Obv.    Rev.

The unique coin of 'Ala'uddin Khalji struck in Nepal peculiar to the Nepal coinage and establish the mintage of this coin in Nepal.

To face page 364

The coin is interesting in so far that it is the only evidence which alludes to ‘Aláúddín’s connection with Nepal. In the contemporary Persian chronicles there is no mention of the sultan’s conquest of that country. Contemporary Hindu accounts, however, allude to the conquest of Nepal by Harasimha Deva of Karnatakula dynasty, the Hindu Raja of Mithila in the time of ‘Aláúddín Khaljí. Mithila, comprising of about the north and north-west of present Bihar, was not affected by the Muhammadan invaders of the 12th and 13th centuries, who marched into Bengal via south Bihar leaving the territory north of the Ganga undisturbed. Harasimha Deva, the king contemporary of ‘Aláúddín, had a fairly long reign, and under him had served able ministers like Devaditya, his son Viréshvar Thakur and his grandson Chandréshwar Thakur. Chandréshvar was an erudite scholar and wrote many treatises in Sanskrit. His main works are Kritya Ratnákar, Dána Ratnákar, Vivád Ratnákar, Sudh Ratnákar, Grahast Ratnákar, and Púja Ratnákar. In Kritya, Dána and Vivád Ratnákars Chandréshvar claims to have conquered Nepal for his king Harasimha. In Vivád Ratnákar he describes how after his great victory he performed the ceremony of Tula Purúsa or religious gift of gold of the donor’s weight to Brahmans etc. in Saka 1236 (A.D. 1314).

रस्युङ्गशुध चन्द्रेण: वामिते शाक्रेभेः
सहसिं वचन पदने वागमती सिन्हुलुतीरे ।
श्रवितु दुङ्गलिन्तुलशैरस्त्रम्या स्वर्गसिंधिः
निमित्र विलस्यगामाग्निर्दि: योंमनाथ: ||

(Translation: In the moon fortnight of the month of Púsa 1236 Saka, Somnath, who was an ocean filled with all good qualities, offered in charity gold equivalent to his weight on the banks of the river Vāgmati).

---

The conquest referred to above was, therefore, undertaken some time before 1314 when the ceremony of Tula Puruś was performed. The capital of Harasimha was at Simrampur (modern Simraon) on the borders of Nepal. It is not improbable that Chandrēshvar who was the minister of peace and war (सान्निव विधिधिक) may have carried a successful expedition into the Nepal territory and may have snatched some portion of Nepal. But Sanskrit writers depict their slightest success with as much exaggeration as Persian chroniclers, and it is just possible that the conquest of Nepal by Chandrēshvar may have only been an ordinary raid into that country. Thus it is clear that in the time of 'Alāūddin an Indian army had marched into the Nepal territory.

Dāna Ratnākar describes Chandrēshvar to having rescued the earth flooded by the Malecchas, but the date when Mithila was attacked by the Muslims in the first decade of the 14th century is not known. It is however certain that when Ghayāsuddīn Tughlaq marched to Bengal in 1324 H. (1324 A.D.) he went through Tirhut and by that time Muslims had gained strength in Mithila. But there is no reason to believe that Mithila had been attacked by 'Alāūddin and its king had acknowledge the sultan’s suzerainty and struck coins in his name, so that when the Raja conquered Nepal coins were struck there in his name as well as in the name of the sultan of Delhi.

The discovery of a single coin of the type mentioned above cannot lead us to surmise that 'Alāūddin sent an army to the far off country of Nepal and compelled the ruling

---

4 J.A.S.B. 1915 pp. 405-33.
Raja to acknowledge his suzerainty and strike coins in his name. Nor is there any mention of commercial relations existing between the kingdoms of Delhi and Nepal, so as to indicate that the coin may be one of the so many used for exchange purposes. The discovery of such a coin is full of interest indeed, but until some further information is available not much can be said on this perplexing point.
APPENDIX B

DID MALIK KĀFÜR RAID RAMESHVARAM?

According to Amīr Khusrau Kāfūr raided the temple of Barmatpuri. This has been identified by Prof. Aiyangar with chidambaram, firstly because chidambaram has a golden ceiling and secondly because it is known as Brahmapuri. Prof. Aiyangar, however, also says that it can be identified with Rameshvaram since Amīr Khusrau in Deval Rāṇī (speaking about this particular campaign) says that the army proceeded towards M'abar and “to the shores of the sea of Lanka, against the ruler whom he called Pandya Guru.”¹ My reading of the text of Deval Rāṇī confirms the first assumption of Prof. Aiyangar; firstly because the place raided is called Marhatpuri by Khusrau and secondly because there was no king by the name of Pandya Guru. Moreover, Khusrau talks of the army having marched on the banks of many rivers یہ دریا سواحل بر سواحل but never to have actually crossed the sea. The text of Deval Rāṇī (p. 72) reads:—

Now, what is میرہت پوری؟ A footnote in the Aligarh text of Deval Rāṇī (p. 72) says that the Aligarh University

¹ Introduction to Habīb’s Trans. of Khazāinul Futūh p. xxxiii.
Ms. has Brémi Pourry (fol. 77b). Thus Marhatpuri is nothing but Barmatpuri or Brámastpuri, which was another name of Chidambaram. Thus, so far as Khusrau is concerned, he does not make mention of any raid on Rameshvaram. We know, however, that Kāfūr made dashing raids in search of Vira Pandya. A glance at the map will show that from Srirangam, a place which Kāfūr raided, river Kaveri and one or two tributaries flow towards Chidambaram where they fall into the sea. Naturally when Kāfūr marched from Srirangam he marched on river banks لب دریا to reach Chidambaram which lies very near the sea if not on the sea coast itself. On the sea coast also lie Patans like Kaveripattanam and Negapatan referred to by Khusrau. Thus so far as Khusrau’s version in Khazain and Deval Rani is concerned there is not the slightest mention of a raid on Rameshvaram.

Ferishtah, writing in the 17th century, however, makes a very significant statement. He says that a “Masjid-i-‘Alāi” existed in Rameshvaram when he was writing his book.²

Ferishtah’s statement clearly shows that the mosque built by Kāfūr after the destruction of the temple was situated at some place near (دربو احی) Rameshvaram. Khusrau and Barani do not mention construction of any mosque at Rameshvaram in the time of ‘Alāúddîn. Khusrau’s description of the sack of the temple at Marhatpuri shows that the temple was demansted and dug up from its very foundation. Now, the well-known temple of Rameshvaram still ² Ferishtah pp. 119-20.

F. 24
exists in all its architectural splendour, the beauty and dimensions of which are given in the Imperial Gazeteer.

Not only Ferishtah but Ḥājiuddabīr also has to say something interesting about this raid. He says that from Dwarsamudra Kāfūr marched to Sarandīp (Ceylon) and broke the Ling-i-Mahādeva there. These versions simply show that Kāfūr’s raid to a Shivite temple in south India was considered a venture unique in its kind; and later historians, ignorant of the topography of the Deccan but anxious to say something about this military feat, fell into the temptation of identifying it with Rameshvaram and even with Ceylon. To sum up, the temple raided was Chidambaram and not Rameshvaram because:

1. No contemporary writer mentions the name of Rameshvaram. Khusrau talks of Marhatpuri which, as shown above, is another name for Chidambaram.

2. Rameshvaram lies far from Madura which seems a limit of Kāfūr’s penetration into the south and all the places mentioned by Khusrau to having been visited by Kāfūr lie near about it.

3. Rameshvaram is an island. Amir Khusrau, who gives the minutest details about this campaign, does not talk of crossing the sea on boats etc.

4. Even Ferishtah who talks about ‘Alā’ūddin’s Masjid locates it somewhere near Rameshvaram but certainly not in the city itself. Again, the mosque to which Ferishtah refers may not have been actually built by ‘Alā’ūddin and may have been only named after him, or some other ‘Alā’ūddin.

---

3 Index Volume pp. 818-19.
4 Zafarul Vālī p. 156.
Moreover, some modern writers\(^5\) have expressed doubt about Kāfūr’s penetration even as far as Madura, not to speak of Rameshvaram. They base their arguments on the evidence of Koyiloluhu, according to which Muhammadans penetrated as far south as Madura not before 1324. On the basis of above arguments I venture to suggest that Malik Kāfūr did not raid the renowned temple of Rameshvaram.

\(^5\) Ind. Ant. 1911 pp. 131-44.

\(^6\) Ind. Ant. 1914 pp. 1-17.
APPENDIX C

BUILDINGS OF 'ALAUDDIN KHALJI

The advent of Islām introduced a new stratum into the Indian culture. After the military clash was over, exigencies political and social ushered in an atmosphere of friendliness. Gradually a new synthesis developed, which gave birth to Indo-Islāmic culture. In every sphere of social and intellectual life, in manners and customs, in art and literature, the conquerors and the conquered inevitably impressed themselves on each other. And by the end of the 13th and the beginning of the 14th century, India began to witness a change in its cultural outlook.

Against their bloody wars and their ruthless destruction of Hindu and Jain temples, is the constructive will of the Turk-kish invaders, which manifested itself pre-eminently in the huge edifices they erected. In the beginning they obtained their material from Hindu temples, reducing them to mere debris; but later, when Muslim hegemony was firmly established, they planned and constructed independently. In India itself, architecture had greatly developed, and Alberūnī, who had seen the architectural splendour of Bāghdad, was greatly amazed at the excellence of Indian craftsmanship. About the temples and buildings of India he says that his people “are unable to describe them, much less to construct anything like them.” Obviously there was no dearth of skilled architects and masons in this country. The early Muslim Sultans employed them freely, and the buildings constructed by them to suit the taste of their Muslim patrons bear an impress of both Hindu and Muslim styles of architec-ture—“sometimes uncouthly mingled, at others beautifully. blended.”¹ Scholars like Havell think that Indo-Islamic architecture is nothing but a modified form of Hindu architecture. Fergusson and G. A. Page, on the other hand, are inclined to discover in it a larger share of Islamic influence.

The history of Hindu-Muslim architecture begins with the accession of Qutbuddin Aibak. Qutbuddin had to establish Muslim power in India, and to raise buildings “as quickly as possible, so that no time might be lost in making an impression on their newly-conquered subjects.”² The Quwwatul Islam mosque was built from the material obtained from the destruction of twenty-seven temples, some of the carved columns and shafts being utilized unaltered. Again, the builders were mostly Hindu craftsmen. Consequently, the generous use of columns, pillars, and shafts carved in Hindu design lend to the mosque a beauty and a grandeur peculiar to the Hindu style.

In the extensions of the Quwwatul Islam Mosque by Iltutmish, according to Marshall, there is much more Saracenic influence traceable. Shafts, capitals and architraves of Hindu pattern are still used; but in the screen very little Indian influence is visible.³ The culmination of the building art of the reign of Iltutmish, however, is reached in his mausoleum, built some time before 1235. The building is a square structure, with sides of 42 ft., and is situated in the north-west of his extensions of the Masjid. The interior hall, with 30 ft. sides, is elaborately sculptured so as to rival some of the Hindu temples in richness of decoration, and is entered through doorways containing pointed arches, a feature particular to Hindu design. Of great interest in this building is the principle employed in the construction of its roof, which was probably some form of shallow dome. The form of the dome employed in Iltutmish’s Mosque was of an improved form known as squinch.

¹ An inscription on a yellowish stone on the Qutb Minar (8th course, 3rd balcony) reads that on Thursday, the 15th day of the dark fortnight of Phalguna in Sam. 1425 (A.D. 1369), lightning fell. The monument was then repaired. The architects were Naha, Lola, and Lashmana. (‘A Historical Memoir of the Qutb’, G.A. page., Arch. Sur. Memoirs., No. 22, page 42).

After the death of Iltutmish, little work in architecture was done, or at least has survived. About 1280 Balban built a palace on the south-east of the Qilâ of Rai Pithaurâ, of which only a few traces are now left. He seems to have been too busy fighting his internal and external foes to erect memorable buildings; but even the remains of the palace mark a notable step in the development of the style. In this building we come across, for the first time, the true arch, produced by means of radiating voussoirs and not by corbels. With the accession of ‘Alâûddîn, construction was resumed with feverish activity. It is not only as a conqueror or an administrator, but also as a great builder, that ‘Alâûddîn stands prominent in the history of medieval India. His buildings indicate a marked improvement upon those of his predecessors, the so-called “Slave Kings” and are more magnificent than those of his successors, the Tughlaqs,—who struck upon an orthodox and austere style. Alâûddîn built from the time of his accession to the day of his death. He extended the Quwatul Islâm Mosque, built a magnificent Gate to its entrance, constructed cisterns, palaces, and mosques, and founded a new city.

4 Percy Brown: Indian Architecture (Islamic Period), p. 12. Fergusson doubts that there was a roof to this tomb, but Cunningham, Carr Stephen, and Percy Brown have good reasons to believe that there was one. (Carr Stephen: Archaeology and Monumental Remains of Delhi, pp. 74-75).

The first monument constructed by 'Alaūddin in the year of his accession (1296) was Hauz-i-Khāṣ or Hauz-i-'Alāi. This magnificent tank covered an area of over 70 acres of land, and was surrounded by a stone and masonry wall. It was filled with mud by Firoz Tughlaq's time who cleaned it about 1354, and built a college near it. Timūr makes mention of this tank in his Memoirs, and says that it supplied water to the City throughout the year.6

In 711 A.H. (1311 A.D.) 'Alaūddin repaired Hauz-i-Shamasī, a tank excavated by Shamsuddin Ilutmish in 1229. The tank, which covered a hundred acres of land, used to dry up occasionally till it was cleared by 'Alaūddin who also built a dome in its centre.7

It was customary with the Sultans of Delhi to build new cities and palaces of their own. Mu'izzuddin Kaiqubād founded the city of Kilughari; Jalāluddin constructed Kau-shak-i-Lāl, and named it Shahr-i-Nau; 'Alaūddin similarly founded Sirī; and his successor, Tughlaq Shāh, founded Tughluqabad (1321).

Sirī was built in 1303 on a village of the same name. It was situated about three miles to the north-east of the Quṭb Mīnār, and, according to Marshall, it was built in order to protect the over-growing population of the suburbs.8 The walls surrounding the City were constructed of rubble in mud but there are traces of ashlar masonry in lime and of lime plaster.9 The fort was not yet finished when the Mongols invaded India. They were completely defeated, and the heads of some 8,000 of them were used as bricks in the construction of its walls. Timur has described Siri in detail, and says that it had seven gates. In 1548 A.D. Sher Shah destroyed this City of ‘Ala‘uddin; and nothing is left of Siri except some portions of the encircling walls which are decaying. While going to the Qutb some dilapidated remains of Siri are seen on the left hand side of the road.

Carr Stephen, 68-69.
There has been some controversy about the actual site of the city. General Cunningham identifies it with the present village of Shapur, and Carr Stephen agreeing with him observes: “If the village of Shapur does not mark the site of ancient Siri, we must give up all attempts to identify its locality.”

In 1303 ‘Ala‘uddin encamped outside Delhi to give battle to the Mongol invader Targhii. After his success the Sultan built, on the site of his camp, an imperial palace known as the Qasr-i-Hazâr Sitân. This name was given to it because of the large number of pillars utilized in its construction. It is said that while the palace was under construction, a large number of Mongol prisoners of war who had come in the train of Gang, were sent to Delhi by imperial officers. They were trampled to death under the feet of elephants and a tower of their skulls was raised in front of this palace. The Qasr must have been as magnificent and beautiful as the other buildings of ‘Ala‘uddin; but unfortunately its complete destruction renders it difficult even to locate its site with any amount of certainty.

Lal Mahal, which stands about 50 yards to the north of the Chausath Khambha, was built, according to Sir Sai-yad, by Balban, and according to Mr. Campbell, by ‘Ala‘uddin. Carr Stephen, agreeing with the latter, says that

10 Carr Stephen pp. 84-85.
11 Siri, A city founded by ‘Ala‘uddin Khalji by Maulvi 142-43).
‘Alai Darvāza
Showing the pannelled treatment in marble and red sandstone

To face page 377
"the style of ornamentation, of the battlements, and of the moulding resembles so strongly that in 'Alāi' Darvāzā' that the two buildings appear to have been designed and built at the same time; 'and we have thus ample warrant for describing Lāl Mahal as the work of 'Alāūddin.'\textsuperscript{12} The neglected building has suffered at the hands of plundering villagers who have removed the red stone and rendered it ugly in appearance.

'Alāī Darvāzā is perhaps the most magnificent building of 'Alāūddin. It was the southern gate-way leading to the Quvvatul Islam Mosque, and was completed in 1311.\textsuperscript{13}

The building of the gate consists of a square hall, 34'6" inside, 56'6" outside. The walls are 11' thick and from the inner floor to the domed ceiling, about 47' high. On each side of the gateway there is a lofty door. The three outer facades are very much alike and are constructed in accordance with Islāmic architectural ideals; but the inner one has a much more indigenous character, since its arch is semi-circular and not of the pointed type. The outer doorways contain pointed arches of the horse-shoe type. On the southern side there is a plinth nearly 10' high, with a flight of seven steps which lead to the higher floor of the interior. The vertical sides of the plinth are beautifully carved in varied bands, while the surface of the wall above is profusely decorated with arabesques and inscriptions, with marble sparingly interspersed with the red sandstone of the building. On each side of the doorway there are two windows, about a third of its size, and containing perforated lattice work. Both the doors and the windows, as well as the outer walls, are elaborately ornamented.

\textsuperscript{12} Carr Stephen, p. 215.

\textsuperscript{13} An inscription on the edifice gives the date of its construction as the 15th of Shavvāl, 710 A.H. (March 7, 1311 A.D.)
The interior is equally beautiful. The mode in which the circular dome has been supported by an octagon, which in its turn has been supported by a square, and so the load of the dome is gradually but completely conveyed to the ground, is both elegant and appropriate. The squinch arch, as well as the method of radiating voussoirs in the construction of the arches is a feature in all parts of the building. The key-note of the whole monument is its perfect symmetry.

'Alā'ī Darvāzā is not only beautiful, it is unique. It is not only the exquisitely flowing verses of the Qurān or the lace-like carvings, so common in other Indo-Muslim buildings, that make it "one of the most treasured gems of Islamic architecture"; but the horse-shoe or "keel" type of arch, which is not found in any of the buildings after those of the Khaljis, the projecting bosses which once filled the sockets now existing in the spandrels, and the radiating voussoirs of the arches, render it peerless. "Nothing so complete," says Fergusson, "had been done before, nothing so ornate was done by them afterwards." The edifice undoubtedly marks the culminating point in the development of Saracenic ornament under the Khaljis.

Percy Brown discerns the assistance of some experts in the building art of Anatolia (the capital of the Seljūqs of Rūm) in the erection of this edifice. The method of stone masonry and the unusual and determinative character of the building are animated by the same spirit as that of the Seljukide architecture. He says that the Mongol invasions put an end to the Seljūq Empire, causing its people to seek refuge in other countries. Some of them found shelter at the court of Delhi. With these refugees crept into India the Seljukian style of architecture, some salient features of which are visible in the ‘Alāi Gate. No contemporary chronicles mention immigrations on a considerable scale from any foreign country, but writers like Amir Khusrau refer to scholars who came from Turkistān and other countries. It is probable that some Seljukian architects helped in the construction of the ‘Alāi Darvāzā, but, as Percy Brown himself admits, the edifice embodies many “purely indigenous features” despite its exotic nature. Throughout its fabric, “there runs the Indian manner”, and it is the blending of the two systems, foreign and Indian, that makes this building an excellent piece of art.

14 Percy Brown, p. 15.

‘Alāi’ Darvāzā is in a state of preservation far from satisfactory. Although it has not fallen into ruins like the walls of Sīrī, or the Kaushak-i-Hazār Sitūn, many stones bearing inscriptions have fallen off, and some others have been spoiled by nitre. In spite of these ravages of time, the beauty of the building remains and “its excellent proportions and simple composition……must be seen at dusk, silhouetted against an evening after-glow, to be rightly appreciated.”

After the construction of ‘Alāi’ Darvāzā, says Amir Khusrau, ‘Alāūddīn commenced further extensions of the Quvvaṭ-ul-Islām Mosque, built by Quṭbuddīn Aibak. Ilutmish had extended the western wall of the mosque by about 115 feet on either side, thus making the whole length of the wall 380 feet. Of the building extensions of ‘Alāūddīn, passing from the Alāi Gate, the pillars which formed the colonnade in front of its inner door have disappeared for about 30 feet. At the eastern end of this gap, the colonnade again begins, and extends for about 120 feet. The walls of the colonnade are pierced by four doors and three lofty windows. The latter are covered with red sand-stone screens of lattice work. ‘Alāūddīn’s additions to the mosque extended beyond the northern extensions of Iltutmish, and included his unfinished Minār. The extension was 700 ft. long and 400 ft. wide, and had nine gates. Thus Ālāūddin nearly doubled the size of the mosque after Iltutmish’s extensions. In 1311 the building was under construction, but it remained unfinished.17

The architectural arrangements of the extensions clearly indicate that the prayer chambers of Iltutmish furnish models for those of Ālāūddin; still there are some features which mark the development of the style reached under the Khaljis. The windows in Iltutmish’s extensions are covered with lintels resting on corbels, while those in the latter have regular arches with voussoirs running through the whole thickness of the wall. This difference also clearly shows that, while Quṭbuddin and Iltutmish had to rely for details of construction on Hindu craftsmen, Ālāūddin was independent of them; and it was in his reign that the school of Muhammadan architecture acquired a more national type.18

The king thought of completely dwarfing the architectural achievements of his predecessors by building a Minār of double the size of the Quṭb. It was commenced in 1311 at a distance of 470 feet to the north-west of the Quṭb Minār. Its circumference is 254 ft. and the diameter of the central column 26’’. It was carried to the height of 75’ above the plinth of about 4½’; but then the construction was abandoned, probably on account of the Sultan’s death. The Minār is divided into 32 faces of 8’ each, and the curious feature of angular flutings is very marked, as also the treatment of the shallow curved recesses, so that the whole column has aptly been described by General Cunningham as “being exactly like a gigantic cog-wheel.” The relative heights of the 17 Asatus Sānādīd, Bk. III, p. 21.

'Alāūddīn’s Madrasā
View of the buildings on the west side of the quadrangle.

To face page 381
encircling windows which pierce the walls at every quadrant indicate that the means of ascent inside the Mīnār was to be a very gradual ramp, and not a stair as that in the Quṭb.\(^{19}\) The outer stones of the Mīnār have disappeared, and only a stump of bricks and mortar now stands there as a monument of 'Alāūddin unfulfilled ambition.

The date of the construction of the building known as the Madrasā of 'Alāūddin is not definitely known. It is even said to have been built by Iltutmish, but the high drummed domes and the advanced corbelled pendentives, show that it was constructed by 'Alāūddin.\(^{20}\) The College lies immediately to the south-west of the Quvvat-ul-Islām Mosque, and is built around a quadrangular court-yard.

On the southern side of this court is located a large structure, 400 ft. long and 200 ft. wide covered originally by a dome, now fallen. It is said to be the tomb of 'Alāūddin. It is entered from all sides and the western entrance is a Pathān-gateway of stone and masonry, with an arch 14 ft. high and 11 ft. wide.\(^{21}\) The tomb itself is about 50 ft. long and 32 ft. wide. On either side of it there is a passage which divides it from the side rooms which are domeless. The noteworthy feature of this building is the use of corbelled pendentives. It is the earliest instance of corbelled treatment of a pendentive in India, and is a happy solution of the constructional problem. The whole building is now in a dilapidated state.

'Alāūddin died in 1316, but his tomb seems to have been constructed after a year or two by his son Quṭbuddin Mubārak Shāh. Firoz Tughlaq repaired it, and put up a sandal wood screen, no longer extant. Even the grave has altogether fallen, and only a mound of lime and mortar remains.\(^\text{22}\) Another important building of the period is the Jama’at Khāna Mosque at the Dargāh of Nizāmuddin Aulia. It lies in the village of Nizāmuddin, situated within five miles of New Delhi. The building is entered through a low gate-way which leads into a stone-paved enclosure, about 60 feet square. On the west side of this is a room now used as a school and on the right is the tomb of Amīr Khurṣrau. To the north of this court is another enclosure which contains the tomb of the renowned saint. The mausoleum is about 48\(\frac{1}{2}\) yards long, and 19\(\frac{1}{2}\) yards broad; and within its walls are the graves of Jahānārā Bēgum, Muḥammad Shāh, and Mirzā Jahāngīr, and the Jama’at Khana Masjid. The tomb of Nizāmuddin is about 30 ft. square, with five arched openings, supported by 20 marble pillars. It is surrounded by a white marble dome, ornamented with vertical stripes of black marble.

\(^{19}\) J. A. Page, p. 16.

\(^{20}\) Ibid, p. 17.

\(^{21}\) Carr Stephen, pp. 88-89.

The Mosque is about 94 feet long, 64 feet wide, and 481 feet high and it is built of red sandstone throughout. The body of the mosque consists of three rooms, the centre one 54 feet by 46 feet, and the two side ones 54 feet by 20 feet. The centre room is covered by a dome, 54 feet in diameter; and the side rooms by two domes each. The domes are built of red sandstone and masonry. The centre room is entered through an arched gate-way about 15 feet high, and the bands round the arches are ornamented with inscriptions from the Qurān. The walls contain red sandstone lattice work.\(^\text{23}\)

The conflicting statements of various historians render it difficult to determine the builder of this edifice. According to Ferishtah it was constructed by Khizr Khān, the eldest son of \(^{22}\) Also see Asarus Sanā`īd, Bk. II, pp. 27-28.

\(^{23}\) For exhaustive details about the dimensions of these buildings see Carr Stephen, pp. 104-105, 111-113.
Alāūddin and a disciple of the Shaikh. Sir Saiyyad Ahmad thinks that it was only the central apartment that was built by the prince, and the two other sides were added by Muḥammad Shāh Tughlaq. Fīroz Tughlaq claims in the Fatūḥat-i-Fīroz Shāhī that he constructed the building, while the author of the Samarqul Quds writes that the saint himself built the mosque.

Whoever may have built the mosque, it is a fine specimen of the "severe" style of Pathan architecture, and is the earliest example of a mosque constructed wholly in accordance with Islāmic ideas, and with materials specially quarried for this purpose. Like ‘Alāī’ Darvāzā it is built of red sand-stone, and is constructed on the same principles. In one respect it marks an advance on the Darvāzā as an intervening storey or triforium has been imposed between the walls of the hall and the base of the dome. In another respect it shows more traces of indigenous handling. In the arch the horse-shoe character is less prominent, while the ogee of the crown, a sign of indigenous influence, is more pronounced. Lace-like bands of Qurānic inscriptions are engraved here and there throughout the building. The inscriptions are excellently done, and are described by Mr. Beglar as "the most beautiful in Delhi."

Of the buildings of Alāūddin outside the capital, mention may be made of his mosque at Muttra,²⁵ and the tomb of Shaikh Farīd (built Cir. 1300) which was probably a converted Hindu or Jain temple. There is another masjid built about the same time at Broach. It is also a converted Jain temple. In 1300 Alp Khān Sanjarī, brother-in-law of ‘Alāūddin, built the Adinah Mosque at Patan. The size of the enclosure of this mosque is 400 feet by 330 feet and it contains 1050 pillars.²⁶

---
²⁶ Percy Brown, p. 52.
Ali Muhammad Khan has described the beauty of this mosque in the Mirāt-i-Sikandārī. It was built of white marble, and it was related "that it was once an idol temple converted to a mosque. But it is...........a wonderful and noble building." The Adina mosque no longer exists.

After conquest of Chittor in 1303, Alauddin constructed a bridge over River Gamberi. Its chief architectural features, the gateways and towers, have disappeared, but the massive arches of grey limestone still indicate the hand of the competent engineers who constructed it.27 Another example of the architecture of the period may be seen in the Ukha Mosque at Bayana (now in the Bharatpur state). It was built by Quṭbuddin Mubarak Shāh, and appears to be a provincialised version of the Delhi style.

How could Alauddin build so extensively, and beautify what he built? The answer is not far to seek. Architectural enterprises require large sums of money, and the Southern expeditions of the Sultan, as well as his revenue regulations, brought him immense wealth. Moreover, Alauddin put an end to the Mughal menace which had threatened the very existence of the Sultanate. His best architectural works were accomplished after 1311, by which time the Mongols had been completely hurled back behind the North-West frontier and immense wealth had been brought from the Deccan. Some of the master craftsmen were foreigners who flocked to his capital from outside, and gave an exotic touch to his buildings, but, as their execution was largely in the hands of the indigenous supervisors and architects, they left an unmistakable impress of the land of their origin.

27 Ibid. p. 16.
APPENDIX E

AUTHORITIES

The history of the Khalji sultans suffers from want of contemporary historians. It is said that Kabiruddin, son of Tājuddin Irāqī, was the court historian of ʿAlāūddin and wrote a history of the latter’s reign in several volumes. His work, the Fatehnamah, is not traceable now, and consequently a very useful account of ʿAlāūddin’s reign has been lost. The works of Barānī and Amīr Khusrav, as well as those of other contemporary and later historians, however, lend sufficient information about the Khaljis. In the following pages a study of the historical value of the various works, mostly in Persian, available to us on the subject would be made. The bibliography gives a list of most of the works utilized in the preparation of this book.

Contemporary Sources.

Ziyūuddin Barānī:—Of the contemporary historical works of our period the greatest value is attached to Maulānā Ziyūuddin Barānī’s Tarikh-i-Firoz Shāhī. It was completed in 1359, about forty years after the death of Mubarak Khalji. Born in 1285 Barānī was about five years when Jalāluddin ascended the throne and thirty-five when Mubarak Khalji died. Thus he was an eye witness to the events of the reigns of all the Khalji sultans, especially of ʿAlāūddin and Mubarak in whose time he had quite passed the age of adolescence. Barānī received his education at Delhi where great scholars and teachers flocked from all parts of Asia, and his Tarikh bears the imprint of his great scholarship. In a lengthy introduction to his book Ziyūuddin dilates upon the uses of history, its method of writing, its place in man’s education. He considers the study of history in no way less important than the study of Ḥadiṣ, Fiqah and hagiological literature. Like Bacon he thought history made men wise and they learnt from the experience of the past. A historian, says he, should be truthful, honest and fearless. If for one reason or another he was unable to write the facts openly, he should try to convey his ideas through implications and suggestions. On more than one occasion he asserts that whatever he wrote was all true, but that is exaggerated self-estimation. Ziyāuddin died at a ripe age after experiencing both the “bitter and sweet” of life. Born and brought up in rich surroundings and patronized by sultan Muḥammad bin Tughlaq, Barani’s last days were miserable; he died poverty-stricken and destitute.

Ziyāuddin catches the thread of narrative dropped by Minhāj Sirāj. The Tarikh-i-Firoz Shāhī begins with the history of the reign of Balban and ends with the first six years of Firoz Tughlaq’s reign.Comparatively studied, the reign of the Khaljīs is more systematically treated than that of the Tughlaqs. In the narrative of the Khaljīs chronological sequence of the events is maintained fairly accurately although the chronology is far from satisfactory.

His father M’uyī’idulk’s and his uncle ‘Alā’aulmulk’s official positions under the Khaljīs, as also his associations with Amir Khusrau, ‘Alā Ḥasan Sajzi and other state officials, had given Barani ample opportunities to collect and ascertain historical facts. He very often refers to his sources of information, naming Khvājā Žaki, nephew of Ḥasan Baṣrī and a Vazīr of Balban, Malik Qira Beg, Amir Khusrau and Amir Ḥasan. He also studied the Divāns of Khusrau whom he quotes at various places. But surely he wrote his history from time to time and not all at once, and he did not fully utilize the contemporary works in the preparation of his Tarikh. Had he improved upon the drafts of his book after consulting Khusrau’s Miftahul Futuh, Khazainul Futuh and Deval Ranî, and Kabiruddin’s Fatehnamah, he would surely have given more information about ‘Aláúddin’s wars in Chittor, Ranthambhor, Malwa and the Deccan. He does not refer to the Deval Ranî episode at all and his account of the Deccan campaigns of Malik Kafur is extremely poor. Moreover, once he starts writing about the Deccan, he neglects the north altogether. For example, he furnishes little information about events in northern India from 1308 to 1313 particularly about the wars in Jalor and Sevena. It must, however, be observed that Ziyâ finished his work at the advanced age of seventy-four when he was in a miserable plight. His pecuniary embarrassments had made him bitter and disappointed. And so he was more prone to pour forth the agonies of his soul, than to sit and improve upon his notes after comparing them with the works of Amîr Khusrau and other contemporary writers. Hence the Tarikh-i-Fîroz Shâhî at times betrays symptoms of a number of jottings carelessly pieced together.

Except in the preface, which is written in a highly florid language, the historian adheres to a simple, clear and lucid style. His narrative, far from exhibiting the highly ornamental style then in fashion, seems to be a painful translation from the spoken Hindustani into Persian. Ziyâuddin uses Hindi words like badla, bhatti, châkar, charai, chautra, chouki, chappar, dholak, mandi, morha, mathâha (earthen jugs), pondâ (sugar cane), palak (eye lids) etc., frequently in the course of his narrative. At places his language is so broken as to make out little sense. Moreover, he is prone to making contradictory statements. Being a chronicler of contemporary events he saw the various aspects of a certain thing and mentions them all unsynthetically. At some some places he extols 'Alāʻuddin, at others dubs him a Pharaoh, and on a study of his Tarikh it is difficult to say whether ‘Alāʻuddin was a benefactor or a tyrant. Anyway, the historian possessed a facile pen and writes in a clear and unostentatious way.

Baranī has his own peculiar way of describing events and he takes pains to make them credible. This is shown in ‘Alāʻuddin’s conversation with Qāżī Mughīsuddin of Bayana, and Qutbuddin’s attachment to his favourite Vazīr Khusrau Khan. On the occasion of Qāżī Mughīs’s talk with ‘Alāʻuddin there was no third person present, but the historian writes every word that passed between the Qāżī and the sultan. In such cases Baranī finds a welcome opportunity to put his own ideas in the mouth of others. At another place he so graphically describes the eventful night of Qutbuddin’s murder; that it gives the impression that he was peeping through a crevice into the apartment where Qutbuddin and his favourite Vazir Khusrau Khan were sleeping together.6 These vivid descriptions do grip popular imagination but cannot satisfy a craving for historical veracity.

Ziyāuddin’s sarcasm is incisive. Occasionally his sardonic humour helps him to sum up his ideas in a few words. His remark that in ‘Alāʻuddin’s days “a camel could be had for a dang, but whereform a dang”,7 shows at once how the reforms of ‘Alāʻuddin had made articles cheap and people poor. Again, the stern attitude of ‘Alāʻuddin towards the revenue officials, according to our historian, made them so unpopular that service in the revenue department was considered worse than “plague”, that nobody “gave his daughter in marriage to a revenue clerk” and that “the office of superintendent was accepted by one who had no regard for life.”8 The sad plight of the agriculturists had reached such dimensions that the

6 Baranī pp. 405-6.
7 Ibid. p. 312.
8 Ibid. p. 289.
peasants “sold their wives and children” to remit the land revenue⁹ while the wives of rich zamindārs (Khāts and Muqaddams) worked in the houses of Musalmans and received wages. And the bazar people, to our historian, are the worst of all the “seventy-two” classes of people (that inhabit the globe).¹⁰

Like all human beings, Baranī has his likes and dislikes. He does not feel interested in the description of battles, tactics used in a particular engagement, and such other points of military strategy. Whenever he has to give such a description he invariably has recourse to brevity. He does, however, pause to praise an act, a character or a motive. When he praises somebody he extols him to heaven, when he condemns, he writes with his pen dipped in acid. Nonetheless his character sketches are excellently done. He is a philosopher-cum-historian and not an accurate historian always. His memory is prodigious.

Tarīkh-i-Fīroz Shahī has greatly suffered at the hands of its transcriptors. Certain passages of the book are altogether incomprehensible. It is possible that at some places Baranī could not dare write true facts with impunity just as in the passage about the death of Ghayāsuddīn Tughlaq, but at other places where he could never be suspected of suppressing truth, as for example in the description of the salary of soldiers in the time of ‘Alā’uddīn,¹¹ or the increase of land revenue by Muhammad Tughlaq, the fault probably lay with later copyists.

But a few shortcomings cannot mar the extra-ordinary value of Baranī’s Tarīkh. He does not only write about courts or campaigns as most of the medieval chroniclers do, but also gives social and economic reforms of rulers, their

---

⁹ Baranī p. 340.
¹⁰ Ibid. p. 343.
¹¹ Ibid. p. 303.
administrative measures and their system of meeting out justice. He gives a long list of contemporary saints, philosophers, historians, poets, medical men and astronomers. His references to clothes, fruits and sweets and other sundry articles of those days throw a flood of light on the socio-economic conditions of the 14th century. Barani's descriptions of the Market Control of Alāūdīn and the sultan's revenue regulations, clearly show that he is not a mere chronicler but a historian in the true sense of the word. Barani knew the shortcomings of his contemporaries and says that Kabiruddin and other historians confine their narrative to kings, courts and conquests. He begins his book with a long discourse on historiography and the uses of historical study. He talks at length about the duties of a king. As a historian he tries to analyse critically the causes which brought about the end of Jalāluddin, of Alāūdīn and of the Khalji regime as a whole. Ziyāuddin was cognizant of his contribution to historical literature and declares, without diffidence, that for the past thousand years a book like the Tarikh-i-Firoz Shahi had not been produced.

Barani's work is undoubtedly very valuable. Later historians have greatly depended upon him for information as well as inspiration. Nizamuddin Aḥmad, Badaoni, Ferishta, Ḥājiuddabīr—almost all important historians of the 16th and 17th centuries have depended upon Barani for their account of the history of the period covered by him. Nizāmuddin especially quotes him very often; at some places he almost copies out Barani and at others tries to solve the knotty problems left by him. Thus he tries to explain the origin of the Khaljis about which Barani says nothing except that they were not "Turks." Ferishta also tries to analyse the passage in which Baranī describes the salaries of soldiers fixed by 'Alāūddin. Ḥājiuddabīr throws fresh light on some vexed questions not properly explained by Baranī, such as the age of 'Alāūddin and the causes underlying the constant quarrels between 'Alāūddin and Jalāluddin’s family. Abdul Haqq Dehlvī, the author of Akhbārul Akhyār, almost entirely depends upon Baranī for the biographical sketches of Nizāmuddin Aulia and other saints of the period.

12 Barani pp. 10-12.
13 Ibid. pp. 41-44.

Besides the Tarikh, Ziyāuddīn is accredited with the authorship of many other works like Salvāt-i-Kabīr, Sanā-i-Muhammadī, Hasratnāmah, Ināyatnāmah, Ma‘āsir-i-S‘ādāt and a history of the Barmakides. Another work of his known as the Fatwā-i-Jahāndārī seems to be nothing more than a supplement to the Tarikh-i-Fīroz Shahi and contains a sort of moral code the clerical historian would like a Muslim monarch to follow. The most important book of Baranī, however, remains his Tarikh which is an everlasting epitome of his erudition and scholarship.

Amīr Khusrav.

Abul Hasan, popularly known by his pseudonym of Amīr Khuršād, is another contemporary authority of our period. Born in 651 H. (1252 A.D.) he witnessed the reigns of Balban, Jalāluddin, ‘Alāūddin, and Muḥammad bin Tughlaq. Most of his works were written in the time of ‘Alāūddin and the latter’s son Mubarak Khaljī. His great merit as a poet and philosopher cannot here be studied in detail for lack of space. Qirānus S‘ādāin, Miftāhul Futūh, Ashīqa, Nūh Sipehr and Tughlaqnāmah are his historical ma‘navīs. Qirānus S‘ādāin deals with the memorable meeting between Buγhra Khan and his son Kaiqubād. In the course of this work Khusrav malignantly portrays the features of the Mongols in whose galling captivity he once fell. Miftāhul Futūh which comprises a part of the Divān Ghurattul Kamal (C. 690 H.) enumerates the victories of Jalāluddin Khaljī. Some portions of this book have been translated by Elliot in volume III of his history. Ašiqqa or Ishqia was completed by the poet in 715 H. and it deals with the love adventures and marriage of Khīzr Khan and Deval Rani. Khusrau begins the mašnavi with a short history of the military exploits of ‘Ala’uddin and his predecessors and gives a glimpse into the uncertain times which preceded and followed ‘Ala’uddin’s death. The poem ends with the description of Khīzr Khan’s numerous hardships and his sad death. Nūh Sipehr or the “Nine Spheres” was completed in Jamādiul Avval 718 H. when the poet reached a ripe age of sixty seven. The mašnavi deals with the victories of Mubarak Shah, but in the third sphere the author gives detailed references about Indian climate, fruits, languages, philosophy, witchcraft etc. Consequently he gives a very interesting as well as authentic sketch of the social conditions of those times. The last mašnavi—the Tughlaqānāmah—was written about the last years of Khusrau. It deals with Ghayāsuddin Tughlaq’s victory over Khusrau Shah, and a few other events about the early years of Tughlaq’s reign. It also describes at length the sad plight of the various sons and descendants of ‘Ala’uddin who were mercilessly massacred by Khusrau Shah.

Khazā’inul Futūḥ, or the “Treasure of Victories”, comprises a detailed account of the victories of sultan ‘Ala’uddin in the Deccan. It is a prose work and is written in an inflated and verbose style. Since Khusrau wrote it for the reigning emperor, it forms almost an official account of the exploits of Malik Kāfūr in the south. It describes events from ‘Ala’uddin’s accession in 695 upto the date of its composition (711 H). The historical importance of this work can hardly be exaggerated as technically it is the only contemporary history of ‘Ala’uddin’s reign, for even Baranī wrote long after the death of the king. Besides the Deccan campaigns which are dealt exhaustively, Khusrau also describes in this work the buildings constructed by ‘Ala’uddin, his conquests of Gujarat, Chittor, Malwa and Sevana as well as his administrative measures. From its numerous topographical details, it appears that the author was an eye-witness to at least some of the scenes described in the course of the Deccan campaigns. According to Badaoni he had accompanied Kâfûr to the South. The Allahabad University Library has a manuscript copy of the Khazainul Futûh. The work has been translated by Professor Habib who supplements it with learned notes.

Mention may also be made of Khusrau's A'ijâz-i-Khusravi, Afzalul Favaid and Râhatul Muhabbin, all being works of his later years. A'ijaz-i-Khusravi is a voluminous work on epistography and deals with various subjects of common interest; and the last two books are collections of the author's conversations with his pir Shaikh Nizamuddin Aulia. All these books throw a flood of light on the social history of the period. The other masnavis of Khusrau like the Mu'tlai Anvar also supply information on social and cultural conditions of those days.

Khusrau's works are of great historical authenticity. He was a government officer and courtier and, therefore, had access to government records and such persons from whom he could gather correct information about affairs of the state. 'Alâ Hasan Sajzi and Ziyâuddin Barani were his intimate acquaintances and his association with them formed another authentic source of ascertaining facts of his own days. The one great merit in Khusrau's works is the abundance of dates which are on the whole reliable; and in matters of chronological details he is more to be trusted than Barani. Khusrau's tastes as well as his activities covered various channels, and, therefore, he was not as good a historian as Barani was, but generally he wrote truthfully and honestly. In Miftahul Futûh he writes that some times he was tempted to add falsehoods, but he always adhered to truth for "truth is an admirable thing”.

Indeed Khusrau’s works shorn of their grandiloquence, verbosity and poetical exaggerations give a true picture of political and social history of the times in which he lived.

Sources almost Contemporary.

Iṣāmī:—Of the sources nearly contemporary, the most valuable work is the Futūḥus Salātīn. It was the outcome of the broken heart of an unknown poet Khvājā ‘Abdulla Malik Iṣāmī. Iṣāmī was born in about 1311 A.D.; his ancestor Fakhr Malik Iṣāmī had come to India from Baghdad in the time of Ilutmish. Since then his family had served under the various sultans of Delhi, so that Iṣāmī’s grandfather A‘izzuddīn was the Chief Huntsman (Sar-i-Lashkar) of Balban. In 1327 when the author was sixteen years of age he was compelled to go to Daulatabad where the capital of the empire had been shifted by Muḥammad bin Tughlaq. He lived there till he was forty but he could never reconcile himself to the change. He determined to leave Hindustan for Mecca, but “the last infirmity of the noble mind” impelled him to leave something permanent behind. He was unmarried and childless, and thought that the best thing he could leave was a poetical composition of historical interest. Consequently he wrote the Futūḥus Salātīn, or the Victories of the Kings (of India). It was begun on the 10th December 1349 and finished on the 14th May 1350 after an incessant labour of a little less than six months.

This book written seven or eight years before Barani’s Tarikh-i-Firoz Shāhī comprises an account of the events from the times of Maḥmud of Ghazna to those of Muḥammad bin Tughlaq. Although the author wrote in a hurry, his work suffers neither from historical inaccuracies nor in poetical merit. His style is simple and lucid, and the epic is written in a short and swift verse. 'Ișāmī neither indulges in the rhetoric of Khusrau nor in the abstruseness of Badr Chach. According to the editor of the work 'Ișāmī may be called the best epic writer of the age. The poet does not cite his authorities, but his narrative clearly shows that he surely used works of historical authenticity and wrote with admirable discretion. So far as the reign of 'Alāūddīn is concerned he seems to have consulted people who had been eye witnesses to his reign. At more than one place he says that he listened to the accounts of various old and experienced persons whose names he does not mention. Besides this he also consulted many authoritative documents. His account of 'Alāūddīn's Deccan expedition of 1296, gives the most detailed information about that event. Since his book was written at Devagiri itself where eye witnesses to the raid must be living at that time, 'Ișāmī was in a better position to know about the details of that particular event than even Barānī and Khusrau. In the descriptions of the loves of Deval Rani and Khizr Khan 'Ișāmī seems to have depended entirely on the 'Ashiqā of Amir Khusrau. 'Ișāmī's account of their love-adventures is only an abridgement of Khusrau's description. Futūḥus Salātīn is tolerably correct in chronology, and the poet has very carefully preserved the sequence of events. 'Ișāmī supports and supplements Barānī at many places. With regard to Mughal invasions especially, he gives many new facts and his account of those invasions is perhaps the most detailed. As the title denotes, the subject matter of 'Ișāmī's work does not deal with any other aspect of government except wars and 16 Futūḥ, English preface p. 4.

17 E.g. he says, p. 340,

- شنیدم زافسنانه گویه که گویه سال - که از زیر کی گردن گویه سال - p. 341,
- شنیدم زافسنانه سال - p. 199,
- شنیدم زافسنانه سالان پاک
victories. The administrative and economic reforms of ‘Alā-ūdān, given in so prominent details by Baranī, have not been touched upon by ‘Iṣāmī, who at places makes only a casual reference to them. But his vivid description of battles and sieges makes his book a source of great historical value. ‘Iṣāmī describes at length ‘Alāūdān’s siege of Ranthambhor and throws fresh light on the emperor’s various engagements with the Mughals.

‘Iṣāmī, however, could not rise above the prejudices of his age. His book is at places full of exaggerations and is marred by personal malice. Since he had to suffer great hardships on account of Muḥammad bin Tughlaq’s transfer of the capital, he denounces that king mercilessly. He compares Muḥammad bin Tughlaq with ‘Alāūdān and while extolling and crediting ‘Alāūdān with great qualities he severely disparages Muḥammad.

Although they were contemporaries, yet, perhaps ‘Iṣāmī never met Baranī, and both were ignorant of each other. Baranī does not mention ‘Iṣāmī anywhere in his narrative, but that is not surprising since Baranī seldom cites anybody’s authority. Niẓāmuddin Ahmad and Firishtah make mention of Futūḥus Salātīn; and as has been shown above, the book possesses great historical value, and cannot be dubbed as an unimportant book of historical romances as Briggs is prone to do.18

The itinerary of Ibn Battūṭah (1304—1378) also is of great historical importance for the history of our period. Abu ‘Abdullah surnamed Muḥammad Ibn Battūṭah was a native of Tangiers, Egypt. Since early childhood he had a passion for voyage and from 1325 to 1349, for full twenty-five years, he travelled in north Africa, Arabia, Persia and India and is said to have gone as far east as China itself. Ibn Battūṭah arrived in India in 1333 A.D. and for his learning and foreign lineage he was appointed Qāẓī of Delhi by the reigning monarch Muḥammad bin Tughlaq. Ibn Battūtah was known as Maulana Badruddin in India and received every consideration at the hands of the sultan, but after remaining in his office for about eight years he was removed from it as he had incurred the displeasure of the sovereign. He was imprisoned, but later on released and sent as an ambassador to China. On his way to that country he was shipwrecked, and fearing the wrath of the sultan, stayed in the Maldiva Islands. After a year he came back to southern India, and not long after he went to Chittagong from where he took boat for China. It is not known for certain if he ever reached there. The indefatigable traveller performed Ḥajj at Mecca and then returned to Morocco where he settled down permanently.

This widely travelled man possessed an observing eye and a keen intellect. His interest in men and things was so great that he jotted down everything that interested him during his travels. Unfortunately his original notes were lost on one of his journeys and the account of his travels which is available to us is only an abridgement of the dictation of his experiences to Ibn Juzzi who edited them in form of a book. The work is known as Tuhfatul Nazzār fi Gharrāibul Amār va ‘Ajā‘ibul Asfār.

Ibn Battūtah arrived in India seventeen years after ‘Alā‘ūdīn’s death, when many people of the latter’s reign would surely be living. His account of ‘Alā‘ūdīn, therefore, was probably based on information derived from eye witnesses of the period. Battūtah gives a short history of the sultans of Delhi prior to Muḥammad bin Tughlaq; and his narrative when compared to those of contemporary writers leaves no doubt that he was truthful. His account is a valuable store-house of information on political and social institutions of those days. He gives a faithful account of sultan Muḥammad’s court and of the manners, customs, habits and institutions of the people at large. Battūtah is an independent writer and is more reliable than the historians who cared for the favour or frown of the emperors. The traveller corroborates Barani at some places and at others he supplements him. But his narrative has its shortcomings also. He was a foreigner. He did not know Persian well and he was altogether ignorant of Hindi. Not unoften he lent a credulous ear to rumour and gossip and frequently mixes up fiction with fact. He cares little about the chronological sequence of events and so also about topographical accuracy. In spite of these defects Ibn Baṭṭūṭah’s Risala forms an invaluable source of Indian history of the 14th century.

I have used the French Edition of Ibn Baṭṭūṭah’s voyages by C. Defrémery and B. R. Sanguinetti. The portions dealing with India have also been translated by Khan Saheb Maulvi Muḥammad Husain, who supplements his translation with valuable footnotes.

Equal in importance to Ibn Buṭṭūṭah is the Venetian traveller Marco Polo, who visited south India about the end of the thirteenth century. It is really unfortunate that Marco did not visit north India, and his account deals only with the Deccan. He speaks very highly of queen Rūdrama of Warangal and gives interesting details about the kings of Mʿabar. His account of horse trade in south India tallies with that of Vaṣṣāf even to details. Marco Polo visited almost all the then existing ports of India and talks about the brisk maritime activity in the south. He describes in detail the manners and habits of the people of the Deccan and forms a very valuable source of social history. Col. Yule has edited the “Travels of Marco Polo” supplementing them with learned footnotes.

Masālikul Āḥṣār fi Mumālikul Aṃsār is another work like the two cited above. Its only shortcoming is that its author Shihābuddin Ahmad also known as Al Marashi (1297—1348), a native of Damascus, did not himself visit India. His account of this country is based only on what he heard from trustworthy persons like Shaikh Mubarak and Khojandi. But on the whole his information is quite trustworthy and is corroborated by other contemporary writers. The Masālik throws much light on the social and economic life of the country as well as on the machinery of government of Hindustan. It has been published in the Aligarh University Magazine. Translations of relevant portions of the book have also been given in Elliot Vol. III. There is also a rotograph copy of a Ms. of the work in the Allahabad University Library.

On the basis of the Masālik an Arab geographer Alqal Qāshindi has written an account of the social conditions of India in his work Subh-ul-A‘sha. Dr. Otto Spies has translated into English the portions of the book dealing with India. Alqal Qāshindi has nothing new to say and copiously copies from the Masālik, at times verbatim.

Besides these works which are very valuable for giving information on social and economic life of the country, there are books on political history written a few years before and after the Khalji period. Minhāj Sirāj’s Tabqat-i-Nāsiri deals with the period between the Muslim conquest of India and the reign of Balban. The most important portions of this book for our period are those dealing with the Mughals. Major Raverty, who has translated the work, has given very copious and learned footnotes. The book forms an authentic and indispensable history for pre-Khalji period.

Shams Sirāj ‘Afif’s Tarikh-i-Firōz Shāhī is a continuation of Barani’s Tarikh and is carried down to 1388 A.D. It occasionally refers to ‘Alā’uddin’s reign which was of great significance in the 14th century. ‘Afif was born in 1350 A.D. and served under Firoz Tughlaq.

Non-Indian Contemporary Sources.

Among the non-Indian contemporary sources the most important is the Tarikh-i-Vassāf. It was finished in 1312 A.D. by ‘Abdullah bin Fazlullah Vassāf, who subsequently resumed writing and brought down the work to 1328.
Vāṣṣāf’s Tarikh is written in Persian transpersed with Arabic at places, and his style is extremely ornamented and verbose.
It is a history of the Mongols of Persia, but the author refers to happenings in India as he heard from travellers and other infomed men. He refers to the climate of Gujarat and the political and commercial conditions of the Deccan. He makes mention about the Mongol raids on India in the time of ‘Alāūddin and gives a graphic account of the closing years of that monarch. No other historian except Vāṣṣāf says anything about the Persian embassy to ‘Alāūddin’s court. The Bombay edition of the text has been used.

Jama'ut-Tavārīkh of Rashīduddin is another non-Indian contemporary work. The book which was completed in 1310
A.D. gives a reliable account of the Mongols of the 13th century. Rashīd also lends information about Indian geography.
I have consulted Gibb Memorial and the Tehran texts.

The Tarikh-i-Guzīdah completed in 1329 A.D. by Ḥamdu-lah Mustaufī is a valuable work and deals with the Mongols of Persia and Transoxiana. Mustaufī’s Nuzhatul Qulūb written in 1339 deals with the history of Persia. Tarikh-i-Guzīdah has been published in the Gibb Memorial Text Series.

Contemporary Literature.

Besides the contemporary historical works, Indian and foreign, there is a lot of contemporary literature to throw light on the social and cultural aspect of the period. Some of the works of Khusrau and Baranī and of those who are mentioned to be great erudites in ‘Alāūddin’s reign have been lost, but whatever is left, lends useful information on this point.
Reference has been made above to Khusrau’s Aijāz-i-Khusarvī also known as Rasāil-ul-A‘ījaz and his maṣnavīs as sources of social history. But equally important are the contemporary hagiological books like the Rāḥatul Qulūb by Nizāmuddin Aulia, Fāvāidul Fāvād by ‘Alā Hasan Sajzī, Afzalul Fāvād.
and Rāḥtul Muhabbīn by Khusrau, Sairul Aulia by Amīr Khurd, Miftahul 'Ashqīn and Khairul Majālis by Nāṣiruddīn Chirāgh Delhi. These books comprise mostly of the talks between the sūfī saints of our time and their disciples who were derived from all strata of society. Consequently much useful information about food and drink, customs and manners, and society and culture of those days can be culled from them. Since the books are of a religious nature, most of them have been translated into Urdu. The translations are done fairly well.

Kritya Ratnākar and Vivād Ratnākar two contemporary Sanskrit works of Chandrēshvar Thakur refer to the raid on Nepal territory by a Hindu Raja of Mithila in the time of 'Alāūddīn.

Secondary Sources.

In the course of writing this book a large number of non-contemporary Persian and Arabic texts and manuscripts have been consulted and a few of these need special attention. The Tarikh-i-Mubarak Shahī of Yāḥya bin Aḥmad, written about the middle of the 15th century (837 H.), supplements Barānī at many places though it is in itself a very brief narrative. Its value lies in the fact that it gives dates of events frequently and is written in a simple style. I have used the Bib. Ind. Text and a Ms. copy possessed by the Allahabad University Library.

Tarikh-i-Muḥammadi was completed in 842 H. by Muḥammad Bihāmad Khan who was a contemporary of Yaḥya. The author's father was in the service of Tughlaq Shah and Muḥammad Tughlaq, the son of Fīroz Tughlaq. The Allahabad University Ms. is a copy of the Ms. of the British Museum.

Tabqāt-i-Akbarī of Niẓāmuddīn Aḥmad written in 1593 A.D. in the time of Akbar also contains an exhaustive account of the Khaljīs. Niẓāmuddīn Aḥmad has borrowed much from Baranī and tries to explain the origin of the Khaljīs. He mentions twenty seven works which he utilized in the preparation of his book. I have utilized Bid. Ind. Text.

Amin Aḥmad Raṣi, the author of Ḥhaft Afqīm, was a contemporary of Nizāmuddin. He is an independent writer and gives valuable information about certain points e.g. about the origin of the Bahmani dynasty. Ḥhaft Afqīm is a sort of encyclopaedia and deals with political history, geography and lives of saints. The Ms. copy of the Bankipur Library has been utilized.

Abdul Qadir Badaoni’s Muntakhabat Tavārikh was finished in 1596. He relies more on Yahya than on Baranī or Nizāmuddin, and follows him in method of writing also. The Bib. Ind. Text and Ranking’s Translation have been utilized.

More important than Badaoni is Muḥammad Qasim Ferishta, whose work Gulshan-i-Ibrahimi, popularly known as Tarikh-i-Ferishta was completed in 1612. It contains a detailed account of the Khaljīs and of the lives of saints contemporaneous to them. As the book was written in the Deccan Ferishta possessed sources from which he gives a more detailed account of the Deccan campaigns of Alauddin than Baranī or even Iṣāmī. Ferishta gives a detailed list of the wealth captured by Alauddin in his various Deccan campaigns and especially in the raid of Devagiri in 1296, but his data are open to doubts since they are not corroborated by any other historian. He cites no less than thirty-five works he utilized in the preparation of his book, but even then his chronology is not free from faults. Moreover, he does not make definite statements on controversial points. The Lucknow text has been utilized.

As Ferishta was writing in the Deccan, his contemporary Ḥājiuddabir was busy with his history in Gujrat. The real title of the book is Zafarul Vāli bi Muzaffar Valiaż and the full name of its author ‘Abdullah Muhammad bin Sīrājud-din 'Umar al Makkī surnamed Ḥājiuddabīr. He began writing in 1605 and was still engaged in 1611 on his work. Ḥāji makes use of a valuable work which so far has not been found to exist. It is the Tabqāt-i-Bahādur Shahī by Husām Khan from which he quotes extensively. Ḥājiuddabīr lends information on many abstruse points and on the whole his statements are quite trustworthy. He is the only historian who gives 'Alāūddīn’s age and relates interesting incidents about his family life, perhaps because he utilized sources now lost. He gives various versions of Padmini episode, and at many places in his narrative he gives original information. The work has been edited by Sir Denison Ross with a learned introduction and a very exhaustive and informative index.

Provincial Histories.

Tarīkh-i-Mʻāsūmī, written in 1008 H. (1599 A.D.), is a history of Sindh from the time of Muḥammedan conquest to its annexation by Akbar. Mīr Mʻāsūm’s work throws sufficient light on 'Alāūddīn’s conquest of Jaisalmer, which has not even been mentioned by any other Persian historian and has only been given by Rajput bards in a very defective manner. The text has been published.

Tarīkh-i-Tahīrī of Tahir Muḥammad is also a history of Sindh completed in 1018 A.H. (1669 A.D.). Tarīkh-i-Tahīrī and Tuḥfatul Kirām of Mīr ‘Ali Qānī of Tattha (C. 1766), another history of Sindh, have been copiously translated by Elliot. I have used the Bankipore Ms. of Tarīkh-i-Tahīrī.

Beg Larnāmah, another history of Sindh was completed in 1017 H. (1608 A.D.). It deals with rulers of Sindh in the time of Akbar but also gives a retrospective sketch of the history of the province. The Allahabad ‘Varsity Ms. is a transcript copy of the Ms. in the British Museum Library.

Of the histories of Gujarat Mirāt-i-Sīkandārī and Mirāt-i-Ahmādī are the most important. The former, written by Sikandar bin Muḥammad, was finished in 1020 H. (1611 A.D.)
the latter, written by 'Ali Muḥammad Khan, was finished in 1174 H. (1760 A.D.). Though written at a later date Mirāt-i-Aḥmad supplies more information about 'Alāūddīn than the former. Ḥājīuddabīr also supplies useful information about the history of Gujarat.

Riāzus Salātīn, the only connected history of Bengal, was completed by Ghulām Ḥusain Yazdputi in 1202 H. (1788 A.D.). It deals with the history of Bengal from the earliest times to the date of writing. The book is full of "inaccuracies and mis-statements" and therefore is not very reliable, but a comparative study of the book with coins and inscriptions helps in ascertaining true facts about the history of Bengal.

Besides some of the important works mentioned above, many other Persian and Arabic texts and Mss. have been utilized in the preparation of this work. A large number of books in Hindi, Urdu and English have been consulted and a list of their names given in the Bibliography. Mention may here be made of Naiṣī's Khayat which is of special value for the study of Rajput history. Compiled in 1650-66 A.D., it is not a historical work in the real sense of the term, but it throws much light on Rajput history of many centuries and presents us with a "Hindu" version of various events. It is written in Marwari interspersed with Dingal at places and covers the period from the 12th to the 17th century.

For archaeological evidence the Reports and Memoirs of the Archaeological Survey of India, the Epigraphica Indica-Moslemica, and the Epigraphica Carnatica have been consulted. A list of the journals and periodicals utilized has been given at the end of the Bibliography.
BIBLIOGRAPHY

1. PERSIAN SOURCES.

Abdul Haqq:
- Akhbaarul Akhyar, Biography of saints, Lko. Text.
- Tarikh-i-Haqqi, completed 1005 A.H. Bankipore Ms.

Abdulla Vassaf:
- Taziyatul Amsar va Tajriyatul Asar, or Tarikh-i-Vassaf C. 1327 A.D. Bombay Text.

Abdul Qadir Badaoni:

Amir Khusrau:
- A'ijaz-i-Khusravi, Lko. Text.
- Deval Rani, Aligarh Text.
- Khazainul Futuh, Aligarh Text and Allahabad University Ms.
- Qiranus Sadain, Aligarh Text.
- Tughlaqnamah, Aurangabad Text.
- Mutla'i-Anvar, Aligarh Text.
- Dibase Divan Ghurratul Kamal, Delhi Text.
- Javahar-i-Khusravi.

Amir Ahmad Razi:
- Haft Aqilim, C. 1594 A.D. Bankipore Ms.

Abdur Rahim Shah Navaz:

Allah Yar 'Usmani:
- Hadiqatul Aqilim C. 1729, Bankipore Ms.

Abul Feda:
- Tarikh-i-Abul Feda, Constantinople 1879.

'AINUL MULK:
- Insha-i-Mahir, Allahabad University Ms.

'ALAUDDIN JUVENI:

407
Ahmad bin Muhammad:
Nuskha-i-Jahanara C. 971 A.H.
Bankipore Ms.

Bakhtavar Khan:
Miratul Alam C. 1667 A.D.
Bankipore Ms.

Beg Larnamah:
A History of Sindh.
Allahabad University Ms.
copy of the British Museum Ms.

Bahrum Amvaj:
A general History of India, 18th. century.

Chiragh Delhi; Nasiruddin Shaikh:
Khairul Majalis, Ms. of Prof.
Habib of Aligarh.

Dara Shikoh:
Safinatul Aulia.

Faizullah Rashiduddin:
Jama'ut Tavarih, C. 1310 A.D.
and later supplemented, Tehran.

Fakhruddin Mubarak:
Tarikh-i-Fakhruddin Mubarak Shahi
C. 602 A.H. Edited by Sir Denison Ross.

Ghulam 'Ali Khan:
Qadiqatus Safa, A general History of India C. 1759 A.D. Bankipore Ms.

Hasan Sajzi:
Favaidul Favad, Newal Kishore
Press, Lucknow.

Hamdullah Mustaufi:
Tarikh-i-Guzidah C. 1329-33 A.D.
Gibb Memorial Series.

Ishami:
Futuhus Salatin, Edited by Agha
Mehdi Husain, Agra 1938.

Ibrahim bin Hariri:
Tarikh-i-Ibrahim, C. 16th century
(Dedicated to Babur) Allahabad University Ms.

Imaduddin Hasan:
Rauzatul Taherin, General History
written 1602 A.D. Bankipore Ms.

Khwand Mir:
Habibus Siyar.

Mir Masum:
Tarikh-i-Masumi History of Sindh
Author died 1606 A.D. Government Oriental Series.
Mir Khvand: Rausatus Safa.
Muhammad bin Mubarak Kirmani: Sairul Aulia, Text edited by Chiranjit Lal.
Muhammad Qasim Hindu Shah Ferishtah: Gulshan-I-Ibrahimi or Tarikh-i-Ferishtah, Lucknow Text.
Muhammad Sadiq: Subah Sadiq, Historical, biographical work C. 1638, Bankipore Ms.
Muhammad Hadi: Haft Gulshan, C. 1719 A.D. Bankipore Ms.
Muhammad Bihammad Khan: Tarikh-i-Muhammad C. 842 A.H. Allahabad University Ms.
Maa'sir-i-Rahim, Mirat-i-Ahmadi,
Nizamuddin Ahmad: History of India C. 17th century.
Qazvin: History of Gujarat.
Shams Siraj 'Afif: Tabqat-i-Akbari C. 16th century.
Bib. Ind. text.
Surjan Rai Bhandari: Nigaristan C. 1564 A.D. Bankipore Ms.
Salim: Khulasatut Tarikh, Text published by K. B. Zafar Husain.
Tahir Muhammad: Riyazus Salatin, History of Bengal C. 1788 A.D.
Tarih-i-Dauda: Tarikh-i-Tahir, Bankipore Ms.
Yahya bin Ahmad bin Abdullah: Tarikh-i-Mubarak Shahi C. 838 A.H.
Bib. Ind. Text.
Ziyauddin Barani: Tarikh-i-Firoz Shahi C. 738 A.H.
Bib. Ind. Text.

2. ARABIC WORKS.

3. SANSKRIT WORKS.

Chandra Naya Śuri: \textit{ Hammir Mahākavya.}

4. HINDI WORKS.

\textit{Rajpūtana ka Itihās} 3 vols. Ajmer 1926.
\textit{Madhya Kalin Bharatī Sanskriti}, Lectures, Hindustani Academy.

Rieu, Bisheshvar Nath: \textit{ Marvār ka Itihās.}

Vidyapati: \textit{Kirtilata}, Indian Press.
\textit{Purush Pariksha.}

Yūsuf ʿAlī: \textit{Madhya Kalin Bharat ki Samajik  Dasha}, Hindustani Academy.

5. URDU BOOKS.

Ferishtah: \textit{Translation of Tarīkh-i-Ferishtah} Newal Kishore Press and Osmania University Press.

Muḥammad Husain Khan Saheb: \textit{Safarnamah}, Trans. of Ibn Bāṭtūtāh’s Travels.
Shibli Naumani: Shairul Ajam 5 parts, Aligarh.
Saiyyad Ahmad Khan: Asarus Sanadid. Delhi 1854.
Malik Muhammad Jaisi.
Translations of: Favaidul Favad of Hasan Sajzi.
Sairul Aulia of Amir Khurd.
Rahatul Muhabbin of Amir Khusrau.
Rahatul Qulub of Nizamuddin Aulia.
Miftahul Ashqin of Chiragh Delhi.
Afzalul Favaid of Khusrau.

6. ENGLISH WORKS.

Abul Fazl: Akbarnamah, Trs. Beveridge.
           Ain-i-Akbari, Trs. Blochmann.

Aiyangar, Krishna Swami: South India and Her Muhammadan Invaders, London 1921.

Ashraf, K.M. Life and Conditions of the People of Hindustan, Calcutta.

Ahmad, M. Bashir: Administration of Justice in Mediaeval India, Aligarh 1941.

Arthashastra of Kautilya: English Translation by S. Shastry, Mysore 1923.

Basu: Tarikh-i-Mubarak Shahi, Translation.

Bayley, E.C.:
Local Muhammedan Dynasties (Gujarat).

Beale, T.W.:

Brown, P.:
Indian Architecture (Islamic period)

Blochmann, H.:
Ain-i-Akbari, Calcutta, 1873.

Barthold, W.:
Turkistan down to the Mongol Invasion London, 1828.

Commissariat, M.S.:
History of Gujarat vol. I.

Carpenter, J.E.:
Theism in Medieval India, London, 1921.

Croix, Petit de la:

De, B.:
Tabqat-i-Akbari, Translation of.

Elliot and Dowson:
History of Indian as told by its own Historians, 8 vols. London, 1887.

Erskine, W.:
A History of India, 2 vols.

Encyclopaedia of Islam: by different Authors, London, 1913-34.

Ernle, R.:
Catalogue of Persian Mss. in the Library of the India Office.

Elias and Ross:
A History of the Mongols of Central Asia.

Fleet, J.F.:
Dynasties of the Kanarese Districts Bombay, 1896.

Forbes, A. K.:
Râsmâlâ 2 vols.

Fergusson, J.:
History of Indian and Eastern Architecture.

Farquhar, J.N.:

Gribble, J.D.B.:
Gibb, H.A.R.:

Gibbon, E.:

Habib, M.:
Campaigns of 'Alāʾuddin, Trs. of Khazāinul Futūh, Bombay, 1933.
Life of Hazrat Amir Khusrau.

Hodivala, S.H.:
Studies in Indo-Muslim History.

Howorth, Sir H.:

Husain, K. B. Zafar:

Husain, W.:
Administration of Justice during the Muslim Rule in India, Calcutta, 1934.

Huges, T. P.:

Havell, E. B.:

Haig, S. W.:
Cambridge History of India vol. III.

Imperial Gazetteer of India.

Kincaid, C. A. and Parasnis, D. B.:

Keay, F. E.:

Keith, A. B.:
History of Sanskrit Literature.

Lane-Poole, S.:
Aurangzeb.

Malet, C. C.: History of Sindh (Translation of Tarikh-i-Mas'umi), Bombay, 1855.

Qureshi I. H.: Administration of the Sultanate of Delhi.

Ranking, George S. A.: Muntakhabut Tavarikh, Translation of Badaoni's History, Calcutta, 1898.

Rogers: Indian Museum Coins.

Ray: Dynastic History of North India 2 vols.
Sarda, Har Bilas.: Hammur of Ranthambhor.
Stephen, Carr.: Archaeology and Monumen- tals of Delhi.
Sanderson, Gordon.: Archaeology of the Qutb Delhi, Arch. Sur. India Memoirs.
Spies, Otto.: An Arab account of the 14th cen- tury Trans. from Şubh-ul-'Asha of Alqal Qashindi, Aligarh.
Sewell, R.: Historical Inscriptions of Southern India, Madras, 1932.

/ Thomas, Edward.: Chronicles of the Pathan Kings of Delhi, London, 1871.

Titus: Indian Islam.
Tripathi, R. P.: Some Aspects of Muslim Adminis- tration, Indian Press, Allahabad.
Topa, I.: Politics in Pre-Mughal Times
Travernier: Travels.
Vladimirstov: Life of Changiz Khan, Trans. from Russian by D. S. Mirsky, Routledge, 1930.
Wright, Nelson.: The Sultans of Delhi, Their Coinage and Metrology, Oxford.

Cathay and the Way Thither, Lon- don 1913-16.
7. PERIODICALS.

Archaeological Survey of India Reports.
Epigraphica Carnatica.
Epigraphica Indo-Moslemica.
Indian Antiquary.
Indian Historical Quarterly.
Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal.
Journal of Indian History.
Journal of Indian Art.
Journal of the Numismatic Society of India.
Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland.
Proceedings of the Indian History Congress.
INDEX

Abaji Akhūrbeg, 34, 72, 75
Abaji Mughal, 207, 295
Abdullah, grandson of Halaku, 36, 37
Abdul Qadir Badaoni, 13, 14
Abdurrazzaq, 187
Abu Bakr, 89
Abu Bakr, son of 'Alā', 320, 352
Abu Bakr Tūsī Haidri, 31
Abuwar, 80
Adinah Mosque, Patan, 383, 384
Afghanpur, 106, 252
Ahmad Chap, Malik, 19, 20, 21, 27, 36, 44, 59, 60, 70, 74, 80
Ainulmulk Multani, 133 & n., 134, 227, 230, 237, 312, 325
326, 336, apptd. gov. of Devagiri 338, 351, 352, given title of 'Alîm Khan 353
Aitmar Kacan, 6, 7, 8, 11, 12
Aitmar Surkha, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11
A'izuddin, Malik, 20, 75, 87, 106, 227, 296
Ajai Singh, 131
Ajmer, 99
Akbar, Mughal Emperor, 129, 310, 'Alā'. compared with 315-317
Akbârul Akhiyâr
Akhūr 'Usmân, Amir, 72
Alaulmulk, Malik, 49, 58, 59, 75, 85, 91, 156, 179, 261, 295, 306, 311-314, 387
'Alâî Darvâzâ 337-339, 383
'Alam, Malik, 171
'Alâûddin Khalji, 8, 17, 19, 24, 26, 39, early life 40-41,
in Kara 41-42, raids Bhilsa 44, appointed 'Ariz-i-Mumalik 45, to Devagiri 49-57, back in Kara 61, accession at Kara 69, 73, at Delhi 74, 77, 80, 88, 98, 103, attempt on life 104-107, takes Ranthambhor 107-113, 129, 134, 241, 250, 263, 265, his Market Control 266-294, last days
295-304, Estimate 305, 318, 319, 378, homage to his tomb 268
'Alâûddin Ayâz, 108, 109
Alexander, 'Alâ'. rivals, 90, 311
Alghachi Malik, 25
Alghû, son-in-law of Jalal,
37, 44, 74, 80
'Ali, 89
'Ali Alkaús, gov. of Deopalpur, 257
'Ali Beg, invasion of, 167
'Ali Dîvânâ, Amir, 72, 174
Almustâssimbillâh, caliph, 145, 222 Almās Beg, 19, 40, 41, 64, becomes Ulugh Khan 69, 79,
80, 83, 87, 101, 102, 103,
106, 110, death 114, 115,
153, 277, 295, 306, 308, 312, 314
Alp Khan, 42, 69, 89, 136, 191, 203, 230, 231, 297-299, murdered 299-301, 306, 307, 312, 314, 325, 383
'Alvî, 109, 110
INDEX

Amīr-i-Koh, 106, 110
Amīr Khusrau 56, 57, 102, 112, 117, 119, 125, 129, 152, 168, 195, 234, 264, 302, 303, 333, his works 392-395
Amroha, 301, 302
Aanur, gov. of Sirpur, 197
Anasagar lake, 99
Anhilvara, 82, 84
Anil Mehta, com. of Warangal, 339
Arghūn, of Persia, 152
Arsalan Kulāhī, Amīr, 305
Arsi Singh, 131
Arya Bhattas, 210
Aṣaduddin, 331, 332, 333
Ashīrgarh, 57
Avadh, 45, 69, 76, 107
Aurangzeb, 219, 295
‘Āzam Shah, 331

Babur, 270
Badah village, 104
Badal, 121
Badaon, 97, 107, 252; Gate, 9, 45, 172
Badaoni, See Abdul Qadir
Badshah Begum, 307
Baghela Rajputs, 76, 83
Baghpat, 73 & n.
Baglana, 190, 191
Bahri, 31
Bahadur bin Muẓaffar Shah, 125, 128
Baharpur, 8 & n, 10, 11, 12, 31
Bahmani Kingdom, 187
Bahram Kara, 207
Bairam Deva Koela, 24
Balakdeo Naik, 205
Balban, See Ghayāsuddin
Balkh, 149
Ballala, Hoysala king, 204, 205, 214
Banda Aljaītū, 152, 206
Baran, 6, 8, 71, 165
Barani, See Ziyāuddin
Barraq, 87
Barthold, 15
Barvari, 342, 344; race of, 348-51
Bashīr Divānā, Shaikh, 254, 317
Bashīr, Paik, 321, 322
Beglarbeynamah, 404
Begi, 87
Behram Aiba, Gov. of Uchch, 357
Benares, 76
Bengal, 79, expedition to 93-97
Berach, 117
Betwa, 44
Bhandarkal Gate, 110
Bhillama Yadava, 46, 191
Bhilas, 39, 44 & n, 45, 59
Bihāmad Khan, Historian, 56
Bilik, 146
Biranjtan Kotvāl, 30, 31
Biradhul, 208, 211
Bokhara, 149
Brahmastpuri, 209, 210, 369
Bughra Khan, See Nāṣiruddin Sultān.
Bundelkhand, 76

Caliphate, 144
Cambay, 86
Carpini, 145
Carvanians travelling merchants, 273
Chachnamah, 117
Chaghtai, 150
Chalukyas, 46
Chambal, 35
Chandava dynasty, 82
Chandaval, 33
Chanderi, 45, 49 n, 59, 92, 195, 221
Chandreshvar Thakur, 365, 366
Changiz Khan, 12, 13, 37, 91, 144, 177
Chaturvardi, 117
Chausath Khambha, 376
Cheras, 77
Chhajjú Malik, Kishlí Khan, his revolt 22-26, 23, 32, 40, 41, 42, 59, 312
Chittor, 76, conquest of 116 & n-120, 256
Chitrangad, 116
Cholas, 77, 182

Damhai, 64 & n
Dava Khan, 151, 175
Deopalpur, 10, 171, 220, 242
Devagiri, 39, 45, kingdom’s boundaries 46, 48, 50 citadel of 52, 76, 84, 180, 181, 202, 219, 220
Deval Rani, 173, captured 190-192, 215, 297, 298, 303, 333, her end 334-335
Devapala, 122, 132
Dhar, 76, 92, 221
Diler Khan, 159
Dúda, 99
Dwarsamudra, 77, 181, 182, 201, 219
Dyandev, 47

Elagabalus, of Rome, 336
Ellichpur, 50 & n, 221
Elliot, 15
Ellora Caves, 191

Fakhruddin Júná, See Muḥammad Tughlaq
Fakhruddin Kúchí, 59, 65, 75
Fakhruddin, historian, 14

Fakhruddin, Kotval, 1, 5, 8, 19, 108, 111, 237, 242
Farid Khan, son of ‘Alá, 320, 352
Fariduddin Shakargunj, Shaikh, 27
Fatehnamah, 386
Ferishtah, historian, 13, 14, 52, 96, 123, 129, 130, 153, 174, 248, 257, 270, 275, 276
Firúz Tughlaq, 56, 235, 250, 271, 272, 285, 375, 381
Futūḥus Salatin, 395-397

Gakharas, 76, 153
Gambheri, 117, 384,
Gang, Mongol chief, 173, 376
Garmsir, 175
Garshasp, a name of ‘Alá, 40
Ghayaspur, 38, 263
Ghayásuddin Balban, 1, 2, 11, 20, 21, 74, 225, 229, 231, 237, 238, 242, 246, 250, 271, 310, 374, 376
Ghati Lajaura, 50
Gházní Khan, 152
Ghazní Gate 74, 110
Gobi desert, 144
Gora, 121
Govardhan, 125
Guhilas, 116
Gujarat, 76, 79, kingdom of 81-82, early history 82-83, expedition to 83-86
Gul Chandar, Khokhar chief, 358
Gurdan Saini, 34
Gurgam, 202
Gurvan Yadho Vikram Sah Deva, 364
Haider, rebel of Gujarat, 303, 325, 326
Haji Maula, 95, 97, his insurrection 108-111, death 110, 266
Hajiuddabir, historian, 13, 40, 42, 56, 114, 123, 129, 137, 323
Hajlak, Mughal, 159
Halaku Khan, of Persia, 36, 151
Hamiduddin, Malik, 75, 110, 115, 227, 229, 296
Hamiduddin Qazi, 233, 235, 267
Hammir, Rana of Ranthambhor, 88, 110, 113
Hammir, ruler of Sesoda, 131, 304
Hansi, 80
Hanmaukonda, 197
Harasimha Deva, 365
Harpal Deva, 216, 304, 318, 327, 328
Hasan, see Nasiruddin Khusrav Shah
Hastapur, 301
Hathiya Paik, 30, 31
Haz-i-Alaï, 165, 360, 361, 375
Hazir Situn, palace of, 238, 321, 342, 376, 379
Hemadpant, 47
Hiranmar, Malik, 20, 75
Hisamuddin, see Arkali Khan
Hisamuddin Malik, 302
Hisamuddin, brother of Khusrav Khan, 327 & n, 328, 352, becomes Khan-i-Khânân, 333, 359, 360
Hoshang Malik, of Ajmer, 357
Hoysalas, 45, 47, 52, empire 182
Husam Khan, historian, 114
Ibn Battuta, 82, 129, 238, 282, 291, 332, works of 397
Ibn Haukal, 14
Ibnul Asir, 145
Ibrahim, see Qadr Khan
Ibrahim Ludi, 272
Ijalak, 87
Ikat Khan, 40, 95, 104, 105, 106, 114, 226, 306
Ikhtiyaruddin Khan-i-Khânân, 8, 9, 19, 23, 29, 33
Ikhtiyaruddin Hûd, 67
Ikhtiyaruddin, Malik, 65
Ibaris, 9, 15, 16, 108, 227
Itutmish, Shamsuddin, 101, 109, 117, 132, 150, 225, 246, 373, 374, 375 380
Indarpur, 38, 263
Imadulmulk, Malik, 63
Iqbalminda, 170
Irijpur, also known Sultanpur, 194 & n
Isami, 56, 86, 114, 129, 153, 161, 173, 300
Istakhari, 14
Jagnar, temple of, 212
Jahanara Begum, 382
Jahariya, 344, 352
Jahatiapali, 56
Jaimal, 129
Jaisalmer, 98 & n, attack on 98-99
Jaitra Singh, 117, 118
Jalaluddin Balvalchi, Qazi, 233
Jautar, 86, 117
Jāmāl Khaljī, Amīr., 81
Jama Masjid, 35
Jama'at Khānah Mosque, 382
Jama'at Taxarikh, 401
Jat Kūta, 209 & n
Jatavārmaṇa Sundarā Pandya, 183, 184
Jaudhar, of Jaisalmer 99, of Ranthambhor 112, of Chittor 119
Jazīyah, 244, 249
Jhāin, 34, 38, 101 & n, 106, 114
Jhūjūh, Malik, 93, 165
Jīna Prabha Sūri, 83
Jūji, 150
Jūnā Malik, see Muḥammad Tughlaq
Jullandhar, 153 & n
Juveni, 144
Kabīruddin, historian, 386
Kadar, 81
Kai Khusrau, 1, 3
Kaiqubād, see Mu'izzuddin
Kaithun 202 & n
Kakatiya Rajas, 94
Kali Nahr, 23 & n
Kamala Devi, 84, 86, 190, 307
Kamaluddin Abul Ma'ali, Malik, 20, 59, 65
Kamaluddin Gurg, 135, 138, 301, 304, 325
Kandur, 209
Kānhaṇī, 50, 51
Kānhar Deva, 130, 136, 137, 138
Kanobari, 202
Karā, 10, 80, 93, 96
Karan Baghela, 83, 86, 190, 191, 297
Kasri, 87
Katlā Nihang, 207
Kaušak-i-Hazār Sitūn, see Hazār Sitūn
Kaušak-i-Sabz, 279
Khalījīs, their ascendance, 6-11, their origin 11-16
Khamosh, Yoghresh Khan Malik, 19 & n, 331
Khairulmajālis, 267, 268, 272, 280
Kharāj, 244
Khayat, 405
Khāzānul Futūh, 172, 393
Khizarabād, 120
Khīzr Khan, 123, 126, 130, 138, 142, 176, 203, 297, 298-304, 319, blinded, 320, 331, assassinated 333-334, 382
Khudavandāda Chashnīgīr, 313
Khumās, 87
Khūt, 78
Khurram Malik, 19, 34, 65
Khusrau Khan, see Nāširuddin K. Shah
Khvāfī Khan, 199
Khvāja Ḥāfīz, 339
INDEX

Khvāja Hasan Basrī, 1
Khvāja Khaṭīr, 4, 19, 75, 229
Khvarizm, 144
Kili, 158 & n
Kilughari, 2, 6, 8, 9, 10, 20, 33, 38, 61, 70, 263, 375
Koh-i-Nur, 199 & n
Koka Pradhān, 133, 136
Kol, 71, 165, 252
Kondjuk, 152
Konkan, 47
Krishna II, 47
Kubak, 170, 178
Kumarpala, 85
Kumbha Rana, 131
Kuwari R., 35
Kuyūk, 178

Lachchvi dynasty, 364
Lakhnauti, 33 & n
Lakshman Singh, 131
Lakshmi, Maharana of Seso-dia, 119
Lal Mahal, or Crimson Palace, 20 & n, 297, 303, 376, 377
Lohravat, 33 & n
M‘abar, 114, 201, 340
Maghlati Malik, 357-359
Mahlak Deva, 132
Mahbāt Khan, 219
Mahmud, sultan of Malwa, 12, 13
Mahmūd Sarjândār, 34, 35
Mahmūd of Ghazna, 82, 188, 219, 237
Mahmūd Sartiha, 207
Māhrū, 42, 43, 297, 298, 302, 307
Maldeva, Raja of Chittor, 130, 131, 138, 304, 361
Malka-i-Jahan, wife of Jalal, 21, 43, 59, 70, 73, 80

Malik Dīnar, 105, becomes Zafar Khan 322-323, 326, executed 327
Malik Muhammad Jaisi, 121
Malka Malik, 307
Malwa, 46, 47, 76, 92, conquest of 132-134, 252
Manda Ahīr, 21
Mandor, 38, 44, & n, 117
Mandu, 133
Manikpur, 64
Mangu Khan, 95, his revolt
107, 108, 226, 306
Manucci, 129
Maravarmana Kulusekhara,
184, 185, 204
Marco Polo, 82, 181, 184, 186, 399
Mardi, 208
Masālikul Absār, 399-400
Meerut, 76
Mevar, 84, 116, 117
Mirāt-i-Ahmādi, 404
Mirāt-i-Sikandari, 404
Mīr M‘asum, 99
Mīr Mubarak, 24
Motupille, 181
Mubhar, paik., 321, 322
Mughals, 17, 76, 144, their army organisation 147, mobi-licity, 148, early history 150-52, 291, 311
Mughalpura, 38
Mughilsuddin Qazī, 198, 305,
389
Muhammad, Brother of ‘Alā., 40
Muhammad Ghaurī, 82, 188
Muhammad Khan, son of Alā., 320
Muhammad bin Qasim, 223
Muhammad, son of Balban, 1
Muhammad Qutlug Khan, 23, 24
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name</th>
<th>Page Numbers</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Muhammad Shah, Amir of Sivistan</td>
<td>357</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muhammad Shah Kehbru</td>
<td>87, 100, 104, 112, 113</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muhammad bin Tughlaq</td>
<td>76, 93, 97, 165, 187, 220, 224, 231, 236, 238, 250, 256, 272, 285, 293, 309, appointed Akhurbeg 315, 323, 352, 353, 383, 387, 390</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mu'izzuddin Kaiqubad</td>
<td>1, 3, 4, 6, 9, 11, 12, 19, 29, 94, 307, 308, 375</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mujiruddin Abu Rija</td>
<td>338 n</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Multan</td>
<td>10, 79, 220, Multani merchants 243, 282</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Munir Paik</td>
<td>321</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Munja, Raja of Malwa</td>
<td>116</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muqaddams</td>
<td>78</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Munhiyān, secret police</td>
<td>278, 292</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muntakhabut Tavārīkh</td>
<td>403</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Muyiidulmulk</td>
<td>76, 387</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nagod</td>
<td>117, 171</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naharvala</td>
<td>86</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Najaf Shah</td>
<td>109</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nainsi</td>
<td>120, 136, 137</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nandurbar</td>
<td>190</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Narnaul, Amir of</td>
<td>34</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naṣiruddin Bughra Khan</td>
<td>1, 3, 5, 30, 238</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naṣiruddin Chirāgh Delhi, Shaikh</td>
<td>267, 272, 280</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naṣiruddin Khuramī</td>
<td>19, 59, 65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naṣiruddin Khusrau Shah, original name</td>
<td>323, 329, 338, his race 348-50, his reign 353-356, death 362-63</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naṣiruddin Mahmūd</td>
<td>76, 94</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naṣiruddin Ranah</td>
<td>20</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Neo-Muslims</td>
<td>4, 295-296</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naṣiruddin Ahmad, historian</td>
<td>12, 13, 14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naṣiruddin Aulia, Shaikh</td>
<td>166, 174, 198, 199, 302 &amp; n 308, Dargah 335, 336, 382</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naṣiruddin Vakil-i-dar</td>
<td>2, 3, 4, 5, 6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naṣiruddin, brother of Alp Khan</td>
<td>301 &amp; n</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nūr Khan</td>
<td>313</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nusrat Subāh, Malik</td>
<td>20, 23, 27</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Oqtai</td>
<td>150</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Orissa</td>
<td>94, 181</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pachisi</td>
<td>321 n</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Padmini</td>
<td>119, 129, 130, legend of 120-130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pandyas</td>
<td>77, kingdom of 183</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parasram Deva</td>
<td>203</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pathan Architecture</td>
<td>383</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pilībhit</td>
<td>76</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prakarmabahū</td>
<td>125</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pratap Rudra Deva</td>
<td>182, 194, 199, 200, 202, 205, 215, 339</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prithvi Raj, 100 n</td>
<td>364</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prithi Narayana Sah Deva</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qadr khan, Ruknuddin Ibrahim</td>
<td>19, 70, 80</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qarabeg, Malik</td>
<td>198</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qāżī Jalāl Kūshānī</td>
<td>29, 30, 31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>INDEX</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qazi Urdu, 30</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qipchaq, 150</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qira Beg, 336</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qirat Beg, 267, 323</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qirat Qimar, 342, 361</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qivāmuddin ‘Ala Dabir, 3, 227, 338</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qubul Ulugh Khan, Malik, 235, 273, 277, 278, 286</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qulij Khan, 12, 13</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qutbuddin Aibak, 101, 225, 241, 373, 379, 380</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qutbuddin Alvi, Malik, 81</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qutbuddin Mubarak Shah Khalji, 220, 225, 226, 240, 293, 294, 308, crowned 322, starts reactionary policy 323-325, 328, character 336, murdered 341-345, estimate 345-347, 381, 384</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qutb Minar, 375, 380, 381</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qutlugh Bugha, 87</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qutlugh Khvajah, 92, 155, 158, 179, 312</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Qutlugh Tighin, 24, 34, 40</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quvvatul Islam Mosque, 319, 373, 374, 377, 379, 381</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Radosa, 83</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Raghava, mendicant, 121</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Raghava, minister of Ram Deva, 329</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajmundry, Raja of., 50</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ram Chandra, Yadava, of Devagiri, 46, 47, 48, 180, 188, 189, visits Delhi 192, 196, 202, 203, 205, 214, 297n, 298, 307, 319</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rameshvaram, 368-369</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Randhol, 344, 352</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ranga Devi, 112</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ranmal, 113</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ranthambhor, Jalal marched to 33, 41, 76, 92, 100 &amp; conquered by 'Ala 100-110, 227, 229, 243, 256</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rashiduddin, 144</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ratanpal, 113</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ratan Singh, 118, 130</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rationing, of 'Ala, 275</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Raverty, 15</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kewari, 34, 252</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rizvussalatin, 405</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rohtak, 4</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rubruquis, 145</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rudramba Devi, 181-182</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ruknuddin Dabir, 313</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ruknuddin Kaikas, 94</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ruknuddin, Shaikh, of Multan, 75</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ruknuddin, Qazi of Kara, 234</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sadruddin 'Arif, Shaikh, 75, 233</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shaddad, 210</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shahnah, 292</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saiyyad Ajal, 75</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saiyyad Tajuddin, 234</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sakarne, 86</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saldi, 81, 89</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Saleh, Paik, 321</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Samanah, 6, 155, 252</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Samar Singh, 84, 118</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sanjar Malik, see Alp Khan</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sannam, 37, 252</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sarang Deva, 84</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sarai 'Adil, 279, 282</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Seljukide Architecture, 378-79</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sevana, capture of 134, 313</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shadi Khan, son of 'Ala, 298, 320</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shadi Khatta, 331, 333</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shadi, Malik, 351</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Shahjahan, 219</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Page</td>
<td>Index</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>----------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tuka Timūr</td>
<td>151</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tüli</td>
<td>150</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tuzaki, Malik</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ujjain</td>
<td>44, 76, 92, 134, 142, 221</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ukha Mosque,</td>
<td>at Bayana, 384</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ʿUmar</td>
<td>89, 95</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ʿUmar Khan</td>
<td>107, 108, 306</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ʿUmar-Surkha</td>
<td>72</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ʿUmdatulmulk</td>
<td>75</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ulugh Khan</td>
<td>see Alams Beg</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ʿUsmān</td>
<td>89</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ʿUsmān Khan,</td>
<td>son of ʿAlā, 320</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vaṭa Malik,</td>
<td>Shahīn, 328, 332</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vahīduddin Qureshi</td>
<td>328,</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>appointed gov. of Gujarat</td>
<td>357, 353</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vakil-i-dar,</td>
<td>his duties 3 n</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vallabhīs</td>
<td>82</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vanmanthali</td>
<td>85</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vassāf</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vārak</td>
<td>rebel of Gujarat, 303, 325, 326</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vijaya Mandir</td>
<td>in Gwalior Fort, 334</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vijayanagar Kingdon</td>
<td>187, 211</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vikram Deva</td>
<td>138</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vinayak Deva,</td>
<td>of Telingana, 198</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vīra Pandya</td>
<td>184, 186, 204, 205, 217</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vireshvar Thakur</td>
<td>365</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wairagarh</td>
<td>196 &amp; n</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Warangal</td>
<td>77, 93, 96, 194, 196, Fort 197, 199, 201</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Woolsey Haig</td>
<td>94</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yadava</td>
<td>46, 52, 77</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yahya, historian</td>
<td>62, 87, 102, 239</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yalhaq, Mughal</td>
<td>87</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yaklakhi, Malik</td>
<td>328, 330, revolt of 337, 357, 359</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yaqūb, Divān-i-Riyāsat, 237, 278, 282, 283, 286, 288, 293</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yasak</td>
<td>146</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yusuf Šūfī</td>
<td>342, becomes Šūfī Khan, 353, 359</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zafar Khan, see Hizabruddin</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zafar Khan, father-in-law of Qutbuddin, 331</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zafarul Vālī</td>
<td>403</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zainuddin Mubarak, Qaẓī, 334</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Žimmī</td>
<td>249</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ziyāuddin Barānī</td>
<td>10, 11, 13, 32, 38, 49, 56, 75, 80, 85</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ziyāuddin Malik</td>
<td>63</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ziyāuddin Maulana, 323</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ziyāuddin Qaẓī, 233, 343, 344</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ziyāuddin Rūmī, Shaikh, 336</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Žungaria</td>
<td>150</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
CORRIGENDA

The list does not contain minor printing errors.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Page</th>
<th>Line</th>
<th>Read</th>
<th>For</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>4</td>
<td>24</td>
<td>practical</td>
<td>practicle</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>asylum</td>
<td>asylum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>23</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>or</td>
<td>of</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25</td>
<td>22</td>
<td>courtiers</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>25</td>
<td>27</td>
<td>remind</td>
<td>countries</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>29</td>
<td>15</td>
<td>became</td>
<td>remain</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>40</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>Taghún</td>
<td>become</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>41</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>trouble was soon</td>
<td>trouble soon</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>44</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>pollution</td>
<td>population</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>53</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>reminded</td>
<td>remained</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>58</td>
<td>23</td>
<td>rumoured</td>
<td>remoured</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>75</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>favourite</td>
<td>favorites</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>76</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>South-east</td>
<td>South-west</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>88</td>
<td>9</td>
<td>terrified</td>
<td>terrified</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>93</td>
<td>13</td>
<td>to Malwa</td>
<td>of Malwa</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>139</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>14th century</td>
<td>13th century</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>194</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>on</td>
<td>no</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>204</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>farther</td>
<td>father</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>219</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>prompted</td>
<td>prompted</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>240</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>stray</td>
<td>story</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>255</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>burnt</td>
<td>burnt</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>311</td>
<td>23</td>
<td>princes</td>
<td>prices</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

350, the verse of line 25 has been incorrectly printed on page 368, line 17.