

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA
ARCHÆOLOGICAL SURVEY OF INDIA
ARCHÆOLOGICAL LIBRARY

ACCESSION NO. 13425

CALL No. 538/680

D.G.A. 79

(92)

10033

HISTORY OF GREECE. - Vol. 8

NOT TO BE REPRODUCED

BY

GEORGE GROTE, Esq.

13425

VOL. VIII.

938

Grote

SECOND EDITION.

LONDON:

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

1851.

CENTRAL ARCHAEOLOGICAL LIBRARY, NEW DELHI.

Acc. No. 13425

Date..... 29.6.1960

Call No. 938 vol. (8)

Gno

92

PREFACE TO VOL. VIII.

I HAD hoped to be able, in this Volume, to carry the history of Greece down as far as the battle of Knidus ; but I find myself disappointed.

A greater space than I anticipated, has been necessary, not merely to do justice to the closing events of the Peloponnesian war, especially the memorable scenes at Athens after the battle of Arginusæ—but also to explain my views both respecting the Sophists and respecting Sokratés.

It has been hitherto common to treat the Sophists as corruptors of the Greek mind, and to set forth the fact of such corruption, increasing as we descend downwards from the great invasion of Xerxès, as historically certified. Dissenting as I do from former authors, and believing that Grecian history has been greatly misconceived, on both these points—I have been forced to discuss the evidences, and exhibit the reasons for my own way of thinking, at considerable length.

To Sokratés I have devoted one entire Chapter. No smaller space would have sufficed to lay before the reader any tolerable picture of that illustrious man—the rarest intellectual phænomenon of ancient times, and originator of the most powerful scientific impulse which the Greek mind ever underwent.

London, February 1850.

G. G.

CONTENTS.

VOL. VIII.

CHAPTER LXII.

Twenty-first Year of the War.—Oligarchy of Four Hundred at Athens.

	Page
Rally of Athens, during the year after the defeat at Syracuse, b.c. 412	1
Commencement of the conspiracy of the Four Hundred at Athens—Alkibiadēs	2
Order from Sparta to kill Alkibiadēs	3
He escapes, retires to Tissaphernēs, and becomes adviser of the Persians	ib.
He advises the satrap to assist neither of the Grecian parties heartily—but his advice leans towards Athens, with a view to his own restoration	4
Alkibiadēs acts as negotiator for Tissaphernēs at Magnesia	5
Diminution of the rate of pay furnished by Tissaphernēs to the Peloponnesians	6
Alkibiadēs opens correspondence with the Athenian officers at Samos. He originates the scheme of an oligarchical revolution at Athens	8
Conspiracy arranged between the Athenian officer and Alkibiadēs	9
Oligarchical Athenians—the hetæries or political clubs. Peisander is sent to push forward the conspiracy at Athens	11
Credulity of the oligarchical conspirators	12
Opposition of Phrynichus at Samos to the conspirators and to Alkibiadēs	13
Manceuvres and counter-manceuvres of Phrynichus and Alkibiadēs	16
Proceedings of Peisander at Athens—strong opposition among the people both to the conspiracy and to the restoration of Alkibiadēs	18
Unwilling vote of the assembly to relinquish their democracy, under the promise of Persian aid for the war. Peisander is sent back to negotiate with Alkibiadēs	20

	Page
Peisander brings the oligarchical clubs at Athens into organised action against the democracy	21
Peisander leaves Athens for Samos—Antiphon takes the management of the oligarchical conspiracy—Theramenes and Phrynichus	24
Military operations near the Asiatic coast	26
Negotiations of Peisander with Alkibiades	27
Tricks of Alkibiades—he exaggerates his demands with a view of breaking off the negotiation—indignation of the oligarchs against him	29
Reconciliation between Theramenes and the Peloponnesians	31
Third convention concluded between them	32
Third convention compared with the two preceding	33
Loss of Orôpus by Athens	34
Peisander and his colleagues persist in the oligarchical conspiracy, without Alkibiades	35
They attempt to subvert the democracy at Samos—assassination of Hyperbols and others	36
The democracy at Samos is sustained by the Athenian argument	38
The Athenian Parali—defeat of the oligarchical conspiracy at Samos	39
The Paralus is sent to Athens with the news	40
Progress of the oligarchical conspiracy at Athens—dexterous management of Antiphon	41
Language of the conspirators—juggle about naming Five Thousand citizens to exercise the political franchise exclusively	42
Assassination of the popular speakers by Antiphon and the oligarchical party	43
Return of Peisander to Athens—oligarchical government established in several of the allied cities	45
Consummation of the revolution at Athens—last public assembly at Kolonos	46
Abolition of the Graphê Paranomon	48
New government proposed by Peisander—oligarchy of Four Hundred	49
Fictitious and nominal aggregate called the Five Thousand	50
The Four Hundred install themselves in the senate-house, expelling the senators by armed force	51
Remarks on this revolution	53
Attachment to constitutional forms at Athens—use made of this sentiment by Antiphon, to destroy the constitution	56
Demagogues the indispensable counterpoise and antithesis to the oligarchs	57
Proceedings of the Four Hundred in the government	59
They make overtures for peace to Agis, and to the Spartans	60

	Page
They send envoys to the camp at Samos	60
First news of the revolution is conveyed to the camp by Charceas—strong sentiment in the camp against the Four Hundred.....	62
Ardent democratical manifestation, and emphatic oath, taken both by the Athenian armament at Samos and by the Samians.....	63
The Athenian democracy is reconstituted by the armament—public assembly of the soldiers—new generals chosen	64
Alkibiadēs opens correspondence with the democratical armament at Samos	67
Alkibiadēs comes to Samos, on the invitation of the armament ...	68
Confidence placed by the armament in his language and promises—they choose him one of their generals.....	70
New position of Alkibiadēs—present turn of his ambition	71
The envoys of the Four Hundred reach Samos—are indignantly sent back by the armament	72
Eagerness of the armament to sail to Peiræus—is discontinued by Alkibiadēs—his answer to the envoys	74
Dismissive advice of Alkibiadēs—how far it is to be commended as sagacious	75
Envoys sent from Argos to the "Athenian Demos at Samos".....	77
Return of the envoys of the Four Hundred from Samos to Athens—bad prospects of the oligarchy.....	78
Mistrust and discord among the Four Hundred themselves. An opposition party formed under Theramenes	79
Theramenes demands that the Five Thousand shall be made a reality.....	83
Measures of Antiphon and the Four Hundred—their solicitations to Sparta—construction of the fort of Ectoneia, for the admission of a Spartan garrison	85
Unaccountable backwardness of the Lacedæmonians.....	87
Assassination of Phrynichus—Lacedæmonian fleet hovering near Peiræus	89
Rising at Athens against the Four Hundred—demolition of the new fort at Ectoneia.....	91
Decline of the Four Hundred—concessions made by them—renewal of the public Assembly	94
Lacedæmonian fleet threatens Peiræus—passes by to Eubœa	96
Naval battle near Eretria—Athenians defeated—Eubœa revolts ...	97
Dismay at Athens—her ruin inevitable, if the Lacedæmonians had acted with energy	99
The Four Hundred are put down—the democracy in substance restored	101
Moderation of political antipathies, and patriotic spirit, now prevalent	105

	Page
The Five Thousand—a number never exactly realised	106
The Five Thousand—were soon enlarged into universal citizenship	107
Restoration of the complete democracy, all except pay	108
Psephism of Demophantus—democratical oath proscribed	109
Flight of most of the leaders of the Four Hundred to Dekeleia	111
Themistocles stands forward to accuse the remaining leaders of the Four Hundred, especially in reference to the fort at Ectinæia, and the embassy to Sparta	112
Antiphon tried, condemned, and executed	116
Treatment of the Four Hundred generally	118
Favourable judgment of Thucydides on the conduct of the Athe- nians	121
Oligarchy at Athens, democracy at Samos—contrast	123

CHAPTER LXIII.

The Restored Athenian Democracy, after the Deposition of the Four Hundred, down to the Arrival of Cyrus the Younger in Asia Minor.

Embarrassed state of Athens after the Four Hundred	126
Peloponnesian fleet—revolt of Abydos from Athens	ib.
Strombichides goes from Chios to the Hellespont—improved con- dition of the Chians	127
Discontent in the Peloponnesian fleet at Miletus	128
Strombichides returns from Chios to Samos	129
Peloponnesian squadron and force at the Hellespont—revolt of Byzantium from Athens	130
Discontent and meeting against Astyochus at Miletus	131
The Spartan commissioner Lichas enjoins the Milesians to obey Tissaphernes—discontent of the Milesians	132
Mindarus supersedes Astyochus as admiral	133
Phœnician fleet at Aspendus—Duplicity of Tissaphernes	134
Alkibiades at Aspendus—his double game between Tissaphernes and the Athenians	135
Phœnicians sent back from Aspendus without action—motives of Tissaphernes	136
Mindarus leaves Miletus with his fleet—goes to Chios—Thrasyllus and the Athenian fleet at Lesbos	137
Mindarus eludes Thrasyllus, and reaches the Hellespont	138
Athenian Hellespontine squadron escapes from Sestos in the night	142
Thrasyllus and the Athenian fleet at the Hellespont	145
Battle of Kynossema—victory of the Athenian fleet	147

	Page
Rejoicing at Athens for the victory.....	149
Bridge across the Euripus, joining Eubœa with Boœotia	150
Revolt of Kyzikus.....	151
Zeal of Pharnabazus against Athens—importance of Persian money.....	152
Tissaphernês again courts the Peloponnesians.....	153
Alkibiadês returns from Aspêndus to Samos	156
Farther combats at the Hellespont	157
Theramênês sent out with reinforcements from Athens.....	158
Renewed troubles at Korkyra	160
Alkibiadês is seized by Tissaphernês and confined at Sardis.....	161
Escape of Alkibiadês—concentration of the Athenian fleet—Mindarus besieges Kyzikus.....	162
Battle of Kyzikus—victory of the Athenians—Mindarus is slain, and the whole Peloponnesian fleet taken.....	163
Discouragement of the Spartans—proposition to Athens for peace.....	164
The Lacedæmonian Eadîus at Athens—his propositions for peace.....	165
Refused by Athens—opposition of Kleophon.....	166
Grounds of the opposition of Kleophon.....	ib.
Question of policy as it then stood, between war and peace.....	167
Strenuous aid of Pharnabazus to the Peloponnesians—Alkibiadês and the Athenian fleet at the Bosphorus	170
The Athenians occupy Chrysopolis, and levy toll on the ships passing through the Bosphorus	171
The Lacedæmonians are expelled from Thasos	172
Klearchus the Lacedæmonian is sent to Byzantium	173
Thrasyllus sent from Athens to Ionia	174
Thrasyllus and Alkibiadês at the Hellespont	176
Pylus is retaken by the Lacedæmonians—disgrace of the Athenian Anytus for not relieving it	ib.
Capture of Chalkêdon by Alkibiadês and the Athenians	178
Convention concluded by the Athenians with Pharnabazus.....	179
Byzantium captured by the Athenians	181
Pharnabazus conveys some Athenian envoys towards Susa, to make terms with the Great King	182

CHAPTER LXIV.

From the arrival of Cyrus the Younger in Asia Minor down to the Battle of Arginusæ.

Cyrus the younger—effects of his coming down to Asia Minor	184
Pharnabazus detains the Athenian envoys	186
Lyfianfer—Lacedæmonian admiral in Asia	187

	Page
Proceedings of the preceding admiral, Kratesipidas.....	189
Lysander visits Cyrus at Sardis	190
His dexterous policy—he acquires the peculiar esteem of Cyrus ...	191
Abundant pay of the Peloponnesian armament, furnished by Cyrus	194
Factions organized by Lysander among the Asiatic cities.....	ib.
Proceedings of Alkibiadēs in Thracæ and Asia	195
His arrival at Athens	196
Feelings and details connected with his arrival	197
Unanimous welcome with which he is received	198
Effect produced upon Alkibiadēs.....	199
Sentiment of the Athenians towards him	200
Disposition to refrain from dwelling on his previous wrangs, and to give him a new trial	201
Mistaken confidence and intoxication of Alkibiadēs	203
He protects the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries by land, against the garrison of Dekeleia	ib.
Fruitless attempt of Agis to surprise Athens	204
Alkibiadēs sails with an armament to Asia—ill-success at Andros —entire failure in respect to hopes from Persia.....	206
Lysander at Ephesus—his cautious policy, refusing to fight—dis- appointment of Alkibiadēs	207
Alkibiadēs goes to Phokæa, leaving his fleet under the command of Antiochus—oppression by Alkibiadēs at Kymē.....	208
Complaints of the Kymæans at Athens—defeat of Antiochus at Notium during the absence of Alkibiadēs	209
Dissatisfaction and complaint in the armament against Alkibiadēs.	210
Murmur and accusation against him transmitted to Athens.....	211
Alteration of sentiment at Athens—displeasure of the Athenians against him	212
Reasonable grounds of such alteration and displeasure	213
Different behaviour towards Nikias and towards Alkibiadēs.....	215
Alkibiadēs is dismissed from his command—ten generals named to succeed him—he retires to the Chersonese	216
Konon and his colleagues—capture and liberation of the Rhodian Doricus by the Athenians	ib.
Kallikratidas supersedes Lysander—his noble character	219
Murmurs and ill-will against Kallikratidas—energy and rectitude whereby he represses them	220
His spirited behaviour in regard to the Persians	221
His appeal to the Milesians—Pan-hellenic feelings	ib.
He fits out a commanding fleet—his success at Lesbos—he liberates the captives and the Athenian garrison at Mithymna	223
Noble character of this proceeding—exalted Pan-hellenic patriotism of Kallikratidas.....	224

	Page
He blocks up Konon and the Athenian fleet at Mitylène	226
Triumphant position of Kallikratidas	227
Hopeless condition of Konon—his stratagem to send news to Athens and entreat relief	228
Kallikratidas defeats the squadron of Diomedon	230
Prodigious effort of the Athenians to relieve Konon—large Athenian fleet equipped and sent to Arginusæ	231
Kallikratidas withdraws most of his fleet from Mitylène, leaving Eteonikos to continue the blockade	ib.
The two fleets marshaled for battle. Comparative nautical skill, reversed since the beginning of the war	233
Battle of Arginusæ—defeat of the Lacedæmonians—death of Kallikratidas	234
It would have been better for Greece, and even for Athens, if Kallikratidas had been victor at Arginusæ	235
Safe escape of Eteonikos and his fleet from Mitylène to Chios ...	237
Joy of Athens for the victory—indignation arising from the fact that the Athenian seamen on the disabled ships had not been picked up after the battle.....	238
State of the facts about the disabled ships, and the men left in them	240
Despatch of the generals to Athens, affirming that a storm had prevented them from saving the drowning men	242
Justifiable wrath and wounded sympathy of the Athenians—extreme excitement among the relatives of the drowned men.....	ib.
The generals are superseded and directed to come home	244
Examination of the generals before the Senate and the people at Athens	ib.
Debate in the public assembly—Theramenes accuses the generals as guilty of omitting to save the drowning men	246
Effect of the accusation by Theramenes upon the assembly	ib.
Defence of the generals—they affirm that they had commissioned Theramenes himself to undertake the duty.....	248
Reason why the generals had not mentioned this commission in their despatch	249
Different account given by Diodorus	250
Probable version of the way in which the facts really occurred ...	252
Justification of the generals—how far valid?—The alleged storm. Escape of Eteonikos.....	255
Feelings of the Athenian public—how the case stood before them—decision adjourned to a future assembly	258
Occurrence of the festival of Apaturia—the great family solemnity of the Ionic race	260
Burst of feeling at the Apaturia—misrepresented by Xenophanes ...	261

	Page
Proposition of Kallixenus in the senate against the generals— adopted and submitted to the public assembly	264
Injustice of the resolution,—by depriving the generals of the cus- tomary securities for judicial trial. Psephism of Kannon	265
Opposition taken by Euryptolemus on the ground of constitutional form— Graphê Paranómōn	268
Excitement of the assembly—constitutional impediment overruled	ib.
The Prytanes refuse to put the question—their opposition over- ruled, all except that of Sokratēs	271
Altered temper of the assembly when the discussion had begun— amendment moved and developed by Euryptolemus	272
Speech of Euryptolemus	ib.
His amendment is rejected—the proposition of Kallixenus is carried	275
The six generals are condemned and executed	276
Injustice of the proceeding—violation of the democratical maxims and sentiments	277
Earnest repentance of the people soon afterwards—disgrace and end of Kallixenus	278
Causes of the popular excitement	279
Generals—not innocent men	282

CHAPTER LXV.

From the Battle of Arginusæ to the Restoration of the Democracy at Athens, after the Expulsion of the Thirty.

Alleged propositions of peace from Sparta to Athens—doubtful ..	286
Eteonikos at Chios—distress of his seamen—conspiracy sup- pressed	287
Solicitations from Chios and elsewhere that Lysander should be sent out again	288
Arrival of Lysander at Ephesus—zeal of his partisans—Cyrus ..	289
Violent revolution at Miletus by the partisans of Lysander	290
Cyrus goes to visit his dying father—confides his tributes to Ly- sander	291
Inaction of the Athenian fleet after the battle of Arginusæ. Ope- rations of Lysander	292
Both fleets at the Hellespont	293
Athenian fleet at Egospotami	294
Battle of Egospotami—surprise and capture of the entire Athenian fleet	295
Capture of the Athenian commanders, all except Konon	297
Slaughter of the captive generals and prisoners	299

The Athenian fleet supposed to have been betrayed by its own commanders	300
Distress and agony at Athens, when the defeat of Egospotami was made known there	301
Proceedings of Lysander	302
Miserable condition of the Athenian Kleruchs, and of the friends of Athens in the allied dependencies. Suffering in Athens.....	304
Amnesty proposed by Patrokleides, and adopted	305
Oath of mutual harmony sworn in the acropolis	306
Arrival of Lysander. Athens is blocked up by sea and land	307
Resolute holding-out of the Athenians—their propositions for capitulating are refused	308
Pretences of Theramenes—he is sent as envoy—his studied delay. ib.
Misery and famine in Athens—death of Kleophon	310
The famine becomes intolerable—Theramenes is sent to obtain peace on any terms—debate about the terms at Sparta.....	311
Peace is granted by Sparta, against the general sentiment of the allies	312
Surrender of Athens—extreme wretchedness—number of deaths from famine	ib.
Lysander enters Athens—return of the exiles—demolition of the Long Walls—dismantling of Peiræus—fleet given up	313
The exiles and the oligarchical party in Athens—their triumphant behaviour and devotion to Lysander	315
Kritias and other exiles—past life of Kritias	316
Kritias at the head of the oligarchs at Athens	318
Oligarchical leaders named at Athens.....	319
Seizure of Strombichides and other eminent democrats	ib.
Nomination of the Thirty, under the dictation of Lysander	321
Conquest of Samos by Lysander—oligarchy restored there	323
Triumphant return of Lysander to Sparta—his prodigious ascendancy throughout Greece	324
Proceedings of the Thirty at Athens—feelings of oligarchical men like Plato	325
The Thirty begin their executions—Strombichides and the imprisoned generals put to death—other democrats also	326
Senate appointed by the Thirty—is only trusted to act under their intimidation. Numerous executions without trial.....	327
The senate began by condemning willingly every one brought before them	328
Discord among the Thirty—dissentient views of Kritias and Theramenes.....	329
Lacedæmonian garrison introduced—multiplied executions by Kritias and the Thirty	330

	Page
Opposition of Theramenes to these measures—violence and rapacity still further increased—rich and oligarchical men put to death	330
Plan of Kritias to gain adherents by forcing men to become accomplices in deeds of blood—resistance of Sokratēs	332
Terror and discontent in the city—the Thirty nominate a body of Three Thousand as partisan hoplites	334
They disarm the remaining hoplites of the city	335
Murders and spoliation by the Thirty. Seizure of the metics ..	336
Seizure of Lykias the rhetor and his brother Polemarchus. The former escapes—the latter is executed	337
Increased exasperation of Kritias and the majority of the Thirty against Theramenes	339
Theramenes is denounced by Kritias in the senate—speech of Kritias	340
Reply of Theramenes	342
Extreme violence of Kritias and the Thirty	344
Condemnation of Theramenes	345
Death of Theramenes—remarks on his character	346
Increased tyranny of Kritias and the Thirty	348
The Thirty forbid intellectual teaching	350
Sokratēs and the Thirty	352
Growing insecurity of the Thirty	ib.
Gradual alteration of feeling in Greece since the capture of Athens	353
Demand by the allies of Sparta to share in the spoils of the war—refused by Sparta	354
Unparalleled ascendancy of Lysander	356
His overweening ambition—oppressive dominion of Sparta	ib.
Disgust excited in Greece by the enormities of the Thirty	357
Opposition to Lysander at Sparta—King Pausanias	358
Kallikratidas compared with Lysander	359
Sympathy at Thebes and elsewhere with the Athenian exiles	361
Thrasybulus seizes Phylē—repulses the Thirty in their attack	ib.
Further success of Thrasybulus—the Thirty retreat to Athens	362
Discord among the oligarchy at Athens—seizure of the Eleusinians	364
Thrasybulus establishes himself in Peiræus	365
The Thirty attack him and are defeated—Kritias is slain	367
Colloquy during the burial-truce—language of Kleokritus	369
Discouragement of the oligarchs at Athens—deposition of the Thirty and appointment of the Ten—the Thirty go to Eleusis ..	370
The Ten carry on the war against the exiles	372
Increasing strength of Thrasybulus	373
Arrival of Lysander in Attica with a Spartan force	374
Straitened condition of the exiles in Peiræus	375

Spartan King Pausanias conducts an expedition into Attica: opposed to Lysander.....	375
His dispositions unfavourable to the oligarchy: reaction against the Thirty.....	376
Pausanias attacks Peireus: his partial success.....	378
Peace-party in Athens—sustained by Pausanias.....	379
Pacification granted by Pausanias and the Spartan authorities.....	380
The Spartans evacuate Attica—Thrasybulus and the exiles are restored—harangue of Thrasybulus.....	382
Restoration of the democracy.....	383
Capture of Eleusis—entire reunion of Attica—flight of the survivors of the Thirty.....	ib.

CHAPTER LXVI.

From the Restoration of the Democracy to the Death of Alkibiades.

Miserable condition of Athens during the two preceding years.....	398
Immediate relief caused by the restoration—unanimous sentiment towards the renewed democracy.....	399
Amnesty—treatment of the Thirty and the Ten.....	401
Disfranchising proposition of Phormion.....	403
The proposition rejected—speech composed by Lysias against it.....	404
Revision of the laws—the Nomothetæ.....	405
Decree that no criminal inquiries should be carried back beyond the archonship of Eukleides— s.c. 403.....	407
Oath taken by the senate and the dikasts modified.....	408
Farther precautions to ensure the observance of the amnesty.....	409
Absence of harsh reactionary feeling, both after the Thirty and after the Four Hundred.....	411
Generous and reasonable behaviour of the Demos—contrasted with that of the oligarchy.....	413
Care of the people to preserve the rights of private property.....	416
Repayment to the Lacedæmonians.....	417
The Horsemen or Knights.....	ib.
Revision of the laws—Nikomachos.....	419
Adoption of the fuller Ionic alphabet, in place of the old Attic, for writing up the laws.....	421
Memorable epoch of the archonship of Eukleides. The rhetor Lysias.....	422
Other changes at Athens—abolition of the Board of Hellenotamæ—restriction of the right of citizenship.....	423
Honorary reward to Thrasybulus and the exiles.....	425

	Page
Position and views of Alkibiadēs in Asia.....	426
Artaxerxes Mnemon the new king of Persia. Plans of Cyrus— Alkibiadēs wishes to reveal them at Susa	427
The Lacedæmonians conjointly with Cyrus require Pharnabazus to put him to death	ib.
Assassination of Alkibiadēs by order of Pharnabazus	429
Character of Alkibiadēs	430

CHAPTER LXVII.

The Drama.—Rhetoric and Dialectics.—The Sophists.

Athens immediately after Eukleidēs—political history little known	434
Extraordinary development of dramatic genius	ib.
Gradual enlargement of tragedy	435
Abundance of new tragedy at Athens	436
Accessibility of the theatre to the poorest citizens	438
Theōrikon or festival-pay	439
Effect of the tragedies on the public mind of Athens	440
Æschylus, Sophoklēs and Euripidēs—modifications of tragedy.....	441
Popularity arising from expenditure of money on the festivals.....	444
Growth and development of Comedy at Athens.....	445
Comic poets before Aristophanēs—Kratinos, etc.	447
Exposure of citizens by name in Comedy—forbidden for a time— then renewed—Kratēs and the milder Comedy	449
Aristophanēs.....	450
Comedy in its effect on the Athenian mind	451
Mistaken estimate of the comic writers, as good witnesses or just critics	454
Aversion of Solon to the drama when nascent	457
Dramatic poetry as compared with the former kinds of poetry.....	458
Ethical sentiment, interest and debate, infused into the drama ...	460
The drama formed the stage of transition to rhetoric, dialectics, and ethical philosophy	462
Practical value and necessity of rhetorical accomplishments.....	ib.
Rhetoric and dialectics	465
Empedoklēs of Agrigentum—first name in the rhetorical movement ..	ib.
Zeno of Elea—first name in the dialectical movement	466
Elvatic school—Parmenidēs.....	467
Zeno and Melissos—their dialectic attacks upon the opponents of Parmenidēs.....	468
Zeno at Athens—his conversation both with Periklēs and with Sokratēs.....	470
Early manifestation, and powerful efficacy, of the negative arm in Grecian philosophy	471

Rhetoric and dialectics—men of active life and men of speculation— two separate lines of intellectual activity.....	473
Standing antithesis between these two intellectual classes—vein of ignorance at Athens, hostile to both.....	475
Gradual enlargement of the field of education at Athens—increased knowledge and capacity of the musical teachers.....	477
The Sophists—true Greek meaning of that word—invidious senti- ment implied in it.....	479
The name Sophist applied by Plato in a peculiar sense, in his po- lemics against the eminent paid teachers.....	481
Misconceptions arising from Plato's peculiar use of the word Sophist.....	485
Paid teachers or Sophists of the Sokratic age—Protagoras, Gor- gias, &c.....	486
Plato and the Sophists—two different points of view—the reformer and theorist against the practical teacher.....	488
The Sophists were professional teachers for active life, like Isokrates and Quintilian.....	491
Misinterpretations of the dialogues of Plato as carrying evidence against the Sophists.....	495
The Sophists as paid teachers—no proof that they were greedy or exorbitant—proceeding of Protagoras.....	497
The Sophists as rhetorical teachers—groundless accusations against them in that capacity, made also against Sokrates, Isokrates and others.....	499
Thrasymachus—his rhetorical precepts—Prodikos—his discrimina- tion of words analogous in meaning.....	501
Protagoras—his treatise on Truth—his opinions about the Pagan gods.....	503
His view of the cognitive process and its relative nature.....	504
Gorgias—his treatise on physical subjects—misrepresentations of the scope of it.....	507
Unfounded accusations against the Sophists.....	509
They were not a sect or school, with common doctrines or method: they were a profession, with strong individual peculiarities.....	515
The Athenian character was not really corrupted, between 480 B.C. and 405 B.C.....	511
Prodikos—The Choice of Herakles.....	515
Protagoras—real estimate exhibited of him by Plato.....	518
Hippias of Elis—how he is represented by Plato.....	524
Gorgias, Polos, and Kallikles.....	526
Doctrine advanced by Polos.....	527
Doctrine advanced by Kallikles—anti-social.....	528
Kallikles is not a Sophist.....	529

	Page
The doctrine put into his mouth could never have been laid down in any public lecture among the Athenians	531
Doctrine of Thrasymachus in the 'Republic' of Plato	536
Such doctrine not common to all the Sophists—what is offensive in it is the manner in which it is put forward	537
Opinion of Thrasymachus afterwards brought out by Glaucon—with less brutality and much greater force of reason	539
Plato against the Sophists generally. His category of accusation comprehends all society, with all the poets and statesmen	541
It is unjust to try either the Sophists, or the statesmen of Athens, by the standard of Plato	543
Plato distinctly denies that Athenian corruption was to be imputed to the Sophists	544
The Sophists were not teachers of mere words, apart from action	545
General good effect of their teaching upon the youth	547
Great reputation of the Sophists—evidence of respect for intellect and of a good state of public sentiment	548

CHAPTER LXVIII.

Sokratēs.

Different spirit shown towards Sokratēs and towards the Sophists	551
Birth and family of Sokratēs	552
His physical and moral qualities	ib.
Xenophon and Plato as witnesses	555
Their pictures of Sokratēs are in the main accordant	556
Habits of Sokratēs	558
Leading peculiarities of Sokratēs	559
His constant publicity of life and indiscriminate conversation	ib.
Reason why Sokratēs was shown up by Aristophanēs on the stage	561
His persuasion of a special religious mission	562
His Demon or Genius—other inspirations	565
Oracle from Delphi declaring that no man was wiser than he	567
His mission to test the false conceit of wisdom in others	569
Confluence of the religious motive with the inquisitive and intellectual impulse in his mind—numerous enemies whom he made ...	571
Sokratēs a religious missionary, doing the work of philosophy	572
Intellectual peculiarities of Sokratēs	ib.
He opened ethics as a new subject of scientific discussion	575
Circumstances which turned the mind of Sokratēs towards ethical speculations	576
Limits of scientific study as laid down by Sokratēs	577
He confines study to human affairs, as distinguished from divine—to man and society	579

Importance of the innovation—multitude of new and accessible phenomena brought under discussion.....	581
Innovations of Sokratēs as to method—dialectic method—inductive discourses—definitions.....	582
Commencement of analytical consciousness of the mental operations—genera and species.....	584
Sokratēs compared with previous philosophers.....	586
Great step made by Sokratēs in laying the foundation of formal logic, afterwards expanded by Plato, and systematised by Aristotle.....	589
Dialectical process employed by Sokratēs—essential connexion between method and subject.....	591
Essential connexion also between the dialectic process and the logical distribution of subject-matter—One in Many and Many in One.....	593
Persuasion of religious mission in Sokratēs, prompting him to extend his colloquial cross-examination to noted men.....	595
His cross-examining purpose was not confined to noted men, but of universal application.....	ib.
Leading ideas which directed the scrutiny of Sokratēs—contrast between the special professions and the general duties of social life.....	597
Platonic dialogues—discussion whether virtue is teachable.....	599
Conceit of knowledge without real knowledge—universal prevalence of it.....	600
Such confident persuasion, without science, belonged at that time to astronomy and physics, as well as to the subjects of man and society—it is now confined to the latter.....	602
Sokratēs first lays down the idea of ethical science, comprising the appropriate ethical end with theory and precepts.....	605
Earnestness with which Sokratēs inculcated self-examination—effect of his conversation upon others.....	607
Preceptorial and positive exhortation of Sokratēs chiefly brought out by Xenophon.....	612
This was not the peculiarity of Sokratēs—his powerful method of stirring up the analytical faculties.....	613
Negative and indirect scrutiny of Sokratēs produced strong thirst, and active efforts, for the attainment of positive truth.....	614
Inductive process of scrutiny, and Baconian spirit of Sokratēs.....	617
Socratic method tends to create minds capable of forming conclusions for themselves—not to plant conclusions ready-made.....	621
Grecian dialectics—their many-sided handling of subjects—force of the negative arm.....	622
The subjects to which they were applied—man and society—essentially required such handling—reason why.....	ib.
Real distinction and variance between Sokratēs and the Sophists.....	625

	Page
Prodigious efficacy of Sokratēs in forming new philosophical minds	626
General theory of Sokratēs on ethics—he resolved virtue into knowledge or wisdom	627
This doctrine defective as stating a part for the whole	628
He was led to this general doctrine by the analogy of special professions	631
Constant reference of Sokratēs to duties of practice and detail	632
The derivative reasonings of Sokratēs were of larger range than his general doctrine	633
Political opinions of Sokratēs	634
Long period during which Sokratēs exercised his vocation as a public converser	636
Accusation against him by Melētus, Anytus and Lykon	637
The real ground for surprise is, that that accusation had not been preferred before	638
Inevitable unpopularity incurred by Sokratēs in his mission	ib.
It was only from the general toleration of the Athenian democracy and population, that he was allowed to go on so long	639
Particular circumstances which brought on the trial of Sokratēs	641
Private offence of Anytus	ib.
Unpopularity arising to Sokratēs from his connexion with Kritias and Alkibiadēs	643
Enmity of the poets and rhetors to Sokratēs	645
Indictment—grounds of the accusers—effect of the 'Clouds' of Aristophanēs, in creating prejudice against Sokratēs	646
Accusation of corruption in teaching was partly founded on political grounds	647
Perversion of the poets alleged against him	649
Remarks of Xenophon upon these accusations	650
The charges touch upon the defective point of the Socratic Ethical theory	651
His political strictures	652
The verdict against Sokratēs was brought upon him partly by his own concurrence	653
Small majority by which he was condemned	654
Sokratēs defended himself like one who did not care to be acquitted	655
The 'Platonic Apology'	656
Sentiment of Sokratēs about death	659
Effect of his defence upon the Dikasts	661
Assertion of Xenophon that Sokratēs might have been acquitted if he had chosen it	663
The sentence—how passed in Athenian procedure	665
Sokratēs is called upon to propose some counter-penalty against himself—his behaviour	ib.

Aggravation of feeling in the Dikasts against him in consequence of his behaviour.....	667
Sentence of death—resolute adherence of Sokratēs to his own convictions	ib.
Satisfaction of Sokratēs with the sentence, on deliberate conviction	668
Sokratēs in prison for thirty days—he refuses to accept the means of escape—his serene death	670
Originality of Sokratēs.....	671
Views taken of Sokratēs as a moral preacher and as a sceptic—the first inadequate—the second incorrect	672
Sokratēs, positive and practical in his end—negative only in his means.....	676
Two points on which Sokratēs is systematically negative.....	ib.
Method of Sokratēs, of universal application.....	678
Condemnation of Sokratēs—one of the misdeeds of intolerance ...	679
Extenuating circumstances—principle of orthodox enforcement recognised generally in ancient times.....	ib.
Number of personal enemies made by Sokratēs	681
His condemnation brought on by himself	ib.
The Athenians did not repent it	683
Appendix to Vol. VIII.	685

HISTORY OF GREECE.

PART II.

CHAPTER LXII.

TWENTY-FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR.—OLIGARCHY OF FOUR HUNDRED AT ATHENS.

ABOUT a year elapsed between the catastrophe of the Athenians near Syracuse and the victory which they gained over the Milésians, on landing near Milétus (from September 413 B.C., to September 412 B.C.). After the first of those two events, the complete ruin of Athens had appeared both to her enemies and to herself, impending and irreparable. But so astonishing, so rapid, and so energetic, had been her rally, that at the time of the second, she was found again carrying on a tolerable struggle, though with impaired resources and on a purely defensive system, against enemies both bolder and more numerous than ever. Nor is there any reason to doubt that her foreign affairs might have gone on thus improving, had they not been endangered at this critical moment by the treason of a fraction of her own citizens—bringing her again to the brink of ruin, from which she was only rescued by the incompetence of her enemies.

Rally of Athens, during the year after the defeat at Syracuse, B.C. 412.

Commencement of the conspiracy of the Four Hundred at Athens—
Alkibiadès.

That treason took its first rise from the exile Alkibiadès. I have already recounted how this man, alike unprincipled and energetic, had thrown himself with his characteristic ardour into the service of Sparta, and had indicated to her the best means of aiding Syracuse, of inflicting positive injury upon Athens, and lastly, of provoking revolt among the Ionic allies of the latter. It was by his boldness and personal connections in Ionia that the revolt of Chios and Milétus had been determined.

In the course of a few months, however, he had greatly lost the confidence of the Spartans. The revolt of the Asiatic dependencies of Athens had not been accomplished so easily and rapidly as he had predicted: Chalkidens, the Spartan commander with whom he had acted, was defeated and slain near Milétus: the Ephor Endius, by whom he was chiefly protected, retained his office only for one year, and was succeeded by other Ephors¹ just about the end of September, or beginning of October, when the Athenians gained their second victory near Milétus, and were on the point of blocking up the town; while his personal enemy King Agis still remained to persecute him. Moreover, there was in the character of this remarkable man something so essentially selfish, vain, and treacherous, that no one could ever rely upon his faithful co-operation. And as soon as any reverse occurred, that very energy and ability, which seldom failed him, made those with whom he acted the more ready to explain the mischance by supposing that he had betrayed them.

¹ See Thucyd. v. 36.

It was thus that, after the defeat of Milêtus, King Agis was enabled to discredit Alkibiadês as a traitor to Sparta; upon which the new Ephors sent out at once an order to the general Astyochus, to put him to death¹. Alkibiadês had now an opportunity of tasting the difference between Spartan and Athenian procedure. Though his enemies at Athens were numerous and virulent,—with all the advantage, so unspeakable in political warfare, of being able to raise the cry of irreligion against him; yet the utmost which they could obtain was, that he should be summoned home to take his trial before the Dikastery. At Sparta, without any positive ground of crimination and without any idea of judicial trial, his enemies procure an order that he shall be put to death.

Order from Sparta to kill Alkibiadês.

Alkibiadês however got intimation of the order in time to retire to Tissaphernês. Probably he was forewarned by Astyochus himself, not ignorant that so monstrous a deed would greatly alienate the Chians and Milêsiens, nor foreseeing the full mischief which his desertion would bring upon Sparta. With that flexibility of character which enabled him at once to master and take up a new position, Alkibiadês soon found means to insinuate himself into the confidence of the satrap. He began now to play a game neither Spartan, nor Athenian, but Persian and anti-Hellenic: a game of duplicity to which Tissaphernês himself was spontaneously disposed, but to which the intervention of a dexterous Grecian negotiator was indispensable. It was by no means the interest of the Great King (Alkibiadès urged) to lend such effective aid to either of the contending parties as would enable it to crush the other: he ought neither to bring up the Phenician fleet to the aid of the Lacedæmonians, nor to furnish that abundant pay which would procure for them indefinite levies of new Grecian force. He ought so to feed and prolong the war, as to make each party an instrument of exhaustion and impoverishment against the other, and thus himself to rise on the ruins of both: first to break down the Athenian empire by means of the Peloponnesians, and afterwards to expel the Peloponnesians themselves—which might be effected with little trouble if they were weakened by a protracted previous struggle¹.

He escapes, retires to Tissaphernês, and becomes adviser of the Persians.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 45. Καὶ ὅτε αὐτὸς ἀφικόμενος ἐπιστάδης πρὸς Ἀστυόχου ἐκ Λακεδαιμονίας ὄντος ἀπακρίβεται (ἦν γὰρ καὶ τὸ ἄγιναι ἐχθρὸς καὶ ἅλλως ἀπίστος ἐφαίνετο), &c.

He advises
the satrap to assist neither of the Grecian parties heartily—but his advice leans towards Athens, with a view to his own
restoration.

Thus far Alkibiadès gave advice, as a Persian counsellor, not unsuitable to the policy of the court of Susa. But he seldom gave advice without some view to his own profit, ambition, or antipathies. Cast off unceremoniously by the Lacedæmonians, he was now driven to seek restoration in his own country. To accomplish this object, it was necessary not only that he should preserve her from being altogether ruined, but that he should present himself to the Athenians as one who could, if restored, divert the aid of Tissaphernès from Lacedæmon to Athens. Accordingly, he farther suggested to the satrap, that while it was essential to his interest not to permit land power and maritime power to be united in the same hands, whether Lacedæmonian or Athenian—it would nevertheless be found easier to arrange matters with the empire and pretensions of Athens, than with those of Lacedæmon. The former (he argued) neither sought nor professed any other object than the subjection of her own maritime dependencies, in return for which she would willingly leave all the Asiatic Greeks in the hands of the Great King; while the latter, forswearing all idea of empire, and professing ostentatiously to aim at the universal enfranchisement of every Grecian city, could not with the smallest consistency conspire to deprive the Asiatic Greeks of the same privilege. This view appeared to be countenanced by the objection which Theramènes and many of the Peloponnesian officers had taken to the first convention concluded by Chalkideus and Alkibiadès with Tissaphernès; objections afterwards renewed by Lichas even against the second modified convention of Theramènes, and accompanied with an indignant protest against the idea of surrendering to the Great King all the territory which had been ever possessed by his predecessors¹.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 45, 46.

All these latter arguments, whereby Alkibiadès professed to create in the mind of the satrap a preference for Athens, were either futile or founded on false assumptions. For on the one hand, even Lichas never refused to concur in surrendering the Asiatic Greeks to Persia—while on the other hand, the empire of Athens, so long as she retained any empire, was pretty sure to be more formidable to Persia than any efforts undertaken by Sparta under the disinterested pretence of liberating generally the acts as negotiator for Tissaphernès at Magnesia.

Alkibiadès

¹ Thucyd. viii. 46-52.

Grecian cities. Nor did Tissaphernès at all lend himself to any such positive impression ; though he felt strongly the force of the negative recommendations of Alkibiadès—that he should do no more for the Peloponnesians than was sufficient to feed the war, without ensuring to them either a speedy or a decisive success : or rather, this duplicity was so congenial to his Oriental mind, that there was no need of Alkibiadès to recommend it. The real use of the Athenian exile, was to assist the satrap in carrying it into execution ; and to provide for him those plausible pretences and justifications, which he was to issue as a substitute for effective supplies of men and money. Established along with Tissaphernès at Magnesia—the same place which had been occupied about fifty years before by another Athenian exile, equally unprincipled and yet abler, Themistoklès—Alkibiadès served as interpreter of his views in all his conversations with the Greeks, and appeared to be thoroughly in his confidence : an appearance of which he took advantage to pass himself off falsely upon the Athenians at Samos as having the power of turning Persian wealth to the aid of Athens.

Diminution of the rate of pay furnished by Tissapher-nès to the Peloponnesians.

The first payment made by Tissaphernès, immediately after the capture of Iasus and of the revolted Amorgès, to the Peloponnesians at Milétus, was at the rate of one drachma per head. But notice was given that for the future it would be reduced one half ; a reduction for which Alkibiadès undertook to furnish a reason. The Athenians (he urged) gave no more than half a drachma ; not because they could not afford more, but because, from their long experience of nautical affairs, they had found that higher pay spoiled the discipline of the seamen by leading them into excesses and over-indulgence, as well as by inducing too ready leave of absence to be granted, in confidence that the high pay would bring back the men when called for¹. As he probably never expected that such subterfuges (employed at a moment when Athens was so poor that she could not even pay the half drachma per head) would carry conviction to any one—so he induced Tissaphernês to strengthen their effect by individual bribes to the generals and trierarchs; a mode of argument which was found effectual in silencing the complaints of all, with the single exception of the Syracusan Hermokratês. In regard to other Grecian cities who sent to ask pecuniary aid, and especially Chios, Alkibiadês spoke out with less reserve. They had been hitherto compelled to contribute to Athens (he said), and now that they had shaken off this payment, they must not shrink from imposing upon themselves equal or even greater burthens in their own defence. Nor was it anything less (he added) than sheer impudence in the Chians, the richest people in Greece—if they required a foreign military force for their protection, to require at the same time that others should furnish the means of paying it².

¹ Thucyd. viii. 45. Οἱ δὲ τὰς κατὰ ἀποδείκνυσιν, ἐπολιπόντες ἐκ ἀμείνων τὸν προσφελλόμενον μισθόν.

This passage is both doubtful in the text and difficult in the translation. - Among the many different explanations given by the commentators, I adopt that of Dr. Arnold as the least unsatisfactory, though without any confidence that it is right.

² Thucyd. viii. 45. Τὰς δὲ πόλεις δευόμεναι χρημάτων ἀπέλυσαν, αὐτοὺς ἀπαγγέλλων ἐπὶ τοῦ Τισσαφέρνηου, ὅτι οἱ μὲν Χίοι ἀναίχιστοι εἶεν, πλουσιώτατοι ὄντες τῶν Ἑλλήνων, ἐπικουρίῃ δὲ ἡμῖν παρόμενοι ἀξιοῦσι καὶ

At the same time, however, he intimated—by way of keeping up hopes for the future—that Tissaphernès was at present carrying on the war at his own cost; but if hereafter remittances should arrive from Susa, the full rate of pay would be resumed, with the addition of aid to the Grecian cities in any other way which could be reasonably asked. To this promise was added an assurance that the Phenician fleet was now under equipment, and would shortly be brought up to their aid, so as to give them a superiority which would render resistance hopeless: an assurance not merely deceitful but mischievous, since it was employed to dissuade them from all immediate action, and to paralyse their navy during its moments of fullest vigour and efficiency. Even the reduced rate of pay was furnished so irregularly, and the Peloponnesian force kept so starved, that the duplicity of the satrap became obvious to every one, and was only carried through by his bribery to the officers¹.

While Alkibiadès, as the confidential agent and interpreter of Tissaphernès, was carrying on this anti-Peloponnesian policy through the autumn and winter of 412–411 B.C.—partly during the stay of the Peloponnesian fleet at Miletus, partly after it had moved to Knidus and Rhodes—he was at the same time opening correspondence with the Athenian officers at Samos. His breach with the Peloponnesians, as well as his ostensible position in the service of Tissaphernès, were facts well-known among the Athenian armament; and his scheme was, to procure both restoration and renewed power in his native city, by representing himself as competent to bring over to her the aid and alliance of Persia, through his ascendancy over the mind of the satrap. His hostility to the democracy, however, was so generally known, that he despaired of accomplishing his return unless he could connect it with an oligarchical revolution; which, moreover, was not less gratifying to his sentiment of vengeance for the past, than to his ambition for the future. Accordingly he sent over a private message to the officers and trierarchs at Samos, several of them doubtless his personal friends, desiring to be remembered to the "best men" in the armament—such was one of the standing phrases by which oligarchical men knew and described each other—and intimating his anxious wish to come again as a citizen among them, bringing with him Tissaphernès as their ally. But he would come only on condition of the formation of an oligarchical government; nor would he ever again set foot amidst the odious democracy to whom he owed his banishment¹.

Alkibiadès opens correspondence with the Athenian officers at Samos. He originates the scheme of an oligarchical revolution at Athens.

τοῖς σώμασι καὶ τοῖς χρήμασι ἄλλους ὑπὲρ τῆς ἐκείνου εὐεχθείας καθυστεροῦν.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 46. Τὴν τε τροφὴν καὶ τὴν ἐπὶ τοῖς Πελοποννησίοις καὶ ναυμαχίαις αἰεὶ εἶναι ἄλλα καὶ τοὺς Φουρίστους οὕτω φάσκοντες ἔχειν καὶ ἐκ περιστάσεως ἠγωνισάσθαι ἐφάρτε τοὺς πράγματα καὶ τὴν ἀκρὴν τοῦ ναυτικοῦ αὐτῶν ἀφείλετο, γενομένη καὶ πάλιν ἰσχυρὰς, τὰ τε ἄλλα, καταφανέστερον δὲ ὅτι λαοδάνει, οὐκ ἀνδρῶν ἐντοπιόμην.

Such was the first originating germ of that temporary calamity, which so near brought Athens to absolute ruin, called the Oligarchy of Four Hundred: a suggestion from the same exile who had already so deeply wounded his country by sending Conspiracy arranged between the Athenian officer and Alkibiades.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 47. Τὰ μὲν καὶ Ἀλκιβιάδου προστίμψαντες λόγους εἰς τοὺς ἀναστατάτους αἰεὶς (Ἀθηναίους) ἄνθρωποι, ὥστε μηχανῆσαι περὶ αἰνῶν εἰς τοὺς βελτίστους τῶν ἀνθρώπων, ὅτι ἐπ' ὀλιγαρχίᾳ βασιλεύει, καὶ οὐ ποιησὶν οὐδὲ δημοκρατίᾳ τῇ αὐτῶν ἐκβαλόντῃ, κατελθὼν, &c.

² Thucyd. viii. 47.

Gylippus to Syracuse, and the Lacedæmonian garrison to Dekeleia. As yet, no man in Samos had thought of a revolution; but the moment that the idea was thus started, the trierarchs and wealthy men in the armament caught at it with avidity. To subvert the democracy for their own profit, and to be rewarded for doing so with the treasures of Persia as a means of carrying on the war against the Peloponnesians—was an extent of good fortune greater than they could possibly have hoped. Amidst the exhaustion of the public treasure at Athens, and the loss of tribute from her dependencies, it was now the private proprietors, and most of all, the wealthy proprietors—upon whom the cost of military operations fell; from which burthen they here saw the prospect of relief, coupled with increased chance of victory. Elate with so tempting a promise, a deputation of them crossed over from Samos to the mainland to converse personally with Alkibiadès, who again renewed his assurances in person, that he would bring not only Tissaphernès, but the Great King himself, into active alliance and co-operation with Athens, provided they would put down the Athenian democracy, which he affirmed that the king could not possibly trust¹. He doubtless did not omit to set forth the other side of the alternative; that if the proposition were refused, Persian aid would be thrown heartily into the scale of the Peloponnesians: in which case, there was no longer any hope of safety for Athens.

On the return of the deputation with these fresh assurances, the oligarchical men in Samos came together, both in greater number and with redoubled ardour, to take their measures for subverting the democracy. They even ventured to speak of the project openly among the mass of the armament, who listened to it with nothing but aversion; but who were silenced at least, though not satisfied, by being told that the Persian treasury would be thrown open to them on condition, and only on condition, that they would relinquish their democracy. Such was at this time the indispensable need of foreign money for the purposes of the war—such was the certainty of ruin, if the Persian treasure went to the aid of the enemy—that the most democratical Athenian might well hesitate when the alternative was thus laid before him. The oligarchical conspirators, however, knew well that they had the feeling of the armament altogether against them—that the best which they could expect from it was a reluctant acquiescence—and that they must accomplish the revolution by their own hands and management. They formed themselves into a political confederacy (or Hetaeria) for the purpose of discussing the best measures towards their end. It was resolved to send a deputation to Athens, with Peisander¹ at the head, to make known the new Oligarchical Athenians—the histories or political clubs. Peisander is sent to push forward the conspiracy at Athens.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 48.

¹ It is asserted in an Oration of Lyfias (Orat. xlv. Δέμως Καταλύσεως Ἀπολογία, v. 3, p. 766 Reisk.) that Phrynichus and Peisander embarked in this oligarchical conspiracy for the purpose of getting clear of previous crimes committed under the democracy. But there is nothing to countenance such an assertion, and the narrative of Thucydides gives quite a different colour to their behaviour.

Peisander was now serving with the armament at Samos; moreover his forwardness and energy (presently to be described) in taking the formidable initiative of putting down the Athenian democracy, is to me quite sufficient evidence that the taunts of the comic writers against his prospects, and to put the standing oligarchical clubs (Heteries) into active co-operation for the purpose of violently breaking up the democracy; and farther, to establish oligarchical governments in all the remaining dependencies of Athens. They imagined that these dependencies would be thus induced to remain faithful to her, perhaps even that some of those which had already revolted might come back to their allegiance—when once she should be relieved from her democracy and placed under the rule of her “best and most virtuous citizens.”

Hitherto, the bargain tendered for acceptance had been—subversion of the Athenian democracy and restoration of Alkibiadēs, on one hand—against hearty co-operation, and a free supply of gold, from Persia, on the other. But what security was there that such bargain would be realised—or that when the first part should have been brought to pass, the second would follow? There was absolutely no security except the word of Alkibiadēs: very little to be trusted, even when promising what was in his own power to perform, as we may recollect from his memorable dealing with the Lacedæmonian envoys at Athens—and on the present occasion, vouching for something in itself extravagant and preposterous. For what reasonable motive could be imagined to make the Great King shape his counsellors are unfounded. Xenophon in the Symposium repeats this taunt (ii. 14), which also appears in Aristophanes, Eupolis, Plato Comicus, and others: see the passages collected in Meineke, Histor. Critic. Comicor. Græcorum, vol. i. p. 178, &c.

Modern writers on Grecian history often repeat such bitter jests as if they were so much genuine and trustworthy evidence against the person libeled.

Credulity of the oligarchical conspirators.

foreign policy according to the interests of Alkibiadês—or to inspire him with such lively interest in the substitution of oligarchy for democracy at Athens? This was a question which the oligarchical conspirators at Samos not only never troubled themselves to raise, but which they had every motive to suppress. The suggestion of Alkibiadês coincided fully with their political interest and ambition. Their object was to put down the democracy, and get possession of the government for themselves—a purpose, towards which the promise of Persian gold, if they could get it accredited, was inestimable as a stepping-stone, whether it afterwards turned out to be a delusion or not. The probability is that having a strong interest in believing it themselves, and a still stronger interest in making others believe it, they talked each other into a sincere persuasion. Without adverting to this fact, we should be at a loss to understand how the word of such a man as Alkibiadês, on such a matter, could be so implicitly accepted as to set in motion a whole train of novel and momentous events.

There was one man, and one man alone so far as we know, who ventured openly to call it in question. This was Phrynichus, one of the generals of the fleet, who had recently given valuable counsel after the victory of Milêtus; a clear-sighted and sagacious man, but personally hostile to Alkibiadês, and thoroughly seeing through his character and projects. Though Phrynichus was afterwards one of the chief organizers of the oligarchical movement, when it became detached from and hostile to Alkibiadês—yet under the actual circumstances he

Opposition
of Phrynichus at Sa-mos to the conspirators and to Alkibiadês.

discountenanced it altogether¹. Alkibiadēs (he said) had no attachment to oligarchical government rather than to democratical; nor could he be relied on for standing by it after it should have been set up. His only purpose was, to make use of the oligarchical conspiracy now forming, for his own restoration; which, if brought to pass, could not fail to introduce political discord into the camp—the greatest misfortune that could at present happen. As to the Persian king, it was unreasonable to expect that he would put himself out of his way to aid the Athenians, his old enemies, in whom he had no confidence—while he had the Peloponnesians present as allies, with a good naval force and powerful cities in his own territory, from whom he had never experienced either insult or annoyance. Moreover the dependencies of Athens—upon whom it was now proposed to confer simultaneously with Athens herself, the blessing of oligarchical government—would receive that boon with indifference. Those who had already revolted, would not come back; those who yet remained faithful, would not be the more inclined to remain so longer. Their object would be to obtain autonomy, either under oligarchy or democracy, as the case might be. Assuredly they would not expect better treatment from an oligarchical government at Athens, than from a democratical; for they knew that those self-styled “good and vir-tuous" men, who would form the oligarchy, were, as ministers of democracy, the chief advisers and instigators of the people to iniquitous deeds; most commonly for nothing but their own individual profit. From an Athenian oligarchy, the citizens of these dependencies had nothing to expect but violent executions without any judicial trial; but under the democracy, they could obtain shelter and the means of appeal, while their persecutors were liable to restraint and chastisement, from the people and the popular Dikasteries. Such (Phrynichus affirmed on his own personal knowledge) was the genuine feeling among the dependencies of Athens¹. Having thus shown the calculations of the conspirators—as to Alkibiadēs, as to Persia, and as to the allied dependencies—to be all illusory, Phrynichus concluded by entering his decided protest against adopting the propositions of Alkibiadēs.

¹ Phrynichus is affirmed in an Oration of Lysias to have been originally poor, keeping sheep in the country part of Attica; then to have resided in the city, and practised what was called syrophoneia, or false and vexatious accusation: before the Dikastery and the public assembly (Lysias, Orit. xi. pro Polystrato, c. 3, p. 674 Reisk.).

But in this protest (borne out afterwards by the result) he stood nearly alone. The tide of opinion,

¹ Thucyd. viii. 48. Τὰς τε ξυμμαχίας πόλεις αἷς ἐπισχῆσθαι δὴ σφίσι ὀλιγαρχίαι, ὅτι δὴ καὶ αὐτοὶ αὐτὴν δημοκρατήσονται, εὖ εἶδεναι ἔφη, ὅτι οὐδὲν μᾶλλον σφίσι αὐτῶν αὐτῶν αἰ ἐπισχῆσθαι προσχωρήσονται, αὐτῶν αἱ ἐπὶ τῶν βασιλευσίων ἴσονται, οὐ γὰρ βουλήσονται αὐτοὶ μετ' ὀλιγαρχίας ἢ δημοκρατίας δουλεύειν μᾶλλον, ἢ μετ' ὀλιγότερου ἢ τυχόντος τούτων ἐλευθέρους εἶναι. Τοῖς τε καλοῖς καὶ κακοῖς ἐνομαζομένοις οὐκ ἐλάττω αὐτοῖς νομίζουσιν σφίσι πράγματα παρὶς τοῦ δήμου, ποριστὰς ἔσται καὶ ἐσσηγοῦναι τῶν κακῶν τῇ δῆμῳ, ἐξ ὧν τὰ πλείονα αὐτοὺς ἀφελείσθαι καὶ τὰ μὲν ἐκ' ἐκείνων εἶναι, καὶ ἄλλα ἢ καὶ βασιότερον ἀπαθῆσθαι, τὰς τε δῆμον σφίσι τε καταφυγὴν εἶναι καὶ ἐκείνων σωφρονοσύνης. Καὶ ταῦτα παρ' αὐτῶν τῶν ἔργων ἐπισταμέναι τοῖς πόλεσι σφίσι αὐτοὶ εἶδεναι, ὅτι οὕτως νομίζουσι.

In taking the comparison between oligarchy and democracy in Greece, there is hardly any evidence more important than this passage: a testimony to the comparative merit of democracy, pronounced by an oligarchical conspirator, and sanctioned by an historian himself unfriendly to the democracy.

Manœuvres
and countermanœuvres
of Phryn-ichus and Alkibiadès.

among the oligarchical conspirators, ran so furiously the other way, that it was resolved to despatch Peisander and others immediately to Athens to consummate the oligarchical revolution as well as the recall of Alkibiadès; and at the same time to propose to the people their new intended ally Tissaphernès.

Phrynichus knew well what would be the consequence to himself—if this consummation were brought about, as he foresaw that it probably would be—from the vengeance of his enemy Alkibiadès against his recent opposition. Satisfied that the latter would destroy him, he took measures for destroying Alkibiadès beforehand, even by a treasonable communication to the Lacedæmonian admiral Astyochus at Milétus; to whom he sent a secret account of the intrigues which the Athenian exile was carrying on at Samos to the prejudice of the Peloponnesians, prefaced with an awkward apology for this sacrifice of the interests of his country to the necessity of protecting himself against a personal enemy. But Phrynichus was imperfectly informed of the real character of the Spartan commander, or of his relations with Tissaphernès and Alkibiadès. Not merely was the latter now at Magnesia, under the protection of the satrap, and out of the power of the Lacedæmonians—but Astyochus, a traitor to his duty through the gold of Tissaphernès, went up thither to show the letter of Phrynichus to the very person whom it was intended to expose. Alkibiadès forthwith sent intelligence to the generals and officers at Samos of the step taken by Phrynichus, and pressed them to put him to death.

The life of Phrynichus now hung by a thread, and was probably preserved only by that respect for judicial formalities so deeply rooted in the Athenian character. In the extremity of danger, he resorted to a still more subtle artifice to save himself. He despatched a second letter to Astyochus, complaining of the violation of confidence in regard to the former, but at the same time intimating that he was now willing to betray to the Lacedæmonians the camp and armament at Samos. He invited Astyochus to come and attack the place, which was as yet unfortified—explaining minutely in what manner the attack could be best conducted; and he concluded by saying that this, as well as every other means of defence, must be pardoned to one whose life was in danger from a personal enemy. Foreseeing that Astyochus would betray this letter as he had betrayed the former, Phrynichus waited a proper time, and then revealed to the camp the intention of the enemy to make an attack, as if it had reached him by private information. He insisted on the necessity of immediate precautions, and himself as general superintended the work of fortification, which was soon completed. Presently arrived a letter from Alkiabiadès, communicating to the army that Phrynichus had betrayed them, and that the Peloponnesians were on the point of making an attack. But this letter, arriving after the precautions taken by order of Phrynichus himself had been already completed, was construed as a mere trick on the part of Alkiabiadès himself, through his acquaintance with the intentions of the Peloponnesians, to raise a charge of treasonable correspondence against his personal enemy. The impression thus made by his second letter effaced the taint which had been left upon Phrynichus by the first, insomuch that the latter stood exculpated on both charges¹.

Proceedings of Peisander
at Athens—strong opposition among the people both to the conspiracy and to the restoration of Alkibiadēs.

But Phrynichus, though thus successful in extricating himself, failed thoroughly in his manœuvre against the influence and life of Alkibiadēs; in whose favour the oligarchical movement not only went on, but was transferred from Samos to Athens. On arriving at the latter place, Peisander and his companions laid before the public assembly the projects which had been conceived by the oligarchs at Samos. The people were invited to restore Alkibiadēs and renounce their democratical constitution; in return for which, they were assured of obtaining the Persian king as an ally, and of overcoming the Peloponnesians². Violent was the storm which these propositions raised in the public assembly. Many speakers rose in animated defence of the democracy; few, if any, distinctly against it. The opponents of Alkibiadēs indignantly denounced the mischief of restoring him, in violation of the laws, and in reversal of a judicial sentence;

¹ Thucyd. viii. 50, 51.

² In the speech made by Thucydides (the Athenian) during the oligarchy of Thirty, seven years afterwards, it is affirmed that the Athenian people voted the adoption of the oligarchy of Four Hundred, from being told that the Lacedæmonians would never trust a democracy (Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 45).

This is thoroughly incorrect—a specimen of the loose assertion of speakers in regard to facts even not very long past. At the moment when Thucydides said this, the question, what political constitution at Athens the Lacedæmonians would please to tolerate, was all-important to the Athenians. Thucydides transfers the feelings of the present to the incidents of the past.

while the Eumolpidæ and Kerykes, the sacred families connected with the Eleusinian mysteries which Alkibiades had profaned, entered their solemn protest on religious grounds to the same effect. Against all these vehement opponents, whose impassioned invectives obtained the full sympathy of the assembly, Peisander had but one simple reply. He called them forward successively by name, and put to each the question—"What hope have you of salvation for the city, when the Peloponnesians have a naval force against us fully equal to ours, together with a greater number of allied cities—and when the king as well as Tissaphernês are supplying them with money, while we have no money left? What hope have you of salvation, unless we can persuade the king to come over to our side?" The answer was a melancholy negative—or perhaps not less melancholy silence. "Well then (rejoined Peisander)—that object cannot possibly be attained, unless we conduct our political affairs for the future in a more moderate way, and put the powers of government more into the hands of a few—and unless we recall Alkibiadês, the only man now living who is competent to do the business. Under present circumstances, we surely shall not lay greater stress upon our political constitution than upon the salvation of the city; the rather as what we now enact may be hereafter modified, if it be found not to answer."

Against the proposed oligarchical change the repugnance of the assembly was alike angry and unanimous. But they were silenced by the imperious necessity of the case, as the armament at

Unwilling vote of the assembly to relinquish their democracy, under the promise of Persian aid for the war.
Peisander
is sent back to negotiate with Al-
kibiadès.

Samos had been before; and admitting the alternative laid down by Peisander (as I have observed already), the most democratical citizen might be embarrassed as to his vote. Whether any speaker, like Phrynichus at Samos, arraigned the fallacy of the alternative, and called upon Peisander for some guarantee, better than mere asseveration, of the benefits to come—we are not informed. But the general vote of the assembly, reluctant and only passed in the hope of future change, sanctioned his recommendation¹. He and ten other envoys, invested with full powers of negotiating with Alkibiadès and Tissaphernès, were despatched to Ionia immediately. Peisander at the same time obtained from the assembly a vote deposing Phrynichus from his command; under the accusation of having traitorously caused the loss of Iasus and the capture of Amorgès, after the battle of Milétus—but from the real certainty that he would prove an insuperable bar to all negotiations with Alkibiadès. Phrynichus, with his colleague Skironidès, being thus displaced, Leon and Diomedon were sent to Samos as commanders in their stead; an appointment, of which, as will be presently seen, Peisander was far from anticipating the consequences.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 54. 'Ὁ δὲ δήμου τὸ μὲν πρῶτον δυνάμει χιλεπῶς ἔθετο τὸ περὶ τῆς Δωραρχίας· ἀφ' οὗ δὲ διδοσκάμενος ἐπὶ τοῦ Πεισανδρίου μὴ εἶναι ἄλλου στερηγίου, δέισας, καὶ ἅμα ἐλπίζων ὡς καὶ μετὰ Σαλαμίῃ, ἐνέδωκε.

"Atheniensibus, imminente periculo belli, major salutis quam dignitatis cura fuit. Itaque, permittente populo, imperium ad Senatum transfertur" (Justin, v. 3).

* Justin is correct, so far as this vote goes: but he takes no notice of the change of matters afterwards, when the establishment of the Four Hundred was consummated without the promised benefit of Persian alliance, and by simple terrorism.

Before his departure for Asia, he took a step yet more important. He was well-aware that the recent vote—a result of fear inspired by the war, representing a sentiment utterly at variance with that of the assembly, and only procured as the price of Persian aid against a foreign enemy—would never pass into a reality by the spontaneous act of the people themselves. It was indeed indispensable as a first step; partly as an authority to himself, partly also as a confession of the temporary weakness of the democracy, and as a sanction and encouragement for the oligarchical forces to show themselves. But the second step yet remained to be performed; that of calling these forces into energetic action—organising an amount of violence sufficient to extort from the people actual submission in addition to verbal acquiescence—and thus as it were tying down the patient while the process of emasculation was being consummated. Peisander visited all the various political clubs, conspiracies, or Hetæries, which were habitual and notorious at Athens; associations, bound together by oath, among the wealthy citizens, partly for purposes of amusement, but chiefly pledging the members to stand by each other in objects of political ambition, in judicial trials, in accusation or defence of official men after the period of office had expired, in carrying points through the public assembly, &c. Among these clubs were distributed most of “the best citizens, the good and honourable men, the elegant men, the men of note, the temperate, the honest and moderate men¹,” &c., to employ that complimentary phraseology by which wealthy and anti-popular politicians have chosen to designate each other, in ancient as well as in modern times. And though there were doubtless individuals among them who deserved these appellations in their best sense, yet the general character of the clubs was not the less exclusive and oligarchical. In the details of political life, they had different partialities as well as different antipathies, and were oftener in opposition than in co-operation with each other. But they furnished, when taken together, a formidable anti-popular force; generally either in abeyance, or disseminated in the accomplishment of smaller political measures and separate personal successes—but capable, at a special crisis, of being evoked, organised, and put in conjoint attack, for the subversion of the democracy. Such was the important movement now initiated by Peisander. He visited separately each of these clubs, put them into communication with each other, and exhorted them all to joint aggressive action against their common enemy the democracy, at a moment when it was already intimidated and might be finally overthrown¹.

Peisander brings the oligarchical clubs at Athens into organised action against the democracy.

¹ Οἱ βέλτιστοι, οἱ καλοκαίριοι, οἱ χαριώτεροι, οἱ γυμνοὶ, οἱ σώφρονες, &c. : le parti honnête et modéré, &c.

¹ About these ἐννομία ἐκεί δὲ κῆμα οἱ ἀρχαῖοι—political and judicial associations—see above, in this History, vol. iv. ch. xxxvii. p. 546; vol. vi. ch. li. p. 396; see also Hermann Büttner, Geschichte der politischen Heterien zu Athen, pp. 75, 79, Leipzig, 1840.

There seem to have been similar political clubs or associations at Carthage, exercising much influence, and holding perpetual banquets as a means of largess to the poor—Aristotel. Polit. ii. 8, 2; Livy, xxxiii. 46; xxxiv. 61; compare Kluge, ad Aristotel. De Polit. Carthag. p. 46-127, Wriestel, 1824.

The like political associations were both of long duration among the nobility of Rome, and of much influence for political objects as well as judicial success—"coitiones" (compare Cicero pro Cluentio, c. 54, s. 148)

Having taken other necessary measures towards the same purpose, Peisander left Athens with his colleagues to enter upon his negotiation with Tis-honorum adipiscendorum causa factæ—factiones—sodalitates." The incident described in Livy (ix. 26) is remarkable. The Senate, suspecting the character and proceedings of these clubs, appointed the Dictator Mænius (in 312 B.C.) as commissioner with full power to investigate and deal with them. But such was the power of the clubs, in a case where they had a common interest and acted in co-operation (as was equally the fact under Peisander at Athens), that they completely frustrated the inquiry, and went on as before. "Nec diutius, ut fit, quam dum recesserat, questio per clara nomina reorum viguit: inde lili coepit ad vilium capita, donec coitionibus factionibusque, addecent quas conspirata erat, oppressu rat." (Livy, ix. 26.) Compare Dio. Cass. xxxvii. 57, about the ἐμπόσι of the Triumvirs at Rome. Quintus Cicero (de Petition. Consulatus, c. 5) says to his brother the orator—"Quod si satis grati homines essent, hæc omnia (i. e. all the subsidia necessary for success in his coming election) tibi parata esse debebant, sicut parata esse confido. Nam hoc hiis quoque quatuor sodalitates civium ad ambitionem gratiosissimorum tibi obligati.....Horum in causis ad te deferendis quidam eorum sudales tibi receperint et confirmarint, scio; nam interfui."

See Th. Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodalibus Romanorum, Kiel 1843, ch. iii. sect. 5, 6, 7; also the Dissertation of Wunder, inserted in the Onomasticon Tullianum of Orelli and Heiter, in the last volume of their edition of Cicero, p. 200-210, ad Ind. Legum: Lex Læcia de Sodalibus.

As an example of these clubs or conspiracies for mutual support in ἐκπαίδειαν ἐπὶ δίκαις (not including ἀγορεύειν, so far as we can make out), we may cite the association called οἱ Εἰκადεῖς made known to us by an Inscription recently discovered in Attica, and published first in Dr. Wordsworth's Athens and Attica, p. 223; next in Ross, Die Demen von Attica, Preface, p. v. These Εἰκადεῖς are an association, the members of which are bound to each other by a common oath, as well as by a curse which the mythical hero of the association, Εἰκάνειος, is supposed to have imprecated (ἐκείνιος τῷ ἄπο ἧς Εἰκადεῖς ἐκπαίδειαν)—they possess common property, and it was held contrary to the oath for any of the members to enter into a pecuniary process against the κοινὴ: compare analogous obligations among the Roman Sodales, Mommsen, p. 4. Some members had violated their obligation upon this point: Polyxenus had attacked them at law for false witness; and the general body of the Εἰκადεῖς pass a vote of thanks to him for so doing, choosing three of their members to assist him in the cause before the Δικαστήριον (οἱ τρεῖς ἀντιπροσώπων τῷ ἐκπαίδευσιν τῆς πόλεως); compare the ἐμπόσι alluded to in Demosthenes (cont. Theokrin.

Peisander leaves Athens for Samos—Antiphon takes the management of the oligarchical conspiracy.—Theramenes and Phryni-chus.

saphernês. But the co-operation and aggressive movement of the clubs which he had originated, was prosecuted with increased ardour during his absence, and even fell into hands more organising and effective than his own. The rhetorical teacher Antiphon, of the deme Rhamnus, took it in hand especially, acquired the confidence of the clubs, and drew the plan of campaign against the democracy. He was a man estimable in private life and not open to pecuniary corruption: in other respects, of pre-eminent ability, in contrivance, judgment, speech, and action. The profession to which he belonged, generally unpopular among the democracy, excluded him from taking rank as a speaker either in the public assembly or the dikastery: for a rhetorical teacher, contending in either of them against a private speaker, (to repeat a remark already once made) was considered to stand at the same unfair advantage, as a fencing-master fighting a duel with a gentleman would be held to stand in modern times. Himself thus debarred from the showy celebrity of Athenian political life, Antiphon became only the more consummate, as a master of advice, calculation, scheming, and rhetorical com-

c. 11. p. 1335) as assisting Theokrinês before the Dikastery and intimidating the witnesses.

The Guilds in the European cities during the middle ages, usually sworn to by every member and called Confraternitates Amicitie, bear in many respects a resemblance to these Εὐφροσύνας; though the judicial proceedings in the mediæval cities, being so much less popular than at Athens, narrowed their range of interference in this direction: their political importance however was quite equal. (See Wilda, Das Gilden Wesen des Mittelalters, Abschn. ii. p. 167, &c.)

"Omnes autem ad Amicitiam pertinentes villæ per fidem et sacrosanctam firmaverunt, quod unus subreptis alteri tanquam fixtri suo in utili et honesto" (ib. p. 148).

position¹, to assist the celebrity of others ; insomuch that his silent assistance in political and judicial debates, as a sort of chamber-counsel, was highly appreciated and largely paid. Now such were precisely the talents required for the present occasion ; while Antiphon, who hated the democracy for having hitherto kept him in the shade, gladly bent his full talents towards its subversion.

Thus efficient was the man to whom Peisander in departing chiefly confided the task of organising the anti-popular clubs, for the consummation of the revolution already in immediate prospect. His chief auxiliary was Theramenês, another Athenian, now first named, of eminent ability and cunning. His father (either natural or by adoption), Agnon, was one of the Probuli, and had formerly been founder of Amphipolis. Even Phrynichus—whose sagacity we have already had occasion to appreciate, and who from hatred towards Alkibiadês had pronounced himself decidedly against the oligarchical movement at Samos—became zealous in forwarding the movement at Athens, after his dismissal from the command. He brought to the side of Antiphon and Theramènes a contriving head not inferior to theirs, coupled with daring and audacity even superior. Under such skilful leaders, the anti-popular force of Athens was organised with a deep skill, and directed with a dexterous wickedness, never before witnessed in Greece.

¹ The person described by Krito in the Euthydêmus of Plato (c. 31, p. 305 C.) as having censured Sokratês for conversing with Euthydêmus and Dionysodôrus, is presented exactly like Antiphon in Thucydides—ἐκέρτα ἐν τοῖς Δία πᾶσι τοῖς οἰκιστοῖς αὐτὸς ἐπὶ δικαστηρίοις ἀναβιβασθεὶς ἰδὼν ἑαυτοῦ αὐτὸς φασὶν ἐπὶ τοῦ πρῶτου, ἐν τοῖς Δία, καὶ ἑαυτὸς εἰμι καὶ δευτέρους λόγους ἑκτιθέναι.

Heindorf thinks that Isokratês is here meant : Groen van Prinsterer talks of Lykias ; Winkelmann, of Thrasymachus. The description would fit Antiphon as well as either of these three : though Stallbaum may perhaps be right in supposing no particular individual to have been in the mind of Plato.

Οἱ ἀνελκυσὶ ἐπιτρίμμετοι, whom Xenophon specifies as being so eminently useful to a person engaged in a law-suit, are probably the persons who knew how to address the Dikastery effectively in support of his case (Xenoph. Memorab. i, 2, 51).

Military operations near the Asiatic coast.

At the time when Peisander and the other envoys reached Ionia (seemingly about the end of January or beginning of February 411 B.C.), the Peloponnesian fleet had already quitted Milétus and gone to Knidus and Rhodes, on which latter island Léon and Diomedon made some hasty descents, from the neighbouring island of Chalké. At the same time, the Athenian armament at Chios was making progress in the siege of that place and the construction of the neighbouring fort at Delphinium. Pendaritus, the Lacedæmonian governor of the island, had sent pressing messages to solicit aid from the Peloponnesians at Rhodes, but no aid arrived; and he therefore resolved to attempt a general sally and attack upon the Athenians, with his whole force foreign as well as Chian. Though at first he obtained some success, the battle ended in his complete defeat and death, with great slaughter of the Chian troops, and with the loss of many whose shields were captured in the pursuit¹. The Chians, now reduced to greater straits than before, and beginning to suffer severely from famine, were only enabled to hold out by a partial reinforcement soon afterwards obtained from the Peloponnesian guard-ships at Milétus. A Spartan named Leon, who had come out in the vessel of Antisthenês as one of the Epibatæ or Marines, conducted this reinforcing squadron of 12 triremes (chiefly Thurian and Syracusan) succeeding Pedaritus in the general command of the island¹.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 55, 56.

It was while Chios seemed thus likely to be recovered by Athens—and while the superior Peloponnesian fleet was paralysed at Rhodes by Persian intrigues and bribes—that Peisander arrived in Ionia to open his negotiations with Alkibiadês and Tissaphernês. He was enabled to announce that the subversion of the democracy at Athens was already begun and would soon be consummated: and he now required the price which had been promised in exchange—Persian alliance and aid to Athens against the Peloponnesians. But Alkibiadês knew well that he had promised what he had not the least chance of being able to per-

Negotiations of Peisander with Alkibiadês.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 61. ἔρχοντο δὲ ἐν τῷ πλοῦν ἄλλοις Ἀντισθένης ἐκ τῆς Μιλήτου Μινδάρ τε ἄλλοι τε Σπαρτιάται, οὗ Ἀριστομένης ἐπιβάρης ἐνέπλει, οὗτοι τε καταστρέφοντες πρὸς τοὺς Πεδαιρίους πάντας ὄντας, &c.

I do not see why the word ἐπιβάρης should not be construed here, as elsewhere, in its ordinary sense of miles classarius. The commentators (see the notes of Dr. Arnold, Poppo, and Gœller) start difficulties which seem to me of little importance; and they imagine divers new meanings, for none of which any authority is produced. We ought not to wonder that a common miles classarius or marine (being a Spartan citizen) should be appointed commander at Chios, when (a few chapters afterwards) we find Thrasylbulus at Samos promoted, from being a common hoplite in the ranks, to be one of the Athenian generals (viii. 73).

The like remark may be made on the passage cited from Xenophon (Hellenic. i. 3, 17), about Hegesandrides—ἐπιβάρης δὲ Μινδάρου, where also the commentators reject the common meaning (see Schneider's note in the Aldenda to his edition of 1791, p. 97). The participle δὲ in that passage must be considered as an inaccurate substitute for παρασπένδων, since Mindarus was dead at the time. Hegesandrides had been among the epibate of Mindarus, and was now in command of a squadron on the coast of Thrice.

form. The satrap had appeared to follow his advice—or had rather followed his own inclination, employing Alkibiadēs as an instrument and auxiliary—in the endeavour to wear out both parties, and to keep them nearly on an equality until each should ruin the other. But he was no way disposed to identify himself with the cause of Athens, nor to break decidedly with the Peloponnesians—especially at a moment when their fleet was both the greater of the two, and in occupation of an island close to his own satrapy. Accordingly Alkibiadēs, when summoned by the Athenian envoys to perform his engagement, found himself in a dilemma from which he could only escape by one of his characteristic manœuvres.

Tricks of Alkibiadēs—he exaggerates his demands with a view of breaking off the negotiation—indignation of the oligarchy against him.

Receiving the envoys himself in conjunction with Tissaphernēs, and speaking on behalf of the latter, he pushed his demands to an extent which he knew that the Athenians would never concede; in order that the rupture might seem to be on their side, and not on his. First, he required the whole of Ionia to be conceded to the Great King; next, all the neighbouring islands, with some other items besides¹. Large as these requisitions were, comprehending the cession of Lesbos and Samos as well as Chios, and replacing the Persian monarchy in the condition in which it had stood in 496 B.C. before the Ionic revolt—Peisander and his colleagues granted them all: so that Alkibiadēs was on the point of seeing his deception exposed and frustrated. At last he bethought himself of a fresh demand, which touched Athenian pride as well as Athenian safety, in the tenderest place. He required that the Persian king should be held free to build ships of war in unlimited number, and to keep them sailing along the coast as he might think fit, through all these new portions of territory. After the immense concessions already made, the envoys not only rejected this fresh demand at once, but resented it as an insult which exposed the real drift and purpose of Alkibiadēs. Not merely did it cancel the boasted treaty (called the peace of Kallias) concluded about forty years before between Athens and Persia, and limiting the Persian ships of war to the sea eastward of Phasēlis—but it extinguished the maritime empire of Athens, and compromised the security of all the coasts and islands of the Ægean. To see Lesbos, Chios, and Samos, &c. in possession of Persia, was sufficiently painful; but if there came to be powerful Persian fleets on these islands, it would be the certain precursor and means of farther conquests to the westward, and would revive the aggressive dispositions of the Great King as they had stood at the beginning of the reign of Xerxes. Peisander and his comrades, abruptly breaking off the debate, returned to Samos;—indignant at the discovery, which they now made for the first time, that Alkibiadēs had juggled them from the outset, and was imposing conditions which he knew to be inadmissible¹. They still appear how-

¹ Thucyd. viii. 66. Ἰωνίαν τε γὰρ πᾶσαν ἤγειρε διδοῦσαν, καὶ αὐτὰς νήσους τε ἐπικουρίας καὶ ἄλλα, οἷα οὐκ ἐμπροσθέντος τῶν Ἀθηναίων, &c.

What these et cetera comprehended, we cannot divine. The demand was certainly simple enough without them.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 56. *οὐκ ὅτιον ἦν βασιλῆα ποιεῖσθαι, καὶ παραδίδω-
ναι τὸν ἑαυτοῦ γῆν, ὅση δὲ καὶ ἔστιν ἡ βουλόμενα.*

In my judgment ἑαυτοῦ is decidedly the proper reading here, not ever to have thought that Alkibiadēs acted thus, not because he could not, but because he would not, bring about the alliance under discussion¹. They suspected him of playing false with the oligarchical movement which he had himself instigated, and of projecting the accomplishment of his own restoration, coupled with the alliance of Tissaphernēs, into the bosom of the democracy which he had begun by denouncing. Such was the light in which they presented his conduct; venting their disappointment in invectives against his duplicity, and in asseverations that he was, after all, unsuitable for a place in oligarchical society. Such declarations, when circulated at Samos, to account for their unexpected failure in realising the hopes which they had raised, created among the armament an impression that Alkibiadēs was really favourable to the democracy; at the same time leaving unabated the prestige of his unbounded ascendancy over Tissaphernēs and the Great King. We shall presently see the effects resulting from this belief.

Immediately after the rupture of the negotiations, however, the satrap took a step well-calculated to enrich. I agree in this respect with Dr. Arnold, Bekker, and Götter.

In a former volume of this History, I have shown reasons for believing (in opposition to Mitford, Dahlmann, and others) that the treaty called by the name of Kallias, and sometimes miscalled by the name of Kimon—was a real fact and not a homalful fiction: see vol. i. ch. xlv. p. 455.

The note of Dr. Arnold, though generally just, gives an inadequate representation of the strong reasons of Athens for rejecting and resenting this third demand.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 63. Καὶ δὲ ὀφείλου αὐτοῖς ἅπασι ὅτι ἐν τῇ Σάμῳ τῶν Ἀθηναίων ἐκκαταστάμενα ἐκείνην, Ἀλκιβιάδης μὲν, ἐπεισέθετο οὐ βούλεται, τῶν (οὐ γὰρ οὐκ ἐκκαταστάμεν αὐτὰς εἰς τὴν ἐλευθερίαν ἐλθεῖν), &c.

destroy the hopes of the Athenians altogether, so far as Persian aid was concerned. Though persisting in his policy of lending no decisive assistance to either party and of merely prolonging the war so as to enfeeble both—he yet began to fear that he was pushing matters too far against the Peloponnesians, who had now been two months inactive at Rhodes, with their large fleet hauled ashore. He had no treaty with them actually in force, since Lichas had disallowed the two previous conventions; nor had he furnished them with pay or maintenance. His bribes to the officers had hitherto kept the armament quiet; yet we do not distinctly see how so large a body of men found subsistence¹. He was now however apprised that they could find subsistence no longer, and that they would probably desert, or commit depredations on the coast of his satrapy, or perhaps be driven to hasten on a general action with the Athenians, under desperate circumstances. Under such apprehensions he felt compelled to put himself again in communication with them, to furnish them with pay, and to conclude with them a third convention—the proposition of which he had refused to entertain at Knidus. He therefore went to Kaunus, invited the Peloponnesian leaders to Milétus, and concluded with them near that town a treaty to the following effect:—

“In this 13th year of the reign of Darius, and in the ephorship of Alexippidas at Lacedæmon, a Reconciliation between Tissaphernes and the Peloponnesians.

Third convention concluded between them.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 44-57. In two parallel cases, one in Chios, the other in Korkyra, the seamen of an unpaid armament found subsistence by hiring themselves out for agricultural labour. But this was only during the summer (see Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 1; vi. 2, 37), while the stay of the Peloponnesians at Rhodes was from January to March.

convention is hereby concluded by the Lacedæmonians and their allies, with Tissaphernês and Hieramenês and the sons of Pharnakês, respecting the affairs of the king and of the Lacedæmonians and their allies. The territory of the king, as much of it as is in Asia, shall belong to the king. Let the king determine as he chooses respecting his own territory. The Lacedæmonians and their allies shall not approach the king's territory with any mischievous purpose—nor shall the king approach that of the Lacedæmonians and their allies with any like purpose. If any one among the Lacedæmonians or their allies shall approach the king's territory with mischievous purpose, the Lacedæmonians and their allies shall hinder him; if any one from the king's territory shall approach the Lacedæmonians or their allies with mischievous purpose, the king shall hinder him. Tissaphernês shall provide pay and maintenance, for the fleet now present, at the rate already stipulated, until the king's fleet shall arrive; after that, it shall be at the option of the Lacedæmonians to maintain their own fleet, if they think fit—or if they prefer, Tissaphernês shall furnish maintenance, and at the close of the war the Lacedæmonians shall repay to him what they have received. After the king's fleet shall have arrived, the two fleets shall carry on war conjointly, in such manner as shall seem good to Tissaphernês and the Lacedæmonians and their allies. If they choose to close the war with the Athenians, they shall close it only by joint consent¹.

In comparing this third convention with the two

¹ Thucyd. viii. 58.

preceding, we find that nothing is now stipulated as to any territory except the continent of Asia; which is ensured unreservedly to the king, of course with all the Greek residents planted upon it. But by a diplomatic finesse, the terms of the treaty imply that this is not all the territory which the king is entitled to claim—though nothing is covenanted as to any remainder¹. Next, this third treaty includes Pharnabazus (the son of Pharnakès) with his satrapy of Daskylium; and Hieramenès, with his district, the extent and position of which we do not know; while in the former treaties no other satrap except Tissaphernès had been concerned. We must recollect that the Peloponnesian fleet included those 27 triremes, which had been brought across by Kalligeitus expressly for the aid of Pharnabazus; and therefore that the latter now naturally became a party to the general operations. Thirdly, we here find, for the first time, formal announcement of a Persian fleet about to be brought up as auxiliary to the Peloponnesians. This was a promise which the satrap now set forth more plainly than before, to amuse them, and to abate the mistrust which they had begun to conceive of his sincerity. It served the temporary purpose of restraining them from any immediate act of despair hostile to his interests, which was all that he looked for. While he renewed his payments, therefore, for the moment, he affected to busy himself in orders and preparations for the fleet from Phenicia².

Third convention compared with the two preceding.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 58. χώραν τὴν βασιλείας, ὅση τῆς Ἀσίας ἐστὶ, βασιλείας εἶναι καὶ περὶ τῆς χώρας τῆς αὐτοῦ βουλευέντω βασιλεῖς ὅπως βούλεται.

² Thucyd. viii. 59.

Loss of Orôpus by
Athens.

The Peloponnesian fleet was now ordered to move from Rhodes. Before it quitted that island, however, envoys came thither from Eretria and from Orôpus; which latter place (a dependency on the north-eastern frontier of Attica), though protected by an Athenian garrison, had recently been surprised and captured by the Bœotians. The loss of Orôpus much increased the facilities for the revolt of Eubœa; and these envoys came to entreat aid from the Peloponnesian fleet, to second the island in that design. The Peloponnesian commanders, however, felt themselves under prior obligation to relieve the sufferers at Chios, towards which island they first bent their course. But they had scarcely passed the Triopian cape, when they saw the Athenian squadron from Chalkê dogging their motions. Though there was no wish on either side for a general battle, yet they saw evidently that the Athenians would not permit them to pass by Samos, and get to the relief of Chios, without a battle. Renouncing therefore the project of relieving Chios, they again concentrated their force at Milêtus; while the Athenian fleet was also again united at Samos¹. It was about the end of March 411 B.C., that the two fleets were thus replaced in the stations which they had occupied four months previously.

s.c. 411.
Peisander
and his colleagues persist in the oligarchical conspiracy, without Alkibiadês.

After the breach with Alkibiadês, and still more after this manifest reconciliation of Tissaphernês with the Peloponnesians, Peisander and the oligarchical conspirators at Samos had to reconsider their plan of action. They would not have begun the movement at first, had they not been instigated by Alkibiadēs, and furnished by him with the treacherous delusion of Persian alliance to cheat and paralyse the people. They had indeed motives enough, from their own personal ambition, to originate it of themselves, apart from Alkibiadēs; but without the hopes—equally useful for their purpose whether false or true—connected with his name, they would have had no chance of achieving the first step. Now, however, that first step had been achieved, before the delusive expectation of Persian gold was dissipated. The Athenian people had been familiarised with the idea of a subversion of their constitution, in consideration of a certain price: it remained to extort from them at the point of the sword, without paying the price, what they had thus consented to sell¹. Moreover the leaders of the scheme felt themselves already compromised, so that they could not recede with safety. They had set in motion their partisans at Athens, where the system of murderous intimidation (though the news had not as yet reached Samos) was already in full swing: so that they felt constrained to persevere, as the only chance of preservation to themselves. At the same time, all that faint pretence of public benefit, in the shape of Persian alliance, which had been originally attached to it and which might have been conceived to enlist in the scheme

¹ Thucyd. viii. 60.

¹ See Aristotel. Politic. v. 3, 8. He cites this revolution as an instance of one begun by deceit, and afterwards consummated by force—οἷος ἐστὶ τῆς τετρακοσίου τοῦ δήμου ἐξήπαρξεν, φάσκοντες τὴν βασιλίαν χρήματα παρέχειν πρὸς τὸν πόλεμον τὸν πρὸς Λακεδαιμονίαν· ψευδόμενοι δὲ, ἐπὶ τέχνῃ ἐπεσφύησαν τὴν πόλιν.

some timid patriots—was now entirely withdrawn. Nothing remained except a naked, selfish, and unscrupulous scheme of ambition, not only ruining the freedom of Athens at home, but crippling and imperilling her before the foreign enemy at a moment when her entire strength was scarcely adequate to the contest. The conspirators resolved to persevere, at all hazards, both in breaking down the constitution and in carrying on the foreign war. Most of them being rich men, they were content (Thucydides observes) to defray the cost out of their own purses, now that they were contending, not for their country, but for their own power and profit¹.

They attempt to subvert the democracy at Samos—assassination of Hyperbolus and others.

They lost no time in proceeding to execution, immediately after returning to Samos from the abortive conference with Alkibiades. While they despatched Peisander with five of the envoys back to Athens, to consummate what was already in progress there—and the remaining five to oligarchise the dependent allies—they organised all their partisan force in the armament, and began to take measures for putting down the democracy in Samos itself. That democracy had been the product of a forcible revolution, effected about ten months before, by the aid of three Athenian triremes. It had since preserved Samos from revolting, like Chios: it was now the means of preserving the democracy at Athens itself.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 63. Ἀδραὶν δὲ ἐπὶ σφῶν αὐτῶν, ὥς τῶν καὶ καρδυνεύοντες, ἄρῃν δὲ πρὸς μὴ ἀναθῆσθαι τὰ πρῆγματα, καὶ τὰ τοῦ πολέμου ἡμῶν ἀνέχουσιν, καὶ ἐσφίρειν αὐτοῖς προθύμως χρήματα καὶ ἑν ταῖς ἄλλαις δὲ, ὥς οὐδὲν ἄλλοις ἢ σφίσι αὐτοῖς ταλαιπωροῦνται.

The partisans of Peisander, finding it an invincible obstacle to their views, contrived to gain over a party of the leading Samians now in authority under it. Three hundred of these latter, a portion of those who ten months before had risen in arms to put down the pre-existing oligarchy, now enlisted as conspirators along with the Athenian oligarchs, to put down the Samian democracy, and get possession of the government for themselves. The new alliance was attested and cemented, according to genuine oligarchical practice, by a murder without judicial trial, or an assassination—for which a suitable victim was at hand. The Athenian Hyperbolus, who had been ostracised some years before by the coalition of Nikias and Alkibiadès, together with their respective partisans—ostracised (as Thucydidès tells us) not from any fear of his power and over-ascendent influence, but from his bad character and from his being a disgrace to the city—and thus ostracised by an abuse of the institution—was now resident at Samos. He represented the demagogic and accusatory eloquence of the democracy, the check upon official delinquency; so that he served as a common object of antipathy to Athenian and Samian oligarchs. Some of the Athenian partisans, headed by Charminus, one of the generals, in concert with the Samian conspirators, seized Hyperbolus and put him to death; seemingly with some other victims at the same time¹.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 73. Καὶ Ὑπερβόλεον εἰ τινα τῶν Ἀθηναίων, μεχθρὸν ἄνθρωπον, ὑπερταυρῶσαν οὐ διὰ δυνάμεως καὶ ἀξιώματος φόβου, ἀλλὰ διὰ

The democracy at Samos is sustained by the Athenian armament.

But though these joint assassinations served as a pledge to each section of the conspirators for the fidelity of the other in respect to farther operations, they at the same time gave warning to opponents. Those leading men at Samos who remained attached to the democracy, looking abroad for defence against the coming attack, made earnest appeal to Leon and Diomedon, the two generals most recently arrived from Athens in substitution for Phrynichus and Skironidês—men sincerely devoted to the democracy, and adverse to all oligarchical change—as well as to the trierarch Thrasyllus, to Thrasybulus (son of Lykus) then serving as an hoplite, and to many others of the pronounced democrats and patriots in the Athenian armament. They made appeal, not simply in behalf of their own personal safety and of their own democracy, now threatened by conspirators of whom a portion were Athenians—but also on grounds of public interest to Athens; since, if Samos became oligarchised, its sympathy with the Athenian democracy and its fidelity to the alliance would be at an end. At this moment the most recent events which had occurred at Athens (presently to be told) were not known, πομπῇ καὶ ἀλοχίῳ τῆς πόλεως, ἀποκτείνουσι μετὰ Χαρχίονος τε ἐπὶ τῶν στρατηγῶν καὶ τινος τῶν παρὰ σφίσιν Ἀθηναίων, πίστιν δίδοντες αὐτοῖς, καὶ ἄλλα μετ' αὐτῶν τοιαῦτα ξυνέπραξαν, τοῖς τε πλείοσι ὁρμητοῖς ἐπιβόησαν.

I presume that the words, ἄλλα τοιαῦτα ξυνέπραξαν, must mean that other persons were assassinated along with Hyperbolus.

The incorrect manner in which Mr. Mitford recounts these proceedings at Samos has been properly commented on by Dr. Thirlwall (Hist. Gr. ch. xxviii. vol. iv. p. 30). It is the more surprising since the phrase μετὰ Χαρχίονος, which Mr. Mitford has misunderstood, is explained in a special note of Duker.

and the democracy was considered as still subsisting there¹.

To stand by the assailed democracy of Samos, and to preserve the island itself, now the mainstay of the shattered Athenian empire, were motives more than sufficient to awaken the Athenian leaders thus solicited. Commencing a personal canvass among the soldiers and seamen, and invoking their interference to avert the overthrow of the Samian democracy, they found the general sentiment decidedly in their favour, but most of all, among the Parali, or crew of the consecrated public trireme called the Paralus. These men were the picked seamen of the state; each of them not merely a free-man, but a full Athenian citizen; receiving higher pay than the ordinary seamen, and known as devoted to the democratical constitution, with an active repugnance to oligarchy itself as well as to every thing which scented of it². The vigilance of Leon and Diomedon on the defensive side counteracted the machinations of their colleague Charminus, along with the conspirators; and provided, for the Samian democracy, faithful auxiliaries constantly ready for action. Presently the conspirators made a violent attack to overthrow the government; but though they chose their own moment and opportunity, they still found themselves thoroughly worsted in the

The Athenian Parali—defeat of the oligarchical conspiracy at Samos.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 73, 74. οὐκ ἔβριον περιδεῖν αὐτοῖς ὅπως τε διαφθερίσται, καὶ Σάμῳ Ἀθηναίων ἐδωκεναι. &c.

...οὐ γὰρ ἤθεσαν πρὸς τοῖς τετρακοσίαις ἄρχουσιν, &c.

² Thucyd. viii. 73. καὶ οὐκ ἦσαν τοῖς Παράλοις, ὅσοις Ἀθηναῖοι τε καὶ ἐλευθέρων πάντες ἐν τῇ καὶ ἐλευθέρῳ, καὶ ἀπὸ δὴ ποτε ὀλιγαρχίᾳ καὶ μὴ παρὰ τὴν ἐλευθερίαν.

Peitholaus called the Paralus βόταλος καὶ ὄργανον—"the club, staff, or mace of the people" (Aristotel. Rhetoric. iii. 3.)

struggle, especially through the energetic aid of the Parali. Thirty of their number were slain in the contest, and three of the most guilty afterwards condemned to banishment. The victorious party took no farther revenge, even upon the remainder of the three hundred conspirators—granted a general amnesty—and did their best to re-establish constitutional and harmonious working of the democracy¹.

The Paralus
is sent to Athens
with the news.

Chæreas, an Athenian trierarch, who had been forward in the contest, was sent in the Paralus itself to Athens, to make communication of what had occurred. But this democratical crew, on reaching their native city, instead of being received with that welcome which they doubtless expected, found a state of things not less odious than surprising. The democracy of Athens had been subverted: instead of the Senate of Five Hundred, and the assembled people, an oligarchy of Four Hundred self-installed persons were enthroned with sovereign authority in the Senate House. The first order of the Four Hundred, on hearing that the Paralus had entered Peiræus, was to imprison two or three of the crew, and to remove all the rest from their own privileged trireme aboard a common trireme, with orders to depart forthwith and to cruise near Eubœa. The commander Chæreas found means to escape, and returned back to Samos to tell the unwelcome news².

The steps, whereby this oligarchy of Four Hundred had been gradually raised up to their new power, must be taken up from the time when Peisander quitted Athens,—after having obtained the vote of the public assembly authorising him to treat with Alkibiadēs and Tissaphernēs,—and after having set on foot a joint organisation and conspiracy of all the anti-popular clubs, which fell under the management especially of Antiphon and Theramēnēs, afterwards aided by Phrynichus. All the members of that board of Elders called Probūli, who had been named after the defeat in Sicily—with Agnon, father of Theramēnēs, at their head¹—together with many other leading citizens, some of whom had been counted among the firmest friends of the democracy, joined the conspiracy; while the oligarchical and the neutral rich came into it with ardour; so that a body of partisans was formed both numerous and well provided with money. Antiphon did not attempt to bring them together, or to make any public demonstration, armed or unarmed, for the purpose of overawing the actual authorities. He permitted the senate and the public assembly to go on meeting and debating as usual; but his partisans, neither the names nor the numbers of whom were publicly known, received from him instructions both when to speak and what language to hold. The great topic upon which they descanted, was the costliness of democratical institutions in the present distressed state of the finances, when tribute from the allies could no longer be reckoned upon—the heavy tax imposed upon the state by paying the Senators, the Dikasts, the Ekklesiasts or citizens who attended the public assembly, &c. The state could now afford to pay only those soldiers who fought in its defence, nor ought any one else to touch the public money. It was essential (they insisted) to exclude from the political franchise all except a select body of Five Thousand, composed of those who were best able to do service to the city by person and by purse.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 73. Καὶ τριάντη μὲν τινες ἀπέκτεινον τῶν τριηράρχων, τρεῖς δὲ τοὺς αἰσιωτάτους φεγγ' ἐξήλυσαν τοὺς δ' ἄλλους εὖ μετῴναι- αῖοντες δημοκρατοῦμενα τὸ λοιπὸν ἐνεπαύσαντο.

² Thucyd. viii. 74.

Progress of the oligarchical conspiracy at Athens—dexterous management of Antiphon.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 1. About the countenance which all these Probūli lent to the conspiracy, see Aristotle, Rhetoric. iii. 18, 2.

Respecting the activity of Agnon, as one of the Probūli, in the same cause, see Lycurgus, Orat. xii. cont. Eratosthenes, c. 11, p. 426 Renss. sect. 66.

Language of the conspirators—juggle about naming Five Thousand citizens to exercise the political franchise exclusively.

The extensive disfranchisement involved in this last proposition was quite sufficiently shocking to the ears of an Athenian assembly. But in reality the proposition was itself a juggle, never intended to become reality, and representing something far short of what Antiphon and his partisans intended. Their design was to appropriate the powers of government to themselves simply, without control or partnership; leaving this body of Five Thousand not merely unconvened, but non-existent, as a mere empty name to impose upon the citizens generally. Of such real intention, however, not a word was as yet spoken. The projected body of Five Thousand was the theme preached upon by all the party orators; yet without submitting any substantive motion for the change, which could not be yet done without illegality.

Assassination of the popular speakers by Antiphon and the oligarchical party.

Even thus indirectly advocated, the project of cutting down the franchise to Five Thousand, and of suppressing all the paid civil functions, was a change sufficiently violent to call forth abundant opponents. For such opponents Antiphon was fully prepared. Of the men who thus stood forward in opposition, either all, or at least all the most prominent, were successively taken off by private assassination. The first of them who thus perished was Androklès, distinguished as a demagogue or popular speaker, and marked out to vengeance not only by that circumstance, but by the farther fact that he had been among the most vehement accusers of Alkibiadès before his exile. For at this time, the breach of Peisander with Tisaphernès and Alkibiadès had not yet become known at Athens, so that the latter was still supposed to be on the point of returning home as a member of the contemplated oligarchical government. After Androklès, many other speakers of similar sentiments perished in the same way, by unknown hands. A band of Grecian youths, strangers got together from different cities¹, was organised for the business: the victims were all chosen on the same special ground, and the deed was so skilfully perpetrated that neither director nor instrument ever became known. After these assassinations—sure, special, secret, and systematic, emanating from an unknown Directory like a Vehmlic tribunal—had continued for some time, the terror which they inspired became intense and universal. No justice could be had, no inquiry could be instituted, even

¹ Thucyd. viii. 69. Οἱ εἰκοσι καὶ ἑκατὸν μετ' αὐτῶν (that is, along with the Four Hundred) Ἑλλήνων πανόμοιοι, οἷς ἐχθρότερον εἰς τὴν πόλιν δόμα χερσὶν ἔργον.

Dr. Arnold explains the words Ἑλλήνων πανόμοιοι to mean some of the members of the aristocratical clubs or unions, formerly spoken of. But I cannot think that Thucydides would use such an expression to designate Athenian citizens: neither is it probable that Athenian citizens would be employed in repeated acts of such a character.

for the death of the nearest and dearest relative. At last, no man dared to demand or even to mention inquiry, looking upon himself as fortunate that he had escaped the same fate in his own person. So finished an organisation, and such well-aimed blows, raised a general belief that the conspirators were much more numerous than they were in reality. And as it turned out that there were persons among them who had before been accounted hearty democrats¹, so at last dismay and mistrust became universally prevalent. Nor did any one dare even to express indignation at the murders going on, much less to talk about redress or revenge, for fear that he might be communicating with one of the unknown conspirators. In the midst of this terrorism, all opposition ceased in the senate and public

¹ Even Peisander himself had professed the strongest attachment to the democracy, coupled with exaggerated violence against parties suspected of oligarchical plots—four years before, in the investigations which followed on the mutilation of the Hermæ at Athens (Andokides de Myer, c. 9, 10, sect. 35-43).

It is a fact that Peisander was one of the prominent movers on both these two occasions, four years apart. And if we could believe Isokratos (de Bigis, sect. 4-7, p. 347), the second of the two occasions was merely the continuance and consummation of a plot, which had been projected and begun on the first, and in which the conspirators had endeavoured to enlist Alkibiadês. The latter refused (so his son, the speaker in the above-mentioned oration, contends) in consequence of his attachment to the democracy; upon which the oligarchical conspirators, incensed at his refusal, got up the charge of irreligion against him and procured his banishment.

Though Droysen and Wattenbach (De Quadringentorum Athenis Factione, p. 7, 8, Berlin 1842) place confidence to a considerable extent, in this manner of putting the facts—I consider it to be nothing better than complete perversion; irreconcilable with Thucydides, confounding together facts unconnected in themselves as well as separated by a long interval of time, and introducing hateful causes—for the purpose of making out (what was certainly not true) that Alkibiadês was a faithful friend of the democracy, and even a sufferer in its behalf.

assembly, so that the speakers of the conspiring oligarchy appeared to carry an unanimous assent¹.

Such was the condition to which things had been brought in Athens, by Antiphon and the oligarchical conspirators acting under his direction, at the time when Peisander and the five envoys arrived thither returning from Samos. It is probable that they had previously transmitted home from Samos news of the rupture with Alkibiadês, and of the necessity of prosecuting the conspiracy without farther view either to him or to the Persian alliance. Such news would probably be acceptable both to Antiphon and Phrynichus, both of them personal enemies of Alkibiadês; especially Phrynichus, who had pronounced him to be incapable of fraternising with an oligarchical revolution². At any rate, the plans of Antiphon had been independent of all view to Persian aid, and had been directed to carry the revolution by means of naked, exorbitant, and well-directed fear, without any intermixture of hope or any prospect of public benefit. Peisander found the reign of terror fully matured. He had not come direct from Samos to Athens, but had halted in his voyage at various allied dependencies—while the other five envoys, as well as a partisan named Diotrephês, had been sent to Thasos and elsewhere³; all for the same purpose, of putting down democracies in those allied cities where they existed, and establishing oligarchies in their room. Peisander made this change at Ténos, Andros, Karystus,

Return of Peisander to Athens—oligarchical government established in several of the allied cities.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 65.

² Thucyd. viii. 68. οὐκ ἔστιν ὅτι ποτε αὐτὸς (Alkibiadês) κατὰ τὸ εἶδος ἐστ' ὀλιγαρχίας καταθέειν, &c.

³ Thucyd. viii. 64.

Ægina, and elsewhere; collecting from these several places a regiment of 300 hoplites, which he brought with him to Athens as a sort of body-guard to his new oligarchy¹. He could not know, until he reached Peiræus, the full success of the terrorism organised by Antiphon and the rest; so that he probably came prepared to surmount a greater resistance than he actually found. As the facts stood, so completely had the public opinion and spirit been subdued, that he was enabled to put the finishing stroke at once, and his arrival was the signal for consummating the revolution; first, by an extorted suspension of the tutelary constitutional sanction—next, by the more direct employment of armed force.

First, he convoked a public assembly, in which he proposed a decree, naming ten commissioners with full powers, to prepare propositions for such political reform as they should think advisable—and to be ready by a given day². According to

Consummation of the revolution at Athens—last public assembly at Kolonos.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 65. Οἱ δὲ ἀμφὶ τὸν Πεισανδρὸν παραπλείοντες τε, ὥστερ' ἐβόουτο, τοῖς δῆμονι ἐν ταῖς πόλεσι κατέλειπον, καὶ ἀμείψαντες ἀφ' ὧν χωρίων καὶ ὁπλίτας ἔχοντες σφίσιν αὐτοῖς ἐνμαχέων ἦλθον ἐν τὰς Ἀθήνας. Καὶ καταλαμβάνουσι τὰ πλείεστα τοῖν ἑταίροις προεργασμένα.

We may gather from c. 69 that the places which I have named in the text were among those visited by Peisander: all of them lay very much in his way from Samos to Athens.

² Thucyd. viii. 67. Καὶ πρῶτον μὲν τοῖς δῆμον ἐνόησαν εἶπαι νόμον, δέκα δώδεκα ἐλέσθαι ἐνυγραφίας αὐτοκρατορίας, ταύτας δὲ ἐνυγραφάμεναι νόμον ἐκτελεστικὸν ἐν τῷ δῆμον ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ῥήγην, καθ' ἣν ἅπαντα ὃ πόλις αἰχίσσεται.

In spite of certain passages found in Suidas and Harpokration (see K. F. Hermann, Lehrbuch der Griechischen Staats Alterthümer, sect. 167, note 12: compare also Wattenbach, De Quadringentor. Factione, p. 38), I cannot think that there was any connection between these ten ἐνυγραφεῖα, and the Board of ἐπὶ βουλῆς mentioned as having been before named (Thucyd. viii. 1). Nor has the passage in Lysias, to which Hermann makes allusion, anything to do with these ἐνυγραφεῖα. The the usual practice, this decree must previously have been approved in the Senate of Five Hundred, before it was submitted to the people. Such was doubtless the case in the present instance, so that the decree passed without any opposition. On the day fixed, a fresh assembly met, which Peisander and his partisans caused to be held, not in the usual place (called the Pnyx) within the city walls, but at a place called Kolônus, ten stadia (rather more than a mile) without the walls¹, north of the city. Kolônus was a temple of Poseidon, within the precinct of which the assembly was enclosed for the occasion. Such an assembly was not likely to be numerous, wherever held², since there could be little motive to attend when freedom of debate was exmention of Thirty persons, by Androtion and Philochorus, seems to imply that either they, or Harpokration, confounded the proceedings ushering in this oligarchy of Four Hundred, with those before the subsequent oligarchy of Thirty. The ἐκκλησία or συγκροτήσις mentioned by Isokrates (Areopagit. Or. vii. sect. 67) might refer either to the case of the Four Hundred or to that of the Thirty.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 67. "Ἐπειτα, ἐπεὶδὴ ἡ ἡμέρα ἐφῆκε, ξενέλασαν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ ἐν τῷ Κόλονος (ἐντὶ δ' ἱερὸς Ποσειδῶνος ἔξω πόλεως, ἀπέχοντος σταδίων μάλιστα δέκα), &c.

The very remarkable word ξενέλασαν, here used respecting the assembly, appears to me to refer (not, as Dr. Arnold supposes in his note, to any existing practice observed even in the usual assemblies which met in the Pnyx, but rather) to a departure from the usual practice, and the employment of a stratagem in reference to this particular meeting.

Kolônus was one of the Attic Demes: indeed there seems reason to imagine that two distinct Demes bore this same name (see Boeckh, in the Commentary appended to his translation of the Antigone of Sophoklês, p. 190, 191; and Ross, Die Demen von Attika, pp. 10, 11). It is in the grove of the Eumenidês, hard by this temple of Poseidon, that Sophoklês has laid the scene of his immortal drama, the Oedipus Kolônensis.

² Compare the statement in Lykias (Orat. xii. cont. Erastosth. s. 76, p. 127) respecting the small numbers who attended and voted at the assembly by which the subsequent oligarchy of Thirty was named.

tinguished; but the oligarchical conspirators now transferred it without the walls; selecting a narrow area for the meeting—in order that they might lessen still farther the chance of numerous attendance—of an assembly which they fully designed should be the last in the history of Athens. They were thus also more out of the reach of an armed movement in the city, as well as enabled to post their own armed partisans around, under colour of protecting the meeting against disturbance by the Lacedæmonians from Dekeleia.

Abolition of the Graphê
Paranomôn.

The proposition of the newly-appointed Decemvirs (probably Peisander, Antiphon, and other partisans themselves) was exceedingly short and simple. They merely moved the abolition of the celebrated Graphê Paranomôn; that is, they proposed that every Athenian citizen should have full liberty of making any anti-constitutional proposition that he chose—and that every other citizen should be interdicted, under heavy penalties, from prosecuting him by Graphê Paranomôn (indictment on the score of informality, illegality, or unconstitutionality), or from doing him any other mischief. This proposition was adopted without a single dissentient. It was thought more formal by the directing chiefs to sever this proposition pointedly from the rest, and to put it, singly and apart, into the mouth of the special commissioners; since it was the legalizing condition of every other positive change which they were about to move afterwards. Full liberty being thus granted to make any motion, however anti-constitutional, and to dispense with all the established formalities, such as preliminary authorisation by the senate—Peisander now came forward with his substantive propositions to the following effect:—

1. All the existing democratical magistracies were suppressed at once, and made to cease for the future. 2. No civil functions whatever were hereafter to be salaried. 3. To constitute a new government, a committee of five persons were named forthwith, who were to choose a larger body of one hundred (that is, one hundred including the five choosers themselves). Each individual, out of this body of one hundred, was to choose three persons. 4. A body of Four Hundred was thus constituted, who were to take their seat in the Senate-house, and to carry on the government with unlimited powers, according to their own discretion. 5. They were to convene the Five Thousand, whenever they might think fit¹. All was passed without a dissentient voice.

New government proposed by Peisander—oligarchy of Four Hundred.

The invention and employment of this imaginary aggregate of Five Thousand was not the least dexterous among the combinations of Antiphon. No one knew who these Five Thousand were: yet the resolution, just adopted, purported—not that such a number of citizens should be singled out and constituted, either by choice, or by lot, or in some determinate manner which should exhibit them to the view and knowledge of others—but that the Four Hundred should convene The Five Thousand, whenever they thought proper: thus assuming the latter to be a list already made up and notorious, at least to the Four Hundred themselves. The real fact was that the Five Thousand existed nowhere except in the talk and proclamations of the conspirators, as a supplement of fictitious auxiliaries. They did not even exist as individual names on paper, but simply as an imposturous nominal aggregate. The Four Hundred now installed formed the entire and exclusive rulers of the state¹. But the mere name of the Five Thousand, though it was nothing more than a name, served two important purposes for Antiphon and his conspiracy. First, it admitted of being falsely produced (especially to the armament at Samos) as proof of a tolerably numerous and popular body of equal, qualified, concurrent citizens—all intended to take their turn by rotation in exercising the powers of government; thus lightening the odium of extreme usurpation to the Four Hundred, and passing them off merely as the earliest section of the Five Thousand, put into office for a few months, and destined at the end of that period to give place to another equal section².

Fictitious and nominal aggregate called the Five Thousand.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 68. Ἐλθέρας δὲ αὐτοῖς παρασκευάσεις δοῦναι ἐν τῷ βασιλευσίνῃ, ἀρχῇ ἐπὶ δὲ ἄλλα γυνέσκειναι, αὐτοκράτορας, καὶ ταῖς πεντακισχίλοις δὲ συλλέγειν, ὅπως αὐτοῖς δοῖν.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 66. ἦν δὲ τοῦτο εἰρησπείη πρὸς τοὺς πλείους, ἐπεὶ ἔξω γε τῆς πόλεως οἷον καὶ μεθιστάναι ἐμελλον.

Plutarch, Alkibiad. c. 26.

² Thucyd. viii. 72. Πέμπουσι δὲ ἐς τὴν Σάμον δέκα ἄνδρας.....δοδάξοντας—πεντακισχίλιοι δὲ ὅτι εἶεν, καὶ οὐ τετρακίσιοι μόνον, αἱ πρόσσποντοι.

viii. 86. Οἱ δ' ἀπαγγέλλουσιν ὡς αὐτοὶ ἐπὶ διαφθορῇ τῆς πόλεως ἡ μεταστάσις γένητο, ἀλλ' ἐπὶ σωτηρίᾳ.....τῶν δὲ πεντακισχιλίων ὅτι πάντες ἐν τῇ μέλει μεθέξουσιν, &c.

viii. 89. ἀλλὰ τοὺς πεντακισχιλίους ἔργῳ καὶ μὴ λόγῳ χρησάμενοι ἀποδεικνύουσιν, καὶ τῶν πολιτικῶν ἰσχυρίων καθιστάμενοι.

viii. 92. (After the Four Hundred had already been much opposed and humbled, and were on the point of being put down)—ἦν δὲ πρὸς τοῦ βχλον ἡ παράδοσις ὡς καὶ ὅστις τοὺς πεντακισχιλίους βοῦλε-

Next, it immensely augmented the means of intimidation possessed by the Four Hundred at home, by exaggerating the impression of their supposed strength. For the citizens generally were made to believe that there were five thousand real and living partners in the conspiracy; while the fact that these partners were not known and could not be individually identified, rather aggravated the reigning terror and mistrust—since every man, suspecting that his neighbour might possibly be among them, was afraid to communicate his discontent or propose means for joint resistance¹. In both these two ways, the name and assumed existence of the Five Thousand lent strength to the real Four Hundred conspirators. It masked their usurpation while it increased their hold on the respect and fears of the citizens.

As soon as the public assembly at Kolônus had with such seeming unanimity accepted all the propositions of Peisander, they were dismissed; and the new regiment of Four Hundred were chosen and constituted in the form prescribed. It now only remained to install them in the Senate-house.

The Four Hundred install themselves in the senate-house, expelling the senators by armed force.

ταὶ ἀρχαὶ ἀπὸ τῶν τετρακισίων, λίαν ἐπὶ τὸ ἔργον. Ἐπεκρίπτετο γὰρ ἅμα ἐν τῇ πεντακισχίλιῳ τῷ ὄνοματι, μὴ ἀνταρῶν δῆμον ὅστις βούλεται ἀρχαὶ διοικῆσαι—φοβούμενοι μὴ τῷ ὄντι ᾧσι, καὶ πρὸς τινὰ εἰπὼν τίς τι δι' ἄγνοιαν σφαλῇ. Καὶ οἱ τετρακίσιοι διὰ τοῦτο οὐκ ἠθέλον τοὺς πεντακισχιλίους οὕτως εἶναι, οὕτως μὴ δυνάμενοι εἶναι τὸ μὲν καταστήσαι μετόχους τοσοούτους, ἀνταρῶν δὲ δῆμον ἡγνόμενοι, τὰ δ' αὖ ἀφανέει φόβον ἐς ἀλλήλους παρεῖν.

viii. 93. λέγουσι τοὺς τε πεντακισχιλίους ἀνοφανεῖς, καὶ ἐκ τούτων ἐν μέρει, ἢ ἂν τοὺς πεντακισχιλίους δοκῇ, τοὺς τετρακισίους ἵστασθαι, τίνες δὲ τῇ πόλει μηδὲν τρόπον διαφθείρουν, &c.

Compare also c. 97.

¹ Compare the striking passage (Thucyd. viii. 92) cited in my previous note.

But this could not be done without force, since the senators were already within it; having doubtless gone thither immediately from the assembly, where their presence (at least the presence of the Prytanes, or Senators of the presiding tribe) was essential as legal presidents. They had to deliberate what they would do under the decree just passed, which divested them of all authority. Nor was it impossible that they might organise armed resistance; for which there seemed more than usual facility at the present moment, since the occupation of Dekeleia by the Lacedæmonians kept Athens in a condition like that of a permanent camp, with a large proportion of the citizens day and night under arms¹. Against this chance the Four Hundred made provision. They selected that hour of the day when the greater number of citizens habitually went home (probably to their morning meal), leaving the military station, with the arms piled and ready, under comparatively thin watch. While the general body of hoplites left the station at this hour according to the usual practice, the hoplites (Andrian, Tenian and others) in the immediate confidence of the Four Hundred were directed by private order to hold themselves prepared and in arms at a little distance off; so that if any symptoms should appear of resistance being contemplated, they might at once interfere and forestall it. Having taken this precaution, the Four Hundred marched in a body to the Senate-house, each man with a dagger concealed under his garment, and followed by their special body-guard of 120 young men from various Grecian cities—the instruments of the assassinations ordered by Antiphon and his colleagues. In this array they marched into the Senate-house, where the senators were assembled—and commanded them to depart; at the same time tendering to them their pay for all the remainder of the year (seemingly about three months or more down to the beginning of Hekatombæon, the month of new nominations) during which their functions ought to have continued. The senators were no way prepared to resist the decree just passed under the forms of legality, with an armed body now arrived to enforce its execution. They obeyed and departed, each man as he passed the door receiving the salary tendered to him. That they should yield obedience to superior force under the circumstances, can excite neither censure nor surprise; but that they should accept from the hands of the conspirators this anticipation of an unearned salary, was a meanness which almost branded them as accomplices, and dishonoured the expiring hour of the last democratical authority. The Four Hundred now found themselves triumphantly installed in the Senate-house; without the least resistance, either within its walls, or even without, by any portion of the citizens¹.

¹ See the jests of Aristophanes, about the citizens all in armour buying their provisions in the market-place and carrying them home—in the Lysistrata 560; a comedy represented about December 412 or January 411 B.C., three months earlier than the events here narrated.

Thus perished, or seemed to perish, the democracy of Athens, after an uninterrupted existence of nearly one hundred years since the revolution of Kleisthenès. So incredible did it appear that the numerous, intelligent, and constitutional citizens of Athens should suffer their liberties to be overthrown by a band of four hundred conspirators, while the great mass of them not only loved their democracy, but had arms in their hands to defend it—that even their enemy and neighbour Agis at Dekeleia could hardly imagine the revolution to be a fact accomplished. We shall see presently that it did not stand—nor would it probably have stood, had circumstances even been more favourable—but the accomplishment of it at all, is an incident too extraordinary to be passed over without some words in explanation.

Remarks on this revolution.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 69, 70.

We must remark that the tremendous catastrophe and loss of blood in Sicily had abated the energy of the Athenian character generally—but especially, had made them despair of their foreign relations; of the possibility that they could make head against enemies, increased in number by revolts among their own allies, and farther sustained by Persian gold. Upon this sentiment of despair is brought to bear the treacherous delusion of Alkibiadēs, offering them the Persian aid; that is, means of defence and success against foreign enemies, at the price of their democracy. Reluctantly the people are brought, but they are brought, to entertain the proposition: and thus the conspirators gain their first capital point—of familiarising the people with the idea of such a change of constitution. The ulterior success of the conspiracy—when all prospect of Persian gold, or improved foreign position, was at an end—is due to the combinations, alike nefarious and skilful, of Antiphon, wielding and organising the united strength of the aristocratical classes at Athens; strength always exceedingly great, but under ordinary circumstances working in fractions disunited and even reciprocally hostile to each other—restrained by the ascendant democratical institutions—and reduced to corrupt what it could not overthrow. Antiphon, about to employ this anti-popular force in one systematic scheme and for the accomplishment of a predetermined purpose, keeps still within the same ostensible constitutional limits. He raises no open mutiny: he maintains inviolate the cardinal point of Athenian political morality—respect to the decision of the senate and political assembly, as well as to constitutional maxims. But he knows well that the value of these meetings, as political securities, depends upon entire freedom of speech; and that if that freedom be suppressed, the assembly itself becomes a nullity—or rather an instrument of positive imposture and mischief. Accordingly he causes all the popular orators to be successively assassinated, so that no man dares to open his mouth on that side; while on the other hand, the anti-popular speakers are all loud and confident, cheering one another on, and seeming to represent all the feeling of the persons present. By thus silencing each individual leader, and intimidating every opponent from standing forward as spokesman, he extorts the formal sanction of the assembly and the senate to measures which the large majority of the citizens detest. That majority however are bound by their own constitutional forms: and when the decision of these, by whatever means obtained, is against them, they have neither the inclination nor the courage to resist. In no part of the world has this sentiment of constitutional duty, and submission to the vote of a legal majority, been more keenly and universally felt, than it was among the citizens of democratical Athens¹. Antiphon thus finds means to employ the constitutional sentiment of Athens as a means of killing the constitution: the mere empty form, after its vital and protective efficacy has been abstracted, remains simply as a cheat to paralyse individual patriotism.

It was this cheat which rendered the Athenians indisposed to stand forward with arms in defence of that democracy to which they were attached. Accustomed as they were to unlimited pacific contention within the bounds of their constitution, they were in the highest degree averse to anything like armed intestine contention. This is the natural effect of an established free and equal polity—to substitute the contests of the tongue for those of the sword, and sometimes, even to create so extreme a disinclination to the latter, that if liberty be energetically assailed, the counter-energy necessary for its defence may probably be found wanting. So difficult is it for the same people to have both the qualities requisite for making a free constitution work well in ordinary times, together with those very different qualities requisite for upholding it against exceptional dangers and under trying emergencies. None but an Athenian of extraordinary

¹ This striking and deep-seated regard of the Athenians for all the forms of an established constitution, makes itself felt even by Mr. Mitford (Hist. Gr. cl. xix. sect. v. vol. iv. p. 235).

Attachment to constitutional forms
at Athens—use made of this sentiment by Antiphon, to destroy the constitution.

ability like Antiphon would have understood the art of thus making the constitutional feeling of his countrymen subservient to the success of his conspiracy—and of maintaining the forms of legal dealing towards assembled and constitutional bodies, while he violated them in secret and successive stabs directed against individuals. Political assassination had been unknown at Athens (as far as our information reaches) since it was employed about fifty years before by the oligarchical party against Ephialtēs, the coadjutor of Periklēs¹. But this had been an individual case, and it was reserved for Antiphon and Phrynichus to organise a band of assassins working systematically, and taking off a series of leading victims one after the other. As the Macedonian kings in after-times required the surrender of the popular orators in a body, so the authors of this conspiracy found the same enemies to deal with, and adopted another way of getting rid of them; thus reducing the assembly into a tame and lifeless mass, capable of being intimidated into giving its collective sanction to measures which its large majority detested.

As Grecian history has been usually written, we are instructed to believe that the misfortunes, and the corruption, and the degradation of the democratical states are brought upon them by the class of demagogues, of whom Kleon, Hyperbolus, Androklês, &c. stand forth as specimens. These men are represented as mischief-makers and revilers, accusing without just cause, and converting innocence into treason. Now the history of this conspiracy of the Four Hundred presents to us the other side of the picture. It shows that the political enemies—against whom the Athenian people were protected by their democratical institutions, and by the demagogues as living organs of those institutions—were not fictitious but dangerously real. It reveals the continued existence of powerful anti-popular combinations, ready to come together for treasonable purposes when the moment appeared safe and tempting. It manifests the character and morality of the leaders, to whom the direction of the anti-popular force naturally fell. It proves that these leaders, men of uncommon ability, required nothing more than the extinction or silence of the demagogues, to be enabled to subvert the popular securities and get possession of the government. We need no better proof to teach us what was the real function and intrinsic necessity of these demagogues in the Athenian system; taking them as a class, and apart from the manner in which individuals among them may have performed their duty. They formed the vital movement of all that was tutelary and public-spirited in democracy. Aggressive in respect to official delinquents, they were defensive in respect to the public and the constitution. If that anti-popular force, which Antiphon found ready-made, had not been efficient, at a much earlier moment, in stifling the democracy—it was because there were demagogues to cry aloud, as well as assemblies to hear and sustain them. If Antiphon's conspiracy was successful, it was because he knew where to aim his blows, so as to strike down the real enemies of the oligarchy and the real defenders of the people. I here employ the term demagogues because it is that commonly used by those who denounce the class of men here under review: the proper neutral phrase, laying aside odious associations, would be to call them, popular speakers or opposition speakers. But by whatever name they may be called, it is impossible rightly to conceive their position in Athens, without looking at them in contrast and antithesis with those anti-popular forces against which they formed the indispensable barrier, and which come forth into such manifest and melancholy working under the organising hands of Antiphon and Phrynichus.

Demagogues the indispensable counterpoise and antithesis to the oligarchs.

¹ See Plutarch, Periklēs, c. 10; Diodor. xi. 77; and vol. v. of this History, chap. xlv. p. 500.

As soon as the Four Hundred found themselves formally installed in the Senate-house, they divided themselves by lot into separate Prytanies (probably ten in number, consisting of forty members each, like the former Senate of Five Hundred, in order that the distribution of the year to which the people were accustomed might not be disturbed), and then solemnized their installation by prayer and sacrifice. They put to death some political enemies, though not many: they farther imprisoned and banished others, and made large changes in the administration of affairs; carrying everything with a strictness and rigour unknown under the old constitution¹. It seems to have been proposed among them to pass a vote of restoration to all persons under sentence of exile. But this was rejected by the

Proceedings of the Four Hundred in the government.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 70. I imagine that this must be the meaning of the words—τὰ δὲ ἅλλα ἔτερον αὐτὸ κράτος εἶναι πάλιν.

majority, in order that Alkibiadés might not be among the number; nor did they think it expedient, notwithstanding, to pass the law, reserving him as a special exception.

They make overtures for peace to Agis, and to the Spartans.

They farther despatched a messenger to Agis at Dekelein, intimating their wish to treat for peace; which (they affirmed) he ought to be ready to grant to them, now that "the faithless Demos" was put down. Agis however, not believing that the Athenian people would thus submit to be deprived of their liberty, anticipated that intestine dissension would certainly break out, or at least that some portion of the Long Walls would be found unguarded, should a foreign army appear. While therefore he declined the overtures for peace, he at the same time sent for reinforcements out of Peloponnesus, and marched with a considerable army, in addition to his own garrison, up to the very walls of Athens. But he found the ramparts carefully manned: no commotion took place within: even a sally was made, in which some advantage was gained over him. He therefore speedily retired, sending back his newly-arrived reinforcements to Peloponnesus; while the Four Hundred, on renewing their advances to him for peace, now found themselves much better received, and were even encouraged to despatch envoys to Sparta itself¹.

They send envoys to the camp at Samos.

As soon as they had thus got over the first difficulties, and placed matters on a footing which seemed to promise stability, they despatched ten envoys to Samos. Aware beforehand of the danger impending over them in that quarter from the known aversion of the soldiers and seamen to anything in the nature of oligarchy, they had moreover just heard, by the arrival of Chæreas and the Paralus, of the joint attack made by the Athenian and Samian oligarchs, and of its complete failure. Had this event occurred a little earlier, it might perhaps have deterred even some of their own number from proceeding with the revolution at Athens—which was rendered thereby almost sure of failure, from the first. Their ten envoys were instructed to represent at Samos that the recent oligarchy had been established with no views injurious to the city, but on the contrary for the general benefit; that though the Council now installed consisted of Four Hundred only, yet the total number of partisans who had made the revolution and were qualified citizens under it, was Five Thousand; a number greater (they added) than had ever been actually assembled in the Pnyx under the democracy, even for the most important debates¹, in

¹ Thucyd. viii. 71.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 72. This allegation, respecting the number of citizens who attended in the Athenian democratical assemblies, has been sometimes cited as if it carried with it the authority of Thucydides; which is a great mistake, duly pointed out by all the best recent critics. It is simply the allegation of the Four Hundred, whose testimony, as a guarantee for truth, is worth little enough.

That no assembly had ever been attended by so many as 5000 (οἰδενώμενοι) I certainly am far from believing. It is not improbable, however, that 5000 was an unusually large number of citizens to attend. Dr. Arnold, in his note, opposes the allegation, in part, by remarking that "the law required not only the presence but the sanction of at least 6000 citizens to some particular decrees of the assembly." It seems to me however quite possible, that in cases where this large number of votes was required, as in the ostracism, and where there was no discussion carried on immediately before the voting—the process of voting may have lasted some hours, like our keeping open of a poll. So that though more than 6000 citizens must have voted, altogether—it consequence of the unavoidable absences of numerous individuals on military service and foreign travel.

What satisfaction might have been given, by this allusion to the fictitious Five Thousand, or by the fallacious reference to the numbers, real or pretended, of the past democratical assemblies—had these envoys carried to Samos the first tidings of the Athenian revolution—we cannot say. They were forestalled by Chæreas the officer of the Paralus; who, though the Four Hundred tried to detain him, made his escape and hastened to Samos to communicate the fearful and unexpected change which had occurred at Athens. Instead of hearing that change described under the treacherous extenuations prescribed by Antiphon and Phrynichus, the armament first learnt it from the lips of Chæreas, who told them at once the extreme truth—and even more than the truth. He recounted with indignation that every Athenian, who ventured to say a word against the Four Hundred rulers of the city, was punished with the scourge—that even the wives and children of persons hostile to them were outraged—that there was a design of seizing and imprisoning the relatives of the democrats at Samos, and putting them to death if the latter refused to obey orders from Athens. The simple narrative, of what had really occurred, would have been quite sufficient to provoke in the armament a sentiment of detestation against the Four Hundred. But these additional details of Chæreas, partly untrue, was not necessary that all should have been present in the same assembly.

First news of the revolution is conveyed to the camp by Chæreas—strong sentiment in the camp against the Four Hundred.

filled them with uncontrollable wrath, which they manifested by open menace against the known partisans of the Four Hundred at Samos, as well as against those who had taken part in the recent oligarchical conspiracy in the island. It was not without difficulty that their hands were arrested by the more reflecting citizens present, who remonstrated against the madness of such disorderly proceedings when the enemy was close upon them.

But though violence and aggressive insult were thus seasonably checked, the sentiment of the armament was too ardent and unanimous to be satisfied without some solemn, emphatic, and decisive declaration against the oligarchs at Athens. A great democratical manifestation, of the most earnest and imposing character, was proclaimed, chiefly at the instance of Thrasybulus and Thrasyllus. The Athenian armament, brought together in one grand assembly, took an oath by the most stringent sanctions—To maintain their democracy—To keep up friendship and harmony with each other—To carry on the war against the Peloponnesians with energy—To be at enmity with the Four Hundred at Athens, and to enter into no amicable communication with them whatever. The whole armament swore to this compact with enthusiasm, and even those who had before taken part in the oligarchical movements were forced to be forward in the ceremony¹. What lent double force to this touching scene, was, that the entire Samian population, every male of the military age, took the oath along with the friendly armament. Both pledged themselves to mutual fidelity and common suffering or triumph, whatever might be the issue of the contest. Both felt that the Peloponnesians at Milētus, and the Four Hundred at Athens, were alike their enemies, and that the success of either would be their common ruin.

Ardent democratical manifestation, and emphatic oath, taken both by the Athenian armament at Samos and by the Samians.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 75. Μετά δὲ τοῦτο, λαμπρῶς ἦδη ἐν δημοκρατίᾳ βουλόμενοι μεταστῆσαι τὰ ἐν τῇ Σάμῳ δὲ τε Θρασυβούλοι καὶ Θρασυλλοί, ἔρρωσαν πάντας τοὺς στρατιώτας τοὺς μερίστους ἔσταναι, καὶ αὐτοὺς ταῦτα ἐκ τῆς ὀλιγαρχίας μιλίσσας, ἢ μὴν δημοκρατῆσθαι καὶ ὁμοσῆσθαι, καὶ τοὺς πρὸς Πελοποννησίωνες πόλεμον προθύμως διαίσταναι, καὶ τοὺς τετραπολίαις πολέμῳ τε ἵστανθαι καὶ οὐδὲν ἐπιτηδευέσθαι. Συνέσπονσαν δὲ

Pursuant to this resolution—of upholding their democracy and at the same time sustaining the war against the Peloponnesians, at all cost or peril to themselves—the soldiers of the armament now took a step unparalleled in Athenian history. Feeling that they could no longer receive orders from Athens under her present oligarchical rulers, with whom Charminus and others among their own leaders were implicated, they constituted themselves into a sort of community apart, and held an assembly as citizens to choose anew their generals and trierarchs. Of those already in command, several were deposed as unworthy of trust; others being elected in their places, especially Thrasybulus and Thrasyllus. Nor was the assembly held for election alone; it was a scene of effusive sympathy, animating eloquence, and patriotism generous as well as resolute. The united armament felt that they were the real Athens; the guardians of her constitution—the upholders of her remaining em-καὶ Σαμίως πάντες τὸν αὐτὸν ὅρκον οἱ ἐν τῇ ἡλικίᾳ, καὶ τὰ πράγματα πάντα καὶ τὰ υποθέματα ἐκ τῶν ἐκείνων συνεισφέρουσιν· οἱ στρατιῶται τοὺς Σαμίους, νομίζοντες ὅτε ἐκείνοις ἀποστροφῇ σωτηρίας ὅτε σφίσι εἶναι, ἄλλ' ἢ ὅτι τε οἱ τετραπύκνιστοι κρατήσωσι ἢ τε οἱ ἐκ Μιλήτου πολέμους, διαφθορήσονται.

The Athenian democracy is reconstituted by the armament—public assembly of the soldiers—new generals chosen.

pire and glory—the protectors of her citizens at home against those conspirators who had intruded themselves wrongfully into the Senate-house—the sole barrier, even for those conspirators themselves, against the hostile Peloponnesian fleet. “The city has revolted from us” (exclaimed Thrasybulus and others in pregnant words which embodied a whole train of feeling¹). “But let not this abate our courage: for they are only the lesser force—we are the greater and the self-sufficing. We have here the whole navy of the state, whereby we can ensure to ourselves the contributions from our dependencies just as well as if we started from Athens. We have the hearty attachment of Samos, second in power only to Athens herself, and serving us as a military station against the enemy, now as in the past. We are better able to obtain supplies for ourselves, than those in the city for themselves; for it is only through our presence at Samos that they have hitherto kept the mouth of Peiræus open. If they refuse to restore to us our democratical constitution, we shall be better able to exclude them from the sea than they to exclude us. What indeed does the city do now for us to second our efforts against the enemy? Little or nothing. We have lost nothing by their separation. They send us no pay—they leave us to provide maintenance for ourselves—they are now out of condition for sending us even good counsel, which is the great superiority of a city over a camp¹. As counsellors, we here are better than they; for they have just committed the wrong of subverting the constitution of our common country—while we are striving to maintain it, and will do our best to force them into the same track. Alkibiadès, if we ensure to him a safe restoration, will cheerfully bring the alliance of Persia to sustain us; and even if the worst comes to the worst—if all other hopes fail us—our powerful naval force will always enable us to find places of refuge in abundance, with city and territory adequate to our wants."

¹ Thucyd. viii. 76. Καὶ παραίνονται ἄλλαι τε ἐποιούνητο ἐν σφίσιν αἰτίαις δυνατάμενοι, καὶ ὡς αὐτοὶ δεῖ ἀθροεῖν ὅτι ἡ πόλις αὐτῶν ἀφίστηκε τοῖς γὰρ ἐλάσσονι ἀπὸ σφῶν τῶν πλεόνων καὶ ἐκ πάντων πολεμικώτερον μεθεστάναι.

Such was the encouraging language of Thrasyllus and Thrasybulus, which found full sympathy in the armament, and raised among them a spirit of energetic patriotism and resolution, not unworthy of their forefathers when refugees at Salamis under the invasion of Xerxès. To regain their democracy and to sustain the war against the Peloponnesians, were impulses alike ardent and blended in the same tide of generous enthusiasm; a tide so vehement as to sweep before it the reluctance of that minority who had before been inclined to the oligarchical movement. But besides these two impulses, there was also a third, tending towards the recall of Alkibiadès; a coadjutor, if in many ways useful, yet bringing with him a spirit of selfishness and duplicity uncongenial to the exalted sentiment now all-powerful at Samos¹.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 76. Βραχὺ δέ τι εἶναι καὶ οὐδένος ἄξιον, ᾧ πρὸς τὸ περιγίγνεσθαι τῶν πολέμων ἡ πόλις χρήσιμος ἦν, καὶ οὐδὲν ἀποβαλεῖναι, οἳ γε μὴτε ὀργίμων ἔτι εἶχε πένθει, ἀλλ' αὐτοὶ ἐκορίζοντο οἱ στρατιῶται, μὴτε βούλευμα χρηστὸν, ὅσπερ ἔτεκα πόλις στρατοπέδου κρητὶς ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐν τοῖσι τοῖς μὲν ἡμετέροις, τοῖς πατρίσι νόμους καταλείψαντας, αὐτοὶ δὲ πᾶσαι καὶ ἐκείνοις περὶστάδας προσαναγκάζειν. "Ὅστις γὰρ τοῖσι, αὐτὰρ ὡς βασιλεύειν τι χρηστὸν, παρὰ σφίσι χεῖρους εἶναι.

This exile had been the first to originate the oligarchical conspiracy, whereby Athens, already scarcely adequate to the exigences of her foreign war, was now paralysed in courage and torn by civil discord—preserved from absolute ruin only by that counter-enthusiasm which a fortunate turn of circumstances had raised up at Samos. Having at first duped the conspirators themselves and enabled them to dupe the sincere democrats, by promising Persian aid and thus floating the plot over its first and greatest difficulties—Alkibiadēs had found himself constrained to break with them as soon as the time came for realising his promises. But he had broken off with so much address as still to keep up the illusion that he could realise them if he chose. His return by means of the oligarchy being now impossible, he naturally became its enemy, and this new antipathy superseded his feeling of revenge against the democracy for having banished him. In fact he was disposed (as Phryni-chus had truly said about him)¹ to avail himself indifferently of either, according as the one or the other presented itself as a serviceable agency for his ambitious views. Accordingly, as soon as the turn of affairs at Samos had made itself manifest, he opened communication with Thrasybulus and the democratical leaders², renewing to them the same promises of Persian alliance, on condition of his own restoration, as he had before made to Peisander and the oligarchical party. Thrasybulus and his colleagues either sincerely believed him, or at least thought that his restoration afforded a possibility, not to be neglected, of obtaining Persian aid, without which they despaired of the war. Such possibility would at least infuse spirit into the soldiers; while the restoration was now proposed without the terrible condition which had before accompanied it, of renouncing the democratical constitution.

Alkibiadēs opens correspondence with the democratic armament at Samos.

¹ The application of the Athenians at Samos to Alkibiadēs, reminds us of the emphatic language in which Tacitus characterises an incident in some respects similar. The Roman army, fighting in the cause of Vitellius against Vespasian, had been betrayed by their general Cæcina, who endeavoured to carry them over to the latter: his army however refused to follow him, adhered to their own cause, and put him under arrest. Being afterwards defeated by the troops of Vespasian, and obliged to capitulate in Cremona, they released Cæcina, and solicited his intercession to obtain favourable terms. "Primores castrorum nomen atque imagines Vitellii amoliuntur: catenas Cæcinæ (nam etiam tum victus erat) exsolvunt, proutque, ut causæ suæ deprecator adisset: aspernantem tumentemque lacrymis fatigant. Extremum malorum, tot fortissimi viri, proditoris opem invocantes" (Tacitus, Histor. iii. 31).

Alkibiadēs comes to Samos, on the invitation of the armament.

It was not without difficulty, however, nor until after more than one assembly and discussion³, that Thrasybulus prevailed on the armament to pass a vote of security and restoration to Alkibiadēs. As Athenian citizens, the soldiers probably were unwilling to take upon them the reversal of a sentence solemnly passed by the democratical tribunal, on the ground of irreligion with suspicion of treason. They were however induced to pass the vote, after which Thrasybulus sailed over to the Asiatic coast, brought across Alkibiadēs to the island, and introduced him to the assembled armament. The supple exile, who had denounced the democracy so bitterly both at Sparta, and in his correspondence with the oligarchical conspirators, knew well how to adapt himself to the sympathies of the democratical assembly now before him. He began by deploring the sentence of banishment passed against him, and throwing the blame of it, not upon the injustice of his countrymen, but upon his own unhappy destiny¹. He then entered upon the public prospects of the moment, pledging himself with entire confidence to realise the hopes of Persian alliance, and boasting in terms not merely ostentatious but even extravagant, of the ascendant influence which he possessed over Tissaphernēs. The satrap had promised him (so the speech went on) never to let the Athenians want for pay, as soon as he once came to trust them; not even if it were necessary to issue out his last daric or to coin his own silver couch into money. Nor would he require any farther condition to induce him to trust them, except that Alkibiadēs should be restored and should become their guarantee. Not only would he furnish the Athenians with pay, but he would, besides, bring up to their aid the Phenician fleet, which was

¹ Thucyd. viii. 48.

² Thucydides does not expressly mention this communication—but it is implied in the words 'Αλκιβιάδην—ἀσμενον παρέχειν, &c. (viii. 76).

³ Thucyd. viii. 81. Θρασυβούλου, δὲι τε τῆς πότῃς γνώμης ἐχόμενος, ἐπειδὴ μερίστησι τὰ πρόγματα, ὥστε κατὰγειν Ἀλκιβιάδην, καὶ τῆλοι ἐν' ἐκκλησίᾳ ἔπεισε τὸ πλῆθος τῶν στρατιωτῶν, &c.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 81. γενομένης δὲ ἐκδηλώσεως τῆς τοῦ ἰδίου ἐνδοφροσύνης τῆς φυγῆς ἐπενείσασατο καὶ ἀπολογούμενα δ' Ἀλκιβιάδῃ, &c.

Contrast the different language of Alkibiadēs, vi. 92; viii. 47.

For the word ἐνδοφροσύνη, compare i. 127.

Nothing can be more false and perverted than the manner in which the proceedings of Alkibiadēs, during this period, are presented in the Oration of Isokrates de Regis, sect. 18-23.

already at Aspendus—instead of placing it at the disposal of the Peloponnesians.

Confidence placed by the armament in his language and promises—they choose him one of their generals.

In the communications of Alkibiadès with Peisander and his coadjutors, Alkibiadès had pretended that the Great King could have no confidence in the Athenians unless they not only restored him, but abnegated their democracy. On this occasion, the latter condition was withdrawn, and the confidence of the Great King was said to be more easily accorded. But though Alkibiadès thus presented himself with a new falsehood, as well as with a new vein of political sentiment, his discourse was eminently successful. It answered all the various purposes which he contemplated—partly of intimidating and disuniting the oligarchical conspirators at home—partly of exalting his own grandeur in the eyes of the armament—partly of sowing mistrust between the Spartans and Tissaphernès. It was in such full harmony with both the reigning feelings of the armament—eagerness to put down the Four Hundred, as well as to get the better of their Peloponnesian enemies in Ionia—that the hearers were not disposed to scrutinise narrowly the grounds upon which his assurances rested. In the fulness of confidence and enthusiasm, they elected him general along with Thrasybulus and the rest; conceiving redoubled hopes of victory over their enemies both at Athens and at Milétus. So completely indeed were their imaginations filled with the prospect of Persian aid, against their enemies in Ionia, that alarm for the danger of Athens under the government of the Four Hundred became the predominant feeling; and many voices were even raised in favour of sailing to Peiræus for the rescue of the city. But Alkibiadēs, knowing well (what the armament did not know) that his own promises of Persian pay and fleet were a mere delusion, strenuously dissuaded such a movement, which would have left the dependencies in Ionia defenceless against the Peloponnesians. As soon as the assembly broke up, he crossed over again to the mainland, under pretence of concerting measures with Tissaphernēs to realise his recent engagements.

Relieved, substantially though not in strict form, from the penalties of exile, Alkibiadēs was thus launched in a new career. After having first played the game of Athens against Sparta, next that of Sparta against Athens, thirdly that of Tissaphernēs against both—he now professed to take up again the promotion of Athenian interests. In reality, however, he was, and had always been, playing his own game, or obeying his own self-interest, ambition, or antipathy. He was at this time eager to make a show of intimate and confidential communication with Tissaphernēs, in order that he might thereby impose upon the Athenians at Samos; to communicate to the satrap his recent election as general of the Athenian force, that his importance with the Persians might be enhanced; and lastly, by passing backwards and forwards from Tissaphernēs to the Athenian camp, to exhibit an appearance of friendly concert between the two, which might sow mistrust and alarm in the minds of the Peloponnesians. In this tripartite manœuvring, so suitable to his habitual character, he was more or less successful; especially in regard to the latter purpose. For though he never had any serious chance of inducing Tissaphernês to assist the Athenians, he did nevertheless contribute to alienate him from the enemy, as well as the enemy from him¹.

New position of Alkibiadēs—present turn of his ambition.

Without any longer delay in the camp of Tissaphernês than was necessary to keep up the faith of the Athenians in his promise of Persian aid, Alkibiadês returned to Samos, where he was found by the ten envoys sent by the Four Hundred from Athens, on their first arrival. These envoys had been long in their voyage; having made a considerable stay at Delos, under alarm from intelligence of the previous visit of Chæreas, and the furious indignation which his narrative had provoked². At length they reached Samos, and were invited by the generals to make their communication to the assembled armament. They had the utmost difficulty in procuring a hearing—so strong was the antipathy against them—so loud were the cries that the subverters of the democracy ought to be put to death. Silence being at length obtained, they proceeded to state that the late revolution had been brought to pass for the salvation of the city, and especially for the economy of the public treasure, by suppressing the salaried civil functions of the democracy, and thus leaving more pay for the soldiers³: that there was no purpose of mischief in the change, still less of betrayal to the enemy, which might already have been ef-

¹ Thucyd. viii. 82, 83, 87.

² Thucyd. viii. 77-86.

³ Thucyd. viii. 86. Εἰ δὲ ἐς εὐταλείαν τι ζωνήσμεθα, τότε τοῖς στρατιώταις ἔχειν τροφήν, πᾶσι δαπανεῖν.

This is a part of the answer of Alkibiadês to the envoys, and therefore indicates what they had urged.

The envoys of the Four Hundred reach Samos—are indignantly sent back by the armament.

fect, had such been the intention of the Four Hundred, when Agis advanced from Dekeleia up to the walls: that the citizens, now possessing the political franchise, were, not Four Hundred only, but Five Thousand in number, all of whom would take their turn in rotation for the places now occupied by the Four Hundred¹: that the recitals of Chæreas, affirming ill-usage to have been offered to

¹ Thucyd. viii. 86. τῶν τε πεντακισχιλίων ὅτι πάντες ἐν τῷ μέρει μετέξουσιν, &c. I dissent from Dr. Arnold's construction of this passage, which is followed both by Poppo and by Göllez. He says in his note—"The sense must clearly be, 'that all the citizens should be of the five thousand in their turn,' however strange the expression may seem, μετέξουσιν τῶν πεντακισχιλίων. But without referring to the absurdity of the meaning, that all the Five Thousand should partake of the government in their turn—for they all partook of it as being the sovereign assembly—yet μετέχουσιν in this sense would require τῶν προγεμάρων after it, and would be at least as harsh, standing alone, as in the construction of μετέξουσιν τῶν πεντακισχιλίων."

Upon this I remark—1. Μετέχουσιν may be construed with a genitive case not actually expressed, but understood out of the words preceding; as we may see by Thucyd. ii. 16, where I agree with the interpretation suggested by Matthiæ (Gr. Gr. § 325), rather than with Dr. Arnold's note.

2. In the present instance, we are not reduced to the necessity of gathering a genitive case for μετέχουσιν by implication out of previous phraseology: for the express genitive case stands there a line or two before—τῆς πόλεως, the idea of which is carried down without being ever dropped—εἰ δ' ἀπὸ γυγλίων, ὡς ὅτε ἐπὶ διαφθορᾷ τῆς πόλεως ἡ μετὰστασις γένοιτο, ἀλλ' ἐπὶ σωτηρίᾳ, ὥσθ' ὡς τοῖς πολεμίοις παραδοθῇ (i. e. ἡ πόλις).....τῶν τε πεντακισχιλίων ὅτι πάντες ἐν τῷ μέρει μετέξουσιν (i. e. τῆς πόλεως).

There is therefore no harshness of expression; nor is there any absurdity of meaning, as we may see by the repetition of the very same in viii. 93—λέγουσι τοὺς τε πεντακισχιλίους ἀποφανείν, καὶ ἐκ τούτων ἐν μέρει, ἧ δ' ἂν τοῖς πεντακισχιλίοις δοῖται, ταῖς τετρακισίοις ἵστασθαι, &c.

Dr. Arnold's designation of these Five Thousand as "the sovereign assembly" is not very accurate. They were not an assembly at all: they had never been called together, nor had anything been said about an intention of calling them together: in reality, they were but a fiction and a name—but even the Four Hundred themselves pretended only the relatives of the soldiers at Athens, were utterly false and calumnious.

Such were the topics on which the envoys insisted, in an apologetic strain, at considerable length, but without any effect in conciliating the soldiers who heard them. The general resentment against the Four Hundred was expressed by several persons present in public speech, by others in private manifestation of feeling against the envoys: and so passionately was this sentiment aggravated—consisting not only of wrath for what the oligarchy had done, but of fear for what they might do—that the proposition of sailing immediately to the Peiræus was revived with greater ardour than before. Alkibiadēs, who had already once discountenanced this design, now stood forward to repel it again. Nevertheless all the plenitude of his influence, then greater than that of any other officer in the armament, and seconded by the esteemed character as well as the loud voice of Thrasybulus¹, was required to avert it. But for him, it would have been executed. While he reproved and silenced those who were most clamorous against the envoys, he took upon himself to give to the latter a public answer in the name of the collective armament. "We make no objection (he said) to the power of the Five Thousand: but the Four Hundred must to talk of them as partners in the conspiracy and revolution, not as an assembly to be convoked—παρακληθῆναι—οἱ πρᾶκτορες (viii. 72).

As to the idea of bringing all the remaining citizens to equal privileges (in rotation) with the Five Thousand, we shall see that it was never broached until considerably after the Four Hundred had been put down.

¹ Pintarch, Alkibiadēs, c. 26.

Eagerness of the armament to sail to Peiræus—is discountenanced by Alkibiadēs—his answer to the envoys.

go about their business, and reinstate the Senate of Five Hundred as it was before. We are much obliged for what you have done in the way of economy, so as to increase the pay available for the soldiers. Above all, maintain the war strenuously, without any flinching before the enemy. For if the city be now safely held, there is good hope that we may make up the mutual differences between us by amicable settlement; but if once either of us perish, either we here or you at home, there will be nothing left for the other to make up with¹."

With this reply he dismissed the envoys; the armament reluctantly abandoning their wish of sailing to Athens. Thucydides insists much on the capital service which Alkibiades then rendered to his country, by arresting a project which would have had the effect of leaving all Ionia and the Hellespont defenceless against the Peloponnesians. His advice doubtless turned out well in the result; yet if we contemplate the state of affairs at the moment when he gave it, we shall be inclined to doubt whether prudential calculation was not rather against him, and in favour of the impulse of the armament. For what was to hinder the Four Hundred from patching up a peace with Sparta, and getting a Lacedæmonian garrison into Athens to help them in maintaining their dominion? Even apart from ambition, this was their best chance, if not their only chance, of safety for themselves:

Disuasive advice of Alkibiades
—how far it is to be commended as sagacious.

¹ Thucyd. xiii. 86. Καὶ τὰλλα ἐκέλευεν ἀπέχεσθαι, καὶ μὴδεν ἐπιδοῦναι τοῖς πολέμοις· πρὸς μὲν γὰρ σφάτε αὐτοὺς συναρμόνους τῆς πόλεως πολλὰν ἐλπίδα εἶναι καὶ συμβῆναι, εἰ δὲ ἀπαρ τὸ ἔκτερον σφαλίσσεται ἢ τὸ ἐν Σάμῳ ἢ ἐκείνῳ, οὐδὲ ὅττι διαλλαγῶσιναι τι εἴη ἰστέον.

and we shall presently see that they tried to do it—being prevented from succeeding, partly indeed by the mutiny which arose against them at Athens, but still more by the stupidity of the Lacedæmonians themselves. Alkibiadès could not really imagine that the Four Hundred would obey his mandate delivered to the envoys, and resign their power voluntarily. But if they remained masters of Athens, who could calculate what they would do—after having received this declaration of hostility from Samos—not merely in regard to the foreign enemy, but even in regard to the relatives of the absent soldiers? Whether we look to the legitimate apprehensions of the soldiers, inevitable while their relatives were thus exposed, and almost unnerving them as to the hearty prosecution of the war abroad in their utter uncertainty with regard to matters at home—or to the chance of irreparable public calamity, greater even than the loss of Ionia, by the betrayal of Athens to the enemy—we shall be disposed to conclude that the impulse of the armament was not merely natural, but even founded on a more prudent estimate of the actual chances, and that Alkibiadès was nothing more than fortunate in a sanguine venture. And if, instead of the actual chances, we look to the chances as Alkibiadès represented, and as the armament conceived them upon his authority—viz. that the Phœnician fleet was close at hand to act against the Lacedæmonians in Ionia—we shall sympathise yet more with the defensive movement homeward. Alkibiadès had an advantage over every one else, simply by knowing his own falsehoods.

At the same assembly were introduced envoys from Argos, bearing a mission of recognition and an offer of aid to the Athenian Demos in Samos. They came in an Athenian trireme, navigated by the Paralî who had brought home Chæreas in the Paralus from Samos to Athens, and had been then transferred into a common ship of war and sent to cruise about Eubœa. Since that time, however, they had been directed to convey Læspodias, Aristophon, and Melésias¹, as ambassadors from the Four Hundred to Sparta. But when crossing the Argolic Gulf, probably under orders to land at Prasiæ, they declared against the oligarchy, sailed to Argos, and there deposited as prisoners the three ambassadors, who had all been active in the conspiracy of the Four Hundred. Being then about to depart for Samos, they were requested by the Argeians to carry thither their envoys, who were dismissed by Alkibiadês with an expression of gratitude, and with a hope that their aid would be ready when called for.

Envoys sent from Argos to the "Athenian Demos at Samos."

Meanwhile the envoys returned from Samos to Athens, carrying back to the Four Hundred the unwelcome news of their total failure with the armament. A little before, it appears, some of the trierarchs on service at the Hellespont had returned to Athens also—Eratosthenês, Iatroklês and others, who had tried to turn their squadron to the purposes of the oligarchical conspirators, but had been baffled and driven off by the inflexible democracy of their own seamen¹. If at Athens, the calculations of these conspirators had succeeded more triumphantly than could have been expected beforehand, everywhere else they had completely miscarried; not merely at Samos and in the fleet, but also with the allied dependencies. At the time when Peisander quitted Samos for Athens to consummate the oligarchical conspiracy even without Alkibiadēs, he and others had gone round many of the dependencies and had effected a similar revolution in their internal government, in hopes that they would thus become attached to the new oligarchy at Athens. But this anticipation (as Phrynichus had predicted) was nowhere realised. The newly-created oligarchies only became more anxious for complete autonomy than the democracies had been before. At Thasos especially, a body of exiles who had for some time dwelt in Peloponnesus were recalled, and active preparations were made for revolt, by new fortifications as well as by new triremes². Instead of strengthening their hold on the maritime empire, the Four Hundred thus found that they had actually weakened it; while the pronounced hostility of the armament at Samos not only put an end to all their hopes abroad, but rendered their situation at home altogether precarious.

Return of the envoys of the Four Hundred from Samos to Athens—had prospects of the oligarchy.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 86. It is very probable that the Melésias here mentioned was the son of that Thucydidês who was the leading political opponent of Periklês. Melésias appears as one of the dramatis personæ in Plato's dialogue called Lachês.

From the moment when the coadjutors of Anti-

¹ Lynias cont. Eratosthen. sect. 43, c. 9, p. 411 Reisk. ὡς γὰρ εἰς πῦρως (Eratosthenes) τῷ ἑαυτοῦ πλῆθει τὰ ἐκείναι ἐπραξεν, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐπὶ τοῖς Τετρακοσίοις ἐν τῷ στρατοπέδῳ ὀλιγαρχίαν καθιστάν ἐβόησαν ἐξ Ἑλλησπόντου τριηράρχος καταλαβὼν τὴν νῆον, μετὰ Ἰατροκλῆους καὶ ἑτέρων.....ἀφισκόμενοι δὲ δεῦρο πάντας τοὺς βουλευμένους δημοκρατίας εἶναι ἔπεισαν.

² Thucyd. viii. 64.

phon first learnt, through the arrival of Chæreas at Athens, the proclamation of the democracy at Samos—discord, mistrust, and alarm began to spread even among their own members; together with a conviction that the oligarchy could never stand except through the presence of a Peloponnesian garrison in Athens. While Antiphon and Phrynichus, the leading minds who directed the majority of the Four Hundred, despatched envoys to Sparta for concluding peace (these envoys never reached Sparta, being seized by the Parali and sent prisoners to Argos, as above stated) and commenced the erection of a special fort at Eetioneia, the projecting mole which contracted and commanded, on the northern side, the narrow entrance of Peiræus—there began to arise even in the bosom of the Four Hundred an opposition minority affecting popular sentiment, among whom the most conspicuous persons were Theramenês and Aristokratês¹.

Mistrust and discord among the Four Hundred themselves. An opposition party formed under Theramenês.

Though these men had stood forward prominently as contrivers and actors throughout the whole progress of the conspiracy, they now found themselves bitterly disappointed by the result. Individually, their ascendancy with their colleagues was inferior to that of Peisander, Kallæschrus, Phrynichus, and others; while, collectively, the ill-gotten power of the Four Hundred was diminished in value, as much as it was aggravated in peril, by the loss of the foreign empire and the alienation of their

¹ Thucyd. viii. 89, 90. The representation of the character and motives of Theramenês, as given by Lysias in the Oration contra Erastostenem (Orat. xii. sect. 66, 67, 79; Orat. xiii. cont. Agorat. sect. 12-17), is quite in harmony with that of Thucydides (viii. 89): compare Aristophan. Ran. 541-966; Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 27-30.

Samian armament. Now began the workings of jealousy and strife among the successful conspirators, each of whom had entered into the scheme with unbounded expectations of personal ambition for himself—each had counted on stepping at once into the first place among the new oligarchical body. In a democracy (observes Thucydides) contentions for power and pre-eminence provoke in the unsuccessful competitors less of fierce antipathy and sense of injustice, than in an oligarchy; for the losing candidates acquiesce with comparatively little repugnance in the unfavourable vote of a large miscellaneous body of unknown citizens; but they are angry at being put aside by a few known comrades, their rivals as well as their equals: moreover at the moment when an oligarchy of ambitious men has just raised itself on the ruins of a democracy, every man of the conspirators is in exaggerated expectation—every one thinks himself entitled to become at once the first man of the body, and is dissatisfied if he be merely put upon a level with the rest¹.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 89. ἦν δὲ τοῖτο μὲν σχῆμα πολιτικῶν τοῦ λόγου αὐτοῖς, κατ' ἰδίαν δὲ φιλοτιμίας οἱ πολλοὶ αὐτῶν ἐν ταυτοῖς προσέκυτον, ἐν ᾧ περ καὶ μάλιστα ὀλιγαρχία ἐκ δημοκρατίας γενομένη ἀπόλλυται. πάντες γὰρ πειθόμενοι ἀξιοῦσιν οὐχ ὅπως ἴσοι, ἀλλὰ καὶ πολλοὶ πρῶτος αὐτοῖς ἕκαστος εἶναι· ἐκ δὲ δημοκρατίας αἰρίσσεως γενομένης, ῥῆον τὰ ἀποβαινόντα, ἐκ εἰς ἀπὸ τῶν ὁμοίων, διασπόμενός τις φέρεται.

I give in the text what appears to me the proper sense of this passage, the last words of which are obscure: see the long notes of the commentators, especially Dr. Arnold and Poppe. Dr. Arnold considers τῶν ὁμοίων as a neuter, and gives the paraphrase of the last clause as follows:—"Whereas under an old established government, they (ambitious men of talent) are prepared to fail: they know that the weight of the government is against them, and are thus spared the peculiar pain of being beaten in a fair race, when they and their competitors

Such were the feelings of disappointed ambition, mingled with despondency, which sprung up among start with equal advantages, and there is nothing to lessen the mortification of defeat. Ἀπὸ τῶν ἰσχυρῶν θανούσιν, is, being beaten when the game is equal, when the terms of the match are fair."

I cannot concur in Dr. Arnold's explanation of these words, or of the general sense of the passage. He thinks that Thucydides means to affirm what applies generally "to an opposition minority when it succeeds in revolutionizing the established government, whether the government be a democracy or a monarchy—whether the minority be an aristocratical party or a popular one." It seems to me, on the contrary, that the affirmation bears only on the special case of an oligarchical conspiracy subverting a democracy, and that the comparison taken is applicable only to the state of things as it stood under the preceding democracy.

Next, the explanation given of the words by Dr. Arnold assumes that "to be beaten in a fair race, or when the terms of the match are fair," causes to the loser the maximum of pain and offence. This is surely not the fact; or rather, the reverse is the fact. The man who loses his cause or his election through unjust favour, jealousy, or antipathy, is more hurt than if he had lost it under circumstances where he could find no injustice to complain of. In both cases, he is doubtless mortified; but if there be injustice, he is offended and angry as well as mortified: he is disposed to take vengeance on men whom he looks upon as his personal enemies. It is important to distinguish the mortification of simple failure, from the discontent and anger arising out of belief that the failure has been unjustly brought about: it is this discontent, tending to break out in active opposition, which Thucydides has present to his mind in the comparison which he takes between the state of feeling which precedes and follows the subversion of the democracy.

It appears to me that the words τῶν ἰσχυρῶν are masculine, and that they have reference (like σώφρων and ἰσος in the preceding line) to the privileged minority of equal confederates who are supposed to have just got possession of the government. At Sparta, the word ἰσχυροί acquired a sort of technical sense to designate the small ascendent minority of wealthy Spartan citizens, who monopolised in their own hands political power, to the practical exclusion of the remainder (see Xenoph. Hellen. iii. 3. 5; Xenoph. Resp. Lac. x. 7; xiii. 1; Demosth. cont. Lept. s. 88). Now these ἰσχυροί or peers, here indicated by Thucydides as the peers of a recently-formed oligarchy, are not merely equal among themselves, but rivals one with another, and personally known to each other. It is important to bear in mind all these attributes as tacitly implied (though not literally designated or connoted) by the word ἰσχυροί or peers; because the comparison instituted by Thucydides is founded a minority of the Four Hundred, immediately after the news of the proclamation of the democracy at Samos

on all the attributes taken together; just as Aristotle (Rhetoric ii. 8; ii. 13, 4), in speaking of the envy and jealousy apt to arise towards rois opoiots, considers them as despôtas and despotisieruz.

The Four Hundred at Athens were all peers—equals, rivals, and personally known among one another—who had just raised themselves by joint conspiracy to supreme power. Theramenes, one of the number, conceives himself entitled to pre-eminence, but finds that he is shut out from it; the men who shut him out being this small body of known equals and rivals. He is inclined to impute the exclusion to personal motives on the part of this small knot—to selfish ambition on the part of each—to ill-will—to jealousy—to wrongful partiality: so that he thinks himself injured, and the sentiment of injury is embittered by the circumstance that those from whom it proceeds are a narrow, known, and definite, body of colleagues. Whereas, if his exclusion had taken place under the democracy, by the suffrage of a large, miscellaneous, and personally unknown, collection of citizens—he would have been far less likely to carry off with him a sense of injury. Doubtless he would have been mortified: but he would not have looked upon the electors in the light of jealous or selfish rivals, nor would they form a definite body before him for his indignation to concentrate itself upon. Timæ Nikomachidês—whom Sokratês (see Xenophon, Memor. iii. 4) meets returning mortified because the people had chosen another person and not him as general—would have been not only mortified, but angry and vindictive besides, if he had been excluded by a few peers and rivals.

Such, in my judgement, is the comparison which Thucydides wishes to draw between the effect of disappointment inflicted by the suffrage of a numerous and miscellaneous body of citizens—compared with disappointment inflicted by a small knot of oligarchical peers upon a competitor among their own number, especially at a moment when the expectations of all these peers are exaggerated, in consequence of the recent acquisition of their power. I believe the remark of the historian to be quite just: and that the disappointment in the first case is less intense—less connected with the sentiment of injury—and less likely to lead to active manifestation of enmity. This is one among the advantages of a numerous suffrage.

I cannot better illustrate the jealousies pretty sure to break out among a small number of ἰσῆες or rival peers, than by the description which Justin gives of the leading officers of Alexander the Great immediately after that monarch's death (Justin, xii. 2):—

"Ceterum, occhio Alexandro, nun, ut lecti, ita et securi facto, omnibus eum locum competentibus: nec nimis milites iuricem se timebant, quorum et libertas solutio et favor incertus erat. Inter among the armament. Theramenes, the leader of this minority—a man of keen ambition, clever but unsteady and treacherous, not less ready to desert his party than to betray his country, though less prepared for extreme atrocities than many of his oligarchical comrades—began to look out for a good pretence to disconnect himself from a precarious enterprise. Taking advantage of the delusion which the Four Hundred had themselves held out about the fictitious Five Thousand, he insisted that since the dangers that beset the newly-formed authority were so much more formidable than had been anticipated, it was necessary to popularise the party by enrolling and producing these Five Thousand as a real instead of a fictitious body¹. Such an opposition, formidable from the very outset, became still bolder and more developed when the envoys re-

Ther-menes demands that the Five Thousand shall be made a reality.

ipso vero equalitas discordians agebat, nemine tantum ceteros excedente, ut ei aliquis se submitteret."

Compare Plutarch, Lysander, c. 23.

Haack and Poppo think that ἀποίας cannot be masculine, because ἐνὶ τῇ ἀποίᾳ Ἀθρομένους would not then be correct, but ought to be, ἐνὶ τῇ ἀποίᾳ Ἀθρομένων. I should dispute, under all circumstances, the correctness of this criticism; for there are quite enough parallel cases to defend the use of ἐνὶ here (see Thucyd. i. 17; iii. 82; iv. 115; vi. 28, &c.). But we need not enter into the debate; for the genitive τῶν ἀποίων depends rather upon τὰ ἀνταίσιμα which precedes, than upon Ἀθρομένους which follows; and the preposition ἐνὶ is what we should naturally expect. To mark this I have put a comma after ἀνταίσιμα as well as after ἀποίων.

To show that an opinion is not correct, indeed, does not afford certain evidence that Thucydides may not have advanced it: for he might be mistaken. But it ought to count as good presumptive evidence, unless the words peremptorily bind us to the contrary; which in this case they do not.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 86, 2. Of this sentence from φθορίσσει down to καθάρσει, I only profess to understand the last clause. It is useless to discuss the many conjectural amendments of a corrupt text, none of them satisfactory.

turned from Samos, with an account of their reception by the armament, as well as of the answer, delivered in the name of the armament, whereby Alkibiadès directed the Four Hundred to dissolve themselves forthwith, but at the same time approved of the constitution of the Five Thousand, coupled with the restoration of the old senate. To enroll the Five Thousand at once, would be meeting the army half-way; and there were hopes that at that price a compromise and reconciliation might be effected, of which Alkibiadès had himself spoken as practicable¹. In addition to the formal answer, the envoys doubtless brought back intimation of the enraged feelings manifested by the armament, and of their eagerness, uncontrollable by every one except Alkibiadès, to sail home forthwith and rescue Athens from the Four Hundred. Hence arose an increased conviction that the dominion of the latter could not last; and an ambition, on the part of others as well as Theramenès, to stand forward as leaders of a popular opposition against it, in the name of the Five Thousand².

¹ Thucyd. viii. 86-89. It is alleged by Andokidès (in an Oration delivered many years afterwards before the people of Athens—De Reclitum, sect. 10-15), that during this spring he furnished the armament at Samos with wood proper for the construction of oars—only obtained by the special favour of Archelaus king of Macedonia, and of which the armament then stood in great need. He further alleges, that he afterwards visited Athens, while the Four Hundred were in full dominion; and that Peisander, at the head of this oligarchical body, threatened his life for having furnished such valuable aid to the armament, then at enmity with Athens. Though he saved his life by clinging to the altar, yet he had to endure bonds and manifold hard treatment.

Of these claims which Andokidès prefers to the favour of the subsequent democracy, I do not know how much is true.

² Thucyd. viii. 89. αυθελουρα δὲ αἰρούς ἐσθρὴν καὶ ἐν τῷ ἑταίρῳ τοῦ

Against this popular opposition, Antiphon and Phrynichus exerted themselves with demagogic assiduity to caress and keep together the majority of the Four Hundred, as well as to uphold their power without abridgement. They were noway disposed to comply with this requisition that the fiction of the Five Thousand should be converted into a reality. They knew well that the enrolment of so many partners¹ would be tantamount to a democracy, and would be in substance at least, if not in form, an annihilation of their own power. They

Measures of Antiphon and the Four Hundred—their solicitations to Sparta—construction of the fort of Ectionia, for the admission of a Spartan garrison.

Ἀλκιβιάδου ἰσχυρὰ δόξα, καὶ ὅτι αὐτοῖς οὐκ ἴδοιτο μέγιστον τὸ τῇ Διγενείῃσι ἰσοῦσθαι. ἡγωνίζετο οὖν εἰς ἑκατοστὸν προσηύτης τοῦ δήμου ἵστασθαι.

This is a remarkable passage as indicating what is really meant by προσηύτης τοῦ δήμου—"the leader of a popular opposition." Theramenes and the other persons here spoken of did not even mention the name of the democracy—they took up simply the name of the Five Thousand—yet they are still called προσηύτης τοῦ δήμου, inasmuch as the Five Thousand were a sort of qualified democracy, compared to the Four Hundred.

The words denote the leader of a popular party, as opposed to an oligarchical party (see Thucyd. iii. 70; iv. 66; vi. 35), in a form of government either entirely democratical, or at least, in which the public assembly is frequently convoked and decides on many matters of importance. Thucydides does not apply the words to any Athenian except in the case now before us respecting Theramenes: he does not use the words even with respect to Kleon, though he employs expressions which seem equivalent to it (iii. 36; iv. 21)—ἀπὸρ δημογωγὸς ἐκτὸς τοῦ χρόνου ὡς καὶ τῇ πλείπῃ πειθαρχεῖται, &c. This is very different from the words which he applies to Perikles—ὡς γὰρ συνέτασσεν αὐτὸς καὶ ἑαίνει καὶ ἀγαστὴν πολιτείαν (i. 127). Even in respect to Nicias, he puts him in conjunction with Pleistoneas at Sparta, and talks of both of them as πειθόμενοι τὰ μέγιστα τῷ ἡγεμονίᾳ (v. 16).

Compare the note of Dr. Arnold on vi. 35; and Wachsmuth, Hellen. Alterth. i. 2. Heylage i. p. 435-438.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 92. τὰ μὲν καταρτίζοντες μετόχους τοσοῦτους, ἀνταρτοῦ δὲ δήμου ἡγούμενοι, &c.

Aristotle (Polit. v. 5, 4) calls Phrynichus the demagogue of the Four Hundred; that is, the person who most strenuously served their interests and struggled for their favour.

had now gone too far to recede with safety; while the menacing attitude of Samos, as well as the opposition growing up against them at home both within and without their own body, served only as instigation to them to accelerate their measures for peace with Sparta and to secure the introduction of a Spartan garrison.

With this view, immediately after the return of their envoys from Samos, the two most eminent leaders, Antiphon and Phrynichus, went themselves with ten other colleagues in all haste to Sparta, prepared to purchase peace and the promise of Spartan aid almost at any price. At the same time the construction of the fortress at Eetioneia was prosecuted with redoubled zeal; under pretence of defending the entrance of Peiræus against the armament from Samos, if the threat of their coming should be executed—but with the real purpose of bringing into it a Lacedæmonian fleet and army. For this latter object every facility was provided. The north-western corner of the fortification of Peiræus, to the north of the harbour and its mouth, was cut off by a cross wall reaching southward so as to join the harbour: from the southern end of this cross wall, and forming an angle with it, a new wall was built, fronting the harbour and running to the extremity of the mole which narrowed the mouth of the harbour on the northern side, at which mole it met the termination of the northern wall of Peiræus. A separate citadel was thus enclosed, defensible against any attack from Peiræus—furnished besides with distinct broad gates and posterns of its own, as well as with facilities for admitting an enemy within it¹. The new cross wall was carried so as to traverse a vast portico or open market-house, the largest in Peiræus: the larger half of this portico thus became enclosed within the new citadel, and orders were issued that all the corn, both actually warehoused and hereafter to be imported into Peiræus, should be deposited therein and sold out from thence for consumption. As Athens was sustained almost exclusively on corn brought from Eubœa and elsewhere, since the permanent occupation of Dekeleia,—the Four Hundred rendered themselves masters by this arrangement of all the subsistence of the citizens, as well as of the entrance into the harbour; either to admit the Spartans or exclude the armament from Samos².

Though Theramènes, himself one of the generals named under the Four Hundred, denounced, in conjunction with his supporters, the treasonable purpose of this new citadel—yet the majority of the Four Hundred stood to their resolution, so that the building made rapid progress under the superintendence of the general Alexiklês, one of the most

Unaccountable back-wardness of the Lacedæmonians.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 90-92. τὸ τεῖχος τοῦτο, καὶ πάλιν εἶχε, καὶ ἐπέδου, καὶ ἐπεσπάρχετο τὴν πόλιν, &c.

I presume that the last expression refers to facilities for admitting the enemy either from the sea-side, or from the land-side—that is to say, from the north-western corner of the old wall of Peiræus, which formed one side of the new citadel.

See Leake's Topographie Athens, p. 269, 270, Germ. transl.

² Thucyd. viii. 90. ἐπεσοδόρησαν δὲ καὶ σπάρτην, &c.

I agree with the note in M. Didot's translation, that this portico, or halle open on three sides, must be considered as pre-existing; not as having been first built now, which seems to be the supposition of Colonel Leake, and the commentators generally.

strenuous of the oligarchical faction¹. Such was the habit of obedience at Athens to an established authority, when once constituted—and so great the fear and mistrust arising out of the general belief in the reality of the Five Thousand, unknown auxiliaries supposed to be prepared to enforce the orders of the Four Hundred—that the people, and even armed citizen hoplites, went on working at the building, in spite of their suspicions as to its design. Though not completed, it was so far advanced as to be defensible, when Antiphon and Phrynichus returned from Sparta. They had gone thither prepared to surrender everything,—not merely their naval force, but their city itself—and to purchase their own personal safety by making the Lacedæmonians masters of Peiræus². Yet we read with astonishment that the latter could not be prevailed on to contract any treaty, and that they manifested nothing but backwardness in seizing this golden opportunity. Had Alkibiadês been now playing their game, as he had been doing a year earlier, immediately before the revolt of Chios—had they been under any energetic leaders to impel them into hearty co-operation with the treason of the Four Hundred, who combined at this moment both the will and the power to place Athens in their hands, if seconded by an adequate force—they might now have overpowered their great enemy at home, before the armament at Samos could have been brought to the rescue.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 91, 92. Ἀλεξικλῆς, στρατηγὸς ὄντα ἐκ τῆς ὀλιγαρχίας καὶ μάλιστα πρὸς τοὺς ἐταίρους τετραμμένω, &c.

² Thucyd. viii. 91. Ἀλλὰ καὶ τοὺς πολέμους ἐσυγγόμενοι ὄντες τεταχῶς καὶ τοῦτο ξυμβῆναι, καὶ ὁπωσοῦν τὸ τῆς πόλεως ἔχει, εἰ τοῖς γε σώμασι σφῶς ἴδια ἴσται.

Ibid. ἐπειδὴ οἱ ἐκ τῆς Λακεδαιμόνους πρὸς αὐτοὺς οὐδὲν πράξαντες ἀνεχώρησαν τοῖς πῶσι ξυμβαλλόμεν, &c.

Considering that Athens was saved from capture only by the slackness and stupidity of the Spartans, we may see that the armament at Samos had reasonable excuse for their eagerness previously manifested to come home; and that Alkibiadēs, in combating that intention, braved an extreme danger which nothing but incredible good fortune averted. Why the Lacedæmonians remained idle, both in Peloponnesus and at Dekeleia, while Athens was thus betrayed and in the very throes of dissolution, we can render no account: possibly the caution of the Ephors may have distrusted Antiphon and Phrynichus, from the mere immensity of their concessions. All that they would promise was, that a Lacedæmonian fleet of 42 triremes (partly from Tarentum and Lokri)—now about to start from Las in the Laconian Gulf, and to sail to Eubœa on the invitation of a disaffected party in that island—should so far depart from its straight course as to hover near Ægina and Peiræus, ready to take advantage of any opportunity for attack laid open by the Four Hundred¹.

Of this squadron, however, even before it rounded Cape Malea, Theramenēs obtained intelligence, and denounced it as intended to operate in concert with the Four Hundred for the occupation of Eetioneia.

Assassination of Phrynichus—Lacedæmonian fleet hovering near Peiræus.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 91. ἡ δὲ τι καὶ ταυτὸς ἀπὸ τῆς τῆς κατηγορίας ἐχούτος, καὶ οὐ πᾶσι διαβολὴ μόνον τοῦ λόγου.

The reluctant language, in which Thucydides admits the treasonable concert of Antiphon and his colleagues with the Lacedæmonians, deserves notice—also c. 94, τάχα μὲν τι καὶ ἀπὸ ξινημένων λόγου, &c.

Meanwhile Athens became daily a scene of greater discontent and disorder, after the abortive embassy and return from Sparta of Antiphon and Phrynichus. The coercive ascendancy of the Four Hundred was silently disappearing, while the hatred which their usurpation had inspired, together with the fear of their traitorous concert with the public enemy, became more and more loudly manifested in men's private conversations as well as in gatherings secretly got together within numerous houses; especially the house of the peripolarch (the captain of the peripoli, or youthful hoplites who formed the chief police of the country). Such hatred was not long in passing from vehement passion into act. Phrynichus, as he left the Senate-house, was assassinated by two confederates, one of them a peripolus, or youthful hoplite, in the midst of the crowded market-place and in full daylight. The man who struck the blow made his escape, but his comrade was seized and put to the torture by order of the Four Hundred¹: he was however a stranger, from Argos, and either could not or would not reveal the name of any directing accomplice. Nothing was obtained from him except general indications of meetings and wide-spread disaffection. Nor did the Four Hundred, being thus left without special evidence, dare to lay hands upon Theramènes, the pronounced leader of the opposition—as we shall find Kritias doing six years afterwards, under the rule of the Thirty. The assassins of Phrynichus remaining undiscovered and unpunished, Theramenès and his associates became bolder in their opposition than before. And the approach of the Lacedæmonian fleet under Agesandridas—which, having now taken station at Epidaurus, had made a descent on Ægina, and was hovering not far off Peiræus, altogether out of the straight course for Eubœa—lent double force to all their previous assertions about the imminent dangers connected with the citadel at Eetioneia.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 91. The statement of Plutarch is in many respects different (Alkibiades, c. 25).

Amidst this exaggerated alarm and discord, the general body of hoplites became penetrated with aversion¹, every day increasing, against the new citadel. At length the hoplites of the tribe in which Aristokratès (the warmest partisan of Theramenès) was taxiarch, being on duty and engaged in the prosecution of the building, broke out into absolute mutiny against it, seized the person of Alexiklès, the general in command, and put him under arrest in a neighbouring house; while the peripoli, or youthful military police, stationed at Munychia, under Hermon, abetted them in the proceeding². News of this violence was speedily conveyed to the Four Hundred, who were at that moment holding session in the Senate-house, Theramenès himself being present. Their wrath and menace were at first vented against him as the instigator of the revolt; a charge against which he could only vindicate himself by volunteering to go among the foremost for the liberation of the prisoner. He forthwith started in haste for the Peiræus, accom-

Rising at Athens against the Four Hundred—demolition of the new fort at Eetioneia.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 92. τὸ δὲ μέγιστον, τὰς ἀσπίδων τὸ στήθος ταῖς τε ῥοδαῖς.

² Plutarch, Alcibiad. c. 26, represents Hermon as one of the assassins of Phrynichus.

panied by one of the generals his colleague, who was of the same political sentiment as himself. A third among the generals, Aristarchus, one of the fiercest of the oligarchs, followed him, probably from mistrust, together with some of the younger Knights (Horsemen or richest class in the state) identified with the cause of the Four Hundred. The oligarchical partisans ran to marshal themselves in arms—alarming exaggerations being rumoured, that Alexiklès had been put to death, and that Peiræus was under armed occupation; while at Peiræus the insurgents imagined that the hoplites from the city were in full march to attack them. For a time all was confusion and angry sentiment, which the slightest untoward accident might have inflamed into sanguinary civil carnage. Nor was it appeased except by earnest entreaty and remonstrance from the elder citizens (aided by Thucydidès of Pharsalus, proxenus or public guest of Athens in his native town) on the ruinous madness of such discord when a foreign enemy was almost at their gates.

The perilous excitement of this temporary crisis, which brought into full daylight every man's real political sentiments, proved the oligarchical faction, hitherto exaggerated in number, to be far less powerful than had been imagined by their opponents. And the Four Hundred had found themselves too much embarrassed how to keep up the semblance of their authority even in Athens itself, to be able to send down any considerable force for the protection of their citadel at Eetioneia; though they were reinforced, only eight days before their fall, by at least one supplementary member, probably in substitution for some predecessor who had accidentally died¹. Theramenês, on reaching Peiræus, began to address the mutinous hoplites in a tone of simulated displeasure, while Aristarchus and his oligarchical companions spoke in the harshest language, and threatened them with the force which they imagined to be presently coming down from the city. But these menaces were met by equal firmness on the part of the hoplites, who even appealed to Theramenês himself, and called upon him to say whether he thought the construction of this citadel was for the good of Athens, or whether it would not be better demolished. His opinion had been fully pronounced beforehand; and he replied, that if they thought proper to demolish it, he cordially concurred. Without farther delay, hoplites and unarmed people mounted pell-mell upon the walls, and commenced the demolition with alacrity; under the general shout—"Whoever is for the Five Thousand in place of the Four Hundred, let him lend a hand in this work." The idea of the old democracy was in every one's mind, but no man uttered the word; the fear of the imaginary Five Thousand still continuing. The work of demolition seems to have been prosecuted all that day, and not to have been completed until the next day; after which the hoplites released Alexiklês from arrest, without doing him any injury².

¹ See Lysias, Orat. xx. 100 Polystrato. The fact that Polystrato was only eight days a member of the Four Hundred, before their fall, is repeated three distinct times in this Oration (c. 2, 4, 5. p. 672, 674, 679 Reisk.), and has all the air of truth.

² Thucyd. viii. 92, 93. In the Oration of Demosthenês (or Demarchus) against Theokrinês (c. 17. p. 1343) the speaker Epicharês makes allusion to this destruction of the fort at Ectoneia by Aristokratês, uncle of his grandfather. The allusion chiefly deserves notice from its

Two things deserve notice, among these details, as illustrating the Athenian character. Though Alexiêlês was vehemently oligarchical as well as unpopular, these mutineers do no harm to his person, but content themselves with putting him under arrest. Next, they do not venture to commence the actual demolition of the citadel, until they have the formal sanction of Theramênês, one of the constituted generals. The strong habit of legality, implanted in all Athenian citizens by their democracy—and the care, even in departing from it, to depart as little as possible—stand plainly evidenced in these proceedings.

The events of this day gave a fatal shock to the ascendancy of the Four Hundred. Yet they assembled on the morrow as usual in the Senate-house; and they appear, now when it was too late, to have directed one of their members to draw up a real list, giving body to the fiction of the Five Thousand¹. Meanwhile the hoplites in Peiræus, having finished the levelling of the new fortifications, took the still more important step of entering, armed as they erroneous mention of Kritias and the return of the Demos from exile—betraying a complete confusion between the events in the time of the Four Hundred and those in the time of the Thirty.

¹ Lysias, Orat. xx. pro Polystrato, c. 4, p. 675 Reisk.

This task was confided to Polystratus, a very recent member of the Four Hundred, and therefore probably less unpopular than the rest. In his defence after the restoration of the democracy, he pretended to have undertaken the task much against his will, and to have drawn up a list containing 9000 names instead of 5000.

It may probably have been in this meeting of the Four Hundred, that Antiphon delivered his oration strongly recommending concord—Ἐπιθυσία. All his eloquence was required just now, to bring back the oligarchical party, if possible, into united action. Philostratus (Vit. Sophistæ, c. xv, p. 500, ed. Olear.) expresses great admiration for this oration, which is several times alluded to both by Harpokration and Suidas. See Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredsamkeit, Beilage ii. p. 276.

were, into the theatre of Dionysus hard by (in Peiræus, but on the verge of Munychia) and there holding a formal assembly; probably under the convocation of the general Theramenês, pursuant to the forms of the antecedent democracy. They here took the resolution of adjourning their assembly to the Anakeion, (or temple of Castor and Pollux, the Dioskuri,) in the city itself and close under the acropolis; whither they immediately marched and established themselves, still retaining their arms. So much was the position of the Four Hundred changed, that they, who had on the preceding day been on the aggressive against a spontaneous outburst of mutineers in Peiræus, were now thrown upon the defensive against a formal assembly, all armed, in the city and close by their own Senate-house. Feeling themselves too weak to attempt any force, they sent deputies to the Anakeion to negotiate and offer concessions. They engaged to publish the list of The Five Thousand, and to convene them for the purpose of providing for the periodical cessation and renewal of the Four Hundred, by rotation from the Five Thousand, in such order as the latter themselves should determine. But they entreated that time might be allowed for effecting this, and that internal peace might be maintained, without which there was no hope of defence against the enemy without. Many of the hoplites in the city itself joined the assembly in the Anakeion, and took part in the debates. The position of the Four Hundred being no longer such as to inspire fear, the tongues of speakers were now again loosed, and the ears of the multitude again opened—for the first time since the arrival of Peisander from Samos, with the plan of the oligarchical conspiracy. Such renewal of free and fearless public speech, the peculiar life-principle of the democracy, was not less wholesome in tranquillizing intestine discord, than in heightening the sentiment of common patriotism against the foreign enemy¹. The assembly at length dispersed, after naming an early future time for a second assembly, to bring about the re-establishment of harmony, in the theatre of Dionysus².

On the day, and at the hour, when this assembly in the theatre of Dionysus was on the point of coming together, the news ran through Peiræus and Athens, that the forty-two triremes under the Lacedæmonian Agesandridas, having recently quitted the harbour of Megara, were sailing along the coast of Salamis in the direction towards Peiræus. Such an event, while causing universal consternation throughout the city, confirmed all the previous warnings of Theramenês as to the treasonable destination of the citadel recently demolished, and every one rejoiced that the demolition had been accomplished just in time. Foregoing their intended assembly, the citizens rushed with one accord down to Peiræus, where some of them took post to garrison the walls and the mouth of the harbour—others got aboard the triremes lying in the harbour—others, again, launched some fresh triremes from the boat-houses into the water. Agesandridas rowed along the shore, near the mouth of Peiræus; but found nothing to promise concert within, or tempt him to the intended attack. Accordingly, he passed by and moved onward to Sunium in a southerly direction. Having doubled the cape of Sunium, he then turned his course along the coast of Attica northward, halted for a little while between Thorikus and Prasîæ, and presently took station at Orôpus¹.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 23. τὸ δὲ πᾶς πλῆθος τῷ ὁπλίῳ, ἀπὸ πολλῶν καὶ πρὸς πολλοὺς λόγων γιγνομένην, ἡσιώτερον ἢ ἡ πρότερον, καὶ ἐθαβεῖτο μάχιστα περὶ τοῦ παντός πολιτικοῦ.

² Thucyd. viii. 23. ἐνεχώρησαν δὲ ὅσπ' ἐκ ἡμέραν ἄρτης ἀεληθείας ποιῆσαι ἐν τῷ Διονυσίῳ περὶ ἁμονίαν.

The definition of time must here allude to the morrow, or to the day following the morrow: at least it seems impossible that the city could be left longer than this interval without a government.

Though relieved when they found that he passed by Peiræus without making any attack, the Athenians knew that his destination must now be against Eubœa; which to them was hardly less important than Peiræus, since their main supplies were derived from that island. Accordingly they put to sea at once with all the triremes which could be manned and got ready in the harbour. But from the hurry of the occasion, coupled with the mistrust and dissension now reigning, and the absence of their great naval force at Samos—the crews mustered were raw and ill-selected, and the armament inefficient. Polystratus, one of the members of the Four Hundred, perhaps others of them also, were aboard; men who had an interest in defeat rather than victory². Thymocharès the admiral conducted them

Naval battle near Eretria—Athenians defeated—Eubœa
revolts.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 24.

² Lysias, Orat. xx. pro Polystrato, c. 4. p. 676 Reisk.

From another passage in this oration, it would seem that Polystratus was in command of the fleet—possibly enough, in conjunction with Thymocharès, according to a common Athenian practice (c. 5. p. 679). His son who defends him affirms that he was wounded in the battle.

Diodorus (xiii. 34) mentions the discord among the crews on board these ships under Thymocharès; almost the only point which we learn from his meagre notice of this interesting period.

round Cape Sunium to Eretria in Eubœa, where he found a few other triremes, which made up his whole fleet to 36 sail.

He had scarcely reached the harbour and disembarked, when, without allowing time for his men to procure refreshment—he found himself compelled to fight a battle with the forty-two ships of Agesandridas, who had just sailed across from Orôpus, and was already approaching the harbour. This surprise had been brought about by the anti-Athenian party in Eretria, who took care, on the arrival of Thymocharês, that no provisions should be found in the market-place, so that his men were compelled to disperse and obtain them from houses at the extremity of the town; while at the same time a signal was hoisted, visible at Orôpus on the opposite side of the strait (less than seven miles broad), indicating to Agesandridas the precise moment for bringing his fleet across to the attack, with their crews fresh after the morning meal. Thymocharês, on seeing the approach of the enemy, ordered his men aboard; but to his disappointment, many of them were found to be so far off that they could not be brought back in time—so that he was compelled to sail out and meet the Peloponnesians with ships very inadequately manned. In a battle immediately outside of the Eretrian harbour, he was, after a short contest, completely defeated, and his fleet driven back upon the shore. Some of his ships escaped to Chalkis, others to a fortified post garrisoned by the Athenians themselves not far from Eretria: yet not less than 22 triremes, out of the whole 36, fell into the hands of Agesandridas, and a large proportion of the crews were slain or made prisoners. Of those seamen who escaped, too, many found their death from the hands of the Eretrians, into whose city they fled for shelter. On the news of this battle, not merely Eretria, but also all Eubœa (except Oreus in the north of the island, which was settled by Athenian Kleruchs) declared its revolt from Athens, which had been intended more than a year before—and took measures for defending itself in concert with Agesandridas and the Bœotians¹.

III could Athens endure a disaster, in itself so immense and aggravated, under the present distressed condition of the city. Her last fleet was destroyed; her nearest and most precious island torn from her side; an island, which of late had yielded more to her wants than Attica itself, but which was now about to become a hostile and aggressive neighbour². The previous revolt of Eubœa, occurring thirty-four years before during the maximum of Athenian power, had been even then a terrible blow to Athens, and formed one of the main circumstances which forced upon her the humiliation of the 'Thirty years' truce. But this second revolt took place when she had not only no means of reconquering the island, but no means even of defending Peiræus against the blockade by the enemy's fleet. The dismay and terror excited by the news at Athens was unbounded; even exceeding what had been felt after the Sicilian catastrophe, or the revolt of Chios. Nor was there any second reserve now in the treasury, such as the thousand talents which had rendered such essential service on the last-mentioned occasion. In addition to their foreign dangers, the Athenians were farther weighed down by two intestine calamities in themselves hardly supportable—alienation of their own fleet at Samos, and the discord, yet unappeased, within their own walls; wherein the Four Hundred still held provisionally the reins of government, with the ablest and most unscrupulous leaders at their head. In the depth of their despair, the Athenians expected nothing less than to see the victorious fleet of Agesandridas (more than sixty triremes strong, including the recent captures) off the Peiræus, forbidding all importation, and threatening them with approaching famine, in combination with Agis at Deceleia. The enterprise would have been easy, for there were neither ships nor seamen to repel him; and his arrival at this critical moment would most probably have enabled the Four Hundred to resume their ascendancy, with the means as well as the disposition to introduce a Lacedæmonian garrison into the city¹. And though the arrival of the Athenian fleet from Samos would have prevented this extremity, yet it could not have arrived in time, except on the supposition of a prolonged blockade; moreover its mere transfer from Samos to Athens would have left Ionia and the Hellespont defenceless against the Lacedæmonians and Persians, and would have caused the loss of all the Athenian empire. Nothing could have saved Athens, if the Lacedæmonians at this juncture had acted with reasonable vigour, instead of confining their efforts to Eubœa, now an easy and certain conquest. As on the former occasion, when Antiphon and Phrynichus went to Sparta prepared to make any sacrifice for the purpose of obtaining Lacedæmonian aid and accommodation—so now, in a still greater degree, Athens owed her salvation only to the fact that the enemies actually before her were indolent and dull Spartans—not enterprising Syracusans under the conduct of Gylippus¹. And this is the second occasion (we may add) on which Athens was on the brink of ruin in consequence of the policy of Alkibiadês in retaining the armament at Samos.

Dismay at Athens—her ruin inevitable, if the Lacedæmonians had acted with energy.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 5; viii. 95.

² Thucyd. viii. 95. To show what Eubœa became at a later period, see Demosthenes, De Fals. Legat. c. 64 p. 409—τὸ ἐν Εἰβοίᾳ κατασκευασθὲν ὁρμητῆριον ἐφ' ἡμᾶς, &c.; and Demosthenes, De Coronâ, c. 71—ἄπλων δ' ἡ θάλασσα ὑπὸ τῶν ἐκ τῆς Εἰβοίας ὁρμυμένων ληστῶν γέγονε, &c.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 96. Μάλιστα δ' αὐτοῖς καὶ δι' ἐγγεστάτου ἰσχυροῦς, εἰ οἱ πολέμιοι τολμήσουσι συνεκρότες εἶδέν σφ' ὅσον ἐπὶ τὸν Πειραιᾶ ἔρχωνται πλοῖα πλείω καὶ ὅσον οὐκ ἔστιν ἐνέμειν αὐτοῖς παρῆναι. Ὅσοι δὲ, εἰ τολμηρότεροι ἦσαν, μάδιον ἂν ἐποίησαν καὶ ἡ θύλακος ἂν ἔτι μᾶλλον τὴν πόλιν ἐφορμοῖεν, ἢ εἰ ἐπολιόμηνον μέντες, καὶ τὰς ἀπ' ἑστέρας ναῦς ἐνέμελλον ἂν βοηθήσαι, &c.

Fortunately for the Athenians, no Agesandridas appeared off Peiræus; so that the twenty triremes, which they contrived to man as a remnant for defence, had no enemy to repel². Accordingly the Athenians were allowed to enjoy an interval of repose which enabled them to recover partially both from consternation and from intestine discord. It was their first proceeding, when the hostile fleet did not appear, to convene a public assembly, and that too in the Pnyx itself; the habitual scene of the democratical assemblies, well-calculated to re-inspire that patriotism which had now been dumb and smouldering for the four last months. In this assembly the tide of opinion ran vehemently against the Four Hundred¹. Even those, who (like the Board of Elders entitled Probuli) had originally counselled their appointment, now denounced them along with the rest, though severely taunted by the oligarchical leader Peisander for their inconsistency. Votes were finally passed—1. To depose the Four Hundred—2. To place the whole government in the hands of The Five Thousand—3. Every citizen, who furnished a panoply either for himself, or for any one else, was to be of right a member of this body of The Five Thousand—4. No citizen was to receive pay for any political function, on pain of becoming solemnly accursed, or excommunicated².

The Four Hundred are put down—the democracy in substance restored.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 96; vii. 21-55.

² Thucyd. viii. 97.

¹ It is to this assembly that I refer, with confidence, the remarkable dialogue of contention between Peisander and Sophoklēs, one of the Athenian Probuli, mentioned in Aristotle. Rhetoric. iii. 18, 2. There was no other occasion on which the Four Hundred were ever publicly thrown upon their defence at Athens.

This was not Sophoklēs the tragic poet, but another person of the same name, who appears afterwards as one of the oligarchy of Thirty.

² Thucyd. viii. 97. Καὶ ἐκκλησίαν συνέλεγον, μίαν μὲν εἶδος τὴν πρῶτον ἐς τὴν Πρίντα καλεσμένην, ὅσπερ καὶ ἄλλοτε εἰώθεσαν, ἐν ᾗ περ καὶ τοὶ τετρακοσίους καταστάντες τοῖς πεντακισχίλοις ἐψηφίσαντο τὰ πρόγματα παραδοῦναι· εἶναι δὲ αὐτῶν, ὅσσοι καὶ ἑπτα παρέχοντα· καὶ μισθὸν μηδὲν φέρειν, μηδὲν ἀρχῇ, εἰ δὲ μὴ, ἐκάρων ἐποίησαντο. Ἐγίνοντο δὲ καὶ ἄλλαι ὑστερον συνεταὶ ἐκκλησίαι, ἀφ' ὧν καὶ νομοθετίας καὶ τῶλλα ἐψηφίσαντο ἐς τὴν πολιτείαν.

In this passage I dissent from the commentators on two points. First, they understand this number Five Thousand as a real definite list of citizens, containing 5000 names, neither more nor less. Secondly, they construe νομοθετίας, not in the ordinary meaning which it bears in Athenian constitutional language, but in the sense of ἐννομοφύεις (c. 67), "persons to model the constitution, corresponding to the ἐννομοφύεις appointed by the aristocratical party a little before"—to use the words of Dr. Arnold.

As to the first point, which is sustained also by Dr. Thirlwall (Hist. Gr. ch. xxviii. vol. iv. p. 51, 2nd ed.), Dr. Arnold really admits what is the ground of my opinion, when he says—"Of course the number of citizens capable of providing themselves with heavy arms must have much exceeded 5000: and it is said in the defence of Polystratus, one of the Four Hundred (Lyxias, p. 675 Reisk.), that he drew up a list of 9000. But we must suppose that all who could furnish heavy arms were eligible into the number of the 5000, whether the members were fixed on by lot, by election, or by rotation; as it had been proposed to appoint the Four Hundred by rotation out of the Five Thousand (viii. 93)."

Such were the points determined by the first assembly held in the Pnyx. The Archons, the Senate

Dr. Arnold here throws out a supposition which by no means conforms to the exact sense of the words of Thucydides—οἱ δὲ αὐτοὶ, ὅσοι καὶ ὅλα παρέχονται. These words distinctly signify, that all who furnished heavy arms should be of the Five Thousand; should belong of right to that body: which is something different from being eligible into the number of the Five Thousand, either by lot, rotation, or otherwise. The language of Thucydides, when he describes (in the passage referred to by Dr. Arnold, c. 93) the projected formation of the Four Hundred by rotation out of the Five Thousand, is very different—καὶ ἐκ τούτων ἐκ μέρους τοῖς τετρακισχίλοις ἰστέλλει, &c. M. Boeckh (Public Economy of Athens, b. ii. ch. 21. p. 268, Eng. Tr.) is not satisfactory in his description of this event.

The idea which I conceive of the Five Thousand, as a number existing from the commencement only in talk and imagination, neither realized nor intended to be realized—coincides with the full meaning of this passage of Thucydides, as well as with everything which he had before said about them.

I will here add that ὅσοι ὅλα παρέχονται means persons furnishing arms either for themselves alone, or for others also (Xenoph. Hellen. iii. 4, 15).

As to the second point, the signification of νομοθέται, I stand upon the general use of that word in Athenian political language: see the explanation earlier in this History, vol. v. ch. xlv. p. 505. It is for the commentators to produce some justification of the unusual meaning which they assign to it—"persons to model the constitution—commissioners who drew up the new constitution," as Dr. Arnold, in concurrence with the rest, translates it. Until some justification is produced, I venture to believe that νομοθέται is a word which would not be used in that sense with reference to nominees chosen by the democracy, and intended to act with the democracy: for it implies a final, derivative, authoritative determination—whereas the ἐγγράφοι or "commissioners to draw up a constitution," were only invested with the function of submitting something for approbation to the public assembly or competent authority; that is, assuming that the public assembly remained an efficient reality.

Moreover the words καὶ τᾶλλα would hardly be used in immediate of Five Hundred, &c., were renewed: after which many other assemblies were also held, in which Nomothetæ, Dikasts, and other institutions essential to the working of the democracy, were constituted. Various other votes were also passed; especially one, on the proposition of Kritias, seconded by Theramênês¹, to restore Alkibiadês and some of his friends from exile; while messages were farther despatched, both to him and to the armament at Samos, doubtless confirming the recent nomination sequence to νομοδότης if the latter word meant that which the commentators suppose:—"Commissioners for framing a constitution and the other things towards the constitution." Such commissioners are surely far too prominent and initiative in their function to be named in this way. Let us add, that the most material items in the new constitution (if we are so to call it) have already been distinctly specified as settled by public vote, before these νομοδῶται are even named.

It is important to notice, that even the Thirty, who were named six years afterwards to draw up a constitution, at the moment when Sparta was mistress of Athens and when the people were thoroughly put down, are not called Νομοδῶται, but are named by a circumlocution equivalent to ξυγγραφεῖς—"Ἐδοξε τῷ δήμῳ, τριάντα ἄνδρας ἐλέγχειν, οἱ τὸν πολιτικὸν νόμον ξυγγράψουσιν, καὶ οἷς πολιτεύσονται.—Ἀλκιβιάδης δὲ, ὅς τ' ἐξ ἑξαγρεῶν νόμον καὶ νόστιμα ἐκτελέσονται, τοῖσιν μὲν δὲ ἑστέροις ξυγγράψειν τε καὶ ἀποδεσκάσειν, &c. (Xenophon, Hellen. ii. 3, 2-11.) Xenophon calls Kritias and Chariklês the Nomothetæ of the Thirty (Memor. i. 2, 30), but this is not democracy.

For the signification of Νομοδότης (applied most generally to Solon, sometimes to others either by rhetorical looseness or by ironical taunt) or Νομοδῶται, a numerous body of persons chosen and sworn—see Lykias cont. Nikomach. sect. 3, 33, 37; Andokidês de Mysteries, sect. 81-85, c. 14, p. 38—where the Nomothetæ are a sworn body of Five Hundred, exercising conjointly with the senate the function of accepting or rejecting laws proposed to them.

¹ Plutarch, Alkibiadês, c. 33. Cornelius Nepos (Alkibiad. c. 5, and Diodorus, xiii. 38-42) mentions Theramênês as the principal author of the decree for restoring Alkibiadês from exile. But the precise words of the elegy composed by Kritias, wherein the latter vindicates this proceeding to himself, are cited by Plutarch, and are very good evidence. Doubtless many of the leading men supported, and none opposed, the proposition.

of generals, apprising them of what had recently occurred at Athens, as well as bespeaking their full concurrence and unabated efforts against the common enemy.

Thucydides bestows marked eulogy upon the general spirit of moderation and patriotic harmony which now reigned at Athens, and which directed the political proceedings of the people¹. But he does not countenance the belief, (as he has been sometimes understood) nor is it true in point of fact—that they now introduced a new constitution. Putting an end to the oligarchy, and to the rule of the Four Hundred, they restored the old democracy, seemingly with only two modifications—first, the partial limitation of the right of suffrage—next, the discontinuance of all payment for political functions. The impeachment against Antiphon, tried immediately afterwards, went before the Senate and the Dikastery, exactly according to the old democratical forms of procedure. But we must presume that the Senate, the Dikasts, the Nomothetæ, the Ekklesiasts (or citizens who attended the assembly), the public orators who prosecuted state-criminals or defended any law when it was impugned—must have worked for the time without pay.

Moreover the two modifications above-mentioned were of little practical effect. The exclusive body of Five Thousand citizens, professedly constituted

Moderation of political antipathies, and patriotic spirit, now prevalent.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 97. Καὶ οὐχ ὅμοια δὲ τὰς πρῶτον χρόνον ἐπὶ γε ἐμοῦ Ἀθηναῖοι φαίνονται εἰς πολιτικὰς αἰτίας· πατρία γὰρ ἦ τε ἐς τοὺς ἀλλοίους καὶ τοὺς πολλοὺς ξίφεσιν ἐγένετο, καὶ ἐκ ποσῶν τῶν πραγμάτων γενομένων ταῦτα πρῶτον ἀπέργει τὴν πόλιν.

I refer the reader to a note on this passage in one of my former volumes, and on the explanation given of it by Dr. Arnold (see vol. v. ch. xlv. p. 447).

The Five Thousand
—a number never exactly realised.

at this juncture, was neither exactly realised, nor long retained. It was constituted, even now, more as a nominal than as a real limit; a nominal total, yet no longer a mere blank as the Four Hundred had originally produced it, but containing indeed a number of individual names greater than the total, and without any assignable line of demarcation. The mere fact, that every one who furnished a panoply was entitled to be of the Five Thousand—and not they alone, but others besides¹—shows that no care was taken to adhere either to that or to any other precise number. If we may credit a speech composed by Lysias², the Four Hundred had themselves (after the demolition of their intended fortress at Ectioneia, and when power was passing out of their hands) appointed a committee of their number to draw up for the first time a real list of The Five Thousand; and Polystratus, a member of that committee, takes credit with the succeeding democracy for having made the list comprise nine thousand names instead of five thousand. As this list of Polystratus (if indeed it ever existed) was never either published or adopted, I merely notice the description given of it to illustrate my position, that the number Five Thousand was now understood on all sides as an indefinite expression for a suffrage extensive, but not universal. The number had been first invented by Antiphon and the leaders of the Four Hundred, to cloak their own usurpation and intimidate the democracy: next, it served the purpose of Theramènes and the minority of the Four Hundred, as a basis on which to raise a sort of dynastic opposition (to use modern phraseology) within the limits of the oligarchy—that is, without appearing to overstep principles acknowledged by the oligarchy themselves: lastly, it was employed by the democratical party generally as a convenient middle term to slide back into the old system, with as little dispute as possible; for Alkibiadēs and the armament had sent word home that they adhered to the Five Thousand, and to the abolition of salaried civil functions¹.

¹ The words of Thucydides (viii. 97)—οἱ δὲ πάντες, ἄλλοις καὶ ἄλλοις παρέχοντο—show that this body was not composed exclusively of those who furnished panoplies. It could never have been intended, for example, to exclude the Hippeis or Knights.

² Lysias, Orat. xx. pro Polystrato, c. 4. p. 675 Reisk.

But exclusive suffrage of the so-called Five Thousand, especially with the expansive numerical construction now adopted, was of little value either to themselves or to the state²; while it was an insulting shock to the feelings of the excluded multitude, especially to brave and active seamen like the Parali. Though prudent as a step of momentary transition, it could not stand, nor was any attempt made to preserve it in permanence—amidst a community so long accustomed to universal citizenship, and where the necessities of defence against the enemy called for energetic efforts from all the citizens.

Even as to the gratuitous functions, the members of the Five Thousand themselves would soon become tired, not less than the poorer freemen, of serving without pay, as senators or in other ways: so that nothing but absolute financial deficit would prevent the re-establishment, entire or partial, of the pay¹. And that deficit was never so complete as to stop the disbursement of the Diobely, or distribution of two oboli to each citizen on occasion of various religious festivals. Such distribution continued without interruption; though perhaps the number of occasions on which it was made may have been lessened.

The Five Thousand—were soon enlarged into universal citizenship.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 86.

² Thucyd. viii. 92. τὸ μὲν καταστήσει περὶ πολλοὺς τοσούτους, ἀλλὰ οὐκ ἔστιν ὅπως ἔχουσιν, &c.

Restoration of the constitute democracy, all except pay.

How far, or under what restriction, any re-establishment of civil pay obtained footing during the seven years between the Four Hundred and the Thirty, we cannot say. But leaving this point undecided, we can show, that within a year after the deposition of the Four Hundred, the suffrage of the so-called Five Thousand expanded into the suffrage of all Athenians without exception, or into the full antecedent democracy. A memorable decree, passed about eleven months after that event—at the commencement of the archonship of Glaukippos (June 410 B.C.) when the Senate of Five Hundred, the Dikasts and other civil functionaries were renewed for the coming year, pursuant to the ancient democratical practice—exhibits to us the full democracy not merely in action, but in all the glow of feeling called forth by a recent restoration. It seems to have been thought that this first renewal of archons and other functionaries, under the revived democracy, ought to be stamped by some emphatic proclamation of sentiment, analogous to

¹ See the valuable financial inscriptions in M. Boeckh's Corpus Inscriptionum, part i. nos. 147, 148, which attest considerable disbursements for the Diobely in 410-409 B.C.

Nor does it seem that there was much diminution during these same years in the private expenditure and ostentation of the Chorégi at the festivals and other exhibitions: see the Oration xxi. of Lysias—Ἀπολογία Δημοδοκού—c. 1, 2. p. 698-700 Reisk.

the solemn and heart-stirring oath taken in the preceding year at Samos. Accordingly Demophantus proposed and carried a (psephism or) decree¹, prescribing the form of an oath to be taken by all Athenians to stand by the democratical constitution.

The terms of his psephism and oath are striking. "If any man subvert the democracy at Athens, or hold any magistracy after the democracy has been subverted, he shall be an enemy of the Athenians. Let him be put to death with impunity, and let his property be confiscated to the public, with the reservation of a tithe to Athênê. Let the man who has killed him, and the accomplice privy to the act, be accounted holy and of good religious odour. Let all Athenians swear an oath under the sacrifice of full-grown victims, in their respective tribes and demes, to kill him². Let the oath be as follows:—
'I will kill with my own hand, if I am able, any man who shall subvert the democracy at Athens, or who shall hold any office in future after the democracy has been subverted, or shall rise in arms for the purpose of making himself a despot, or shall help the despot to establish himself. And if any one else shall kill him, I will account the slayer to Psephism of Demophantus—democratical oath prescribed.

¹ About the date of this psephism or decree, see Boeckh, Staats-haushaltung der Athener, vol. ii. p. 168 (in the comment upon sundry inscriptions appended to his work, not included in the English translation by Mr. Lewis); also Meier, De Bonis Damnatorum, sect. ii. p. 6-10. Wachsmuth erroneously places the date of it after the Thirty—see Hellen. Alterth. ii. ix. p. 267.

² Andokidês de Mysteriis, sect. 95-99. (c. 16, p. 48 R.)—ὁ δ' ἀποκρίναι τὸν ταῦτα ποιῶντα, καὶ δ' ἀντιβολευόμενος, ὅστις ἔσται καὶ εἰσάγει. Ὁμόσαι δ' Ἀθηναῖους ἅπαντας καθ' ἑρῶς τελείων, κατὰ φύλιν καὶ κατὰ δῆμον, ἀποκρίναι τὸν ταῦτα ποιῶντα.

The comment of Sievers (Commentationes De Xenophontis Hellenicis, Berlin 1833, p. 18, 19) on the events of this time, is not clear.

be holy as respects both gods and demons, as having slain an enemy of the Athenians. And I engage, by word, by deed and by vote, to sell his property and make over one-half of the proceeds to the slayer, without withholding anything. If any man shall perish in slaying or in trying to slay the despot, I will be kind both to him and to his children, as to Harmodius and Aristogeiton and their descendants. And I hereby break and renounce all oaths which have been sworn hostile to the Athenian people, either at Athens, or at the camp (at Samos) or elsewhere¹. Let all Athenians swear this as the regular oath immediately before the festival of the Dionysia, with sacrifice and full-grown victims²; invoking upon him who keeps it, good things in abundance,—but upon him who breaks it, destruction for himself as well as for his family."

Such was the remarkable decree which the Athenians not only passed in senate and public assembly, less than a year after the deposition of the Four Hundred, but also caused to be engraved on a column close to the door of the Senate-house. It

¹ Andokidēs de Mysterior, sect. 95-99. (c. 16. p. 48 R.) "Ὅσοις ἢ ἔπος ἡμῶντος Ἀθηναῖς ἢ ἐν τῷ στρατοπέδῳ ἢ ἄλλοθι ποσὶ δέντροις τῶν ἄλλων τῶν Ἀθηναίων, λῶν καὶ ἀφῆμι.

To what particular anti-constitutional oaths allusion is here made, we cannot tell. All those of the oligarchical conspirators, both at Samos and at Athens, are doubtless intended to be abrogated: and this oath, like that of the armament at Samos (Thucyd. viii. 75), is intended to be sworn by every one, including those who had before been members of the oligarchical conspiracy. Perhaps it may also be intended to abrogate the covenant sworn by the members of the political clubs or ἐκκλησίαι among themselves, insofar as it pledged them to anti-constitutional acts (Thucyd. viii. 54-81).

² Andokidēs de Mysterior, sect. 95-99. (c. 16. p. 48 R.) Ταῦτα δὲ ἡμῶντος Ἀθηναῖσι πάντες κοτ' ἑρῶν τελείαν, τὸν νόμον ἔπος, πρὸ δέντροις, &c.

plainly indicates, not merely that the democracy had returned, but an unusual intensity of democratic feeling along with it. The constitution which all the Athenians thus swore to maintain by the most strenuous measures of defence, must have been a constitution in which all Athenians had political rights—not one of Five Thousand privileged persons excluding the rest¹. This decree became invalid after the expulsion of the Thirty, by the general resolution then passed not to act upon any laws passed before the archonship of Eukleidēs, unless specially re-enacted. But the column, on which it stood engraved, still remained, and the words were read upon it at least down to the time of the orator Lykurgus, eighty years afterwards².

The mere deposition of the Four Hundred, however, and the transfer of political power to the Five Thousand, which took place in the first public assembly held after the defeat off Eretria—was sufficient to induce most of the violent leaders of the Four Hundred forthwith to leave Athens. Peisander, Alexiklēs, and others, went off secretly to Dekeleia³; Aristarchus alone made his flight the Flight of most of the leaders of the Four Hundred to Dekeleia.

¹ Those who think that a new constitution was established (after the deposition of the Four Hundred) are perplexed to fix the period at which the old democracy was restored. K. F. Hermann and others suppose, without any special proof, that it was restored at the time when Alkibiades returned to Athens in 407 B.C. See K. F. Hermann, Griech. Staats Alterthümer, s. 167. not. 13.

² Lykurgus adv. Leokrat. sect. 131, c. 31, p. 225; compare Demosthen. adv. Leptin. sect. 138, c. 34, p. 506.

³ If we wanted any proof, how perfectly reckless and unmeaning is the mention of the name of Solon by the orators, we should find it in this passage of Andokidēs. He calls this periphrasis of Demophantos a law of Solon (sect. 26): see above in this History, vol. iii. ch. xi.

⁴ Thucyd. viii. 98. Most of these fugitives returned six years afterwards, after the battle of Egospotami, when the Athenian people again means of inflicting a new wound upon his country. Being among the number of the generals, he availed himself of this authority to march—with some of the rudest among those Scythian archers, who did the police duty of the city—to CEnoë on the Boeotian frontier, which was at that moment under siege by a body of Corinthians and Boeotians united. Aristarchus, in concert with the besiegers, presented himself to the garrison, and acquainted them that Athens and Sparta had just concluded peace, one of the conditions of which was that CEnoë should be surrendered to the Boeotians. He therefore, as general, ordered them to evacuate the place, under the benefit of a truce to return home. The garrison, having been closely blocked up, and kept wholly ignorant of the actual condition of politics, obeyed the order without reserve; so that the Boeotians acquired possession of this very important frontier position—a new thorn in the side of Athens, besides Deceleia¹.

Themistocles stands forward to accuse the remaining leaders of the Four Hundred, especially in reference to the fort at Ectoneia, and the embassy to Sparta.

Thus was the Athenian democracy again restored, and the divorce between the city and the armament at Samos terminated, after an interruption of about four months by the successful conspiracy of the Four Hundred. It was only by a sort of miracle—or rather by the incredible backwardness and stupidity of her foreign enemies—that Athens escaped became subject to an oligarchy in the persons of the Thirty. Several of them became members of the senate which worked under the Thirty. (Lysias cont. Agorast. sect. 80, c. 18, p. 495).

Whether Aristoteles and Chariklès were among the number of the Four Hundred who now went into exile, as Wattenbach affirms (De Quadringent. Ath. Factione, p. 66), seems not clearly made out.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 89-90. Ἀριστορχὺς, ἀπὸρ ἐκ τοῦ πύλου καὶ ἐκ πύλου ἐκστρέψας τὸν ἀπὸρ, &c.

alive from this nefarious aggression of her own ablest and wealthiest citizens. That the victorious democracy should animadvert upon and punish the principal actors concerned in it—who had satiated their own selfish ambition at the cost of so much suffering, anxiety, and peril, to their country—was nothing more than rigorous justice. But the circumstances of the case were peculiar: for the counter-revolution had been accomplished partly by the aid of a minority among the Four Hundred themselves—Theramenês, Aristokratês, and others, together with the Board of Elders called Probûli—all of whom had been, at the outset, either principals or accomplices in that system of terrorism and assassination, whereby the democracy had been overthrown and the oligarchical rulers established in the Senate-house. The earlier operations of the conspiracy, therefore, though among its worst features, could not be exposed to inquiry and trial, without compromising these parties as fellow-criminals. Theramenês evaded the difficulty, by selecting for animadversion a recent act of the majority of the Four Hundred, which he and his partisans had opposed, and on which therefore he had no interests adverse either to justice or to the popular feeling. He stood foremost to impeach the last embassy sent by the Four Hundred to Sparta—sent with instructions to purchase peace and alliance at almost any price—and connected with the construction of the fort at Eetioneia for the reception of an enemy's garrison. This act of manifest treason, in which Antiphon, Phrynichus, and ten other known envoys were concerned, was chosen as the special matter for public trial and punishment, not less on public grounds than with a view to his own favour in the renewed democracy. But the fact that it was Theramenes who thus denounced his old friends and fellow-conspirators, after having lent hand and heart to their earlier and not less guilty deeds—was long remembered as a treacherous betrayal, and employed in after-days as an excuse for atrocious injustice against himself¹.

Of the twelve envoys who went on this mission, all except Phrynichus, Antiphon, Archeptolemus, and Onomaklês, seem to have already escaped to Dekeleia or elsewhere. Phrynichus (as I have mentioned a few pages above) had been assassinated several days before. Respecting his memory, a condemnatory vote had already been just passed by the restored Senate of Five Hundred, decreeing that his property should be confiscated and his house razed to the ground: and conferring the gift of citizenship, together with a pecuniary recompense, on two foreigners who claimed to have assassinated him². The other three, Antiphon, Ar-

¹ Lyxias cont. Eratosthen. c. 11. p. 427. sect. 66-68. Βουλόμενος δὲ (Theramenes) τῷ ὑπερέφω πλεῖστον πιστὸς δοκεῖν εἶναι. Ἀντιφῶντα καὶ Ἀρχεπτόλεμον, φιλάμεινος ἄνθρωποι αὐτῷ, κατηγοροῦντες ἀπέκτειναν· εἰς τὰς οὐκίας τοῦ δὲ κακίας ἔλθον, ὥστε ἅμα μὲν διὰ τὴν πρὸς δούλους πίστιν ἑαυτοὺς καταδικαίωσαν, διὰ δὲ τὴν πρὸς ἑαυτοῖς τοῖς φίλοις ἀπάλησιν.

Compare Xenophon, Hellen. ii. 3, 30-33.

² That these votes, respecting the memory and the death of Phrynichus, preceded the trial of Antiphon—we may gather from the concluding words of the sentence passed upon Antiphon: see Piatarch, Vit. X. Orat. p. 834 B.: compare Schol. Aristoph. Lysistr. 313.

Both Lyxias and Lykurgus, the orators, contain statements about the death of Phrynichus which are not in harmony with Thucydides. Both these orators agree in reporting the names of the two foreigners who cheptolemus, and Onomaklēs¹, were presented in name to the Senate by the generals (of whom probably Theramenēs was one) as having gone on a mission to Sparta for purposes of mischief to Athens, partly on board an enemy's ship, partly through the Spartan garrison at Dekeleia. Upon this presentation, doubtless a document of some length and going into particulars, a senator named Andron moved,—That the generals, aided by any ten senators whom they may choose, do seize the three persons accused, and hold them in custody for trial :—That the Thesmothetæ do send to each of the three a formal summons, to prepare themselves for trial on a future day before the Dikastery, on the charge of high treason—and do bring them to trial on the day named; assisted by the generals, the ten senators chosen as auxiliaries, and any other claimed to have slain Phrynichus, and whose claim was allowed by the people afterwards, in a formal reward and vote of citizenship—Thrasylbus of Kalydon—Apollodorus of Megara (Lysias cont. Agorat. c. 18. p. 492; Lykurg. cont. Leokrat. c. 29. p. 217).

Lykurgus says that Phrynichus was assassinated by night "near the fountain hard by the willow-trees;" which is quite contradictory to Thucydides, who states that the deed was done in daylight, and in the market-place. Agoratus, against whom the speech of Lysias is directed, pretended to have been one of the assassins, and claimed reward on that score.

The story of Lykurgus, that the Athenian people, on the proposition of Kritias, exhumed and brought to trial the dead body of Phrynichus, and that Aristarchus and Alexaklēs were put to death for undertaking its defence—is certainly in part false, and probably wholly false. Aristarchus was then at Enos, Alexaklēs at Dekeleia.

¹ Onomaklēs had been one of the colleagues of Phrynichus, as general of the armament to Ionia, in the preceding autumn (Thucyd. viii. 25).

In one of the Biographies of Thucydides (p. xxii. in Dr. Arnold's edition) it is stated that Onomaklēs was executed along with the other two; but the document cited in the Pseudo-Plutarch contradicts this.

citizen who may please to take part, as their accusers. Each of the three was to be tried separately, and if condemned, was to be dealt with according to the penal law of the city against traitors, or persons guilty of treason¹.

Antiphon
tried, condemned,
and executed.

Though all the three persons thus indicated were in Athens, or at least were supposed to be there, on the day when this resolution was passed by the Senate,—yet before it was executed, Onomaklès had fled; so that Antiphon and Archeptolemus only were imprisoned for trial. They too must have had ample opportunity for leaving the city, and we might have presumed that Antiphon would have thought it quite as necessary to retire as Peisander and Alexiklès. So acute a man as he, at no time very popular, must have known that now at least he had drawn the sword against his fellow-citizens in a manner which could never be forgiven. However, he chose voluntarily to stay: and this man, who had given orders for taking off so many of the democratical speakers by private assassination, received from the democracy, when triumphant, full notice and fair trial, on a distinct and specific charge. The speech which he made in his defence, though it did not procure acquittal, was listened to, not merely with patience, but with admiration; as we may judge from the powerful and lasting effect which it produced. Thucydides describes it as the most magnificent defence against a capital charge, which had ever come before him¹; and the poet Agathon, doubtless a hearer, warmly complimented Antiphon on his eloquence; to which the latter replied, that the approval of one such discerning judge was in his eyes an ample compensation for the unfriendly verdict of the multitude. Both he and Archeptolemus were found guilty by the Dikastery and condemned to the penalties of treason. They were handed over to the magistrates called the Eleven (the chiefs of executive justice at Athens) to be put to death by the customary draught of hemlock. Their properties were confiscated: their houses were directed to be razed, and the vacant site to be marked by columns, with the inscription—"The residence of Antiphon the traitor—of Archeptolemus the traitor." They were not permitted to be buried either in Attica, or in any territory subject to Athenian dominion². Their children, both legitimate and illegitimate, were deprived of the citizenship; and the citizen, who should adopt any descendant of either of them, was to be himself in like manner disfranchised.

¹ Plutarch, Vit. X. Oratt. p. 834: compare Xenophon, Hellenic. i. 7. 22.

Apoléxis was one of the accusers of Antiphon: see Harpokration, γ. Ξανόκριτος.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 68; Aristotel. Ethic. Eudem. iii. 5. Καὶ αὐτὸς γε ("Antiphon")—δύσιστα φαίνεται τῷ μέχρι ἐμοῦ, ὑπὲρ αὐτοῦ τοῦτο αἰτιάσθαι—θανάτου διὰ τὸ ἀπολογησάμενος—"And he too for himself," &c. Thucydides had just before stated that Antiphon rendered the most valuable service as an adviser to other litigants, but that he seldom spoke before the people or the Dikastery himself. The words καὶ αὐτὸς γε, following immediately, set forth his great efficiency when he did for once plead his own cause.

Rühken seems quite right (Dissertat. De Antiphont. p. 818 Reisk) in considering the oration ἐπὶ μετασκευῇ to be Antiphon's defence of himself—though Westermann (Geschichte der Griechisch. Beredsamkeit, p. 277) contravenes this opinion. This oration is alluded to in several of the articles in Harpokration.

² So, Themistoklēs, as a traitor, was not allowed to be buried in Attica (Thucyd. i. 138; Cornel. Nepos, Vit. Themistocl. ii. 10). His friends are said to have brought his bones thither secretly.

Such was the sentence passed by the Dikastery, pursuant to the Athenian law of treason. It was directed to be engraved on the same brazen column as the decree of honour to the slayers of Phrynichus. From that column it was transcribed, and has thus passed into history¹.

Treatment
of the Four Hundred
generally.

How many of the Four Hundred oligarchs actually came to trial or were punished, we have no means of knowing²; but there is ground for believing that none were put to death except Antiphon and Archeptolemus—perhaps also Aristarchus, the betrayer of CENOË to the Boeotians. The latter is said to have been formally tried and condemned³:

¹ It is given at length in Pseudo-Plutarch. Vit. X. Oratt. p. 833, 834. It was preserved by Cicilius, a Sicilian and rhetorical teacher, of the Augustan age; who possessed sixty orations ascribed to Antiphon, twenty-five of which he considered to be spurious.

Antiphon left a daughter, whom Kallischius sued for in marriage pursuant to the forms of law, being entitled to do so on the score of near relationship (ἐνδοξιστὴρ). Kallischius was himself one of the Four Hundred—perhaps a brother of Kritias. It seems singular that the legal power of suing at law for a female in marriage, by right of near kin (εὐὸ ἐνδοξιστὴρ), could extend to a female disfranchised and debarred from all rights of citizenship.

If we may believe Harpokration, Andron (who made the motion in the Senate for sending Antiphon and Archeptolemus to trial) had been himself a member of the Four Hundred oligarchs, as well as Tharmenes (Harp. v. Ἀνδρων).

The note of Dr. Arnold, upon that passage (viii. 68) wherein Thucydides calls Antiphon ἀπὸ κατὰ φύσιν ὀλιγαρχίας—"inferior to no man in virtue"—well deserves to be consulted. This passage shows in a remarkable manner, what were the political and private qualities which determined the esteem of Thucydides. It shows that his sympathies went along with the oligarchical party; and that while the exaggerations of opposition speakers or demagogues, such as those which he imputes to Kleon and Hyperbolus, provoked his bitter hatred—exaggerations of the oligarchical warfare, or multiplied assassinations, did not make him like a man the worse. But it shows at the same time his great candour in the narration of facts; for he gives an undigested revelation both of the assassinations, and of the treason, of Antiphon.

² Xenoph. Hellenic. i. 7, 28. This is the natural meaning of the

though by what accident he afterwards came into the power of the Athenians, after having once effected his escape, we are not informed. The property of Peisander (he himself having escaped) was confiscated, and granted either wholly or in part as a recompense to Apollodorus, one of the assassins of Phrynichus¹: probably the property of the other conspicuous fugitive oligarchs was confiscated also. Polystратus, another of the Four Hundred, who had only become a member of that body a few days before its fall, was tried during absence (which absence his defenders afterwards accounted for by saying that he had been wounded in the naval battle off Eretria) and heavily fined. It seems that each of the Four Hundred was called on to go through an audit and a trial of accountability (according to the practice general at Athens with magistrates going out of office). Such of them as did not appear to this trial were condemned to fine, to exile, or to have their names recorded as traitors. But most of those who did appear seem to have been acquitted, partly, we are told, by bribes to the Logistæ or auditing officers—though some were condemned either to fine or to partial political disability, along with those hoplites who had been the most marked partisans of the Four Hundred².

passage; though it may also mean that a day for trial was named, but that Aristarchus did not appear. Aristarchus may possibly have been made prisoner in one of the engagements which took place between the garrison of Dekeleia and the Athenians. The Athenian exiles in a body established themselves at Dekeleia and carried on constant war with the citizens at Athens: see Lysias, De Bonis Nigræ Fratribus, Or. xviii. ch. 4. p. 604; Pro Polystратo, Orat. xx. c. 7. p. 688; Andokides de Mysteriis, c. 17. p. 50.

¹ Lysias, De Olcâ Sacra, Or. vii. ch. 2. p. 263 Retak.

² "Quadringentis ipsa dominatio fraudi non fuit; imo qui cum Theramene et Aristocrate steterant, in magno honore habiti sunt; om-

Indistinctly as we make out the particular proceedings of the Athenian people at this restoranibus autem rationes redilendæ fuerunt; qui solus vertissent, proditores iudicati sunt, nomina in publico proposita" (Wattenbach, De Quadragesenario Athenis Factione, p. 65).

From the proscription of Patrokleides (passed six years subsequently, after the battle of Egospotamos) we learn that the names of such among the Four Hundred as did not stay to take their trial, were engraved on pillars distinct from those who were tried and condemned either to fine or to various disabilities—Andokides de Mysteriis, sect. 75-78—Καὶ οὗτοι ἀνέγραψαν τῶν τετρακοσίων τοὺς ἐγγράψαντας, ἃ ἄλλα τι περὶ τῶν ἐν τῇ διανοχίᾳ πραχθέντων ἔστι πον γεγραμμένον, πλὴν ἔπαιον ἐν στήλαις γέγραπται τῶν μὴ τεθῆαι μινόντων, &c. (these last names, as the most criminal, were excepted from the amnesty of Patrokleides.)

We here see that there were two categories among the condemned Four Hundred:—1. Those who remained to stand the trial of accountability, and were condemned either to a fine which they could not pay, or to some positive disability. 2. Those who did not remain to stand their trial, and were condemned par contumace.

Along with the first category we find other names besides those of the Four Hundred, found guilty as their partisans—ἄλλα τι (ἄλλα) περὶ τῶν ἐν τῇ διανοχίᾳ πραχθέντων. Among these partisans we may rank the soldiers mentioned a little before, sect. 75—οἱ στρατιῶται, οἳ ἐν ἐπείκειναι ἐπὶ τῶν τυράννων ἐν τῇ πόλει, τὰ μὲν ἄλλα ἢ ἄνερ τῶν ἄλλων πολιτῶν, εἰς αὐτὸν δὲ ἐν τῇ δήμῳ οἳ ἐξῆν αἰνῶσι οὐδὲ βολαδίσαν—where the preposition ἐν seems to signify not simply contemporaneity, but a sort of intimate connection, like the phrase ἐν κρητίστον αἰσῶν (see Matthiæ, Gr. Gr. sect. 584; Kühner, Gr. Gr. sect. 611).

The creation of Lykias pro Polystratus is on several points obscure: but we make out that Polystratus was one of the Four Hundred who did not come to stand his trial of accountability, and was therefore condemned in his absence. Severe accusations were made against him, and he was falsely asserted to be the cousin, whereas he was in reality only fellow-demos, of Phrynichus (sect. 20, 24, 11). The defence explains his non-appearance by saying that he had been wounded at the battle of Eretria, and that the trial took place immediately after the deposition of the Four Hundred (sect. 14, 24). He was heavily fined, and deprived of his citizenship (sect. 15, 33, 38). It would appear that the fine was greater than his property could discharge: accordingly this fine, remaining unpaid, would become chargeable upon his sons after his death, and unless they could pay it, they would come into the situation of insolvent public debtors to the state, which would deprive them from the exercise of the rights of citizenship, so long as the debt remained unpaid. But while Polystratus was alive, his sons were not liable to the state for the payment of his fine; and they therefore tion of the democracy, we know from Thucydides that their prudence and moderation were exemplary. The eulogy, which he bestows in such emphatic terms upon their behaviour at this juncture, is indeed doubly remarkable¹: first, because it comes from an exile, not friendly to the democracy, and a strong admirer of Antiphon; next, because the juncture itself was one eminently trying to the popular morality, and likely to degenerate, by almost natural tendency, into excess of reactionary vengeance and persecution. The democracy was now one hundred years old, dating from Kleisthenes—and fifty years old, even dating from the final reforms of Ephialtes and Perikles; so that self-government and political equality were a part of the habitual sentiment of every man's bosom—heightened in this case by the fact that Athens was not merely a democracy, but an imperial democracy, having dependencies abroad². At a moment when, from unparalleled previous disasters, she is barely still remained citizens and in the full exercise of their rights, though she was disfranchised. They were three sons, all of whom had served with credit as hoplites, and even as horsemen, in Sicily and elsewhere. In the speech before us, one of them prefers a petition to the Dikastery that the sentence passed against his father may be mitigated—partly on the ground that it was unmerited, being passed while his father was afraid to stand forward in his own defence—partly as recompense for distinguished military services of all the three sons. The speech was delivered at a time later than the battle of Kynossema, in the autumn of this year (sect. 31), but not very long after the overthrow of the Four Hundred, and certainly (I think) long before the Thirty; so that the assertion of Taylor (Vit. Lysia, p. 55) that all the extant orations of Lysias bear date after the Thirty, must be received with this exception.

Favourable judgment of Thucydides on the conduct of the Athenians.

¹ This testimony of Thucydides is amply sufficient to refute the vague assertions in the Oration xvi. of Lysias (Ἐπεὶ καὶ ἄλλοι, Ἀπολ. sec. 34, 35) about great enormities now committed by the Athenians; though Mr. Mitford copies these assertions as if they were real history, referring them to a time four years afterwards (History of Greece, ch. xx. s. 1. vol. iv. p. 327).

² Thucyd. viii. 68.

able to keep up the struggle against her foreign enemies, a small knot of her own wealthiest citizens, taking advantage of her weakness, contrive, by a tissue of fraud and force not less flagitious than skillfully combined, to concentrate in their own hands the powers of the state, and to tear from their countrymen the security against bad government, the sentiment of equal citizenship, and the long-established freedom of speech. Nor is this all: these conspirators not only plant an oligarchical sovereignty in the Senate-house, but also sustain that sovereignty by inviting a foreign garrison from without, and by betraying Athens to her Peloponnesian enemies. Two more deadly injuries it is impossible to imagine; and from neither of them would Athens have escaped, if her foreign enemy had manifested reasonable alacrity. Considering the immense peril, the narrow escape, and the impaired condition in which Athens was left notwithstanding her escape—we might well have expected in the people a violence of reactionary hostility such as every calm observer, while making allowance for the provocation, must nevertheless have condemned; and perhaps somewhat analogous to that exasperation which, under very similar circumstances, had caused the bloody massacres at Korkyra¹. And when we find that this is exactly the occasion which Thucydides (an observer rather less than impartial) selects to eulogise their good conduct and moderation, we are made deeply sensible of the good habits which their previous democracy must have implanted in them, and which now served as a corrective to the impulse of the actual moment. They had become familiar with the cementing force of a common sentiment; they had learnt to hold sacred the inviolability of law and justice, even in respect to their worst enemy; and what was of not less moment, the frequency and freedom of political discussion had taught them not only to substitute the contentions of the tongue for those of the sword, but also to conceive their situation with its present and prospective liabilities, instead of being hurried away by blind retrospective vengeance against the past.

¹ See, about the events in Korkyra, vol. vi. ch. l. p. 382.

There are few contrasts in Grecian history more memorable or more instructive, than that between this oligarchical conspiracy,—conducted by some of the ablest hands at Athens—and the democratical movement going on at the same time in Samos, among the Athenian armament and the Samian citizens. In the former we have nothing but selfishness and personal ambition from the beginning: first, a partnership to seize for their own advantage the powers of government—next, after this object has been accomplished, a breach among the partners, arising out of disappointment alike selfish. We find appeal made to nothing but the worst tendencies; either tricks to practise upon the credulity of the people, or extra-judicial murders to work upon their fear. In the latter, on the contrary, the sentiment invoked is that of common patriotism, and equal, public-minded sympathy. That which we read in Thucydides—when the soldiers of the armament and the Samian citizens pledged themselves to each other by solemn oaths to uphold their democracy, to maintain harmony and good feeling with each other, to prosecute energetically the war against

Oligarchy
at Athens, democracy at Samos—contrast.

the Peloponnesians, and to remain at enmity with the oligarchical conspirators at Athens—is a scene among the most dramatic and inspiring which occurs in his history¹. Moreover we recognise at Samos the same absence of reactionary vengeance as at Athens, after the attack of the oligarchs, Athenian as well as Samian, has been repelled; although those oligarchs had begun by assassinating Hyperbolus and others. There is throughout this whole democratical movement at Samos a generous exaltation of common sentiment over personal, and at the same time an absence of ferocity against opponents, such as nothing except democracy ever inspired in the Grecian bosom.

It is indeed true that this was a special movement of generous enthusiasm, and that the details of a democratical government correspond to it but imperfectly. Neither in the life of an individual, nor in that of a people, does the ordinary and every-day movement appear at all worthy of those particular seasons in which a man is lifted above his own level, and becomes capable of extreme devotion and heroism. Yet such emotions, though their complete predominance is never otherwise than transitory, have their foundation in veins of sentiment which are not even at other times wholly extinct, but count among the manifold forces tending to modify and improve, if they cannot govern, human action. Even their moments of transitory predominance leave a luminous tract behind, and render the men who have passed through them more apt to conceive again the same generous impulse, though in fainter degree. It is one of the merits of Grecian democracy that it did raise this feeling of equal and patriotic communion; sometimes, and on rare occasions, like the scene at Samos, with overwhelming intensity, so as to impassion an unanimous multitude; more frequently, in feebler tide, yet such as gave some chance to an honest and eloquent orator of making successful appeal to public feeling against corruption or selfishness. If we follow the movements of Antiphon and his fellow-conspirators at Athens, contemporaneous with the democratical manifestations at Samos, we shall see that not only was no such generous impulse included in it, but the success of their scheme depended upon their being able to strike all common and active patriotism out of the Athenian bosom. Under the "cold shade" of their oligarchy—even if we suppose the absence of cruelty and rapacity, which would probably soon have become rife had their dominion lasted, as we shall presently learn from the history of the second oligarchy of Thirty—no sentiment would have been left to the Athenian multitude except fear, servility, or at best a tame and dumb sequacity to leaders whom they neither chose nor controlled. To those who regard different forms of government as distinguished from each other mainly by the feelings which each tends to inspire in magistrates as well as citizens, the contemporaneous scenes of Athens and Samos will suggest instructive comparisons between Grecian oligarchy and Grecian democracy.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 75.

CHAPTER LXIII.

THE RESTORED ATHENIAN DEMOCRACY, AFTER THE DEPOSITION OF THE FOUR HUNDRED, DOWN TO THE ARRIVAL OF CYRUS THE YOUNGER IN ASIA MINOR.

THE oligarchy of Four Hundred at Athens (installed in the Senate-house about February or March 411 B.C., and deposed about July of the same year), after four or five months of danger and distraction such as to bring her almost within the grasp of her enemies, has now been terminated by the restoration of her democracy; with what attendant circumstances has been amply detailed. I now revert to the military and naval operations on the Asiatic coast, partly contemporaneous with the political dissensions at Athens, above described.

It has already been stated that the Peloponnesian fleet of 94 triremes¹, having remained not less than 80 days idle at Rhodes, had come back to Miletus towards the end of March; with the intention of proceeding to the rescue of Chios, which a portion of the Athenian armament under Strombichides had been for some time besieging, and which was now in the greatest distress. The main Athenian fleet at Samos, however, prevented Astyochus from effecting this object, since he did not think it advisable to hazard a general battle. He was influenced partly by the bribes, partly by the delusions of Tissaphernès, who sought only to wear out both parties by protracted war, and who now professed

¹ Thucyd. viii. 44, 45.

B.C. 411.
Embarrassed state of Athens
after the Four Hundred.

Peloponnesian fleet—result of Abydos from
Athens.

to be on the point of bringing up the Phœnician fleet to his aid. Astyochus had in his fleet the ships which had been brought over for co-operation with Pharnabazus at the Hellespont, and which were thus equally unable to reach their destination. To meet this difficulty, the Spartan Derkyllidas was sent with a body of troops by land to the Hellespont, there to join Pharnabazus, in acting against Abydos and the neighbouring dependencies of Athens. Abydos, connected with Milētus by colonial ties, set the example of revolting from Athens to Derkyllidas and Pharnabazus; an example followed, two days afterwards, by the neighbouring town of Lampsakus.

It does not appear that there was at this time any Athenian force in the Hellespont; and the news of this danger to the empire in a fresh quarter, when conveyed to Chios, alarmed Strombichidēs, the commander of the Athenian besieging armament. The Chians, driven to despair by increasing famine as well as by want of relief from Astyochus, and having recently increased their fleet to 36 triremes against the Athenian 32, by the arrival of 12 ships under Leon (obtained from Milētus during the absence of Astyochus at Rhodes) had sallied out and fought an obstinate naval battle against the Athenians, with some advantage¹. Nevertheless Strombichidēs felt compelled immediately to carry away 24 triremes and a body of hoplites for the relief of the Hellespont. Hence the Chians became sufficiently masters of the sea, to provision themselves afresh, though the Athenian armament and fortified post still remained on the island. Astyochus also was enabled to recall Leon with the twelve triremes to Milêtus, and thus to strengthen his main fleet¹.

Strombichidēs goes from Chios to the Hellespont—improved condition of the Chians.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 61, 62. οὐκ ἄνευρος ἔχουρες means a certain success, not very decisive.

Discontent
in the Pe-loponnesian fleet at Milêtus.

The present appears to have been the time, when the oligarchical party both in the town and in the camp at Samos, were laying their plan of conspiracy as already recounted, and when the Athenian generals were divided in opinion—Charminus siding with this party, Leon and Diomedon against it. Apprised of the reigning dissension, Astyochus thought it a favourable opportunity for sailing with his whole fleet up to the harbour of Samos, and offering battle; but the Athenians were in no condition to leave the harbour: He accordingly returned to Milêtus, where he again remained inactive, in expectation (real or pretended) of the arrival of the Phœnician ships. But the discontent of his own troops, especially the Syracusan contingent, presently became uncontrollable. They not only murmured at the inaction of the armament during this precious moment of disunion in the Athenian camp, but also detected the insidious policy of Tissaphernês in thus frittering away their strength without result; a policy still more keenly brought home to their feelings by his irregularity in supplying them with pay and provision, which caused serious distress. To appease their clamours, Astyochus was compelled to call together a general assembly, the resolution of which was pronounced in favour of immediate battle. He accordingly sailed from Milêtus with his whole fleet of 112 triremes round to the promontory of Mykalé immediately opposite Samos—ordering the Milesian hoplites to cross the promontory by land to the same point. The Athenian fleet, now consisting of only 82 sail, in the absence of Strombichidēs, was then moored near Glaukē on the mainland of Mykalé: but the public decision just taken by the Peloponnesians to fight becoming known to them, they retired to Samos, not being willing to engage with such inferior numbers¹.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 63.

It seems to have been during this last interval of inaction on the part of Astyochus, that the oligarchical party in Samos made their attempt and miscarried; the reaction from which attempt brought about, with little delay, the great democratical manifestation, and solemn collective oath, of the Athenian armament—coupled with the nomination of new, cordial, and unanimous generals. They were now in high enthusiasm, anxious for battle with the enemy; and Strombichidēs had been sent for immediately, that the fleet might be united against the main enemy at Milētus. That officer had recovered Lampsakus, but had failed in his attempt on Abydos². Having established a central fortified station at Sestos, he now rejoined the fleet at Samos, which by his arrival was increased to 108 sail. He arrived in the night, when the Peloponnesian fleet was preparing to renew its attack from Mykalé the next morning. It consisted of 112 ships, and was therefore still superior in number to the Athenians. But having now learnt both the arrival of Strombichidēs, and the renewed spirit as well as unanimity of the Athenians, the Peloponnesian commanders did not venture to persist in their resolution of fighting. They returned back to Milétus, to the mouth of which harbour the Athenians sailed, and had the satisfaction of offering battle to an unwilling enemy¹.

Strombichides returns from Chios to Samos.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 79, 79.

² Thucyd. viii. 62.

Peloponnesian squadron and force at the Hellespont — revolt of Byzantium from Athens.

Such confession of inferiority was well-calculated to embitter still further the discontents of the Peloponnesian fleet at Milétus. Tissaphernês had become more and more parsimonious in furnishing pay and supplies; while the recall of Alkibiadês to Samos, which happened just now, combined with the uninterrupted apparent intimacy between him and the satrap, confirmed their belief that the latter was intentionally cheating and starving them, in the interest of Athens. At the same time, earnest invitations arrived from Pharnabazus, soliciting the co-operation of the fleet at the Hellespont, with liberal promises of pay and maintenance. Klearchus, who had been sent out with the last squadron from Sparta for the express purpose of going to aid Pharnabazus, claimed to be allowed to execute his orders; while Astyochus also, having renounced the idea of any united action, thought it now expedient to divide the fleet, which he was at a loss how to support. Accordingly Klearchus was sent with forty triremes from Milétus to the Hellespont, yet with instructions to evade the Athenians at Samos by first stretching out westward into the Ægean. Encountering severe storms, he was forced with the greater part of his squadron to seek shelter at Delos, and even suffered so much damage as to return to Milētus, from whence he himself marched to the Hellespont by land. Ten of his triremes, however, under the Megarian Helixus, weathered the storm and pursued their voyage to the Hellespont, which was at this moment unguarded, since Strombichidēs seems to have brought back all his squadron. Helixus passed on unopposed to Byzantium, a Doric city and Megarian colony, from whence secret invitations had already reached him, and which he now induced to revolt from Athens. This untoward news admonished the Athenian generals at Samos, whose vigilance the circuitous route of Klearchus had eluded, of the necessity of guarding the Hellespont, whither they sent a detachment, and even attempted in vain to recapture Byzantium. Sixteen fresh triremes afterwards proceeded from Milētus to the Hellespont and Abydos, thus enabling the Peloponnesians to watch that strait as well as the Bosphorus and Byzantium¹, and even to ravage the Thracian Chersonese.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 79.

Meanwhile the discontents of the fleet at Milētus broke out into open mutiny against Astyochus and Tissaphernēs. Unpaid and only half-fed, the seamen came together in crowds to talk over their grievances; denouncing Astyochus as having betrayed them for his own profit to the satrap, who was treacherously ruining the armament under the inspirations of Alkibiadēs. Even some of the officers, whose silence had been hitherto purchased, began to hold the same language; perceiving that

Discontent
and meeting against Astyochus
at Milētus.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 80-99.

the mischief was becoming irreparable, and that the men were actually on the point of desertion. Above all, the incorruptible Hermokratès of Syracuse, and Dorieus the Thurian commander, zealously espoused the claims of their seamen, who being mostly free-men (in greater proportion than the crews of the Peloponnesian ships), went in a body to Astyochus, with loud complaints and demand of their arrears of pay. But the Peloponnesian general received them with haughtiness and even with menace, lifting up his stick to strike the commander Dorieus while advocating their cause. Such was the resentment of the seamen that they rushed forward to pelt Astyochus with missiles: he took refuge, however, on a neighbouring altar, so that no actual mischief was done¹.

The Spartan commissioner Lichas enjoins the Milesians to obey Tissaphernes—discontent of the Milesians.

Nor was the discontent confined to the seamen of the fleet. The Milesians also, displeased and alarmed at the fort which Tissaphernès had built in their town, watched an opportunity of attacking it by surprise, and expelled his garrison. Though the armament in general, now full of antipathy against the satrap, sympathised in this proceeding, yet the Spartan commissioner Lichas censured it severely; intimating to the Milesians that they, as well as the other Greeks in the king's territory, were bound to be subservient to Tissaphernès within all reasonable limits—and even to court him by extreme subservience, until the war should be prosperously terminated. It appears that in other matters also, Lichas had enforced instead of mitigating the authority of the satrap over them; so that the Milesians now came to hate him vehemently¹, and when he shortly afterwards died of sickness, they refused permission to bury him in the spot (probably some place of honour) which his surviving countrymen had fixed upon. Though Lichas in these enforcements only carried out the stipulations of his treaty with Persia, yet it is certain that the Milesians, instead of acquiring autonomy according to the general promises of Sparta, were now farther from it than ever, and that imperial Athens had protected them against Persia much better than Sparta.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 83, 84.

The subordination of the armament, however, was now almost at an end, when Mindarus arrived from Sparta as admiral to supersede Astyochus, who was summoned home and took his departure. Both Hermokratès and some Milesian deputies availed themselves of this opportunity to go to Sparta for the purpose of preferring complaints against Tissaphernès; while the latter on his part sent thither an envoy named Gaulites (a Karian brought up in equal familiarity with the Greek and Karian languages) both to defend himself against the often-repeated charges of Hermokratès, that he had been treacherously withholding the pay under concert with Alkibiadès and the Athenians—and to denounce the Milesians on his own side, as having supersedes Astyochus

Mindarus
as admiral.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 84. Ὁ μὲντοι Λίχας ὡς τε ἠγάσσαντο αὐτοῖς, ἔφη τε χρήσαι Τισσαφέρνηι καὶ δουλεῖν Μιλησίους καὶ τοῖς ἄλλοις ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ τὰ μέγιστα, καὶ ἐπιθεραπεῖν οὐκ ἐν τῷ πόλεμῳ εἶδέναι. Οἱ δὲ Μιλησιοὶ ἀργίζοντο τε αὐτῷ καὶ διὰ ταῦτα καὶ δι' ἄλλα τοιοῦτότροπα, &c.

wrongfully demolished his fort¹. At the same time, he thought it necessary to put forward a new pretence, for the purpose of strengthening the negotiations of his envoy at Sparta, soothing the impatience of the armament, and conciliating the new admiral Mindarus. He announced that the Phœnician fleet was on the point of arriving at Aspendus in Pamphylia, and that he was going thither to meet it, for the purpose of bringing it up to the seat of war to co-operate with the Peloponnesians. He invited Lichas to accompany him, and engaged to leave Tamos at Milêtus, as deputy during his absence, with orders to furnish pay and maintenance to the fleet².

Phœnician
fleet at Aspendus
—Duplicity of Tis-saphernês.

Mindarus, a new commander without any experience of the mendacity of Tissaphernês, was imposed upon by his plausible assurance, and even captivated by the near prospect of so powerful a reinforcement. He despatched an officer named Philippus with two triremes round the Triopian Cape to Aspendus, while the satrap went thither by land.

Here again was a fresh delay of no inconsiderable length, while Tissaphernês was absent at Aspendus, on this ostensible purpose. Some time elapsed before Mindarus was undeceived, for Philippus found the Phœnician fleet at Aspendus, and was therefore at first full of hope that it was really coming onward. But the satrap soon showed that his purpose now, as heretofore, was nothing better than delay and delusion. The Phœnician ships were 147

¹ Thucyd. viii. 85.

² Thucyd. viii. 87.

in number; a fleet more than sufficient for concluding the maritime war, if brought up to act zealously. But Tissaphernès affected to think that this was a small force, unworthy of the majesty of the Great King; who had commanded a fleet of 300 sail to be fitted out for the service¹. He waited for some time in pretended expectation that more ships were on their way, disregarding all the remonstrances of the Lacedæmonian officers.

Presently arrived the Athenian Alkibiadès, with thirteen Athenian triremes, exhibiting himself as on the best terms with the satrap. He too had made use of the approaching Phœnician fleet to delude his countrymen at Samos, by promising to go and meet Tissaphernès at Aspendus; so as to determine him, if possible, to employ the fleet in aid of Athens—but at the very least, not to employ it in aid of Sparta. The latter alternative of the promise was sufficiently safe, for he knew well that Tissaphernès had no intention of applying the fleet to any really efficient purpose. But he was thereby enabled to take credit with his countrymen for having been the means of diverting such a formidable reinforcement from the enemy.

Alkibiadès at Aspendus—his double game between Tissaphernès and the Athenians.

Partly the apparent confidence between Tissaphernès and Alkibiadès—partly the impudent shifts

¹ Thucyd. viii. 87. This greater total, which Tissaphernès pretended that the Great King purposed to send, is specified by Diodorus at 300 sail. Thucydides does not assign any precise number (Diodor. xiii. 38, 42, 46).

On a subsequent occasion, too, we hear of the Phœnician fleet as intended to be augmented to a total of 300 sail (Xenoph. Hellen. iii. 4, 1). It seems to have been the sort of standing number for a fleet worthy of the Persian king.

Phenicians sent back on Aspendus without anon—motives of Asapher-
is.

of the former, grounded on the incredible pretence that the fleet was insufficient in number—at length satisfied Philippos that the present was only a new manifestation of deceit. After a long and vexatious interval, he apprised Mindarus—not without indignant abuse of the satrap—that nothing was to be hoped from the fleet at Aspendus. Yet the proceeding of Tissaphernés, indeed, in bringing up the Phenicians to that place, and still withholding the order for farther advance and action, was in every one's eyes mysterious and unaccountable. Some fancied that he did it with a view of levying larger bribes from the Phenicians themselves, as a premium for being sent home without fighting, as it appears that they actually were. But Thucydides supposes that he had no other motive than that which had determined his behaviour during the last year—to protract the war and impoverish both Athens and Sparta, by setting up a fresh deception, which would last for some weeks, and thus procure so much delay¹. The historian is doubtless right: but without his assurance, it would have been difficult to believe, that the maintenance of a fraudulent pretence, for so inconsiderable a time, should have been held as an adequate motive for bringing this large fleet from Phenicia to Aspendus, and then sending it away unemployed.

Having at length lost his hope of the Phenician ships, Mindarus resolved to break off all dealing with the perfidious Tissaphernés—the more so as Tamos, the deputy of the latter, though left osten-

¹ Thucyd. viii. 87, 88, 89.

sibly to pay and keep the fleet, performed that duty with greater irregularity than ever—and to conduct his fleet to the Hellespont into co-operation with Pharnabazus, who still continued his promises and invitations. The Peloponnesian fleet¹ (73 triremes strong, after deducting 13 which had been sent under Dorieus to suppress some disturbances in Rhodes) having been carefully prepared beforehand, was put in motion by sudden order, so that no previous intimation might reach the Athenians at Samos. After having been delayed some days at Ikarus by bad weather, Mindarus reached Chios in safety. But here he was pursued by Thrasyllus, who passed, with 55 triremes, to the northward of Chios, and was thus between the Lacedæmonian admiral and the Hellespont. Believing that Mindarus would remain some time at Chios, Thrasyllus placed scouts both on the high lands of Lesbos and on the continent opposite Chios, in order that he might receive instant notice of any movement on the part of the enemy's fleet². Meanwhile he employed his Athenian force in reducing the Lesbian town of Eresus, which had been lately prevailed on to revolt by a body of 300 assailants from Kymê under the Theban Anaxander—partly Methymnæan exiles with some political sympathisers, partly mer-

Mindarus leaves Miletus with his fleet—goes to Chios—Thrasyllus and the Athenian fleet at Lesbos.

¹ Diodor. xiii. 38.

² Thucyd. viii. 100, ἀλαθίμωτος δὲ ὄντι ἐν τῇ Χίῳ εἴη, καὶ ἐπιπλεῖσιν αἰεὶς ἐκτίθετο αἰετῶν, ἀποστείλας μὲν ἀνακρίσαντες καὶ ἐν τῇ Λέσβῳ, καὶ ἐν τῇ ἀπέναντι ἡπείρῳ, εἰ ἴδωσι καὶ κινῶντο αἱ σῆς, ἄνωγε μὴ λάθωσι, &c.

I construe τῇ ἀπέναντι ἡπείρῳ as meaning the mainland opposite Chios, not opposite Lesbos. The words may admit either sense, since Χίῳ καὶ αἰετῶν follow so immediately before: and the situation for the scouts was much more suitable, opposite the northern portion of Chios.

cenary foreigners—who succeeded in carrying Eresus after failing in an attack on Methymna. Thrasyllus found before Eresus a small Athenian squadron of five triremes under Thrasybulus, who had been despatched from Samos to try and forestall the revolt, but had arrived too late. He was farther joined by two triremes from the Hellespont, and by others from Methymna, so that his entire fleet reached the number of 67 triremes, with which he proceeded to lay siege to Eresus; trusting to his scouts for timely warning in case the enemy's fleet should move northward.

Mindarus
eludes Thrasyllus, and reaches the Helles-
pont.

The course which Thrasyllus expected the Peloponnesian fleet to take, was to sail from Chios northward through the strait which separates the north-eastern portion of that island from Mount Mimas on the Asiatic mainland: after which it would probably sail past Eresus on the western side of Lesbos, as being the shortest track to the Hellespont—though it might also go round on the eastern side between Lesbos and the continent, by a somewhat longer route. The Athenian scouts were planted so as to descry the Peloponnesian fleet if it either passed through this strait or neared the island of Lesbos. But Mindarus did neither; thus eluding their watch and reaching the Hellespont without the knowledge of the Athenians. Having passed two days in provisioning his ships, receiving besides from the Chians three tesserakosts (a Chian coin of unknown value) for each man among his seamen, he departed on the third day from Chios, but took a southerly route and rounded the island in all haste on its western or sea-side. Having reached and passed the northern latitude of Chios, he took an eastward course, with Lesbos at some distance to his left-hand, direct to the mainland; which he touched at a harbour called Karterii in the Phokæan territory. Here he stopped to give the crew their morning meal: he then crossed the arc of the Gulf of Kymê to the little islets called Arginusæ (close on the Asiatic continent opposite Mitylênê), where he again halted for supper. Continuing his voyage onward during most part of the night, he was at Harmatûs (on the continent, directly northward and opposite to Methymna) by the next day's morning meal: then still hastening forward after a short halt, he doubled Cape Lektum, sailed along the Troad and past Tenedos, and reached the entrance of the Hellespont before midnight; where his ships were distributed at Sigeium, Rhœteium, and other neighbouring places¹.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 101. The latter portion of this voyage is sufficiently distinct; the earlier portion less so. I describe it in the text differently from all the best and most recent editors of Thucydides; from whom I dissent with the less reluctance, as they all here take the gravest liberty with his text, inserting the negative οὐ on pure conjecture, without the authority of a single MS. Niebuhr has laid it down as almost a canon of criticism that this is never to be done: yet here we have Krüger recommending it, and Haack, Gölter, Dr. Arnold, Poppo, and M. Didot, all adopting it as a part of the text of Thucydides; without even following the caution of Bekker in his small edition, who admonishes the reader by enclosing the word in brackets. Nay, Dr. Arnold goes so far as to say in note, "This correction is an certain and so necessary, that it only shows the inattention of the earlier editors that it was not made long since."

The words of Thucydides, without this correction and as they stood universally before Haack's edition (even in Bekker's edition of 1821).

By this well-laid course, and accelerated voyage, the Peloponnesian fleet completely eluded the lookers-

Ὁ δὲ Μινδαρος ἐν ταύτῃ καὶ αἱ ἐκ τῆς Χίου τῶν Πειλοποννησίων νῆες, ἐπισπασάμεναι ὅσον ἡμέρας, καὶ λαβόντες παρὰ τῶν Χίων τρεῖς τοσσαυκοτάς ἑκαστοὺς Χίους τῇ τρίτῃ διὰ ταχίας ἀπαίρουνται ἐκ τῆς Χίου πελάγιοι, ἵνα μὴ περιτύχῃσι τοῖς ἐν τῇ Ἐρέσῃ ναυσίν, ἀλλὰ ἐν ἀριστερᾷ τὴν Λέσβον ἔχοντες ἔπλουν ἐπὶ τὴν Ἥαντον. Καὶ προσβαλόντες τῆς Φωκαίδος ἐκ τὸν ἐν Καρτερίῳ λιμένα, καὶ ἀποτοπωσάμεναι, παραπλεύσαντες τὴν Κορινίαν διαικισποιοῦνται ἐν Ἀργεωσάσῃ τῆς Ἥαντου, ἐν τῇ ἀντιπείρῃ τῆς Μυτιλήνης, &c.

Haack and the other eminent critics just mentioned, all insist that these words as they stand are absurd and contradictory, and that it is indispensable to insert οὐ before πελάγιοι; so that the sentence stands in their editions ἀπαίρουνται ἐκ τῆς Χίου οὐ πελάγιοι. They all picture to themselves the fleet of Mindarus as sailing from the town of Chios northward, and going out at the northern strait. Admitting this, they say, plausibly enough, that the words of the old text involve a contradiction, because Mindarus would be going in the direction towards Eretria, and not away from it; though even then, the propriety of their correction would be disputable. But the word πελάγιοι, when applied to ships departing from Chios—though it may perhaps mean that they round the north-eastern corner of the island and then strike west round Lesbos—yet means also as naturally, and more naturally, to announce them as departing by the outer sea, or sailing on the sea-side (round the southern and western coast) of the island. Accept this meaning, and the old words construe perfectly well. Ἀπαίρουν ἐκ τῆς Χίου πελάγιοι is the natural and proper phrase for describing the circuit of Mindarus round the south and west coast of Chios. This, too, was the only way by which he could have escaped the scouts and the ships of Thrasyllus: for which same purpose of avoiding Athenian ships, we find (viii. 80) the squadron of Klearchus, on another occasion, making a long circuit out to sea. If it be supposed (which those who read οὐ πελάγιοι must suppose) that Mindarus sailed first up the northern strait between Chios and the mainland, and then turned his course east towards Phocæa, this would have been the course which Thrasyllus expected that he would take; and it is hardly possible to explain why he was not seen both by the Athenian scouts as well as by the Athenian garrison at their station of Delphium on Chios itself. Whereas by taking the circuitous route round the southern and western coast, he never came in sight either of one or the other; and he was enabled, when he got round to the latitude north of the island, to turn to the right and take a straight easterly course, with Lesbos on his left-hand, but at a sufficient distance from land to be out of sight of all out of Thrasyllus, and reached the opening of the Hellespont when that admiral was barely apprised sounds. Ἀνιγερθαι ἐκ τῆς Χίου πελάγους (Xen. Hellen. ii. 1. 17) means to strike into the open sea, quite clear of the coast of Asia: that passage does not decisively indicate whether the ships rounded the south-east or the north-east corner of the island.

We are here told that the seamen of Mindarus received from the Chians per head three Chian tessarakosta. Now this is a small Chian coin, nowhere else mentioned; and it is surprising to find so petty and local a denomination of money here specified by Thucydides, contrasted with the different manner in which Xenophon describes Chian payments to the Peloponnesian seamen (Hellen. i. 6, 12; ii. 1, 5). But the voyage of Mindarus round the south and west of the island explains the circumstance. He must have landed twice on the island during this circumnavigation (perhaps starting in the evening, for dinner and supper: and this Chian coin (which probably had no circulation out of the island) served each man to buy provisions at the Chian landing-places. It was not convenient to Mindarus to take aboard more provisions in kind, at the town of Chios; because he had already aboard a stock of provisions for two days—the subsequent portion of his voyage, along the coast of Asia to Sigæum, during which he could not afford time to halt and buy them; and where indeed the territory was not friendly.

It is enough if I can show that the old text of Thucydides will construe very well, without the violent intrusion of this conjectural οὐ. But I can show more: for this negative actually renders even the construction of the sentence awkward at least, if not inadmissible. Surely, ἀπαίρονται οὐ πελάγῳ, ἀλλὰ—ought to be followed by a correlative adjective or participle belonging to the same verb ἀπαίρονται: yet if we take ἔχουσι as such correlative participle, how are we to construe ἔαλει? In order to express the sense which Haack brings out, we ought surely to have different words, such as—οὐκ ἄρῃας ἐκ τῆς Χίου πελάγῳ, ἀλλ' ἐν ἀμείνῃ τῇ Λέσβῳ ἔχουσι ἔαλει ἐπὶ τῇ ἡπείρῳ. Even the change of tense from present to past, when we follow the construction of Haack, is awkward; while if we understand the words in the sense which I propose, the change of tense is perfectly admissible, since the two verbs do not both refer to the same movement or to the same portion of the voyage. "The fleet starts from Chios out by the sea-side of the island; but when it came to have Lesbos on the left-hand, it sailed straight to the continent."

I hope that I am not too late to make good my γραφὴν ξενίας, or protest against the unwarranted right of Thucydidean citizenship which the recent editors have conferred upon this word οὐ, in c. 101. The old text ought certainly to be restored; or if these editors maintain

Athenian Hellepontine squadron escapes from Sestos
in the night.

of its departure from Chios. When it arrived at Harmatûs, however, opposite to and almost within sight of the Athenian station at Methymna, its progress could no longer remain a secret. As it advanced still farther along the Troad, the momentous news circulated everywhere, and was promulgated through numerous fire-signals and beacons on the hill, by friend as well as by foe.

These signals were perfectly visible, and perfectly intelligible, to the two hostile squadrons now on guard on each side of the Hellespont: 18 Athenian triremes at Sestos in Europe—16 Peloponnesian triremes at Abydos in Asia. To the former, it was destruction to be caught by this powerful enemy in the narrow channel of the Hellespont. They quitted Sestos in the middle of the night, passing opposite to Abydos, and keeping a southerly course close along the shore of the Chersonese, in the direction towards Eleûs at the southern extremity of that peninsula, so as to have the chance of escape in the open sea and of joining Thrasyllus. But they would not have been allowed to pass even the hostile station at Abydos, had not the Peloponnesian guardships received the strictest orders from Mindarus, transmitted before he left Chios, or perhaps even before he left Milêtus, that if he should attempt the start, they were to keep a vigilant and special lookout for his coming, and reserve themselves to lend him such assistance as might be needed, in case he were attacked by Thrasyllus. When the signals their views, they ought at least to enclose the word in brackets. In the edition of Thucydides, published at Leipzig, 1845, by C. A. Koth, I observe that the text is still correctly printed, without the negative.

first announced the arrival of Mindarus, the Peloponnesian guard-ships at Abydos could not know in what position he was, nor whether the main Athenian fleet might not be near upon him. Accordingly they acted on these previous orders, holding themselves in reserve in their station at Abydos, until daylight should arrive, and they should be better informed. They thus neglected the Athenian Hellespontine squadron in its escape from Sestos to Elkeüs¹.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 102. Οἱ δὲ Ἀθηναῖοι ἐν τῇ Σηστῇ,.....ἀπὸ αὐτοῖν οἷ τε φημιστοὶ ἐσημνιστοὶ, καὶ βιάσαντο τὰ πρὸ ἐξαιφνης πολλὰ ἐν τῇ πολέμῳ φανέντῃ, ἰγνώσαντες ὅτι ἐσπλύνοντο οἱ Πελοποννησῖται. Καὶ τῆς αἰτῆς τυπύτης ἡκατέρω, ὡς εἶχον τάχους, ἐπομίζοντες τῇ Χερσονήσῳ, παμ-ἐπλεον ἐν Ἐλαιούτοις, βουλόμενοι ἐκπλέυσαι ἐκ τῆν εἰρηγορίας τὰς τῶν πολεμίων οὐκ. Καὶ τὰς μὲν ἐν Ἀβύδῳ ἐκαίδεκα ναυεῖς ἔλαβον, προειρημένης φυλακῆς τῇ φιλίῳ ἐπίπλῳ, ὅπως αὐτῶν ἀνακῶν ἔξουσιν, ἢ ἐκπλέωσι· τὰς δὲ μετὰ τοῦ Μινδάρου ἡμὲν ἐν καθύδατος, &c.

Here, again, we have a difficult text, which has much perplexed the commentators, and which I venture to translate (as it stands in my text) differently from all of them. The words—προειρημένης φυλακῆς τῇ φιλίῳ ἐπίπλῳ, ὅπως αὐτῶν ἀνακῶν ἔξουσιν, ἢ ἐκπλέωσι—are explained by the Scholiast to mean—"Although watch had been enjoined to them (i. e. to the Peloponnesian guard-squadron at Abydos) by the friendly approaching fleet (of Mindarus), that they should keep strict guard on the Athenians at Sestos, in case the latter should sail out."

Dr. Arnold, Gölter, Poppo, and M. Didot, all accept this construction, though all agree that it is most harsh and confused. The former says, "This again is most strangely intended to mean, προειρημένον αὐτοῖς ἐπὶ τῶν ἐπιπλέοντων φιλίῳ φυλάσσειν τοὺς πολεμίους."

To construe τῇ φιλίῳ ἐπίπλῳ as equivalent to ἐπὶ τῶν ἐπιπλέοντων φιλίῳ, is certainly such a harshness as we ought to be very glad to escape. And the construction of the Scholiast involves another liberty which I cannot but consider as objectionable. He supplies, in his paraphrase, the word καίτοι—although—from his own imagination. There is no indication of although, either express or implied, in the text of Thucydides; and it appears to me hazardous to assume into the meaning so decisive a particle without any authority. The genitive absolute, when annexed to the main predication affirmed in the verb, usually denotes something naturally connected with it in the descried by the fleet of Mindarus which had come the night before to the opposite stations of Sigium ordered to watch for the approaching voyage of their friends." The English preposition for expresses here exactly the sense of the Greek dative—that is, the object, purpose, or persons whose benefit is referred to.

Thrasylus and the Athenian fleet at the Hellespont.

The words immediately succeeding—ἵκοντο αὐτῶν (τῶν φίλων) ἀνακῶς ἔχουσι, ἢ ἐκπλέουσι—are an expansion of consequences intended to follow from—φύλακας τῷ φίλῳ ἐπέπλεον. "They shall watch for the approach of the main fleet, in order that they may devote special and paramount regard to its safety, in case it makes a start." For the phrase ἀνακῶς ἔχειν, compare Herodot. i. 24; viii. 109. Plutarch, Thucyd. c. 33: ἀνακῶς, φύλακῶς, προσηγουσῶς, ἐπιμελῶς—the notes of Arnold and Götter here; and Kühner, Gr. Gr. sect. 533. ἀνακῶς ἔχειν τινος for ἐπιμελίσθαι. The words ἀνακῶς ἔχουσι express the anxious and special vigilance which the Peloponnesian squadron at Abydos was directed to keep for the arrival of Mindarus and his fleet, which was a matter of doubt and danger; but they would not be properly applicable to the duty of that squadron as respects the opposite Athenian squadron at Sestos, which was hardly of superior force to themselves, and was besides an avowed enemy, in sight of their own port.

Lastly, the words ἢ ἐκπλέουσι refer to Mindarus and his fleet about to start from Chios, as their subject—not to the Athenians at Sestos.

The whole sentence would stand thus, if we dismiss the peculiarities of Thucydides and express the meaning in common Greek—καὶ τὰς μὲν ἐν Ἀβύδῳ ἐκαυδῶσι τοῖς (Ἀθηναίοις) πλοῖσιν προέργησεν γὰρ (ἐκείνοις τοῖς ναῦταις) φύλασσειν τῶν ἐπὶ πλοῖν τῶν φίλων, ὅπως αὐτῶν (τῶν φίλων) ἀνακῶς ἔχουσι, ἢ ἐκπλέουσι. The verb φύλασσειν here (and of course the abstract substantive φύλαξι which represents it) signifies to watch for or wait for: like Thucyd. ii. 3. φύλασσοντες ἐπὶ νύκτι, καὶ αὐτὰ τὰ περιέρχοντες; also viii. 41. ἐφύλασσον.

If we construe the words in this way, they will appear in perfect harmony with the general scheme and purpose of Mindarus. That admiral is bent upon carrying his fleet to the Hellespont, but to avoid an action with Thrasylus in doing so. This is difficult to accomplish, and can only be done by great secrecy of proceeding, as well as by an unusual route. He sends orders beforehand from Chios (perhaps even from Miletus, before he quitted that place) to the Peloponnesian squadron guarding the Hellespont at Abydos. He contemplates the possible case that Thrasylus may detect his plan, intercept him on the passage, and perhaps block him up or compel him to fight in some roadstead or bay on the coast opposite Lesbos, or on the Troad (which would indeed have come to pass, had he been seen by a single hostile fishing-boat in rounding the island of Chios). Now the orders sent and Rhœteium. The latter immediately gave chase: but the Athenians, now in the wide sea, contrived to escape most of them to Imbros—not without the loss however of four triremes, one even captured with all the crew on board, near the temple of Protesilaus at Elæus: the crews of the other three escaped ashore. Mindarus was now joined by the squadron from Abydos, and their united force (86 triremes strong) was employed for one day in trying to storm Elæus. Failing in this enterprise, the fleet retired to Abydos. Before all could arrive there, Thrasyllus with his fleet arrived in haste from Eresus, much disappointed that his scouts had been forward, direct the Peloponnesian squadron at Abydos what they are to do in this contingency; since without such orders, the captain of the squadron would not have known what to do, assuming Mindarus to be intercepted by Thrasyllus—whether to remain on guard at the Hellespont, which was his special duty; or to leave the Hellespont unguarded, keep his attention concentrated on Mindarus, and come forth to help him. “Let your first thought be to ensure the safe arrival of the main fleet at the Hellespont; and to come out and render help to it, if it be attacked in its route; even though it be necessary for that purpose to leave the Hellespont for a time unguarded.” Mindarus could not tell beforehand the exact moment when he would start from Chios—nor was it indeed absolutely certain that he would start at all, if the enemy were watching him; his orders were therefore sent, conditional upon his being able to get off (ἡ ἐκπαίδεσις). But he was lucky enough, by the well-laid plan of his voyage, to get to the Hellespont without encountering an enemy. The Peloponnesian squadron at Abydos, however, having received his special orders—when the fire-signals acquainted them that he was approaching, thought only of keeping themselves in reserve to lend him assistance if he needed it, and neglected the Athenians opposite. As it was night, probably the best thing which they could do, was to wait in Abydos for daylight, until they could learn particulars of his position, and how or where they could render aid.

We thus see both the general purpose of Mindarus, and in what manner the orders which he had transmitted to the Peloponnesian squadron at Abydos, brought about indirectly the escape of the Athenian squadron without interruption from Sextus.

cluded and all his calculations baffled. Two Peloponnesian triremes, which had been more adventurous than the rest in pursuing the Athenians, fell into his hands. He awaited at Elæus the return of the fugitive Athenian squadron from Imbros, and then began to prepare his triremes, 76 in number, for a general action.

After five days of such preparation, his fleet was brought to battle, sailing northward towards Sestus up the Hellespont, by single ships ahead, along the coast of the Chersonese, or on the European side. The left or most advanced squadron under Thrasyllus, stretched even beyond the headland called Kynossema, or the Dog's Tomb, ennobled by the legend and the chapel of the Trojan queen Hecuba : it was thus nearly opposite Abydos, while the right squadron under Thrasybulus was not very far from the southern mouth of the strait, nearly opposite Dardanus. Mindarus on his side brought into action eighty-six triremes (ten more than Thrasyllus in total number), extending from Abydos to Dardanus on the Asiatic shore ; the Syracusans under Hermokratês being on the right, opposed to Thrasyllus, while Mindarus with the Peloponnesian ships was on the left opposed to Thrasybulus. The epibatæ or maritime hoplites on board the ships of Mindarus are said to have been superior to the Athenians, but the latter had the advantage in skilful pilots and nautical manœuvring : nevertheless the description of the battle tells us how much Athenian manœuvring had fallen off since the glories of Phormion at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war ; nor would that eminent seaman have selected for

Battle of Kynossema —victory
of the Athenian
fleet.

the scene of a naval battle the narrow waters of the Hellespont. Mindarus took the aggressive, advancing to attack near the European shore, and trying to outflank his opponents on both sides, as well as to drive them up against the land. Thrasyllus on one wing, and Thrasybulus on the other, by rapid movements, extended themselves so as to frustrate this attempt to outflank them; but in so doing, they stripped and weakened the centre, which was even deprived of the sight of the left wing by means of the projecting headland of Kynossema. Thus unsupported, the centre was vigorously attacked and roughly handled by the middle division of Mindarus. Its ships were driven up against the land, and the assailants even disembarked to push their victory against the men ashore. But this partial success threw the central Peloponnesian division itself into disorder, while Thrasybulus and Thrasyllus carried on a conflict at first equal, and presently victorious, against the ships on the right and left of the enemy. Having driven back both these two divisions, they easily chased away the disordered ships of the centre, so that the whole Peloponnesian fleet was put to flight, and found shelter first in the river Meidius, next in Abydos. The narrow breadth of the Hellespont forbade either long pursuit or numerous captures. Nevertheless eight Chian ships, five Corinthians, two Ambrakian and as many Boeotian, and from Sparta, Syracuse, Pellene, and Leukas, one each—fell into the hands of the Athenian admirals; who however on their own side lost fifteen ships. They erected a trophy on the headland of Kynossema, near the tomb or chapel of Hecuba; not omitting the usual duties of burying their own dead, and giving up those of the enemy under the customary request for truce¹.

A victory so incomplete and indecisive would have been little valued by the Athenians, in the times preceding the Sicilian expedition. But since that overwhelming disaster, followed by so many other misfortunes, and last of all, by the defeat of Thymocharis with the revolt of Eubœa—their spirit had been so sadly lowered, that the trireme which brought the news of the battle of Kynossema, seemingly towards the end of August 411 B.C., was welcomed with the utmost delight and triumph. They began to feel as if the ebb-tide had reached its lowest point, and had begun to turn in their favour, holding out some hopes of ultimate success in the war. Another piece of good fortune soon happened to strengthen this belief. Mindarus was compelled to reinforce himself at the Hellespont by sending Hippokratès and Epiklès to bring the fleet of fifty triremes now acting at Eubœa². This was in itself an important relief to Athens, by withdrawing an annoying enemy near home. But it was still farther enhanced by the subsequent misfortunes of the

Rejoicing
at Athens
for the victory.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 105, 106; Diodor. xiii. 39, 40.

The general account which Diodorus gives of this battle, is, even in its most essential features, not reconcileable with Thucydides. It is vain to try to blend them. I have been able to borrow from Diodorus hardly anything except his statement of the superiority of the Athenian pilots, and the Peloponnesian epibata. He states that twenty-five fresh ships arrived to join the Athenians in the middle of the battle, and determined the victory in their favour: this circumstance is evidently borrowed from the subsequent conflict a few months afterwards.

We owe to him, however, the mention of the chapel or tomb of Hecuba on the headland of Kynossema.

² Thucyd. viii. 107; Diodor. xiii. 41.

fleet, which in passing round the headland of Mount Athos to get to Asia, was overtaken by a terrific storm and nearly destroyed, with great loss of life among the crews; so that a remnant only under Hippokratēs survived to join Mindarus¹.

Bridge across the Euripus, joining Eubœa with Bœotia.

But though Athens was thus exempted from all fear of aggression on the side of Eubœa, the consequences of this departure of the fleet were such as to demonstrate how irreparably the island itself had passed out of her supremacy. The inhabitants of Chalkis and the other cities, now left without foreign defence against her, employed themselves jointly with the Bœotians, whose interest in the case was even stronger than their own, in divesting Eubœa of its insular character, by constructing a mole or bridge across the Euripus, the narrowest portion of the Eubœan strait, where Chalkis was divided from Bœotia. From each coast a mole was thrown out, each mole guarded at the extremity by a tower, and leaving only an intermediate opening, broad enough for a single vessel to pass through, covered by a wooden bridge. It was in vain that the Athenian Theramenes, with thirty triremes, presented himself to obstruct the progress of the undertaking. The Eubœans and Bœotians both prosecuted it in such numbers, and with so much zeal, that it was speedily brought to completion. Eubœa, so lately the most important island attached to Athens, is from henceforward a portion of the mainland, altogether independent of her, even though it should please fortune to re-establish her maritime power¹.

¹ Diodor. xiii. 41. It is probable that this fleet was in great part Bœotian; and twelve seamen who escaped from the wreck commemorated their rescue by an inscription in the temple of Athina at Korôneia; which Inscription was read and copied by Ephorus. By an exaggerated and over-literal confidence in the words of it, Diodorus is led to affirm that these twelve men were the only persons saved, and that every other person perished. But we know perfectly that Hippokratēs himself survived, and that he was alive at the subsequent battle of Kyzikus (Xenoph. Hellen. i. 1, 23).

Respecting the danger of sailing round the promontory of Athos, the reader is referred to a former chapter of this work, wherein the ship-canal, cut across the Isthmus by order of Xerxes, is described; together with an instructive citation from Colonel Leake's Travels. See vol. v. ch. xxviii. of this History.

The battle of Kynossêma produced no very important consequences, except that of encouragement to the Athenians. Even just after the action, Kyzikus revolted from them, and on the fourth day after it, the Athenian fleet, hastily refitted at Sestos, sailed to that place to retake it. It was unfortified, so that they succeeded with little difficulty, and imposed upon it a contribution: moreover in the voyage thither, they gained an additional advantage by capturing, off the southern coast of the Propontis, those eight Peloponnesian triremes which had

Revolt of Kyzikus.

¹ Diodor. xiii. 47. He places this event a year later, but I agree with Sievers in conceiving it as following with little delay on the withdrawal of the protecting fleet (Sievers, Comment. in Xenoph. Hellen. p. 9; not. p. 66).

See Colonel Leake's Travels in Northern Greece, for a description of the Euripus, and the adjoining ground, with a plan, vol. ii. ch. xiv. p. 259-265.

I cannot make out from Colonel Leake what is the exact breadth of the channel. Strabo talks in his time of a bridge reaching 200 feet (x. p. 490). But there must have been material alterations made by the inhabitants of Chalkis during the time of Alexander the Great (Strabo, x. p. 447). The bridge here described by Diodorus, covering an open space broad enough for one ship, could scarcely have been more than 20 feet broad; for it was not at all designed to render the passage easy. The ancient ships could all lower their masts. I cannot but think that Colonel Leake (p. 259) must have read in Diodorus xiii. 47—οὐδ in place of δ.

accomplished, a little while before, the revolt of Byzantium. But on the other hand, as soon as the Athenian fleet had left Sestos, Mindarus sailed from his station at Abydos to Elaëus, and recovered all the triremes captured from him at Kynossëma, which the Athenians had there deposited; except some of them which were so much damaged that the inhabitants of Elaëus set them on fire¹.

Zeal of Pharnabazus against Athens—importance of Persian
money.

But that which now began to constitute a far more important element of the war, was, the difference of character between Tissaphernès and Pharnabazus, and the transfer of the Peloponnesian fleet from the satrapy of the former to that of the latter. Tissaphernès, while furnishing neither aid nor pay to the Peloponnesians, had by his treacherous promises and bribes enervated all their proceedings for the last year, with the deliberate view of wasting both the belligerent parties. Pharnabazus was a brave and earnest man, who set himself to strengthen them strenuously, by men as well as by money, and who laboured hard to put down the Athenian power; as we shall find him labouring equally hard, eighteen years afterwards, to bring about its partial renovation. From this time forward, Persian aid becomes a reality in the Grecian war; and in the main—first through the hands of Pharnabazus, next through those of the younger Cyrus—the determining reality. For we shall find that while the Peloponnesians are for the most part well-paid, out of the Persian treasury—the Athenians, destitute of any such resource, are compelled to rely on the contributions which they can levy here and there, without established or accepted right; and to interrupt for this purpose even the most promising career of success. Twenty-six years after this, at a time when Sparta had lost her Persian allies, the Lacedæmonian Teleutias tried to appease the mutiny of his unpaid seamen, by telling them how much nobler it was to extort pay from the enemy by means of their own swords, than to obtain it by truckling to the foreigner¹; and probably the Athenian generals, during these previous years of struggle, tried similar appeals to the generosity of their soldiers. But it is not the less certain, that the new constant paymaster now introduced gave fearful odds to the Spartan cause.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 107.

The good pay and hearty co-operation which the Peloponnesians now enjoyed from Pharnabazus, only made them the more indignant at the previous deceit of Tissaphernès. Under the influence of this sentiment, they readily lent aid to the inhabitants of Antandrus in expelling his general Arsakes with the Persian garrison. Arsakes had recently committed an act of murderous perfidy, under the influence of some unexplained pique, against the Delians established at Adramyttium: he had summoned their principal citizens to take part as allies in an expedition, and had caused them all to be surrounded, shot down, and massacred during the morning meal. Such an act was more than sufficient to excite hatred and alarm among the neighbouring Antandrians, who invited a body of Peloponnesian hoplites from Abydos, across the mountain range of Ida; by whose aid Antandrus was liberated from the Persians¹.

Tissaphernès again courts the Peloponnesians.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. v. 1, 17. Compare a like exclamation, under nobler circumstances, from the Spartan Kallikratidas, Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 7; Plutarch, Lysander, c. 6.

In Milétus as well as in Knidus, Tissaphernés had already experienced the like humiliation²: Lichas was no longer alive to back his pretensions: nor do we hear that he obtained any result from the complaints of his envoy Gaulites at Sparta. Under these circumstances he began to fear that he had incurred a weight of enmity which might prove seriously mischievous, nor was he without jealousy of the popularity and possible success of Pharnabazus. The delusion respecting the Phenician fleet, now that Mindarus had openly broken with him and quitted Milétus, was no longer available to any useful purpose. Accordingly he dismissed the Phenician fleet to their own homes, pretending to have received tidings that the Phenician towns were endangered by sudden attacks from Arabia and Egypt³; while he himself quitted Aspendus to revisit Ionia, as well as to go forward to the Hellespont for the purpose of renewing personal intercourse with the dissatisfied Peloponnesians. He wished, while trying again to excuse his own treachery about the Phenician fleet, at the same time to protest against their recent proceedings at Antandrus; or, at the least, to obtain some guarantee against repetition of such hostility. His visit to Ionia, however, seems to have occupied some time, and he tried to conciliate the Ionic Greeks by a splendid sacrifice to Artemis at Ephesus¹. Having quitted Aspendus (as far as we can make

¹ Thucyd. viii. 108; Diodor. xiii. 42.

² Thucyd. viii. 109.

³ Diodor. xiii. 46. This is the statement of Diodorus, and seems probable enough; though he makes a strange confusion in the Persian affairs of this year, leaving out the name of Tissaphernés, and jumbling the acts of Tissaphernés with the name of Pharnabazus.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 109. It is at this point that we have to part company with the historian Thucydides, whose work not only closes without reaching any definite epoch or limit, but even breaks off (as we possess it) in the middle of a sentence.

The full extent of this irreparable loss can hardly be conceived, except by those who have been called upon to study his work with the profound and minute attention required from an historian of Greece. To pass from Thucydides to the Hellenica of Xenophon, is a descent truly mournful: and yet, when we look at Grecian history as a whole, we have great reason to rejoice that even so inferior a work as the latter has reached us. The historical purposes and conceptions of Thucydides, as set forth by himself in his preface, are exalted and philosophical to a degree altogether wonderful, when we consider that he had no pre-existing models before him from which to derive them: nor are the eight books of his work (in spite of the unfinished condition of the last) unworthy of these large promises, either in spirit or in execution. Even the peculiarity, the condensation, and the harshness, of his style, though it sometimes hides from us his full meaning, has the general effect of lending great additional force and of impressing his thoughts much more deeply upon every attentive reader.

During the course of my two last volumes, I have had frequent occasion to notice the criticisms of Dr. Arnold in his edition of Thucydides; most generally on points where I dissented from him. I have done this, partly because I believe that Dr. Arnold's edition is in most frequent use among all English readers of Thucydides—partly because of the high esteem which I entertain for the liberal spirit, the erudition, and the judgment, which pervade his criticisms generally throughout the book. Dr. Arnold deserves, especially, the high commendation, not often to be bestowed even upon learned and exact commentators, of conceiving and appreciating antiquity as a living whole, and not merely as an aggregate of words and abstractions. His criticisms are continually adopted by Götter in the second edition of his Thucydides, and to a great degree also by Poppe. Desiring, as I do sincerely, that his edition may long maintain its pre-eminence among English students of Thucydides, I have thought it my duty at the same time to indicate many of the points on which his remarks either advance or imply views of Grecian history different from my own.

out) about the beginning of August (411 B.C.), he did not reach the Hellespont until the month of November¹.

As soon as the Phœnician fleet had disappeared, Alkibiadēs returned with his thirteen triremes from Phasēlis to Samos. He too, like Tissaphernēs, made the proceeding subservient to deceit of his own. He took credit with his countrymen for having enlisted the goodwill of the satrap more strongly than ever in the cause of Athens, and for having induced him to abandon his intention of bringing up the Phœnician fleet². At this time Dorieus was at Rhodes with thirteen triremes, having been despatched by Mindarus (before his departure from Milētus) in order to stifle the growth of a philo-Athenian party in the island. Perhaps the presence of this force may have threatened the Athenian interest in Kos and Halikarnassus; for we now find Alkibiadēs going to these places from Samos, with nine fresh triremes in addition to his own thirteen. Having erected fortifications at the town of Kos, he planted in it an Athenian officer and garrison: from Halikarnassus he levied large contributions; upon what pretence, or whether from simple want of money, we do not know. It was towards the middle of September that he returned to Samos³.

At the Hellespont, Mindarus had been reinforced

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 1, 2.

² Thucyd. viii. 108. Diodorus (xiii. 38) talks of this influence of Alkibiadēs over the satrap as if it were real. Plutarch (Alkibiad. c. 26) speaks in more qualified language.

³ Thucyd. viii. 108. πρὸς τὸ μεσοσταθίον. Haack and Sievers (see Sievers, Comment. ad Xenoph. Hellen. p. 105) construe this as indicating the middle of August, which I think too early in the year.

after the battle of Kynossema by the squadron from Eubœa; at least by that portion of it which had escaped the storm off Mount Athos. The departure of the Peloponnesian fleet from Eubœa enabled the Athenians also to send a few more ships to their fleet at Sestos. Thus ranged on the opposite sides of the strait, the two fleets came to a second action, wherein the Peloponnesians, under Agesandridas, had the advantage; yet with little fruit. It was about the month of October, seemingly, that Dorieus with his fourteen triremes came from Rhodes to rejoin Mindarus at the Hellespont. He had hoped probably to get up the strait to Abydos during the night, but he was caught by daylight a little way from the entrance, near Rhœteium; and the Athenian scouts instantly gave signal of his approach. Twenty Athenian triremes were despatched to attack him: upon which Dorieus fled, and sought safety by hauling his vessels ashore in the receding bay near Dardanus. The Athenian squadron here attacked him, but were repulsed and forced to sail back to Madytus. Mindarus was himself a spectator of this scene, from a distance; being engaged in sacrificing to Athênê on the venerated hill of Ilium. He immediately hastened to Abydos, where he fitted out his whole fleet of 84 triremes; Pharnabazus co-operating on the shore with his land-force. Having rescued the ships of Dorieus, his next care was, to resist the entire Athenian fleet, which presently came to attack him under Thrasybulus and Thrasyllus. An obstinate naval combat took place between the two fleets, which lasted combats at the Helles-

Further
pont.

a.c. 411.

nearly the whole day with doubtful issue: at length, towards the evening, 20 fresh triremes were seen approaching. They proved to be the squadron of Alkibiadēs sailing from Samos: having probably heard of the re-union of the squadron of Dorieus with the main Peloponnesian fleet, he had come with his own counterbalancing reinforcement¹. As soon as his purple flag or signal was ascertained, the Athenian fleet became animated with redoubled spirit. The new-comers aided them in pressing the action so vigorously, that the Peloponnesian fleet was driven back to Abydos, and there run ashore. Here the Athenians still followed up their success, and endeavoured to tow them all off. But the Persian land-force protected them, and Pharnabazus himself was seen foremost in the combat; even pushing into the water in person, as far as his horse could stand. The main Peloponnesian fleet was thus preserved: yet the Athenians retired with an important victory, carrying off thirty triremes as prizes, and retaking those which they had themselves lost in the two preceding actions².

Mindarus kept his defeated fleet unemployed at Abydos during the winter, sending to Peloponnesus as well as among his allies to solicit reinforcements: in the mean time, he engaged jointly with Pharnabazus in operations by land against various Athenian allies on the continent. The Athenian admiral n.c. 411-410.

Theramenes sent out with reinforcements from Athens.

¹ Diodorus (xiii. 46) and Plutarch (Alkib. c. 27) speak of his coming to the Hellespont by accident—συνὰ τύχην—which is certainly very improbable.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 1, 6, 7.

erals, on their side, instead of keeping their fleet united to prosecute the victory, were compelled to disperse a large portion of it in flying squadrons for collecting money, retaining only forty sail at Sestos; while Thrasyllus in person went to Athens to proclaim the victory and ask for reinforcements. Pursuant to this request, thirty triremes were sent out under Theramenes; who first endeavoured without success to impede the construction of the bridge between Eubœa and Bœotia, and next sailed on a voyage among the islands for the purpose of collecting money. He acquired considerable plunder by descents upon hostile territory, and also extorted money from various parties, either contemplating or supposed to contemplate revolt, among the dependencies of Athens. At Paros, where the oligarchy established by Peisander in the conspiracy of the Four Hundred still subsisted, Theramenes deposed and fined the men who had exercised it—establishing a democracy in their room. From hence he passed to Macedonia, to the assistance and probably into the temporary pay, of Archelaus king of Macedonia, whom he aided for some time in the siege of Pydna; blocking up the town by sea while the Macedonians besieged it by land. The blockade having lasted the whole winter, Theramenes was summoned away, before its capture, to join the main Athenian fleet in Thrace: Archelaus however took Pydna not long afterwards, and transported the town with its residents from the sea-board to a distance more than two miles inland¹. We trace in all these proceedings the evidence of that terrible want of money which now drove the Athenians to injustice, extortion, and interference with their allies, such as they had never committed during the earlier years of the war.

¹ Diodor. xiii. 47-49.

Renewed troubles at Korkyra.

It is at this period that we find mention made of a fresh intestine commotion in Korkyra, less stained however with savage enormities than that recounted in the seventh year of the war. It appears that the oligarchical party in the island, which had been for the moment nearly destroyed at that period, had since gained strength, and was encouraged by the misfortunes of Athens to lay plans for putting the island into the hands of the Lacedæmonians. The democratical leaders, apprised of this conspiracy, sent to Naupaktus for the Athenian admiral Konon. He came with a detachment of 600 Messenians, by the aid of whom they seized the oligarchical conspirators in the market-place, putting a few to death, and banishing more than a thousand. The extent of their alarm is attested by the fact, that they liberated the slaves and conferred the right of citizenship upon the foreigners. The exiles, having retired to the opposite continent, came back shortly afterwards, and were admitted, by the connivance of a party within, into the market-place. A serious combat took place within the walls, which was at last made up by a compromise and by the restoration of the exiles¹. We know nothing about the particulars of this compromise, but it seems to have been wisely drawn up and faithfully observed; for we hear nothing about Korkyra until about thirty-five years after this period, and the island is then presented to us as in the highest perfection of cultivation and prosperity¹. Doubtless the emancipation of slaves, and the admission of so many new foreigners to the citizenship, contributed to this result.

¹ Diodor. xiii. 48. Sievers (Commentat. ad Xenoph. Hellen. p. 12, and p. 65, not. 58) controverts the reality of these tumults in Korkyra, here mentioned by Diodorus, but not mentioned in the Hellenika of

Meanwhile Tissaphernés, having completed his measures in Ionia, arrived at the Hellespont not long after the battle of Abydos—seemingly about November 411 B.C. He was anxious to retain some credit with the Peloponnesians, for which an opportunity soon presented itself. Alkibiadés, then in command of the Athenian fleet at Sestos, came to visit him in all the pride of victory, bringing the customary presents; but the satrap seized his person and sent him away to Sardis as a prisoner in custody, affirming that he had the Great King's express orders for carrying on war with the Athenians². Here was an end of all the delusions of Alkibiadés, respecting pretended power of influencing the Persian counsels. Yet these delusions had already served his purpose by procuring for him a renewed position in the Athenian camp, which his Alkibiadés is seized by Tissaphernés and confined at Sardis.

Xenophon, and contradicted, as he thinks, by the negative inference derivable from Thucyd. iv. 48—ὅρα γὰρ κατὰ τὸς πύλας τοῦδε. But it appears to me that P. W. Ulrich (Beiträge zur Erklärung des Thukydides, p. 95-99) has properly explained this phrase of Thucydides, as meaning, in the place here cited, the first ten years of the Peloponnesian war, between the surprise of Plataea and the peace of Nicias.

I see no reason to call in question the truth of these disturbances in Korkyra here alluded to by Diodorus.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. vi. 2, 25.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 1, 9; Plutarch, Alkibiadés, c. 27.

own military energy enabled him to sustain and justify.

B.C. 410.

Escape of Alkibiadēs
—concentration of the Athenian fleet—Mindarus
besieges
Kyzikus.

Towards the middle of this winter the superiority of the fleet of Mindarus at Abydos, over the Athenian fleet at Sestos, had become so great (partly, as it would appear, through reinforcements obtained by the former—partly through the dispersion of the latter into flying squadrons from want of pay) that the Athenians no longer dared to maintain their position in the Hellespont. They sailed round the southern point of the Chersonese, and took station at Kardia on the western side of the isthmus of that peninsula. Here, about the commencement of spring, they were rejoined by Alkibiadēs; who had found means to escape from Sardis, (along with Mantiheus, another Athenian prisoner,) first to Klazomenæ, and next to Lesbos, where he collected a small squadron of five triremes. The dispersed squadrons of the Athenian fleet being now all summoned to concentrate, Theramenes came to Kardia from Macedonia, and Thrasybulus from Thasos; whereby the Athenian fleet was rendered superior in number to that of Mindarus. News was brought that the latter had moved with his fleet from the Hellespont to Kyzikus, and was now engaged in the siege of that place, jointly with Pharnabazus and the Persian land-force.

His vigorous attacks had in fact already carried the place, when the Athenian admirals resolved to attack him there, and contrived to do it by surprise. Having passed first from Kardia to Elæus at the south of the Chersonese, they sailed up the Hellespont to Prokonnesus by night, so that their passage escaped the notice of the Peloponnesian guardships at Abydos¹.

Resting at Prokonnesus one night, and seizing every boat on the island in order that their movements might be kept secret, Alkibiadês warned the assembled seamen that they must prepare for a sea-fight, a land-fight, and a wall-fight, all at once. "We have no money (said he), while our enemies have plenty from the Great King." Neither zeal in the men, nor contrivance in the commanders, was wanting. A body of hoplites were landed on the mainland in the territory of Kyzikus, for the purpose of operating a diversion; after which the fleet was distributed into three divisions under Alkibiadês, Theramenês, and Thrasybulus. The former, advancing near to Kyzikus with his single division, challenged the fleet of Mindarus, and contrived to inveigle him by pretended flight to a distance from the harbour; while the other Athenian divisions, assisted by hazy and rainy weather, came up unexpectedly, cut off his retreat, and forced him to run his ships ashore on the neighbouring mainland. After a gallant and hard-fought battle, partly on ship-board, partly ashore—at one time unpromising to the Athenians, in spite of their superiority of number, but not very intelligible in its details, and differently conceived by our two authorities—both the Peloponnesian fleet by sea and the forces of Pharnabazus on land were completely defeated. Mindarus himself was slain; and the entire fleet, every

Battle of Kyzikus—victory of the Athenians—Mindarus is slain, and the whole Peloponnesian fleet taken.

¹ Diodor. xiii. 49. Diodorus specially notices this fact, which must obviously be correct. Without it, the surprise of Mindarus could not have been accomplished.

single trireme, was captured, except the triremes of Syracuse, which were burnt by their own crews; while Kyzikus itself surrendered to the Athenians, and submitted to a large contribution, being spared from all other harm. The booty taken by the victors was abundant and valuable. The number of the triremes thus captured or destroyed is differently given; the lowest estimate states it at 60, the highest at 80¹.

B.C. 410.

Discouragement of the Spartans—proposition to Athens for peace.

This capital action, ably planned and bravely executed by Alkibiadés and his two colleagues (about April 410 B.C.), changed sensibly the relative position of the belligerents. The Peloponnesians had now no fleet of importance in Asia, though they probably still retained a small squadron at the station of Milétus; while the Athenian fleet was more powerful and menacing than ever. The dismay of the defeated army is forcibly portrayed in the laconic despatch sent by Hippokratés (secretary of the late admiral Mindarus) to the Ephors at Sparta:—"All honour and advantage are gone from us; Mindarus is slain; the men are starving: we are in straits what to do²." The Ephors doubtless heard the same deplorable tale from more than one witness; for this particular despatch never reached them, having been intercepted and carried to Athens. So discouraging was the view which they enter-

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 1, 14-20; Diodor. xiii. 50, 51.

The numerous discrepancies between Diodorus and Xenophon, in the events of these few years, are collected by Sievers, Commentat. in Xenoph. Hellen. not. 62. pp. 65, 66 seq.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 1, 23. "Ἐβρίει τὰ καλὰ Μίνδαρος ἀπεσπείλει· σπείνεται τὸ δόρυ· ἀπορρέουσι τὶ χυρὴ ὄρεα.

Plutarch, Alkib. c. 28.

tained of the future, that a Lacedæmonian embassy with Endius at their head, came to Athens to propose peace; or rather perhaps Endius (ancient friend and guest of Alkibiadēs, who had already been at Athens as envoy before) was allowed to come thither now again to sound the temper of the city, in a sort of informal manner which admitted of being easily disavowed if nothing came of it. For it is remarkable that Xenophon makes no mention of this embassy: and his silence, though not sufficient to warrant us in questioning the reality of the event—which is stated by Diodorus, perhaps on the authority of Theopompus, and is noway improbable in itself—nevertheless leads me to doubt whether the Ephors themselves admitted that they had made or sanctioned the proposition. It is to be remembered, that Sparta, not to mention her obligation to her confederates generally, was at this moment bound by special convention to Persia to conclude no separate peace with Athens.

According to Diodorus, Endius, having been admitted to speak in the Athenian assembly, invited the Athenians to make peace with Sparta on the following terms:—That each party should stand just as they were: That the garrisons on both sides should be withdrawn: That prisoners should be exchanged, one Lacedæmonian against one Athenian. Endius insisted in his speech on the mutual mischief which each was doing to the other by prolonging the war: but he contended that Athens was by far the greater sufferer of the two, and had the deepest interest in accelerating peace. She had no money, while Sparta had the Great King as a paymaster: she was robbed of the produce of Attica by the garrison of Dekeleia, while Peloponnesus was undisturbed: all her power and influence depended upon superiority at sea, which Sparta could dispense with, and yet retain her pre-eminence¹.

The Lacedæmonian Endius at Athens—his propositions for peace.

If we may believe Diodorus, all the most intelligent citizens in Athens recommended that this proposition should be accepted. Only the demagogues, the disturbers, those who were accustomed to blow up the flames of war in order to obtain profit for themselves, opposed it. Especially the demagogue Kleophon, now enjoying great influence, enlarged upon the splendour of the recent victory, and upon the new chances of success now opening to them: inasmuch that the assembly ultimately rejected the proposition of Endius².

It was easy for those, who wrote after the battle of Ægosspotamos and the capture of Athens, to be wise after the fact, and to repeat the stock denunciations against an insane people misled by a corrupt demagogue. But if, abstracting from our knowledge of the final close of the war, we look to the tenor of this proposition (even assuming it to have been formal and authorised) as well as the time at which it was made—we shall hesitate before we pronounce Kleophon to have been foolish, much less corrupt, for recommending its rejection. In reference to the charge of corrupt interest in the continuance of war, I have already made some remarks about Kleon, tending to show that no such

¹ Diodor. xiii. 52.

² Diodor. xiii. 53.

Refused by Athens—opposition of Kleophon.

Grounds of the opposition of Kleophon.

interest can fairly be ascribed to demagogues of that character¹. They were essentially unwarlike men, and had quite as much chance personally of losing, as of gaining, by a state of war. Especially this is true respecting Kleophon during the last years of the war—since the financial posture of Athens was then so unprosperous, that all her available means were exhausted to provide for ships and men, leaving little or no surplus for political speculators. The admirals, who paid the seamen by raising contributions abroad, might possibly enrich themselves, if so inclined; but the politicians at home had much less chance of such gains than they would have had in time of peace. Besides, even if Kleophon were ever so much a gainer by the continuance of war, yet assuming Athens to be ultimately crushed in the war, he was certain beforehand to be deprived, not only of all his gains and his position, but of his life also.

So much for the charge against him of corrupt interest. The question whether his advice was judicious, is not so easy to dispose of. Looking to the time when the proposition was made, we must recollect that the Peloponnesian fleet in Asia had been just annihilated, and that the brief epistle itself, from Hippokratês to the Ephors, divulging in so emphatic a manner the distress of his troops, was at this moment before the Athenian assembly. On the other hand, the despatches of the Athenian generals, announcing their victory, had excited a sentiment of universal triumph, manifested by public thanksgiving, at Athens²: nor can we doubt that Alkibiadēs and his colleagues promised a large career of coming success, perhaps the recovery of most part of the lost maritime empire. In this temper of the Athenian people and of their generals, justified as it was to a great degree by the reality, what is the proposition which comes from Endius? What he proposes, is, in reality, no concession at all. Both parties to stand in their actual position—to withdraw garrisons—to restore prisoners. There was only one way in which Athens would have been a gainer by accepting these propositions. She would have withdrawn her garrison from Pylus—she would have been relieved from the garrison of Dekeleia: such an exchange would have been a considerable advantage to her. To this we must add the relief arising from simple cessation of war—doubtless real and important.

Question of policy as it then stood, between war and peace.

¹ See the preceding vol. vi. ch. liv. p. 626.

² Diodor. xiii. 52.

Now the question is, whether a statesman like Periklēs would have advised his countrymen to be satisfied with such a measure of concession, immediately after the great victory at Kyzikus, and the two smaller victories preceding it? I incline to believe that he would not. It would rather have appeared to him in the light of a diplomatic artifice calculated to paralyse Athens during the interval while her enemies were defenceless, and to gain time for them to build a new fleet¹. Sparta could not pledge herself either for Persia, or for her Peloponnesian confederates: indeed past experience had shown that she could not do so with effect. By accepting the propositions, therefore, Athens would not really have obtained relief from the entire burthen of war; but would merely have blunted the ardour and tied up the hands of her own troops, at a moment when they felt themselves in the full current of success. By the armament, most certainly—and by the generals, Alkibiadès, Theramenès, and Thrasybulus—the acceptance of such terms at such a moment would have been regarded as a disgrace. It would have balked them of conquests ardently, and at that time not unreasonably, anticipated; conquests tending to restore Athens to that eminence from which she had been so recently deposed. And it would have inflicted this mortification, not merely without compensating gain to her in any other shape, but with a fair probability of imposing upon all her citizens the necessity of redoubled efforts at no very distant future, when the moment favourable to her enemies should have arrived.

¹ Philochorus (sq. Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 371) appears to have said that the Athenians rejected the proposition as insincerely meant—Λακεδαιμόνιοι προσβουλευμένοι περὶ εἰρήνῃς διανοήσαντες οὐ δ' ἀδοκίμως αὐτὸ προσέειπον; compare also Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 772—Philochori Fragment.

If therefore, passing from the vague accusation, that it was the demagogue Kleophon who stood between Athens and the conclusion of peace, we examine what were the specific terms of peace which he induced his countrymen to reject—we shall find that he had very strong reasons, not to say preponderant reasons, for his advice. Whether he made any use of this proposition, in itself inadmissible, to try and invite the conclusion of peace on more suitable and lasting terms, may well be doubted. Probably no such efforts would have succeeded, even if they had been made: yet a statesman like Periklès would have made the trial, in a conviction that Athens was carrying on the war at a disadvantage which must in the long run sink her. A mere opposition speaker like Kleophon, even when taking what was probably a right measure of the actual proposition before him, did not look so far forward into the future.

B.C. 410,
May, June,
&c.

Strenuous aid of Pharnabazus to the Peloponnesians
—Alkibiadēs and the Athenian fleet at the Bosphorus.

Meanwhile the Athenian fleet reigned alone in the Propontis and its two adjacent straits, the Bosphorus and the Hellespont; although the ardour and generosity of Pharnabazus not only supplied maintenance and clothing to the distressed seamen of the vanquished fleet, but also encouraged the construction of fresh ships in the room of those captured. While he armed the seamen, gave them pay for two months, and distributed them as guards along the coast of the satrapy, he at the same time granted an unlimited supply of ship-timber from the abundant forests of Mount Ida, and assisted the officers in putting new triremes on the stocks at Antandrus; near to which (at a place called Aspaneus) the Idæan wood was chiefly exported¹.

Having made these arrangements, he proceeded to lend aid at Chalkêdon, which the Athenians had already begun to attack. Their first operation after the victory had been to sail to Perinthus and Selymbria, both of which had before revolted from Athens: the former, intimidated by the recent events, admitted them and rejoined itself to Athens; the latter resisted such a requisition, but ransomed itself from attack for the present by the payment of a pecuniary fine. Alkibiadēs then conducted them to Chalkêdon, opposite to Byzantium on the southernmost Asiatic border of the Bosphorus. To be masters of these two straits, the Bosphorus and the Hellespont, was a point of first-rate moment to Athens; first, because it enabled her to secure the arrival of the corn ships from the Euxine for her own consumption; next, because she had it in her power to impose a tithe or due upon all the trading ships passing through—not unlike the dues imposed by the Danes at the Sound even down to the present time. For the opposite reasons, of course the importance of the position was equally great to the enemies of Athens. Until the spring of the preceding year, Athens had been undisputed mistress of both the straits. But the revolt of Abydos in the Hellespont (about April 411 B.C.) and that of Byzantium with Chalkêdon in the Bosphorus (about June 411 B.C.), had deprived her of this pre-eminence; and her supplies obtained during the last few months could only have come through during those intervals when her fleets there stationed had the preponderance, so as to give them convoy. Accordingly it is highly probable that her supplies of corn from the Euxine during the autumn of 411 B.C. had been comparatively restricted.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 1, 24-26; Strabo, xiii. p. 606.

Though Chalkêdon itself, assisted by Pharnabazus, still held out against Athens, Alkibiadês now took possession of Chrysopolis, its unfortified seaport, on the eastern coast of the Bosphorus opposite Byzantium. This place he fortified, established in it a squadron with a permanent garrison, and erected it into a regular tithing port for levying toll on all vessels coming out of the Euxine¹. The Athenians seem to have habitually levied this toll at Byzantium, until the revolt of that place, among their constant sources of revenue: it was now re-established under the auspices of Alkibiadés. In so far as it was levied on ships which brought their produce for sale and consumption at Athens, it was of course ultimately paid in the shape of increased price by Athenian citizens and metics. Thirty triremes under Theramenés were left at Chrysopolis to enforce this levy, to convoy friendly merchantmen, and in other respects to serve as annoyance to the enemy.

The Athenians occupy Chrysopolis, and levy toll on the ships passing through the Bosphorus.

¹ See Demosthen. de Coronâ, c. 71; and Xenoph. Hellen. i. 1, 22.

The remaining fleet went partly to the Hellespont, partly to Thrace, where the diminished maritime strength of the Lacedæmonians already told in respect to the adherence of the cities. At Thasus especially¹, the citizens, headed by Ekphantus, expelled the Lacedæmonian harmost Eteonikus with his garrison, and admitted Thrasybulus with an Athenian force. It will be recollected that this was one of the cities in which Peisander and the Four Hundred conspirators (early in 411 B.C.) had put down the democracy and established an oligarοἱ δεκατενῆμον εὐρεσκάντας ἐν αὐτῇ (Χρυσόπολι), καὶ τῆς δεκάτης ἐξέλεγοντο τῆς ἐκ τοῦ Πόντου πλοίας: compare iv. 8, 27; and v. 1, 28; also Diodor. xiii. 64.

The expression τῆς δεκάτης implies that this tithe was something known and pre-established.

Polybius (iv. 44) gives credit to Alkibiadés for having been the first to suggest this method of gain to Athens. But there is evidence that it was practised long before—even anterior to the Athenian empire, during the times of Persian preponderance (see Herodot. vi. 5).

See a striking passage, illustrating the importance to Athens of the possession of Byzantium, in Lyaina, Orat. xxviii. cont. Ergokl. sect. 6.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 1, 32; Demosthen. cont. Leptin. a. 48. c. 14. p. 474.

The Lacedæmonians are expelled from Thasus.

chical government, under pretence that the allied cities would be faithful to Athens as soon as she was relieved from her democratical institutions. All the calculations of these oligarchs had been disappointed, as Phrynichus had predicted from the first. The Thasians, as soon as their own oligarchical party had been placed in possession of the government, recalled their disaffected exiles¹, under whose auspices a Laconian garrison and harmost had since been introduced. Eteonikus, now expelled, accused the Lacedæmonian admiral Pasippidas of being himself a party to the expulsion, under bribes from Tissaphernès; an accusation, which seems improbable, but which the Lacedæmonians believed, and accordingly banished Pasippidas, sending Kratesippidas to replace him. The new admiral found at Chios a small fleet which Pasippidas had already begun to collect from the allies, to supply the recent losses².

The tone at Athens, since the late naval victories, had become more hopeful and energetic. Agis, with his garrison at Dekeleia, though the Athenians could not hinder him from ravaging Attica, yet on approaching one day near to the city walls, was repelled with spirit and success by Thrasyllus. But that which most mortified the Lacedæmonian king, was to discern from his lofty station at Dekeleia the abundant influx into the Peiræus of corn-ships from the Euxine, again renewed in the autumn of 410 B.C., since the occupation of the Bosphorus and Hellespont by Alkibiadès. For the safe reception of these vessels, Thorikus was soon after fortified.

Klearchus
the Lacedæmonian is sent to Byzantium.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 64.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 1, 32.

Agis exclaimed that it was fruitless to shut out the Athenians from the produce of Attica, so long as plenty of imported corn was allowed to reach them. Accordingly he provided, in conjunction with the Megarians, a small squadron of fifteen triremes, with which he despatched Klearchus to Byzantium and Chalkêdon. That Spartan was a public guest of the Byzantines, and had already been singled out to command auxiliaries intended for that city. He seems to have begun his voyage during the ensuing winter (B.C. 410-409), and reached Byzantium in safety, though with the destruction of three of his squadron by the nine Athenian triremes who guarded the Hellespont¹.

In the ensuing spring, Thrasyllus was despatched from Athens at the head of a large new force to act in Ionia. He commanded 50 triremes, 1000 of the regular hoplites, 100 horsemen, and 5000 seamen, with the means of arming these latter as peltasts; also transports for his troops besides the triremes². Having reposed his armament for three days at Samos, he made a descent at Pygela, and next succeeded in making himself master of Kolophon with its port Notium. He next threatened Ephesus, but that place was defended by a powerful force which Tissaphernês had summoned, under proclamation "to go and succour the goddess Artemis;" as well

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 1, 35-36. He says that the ships of Klearchus, on being attacked by the Athenians in the Hellespont, fled first to Sestos, and afterwards to Byzantium. But Sestos was the Athenian station. The name must surely be put by inadvertence for Abydos, the Peloponnesian station.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 1, 34; i. 2, 1. Diodorus (xiii. 64) confounds Thrasybulus with Thrasyllus.

B.C. 409,
April.

Thrasyllus
sent from Athens to Ionia.

as by twenty-five fresh Syracusan and two Selinusian triremes recently arrived¹. From these enemies Thrasyllus sustained a severe defeat near Ephesus, lost 300 men, and was compelled to sail off to Notium; from whence, after burying his dead, he proceeded northward towards the Hellespont. On their way thither, while halting for a while at Methymna in the north of Lesbos, Thrasyllus saw the twenty-five Syracusan triremes passing by on their voyage from Ephesus to Abydos. He immediately attacked them, captured four along with the entire crews, and chased the remainder back to their station at Ephesus. All the prisoners taken were sent to Athens, where they were deposited for custody in the stone-quarries of Peiræus, doubtless in retaliation for the treatment of the Athenian prisoners at Syracuse: they contrived however during the ensuing winter to break a way out and escape to Dekeleia. Among the prisoners taken, was found Alkibiadēs the Athenian (cousin and fellow-exile of the Athenian general of the same name), whom Thrasyllus caused to be set at liberty, while the others were sent to Athens².

After the delay caused by this pursuit, he brought back his armament to the Hellespont and joined

B.C. 409.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 2, 5-11. Xenophon distinguishes these twenty-five Syracusan triremes into τὰς σφαιρίους εἰκοσι πέντε—and then αἱ ἑξήκονα τριῆς, αἱ νεώτεροι ἡγεμονίαι. But it appears to me that the twenty triremes, as well as the five, must have come to Asia, since the battle of Kyzikus—though the five may have been somewhat later in their period of arrival. All the Syracusan ships in the fleet of Mindarus were destroyed; and it seems impossible to imagine that that admiral can have left twenty Syracusan ships at Ephesus or Miletus, in addition to those which he took with him to the Hellespont.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 2, 8-15.

Thrasyllos and Alki-biadēs at the Helles-
pont.

Alkibiadēs at Sestos. Their joint force was conveyed over, seemingly about the commencement of autumn, to Lampsakus on the Asiatic side of the strait; which place they fortified and made their head-quarters for the autumn and winter, maintaining themselves by predatory excursions throughout the neighbouring satrapy of Pharnabazus. It is curious to learn, however, that when Alkibiadēs was proceeding to marshal the army altogether (the hoplites, pursuant to Athenian custom, taking rank according to their tribes), his own soldiers, never yet beaten, refused to fraternise with those of Thrasyllos, who had been so recently worsted at Ephesus. Nor was this alienation removed until after a joint expedition against Abydos; Pharnabazus, presenting himself with a considerable force, especially cavalry, to relieve that place, was encountered and defeated in a battle wherein all the Athenians present took part. The honour of the hoplites of Thrasyllos was now held to be re-established, so that the fusion of ranks was admitted without farther difficulty¹. Even the entire army, however, was not able to accomplish the conquest of Abydos; which the Peloponnesians and Pharnabazus still maintained as their station on the Hellespont.

B.C. 409.

Pylus is retaken by the Lacedæmonians — disgrace of the Athenian Anytus for not relieving it.

Meanwhile Athens had so stripped herself of force, by the large armament recently sent with Thrasyllos, that her enemies near home were encouraged to active operations. The Spartans despatched an expedition, both of triremes and of land-force, to attack Pylus, which had remained as an ¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 2, 13-17; Plutarch, Alkibiad. c. 29.

Athenian post and a refuge for revolted Helots ever since its first fortification by Demosthenes in B.C. 425. The place was vigorously attacked both by sea and by land, and soon became much pressed. Not unmindful of its distress, the Athenians sent to its relief 30 triremes under Anytus, who however came back without even reaching the place, having been prevented by stormy weather or unfavourable winds from doubling Cape Malea. Pylus was soon afterwards obliged to surrender, the garrison departing on terms of capitulation¹. But Anytus on his return encountered great displeasure from his countrymen, and was put on his trial for having betrayed, or for not having done his utmost to fulfill, the trust confided to him. It is said that he only saved himself from condemnation by bribing the Dikastery, and that he was the first Athenian who ever obtained a verdict by corruption². Whether he could really have reached Pylus, and whether the obstacles which baffled him were such as an energetic officer would have overcome, we have no means of determining; still less, whether it be true that he actually escaped by bribery. The story seems to prove, however, that the general Athenian public thought him deserving of condemnation, and were so much surprised by his acquittal, as to account for it by supposing, truly or falsely, the use of means never before attempted.

¹ Diodor. xiii. 64. The slighting way in which Xenophon (Hellen. i. 2, 18) dismisses this capture of Pylus, as a mere retreat of some runaway Helots from Malea—as well as his employment of the name Koryphasion, and not of Pylus—prove how much he wrote from the statements of Lacedæmonian informants.

² Diodor. xiii. 64; Plutarch, Cæsar, c. 14.

Aristotle, Ἀθηναίων πολιτεία, ap. Harpokratæ, v. Δεινός—and in the Collection of Fragment. Aristotel. no. 72. ed. Didot (Fragment. Historie. Græc. vol. ii. p. 127).

It was about the same time, also, that the Megarians recovered by surprise their port of Nisæa, which had been held by an Athenian garrison since b.c. 424. The Athenians made an effort to recover it, but failed; though they defeated the Megarians in an action¹.

b.c. 408.

Capture of Chalkêdon
by Alkibiadês and the Athenians.

Thrasyllus, during the summer of b.c. 409—and even the joint force of Thrasyllus and Alkibiadês during the autumn of the same year—seem to have effected less than might have been expected from so large a force: indeed it must have been at some period during this year that the Lacedæmonian Klearchus, with his 15 Megarian ships, penetrated up the Hellespont to Byzantium, finding it guarded only by 9 Athenian triremes². But the operations of 408 b.c. were more important. The entire force under Alkibiadês and the other commanders was mustered for the siege of Chalkêdon and Byzantium. The Chalkêdonians, having notice of the project, deposited their moveable property for safety in the hands of their neighbours the Bithynian Thracians; a remarkable evidence of the good feeling and confidence between the two, contrasting strongly with the perpetual hostility which subsisted on the other side of the Bosphorus between Byzantium and the Thracian tribes adjoining³. But the precaution was frustrated by Alkibiadês, who entered the territory of the Bithynians and compelled them by threats to deliver up the effects confided to them. He then proceeded to block up Chalkêdon by a wooden wall carried across from the Bosphorus to the Propontis ; though the continuity of this wall was interrupted by a river, and seemingly by some rough ground on the immediate brink of the river. The blockading wall was already completed, when Pharnabazus appeared with an army for the relief of the place, and advanced as far as the Herakleion (or temple of Heraklês) belonging to the Chalkedonians. Profiting by his approach, Hippokratês, the Lacedæmonian harmost in the town, made a vigorous sally : but the Athenians repelled all the efforts of Pharnabazus to force a passage through their lines and join him—so that, after an obstinate contest, the sallying force was driven back within the walls of the town, and Hippokratês himself killed¹.

¹ Diodor. xiii. 65.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 1, 36.

³ Polyb. iv. 44–45.

The blockade of the town was now made so sure, that Alkibiadês departed with a portion of the army to levy money and get together forces for the siege of Byzantium afterwards. During his absence, Theramenês and Thrasybulus came to terms with Pharnabazus for the capitulation of Chalkêdon. It was agreed that the town should again become a tributary dependency of Athens, on the same rate of tribute as before the revolt, and that the arrears during the subsequent period should be paid up. Moreover Pharnabazus himself engaged to pay to the Athenians 20 talents on behalf of the town, and also to escort some Athenian envoys up to Susa, enabling them to submit propositions for accommodation to the Great King. Until those envoys should return, the Athenians covenanted to abstain concluded by the Athenians with Phar-nabazus.

Convention

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 3, 5-7 ; Diodor. xiii. 66.

from hostilities against the satrapy of Pharnabazus¹. Oaths to this effect were mutually exchanged, after the return of Alkibiadês from his expedition. For Pharnabazus positively refused to complete the ratification with the other generals, until Alkibiadês should be there to ratify in person also; a proof at once of the great individual importance of the latter, and of his known facility in finding excuses to evade an agreement. Two envoys were accordingly sent by Pharnabazus to Chrysopolis, to receive the oaths of Alkibiadês, while two relatives of Alkibiadês came to Chalkêdon as witnesses to those of Pharnabazus. Over and above the common oath shared with his colleagues, Alkibiadês took a special covenant of personal friendship and hospitality with the satrap, and received from him the like.

Alkibiadês had employed his period of absence in capturing Selybria, from whence he obtained a sum of money, and in getting together a large body

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 3, 9. Ὑποτάξαι τὸν φίλον Χαλκηδόνιον Ἀθηναίοις ὅσοι περ εἰσέλθουσιν, καὶ τὰ ἀφαιρόμενα χρήματα ἀποδοῦναι Ἀθηναίοις δὲ μὴ πολέμειν Χαλκηδόνιοις. ἔτι δὲ οἱ παρὰ βασιλεῖα πρέσβειν ἐλάβοντο.

This passage strengthens the doubts which I threw out in a former chapter, whether the Athenians ever did or could realise their project of commuting the tribute (imposed upon the dependent allies) for an ad valorem duty of five per cent. on imports and exports, which project is mentioned by Thucydides (vii. 28) as having been resolved upon at least, if not carried out, in the summer of 413 B.C. In the bargain here made with the Chalkedonians, it seems implied that the payment of tribute was the last arrangement subsisting between Athens and Chalkêdon, at the time of the revolt of the latter.

Next, I agree with the remark made by Schneidler in his note upon the passage Ἀθηναίοις δὲ μὴ πολέμειν Χαλκηδόνιοις. He notices the tenor of the covenant as it stands in Plutarch—τὴν φαρμαβάζου διὰ χάριν μὴ ἄλλοις (Alkib. c. 31), which is certainly far more suitable to the circumstances. Instead of Χαλκηδόνιοις he proposes to read φαρμαβάζου. At any rate, this is the meaning.

of Thracians, with whom he marched by land to Byzantium. That place was now besieged, immediately after the capitulation of Chalkêdon, by the united force of the Athenians. A wall of circumvallation was drawn around it, and various attacks were made by missiles and battering engines. These however the Lacedæmonian garrison, under the harmost Klearchus, aided by some Megarians under Helixus and Bœotians under Kœratadas, was perfectly competent to repel. But the ravages of famine were not so easily dealt with. After the blockade had lasted some time, provisions began to fail; so that Klearchus, strict and harsh even under ordinary circumstances, became inexorable and oppressive from exclusive anxiety for the subsistence of his soldiers; and even locked up the stock of food while the population of the town were dying of hunger around him. Seeing that his only hope was from external relief, he sallied forth from the city to entreat aid from Pharnabazus; and to get together, if possible, a fleet for some aggressive operation that might divert the attention of the besiegers. He left the defence to Kœratadas and Helixus, in full confidence that the Byzantines were too much compromised by their revolt from Athens to venture to desert Sparta, whatever might be their suffering. But the favourable terms recently granted to Chalkêdon, coupled with the severe and increasing famine, induced Kydon and a Byzantine party to open the gates by night, and admit Alkibiadês with the Athenians into the wide interior square called the Thrakion. Helixus and Kœratadas, apprised of this attack only when the enemy had ac-

B.C. 408.

Byzantium captured by the Athenians.

tually got possession of the town on all sides, vainly attempted resistance, and were compelled to surrender at discretion. They were sent as prisoners to Athens, where Kœratadas contrived to escape during the confusion of the landing at Peiræus. Favourable terms were granted to the town, which was replaced in its position of a dependent ally of Athens, and probably had to pay up its arrears of tribute in the same manner as Chalkêdon¹.

B.C. 408.

Pharnabazus conveys some Athenian envoys towards Susa, to make terms with the Great King.

So slow was the process of siege in ancient times, that the reduction of Chalkêdon and Byzantium occupied nearly the whole year; the latter place surrendering about the beginning of winter². Both of them, however, were acquisitions of capital importance to Athens, making her again undisputed mistress of the Bosphorus, and ensuring to her two valuable tributary allies. Nor was this all the improvement which the summer had operated in her position. The accommodation just concluded with Pharnabazus was also a step of great value, and still greater promise. It was plain that the satrap had grown weary of bearing all the brunt of the war for the benefit of the Peloponnesians, and that he was well-disposed to assist the Athenians in coming to terms with the Great King. The mere withdrawal of his hearty support from Sparta, even if nothing else followed from it, was of immense moment to

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 3, 15-22; Diodor. xiii. 67; Plutarch, Alkib. c. 31.

The account given by Xenophon of the surrender of Byzantium which I have followed in the text, is perfectly plain and probable. It does not consist with the complicated stratagem described in Diodorus and Plutarch, as well as in Frontinus, iii. xi. 3; alluded to also in Polyænus, i. 48, 2.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 4, 1.

Athens; and thus much was really achieved. The envoys, five Athenians and two Argeians (all, probably, sent for from Athens, which accounts for some delay), were directed after the siege of Chalkêdon to meet Pharnabazus at Kyzikus. Some Lacedæmonian envoys, and even the Syracusan Hermokratês, who had been condemned and banished by sentence at home, took advantage of the same escort, and all proceeded on their journey upward to Susa. Their progress was arrested, during the extreme severity of the winter, at Gordium in Phrygia; and it was while pursuing their tract into the interior at the opening of spring, that they met the young prince Cyrus, son of King Darius, coming down in person to govern an important part of Asia Minor. Some Lacedæmonian envoys (Bœotius and others) were travelling down along with him, after having fulfilled their mission at the Persian court¹.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 4, 2-3.

CHAPTER LXIV.

FROM THE ARRIVAL OF CYRUS THE YOUNGER IN ASIA
MINOR DOWN TO THE BATTLE OF ARGINUSÆ.

THE advent of Cyrus, commonly known as Cyrus the younger, into Asia Minor, was an event of the greatest importance, opening what may be called the last phase in the Peloponnesian war.

He was the younger of the two sons of the Persian king Darius Nothus by the cruel queen Parysatis, and was now sent down by his father as satrap of Lydia, Phrygia the greater, and Kappadokia; as well as general of all that military division of which the muster-place was Kastólus. His command did not at this time comprise the Greek cities on the coast, which were still left to Tissaphernês and Pharnabazus¹. But he nevertheless brought down with him a strong interest in the Grecian war, and an intense anti-Athenian feeling, with full authority from his father to carry it out into act. Whatever this young man willed, he willed strongly: his bodily activity, rising superior to those temptations of sensual indulgence which often enervated the Persian grandees, provoked the admiration even of Spartans²; and his energetic character was combined with a certain measure of ability. Though he had not as yet conceived that deliberate plan for mounting the Persian throne which afterwards absorbed his whole mind, and was so near succeeding by the help of the Ten Thousand Greeks—yet he seems to have had from the beginning the sentiment and ambition of a king in prospect, not those of a satrap. He came down well-aware that Athens was the efficient enemy by whom the pride of the Persian kings had been humbled, the insular Greeks kept out of the sight of a Persian ship, and even the continental Greeks on the coast practically emancipated—for the last sixty years. He therefore brought down with him a strenuous desire, to put down the Athenian power, very different from the treacherous balancing of Tissaphernes, and much more formidable even than the straightforward enmity of Pharnabazus, who had less money, less favour at court, and less of youthful ardour. Moreover Pharnabazus, after having heartily espoused the cause of the Peloponnesians for the last three years, had now become weary of the allies whom he had so long kept in pay. Instead of expelling Athenian influence from his coasts with little difficulty, as he had expected to do—he found his satrapy plundered, his revenues impaired or absorbed, and an Athenian fleet all-powerful in the Propontis and Hellespont; while the Lacedæmonian fleet, which he had taken so much pains to invite, was destroyed. Decidedly sick of the Peloponnesian cause, he was even leaning towards Athens; and the envoys whom he was escorting to Susa might perhaps have laid the foundation of an altered Persian policy in Asia Minor, when the journey of Cyrus down to the coast overthrew all such calculations. The young prince brought with him a fresh, hearty, and youthful antipathy against Athens,—a power inferior only to that of the Great King himself—and an energetic determination to use it without reserve in ensuring victory to the Peloponnesians.

¹ The Anabasis of Xenophon (i. 1, 6-8; i. 9, 7-9) is better authority, and speaks more exactly, than the Hellenica, i. 4, 3.

² See the anecdote of Cyrus and Lysander in Xenoph. Oeconom. iv. 21-23.

From the moment that Pharnabazus and the Athenian envoys met Cyrus, their farther progress towards Susa became impossible. Bœotius, and the other Lacedæmonian envoys travelling along with the young prince, made extravagant boasts of having obtained all that they asked for at Susa; while Cyrus himself announced his powers as unlimited in extent over the whole coast, all for the purpose of prosecuting vigorous war in conjunction with the Lacedæmonians. Pharnabazus, on hearing such intelligence and seeing the Great King's seal to the words—"I send down Cyrus, as lord of all those who muster at Kastólus"—not only refused to let the Athenian envoys proceed onward, but was even obliged to obey the orders of the young prince; who insisted that they should either be surrendered to him, or at least detained for some time in the interior, in order that no information might be conveyed to Athens. The satrap resisted the first of these requisitions, having pledged his word for their safety; but he obeyed the second—detaining them in Kappadokia for no less than three years, until Athens was prostrate and on the point of surrender, after which he obtained permission from Cyrus to send them back to the sea-coast¹.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 4, 3-8. The words here employed respecting the envoys, when returning after their three years' detention—ὁδὸν

B.C. 407.
 Lysander—Lacedæmonian admiral in Asia.

This arrival of Cyrus, overruling the treachery of Tissaphernês as well as the weariness of Pharnabazus, and supplying the enemies of Athens with a double flow of Persian gold at a moment when the stream would otherwise have dried up—was a paramount item in that sum of causes which concurred to determine the result of the war¹. But important as the event was in itself, it was rendered still more important by the character of the Lacedæmonian admiral Lysander, with whom the young prince first came into contact on reaching Sardis.

Lysander had come out to supersede Kratesippidas about December 408 B.C., or January 407 B.C.²

πρὸς τὸ ἄλλο ἀπαιτούμενος ἀπὸ πλάνου—appear to me an inadvertence. The return of the envoys must have been in the spring of 404 B.C., at a time when Athens had no camp: the surrender of the city took place in April 404 B.C. Xenophon incidentally speaks as if that state of things which existed when the envoys departed, still continued at their return.

¹ The words of Thucydides (ii. 65) imply this as his opinion—Κέρρε τε ὕστερον βασιλέως παῖδι προσγεγονότω, &c.

² The commencement of Lysander's navy or year of maritime command appears to me established for this winter. He had been some time actually in his command before Cyrus arrived at Sardis—Οἱ δὲ Λακεδαιμόνιοι, πρότερον τούτων οὐ πολλῷ χρόνῳ Κρατισσιπιδῆς τῆς ναυαρχίας παρεληλυθίας, Λύσανδρον ἐξέπρωψαν ναύαρχον. Ὁ δὲ ἀφικόμενος ἐς Ῥόδον, καὶ εὖτε ἐκείθεν λαβὼν, ἐς Κῶ καὶ Μίλητον ἐπλευσε· ἐκείθεν δὲ ἐς Ἐφέσον· καὶ ἐκεῖ ἔμεινε, εὖτε ἔχω ἐβδόμηστον, μέχρις αὖ Κῦρος ἐς Σάρδεϊς ἀφίκετο (Xenoph. Hellen. i. 5, 1).

Mr. Fynes Clinton (Fast. H. ad ann. 407 B.C.) has, I presume, been misled by the first words of this passage—πρότερον τούτων οὐ πολλῷ χρόνῳ—when he says—"During the stay of Alcibiadês at Athens, Lysander is sent as ναύαρχος—Xen. Hell. i. 5, 1. Then followed the defeat of Antiochus, the deposition of Alcibiadês, and the substitution of Ἀλχοῦ δέικα, between September 407 and September 406, when Callicratidas succeeded Lysander."

Now Alcibiadês came to Athens in the month of Thargelion, or about the end of May 407, and staid there till the beginning of September 407. Cyrus arrived at Sardis before Alcibiadês reached Athens, and Lysander had been some time at his post before Cyrus arrived; so that

He was the last (after Brasidas and Gylippus) of that trio of eminent Spartans, from whom all the capital wounds of Athens proceeded, during the course of this long war. He was born of poor parents, and is even said to have been of that class called Mothakes, being only enabled by the aid of richer men to keep up his contribution to the public mess, and his place in the constant drill and discipline. He was not only an excellent officer¹, thoroughly competent to the duties of military command, but possessed also great talents for intrigue, and for organising a political party as well as keeping up its disciplined movements. Though indifferent to the temptations either of money or of pleasure², and willingly acquiescing in the poverty to which he was born, he was altogether unscrupulous in the prosecution of ambitious objects, either for his country or for himself. His family, poor as it was, enjoyed a dignified position at Sparta—belonging to the gens of the Herakleidæ, not connected by any near relationship with the kings:—moreover his personal reputation as a Spartan was excellent, since Lysander was not sent out "during the stay of Alcibiades at Athens," but some months before. Still less is it correct to say that Kallikratidas succeeded Lysander in September 406. The battle of Arginusæ, wherein Kallikratidas perished, was fought about August 406, after he had been admiral for several months. The words ἐπὶ τοῖς ἐσπέραις, when construed along with the context which succeeds, must evidently be understood in a large sense—"these events"—mean the general series of events which begins i. 4, 8—the proceedings of Alcibiades from the beginning of the spring of 407.

¹ Ellen, V. II. iii. 43; Atheniensis, vi. p. 271. The assertion that Lysander belonged to the class of Mothakes is given by Atheniensis as coming from Phylarchus, and I see no reason for calling it in question. Ellen states the same thing respecting Gylippus and Kallikratidas also; I do not know on what authority.

² Thucopompus, Fragm. 21, ed. Didot; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 30.

his observance of the rules of discipline had been rigorous and exemplary. The habits of self-constraint thus acquired served him in good stead when it became necessary to his ambition to court the favour of the great. His recklessness about falsehood and perjury is illustrated by various current sayings ascribed to him—such as, that children were to be taken in by means of dice, men by means of oaths¹. A selfish ambition—for promoting the power of his country not merely in connection with, but in subservience to, his own—guided him from the beginning to the end of his career. In this main quality, he agreed with Alkibiadès; in reckless immorality of means, he went even beyond him. He seems to have been cruel; an attribute which formed no part of the usual character of Alkibiadès. On the other hand, the love of personal enjoyment, luxury, and ostentation, which counted for so much in Alkibiadès, was quite unknown to Lysander. The basis of his disposition was Spartan, tending to merge appetite, ostentation, and expansion of mind, all in the love of command and influence—not Athenian, which tended to the development of many and diversified impulses; ambition being one, but only one, among the number.

Kratesippidas, the predecessor of Lysander, seems to have enjoyed the maritime command for more than the usual yearly period, having superseded Pasippidas during the middle of the year of the latter. But the maritime power of Sparta was then so weak (having not yet recovered from the ruinous defeat at Kyzikus), that he achieved little or nothing. We hear of him only as furthering, for his own profit, a political revolution at Chios. Bribed by a party of Chian exiles, he took possession of the acropolis, reinstated them in the island, and aided them in deposing and expelling the party then in office, to the number of 600. It is plain that this was not a question between democracy and oligarchy, but between two oligarchical parties, the one of which succeeded in purchasing the factious agency of the Spartan admiral. The exiles whom he expelled took possession of Atarneus, a strong post belonging to the Chians on the mainland opposite Lesbos. From hence they made war, as well as they could, upon their rivals now in possession of the island, and also upon other parts of Ionia; not without some success and profit, as will appear by their condition about ten years afterwards¹.

Proceedings of the preceding admiral, Kratesippidas.

¹ Plutarch, Lysander, c. 8.

Lysander
visits Cyrus at Sardis.

The practice of reconstituting the governments of the Asiatic cities, thus begun by Kratesippidas, was extended and brought to a system by Lysander; not indeed for private emolument, which he always despised—but in views of ambition. Having departed from Peloponnesus with a squadron, he reinforced it at Rhodes and then sailed onward to Kôs (an Athenian island, so that he could only have touched there) and Milêtus. He took up his final station at Ephesus, the nearest point to Sardis, where Cyrus was expected to arrive; and while awaiting his coming, augmented his fleet to the number of 70 triremes. As soon as Cyrus reached Sardis (about

¹ Diodor. xiii. 65; Xenoph. Hellen. iii. 2, 11. I presume that this conduct of Kratesippidas is the fact glanced at by Isokrês de Pace, Sect. 128. p. 240, ed. Bekk.

April or May 407 B.C.), Lysander went to pay his court to him along with some Lacedæmonian envoys, and found himself welcomed with every mark of favour. Preferring bitter complaints against the double-dealing of Tissaphernês—whom they accused of having frustrated the king's orders and sacrificed the interests of the empire, under the seductions of Alkibiadês,—they entreated Cyrus to adopt a new policy, and execute the stipulations of the treaty by leading the most vigorous aid to put down the common enemy. Cyrus replied that these were the express orders which he had received from his father, and that he was prepared to fulfill them with all his might. He had brought with him (he said) 500 talents, which should be at once devoted to the cause: if these were insufficient, he would resort to the private funds which his father had given him; and if more still were needed, he would coin into money the gold and silver throne on which he sat¹.

Lysander and the envoys returned the warmest thanks for these magnificent promises, which were not likely to prove empty words from the lips of a vehement youth like Cyrus. So sanguine were the hopes which they conceived from his character and proclaimed sentiments, that they ventured to ask him to restore the rate of pay to one full Attic drachma per head for the seamen; which had been the rate promised by Tissaphernês through his envoys at Sparta, when he first invited the Lacedæmonians across the Ægean, and when it was doubtful whether they would come—but actually paid only for the first month, and then reduced to half a drachma, furnished in practice with miserable irregularity. As a motive for granting this increase of pay, Cyrus was assured that it would determine the Athenian seamen to desert so largely, that the war would sooner come to an end, and of course the expenditure also. But he refused compliance, saying that the rate of pay had been fixed both by the king's express orders and by the terms of the treaty, so that he could not depart from it¹. In this reply Lysander was forced to acquiesce. The envoys were treated with distinction, and feasted at a banquet; after which Cyrus, drinking to the health of Lysander, desired him to declare what favour he

His dexterous policy—he acquires the peculiar esteem of Cyrus.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 5, 3-4; Diodor. xiii. 70; Plutarch, Lysander, c. 4. This seems to have been a favourite metaphor, either used by, or at least ascribed to, the Persian grandees; we have already had it a little before from the mouth of Tissaphernês.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 5, 5. οὐκ ἔστι καὶ τὰς ἀποδόσεων αὐτοῖς ἔλαττον, ἐπιδόσθαι μᾶλλον ἰσχυρῶς ἐπὶ τοῖς μισθοῖς δίδόναι, ὁπόσους αὖτε ὁ βασιλεὺς ἐπέταξε ἀνταποδοῖναι.

This is not strictly correct. The rate of pay is not specified in either of the three conventions, as they stand in Thucyd. viii. 18, 57, 58. It seems to have been, from the beginning, matter of verbal understanding and promise: first a drachma per day was promised by the envoys of Timophernæ at Sparta—next, the satrap himself at Miletus cut down the drachma to half a drachma, and promised this lower rate for the future (viii. 29).

Mr. Mitford says—"Lysander proposed, that an Attic drachma, which was eight oboli, nearly tenpence sterling, should be allowed for daily pay to every seaman."

Mr. Mitford had in the previous sentence stated three oboli as equal to not quite fourpence sterling. Of course therefore it is plain that he did not consider three oboli as the half of a drachma (Hist. Greece, ch. xx. sect. i. vol. iv. p. 317, oct. ed. 1814).

That a drachma was equivalent to six oboli (that is, an Æginæan drachma to six Æginæan oboli, and an Attic drachma to six Attic oboli) is so familiarly known, that I should almost have imagined the word eight (in the first sentence here cited) to be a misprint for six—if the sentence cited next had not clearly demonstrated that Mr. Mitford really believed a drachma to be equal to eight oboli. It is certainly a mistake surprising to find.

could do to gratify him most. "To grant an additional obolus per head for each seaman's pay," replied Lysander. Cyrus immediately complied, having personally bound himself by his manner of putting the question. But the answer impressed him both with astonishment and admiration; for he had expected that Lysander would ask some favour or present for himself—judging him not only according to the analogy of most Persians, but also of Astyochus and the officers of the Peloponnesian armament at Milétus, whose corrupt subservience to Tissaphernès had probably been made known to him. From such corruption, as well as from the mean carelessness of Theramenès (the Spartan) respecting the condition of the seamen¹, Lysander's conduct stood out in pointed and honourable contrast.

The incident here described not only procured for the seamen of the Peloponnesian fleet the daily pay of four oboli (instead of three) per man, but also ensured to Lysander himself a degree of esteem and confidence from Cyrus which he knew well how to turn to account. I have already remarked², in reference to Periklès and Nikias, that an established reputation for personal incorruptibility, rare as that quality was among Grecian leading politicians, was among the most precious items in the capital stock of an ambitious man—even if looked at only in regard to the durability of his own influence. If the proof of such disinterestedness was of so much value in the eyes of the Athenian people, yet more powerfully did it work upon the mind of Cyrus. With his

¹ Thucyd. viii. 29.

² See the former volume vi. ch. li. p. 391.

Persian and princely ideas of winning adherents by munificence¹, a man who despised presents was a phenomenon commanding the higher sentiment of wonder and respect. From this time forward he not only trusted Lysander with implicit pecuniary confidence, but consulted him as to the prosecution of the war, and even condescended to second his personal ambition to the detriment of this object².

Abundant pay of the Peloponnesian armament, furnished by Cyrus.

Returning from Sardis to Ephesus, after such unexampled success in his interview with Cyrus, Lysander was enabled not only to make good to his fleet the full arrear actually due, but also to pay them for a month in advance, at the increased rate of four oboli per man; and to promise that high rate for the future. A spirit of the highest satisfaction and confidence was diffused through the armament. But the ships were in indifferent condition, having been hastily and parsimoniously got up since the late defeat at Kyzikus. Accordingly Lysander employed his present affluence in putting them into better order, procuring more complete tackle, and inviting picked crews³. He took another step pregnant with important results. Summoning to Ephesus a few of the most leading and active men from each of the Asiatic cities, he organized them into disciplined clubs or factions, in correspondence with himself. He instigated these clubs to the most vigorous prosecution of the war against Athens, promising that as soon as that war should be concluded, they should be invested and maintained by Spartan influence in organized by Lysander among the Asiatic cities.

Factions

¹ See the remarkable character of Cyrus the younger, given in the Anabasis of Xenophon, ii. 9, 22-28.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 13; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 4-9.

³ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 5, 10.

the government of their respective cities¹. His newly established influence with Cyrus, and the abundant supplies of which he was now master, added double force to an invitation in itself but too seducing. And thus, while infusing increased ardour into the joint warlike efforts of these cities, he at the same time procured for himself an ubiquitous correspondence, such as no successor could manage; rendering the continuance of his own command almost essential to success. The fruits of his factious manœuvres will be seen in the subsequent Dekarchies or oligarchies of Ten, after the complete subjugation of Athens.

While Lysander and Cyrus were thus restoring formidable efficacy to their side of the contest, (during the summer of 407 B.C.), the victorious exile Alkibiadès had accomplished the important and delicate step of re-entering his native city for the first time. According to the accommodation with Pharnabazus, concluded after the reduction of Chalkêdon, the Athenian fleet was precluded from assailing his satrapy, and was thus forced to seek subsistence elsewhere. Byzantium and Selymbria, with contributions levied in Thrace, maintained them for the winter: in the spring (407 B.C.), Alkibiadès brought them again to Samos; from whence he undertook an expedition against the coast of Karia, levying contributions to the extent of 100 talents. Thrasylulus, with thirty triremes, went to attack Thrace, where he reduced Thasos, Abdêra, and all those towns which had revolted from Athens; Thasos being now in especial distress from famine as well as from past seditions. A valuable contribution for the support of the fleet was doubtless among the fruits of this success. Thrasyllus at the same time conducted another division of the army home to Athens, intended by Alkibiadès as precursors of his own return¹.

B.C. 407.

Proceedings of Alkibiadès in Thrace and Asia.

¹ Diodor. xiii. 70; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 5.

B.C. 407.

His arrival
at Athens.

Before Thrasyllus arrived, the people had already manifested their favourable disposition towards Alkibiadès by choosing him anew general of the armament, along with Thrasybulus and Konon. Alkibiadès was now tending homeward from Samos with twenty triremes, bringing with him all the contributions recently levied. He first stopped at Paros, then visited the coast of Laconia, and lastly looked into the Lacedæmonian harbour of Gytheion, where he had learnt that thirty triremes were preparing. The news which he received of his re-election as general, strengthened by the pressing invitations and encouragements of his friends, as well as by the recall of his banished kinsmen—at length determined him to sail to Athens. He reached Peiræus on a marked day—the festival of the Plyntéria on the 25th of the month Thargélion—(about the end of May 407 B.C.). This was a day of melancholy solemnity, accounted unpropitious for any action of importance. The statue of the goddess Athéné was stripped of all its ornaments, covered up from every one's gaze, and washed or cleansed under a mysterious ceremonial, by the holy gens called Praxiergidæ². The goddess

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 4, 8-10; Diodor. xiii. 72. The chronology of Xenophon, though not so clear as we could wish, deserves unquestionable preference over that of Diodorus.

² See the description of a similar solemnity performed by appointed priestesses and other women at Argos (the annual washing of the statue

thus seemed to turn away her face, and refuse to behold the returning exile. Such at least was the construction of his enemies; and as the subsequent turn of events tended to bear them out, it has been preserved; while the more auspicious counter-interpretation, doubtless suggested by his friends, has been forgotten.

The most extravagant representations, of the pomp and splendour of this return of Alkibiadēs to Athens, were given by some authors of antiquity—especially by Duris at Samos, an author about two generations later. It was said that he brought with him 200 prow-ornaments belonging to captive enemies' ships, or (according to some) even the 200 captured ships themselves; that his trireme was ornamented with gilt and silvered shields, and sailed by purple sails; that Kallippidēs, one of the most distinguished actors of the day, performed the functions of Keleustēs, pronouncing the chant or word of command to the rowers; that Chrysogonus, a flute-player who had gained the first prize at the Pythian games, was also on board, playing the air of return¹. All these details, invented with melancholy facility to illustrate an ideal of ostentation and insolence, are refuted by the more simple and credible narrative of Xenophon. The re-entry of Alkibiadēs was not merely unostentatious, but even mistrustful

Feelings and details connected with his arrival.

of Athēnē in the river Ilachus) given by the poet Kallimachus—Hymnus in Lavacrum Palladis—with the copious illustrative notes of Ezekiel Spanheim. Here, again, we find analogies in the existing sentiment of Hindoo religion. Colonel Sleeman mentions—"The water of the Ganges, with which the image of the God Vishnoo has been washed, is considered a very holy draught, fit for princes. That with which the image of the God Sera is washed, must not be drunk." (Rambles and Recollections of an Indian Official, ch. 23. p. 182.)

¹ Diodor. xiii. 68; Plutarch, Alkib. c. 31; Athenæ. xii. p. 535.

and apprehensive. He had with him only twenty triremes; and though encouraged, not merely by the assurances of his friends, but also by the news that he had just been re-elected general,—he was nevertheless half-afraid to disembark, even at the instant when he made fast his ship to the quay in Peiræus. A vast crowd had assembled there from the city and the port, animated by curiosity, interest, and other emotions of every kind, to see him arrive. But so little did he trust their sentiments, that he hesitated at first to step on shore, and stood up on the deck looking about for his friends and kinsmen. Presently he saw Euryptolemus his cousin and others, by whom he was heartily welcomed, and in the midst of whom he landed. But they too were so apprehensive of his numerous enemies, that they formed themselves into a sort of body-guard to surround and protect him against any possible assault, during his march from Peiræus to Athens¹.

Unanimous welcome with which he is received.

No protection, however, was required. Not merely did his enemies attempt no violence against him, but they said nothing in opposition when he made his defence before the Senate and the public assembly. Protesting before the one as well as the other, his innocence of the impiety laid to his charge, he denounced bitterly the injustice of his enemies, and gently, but pathetically, deplored the unkindness of the people. His friends all spoke warmly in the same strain. So strenuous and so pronounced, was the sentiment in his favour, both of the Senate and of the public assembly, that no one dared to address them in the contrary sense¹. The sentence of condemnation passed against him was cancelled: the Eumolpidæ were directed to revoke the curse which they had pronounced upon his head: the record of the sentence was destroyed, and the plate of lead, upon which the curse was engraven, thrown into the sea: his confiscated property was restored: lastly, he was proclaimed general with full powers, and allowed to prepare an expedition of 100 triremes, 1500 hoplites from the regular muster-roll, and 150 horsemen. All this passed, by unopposed vote, amidst silence on the part of enemies and acclamations from friends—amidst unmeasured promises of future achievement from himself, and confident assurances, impressed by his friends on willing hearers, that Alkibiadès was the only man competent to restore the empire and grandeur of Athens. The general expectation, which he and his friends took every possible pains to excite, was, that his victorious career of the last three years was a preparation for yet greater triumphs during the next.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 4, 18, 19. Ἀλκιβιάδης δὲ, πρὸς τῆς γῆς ὁρμηθεὶς, ἀνέβηκε μὲν οὐκ εἰδὼς, φεβοῦμενος τοὺς ἔχθρους· ἐπισπαστὴς δὲ ἐπὶ τῷ καταστρώματι, ἐσκόπει τοὺς αὐτῷ ἐπιτηδείους, εἰ παρήσαν. Κατεβὼς δὲ Εὐρυπτόλεμος τῆς Πειραιέως, αὐτοῦ δὲ ἀσπείων, καὶ τοὺς ἄλλους σέβειους καὶ φίλους μετ' αὐτῶν, τότε ἀποβὰς ἀναβάντες ἐς τὴν πόλιν, μετὰ τῇσι παρίεσθαι σήμερον, εἰ τι ἀπαιτοῦτο, μὴ ἐπιτρέπειν.

We may be satisfied, when we advert to the apprehensions of Alkibiadès on entering the Peiræus, and to the body-guard organized by his friends, that this overwhelming and uncontradicted triumph greatly surpassed the anticipations of both. It intoxicated him, and led him to make light of enemies whom only just before he had so much dreaded. This mistake, together with the carelessness and insolence arising out of what seemed to be an unbounded ascendancy, proved the cause of his future ruin. But the truth is, that these enemies, however they might remain silent, had not ceased to be formidable. Alkibiadès had now been eight years in exile, from about August 415 B.C. to May 407 B.C. Now absence was in many ways a good thing for his reputation; since his overbearing private demeanour had been kept out of sight, and his impieties partially forgotten. There was even a disposition among the majority to accept his own explicit denial of the fact laid to his charge; and to dwell chiefly upon the unworthy manœuvres of his enemies in resisting his demand for instant trial immediately after the accusation was broached, in order that they might calumniate him during his absence. He was characterized as a patriot animated by the noblest motives, who had brought both first-rate endowments and large private wealth to the service of the commonwealth, but had been ruined by a conspiracy of corrupt and worthless speakers, every way inferior to him; men, whose only chance of success with the people arose from expelling those who were better than themselves, while he (Alkibiadès), far from having any interest adverse to the democracy, was the natural and worthy favourite of a democratical people¹. So far as the old causes of unpopularity were concerned, therefore, time and absence had done much to weaken their effect, and to assist his friends in countervailing them by pointing to the treacherous political manœuvres employed against him.

Effect produced upon Alkibiadès.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 4, 20; Plutarch, Alkibi. c. 33; Diodor. xiii. 69.

Sentiment
of the Athenians towards him.

But if the old causes of unpopularity had thus, comparatively speaking, passed out of sight, others had since arisen, of a graver and more ineffaceable character. His vindictive hostility to his country had been not merely ostentatiously proclaimed, but actively manifested, by stabs but too effectively aimed at her vitals. The sending of Gylippus to Syracuse—the fortification of Dekeleia—the revolts of Chios and Milétus—the first origination of the conspiracy of the Four Hundred—had all been emphatically the measures of Alkibiadês. Even for these, the enthusiasm of the moment attempted some excuse: it was affirmed that he had never ceased to love his country, in spite of her wrongs towards him, and that he had been compelled by the necessities of exile to serve men whom he detested, at the daily risk of his life¹. Such pretences, however, could not really impose upon any one. The treason of Alkibiadês during the period of his exile remained indefensible as well as undeniable, and would have been more than sufficient as a theme for his enemies, had their tongues been free. But his position was one altogether singular: having first inflicted on his country immense mischief, he had since rendered her valuable service, and promised to render still more. It is true, that the subsequent service was by no means adequate to the previous mischief: nor had it indeed been rendered exclusively by him, since the victories of Abydos and Kyzikus belong not less to Theramenês and Thrasybulus than to Alkibiadês²: moreover, the peculiar present or capital

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 4, 14-16.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 4. 15.

² This point is justly touched upon, more than once, by Cornelius Nepos—Vit. Alcibiad. c. 6—"quoniam Theramenês et Thrasybulus eisdem rebus profuerant." And again in the life of Thrasybulus (c. 1) "Primum Peloponnesiaco bello multa hic (Thrasybulus) sine Alcibiade gessit; ille nullam rem sine hoc."

which he had promised to bring with him—Persian alliance and pay to Athens—had proved a complete delusion. Still the Athenian arms had been eminently successful since his junction, and we may see that not merely common report, but even good judges such as Thucydides, ascribed this result to his superior energy and management.

Disposition to refrain from dwelling on his previous wrongs, and to give him a new trial.

Without touching upon these particulars, it is impossible fully to comprehend the very peculiar position of this returning exile before the Athenian people in the summer of 407 B.C. The more distant past exhibited him as among the worst of criminals—the recent past, as a valuable servant and patriot—the future promised continuance in this last character, so far as there were any positive indications to judge by. Now this was a case in which discussion and recrimination could not possibly answer any useful purpose. There was every reason for re-appointing Alkibiades to his command; but this could only be done under prohibition of censure on his past crimes, and provisional acceptance of his subsequent good deeds as justifying the hope of yet better deeds to come. The popular instinct felt this situation perfectly, and imposed absolute silence on his enemies¹. We are not to infer from hence that the people had forgotten the past deeds of Alkibiades, or that they entertained for him nothing but unqualified confidence and admiration. In their present very justifiable sentiment of hopefulness, they determined that he should have full scope for prosecuting his new and better career, if he chose; and that his enemies should be precluded from reviving the mention of an irreparable past, so as to shut the door against him. But what was thus interdicted to men's lips as unseasonable, was not effaced from their recollections; nor were the enemies, though silenced for the moment, rendered powerless for the future. All this train of combustible matter lay quiescent, ready to be fired by any future misconduct or negligence, perhaps even by blameless ill-success, on the part of Alkibiadēs.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 4, 20. λεχθέντων δὲ καὶ ἄλλων τιμωρῶν, ἐπὶ αὐτοῖς ἀνεπιπόντοις, διὰ τὸ μὴ ἀνασχέσθαι ἢ τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, &c.

At a juncture when so much depended upon his future behaviour, he showed (as we shall see presently) that he completely misinterpreted the temper of the people. Intoxicated by the unexpected triumph of his reception—according to that fatal susceptibility so common among distinguished Greeks—he forgot his own past history, and fancied that the people had forgotten and forgiven it also; construing their studied and well-advised silence into a proof of oblivion. He conceived himself in assured possession of public confidence, and looked upon his numerous enemies as if they no longer existed, because they were not allowed to speak at a most unseasonable hour. Without doubt, his exultation was shared by his friends, and this sense of false security proved his future ruin.

Two colleagues, recommended by Alkibiadēs himself—Adeimantus and Aristokratēs—were named by the people as generals of the hoplites to go out with him, in case of operations ashore¹. In less than three months, his armament was ready; but he designedly deferred his departure until that day of the month Boedromion (about the beginning of September) when the Eleusinian mysteries were celebrated, and when the solemn processional march of the crowd of communicants was wont to take place, along the Sacred Way from Athens to Eleusis. For seven successive years, ever since the establishment of Agis at Dekeleia, this march had been of necessity discontinued, and the procession had been transported by sea, to the omission of many of the ceremonial details. Alkibiadēs on this occasion caused the land-march to be renewed, in full pomp and solemnity; assembling all his troops in arms to protect, in case any attack should be made from Dekeleia. No such attack was hazarded; so that he had the satisfaction of reviving the full regularity of this illustrious scene, and escorting the numerous communicants out and home, without the smallest interruption;—an exploit gratifying to the religious feelings of the people, and imparting an acceptable sense of undiminished Athenian power; while in reference to his own reputation, it was especially politic, as serving to make his peace with the Eumolpidae and the Two Goddesses, on whose account he had been condemned¹.

Mistaken confidence and intoxication of Alkibiadēs.

He protects the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries by land, against the garrison of Dekeleia.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 4, 21. Both Diodorus (xiii. 69) and Cornelius Nepos (Vit. Alcib. c. 7) state Thraasybulus and Adeimantus as his col-

Immediately after the mysteries, he departed with his armament. It appears that Agis at Dekeleia, leagues: both state also that his colleagues were chosen on his recommendation. I follow Xenophon as to the names, and also as to the fact, that they were named as συνὴ γῆρ' ἀρπύγων.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 4, 20; Plutarch, Alkib. c. 34. Neither Diodorus nor Cornelius Nepos mentions this remarkable incident about the escort of the Eleusinian procession.

fruitless attempt of Agis to surprise
 Athens.

though he had not chosen to come out and attack Alkibiadês when posted to guard the Eleusinian procession, had nevertheless felt humiliated by the defiance offered to him. He shortly afterwards took advantage of the departure of this large force, to summon reinforcements from Peloponnesus and Bœotia, and attempt to surprise the walls of Athens on a dark night. If he expected any connivance within, the plot miscarried: alarm was given in time, so that the eldest and youngest hoplites were found at their posts to defend the walls. The assailants—said to have amounted to 28,000 men, of whom half were hoplites, with 1200 cavalry, 900 of them Bœotians—were seen on the ensuing day close under the walls of the city, which were amply manned with the full remaining strength of Athens. In an obstinate cavalry battle which ensued, the Athenians gained the advantage even over the Bœotians. Agis encamped the next night in the garden of Akadêmus; again on the morrow he drew up his troops and offered battle to the Athenians, who are affirmed to have gone forth in order of battle, but to have kept under the protection of the missiles from the walls, so that Agis did not dare to attack them¹. We may well doubt whether the Athenians went out at all, since they had been for years accustomed to regard themselves as inferior to the Peloponnesians in the field. Agis now withdrew, satisfied apparently with having offered battle, so as to efface the affront which he had received from the march of the Eleusinian communicants in defiance of his neighbourhood.

¹ Diodor. xiii. 72, 73.

B.C. 407.
Sept.,
Octob.

Alkibiadēs sails with an armament to Asia—ill-success at Andros—entire failure in respect to hopes from Persia.

The first exploit of Alkibiadēs was to proceed to Andros, now under a Lacedæmonian harmost and garrison. Landing on the island, he plundered the fields, defeated both the native troops and the Lacedæmonians, and forced them to shut themselves up within the town; which he besieged for some days without avail, and then proceeded onward to Samos, leaving Konon in a fortified post, with twenty ships, to prosecute the siege¹. At Samos he first ascertained the state of the Peloponnesian fleet at Ephesus—the influence acquired by Lysander over Cyrus—the strong anti-Athenian dispositions of the young prince—and the ample rate of pay, put down even in advance, of which the Peloponnesian seamen were now in actual receipt. He now first became convinced of the failure of those hopes which he had conceived, not without good reason, in the preceding year—and of which he had doubtless boasted at Athens; that the alliance of Persia might be neutralised at least, if not won over, through the envoys escorted to Susa by Pharnabazus. It was in vain that he prevailed upon Tissaphernēs to mediate with Cyrus, to introduce to him some Athenian envoys, and to inculcate upon him his own views of the true interests of Persia: that is, that the war should be fed and protracted so as to wear out both the Grecian belligerent parties, each by means of the other. Such a policy, uncongenial at all times to the vehement temper of Cyrus, had become yet more repugnant to him since his intercourse with Lysander. He would not consent even to see the envoys, nor was he probably displeased to put a slight upon a neighbour and rival satrap. Deep was the despondency among the Athenians at Samos, when painfully convinced that all hopes from Persia must be abandoned for themselves; and farther, that Persian pay was both more ample and better assured, to their enemies, than ever it had been before¹.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 4, 22—i. 5, 18; Plutarch, Alkib. c. 35; Diodor. xiii. 69. The latter says that Thrasybulus was left at Andros—which cannot be true.

Lysander had at Ephesus a fleet of ninety triremes, which he employed himself in repairing and augmenting, being still inferior in number to the Athenians. In vain did Alkibiadès attempt to provoke him out to a general action. This was much to the interest of the Athenians, apart from their superiority of number, since they were badly provided with money, and obliged to levy contributions wherever they could: but Lysander was resolved not to fight unless he could do so with advantage, and Cyrus, not afraid of sustaining the protracted expense of the war, had even enjoined upon him this cautious policy, with additional hopes of a Phœnician fleet to his aid,—which in his mouth was not intended to delude, as it had been by Tissaphernès². Unable to bring about a general battle, and having no immediate or capital enterprise to constrain his attention, Alkibiadès became careless, and abandoned himself partly to the love of pleasure, partly to reckless predatory enterprises for the purpose of getting money to pay his army. Thrasybulus had come from his post on the Hellespont and was now engaged in fortifying Phokæa, probably for the purpose of establishing a post to be enabled to pillage the interior. Here he was joined by Alkibiadès, who sailed across with a squadron, leaving his main fleet at Samos. He left it under the command of his favourite pilot Antiochus, but with express orders on no account to fight until his return.

Lysander at Ephesus—his cautious policy, refusing to fight—disappointment of Alkibiadès.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 5, 9; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 4. The latter tells us that the Athenian ships were presently emptied by the desertion of the seamen: a careless exaggeration.

² Plutarch, Lysand. c. 9. I venture to antedate the statements which he there makes, as to the encouragements from Cyrus to Lysander.

While employed in his visit to Phokæa and Klazomenæ, Alkibiadès, perhaps hard-pressed for money, conceived the unwarrantable project of enriching his men by the plunder of the neighbouring territory of Kymè, an allied dependency of Athens. Landing on this territory unexpectedly, after fabricating some frivolous calumnies against the Kymæans, he at first seized much property and a considerable number of prisoners. But the inhabitants assembled in arms, bravely defended their possessions, and repelled his men to their ships; recovering the plundered property, and lodging it in safety within their walls. Stung with this miscarriage, Alkibiadès sent for a reinforcement of hoplites from Mitylênê, and marched up to the walls of Kymè, where he in vain challenged the citizens to come forth and fight. He then ravaged the territory at pleasure; while the Kymæans had no other resource, except to send envoys to Athens, to complain of so gross an outrage inflicted by the Athenian general upon an unoffending Athenian dependency¹.

¹ Diodor. xiii. 73. I follow Diodorus in respect to this story about Kymè, which he probably copied from the Kymæan historian Ephorus. Cornelius Nepos (Alcib. c. 7) briefly glances at it.

Xenophon (Hellen. i. 5, 11) as well as Plutarch (Lycurg. c. 5) men-

Alkibiadès goes to Phokæa, leaving his fleet under the command of Antiochus—oppression by Alkibiadès at Kymè.

This was a grave charge, and not the only charge which Alkibiadès had to meet at Athens. During his absence at Phokæa and Kymè, Antiochus the pilot, whom he had left in command, disobeying the express order pronounced against fighting a battle, first sailed across from Samos to Notium, the harbour of Kolophon—and from thence to the mouth of the harbour of Ephesus, where the Peloponnesian fleet lay. Entering that harbour with his own ship and another, he passed close in front of the prows of the Peloponnesian triremes, insulting them scornfully and defying them to combat. Lysander detached some ships to pursue him, and an action gradually ensued, which was exactly that which Antiochus desired. But the Athenian ships were all in disorder, and came into battle as each of them separately could; while the Peloponnesian fleet was well-marshaled and kept in hand; so that the battle was all to the advantage of the latter. The Athenians, compelled to take flight, were pursued to Notium—losing fifteen triremes, several along with their full crews. Antiochus himself was slain. Before retiring to Ephesus, Lysander had the satisfaction of erecting his trophy on the shore of Notium; while the Athenian fleet was carried back to its station at Samos¹.

Complaints
of the Kymæans
at Athens
—defeat of Antiochus at Notium during the absence of Alkibiadès.

It was in vain that Alkibiadès, hastening back to Samos, mustered the entire Athenian fleet, sailed tion the visit of Alkibiadès to Thrasybulus at Phokæa. They do not name Kymè, however: according to them, the visit to Phokæa has no assignable purpose or consequences. But the plunder of Kymè is a circumstance both sufficiently probable in itself, and suitable to the occasion.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 5, 12-15; Diodor. xiii. 71; Plutarch, Alkib. c. 35; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 5.

to the mouth of the harbour of Ephesus, and there ranged his ships in battle order, challenging the enemy to come forth. Lysander would give him no opportunity of wiping off the late dishonour. And as an additional mortification to Athens, the Lacedæmonians shortly afterwards captured both Teos and Delphinium; the latter being a fortified post which the Athenians had held for the last three years in the island of Chios¹.

Dissatisfaction and complaint in the armament against Alkibiadès.

Even before the battle of Notium, it appears that complaints and dissatisfaction had been growing up in the armament against Alkibiadès. He had gone out with a splendid force, not inferior, in number of triremes and hoplites, to that which he had conducted against Sicily—and under large promises, both from himself and his friends, of achievements to come. Yet in a space of time which can hardly have been less than three months, not a single success had been accomplished; while, on the other side, there was to be reckoned, the disappointment on the score of Persia—which had great effect on the temper of the armament, and which, though not his fault, was contrary to expectations which he had held out—the disgraceful plunder of Kymè—and the defeat at Notium. It was true that Alkibiadès had given peremptory orders to Antiochus not to fight, and that the battle had been hazarded in flagrant disobedience to his injunctions. But this circumstance only raised new matter for dissatis-

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 5, 15; Diodor. xiii. 74.

I copy Diodorus, in putting Teos, pursuant to Weiske's note, in place of Eion, which appears in Xenophon. I copy the latter, however, in ascribing these captures to the year of Lysander, instead of to the year of Kallikratides.

faction, of a graver character. If Antiochus had been disobedient—if besides disobedience, he had displayed a childish vanity and an utter neglect of all military precautions—who was it that had chosen him for deputy; and that too against all Athenian precedent, putting the pilot, a paid officer of the ship, over the heads of the trierarchs who paid their pilots, and served at their own cost? It was Alkibiadēs who placed Antiochus in this grave and responsible situation: a personal favourite, an excellent convivial companion, but destitute of all qualities befitting a commander. And this turned attention on another point of the character of Alkibiadēs—his habits of excessive self-indulgence and dissipation. The loud murmurs of the camp charged him with neglecting the interests of the service for enjoyments with jovial parties and Ionian women, and with admitting to his confidence those who best contributed to the amusement of such chosen hours¹.

It was in the camp at Samos that this general indignation against Alkibiadēs first arose, and was from thence transmitted formally to Athens, by the mouth of Thrasybulus son of Thrason²—not the eminent Thrasybulus (son of Lykus) who has been already often mentioned in this history, and will be mentioned again. There came at the same time to Athens the complaints from Kymē, against the unprovoked aggression and plunder of that place by and accusation against him transmitted to Athens.

Murmur

¹ Plutarch, Alkib. c. 36. He recounts, in the tenth chapter of the same biography, an anecdote describing the manner in which Antiochus first won the favour of Alkibiadēs, then a young man; by catching a tame quail, which had escaped from his bosom.

² A person named Thrason is mentioned in the Choiseul Inscription (No. 147, p. 221, 222 of the Corp. Inscr. of Boeckh) as one of the Hellenotamias in the year 410 B.C. He is described by his Demos as Batades: he is probably enough the father of this Thrasybulus.

Alkibiadēs; and seemingly complaints from other places besides¹. It was even urged as accusation against him, that he was in guilty collusion to betray the fleet to Pharnabazus and the Lacedæmonians, and that he had already provided three strong forts in the Chersonese to retire to, so soon as this scheme should be ripe for execution.

Alteration of sentiment at Athens—displeasure of the Athenians against him.

Such grave and wide-spread accusations, coupled with the disaster at Notium, and the complete disappointment of all the promises of success—were more than sufficient to alter the sentiments of the people of Athens towards Alkibiadēs. He had no character to fall back upon; or rather, he had a character worse than none—such as to render the most criminal imputations of treason not intrinsically improbable. The comments of his enemies, which had been forcibly excluded from public discussion during his summer visit to Athens, were now again set free; and all the adverse recollections of his past life doubtless revived. The people had refused to listen to these, in order that he might have a fair trial, and might verify the title, claimed for him by his friends, to be judged only by his

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 5, 16-17. 'Ἀλκιβιάδης μὲν οὖν, ποιητὴς καὶ ἐν τῇ στρατιῇ φερόμενος, &c. Diodor. xiii. 73. ἐγένοντο δὲ καὶ ἄλλαι πολλαὶ διαβολαὶ κατ' αὐτοῦ, &c.

Plutarch, Alkibi. c. 36.

One of the remaining speeches of Lysias (Orat. xxi. Ἀπολογία Δαιμονόδοκου) is delivered by the trierarch in this fleet, on board of whose ship Alkibiadēs himself chose to sail. This trierarch complains of Alkibiadēs as having been a most uncomfortable and troublesome companion (sect. 7). His testimony on the point is valuable; for there seems no disposition here to make out any case against Alkibiadēs. The trierarch notices the fact, that Alkibiadēs preferred his trireme, simply as a proof that it was the best equipped, or among the best equipped, of the whole fleet. Archestratus and Erasinidēs preferred it afterwards, for the same reason.

subsequent exploits, achieved since the year 411 B.C. He had now had his trial; he had been found wanting; and the popular confidence, which had been provisionally granted to him, was accordingly withdrawn.

It is not just to represent the Athenian people (however Plutarch and Cornelius Nepos may set before us this picture) as having indulged an extravagant and unmeasured confidence in Alkibiadēs in the month of July, demanding of him more than man could perform—and as afterwards in the month of December passing, with childish abruptness, from confidence into wrathful displeasure, because their own impossible expectations were not already realized. That the people entertained large expectations, from so very considerable an armament, cannot be doubted: the largest of all, probably (as in the instance of the Sicilian expedition), were those entertained by Alkibiadēs himself, and promulgated by his friends. But we are not called upon to determine what the people would have done, had Alkibiadēs, after performing all the duties of a faithful, skilful, and enterprising commander, nevertheless failed, from obstacles beyond his own control, in realising their hopes and his own promises. No such case occurred: that which did occur was materially different. Besides the absence of grand successes, he had farther been negligent and reckless in his primary duties—he had exposed the Athenian arms to defeat, by his disgraceful selection of an unworthy lieutenant¹—he had violated the territory and property of an allied dependency,

Reasonable grounds of such alteration and displeasure.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 5, 16. Οἱ Ἀθηναῖοι, διὰ ἡγγελάθῃ ἢ ταγμαχία, at a moment when Athens had a paramount interest in cultivating by every means the attachment of her remaining allies. The truth is, as I have before remarked, that he had really been spoiled by the intoxicating reception given to him so unexpectedly in the city. He had mistaken a hopeful public, determined, even by forced silence as to the past, to give him the full benefit of a meritorious future, but requiring as condition from him that that future should really be meritorious—for a public of assured admirers, whose favour he had already earned and might consider as his own. He became an altered man after that visit, like Miltiadēs after the battle of Marathon; or rather, the impulses of a character essentially dissolute and insolent, broke loose from that restraint under which they had before been partially controlled. At the time of the battle of Kyzikus—when Alkibiadēs was labouring to regain the favour of his injured countrymen and was yet uncertain whether he should succeed—he would not have committed the fault of quitting his fleet and leaving it under the command of a lieutenant like χάλεπας εἶχον τῷ Ἀλκιβιάδῃ, οἵμους δὲ ἀμείλιαν τε καὶ ἀειρόμενον ἀνταλκιδέου τοῦ καί.

The expression which Thucydides employs in reference to Alkibiadēs requires a few words of comment: (vi. 15)—καὶ δημοσίᾳ κρᾶτισσα διαβίοντα τὸ τοῦ πολέμου, ἰδίᾳ ἴσασιν τοῖς ἐπιτηδεύμασι αὐτοῦ ἀχθεσθῆναι, καὶ ἄλλοις ἐπιτρέψαντες (the Athenians), οὐδ' αὖ μισροῦ ἐσφάλαν τὸν πόλεον.

The "strenuous and effective prosecution of warlike business" here ascribed to Alkibiadēs, is true of all the period between his exile and his last visit to Athens (about September B.C. 415 to September B.C. 407). During the first four years of that time, he was very effective against Athens; during the last four, very effective in her service.

But the assertion is certainly not true of his last command, which ended with the battle of Notium; nor is it more than partially true (at least, it is an exaggeration of the truth) for the period before his exile.

Antiochus. If therefore Athenian sentiment towards Alkibiadēs underwent an entire change during the autumn of 407 B.C., this was in consequence of an alteration in his character and behaviour; an alteration for the worse, just at the crisis when everything turned upon his good conduct, and upon his deserving at least, if he could not command, success.

We may indeed observe that the faults of Nikias before Syracuse and in reference to the coming of Gylippus, were far graver and more mischievous than those of Alkibiadēs during this turning-season of his career—and the disappointment of antecedent hopes at least equal. Yet while these faults and disappointment brought about the dismissal and disgrace of Alkibiadēs, they did not induce the Athenians to dismiss Nikias, though himself desiring it,—nor even prevent them from sending him a second armament to be ruined along with the first. The contrast is most instructive, as demonstrating upon what points durable esteem in Athens turned; how long the most melancholy public incompetency could remain overlooked, when covered by piety, decorum, good intentions, and high station¹; how short-lived was the ascendancy of a man far superior in ability and energy, besides an equal station—when his moral qualities and antecedent life were such as to provoke fear and hatred in many, esteem from none.

Different
behaviour towards Nikias and towards Alkibiadēs.

¹ To meet the case of Nikias, it would be necessary to take the converse of the judgement of Thucydides respecting Alkibiadēs, cited in my last note, and to say—καὶ δημοσίᾳ κακίοντα δοθέντα τὰ τοῦ πολέμου, ἴδιᾳ ἔσονται τὰ ἐπιτηδεύματα αὐτοῦ ἀγασσόμενοι, καὶ αὐτῷ ἐντρέψαντες, οὐδὲν μικρὸν ἰσχυρότερον τοῦ πολέμου.

The reader will of course understand that those last Greek words are not an actual citation, but a transfiguration of the actual words of Thucydides, for the purpose of illustrating the contrast between Alkibiadēs and Nikias.

Yet on the whole, Nikias, looking at him as a public servant, was far more destructive to his country than Alkibiadēs. The mischief done to Athens by the latter was done chiefly in the avowed service of her enemies.

Alkibiadēs is dismissed from his command—ten generals named to succeed him—he retires to the Chersonese.

On hearing the news of the defeat of Notium and the accumulated complaints against Alkibiadēs, the Athenians simply voted that he should be dismissed from his command; naming ten new generals to replace him. He was not brought to trial, nor do we know whether any such step was proposed. Yet his proceedings at Kymē, if they happened as we read them, richly deserved judicial animadversion; and the people, had they so dealt with him, would only have acted up to the estimable function ascribed to them by the oligarchical Phrynichus—"of serving as refuge to their dependent allies, and chastising the high-handed oppressions of the optimates against them¹." In the perilous position of Athens, however, with reference to the foreign war, such a political trial would have been productive of much dissension and mischief. And Alkibiadēs avoided the question by not coming to Athens. As soon as he heard of his dismissal, he retired immediately from the army to his own fortified posts on the Chersonese.

Konon and his colleagues—capture and liberation of the Rhodian Dorians by the Athenians.

The ten new generals named were, Konon, Diomedon, Leon, Periklēs, Erasinidēs, Aristokratēs, Archedestratus, Protomachus, Thrasyllus, Aristogenēs. Of these, Konon was directed to proceed forthwith from Andros, with the twenty ships which he had

¹ Thucyd. viii. 48. τὰς δὲ ἡμῶν, σφῶν τε (of the allied dependencies) καταφρονεῖν, καὶ ἐκείνων (i. e. of the high persons called σαλκοῦργαδοὶ or optimates) ἀσφραγιστῆν.

there, to receive the fleet from Alkibiadēs; while Phanosthenēs proceeded with four triremes to replace Konon at Andros¹.

In his way thither, Phanosthenēs fell in with Dorieus the Rhodian and two Thurian triremes, which he captured with every man aboard. The captives were sent to Athens, where all were placed in custody (in case of future exchange) except Dorieus himself. The latter had been condemned to death and banished from his native city of Rhodes, together with his kindred; probably on the score of political disaffection, at the time when Rhodes was a member of the Athenian alliance. Having since then become a citizen of Thuriæ, he had served with distinction in the fleet of Mindarus both at Milētus and the Hellespont. The Athenians now had so much compassion upon him, that they released him at once and unconditionally, without even demanding a ransom or an equivalent. By what particular circumstance their compassion was determined, forming a pleasing exception to the melancholy habits which pervaded Grecian warfare in both belligerents—we should never have learnt from the meagre narrative of Xenophon. But we ascertain from other sources, that Dorieus (the son of Diagoras of Rhodes) was illustrious beyond all other Greeks for his victories in the pankration at the Olympic, Isthmian, and Nemean festivals—that he had gained the first prize at three Olympic festivals in succession (of which Olympiad 88 or 428 B.C. was the second), a distinction altogether without precedent, besides 8 Isthmian and 7 Nemean prizes—that his father Diagoras, his brothers, and his cousins were all celebrated as successful athletes—lastly, that the family were illustrious from old date in their native island of Rhodes, and were even descended from the Messenian hero Aristomenès. When the Athenians saw before them as their prisoner a man doubtless of magnificent stature and presence (as we may conclude from his athletic success), and surrounded by such a halo of glory impressive in the highest degree to Grecian imagination—the feelings and usages of war were at once overruled. Though Dorieus had been one of their most vehement enemies, they could not bear either to touch his person, or to exact from him any condition. Released by them on this occasion, he lived to be put to death, about thirteen years afterwards, by the Lacedæmonians¹.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 5, 18; Diodor. xiii. 74.

When Konon reached Samos to take the command, he found the armament in a state of great despondency; not merely from the dishonourable affair of Notium, but also from disappointed hopes connected with Alkibiadès, and from difficulties in procuring regular pay. So painfully was the last inconvenience felt, that the first measure of Konon was to contract the numbers of the armament from above 100 triremes to 70; and to reserve for the diminished fleet all the abler seamen of the larger. With this fleet, he and his colleagues roved about the enemies' coasts to collect plunder and pay².

Apparently about the same time that Konon superseded Alkibiadès (that is, about December 407 B.C. or January 406 B.C.), the year of Lysander's command expired, and Kallikratidas arrived from ¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 5, 19; Pausan. vi. 7, 2.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 5, 20; compare i. 6, 16; Diodor. xiii. 77.

Sparta to replace him. His arrival was received with undisguised dissatisfaction by the leading Lacedæmonians in the armament, by the chiefs in the Asiatic cities, and by Cyrus. Now was felt the full influence of those factious correspondences and intrigues which Lysander had established with all of them, for indirectly working out the perpetuity of his own command. While loud complaints were heard of the impolicy of Sparta in annually changing her admiral—both Cyrus and the rest concurred with Lysander in throwing difficulties in the way of the new successor.

Kallikratidas superseded Lysander—his noble
character,

Kallikratidas, unfortunately only shown by the Fates¹ and not suffered to continue in the Grecian world, was one of the noblest characters of his age. Besides perfect courage, energy, and incorruptibility, he was distinguished for two qualities, both of them very rare among eminent Greeks; entire straightforwardness of dealing—and a Pan-hellenic patriotism alike comprehensive, exalted, and merciful. Lysander handed over to him nothing but an empty purse; having repaid to Cyrus all the money remaining in his possession, under pretence that it had been confided to himself personally².

¹ Virgil, Æneid, vi. 870.

Ostendent terris hunc tantum fata, neque ultra Esse siliunt.

² How completely this repayment was a manoeuvre for the purpose of crippling his successor—and not an act of genuine and conscientious obligation to Cyrus, as Mr. Mitford represents it—we may see by the conduct of Lysander at the close of the war. He then carried away with him to Sparta all the residuum of the triantes from Cyrus which he had in his possession, instead of giving them back to Cyrus (Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 8). The obligation to give them back to Cyrus was greater at the end of the war than it was at the time when Kallikra-

Moreover, on delivering up the fleet to Kallikratidas at Ephesus, he made boast of delivering to him at the same time the mastery of the sea, through the victory recently gained at Notium. "Conduct the fleet from Ephesus along the coast of Samos, passing by the Athenian station (replied Kallikratidas), and give it up to me at Milétus: I shall then believe in your mastery of the sea." Lysander had nothing else to say, except that he should give himself no farther trouble, now that his command had been transferred to another.

Kallikratidas soon found that the leading Lacedæmonians in the fleet, gained over to the interests of his predecessor, openly murmured at his arrival, and secretly obstructed all his measures; upon which he summoned them together, and said: "I for my part am quite content to remain at home; and if Lysander or any one else pretends to be a better admiral than I am, I have nothing to say against it. But sent here as I am by the authorities at Sparta to command the fleet, I have no choice except to execute their orders in the best way that I can. You now know how far my ambition reaches¹; you know also the murmurs which are abroad against our common city (for her frequent change of admirals). Look to it, and give me your opinion—Shall I stay where I am—or shall I go home, and communicate what has happened here?"

This remonstrance, alike pointed and dignified, tidas came out, and when war was still going on; for the war was a joint business, which the Persians and the Spartans had sworn to prosecute by common efforts.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 5. ἡμεῖς δὲ, πρὸς ἃ ἐγὼ τι φιλοτιμούμαι, καὶ ἡ πόλις ἡμῶν αἰτιάσεται (τοτε γὰρ αὐτὰ, ὡς περ καὶ ἐγὼ) συμβουλεύετε, &c.

Murmurs and ill-will against Kallikra-tidās—energy and rectitude whereby he represses
them.

produced its full effect. Every one replied, that it was his duty to stay and undertake the command. The murmurs and cabals were from that moment discontinued.

His next embarrassments arose from the manoeuvre of Lysander in paying back to Cyrus all the funds from whence the continuous pay of the army was derived. Of course this step was admirably calculated to make every one regret the alteration of command. Kallikratidas, who had been sent out without funds, in full reliance on the unexhausted supply from Sardis, now found himself compelled to go thither in person and solicit a renewal of the bounty. But Cyrus, eager to manifest in every way his partiality for the last admiral, deferred receiving him,—first for two days, then for a farther interval, until the patience of Kallikratidas was wearied out, so that he left Sardis in disgust without an interview. So intolerable to his feelings was the humiliation of thus begging at the palace gates, that he bitterly deplored those miserable dissensions among the Greeks which constrained both parties to truckle to the foreigner for money; swearing that if he survived the year's campaign, he would use every possible effort to bring about an accommodation between Athens and Sparta¹.

In the meantime, he put forth all his energy to obtain money in some other way, and thus get the fleet to sea; knowing well, that the way to overcome the reluctance of Cyrus was, to show that he could do without him. Sailing first from Ephesus to Milétus, he despatched from thence a small squadron to Sparta, disclosing his unexpected poverty,

His spirited
behaviour
in regard to the Persians.

His appeal to the Atle-sians—
Pan-hellenic feelings.

and asking for speedy pecuniary aid. In the meantime he convoked an assembly of the Milesians, communicated to them the mission just sent to Sparta, and asked from them a temporary supply until this money should arrive. He reminded them that the necessity of this demand sprang altogether from the manœuvre of Lysander in paying back the funds in his hands:—that he had already in vain applied to Cyrus for farther money, meeting only with such insulting neglect as could no longer be endured: that they (the Milesians), dwelling amidst the Persians, and having already experienced the maximum of ill-usage at their hands, ought now to be foremost in the war, and to set an example of zeal to the other allies¹, in order to get clear the sooner from dependence upon such imperious task-masters. He promised that when the remittance from Sparta and the hour of success should arrive, he would richly requite their forwardness. "Let us, with the aid of the Gods, show these foreigners (he concluded) that we can punish our enemies without worshiping them."

The spectacle of this generous patriot struggling against a degrading dependence on the foreigner, which was now becoming unhappily familiar to the leading Greeks of both sides—excites our warm sympathy and admiration. We may add, that his language to the Milesians, reminding them of the misery which they had endured from the Persians as a motive to exertion in the war—is full of instruction as to the new situation opened for the Asiatic

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 9. ἡμῶν δὲ ἐν τῷ ἀγῶνι προθυμώμενοι εἶναι ἐς τὸν πόλεμον, διὰ τὸ ἀκούειν ἐκ βαρβάρων πλεονεξίαν καὶ ἥδον ἐν αὐτῶν ἐνδοθῆναι.

Greeks since the breaking up of the Athenian power. No such evils had they suffered while Athens was competent to protect them, and while they were willing to receive protection from her—during the interval of more than fifty years between the complete organization of the confederacy of Delos and the disaster of Nikias before Syracuse.

The single-hearted energy of Kallikratidas imposed upon all who heard him, and even inspired so much alarm to those leading Milesians who were playing underhand the game of Lysander, that they were the first to propose a large grant of money towards the war, and to offer considerable sums from their own purses; an example probably soon followed by other allied cities. Some of the friends of Lysander tried to couple their offers with conditions; demanding a warrant for the destruction of their political enemies, and hoping thus to compromise the new admiral. But he strenuously refused all such guilty compliances¹. He was soon able to collect at Milétus fifty fresh triremes in addition to those left by Lysander, making a fleet of 140 sail in all. The Chians having furnished him with an outfit of five drachmas for each seaman (equal to ten days' pay at the usual rate), he sailed with the whole fleet northward towards Lesbos. Of this numerous fleet, the greatest which had yet been assembled throughout the war, only ten triremes were Lacedæmonian²; while a considerable proportion, and among the best equipped, were Bceotian and Eubœan³. In his voyage towards Lesbos, Kalli-

B.C. 406.

He fits out a commanding fleet—his success at Lesbos—he liberates the captives and the Athenian garrison at Methymna.

¹ Plutarch, Apophthegm. Laconic. p. 222 C; Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 12.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 34.

³ Diodor. xiii. 92.

kratidas seems to have made himself master of Phokæa and Kymê¹, perhaps with the greater facility in consequence of the recent ill-treatment of the Kymæans by Alkibiadês. He then sailed to attack Methymna, on the northern coast of Lesbos; a town not only strongly attached to the Athenians, but also defended by an Athenian garrison. Though at first repulsed, he renewed his attacks until at length he took the town by storm. The property in it was all plundered by the soldiers, and the slaves collected and sold for their benefit. It was farther demanded by the allies, and expected pursuant to ordinary custom, that the Methymnæan and Athenian prisoners should be sold also. But Kallikratidas peremptorily refused compliance, and set them all free the next day; declaring, that so long as he was in command, not a single free Greek should be reduced to slavery if he could prevent it².

Noble character of this proceeding—exalted Pan-hellenic patriotism of Kallikratidas.

No one, who has not familiarized himself with the details of Grecian warfare, can feel the full grandeur and sublimity of this proceeding—which stands, so far as I know, unparalleled in Grecian history. It is not merely that the prisoners were spared and set free: as to that point, analogous cases may be found, though not very frequent. It is, that this particular act of generosity was performed in the name and for the recommendation of Pan-Hellenic brotherhood and Pan-Hellenic independence of the foreigner : a comprehensive principle, announced by Kallikratidas on previous occasions as well as on this, but now carried into practice under emphatic circumstances, and coupled with an explicit declaration of his resolution to abide by it in all future cases. It is, lastly, that the step was taken in resistance to formal requisition on the part of his allies, whom he had very imperfect means either of paying or controlling, and whom therefore it was so much the more hazardous for him to offend. There cannot be any doubt that these allies felt personally wronged and indignant at the loss, as well as confounded with the proposition of a rule of duty so new as respected the relations of belligerents in Greece ; against which too (let us add) their murmurs would not be without some foundation—" If we should come to be Konon's prisoners, he will not treat us in this manner." Reciprocity of dealing is absolutely essential to constant moral observance, either public or private ; and doubtless Kallikratidas felt a well-grounded confidence, that two or three conspicuous examples would sensibly modify the future practice on both sides. But some one must begin by setting such examples, and the man who does begin—having a position which gives reasonable chance that others will follow—is the hero. An admiral like Lysander would not only sympathise heartily with the complaints of the allies, but also condemn the proceeding as a dereliction of duty to Sparta : even men better than Lysander would at first look coldly on it as a sort of Quixotism, in doubt whether the example would be copied: while the Spartan Ephors, though probably tolerating it because they interfered very sparingly with their admirals afloat, would certainly have little sympathy with the feelings in which it originated. So much the rather is Kallikratidas to be admired, as bringing out with him not only a Pan-Hellenic patriotism¹ rare either at Athens or Sparta, but also a force of individual character and conscience yet rarer—enabling him to brave unpopularity and break through routine, in the attempt to make that patriotism fruitful and operative in practice. In his career, so sadly and prematurely closed, there was at least this circumstance to be envied: that the capture of Methymna afforded him the opportunity, which he greedily seized as if he had known that it would be the last, of putting in act and evidence the full aspirations of his magnanimous soul.

¹ I infer this from the fact, that at the period of the battle of Arginusæ, both these towns appear as adhering to the Peloponnesians; whereas during the command of Alkibiadês they had been both Athenian (Xenoph. Hellen. i. 5, 11; i. 6, 33; Diodor. xiii. 73-99).

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 14. Καὶ καλευόντων τῶν ἐν τῇ πόλει ἀποδοῦναι καὶ τοῖς Μεθυμνίαις, οὐκ ἐφ' αὐτοῦ γὰρ ἄρχοντος αἰδέσθαι Ἕλληνας εἰς πωλείαν ἀναγκάσειν δεδραμένους.

Compare a later declaration of Agesilaus, substantially to the same purpose, yet delivered under circumstances far less emphatic—in Xenoph. Agesilaus, vii. 6.

Kallikratidas sent word by the released prisoners to Konon that he would presently put an end to his adulterous intercourse with the sea²; which he now considered as his wife and lawfully appertaining to him, having 140 triremes against the 70 triremes of Konon. That admiral, in spite of his inferior numbers, had advanced near to Methymna to try and relieve it; but finding the place already captured, had retired to the islands called Hekatonnêsoi,

He blocks up Konon
and the Athenian fleet at Mitylênê.

¹ The sentiment of Kallikratidas deserved the designation of ἑλληνοφιλία πολέμου—far more than that of Nikias, to which Plutarch applies those words (Compar. of Nikias and Crassus, c. 2).

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 15. Κόνων ἐλπίσας, ὅτι ναῖον ἐνὶ πρυμνήνῃ τῇ δολιχέρει, &c. He could hardly say this to Konon, in any other way than through the Athenian prisoners.

off the continent bearing north-east from Lesbos. Thither he was followed by Kallikratidas, who, leaving Methymna at night, found him quitting his moorings at break of day, and immediately made all sail to try and cut him off from the southerly course towards Samos. But Konon, having diminished the number of his triremes from 100 to 70, had been able to preserve all the best rowers, so that in speed he outran Kallikratidas and entered first the harbour of Mitylênê. His pursuers however were close behind, and even got into the harbour along with him, before it could be closed and put in a state of defence. Constrained to fight a battle at its entrance, he was completely defeated: thirty of his ships were taken, though the crews escaped to land; and he preserved the remaining forty only by hauling them ashore under the wall¹.

The town of Mitylênê, originally founded on a small islet off Lesbos, had afterwards extended across a narrow strait to Lesbos itself. By this strait (whether bridged over or not we are not informed), the town was divided into two portions, and had two harbours, one opening northward towards the Hellespont, the other southward towards the promon-

Triumphant position of Kallikratidas.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 17; Diodor. xiii. 78, 79.

Here, as on so many other occasions, it is impossible to blend these two narratives together. Diodorus conceives the facts in a manner quite different from Xenophon, and much less probable. He tells us that Konon practised a stratagem during his flight (the same in Polyænus, i. 482), whereby he was enabled to fight with and defeat the foremost Peloponnesian ships before the rest came up; also, that he got into the harbour in time to put it into a state of defence before Kallikratidas came up. Diodorus then gives a prolix description of the battle by which Kallikratidas forced his way in.

The narrative of Xenophon, which I have followed, plainly implies that Konon could have had no time to make preparations for defending the harbour.

tory of Kanê on the mainland¹. Both these harbours were undefended, and both now fell into the occupation of the Peloponnesian fleet; at least all the outer portion of each, near to the exit of the harbour, which Kallikratidas kept under strict watch. He at the same time sent for the full forces of Methymna and for hoplites across from Chios, so as to block up Mitylênê by land as well as by sea. As soon as his success was announced, too, money for the fleet (together with separate presents for himself, which he declined receiving²) was immediately sent to him by Cyrus; so that his future operations became easy.

Hopeless condition of Konon—his stratagem to send news to Athens and entreat relief.

No preparations had been made at Mitylênê for a siege: no stock of provisions had been accumulated, and the crowd within the walls was so considerable, that Konon foresaw but too plainly the speedy exhaustion of his means. Nor could he expect succour from Athens, unless he could send intelligence thither of his condition; of which, as he had not been able to do so, the Athenians remained altogether ignorant. All his ingenuity was required to get a trireme safe out of the harbour, in the face of the enemy's guard. Putting afloat two triremes, the best sailers in his fleet, and picking

¹ Thucyd. iii. 6; τοὺς ἐφύλακτους ἐπ' ἀμφοτέρωσι τοῖς λιμένεσσι ἐποιεῖντο.—(Strabo, xiii. p. 617). Xenophon talks only of the harbour, as if it were one; and possibly, in very inaccurate language, it might be described as one harbour with two entrances. It seems to me, however, that Xenophon had no clear idea of the locality.

Strabo speaks of the northern harbour as defended by a mole—the southern harbour, as defended by triremes chained together. Such defences did not exist in the year 406 B.C. Probably, after the revolt of Mitylênê in 427 B.C., the Athenians had removed what defences might have been before provided for the harbour.

² Ptolemy, Apophth. Laconie, p. 222 F.

out the best rowers for them out of all the rest, he caused these rowers to go aboard before daylight, concealing the Epibatae or maritime soldiers in the interior of the vessel (instead of the deck, which was their usual place), with a moderate stock of provisions, and keeping the vessel still covered with hides or sails, as was customary with vessels hauled ashore to protect them against the sun¹. These two triremes were thus made ready to depart at a moment's notice, without giving any indication to the enemy that they were so. They were fully manned before daybreak, the crews remained in their position all day, and after dark were taken out to repose. This went on for four days successively, no favourable opportunity having occurred to give the signal for attempting a start. At length, on the fifth day, about noon, when many of the Peloponnesian crews were ashore for their morning meal, and others were reposing, the moment seemed

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 19. Καθελκίσας (Konon) τὰς νῆας τὰς ἀριστα πλεούσας δύο, ἐκλήρωσεν ἀπὸ ἡμῶν, ἐξ ἀπασι τῶν πῶς τοῖς ἀρίστοις ἰρέταις ἐκλίσας, καὶ τοὺς ἐπιβάτας ἐν κοίλῃ τῇ αὐτῇ μεταβιβάζει, καὶ τὰ παραβύματα παραβαλὼν.

The meaning of παραβύματα is very uncertain. The commentators give little instruction; nor can we be sure that the same thing is meant as is expressed by παραβλήματα (infra, ii. 1, 22). We may be quite sure that the matters meant by παραβύματα were something which, if visible at all to a spectator without, would at least afford no indication that the trireme was intended for a speedy start; otherwise, they would defeat the whole contrivance of Konon, whose aim was secrecy. It was essential that this trireme, though afloat, should be made to look as much as possible like the other triremes which still remained hauled ashore; in order that the Peloponnesians might not suspect any purpose of departure. I have endeavoured in the text to give a meaning which answers this purpose, without forsaking the explanations given by the commentators: see Boeckh, Ueber das Attische See-Wesen, ch. x. p. 159.

favourable, the signal was given, and both the triremes started at the same moment with their utmost speed; one to go out at the southern entrance towards the sea between Lesbos and Chios—the other to depart by the northern entrance towards the Hellespont. Instantly the alarm was given among the Peloponnesian fleet: the cables were cut, the men hastened aboard, and many triremes were put in motion to overtake the two runaways. That which departed southward, in spite of the most strenuous efforts, was caught towards evening and brought back with all her crew prisoners: that which went towards the Hellespont escaped, rounded the northern coast of Lesbos, and got safe with the news to Athens; sending intelligence also, seemingly, in her way, to the Athenian admiral Diomedon at Samos.

The latter immediately made all haste to the aid of Konon, with the small force which he had with him, no more than twelve triremes. The two harbours being both guarded by a superior force, he tried to get access to Mitylênê through the Euripus, a strait which opens on the southern coast of the island into an interior lake or bay, approaching near to the town. But here he was attacked suddenly by Kallikratidas, and his squadron all captured except two triremes, his own and another: he himself had great difficulty in escaping¹.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 22. Διομέδων δὲ βοηθῶν Κόνωνι πολὺν χρόνον ἐλάσας αὐτοῦ ἀρπάζειν ἐς τὴν εἰρήνην τῆς Μιτυληναίων.

The reader should look at a map of Lesbos, to see what is meant by the Euripus of Mitylênê—and the other Euripus of the neighbouring town of Pyrrha.

Diodorus (xiii. 79) confounds the Euripus of Mitylênê with the harbour of Mitylênê, with which it is quite unconnected. Schneider and Plehn seem to make the same confusion (see Plehn, Lesbica, p. 15).

Athens was all in consternation at the news of the defeat of Konon and the blockade of Mitylênê. The whole strength and energy of the city was put forth to relieve him, by an effort greater than any which had been made throughout the whole war. We read with surprise that within the short space of thirty days, a fleet of no less than 110 triremes was fitted out and sent from Peiræus. Every man of age and strength to serve, without distinction, was taken to form a good crew: not only freemen, but slaves, to whom manumission was promised as reward: many also of the Horsemen or Knights' and citizens of highest rank went aboard as Epibatæ, hanging up their bridles like Kimon before the battle of Salamis. The levy was in fact as democratical and as equalising as it had been on that memorable occasion. The fleet proceeded straight to Samos, whither orders had doubtless been sent to get together all the triremes which the allies could furnish as reinforcements, as well as all the scattered Athenian. By this means, forty additional triremes (ten of them Samian) were assembled, and the whole fleet, 150 sail, went from Samos to the little islands called Arginusæ, close on the mainland, opposite to Malea the south-eastern cape of Lesbos.

Kallikratidas, apprised of the approach of the new fleet while it was yet at Samos, withdrew the greater portion of his force from Mitylênê, leaving fifty triremes under Eteonikus to continue the blockade. Less than fifty probably would not have been sufficient, inasmuch as two harbours were to be watched; but he was thus reduced to meet the n.c. 406, July.

Prodigious effort of the Athenians to relieve Konon—large Athenian fleet equipped and sent to Arginusæ.

Kallikratidas withdraws most of his fleet from Mitylênê, leaving Eteonikus to continue the blockade.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 24-25; Diodor. xiii. 97.

Athenian fleet with inferior numbers—120 triremes against 150. His fleet was off Cape Malea, where the crews took their suppers, on the same evening as the Athenians supped at the opposite islands of Arginuse. It was his project to sail across the intermediate channel in the night and attack them in the morning before they were prepared; but violent wind and rain forced him to defer all movement till daylight. On the ensuing morning both parties prepared for the greatest naval encounter which had taken place throughout the whole war. Kallikrati-das was advised by his pilot, the Megarian Hermon, to retire for the present without fighting, inasmuch as the Athenian fleet had the advantage of thirty triremes over him in number. He replied that flight was disgraceful, and that Sparta would be no worse off, even if he should perish¹. The answer was one congenial to his chivalrous nature; and we may well conceive, that having for the last two or three months been lord and master of the sea, he recollected his own haughty message to Konon, and thought it dishonour to incur or deserve, by retiring, the like taunt upon himself. We may remark too that the disparity of numbers, though serious, was by no means such as to render the contest hopeless, or to serve as a legitimate ground for retreat to one who prided himself on a full measure of Spartan courage.

The Athenian fleet was so marshaled, that its great strength was placed in the two wings; in each of which there were sixty Athenian ships, divided into four equal divisions, each division commanded by a general. Of the four squadrons of fifteen ships each, two were placed in front, two to support them in the rear. Aristokratēs and Diomedon commanded the two front squadrons of the left division, Periklēs and Erasinidēs the two squadrons in the rear: on the right division, Protomachus and Thrasyllus commanded the two in front, Lysias and Aristogenēs the two in the rear. The centre, wherein were the Samians and other allies, was left weak and all in single line: it appears to have been exactly in front of one of the isles of Arginusæ, while the two other divisions were to the right and left of that isle. We read with some surprise that the whole Lacedæmonian fleet was arranged by single ships, because it sailed better and manœuvred better than the Athenians; who formed their right and left divisions in deep order, for the express purpose of hindering the enemy from performing the nautical manœuvres of the diekplus and the *periplus*¹. It would seem that the Athenian centre, having the land immediately in its rear, was supposed to be better protected against an enemy "sailing through the line out to the rear and sailing round about" than the other divisions, which were in the open waters; for which reason it was left weak, with the ships in single line. But the fact which strikes us the most is, that if we turn back to the beginning of the war, we shall find that this diekplus and periplus were the special manœuvres of the Athenian navy, and continued to be so even down to the siege of Syracuse; the Lacedæmonians being at first absolutely unable to perform them at all, and continuing for a long time to perform them far less skilfully than the Athenians. Now, the comparative value of both parties is reversed: the superiority of nautical skill has passed to the Peloponnesians and their allies: the precautions whereby that superiority is neutralized or evaded, are forced as a necessity on the Athenians. How astonished would the Athenian admiral Phormion have been, if he could have witnessed the fleets and the order of battle at Arginusæ!

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 32; Diodor. xiii. 97, 98—the latter reports terrific omens beforehand for the generals.

The answer has been a memorable one, more than once adverted to—Plutarch, Laconic. Apophthegm. p. 832; Cicero, De Offic. i. 24.

The two fleets marshaled for battle. Comparative nautical skill, reversed since the beginning of the war.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 31. Οὕτω δ' ἐτάχθησαν (οἱ Ἀθηναῖοι) ἵνα μὴ διάκλων διδοῖεν χεῖρος γὰρ ἔπλεον. Αἱ δὲ τῶν Λακεδαιμονίων ἀνταγωνίσματα ἦσαν ἅπαντα ἐπὶ μίᾳ, ὥς πρὸς διάκλων ἐπὶ περιπλῶν πυροσπυαγμῶν, διὰ τὸ βέλτιον κλεῖν.

Contrast this with Thucyd. ii. 84-89 (the speech of Phormion), iv. 12, vii. 36.

Battle of Arginusæ
—defeat of the Lacedæmonians
—death of Kallikratidas.

Kallikratidas himself, with the ten Lacedæmonian ships, was on the right of his fleet: on the left were the Boeotians and Eubœans, under the Boeotian admiral Thrasondas. The battle was long and obstinately contested, first by the two fleets in their original order; afterwards, when all order was broken, by scattered ships mingled together and contending in individual combat. At length the brave Kallikratidas perished. His ship was in the act of driving against the ship of an enemy, and he himself probably (like Brasidas¹ at Pylus) had planted himself on the forecastle, to be the first in boarding the enemy or in preventing the enemy from boarding him—when the shock, arising from impact, threw him off his footing, so that he fell overboard and was drowned². In spite of the discouragement

¹ See Thucyd. iv. 11.

² Xenophon, Hellen. i. 6, 33. ἐπεὶ δὲ Κἀλλικράτιδας τοὺς ἐμβολήσας τῆς ἐνὸς ἀποστολῆς ἐς τὴν θαλάσσαν ἤρπασθη, &c.

The details given by Diodorus about this battle and the exploits of springing from his death, the ten Lacedæmonian triremes displayed a courage worthy of his, and nine of them were destroyed or disabled. At length the Athenians were victorious in all parts: the Peloponnesian fleet gave way, and their flight became general, partly to Chios, partly to Phokæa. More than sixty of their ships were destroyed over and above the nine Lacedæmonian, seventy-seven in all; making a total loss of above the half of the entire fleet. The loss of the Athenians was also severe—amounting to twenty-five triremes. They returned to Arginusæ after the battle¹.

The victory of Arginusæ afforded the most striking proof how much the democratical energy of Athens could yet accomplish, in spite of so many years of exhausting war. But far better would it have been, if her energy on this occasion had been less efficacious and successful. The defeat of the Peloponnesian fleet, and the death of their admirable leader—we must take the second as inseparable from the first, since Kallikratidas was not the man to survive a defeat—were signal misfortunes to the whole Grecian world; and in an especial manner, misfortunes to Athens herself. If Kallikratidas had gained the victory and survived it, he would certainly have been the man to close the Peloponnesian war; for Mitylênê must immediately have surrendered, and Konon with all the Athenian fleet there blocked up must have become his prisoners; which

It would have been better for Greece, and even for Athens, if Kallikratidas had been victor at Arginusæ.

Kallikratidas are at once prolix and unworthy of confidence. See an excellent note of Dr. Arnold on Thucyd. iv. 12—respecting the description given by Diodorus of the conduct of Brasidas at Pylos.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 34; Diodor. xiii. 99, 100.

circumstance, coming at the back of a defeat, would have rendered Athens disposed to acquiesce in any tolerable terms of peace. Now to have the terms dictated at a moment when her power was not wholly prostrate, by a man like Kallikratidas, free from corrupt personal ambition and of a generous Pan-Hellenic patriotism—would have been the best fate which at this moment could befall her; while to the Grecian world generally, it would have been an unspeakable benefit, that in the re-organization which it was sure to undergo at the close of the war, the ascendant individual of the moment should be penetrated with devotion to the great ideas of Hellenic brotherhood at home, and Hellenic independence against the foreigner. The near prospect of such a benefit was opened by that rare chance which threw Kallikratidas into the command, enabled him not only to publish his lofty profession of faith, but to show that he was prepared to act upon it, and for a time floated him on towards complete success. Nor were the envious gods ever more envious, than when they frustrated, by the disaster of Arginusæ, the consummation which they had thus seemed to promise. The pertinence of these remarks will be better understood in the next chapter, when I come to recount the actual winding-up of the Peloponnesian war under the auspices of the worthless, but able, Lysander. It was into his hands that the command was re-transferred: a transfer almost from the best of Greeks to the worst. We shall then see how much the sufferings of the Grecian world, and of Athens especially, were aggravated by his individual temper and tendencies—and we shall then feel by contrast, how much would have been gained if the commander armed with such great power of dictation had been a Pan-Hellenic patriot. To have the sentiment of that patriotism enforced, at a moment of break-up and re-arrangement throughout Greece, by the victorious leader of the day, with single-hearted honesty and resolution, would have been a stimulus to all the better feelings of the Grecian mind such as no other combination of circumstances could have furnished. The defeat and death of Kallikratidas was thus even more deplorable as a loss to Athens and Greece, than to Sparta herself. To his lofty character and patriotism, even in so short a career, we vainly seek a parallel.

The news of the defeat was speedily conveyed to Eteonikus at Mitylênê by the admiral's signal-boat. As soon as he heard it, he desired the crew of the signal-boat to say nothing to any one, but to go again out of the harbour, and then return with wreaths and shouts of triumph—crying out that Kallikratidas had gained the victory and had destroyed or captured all the Athenian ships. All suspicion of the reality was thus kept from Konon and the besieged; while Eteonikus himself, affecting to believe the news, offered the sacrifice of thanksgiving; but gave orders to all the triremes to take their meal and depart afterwards without losing a moment; directing the masters of the trading-ships also to put their property silently aboard, and get off at the same time. And thus, with little or no delay, and without the least obstruction from Konon, all these ships, triremes and merchantmen, sailed out of the harbour and were carried off in

Safe escape of Eteonikus and his fleet from Mitylênê to Chios.

safety to Chios, the wind being fair. Eteonikus at the same time withdrew his land-forces to Methymna, burning his camp. Konon, thus finding himself unexpectedly at liberty, put to sea with his ships when the wind had become calmer, and joined the main Athenian fleet, which he found already on its way from Arginusæ to Mitylênê. The latter presently came to Mitylênê, and from thence passed over to make an attack on Chios; which attack proving unsuccessful, they went forward to their ordinary station at Samos¹.

Joy of Athens for the victory — indignation arising from the fact that the Athenian seamen on the disabled ships had not been picked up after the battle.

The news of the victory at Arginusæ diffused joy and triumph at Athens. All the slaves who had served in the armament were manumitted and promoted, according to promise, to the rights of Plataians at Athens—a qualified species of citizenship. Yet the joy was poisoned by another incident which became known at the same time, raising sentiments of a totally opposite character, and ending in one of the most gloomy and disgraceful proceedings in all Athenian history.

Not only the bodies of the slain warriors floating about on the water had not been picked up for burial, but the wrecks had not been visited to preserve those who were yet living. The first of these two points, even alone, would have sufficed to excite a painful sentiment of wounded piety at Athens. But the second point, here an essential part of the same omission, inflamed that sentiment into shame, grief, and indignation of the sharpest character.

In the descriptions of this event, Diodorus and many other writers take notice of the first point, either exclusively¹, or at least with slight reference to the second; which latter, nevertheless, stands as

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 38; Diodor. xiii. 100.

¹ See the narrative of Diodorus (xii. 100, 101, 102), where nothing is mentioned except about picking up the floating dead bodies—about the crime, and offence in the eyes of the people, of omitting to secure burial to so many dead bodies. He does not seem to have fancied that there were any living bodies, or that it was a question between life and death to so many of the crews.

Whereas if we follow the narrative of Xenophon (Hellen. l. 7), we shall see that the question is put throughout about picking up the living men—the shipwrecked men, or the men belonging to, and still living aboard of, the broken ships—ἀπολίσθαι τοὺς ναυηγούς, τοὺς διατεταχμένους, τοὺς καταδύοντας (Hellen. ii. 3, 32): compare especially ii. 3, 35—πλὴν ἐπὶ τὰς καταδύοντας αὐτῶν καὶ τοὺς ἐκ αὐτῶν ἀνθρώπους (i. 6, 35). The word ναυηγός does not mean a dead body, but a living man who has suffered shipwreck: Ναυηγὸς ἦεν, ζῶντα, ἀνάλαντος γένος (says Menelaus; Eurip. Helen. 457): also 407—Καὶ εἰς τὰς ναυηγίας, ἀπολίσσας φίλους ἔξεπεσον ἐς γῆν τιρὸς, &c., again 538. It corresponds with the Latin naufregus—versus rate naufragus assens Dum cogat, et picta se tempestate tuctur (Juvenal, xiv. 301). Thucydides does not use the word ναυηγός, but speaks of τοὺς νεκροὺς καὶ τὰ ναυῶν, meaning by the latter word the damaged ships with every person and thing on board.

It is remarkable that Schneider and most other commentators on Xenophon, Sturz in his Lexicon Xenophonticum (v. ναυηγός), Stallbaum ad Platon. Apol. Socrat. c. 20, p. 32, Sierers, Comment. ad Xenoph. Hellen. p. 31, Forchhammer, Die Athenen und Sokrates, p. 30-31. Berlin, 1837,—and others—all treat this event as if it were nothing but a question of picking up dead bodies for sepulture. This is a complete misinterpretation of Xenophon; not merely because the word ναυηγός, which he uses four several times, means a living person, but because there are two other passages, which leave absolutely no doubt about the matter—Παρήλθε δὲ τι ἐς τῆς ἐκκλησίας, φασκεν εἰς τούτους ἀλφειῶν σαθῆσαι· περιαλλάξει δ' αὐτῶ τοὺς ἀπολλυμένους, εἰν σαθῆ, ἀπυγγεῖλαι τῇ δόμῳ, ὅτι οἱ στρατηγοὶ οὐκ ἀνέλυσαν τοὺς ἀρίστους ὑπὲρ τῆς πατρίδος γενομένους. Again (ii. 3, 35), Themistocles, when vindicating himself, before the oligarchy of Thirty two years afterwards, for his conduct in accusing the generals, says that the generals brought their own destruction upon themselves by accusing him first, and by saying that the men on the disabled ships might have been saved with proper diligence—φάσκοντες γὰρ (the generals) οἷον τε εἴμαι σώσαι τοὺς ἀνδρας, προέμενοι αὐτοὺς ἀπολίσθαι, ἀπολλόντες ἑαυτοὺς. These passages place the point beyond dispute, that the generals were accused of having neglected to save the lives of men

State of the facts about the disabled ships, and the men left in them.

far the gravest in the estimate of every impartial critic, and was also the most violent in its effect upon Athenian feelings. Twenty-five Athenian triremes had been ruined along with most of their crews; that is, lay heeled over or disabled, with their oars destroyed, no masts, nor any means of moving—mere hulls partially broken by the impact of an enemy's ship, and gradually filling and sinking. The original crew of each was 200 men. The field of battle (if we may use that word for a space of sea) was strewn with these wrecks; the men remaining on board being helpless and unable to get away—for the ancient trireme carried no boat, nor any aids for escape. And there were moreover, floating about, men who had fallen overboard, or were trying to save their lives by means of accidental spars or empty casks. It was one of the privileges of a naval victory, that the party who gained it could sail over the field of battle, and thus assist their own helpless or wounded comrades aboard the disabled ships¹; taking captive, or sometimes killing, the corresponding persons belonging to the enemy. According even to the speech made in the Athenian public assembly afterwards, by Eurypolemus the defender of the accused generals, there were twelve triremes with their crews on board lying in the condition just described. This is an admission by the defence, and therefore the minimum of the reality: there cannot on the point of being drowned, and who by their neglect afterwards were drowned—not of having neglected to pick up dead bodies for sepulture. This misinterpretation of the commentators is here of the gravest import. It alters completely the criticisms on the proceedings at Athens.

¹ See Thucyd. i. 50, 51.

possibly have been fewer, but there were probably several more, out of the whole twenty-five stated by Xenophon¹. No step being taken to preserve them, the surviving portion, wounded as well as unwounded, of these crews, were left to be gradually drowned as each disabled ship went down. If any of them escaped, it was by unusual goodness of swimming—by finding some fortunate plank or spar—at any rate by the disgrace of throwing away their arms, and by some method such as no wounded man would be competent to employ.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 34. Ἀπώλοντο δὲ τῶν μὲν Ἀθηναίων οἷμα πέντε καὶ ἑξοαίε αὐτοῖς ἀνδράσιν, ἐκτὸς ὀλίγων τῶν πρὸς τὴν γῆν προσεχθέντων.

Schneider in his note, and Mr. Mitford in his History, express surprise at the discrepancy between the number twelve which appears in the speech of Euryptolemus, and the number twenty-five given by Xenophon.

But, first, we are not to suppose Xenophon to guarantee those assertions as to matters of fact which he gives as coming from Euryptolemus; who, as an advocate speaking in the assembly, might take great liberties with the truth.

Next, Xenophon speaks of the total number of ships ruined or disabled in the action: Euryptolemus speaks of the total number of wrecks afloat and capable of being visited so as to rescue the sufferers, at the subsequent moment when the generals directed the squadron under Theramenes to go out for the rescue. It is to be remembered that the generals went back to Arginusæ from the battle, and there determined (according to their own statement) to send out from thence a squadron for visiting the wrecks. A certain interval of time must therefore have elapsed between the close of the action, and the order given to Theramenes. During that interval, undoubtedly some of the disabled ships went down or came to pieces: if we are to believe Euryptolemus, thirteen out of the twenty-five must have thus disappeared, so that their crews were already drowned, and no more than twelve remained floating for Theramenes to visit, even had he been ever so active and ever so much favoured by weather.

I distrust the statement of Euryptolemus, and believe that he most probably underrated the number. But assuming him to be correct, this will only show how much the generals were to blame (as we shall hereafter remark) for not having seen to the visitation of the wrecks before they went back to their moorings at Arginusæ.

Despatch of the generals to Athens, affirming that a storm had prevented them from saving the drowning men.

The first letter from the generals which communicated the victory, made known at the same time the loss sustained in obtaining it. It announced, doubtless, the fact which we read in Xenophon, that twenty-five Athenian triremes had been lost with nearly all their crews; specifying, we may be sure, the name of each trireme which had so perished; for each trireme in the Athenian navy, like modern ships, had its own name¹. It mentioned at the same time that no step whatever had been taken by the victorious survivors to save their wounded and drowning countrymen on board the sinking ships. A storm had arisen (such was the reason assigned), so violent as to render all such intervention totally impracticable².

Justifiable wrath and wounded sympathy of the Athenians—extreme excitement among the relatives of the drowned men.

It is so much the custom, in dealing with Grecian history, to presume the Athenian people to be a set of children or madmen, whose feelings it is not worth while to try and account for—that I have been obliged to state these circumstances somewhat at length, in order to show that the mixed sentiment excited at Athens by the news of the battle of Arginusæ was perfectly natural and justifiable. Along with joy for the victory, there was blended horror and remorse at the fact, that so many of the brave men who had helped to gain it, had been left to perish unheeded. The friends and relatives of the crews of these lost triremes were of course foremost in the expression of such indignant emotion. The narrative of Xenophon, meagre and confused as well as unfair, presents this emotion as if it were something causeless, factitious, pumped up out of the standing irascibility of the multitude by the artifices of Theramènes, Kallixenus, and a few others. But whatever may have been done by these individuals to aggravate the public excitement, or pervert it to bad purposes, assuredly the excitement itself was spontaneous, inevitable, and amply justified. The very thought that so many of the brave partners in the victory had been left to drown miserably on the sinking hulls, without any effort, on the part of their generals and comrades near, to rescue them—was enough to stir up all the sensibilities, public as well as private, of the most passive nature, even in citizens who were not related to the deceased—much more in those who were so. To expect that the Athenians would be so absorbed in the delight of the victory, and in gratitude to the generals who had commanded, as to overlook such a desertion of perishing warriors, and such an omission of sympathetic duty—is, in my judgment, altogether preposterous; and would, if it were true, only establish one more vice in the Athenian people, besides those which they really had, and the many more with which they have been unjustly branded.

¹ Boeckh, in his instructive volume—Urkunden über das Attische See-Weesen (vii. p. 24 seq.) gives, from inscriptions, a long list of the names of Athenian triremes, between B.C. 356 and 322. All the names are feminine; some curious. We have a long list also of the Athenian ship-builders; since the name of the builder is commonly stated in the inscription along with that of the ship—Εὐχαρία, Ἀλεξάνδρια ἔργον—Σαίρη, Ἀριστοκράτους ἔργον—Ἐλευθερία, Ἀρχαίου ἔργον—Ἐπίδειξις, Δυσιστράτου ἔργον—Δημοκρατία, Χαιρεστράτου ἔργον, &c.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7. 4. Ὅτι μὲν γὰρ οἰδάντες ἄλλως καθήκοντα (οἱ στρατηγοὶ) ἐπιστολὴν ἐπέδειξαν (Theramienós) μαρτύριον καὶ ἐπεμψαν οἱ πρῶτοι εἰς τὴν βουλὴν καὶ εἰς τὸν δῆμον, ἄλλο οἶδεν αἰτιώμενος ἢ τὸν χειμῶνα.

The generals in their public letter accounted for their omission by saying that the violence of the storm was too great to allow them to move. First, was this true as matter of fact? Next, had there been time to discharge the duty, or at the least to try and discharge it, before the storm came on to be so intolerable? These points required examination. The generals, while honoured with a vote of thanks for the victory, were superseded, and directed to come home; all except Konon, who having been blocked up at Mitylênê, was not concerned in the question. Two new colleagues, Philoklês and Adeimantus, were named to go out and join him¹. The generals probably received the notice of their recall at Samos, and came home in consequence; reaching Athens seemingly about the end of September or beginning of October—the battle of Arginusæ having been fought in August 406 B.C. Two of the generals, however, Protomachus and Aristogenês, declined to come: warned of the displeasure of the people, and not confiding in their own case to meet it, they preferred to pay the price of voluntary exile. The other six, Periklês, Lysias, Diomedon, Erasinidês, Aristokratês, and Thrasyllus (Archestratus, one of the original ten, having died at Mitylênê²), came without their two colleagues; an unpleasant augury for the result.

The generals are superseded and directed to come home.

Examination of the generals before the Senate and the people at Athens.

On their first arrival, Archedêmus, at that time an acceptable popular orator, and exercising some magistracy or high office which we cannot distinctly make out³, imposed upon Erasinidês a fine to that

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 1; Diodor. xiii. 101—ἐπὶ μὲν τῇ νίκῃ τοὺς στρατηγοὺς ἐπῆσαν, ἐπὶ δὲ τῇ περὶ αὐτῶν ἀποφασίᾳ τοὺς ἐπὶ τῆς ἡμετέρας τελευτησάντας, χαλεπῶς διετίθησαν.

I have before remarked that Diodorus makes the mistake of talking about nothing but dead bodies, in place of the living enquiry spoken of by Xenophon. ² Lysias, Orit. xxi. (Ἀπολογία Δημοδοκίου) sect. vii.

³ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 2. Archedêmus is described as τῶν ἀρχαίων ἐπιμελομένων. What is meant by these words, none of the commentators can explain in a satisfactory manner. The text must be corrupt.

limited amount which was within the competence of magistrates without the sanction of the Dikastery—and accused him besides before the Dikastery; partly for general misconduct in his command, partly on the specific charge of having purloined some public money on its way from the Hellespont. Erasinidēs was found guilty, and condemned to be imprisoned, either until the money was made good, or perhaps until farther examination could take place into the other alleged misdeeds.

This trial of Erasinidēs took place before the generals were summoned before the Senate to give their formal exposition respecting the recent battle and the subsequent neglect of the drowning men. And it might almost seem as if Archedēmus wished to impute to Erasinidēs exclusively, apart from the other generals, the blame of that neglect; a distinction, as will hereafter appear, not wholly unfounded. If however any such design was entertained, it did not succeed. When the generals went to explain their case before the Senate, the decision of that body was decidedly unfavourable to all of them.

Some conjecture like that of Dobree seems plausible; some words like τῆς δακρύς or τῆς δακρυόεως—having reference to the weeping of the title in the Hellespont; which would furnish reasonable ground for the proceeding of Archedēmus against Erasinidēs.

The office held by Archedēmus, whatever it was, must have been sufficiently exalted to confer upon him the power of imposing the fine of limited amount called εὐχολή.

I hesitate to identify this Archedēmus with the person of that name mentioned in the Memorabilia of Xenophon, ii. 9. There seems no similarity at all in the points of character noticed.

The popular orator Archidēmus was derided by Eupolis and Aristophanes as having sore eyes, and as having got his citizenship without a proper title to it (see Aristophan. Ran. 419-588, with the Scholia). He also is charged in a line of an oration of Lysias with having embezzled the public money (Lysias cont. Alkibiad. sect. 25. Orat. xiv.).

though we have no particulars of the debate which passed. On the proposition of the Senator Timokratês¹, a resolution was passed that the other five generals present should be placed in custody, as well as Erasinidês, and thus handed over to the public assembly for consideration of the case².

The public assembly was accordingly held, and the generals were brought before it. We are here told who it was that appeared as their principal accuser, along with several others; though unfortunately we are left to guess what were the topics on which they insisted. Theramenês was the man who denounced them most vehemently, as guilty of leaving the crews of the disabled triremes to be drowned, and of neglecting all efforts to rescue them. He appealed to their own public letter to the people, officially communicating the victory; in which letter they made no mention of having appointed any one to undertake the duty, nor of having any one to blame for not performing it. The omission therefore was wholly their own; they might have performed it, and ought to be punished for so cruel a breach of duty.

The generals could not have a more formidable enemy than Theramenês. We have had occasion to follow him, during the revolution of the Four Hundred, as a long-sighted as well as tortuous politician: he had since been in high military command, a partaker in victory with Alkibiadês at Kyzikus and elsewhere; and he had served as trierarch in the victory of Arginusæ itself. His authority

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 3. Τιμοκράτης δ' ἐπείθετο, ὅτι καὶ τοὺς ἄλλους χρὴ δεῖσθαι ἐκ τοῦ δήμου παραδοθῆναι, ἢ βουλὴ ἴδῃαι.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 4.

Debate in the public assembly—Theramenês accuses the generals as guilty of omitting to save the drowning men.

Effect of the accusation by Theramenês upon the assembly.

therefore was naturally high, and told for much, when he denied the justification which the generals had set up, founded on the severity of the storm. According to him, they might have picked up the drowning men, and ought to have done so: either they might have done so before the storm came on—or there never was any storm of sufficient gravity to prevent them: upon their heads lay the responsibility of omission¹. Xenophon, in his very meagre narrative, does not tell us in express words, that Theramenes contradicted the generals as to the storm. But that he did so contradict them, point blank, is implied distinctly in that which Xenophon alleges him to have said. It seems also that Thrasylus—another trierarch at Arginusæ, and a man not only of equal consequence, but of far more estimable character—concurred with Theramenes in this same accusation of the generals², though not standing forward so prominently in the case. He too therefore must have denied the reality of the storm; or at least, the fact of its being so instant after the battle or so terrible, as to forbid all effort for the relief of these drowning seamen.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 4. Μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα, ἐκκλησίᾳ ἐγένετο, ἐν ᾗ τῶν στρατηγῶν κατηγοροῦν ἄλλοι τε καὶ Θερραμένης μάλιστα, δίκαιους εἶναι λέγων λόγον ὑποσχεῖν, διότι οὐκ ἀνείλοντο τοὺς ναυαγούς. Ὅτι μὲν γὰρ αὐθεντὸς ἄλλον καθέκαστον, ἐπιστολὴν ἐπέδιδκον μαρτύριον· καὶ ἐπεμψαν οἱ στρατηγοὶ ἐν τῇ βουλῇ καὶ ἐν τῷ δήμῳ, ἵνα οὐδὲν αἰτιώμεναι ἢ τὸν χειμῶνα.

² That Thrasylus concurred with Theramenes in accusing the generals, is intimated in the reply which Xenophon represents the generals to have made (i. 7, 6)—Καὶ εἶχ', ὅτι γε κατηγοροῦσιν ἡμῶν, ἔφασαν, ψευδόμεθα φάσαντες αὐτοῖς αἰτίους εἶναι, ἀλλὰ τὸ μέγεθος τοῦ χειμῶνος εἶναι τὸ καλῶσαι τὴν ἀνείρεσιν.

The plural κατηγοροῦσιν shows that Thrasylus as well as Theramenes stood forward to accuse the generals, though the latter was the most prominent and violent.

Defence of the generals —they affirm that they had commissioned Theramenés himself to undertake the duty.

The case of the generals, as it stood before the Athenian public, was completely altered when men like Theramenés and Thrasybulus stood forward as their accusers. Doubtless what was said by these two had been said by others before, in the Senate and elsewhere; but it was now publicly advanced by men of influence, as well as perfectly cognizant of the fact. And we are thus enabled to gather indirectly (what the narrative of Xenophon, studiously keeping back the case against the generals, does not directly bring forward), that though the generals affirmed the storm, there were others present who denied it—thus putting in controversy the matter of fact, which formed their solitary justification. Moreover we come, in following the answer made by the generals in the public assembly to Theramenés and Thrasybulus—to a new point in the case, which Xenophon lets out as it were indirectly, in that confused manner which pervades his whole narrative of the transaction. It is however a new point of extreme moment. The generals replied that if any one was to blame for not having picked up the drowning men, it was Theramenés and Thrasybulus themselves; for it was they two, to whom, together with various other trierarchs and with forty-eight triremes, the generals had expressly confided the performance of this duty: it was they two who were responsible for its omission, not the generals. Nevertheless they (the generals) made no charge against Theramenés and Thrasybulus—well knowing that the storm had rendered the performance of the duty absolutely impossible, and that it was therefore a complete justification for one as well as for the other. They (the generals) at least could do no more than direct competent men like these two trierarchs to perform the task, and assign to them an adequate squadron for the purpose; while they themselves with the main fleet went to attack Eteonikus, and relieve Mitylênê. Diomedon, one of their number, had wished after the battle to employ all the ships in the fleet for the preservation of the drowning men, without thinking of anything else until that was done. Erasinidês, on the contrary, wished that all the fleet should move across at once against Mitylênê: Thrasyllus said that they had ships enough to do both at once. Accordingly it was agreed that each general should set apart three ships from his division, to make a squadron of forty-eight ships under Thrasybulus and Theramenês. In making these statements, the generals produced pilots and others, men actually in the battle, as witnesses in general confirmation.

Here then, in this debate before the assembly, were two new and important points publicly raised. First, Theramenês and Thrasybulus denounced the generals as guilty of the death of these neglected men: next, the generals affirmed that they had delegated the duty to Theramenês and Thrasybulus themselves. If this latter were really true, how came the generals in their official despatch first sent home, to say nothing about it? Euryptolemus, an advocate of the generals (speaking in a subsequent stage of the proceedings, though we can hardly doubt that the same topics were also urged in this very assembly), while blaming the generals for such omission, ascribed it to an ill-placed good-nature on their part, and reluctance to bring Theramenês and Thrasybulus under the displeasure of the people.

Reason why the generals had not mentioned this commission in their despatch.

Most of the generals (he said) were disposed to mention the fact in their official despatch, but were dissuaded from doing so by Periklès and Diomedon; an unhappy dissuasion (in his judgment), which Theramenès and Thrasybulus had ungratefully requited by turning round and accusing them all¹.

This remarkable statement of Euryptolemus, as to the intention of the generals in wording the official despatch, brings us to a closer consideration of what really passed between them on the one side, and Theramenès and Thrasybulus on the other; which is difficult to make out clearly, but which Diodorus represents in a manner completely different from Xenophon. Diodorus states that the generals were prevented partly by the storm, partly by the fatigue and reluctance and alarm of their own seamen, from taking any steps to pick up (what he calls) the dead bodies for burial—that they suspected Theramenès and Thrasybulus, who went to Athens before them, of intending to accuse them before the people—and that for this reason they sent home intimation to the people that they had given special orders to these two trierarchs to perform the duty. When these letters were read in the public assembly (Diodorus says), the Athenians were ex-

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 17. Euryptolemus says—Κατηγοροῦν μὲν οὖν αὐτῶν, ὅτι ἐπεισας τοὺς ξυμάρχοντας, βουλευμένους πέμψαν γράμματα τῇ τε βουλῇ καὶ τῷ δήμῳ, ὅτι ἐπέταξαν τῷ Θηραμένει καὶ Θρασυβούλῳ τεταγμένοντα καὶ ἅπαντα τῶν ἡρώων ἀνελεῖσθαι τοὺς νεκροὺς, οἳ δὲ οὐκ ἀκούσαντες. Ἐπειὰ τοῦ τῶν αὐτῶν κωκυθῆ ἔχουσιν, ἐκείνους ὅλην ἀμαρτυροῦντες καὶ ἀπὸ τῆς τότε φιλανθρωπίας, οὐκ ὅτι ἐκείνους τε καὶ τινες ἄλλους ἐπέταξαν ἀνελεῖσθαι καθυπερβοῦσιν ἀπολέσθαι.

We must here construe ἐπεισας as equivalent to ἀπέπεισαν or μετέπεισαν, placing a comma after ξυμάρχοντας. This is unusual, but not inadmissible. To persuade a man to alter his opinion or his conduct, might be expressed by πείθειν, though it would more properly be expressed by ἀπειθεῖν: see ἐπεισθῆναι, Thucyd. iii. 32.

cessively indignant against Theramènes; who however defended himself effectively and completely, throwing the blame back upon the generals. He was thus forced, against his own will and in self-defence, to become the accuser of the generals, carrying with him his numerous friends and partisans at Athens. And thus the generals, by trying to ruin Theramènes, finally brought condemnation upon themselves¹.

Such is the narrative of Diodorus, in which it is implied that the generals never really gave any special orders to Theramènes and Thrasybulus, but falsely asserted afterwards that they had done so, in order to discredit the accusation of Theramènes against themselves. To a certain extent, this coincides with what was asserted by Theramènes himself two years afterwards in his defence before the Thirty—that he was not the first to accuse the generals—they were the first to accuse him, affirming that they had ordered him to undertake the duty, and that there was no sufficient reason to hinder him from performing it—they were the persons who distinctly pronounced the performance of the duty to be possible, while he had said from the beginning that the violence of the storm was such as even to forbid any movement in the water; much more, to prevent rescue of the drowning men².

¹ Diodor. xiii. 100, 101.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 35. If Theramènes really did say, in the actual discussions at Athens on the conduct of the generals, that which he here asserts himself to have said (viz. that the violence of the storm rendered it impossible for any one to put to sea), his accusation against the generals must have been grounded upon alleging that they might have performed the duty at an earlier moment; before they came back from the battle—before the storm arose—before they gave the order to

Probable version of the way in which the facts really occurred.

Taking the accounts of Xenophon and Diodorus together, in combination with the subsequent accusation and defence of Theramenes at the time of the Thirty—and blending them so as to reject as little as possible of either—I think it probable that the order for picking up the exposed men was really given by the generals to Theramenes, Thrasybulus, and other trierarchs; but that, first, a fatal interval was allowed to elapse between the close of the battle and the giving of such order—next, that the forty-eight triremes talked of for the service, and proposed to be furnished by drafts of three out of each general's division, were probably never assembled—or if they assembled, were so little zealous in the business as to satisfy themselves very easily that the storm was too dangerous to brave, and that it was now too late. For when we read the version of the transaction even as given by Euryptolemus, we see plainly that none of the generals, except Diomedon, was eager in the performance of the task. It is a memorable fact, that of all the eight generals, not one of them undertook the business in person, although its purpose was to save more than a thousand drowning comrades from death¹. In a pro-

him. But I think it most probable that he misrepresented at the later period what he had said at the earlier, and that he did not, during the actual discussions, admit the sufficiency of the storm as fact and justification.

¹ The total number of ships lost with all their crews was twenty-five, of which the aggregate crews (speaking in round numbers) would be 5000 men. Now we may fairly calculate that each one of the disabled ships would have on board half her crew, or 100 men, after the action: not more than half would have been slain or drowned in the combat. Even ten disabled ships would thus contain 1000 living men, wounded and unarmoured. It will be seen therefore that I have understated the number of lives in danger.

ceeding where every interval even of five minutes was precious, they go to work in the most dilatory manner, by determining that each general shall furnish three ships, and no more, from his division. Now we know from the statement of Xenophon, that towards the close of the battle, the ships on both sides were much dispersed¹. Such collective direction therefore would not be quickly realized; nor, until all the eight fractions were united, together with the Samians and others, so as to make the force complete, would Theramenes feel bound to go out upon his preserving visitation. He doubtless disliked the service—as we see that most of the generals did—while the crews also, who had just got to land after having gained a victory, were thinking most about rest and refreshment, and mutual congratulations². All were glad to find some excuse for staying in their moorings instead of going out again to buffet what was doubtless unfavourable weather. Partly from this want of zeal, coming in addition to the original delay—partly from the bad weather—the duty remained unexecuted, and the seamen on board the damaged ships were left to perish unassisted.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 33.

² We read in Thucydides (vii. 73) how impossible it was to prevail on the Syracusans to make any military movement after their last maritime victory in the Great Harbour, when they were full of triumph, felicitation, and enjoyment.

They had visited the wrecks and picked up both the living men on board and the floating bodies, before they went ashore. It is remarkable that the Athenians on that occasion were so completely overpowered by the immensity of their disaster, that they never even thought of asking permission (always granted by the victors when asked) to pick up their dead or visit their wrecks (viii. 72).

But presently arose the delicate, yet unavoidable question, "How are we to account for the omission of this sacred duty in our official despatch to the Athenian people?" Here the generals differed among themselves, as Eurypolemus expressly states: Periklēs and Diomedon carried it, against the judgement of their colleagues, that in the official despatch (which was necessarily such as could be agreed to by all) nothing should be said about the delegation to Theramenēs and others; the whole omission being referred to the terrors of the storm. But though such was the tenor of the official report, there was nothing to hinder the generals from writing home and communicating individually with their friends in Athens as each might think fit; and in these unofficial communications, from them as well as from others who went home from the armament—communications not less efficacious than the official despatch in determining the tone of public feeling at Athens—they did not disguise their convictions that the blame of not performing the duty belonged to Theramenēs. Having thus a man like Theramenēs to throw the blame upon, they did not take pains to keep up the story of the intolerable storm, but intimated that there had been nothing to hinder him from performing the duty if he had chosen. It is this which he accuses them of having advanced against him, so as to place him as the guilty man before the Athenian public: it was this which made him, in retaliation and self-defence, violent and unscrupulous in denouncing them as the persons really blameable¹.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 32. The light in which I here place the

As they had made light of the alleged storm, in casting the blame upon him—so he again made light of it, and treated it as an insufficient excuse, in his denunciations against them; taking care to make good use of their official despatch, which virtually exonerated him, by its silence, from any concern in the matter.

Such is the way in which I conceive the relations to have stood between the generals on one side and Theramenes on the other; having regard to all that is said both in Xenophon and in Diodorus. But the comparative account of blame and recrimination between these two parties is not the most important feature of the case. The really serious inquiry is, as to the intensity or instant occurrence of the storm.

Justification of the generals—how far valid?—The alleged storm. Escape of Eteonikus.

conduct of Theramenes is not only coincident with Diodorus, but with the representations of Kritias, the violent enemy of Theramenes, under the government of the Thirty—just before he was going to put Theramenes to death—Οἷτος δὲ τοι ἐστίν, ὅς ταχέως ἀνελίσσεται ἐκ τῆς στρατηγῆς τοῖς καταδύντας Ἀθηναίους ἐν τῇ περὶ Λέσβου συμμάχῳ, αὐτὸς οὐκ ἀνελόμενος ὁμῶς τῶν στρατηγῶν κατηγορῶν ἀπίστευται αὐτοῖς, ἵσα αὐτὸς περισσέθει (Xen. at sup.).

Here it stands admitted that the first impression at Athens was (as Diodorus states expressly) that Theramenes was ordered to pick up the men on the wrecks—might have done it if he had taken proper pains—and was to blame for not doing it. Now how did this impression arise? Of course through communications received from the armament itself. And when Theramenes in his reply says, that the generals themselves made communications in the same tenor, there is no reason why we should not believe him; in spite of their joint official despatch, wherein they made no mention of him—and in spite of their speech in the public assembly afterwards, where the previous official letter fettered them, and prevented them from accusing him, forcing them to adhere to the statement first made of the all-sufficiency of the storm.

The main facts which we here find established even by the enemies of Theramenes, are—1. That Theramenes accused the generals because he found himself in danger of being punished for the neglect. 2. That his enemies, who charged him with the breach of duty, did not admit the storm as an excuse for him.

Was it really so instant and so dangerous, that the duty of visiting the wrecks could not be performed, either before the ships went back to Arginusæ, or afterwards? If we take the circumstances of the case, and apply them to the habits and feelings of the English navy—if we suppose more than 1000 seamen, late comrades in the victory, distributed among twenty damaged and helpless hulls, awaiting the moment when these hulls would fill and consign them all to a watery grave—it must have been a frightful storm indeed, which would force an English admiral even to go back to his moorings leaving these men so exposed—or which would deter him, if he were at his moorings, from sending out the very first and nearest ships at hand to save them. And granting the danger to be such, that he hesitated to give the order, there would probably be found officers and men to volunteer, against the most desperate risks, in a cause so profoundly moving all their best sympathies. Now unfortunately for the character of Athenian generals, officers, and men, at Arginusæ—for the blame belongs, though in unequal proportions, to all of them—there exists here strong presumptive proof that the storm on this occasion was not such as would have deterred any Grecian seamen animated by an earnest and courageous sense of duty. We have only to advert to the conduct and escape of Eteonikus and the Peloponnesian fleet from Mitylênê to Chios; recollecting that Mitylênê was separated from the promontory of Kanê on the Asiatic mainland, and from the isles of Arginusæ, by a channel only 120 stadia broad¹—about fourteen

¹ Strabo, xiii. p. 617.

English miles. Eteonikus, apprised of the defeat by the Peloponnesian official signal-boat, desired that boat to go out of the harbour, and then to sail into it again with deceptive false news, to the effect that the Peloponnesians had gained a complete victory: he then directed his seamen, after taking their dinners, to depart immediately, and the masters of the merchant vessels silently to put their cargoes aboard, and get to sea also. The whole fleet, triremes and merchant vessels both, thus went out of the harbour of Mitylênê and made straight for Chios, whither they arrived in safety; the merchant vessels carrying their sails, and having what Xenophon calls "a fair wind¹." Now it is scarcely possible that all this could have taken place, had there blown during this time an intolerable storm between Mitylênê and Arginusæ. If the weather was such as to allow of the safe transit of Eteonikus and all his fleet from Mitylênê to Chios—it was not such as to form a legitimate obstacle capable of deterring any gene-

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 6, 37. 'Ἐτεονίκος δὲ, ἐπειδὴ ἔσπευε (the signal-boat with news of the pretended victory) κατέπλεον, ἶδεν τὸ εὐεργεσίαν, καὶ τοῖς στρατιώταις παρήγγειλε διαπλοκεῖσθαι, καὶ τοῖς ἐμπόροις, τὰ χρήματα σιωπῇ ἐνθιμύνουσι εἰς τὰ πλοῖα ἀποσπείναι εἰς Χίον, ἥν δὲ τὸ πνεῦμα αὖριον, καὶ τὰς τριήρεις τῇ ταχίστῃ. Αὐτοὶ δὲ τὸ πρῶτον ἀπῆλθον εἰς τὴν Μηθύμνην, τὸ στρατόπεδον ἑμαρτήσαν. Κόνην δὲ καθελκύσαντες τὰς νύκτας, ἐπεὶ οἱ τε πολέμιοι ἀπεδεδοράκεισαν, καὶ ὁ ἄνεμος εὐδιαίτερος ἦν, ἀπαντήσαντες τοῖς Ἀθηναίοις ἦλθον ὡς ἡγγεμένοις ἐκ τῆς Ἀργινοῦσσης, ἰφραυεὶ τὰ περὶ Ἐτεονίκου.

One sees by the expression used by Xenophon respecting the proceedings of Konon—that he went out of the harbour "as soon as the wind became calmer"—that it blew a strong wind, though in a direction favourable to carry the fleet of Eteonikus to Chios. Konon was under no particular motive to go out immediately: he could afford to wait until the wind became quite calm. The important fact is, that wind and weather were perfectly compatible with, indeed even favourable to, the escape of the Peloponnesian fleet from Mitylênê to Chios.

rous Athenian seaman, still less a responsible officer, from saving his comrades exposed on the wrecks near Arginusæ. Least of all was it such as ought to have hindered the attempt to save them—even if such attempt had proved unsuccessful. And here the gravity of the sin consists, in having remained inactive while the brave men on the wrecks were left to be drowned. All this reasoning, too, assumes the fleet to have been already brought back to its moorings at Arginusæ; discussing only how much was practicable to effect after that moment, and leaving untouched the no less important question, why the drowning men were not picked up before the fleet went back?

I have thought it right to go over these considerations, indispensable to the fair appreciation of so memorable an event—in order that the reader may understand the feelings of the assembly and the public of Athens, when the generals stood before them, rebutting the accusations of Theramenes and re-criminating in their turn against him. The assembly had before them the grave and deplorable fact, that several hundreds of brave seamen had been suffered to drown on the wrecks, without the least effort to rescue them. In explanation of this fact, they had not only no justification, at once undisputed and satisfactory—but not even any straightforward, consistent, and uncontradicted statement of facts. There were discrepancies among the generals themselves, comparing their official with their unofficial, as well as with their present statements—and contradictions between them and Theramenes, each having denied the sufficiency of the storm as a vin-dication for the neglect imputed to the other. It was impossible that the assembly could be satisfied to acquit the generals, on such a presentation of the case; nor could they well know how to apportion the blame between them and Theramenes. The relatives of the men left to perish would be doubtless in a state of violent resentment against one or other of the two, perhaps against both. Under these circumstances, it could hardly have been the sufficiency of their defence—it must have been rather the apparent generosity of their conduct towards Theramenes, in formally disavowing all charge of neglect against him, though he had advanced a violent charge against them—which produced the result that we read in Xenophon. The defence of the generals was listened to with favour and seemed likely to prevail with the majority¹. Many individuals present offered themselves as bail for the generals, in order that the latter might be liberated from custody: but the debate had been so much prolonged (we see from hence that there must have been a great deal of speaking) that it was now dark, so that

Feelings of the Athenian public—how the case stood before them—decision adjourned to a future assembly.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 5-7. Μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα οἱ στρατηγοὶ βραχέα ἱκανοὶ ἀπελογήσαντο, οὐ γὰρ προϊέμεθα σφίσι λόγους κατὰ τὸν νόμον.....

Ταῦτα λέγοντες ἔπειθοι τὸν δῆμον. The imperfect tense ἔπειθοι must be noticed: "they were persuading," or seemed in the way to persuade, the people: not ἔπεισαν the arist., which would mean that they actually did satisfy the people.

The first words here cited from Xenophon do not imply that the generals were choked or abridged in their liberty of speaking before the public assembly, but merely that no judicial trial and defence were granted to them. In judicial defence, the person accused had a measured time for defence (by the clepsydra or water-clock) allotted to him, during which no one could interrupt him; a time doubtless much longer than any single speaker would be permitted to occupy in the public assembly.

no vote could be taken, because the show of hands was not distinguishable. It was therefore resolved to adjourn the whole decision until another assembly; but that in the meantime the senate should meet to consider what would be the proper mode of trying and judging the generals—and should submit a proposition to that effect to the approaching assembly.

It so chanced that immediately after this first assembly, during the interval before the meeting of the senate or the holding of the second assembly, the three days of the solemn annual festival called Apaturia intervened; early days in the month of October. This was the characteristic festival of the Ionic race; handed down from a period anterior to the constitution of Kleisthenês, and to the ten new tribes each containing so many demes—and bringing together the citizens in their primitive unions of family, gens, phratry, &c., the aggregate of which had originally constituted the four Ionic tribes, now superannuated. At the Apaturia the family ceremonies were gone through; marriages were enrolled, acts of adoption were promulgated and certified, the names of youthful citizens first entered on the gentile and phratric roll; sacrifices were jointly celebrated by these family assemblages to Zeus Phratrius, Athênê, and other deities, accompanied with much festivity and enjoyment. A solemnity like this, celebrated every year, naturally provoked, in each of these little unions, questions of affectionate interest—"Who are those that were with us last year, but are not here now? The absent—where are they? The deceased—where or how did they

Occurrence of the festival of Apaturia—the great family solemnity of the Ionic race.

die?" Now the crews of the twenty-five Athenian triremes, lost at the battle of Arginusæ, (at least all those among them who were freemen), had been members of some one of these family unions, and were missed on this occasion. The answer to the above inquiry, in their case, would be one alike melancholy and revolting—"They fought like brave men and had their full share in the victory: their trireme was broken, disabled, and made a wreck, in the battle: aboard this wreck they were left to perish, while their victorious generals and comrades made not the smallest effort to preserve them." To hear this about fathers, brothers, and friends—and to hear it in the midst of a sympathising family circle—was well-calculated to stir up an agony of shame, sorrow, and anger, united; an intolerable sentiment, which required as a satisfaction, and seemed even to impose as a duty, the punishment of those who had left these brave comrades to perish. Many of the gentile unions, in spite of the usually festive and cheerful character of the Apaturia, were so absorbed by this sentiment, that they clothed themselves in black garments and shaved their heads in token of mourning, resolving to present themselves in this guise at the coming assembly, and to appease the manes of their abandoned kinsmen by every possible effort to procure retribution on the generals¹.

Xenophon in his narrative describes this burst of feeling at the Apaturia as false and factitious, and the men in mourning as a number of hired impos-

Burst of feeling at the Apaturia—misrepresented by Xenophon.

¹ Lysias puts into one of his orations a similar expression respecting the feeling at Athens towards these generals—ὀφθαλμοὶ καὶ τὴν τῶν νεκρῶν ἀπὸ τῆς ἀντιθέσεως ὁμοῦ λατρεῖν—Lysias cont. Erastosth. v. 37.

tors, got up by the artifices of Theramenes¹, to destroy the generals. But the case was one in which no artifice was needed. The universal and self-

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 8. Οἱ δὲ περὶ τὴν Θερμάνην παρεκκίνησαν ἀνθρώπων μάλιστα ἰσάντια ἔχοντες, καὶ ἐν χρόνῳ κεκαρμένους πολλοὺς ἐν ταύτῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ, ὅτε πρὸς τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ ἦσαν, ὥς δὴ ξογ-γευσθεῖς ὄντες τὰς ἀπαιτήσεις.

Here I adopt substantially the statement of Diodorus, who gives a juster and more natural description of the proceeding; representing it as a spontaneous action of mournful and vindictive feeling on the part of the kinsmen of the deceased (xiii. 101).

Other historians of Greece, Dr. Thirlwall not excepted (Hist. of Greece, ch. xxx. vol. iv. p. 117-125), follow Xenophon on this point. They treat the intense sentiment against the generals at Athens as "popular prejudices"—"excitement produced by the artifices of Theramenes" (Dr. Thirlwall, p. 117-124). "Theramenes (he says) hired a great number of persons to attend the festival, dressed in black, and with their heads shaven, as mourning for kinsmen whom they had lost in the sea-fight."

Yet Dr. Thirlwall speaks of the narrative of Xenophon in the most unfavourable terms; and certainly in terms no worse than it deserves (see p. 116, the note):—"It looks as if Xenophon had purposely involved the whole affair in obscurity." Compare also p. 123, where his criticism is equally severe.

I have little scruple in deserting the narrative of Xenophon (of which I think as meanly as Dr. Thirlwall), so far as to supply (without contradicting any of his main allegations) an omission which I consider capital and preponderant. I accept his account of what actually passed at the festival of the Apaturia, but I deny his statement of the manœuvres of Theramenes as the producing cause.

Most of the obscurity which surrounds these proceedings at Athens arises from the fact, that no notice has been taken of the intense and spontaneous emotion which the desertion of the men on the wreck was naturally calculated to produce on the public mind. It would (in my judgement) have been unaccountable if such an effect had not been produced, quite apart from all instigations of Theramenes. The moment that we recognise this capital fact, the series of transactions becomes comparatively perspicuous and explicable.

Dr. Thirlwall, as well as Sievers (Commentat. de Xenophontis Hellen. p. 25-30), supposes Theramenes to have acted in concert with the oligarchical party, in making use of this incident to bring about the ruin of generals odious to them—several of whom were connected with Alcibiades. I confess that I see nothing to countenance this idea: but at all events, the cause here named is only secondary—not the grand and dominant fact of the moment.

acting stimulants of intense human sympathy stand here so prominently marked, that it is not simply superfluous but even misleading, to look behind for the gold and machinations of a political instigator. Theraménès might do all that he could to turn the public displeasure against the generals, and to prevent it from turning against himself: it is also certain that he did much to annihilate their defence. He may thus have had some influence in directing the sentiment against them, but he could have had little or none in creating it. Nay, it is not too much to say that no factitious agency of this sort could ever have prevailed on the Athenian public to desecrate such a festival as the Apaturia by all the insignia of mourning. If they did so, it could only have been through some internal emotion alike spontaneous and violent, such as the late event was well-calculated to arouse.

Moreover, what can be more improbable than the allegation that a great number of men were hired to personate the fathers or brothers of deceased Athenian citizens, all well-known to their really surviving kinsmen? What more improbable than the story that numbers of men would suffer themselves to be hired, not merely to put on black clothes for the day, which might be taken off in the evening—but also to shave their heads, thus stamping upon themselves an ineffaceable evidence of the fraud, until the hair had grown again? That a cunning man, like Theraménès, should thus distribute his bribes to a number of persons, all presenting naked heads which testified his guilt, when there were real kinsmen surviving to prove the fact of personation?

That having done this, he should never be arraigned or accused for it afterwards,—neither during the prodigious reaction of feeling which took place after the condemnation of the generals, which Xenophon himself so strongly attests, and which fell so heavily upon Kallixenus and others—nor by his bitter enemy Kritias under the government of the Thirty? Not only Theramenes is never mentioned as having been afterwards accused, but for aught that appears, he preserved his political influence and standing, with little, if any, abatement. This is one forcible reason among many others, for disbelieving the bribes and the all-pervading machinations which Xenophon represents him as having put forth, in order to procure the condemnation of the generals. His speaking in the first public assembly, and his numerous partisans voting in the second, doubtless contributed much to that result—and by his own desire. But to ascribe to his bribes and intrigues the violent and overruling emotion of the Athenian public, is, in my judgment, a supposition alike unnatural and preposterous both with regard to them and with regard to him.

Proposition of Kallixenus in the senate against the generals—adopted and submitted to the public assembly.

When the senate met, after the Apaturia, to discharge the duty confided to it by the last public assembly, of determining in what manner the generals should be judged, and submitting their opinion for the consideration of the next assembly—the senator Kallixenus (at the instigation of Theramenes, if Xenophon is to be believed) proposed, and the majority of the senate adopted, the following resolution: “The Athenian people, having already heard in the previous assembly, both the accusation and the defence of the generals, shall at once come to a vote on the subject by tribes. For each tribe two urns shall be placed, and the herald of each tribe shall proclaim—All citizens who think the generals guilty for not having rescued the warriors who had conquered in the battle, shall drop their pebbles into the foremost urn; all who think otherwise, into the hindmost. Should the generals be pronounced guilty, (by the result of the voting,) they shall be delivered to the Eleven, and punished with death; their property shall be confiscated, the tenth part being set apart for the goddess *Athêné*¹. One single vote was to embrace the case of all the eight generals².

The unparalleled burst of mournful and vindictive feeling at the festival of the Apaturia, extending by contagion from the relatives of the deceased to many other citizens—and the probability thus created that the coming assembly would sanction the most violent measures against the generals—probably emboldened Kallixenus to propose, and prompted the senate to adopt, this deplorable resolution. As soon as the assembly met, it was read and moved by Kallixenus himself, as coming from the senate in discharge of the commission imposed upon them by the people.

It was heard by a large portion of the assembly with well-merited indignation. Its enormity consisted in breaking through the established constitutional maxims and judicial practices of the Athenian democracy. It deprived the accused generals of all fair trial, alleging, with a mere faint pretence of truth which was little better than utter falsehood, that their defence as well as their accusation had been heard in the preceding assembly. Now there has been no people, ancient or modern, in whose view the formalities of judicial trial were habitually more sacred and indispensable than in that of the Athenians—formalities including ample notice beforehand to the accused party, with a measured and sufficient space of time for him to make his defence before the Dikasts; while those Dikasts were men who had been sworn beforehand as a body, yet were selected by lot for each occasion as individuals. From all these securities the generals were now to be debarred, and submitted, for their lives, honours, and fortunes, to a simple vote of the unsworn public assembly, without hearing or defence. Nor was this all. One single vote was to be taken in condemnation or absolution of the eight generals collectively. Now there was a rule in Attic judicial procedure, called the psephism of Kannónus (originally adopted, we do not know when, on the proposition of a citizen of that name, as a psephism or decree for some particular case—but since generalized into common practice, and grown into great prescriptive reverence), which peremptorily forbade any such collective trial or sentence, and directed that a separate judicial vote should in all cases be taken for or against each accused party. The psephism of Kannónus, together with all the other respected maxims of Athenian criminal justice, was here audaciously trampled under foot¹.

Injustice of the resolution,—by depriving the generals of the customary securities for judicial trial. Psephism of Kallixenos.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 8, 9.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 34.

¹ I cannot concur with the opinion expressed by Dr. Thirlwall in Appendix III. vol. iv. p. 501 of his History—on the subject of the psephism of Kannónus. The view which I give in the text coincides

As soon as the resolution was read in the public assembly, Euryptolemus, an intimate friend of the

with that of the expositors generally, from whom Dr. Thirlwall dissents.

The psephism of Kannónus was the only enactment at Athens which made it illegal to vote upon the case of two accused persons at once. This had now grown into a practice in the judicial proceedings at Athens; so that two or more prisoners, who were ostensibly tried under some other law, and not under the psephism of Kannónus with its various provisions, would yet have the benefit of this its particular provision—viz. severance of trial.

In the particular case before us, Euryptolemus was thrown back to appeal to the psephism itself; which the senate, by a proposition unheard-of at Athens, proposed to contravene. The proposition of the senate offended against the general law in several different ways. It deprived the generals of trial before a sworn dikastery: it also deprived them of the liberty of full defence during a measured time: but farther, it prescribed that they should all be condemned or absolved by one and the same vote, and in this last respect it sinned against the psephism of Kannónus. Euryptolemus in his speech, endeavouring to persuade an exasperated assembly to reject the proposition of the senate and adopt the psephism of Kannónus as the basis of the trial, very prudently dwells upon the severe provisions of the psephism, and artfully shurs over what he principally aims at, the severance of the trials, by offering his relative Periklēs to be tried first. The words ὅλας ἐκαστος (sect. 37) appear to me to be naturally construed with κατὰ τὸ Καννόνος ψήφισμα, as they are by most commentators, though Dr. Thirlwall dissents from it. It is certain that this was the capital feature of illegality, among many, which the proposition of the senate presented—I mean the judging and condemning all the generals by one vote. It was upon this point that the amendment of Euryptolemus was taken, and that the obstinate resistance of Sokratēs turned (Plato, Apol. 20; Xenoph. Memor. i. 1, 18).

Farther, Dr. Thirlwall, in assigning what he believes to have been the real tenor of the psephism of Kannónus, appears to me to have been misled by the Scholiast in his interpretation of the much-discussed passage of Aristophanes, Ekklesiaz. 1089:—

Τοῦτ' ἐπὶ πρῶτον κατὰ τὸ Καννόνος παρῶς ψήφισμα, συνέιν δέ μ' ἐπαλελημένον, Πῶς νῦν δίκασται ἀμφότεροις ἐνέησονται;

Upon which Dr. Thirlwall observes—"that the young man is comparing his plight to that of a culprit, who, under the decree of Kannónus, was placed at the bar held by a person on each side. In this sense the Greek Scholiast, though his words are corrupted, clearly understood the passage."

I cannot but think that the Scholiast understood the words com-

Opposition
taken by Euryptolemus on the ground of constitutional form
—Graphê
Paranomônôn.

Excitement of the assembly—constitutional impediment
overruled.

generals, denounced it as grossly illegal and unconstitutional; presenting a notice of indictment against Kallixenus, under the Graphê Paranomôn, for having proposed a resolution of that tenor. Several other citizens supported the notice of indictment, which according to the received practice of Athens, would arrest the farther progress of the measure until the trial of its proposer had been consummated. Nor was there ever any proposition made at Athens, to which the Graphê Paranomôn more closely and righteously applied.

But the numerous partisans of Kallixenus—especially the men who stood by in habits of mourning, with shaven heads, agitated with sad recollections and thirst of vengeance—were in no temper to respect this constitutional impediment to the discus-pletely wrong. The young man in Aristophanes does not compare his situation with that of the culprit, but with that of the dikastery which tried culprits. The psophism of Kannónus directed that each defendant should be tried separately: accordingly, if it happened that two defendants were presented for trial, and were both to be tried without a moment's delay, the dikastery could only effect this object by dividing itself into two halves or portions; which was perfectly practicable (whether often practised or not), as it was a numerous body. By doing this (ἐπειὴ δικάστημῶν) it could try both the defendants at once; but in no other way.

Now the young man in Aristophanes compares himself to the dikastery thus circumstanced; which comparison is signified by the pun of ἐπειὴ δικάστημῶν in place of ἐπειὴ δικάστημῶν. He is waited by two obtusive and importunate customers, neither of whom will wait until the other has been served. Accordingly he says—"Clearly I ought to be divided into two parts, like a dikastery acting under the psophism of Kannónus, to deal with this matter: yet how shall I be able to serve both at once?"

This I conceive to be the proper explanation of the passage in Aristophanes; and it affords a striking confirmation of the truth of that which is generally received as purport of the psophism of Kannónus. The Scholiast appears to me to have puzzled himself, and to have mission of what had already been passed by the senate. They loudly clamoured that "it was intolerable to see a small knot of citizens thus hindering the assembled people from doing what they chose:" and one of their number, Lykiskus, even went so far as to threaten that those who tendered the indictment against Kallixenus should be judged by the same vote along with the generals, if they would not let the assembly proceed to consider and determine on the motion just read¹. The excited disposition of the large party thus congregated, farther inflamed by this menace of Lykiskus, was wound up to its highest pitch by various other speakers; especially by one, who stood forward and said—"Athenians, I was myself a wrecked man in the battle: I escaped only by getting upon an empty meal-tub; but my comrades, perishing on the wrecks near me, implored me, if I should myself be saved, to make known to the Athenian people, that their generals had abandoned to death warriors who had bravely conquered in behalf of their country." Even in the most tranquil state of the public mind, such a communication of the last words of these drowning men reported by an ear-witness, would have been heard with emotion; but under the actual predisposing excitement, it went to the inmost depth of the hearers' souls, and marked the generals as doomed men¹. Doubtless there were other similar statements, not expressly mentioned to us, bringing to view the same fact in other ways, and all contributing to aggravate the violence of the public manifestations; which at length reached such a point, that Euryptolemus was forced to withdraw his notice of indictment against Kallixenus.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7. Τὸν δὲ Καλλίξενον προσκαλέσασθαι παρόντων φάσκοντες ξυγγεγραφέσθαι, Εὐρυπτόδεμιν τε καὶ ἄλλοι τινες τοῦ δὲ δήμου ἵσταν ταῦτα ἀπῆλθον· τὰ δὲ πλῆθος ἰβόα, δεινὸν εἶναι, εἰ μὴ τι εἴπῃ τοις δῆμοι πράττειν, ὃ ἂν βούληται. Καὶ ἐπὶ ταῖσι εἰσόντις Δυσίωνα, καὶ τοῖσιν τῇ αὐτῇ ψήφῳ κρίνεσθαι, ὅτι καὶ τοῖς στρατηγοῖς, ἴαν μὴ ἀφῶσι τὴν ἐκκλησίαν, ἐπιθορίζουσι πάντων δὲ δήμου, καὶ ἡσυχιάσθων ἀφῆναι τὸς πλῆθει.

All this violence is directed to the special object of getting the proposition discussed and decided on by the assembly, in spite of constitutional obstacles.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 11. Παρῶδε δὲ τὰ ἐς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν φέρονται, διὰ τοῦτον ἀφῆκεν εὐθὺς ἐπιστάλλειν ὃ αὐτῷ τὸν ἀπολλυμένον, ἐν σὺνδῳ, ἀπαγγέλλαν τῷ δήμῳ, ὅτι αἱ στρατηγοὶ οὐκ ἀνέδεικτο τὸν ἀρίστου ὑπὲρ τῆς πατρίδος γυμνάσιον.

I venture to say that there is nothing, in the whole compass of ancient oratory, more full of genuine pathos and more profoundly impressive, than this simple incident and speech; though recounted in the most bald manner, by an unfavourably and contemptuous advocate.

Yet the whole effect of it is lost, because the habit is to dismiss everything which goes to inculpate the generals, and to justify the vehement emotion of the Athenian public, as if it was mere stage trick and falsehood. Dr. Thirlwall goes even beyond Xenophon when he says (p. 119, vol. iv.)—"A man was brought forward, who pretended he had been preserved by clinging to a meal-barrel, and that his comrades," &c. So Mr. Mitford—"A man was produced," &c. (p. 347.)

Now παρῶδε does not mean "he was brought forward;" it is a common word employed to signify one who comes forward to speak in the public assembly (see Thucyd. iii. 44, and the participle παρῶδαι in numerous places).

Next, φάσκον, while it sometimes means pretending, sometimes also means simply affirming: Xenophon does not guarantee the matter affirmed, but neither does he pronounce it to be false. He uses φάσκον in various cases where he himself agrees with the fact affirmed (see Hellen. i. 7, 12; Memorab. i. 2, 29; Cyropæd. viii. 3, 41; Plato, Ap. Socr. c. 6. p. 21).

The people of Athens heard and fully believed this deposition; nor do I see any reason why an historian of Greece should disbelieve it. There is nothing in the assertion of this man which is at all improbable; nay, more, it is plain that several such incidents must have happened. If we take the smallest pains to expand in our imaginations the details connected with this painfully interesting crisis at Athens, we shall see that numerous stories of the same affecting character must have been in circulation—doubtless many false, but many also perfectly true.

Now however a new form of resistance sprung up, still preventing the proposition from being taken into consideration by the assembly. Some of the Prytanes—or senators of the presiding tribe, on that occasion the tribe Antiochis—the legal presidents of the assembly, refused to entertain or put the question; which, being illegal and unconstitutional, not only inspired them with aversion, but also rendered them personally open to penalties. Kallixenus employed against them the same menaces which Lykiskus had uttered against Eurypolemus: he threatened, amidst encouraging clamour from many persons in the assembly, to include them in the same accusation with the generals. So intimidated were the Prytanes by the incensed manifestations of the assembly, that all of them, except one, relinquished their opposition, and agreed to put the question. The single obstinate Prytanis, whose refusal no menace could subdue, was a man whose name we read with peculiar interest, and in whom an impregnable adherence to law and duty was only one among many other titles to reverence. It was the philosopher Sokratēs; on this trying occasion, once throughout a life of seventy years, discharging a political office, among the fifty senators taken by lot from the tribe Antiochis. Sokratēs could not be induced to withdraw his protest, so that the question was ultimately put by the remaining Prytanes without his concurrence¹. It should be observed

The Prytanes refused to put the question—their opposition overruled, all except that of Sokratēs.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 14, 15; Plato, Apol. Socr. c. 20; Xenoph. Memor. i. 1, 18; iv. 4, 2.

In the passage of the Memorabilia, Xenophon says that Sokratēs was Epistatēs, or presiding Prytanis for that actual day. In the Hellenica, he only reckons him as one among the Prytanes. It can hardly be that his resistance did not imply any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the generals, but applied simply to the illegal and unconstitutional proposition now submitted for determining their fate; a proposition, which he must already have opposed once before, in his capacity of member of the senate.

The constitutional impediments having been thus violently overthrown, the question was regularly put by the Prytanes to the assembly. At once the clamorous outcry ceased, and those who had raised it resumed their behaviour of Athenian citizens—patient hearers of speeches and opinions directly opposed to their own. Nothing is more deserving of notice than this change of demeanour. The champions of the men drowned on the wrecks had resolved to employ as much force as was required to eliminate those preliminary constitutional objections, in themselves indisputable, which precluded the discussion. But so soon as the discussion was once begun, they were careful not to give to the resolution the appearance of being carried by force. Eurypolemus, the personal friend of the generals, was allowed not only to move an amendment negating the proposition of Kallixenus, but also to develop it in a long speech, which Xenophon sets before us¹.

His speech is one of great skill and judgment in reference to the case before him and to the temper accounted certain that he was Epistates—the rather as this same passage of the Memorabilia is inaccurate on another point: it names nine generals as having been condemned, instead of eight.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 16. Μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα, (that is, after the cries and shouts above recounted) ἀνέβη Εὐρυπόλεμος εἰλεῖν πρὶς τοὺς στρατηγοὺς ταῦτα, &c.

Altered temper of the assembly when the discussion had begun—amendment moved and developed by Eury-ptolemus.

Speech of Eurypolemus.

of the assembly. Beginning with a gentle censure on his friends the generals Periklēs and Diomedon, for having prevailed on their colleagues to abstain from mentioning, in their first official letter, the orders given to Theramenes,—he represented them as now in danger of becoming victims to the base conspiracy of the latter, and threw himself upon the justice of the people to grant them a fair trial. He besought the people to take full time to instruct themselves before they pronounced so solemn and irrevocable a sentence—to trust only to their own judgment, but at the same time to take security that judgment should be pronounced after full information and impartial hearing—and thus to escape that bitter and unavailing remorse which would otherwise surely follow. He proposed that the generals should be tried each separately, according to the psephism of Kannōnus—with proper notice, and ample time allowed for the defence as well as for the accusation; but that if found guilty, they should suffer the heaviest and most disgraceful penalties—his own relation Periklēs the first. This was the only way of striking the guilty, of saving the innocent, and of preserving Athens from the ingratitude and impiety of condemning to death, without trial as well as contrary to law, generals who had just rendered to her so important a service. And what could the people be afraid of? Did they fear lest the power of trial should slip out of their hands,—that they were so impatient to leap over all the delays prescribed by the law? To the worst of public traitors, Aristarchus, they had granted a day with full notice for trial, with all the legal means for making his defence: and would they now show such flagrant contrariety of measure to victorious and faithful officers? "Be not ye (he said) the men to act thus, Athenians. The laws are your own work; it is through them that ye chiefly hold your greatness: cherish them, and attempt not any proceeding without their sanction¹."

¹ It is this accusation of "reckless hurry" (ἡσυχασμός) which Pausanias mentions. VOL. VIII.

Euryptolemus then shortly recapitulated the proceedings after the battle, with the violence of the storm which had prevented approach to the wrecks; adding that one of the generals, now in peril, had himself been on board a broken ship, and had only escaped by a fortunate accident². Gaining courage from his own harangue, he concluded by reminding the Athenians of the brilliancy of the victory, and by telling them that they ought in justice to wreath the brows of the conquerors, instead of following those wicked advisers who pressed for their execution³.

It is no small proof of the force of established habits of public discussion, that the men in mourning and with shaven heads who had been a few minutes before in a state of furious excitement, should nias brings against the Athenians in reference to their behaviour towards the six generals (vi. 7, 2).

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 30. Μὴ ὑμεῖς γε, ὦ Ἀθηναῖοι, ὡς αὐτῶν ὄντων τοὺς νόμους, ἐν οἷς μάλιστα μέγιστοί ἐστε, φοβέσθητε, ἀλλὰ τοῖσιν μὲν πράττειν παύσασθε.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 35. τοῖσιν δὲ μάρτυρες οἱ παθόντες ἀπὸ τοῦ αἰσχροτάτου, ὥς εἰς τὸν ὑμετέρου στρατηγίου ἐπὶ καταδύσας πρὸς αὐτοὺς ὦν, &c.

³ The speech is contained in Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 16-26.

patiently hear out a speech so effective and so conflicting with their strongest sentiments as this of Euryptolemus. Perhaps others may have spoken also; but Xenophon does not mention them. It is remarkable that he does not name Theramenes as taking any part in this last debate.

The substantive amendment proposed by Euryptolemus was, that the generals should be tried each separately, according to the psephism of Kannônus; implying notice to be given to each, of the day of trial, and full time for each to defend himself. This proposition, as well as that of the senate moved by Kallixenus, was submitted to the vote of the assembly; hands being separately held up, first for one, next for the other. The Prytanes pronounced the amendment of Euryptolemus to be carried. But a citizen named Meneklês impeached their decision as wrong or invalid, alleging seemingly some informality or trick in putting the question, or perhaps erroneous report of the comparative show of hands. We must recollect that in this case the Prytanes were declared partisans. Feeling that they were doing wrong in suffering so illegal a proposition as that of Kallixenus to be put at all, and that the adoption of it would be a great public mischief, they would hardly scruple to try and defeat it even by some unfair manœuvre. But the exception taken by Meneklês constrained them to put the question over again, and they were then obliged to pronounce that the majority was in favour of the proposition of Kallixenus¹.

His amendment is rejected—the proposition of Kallixenus is carried.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 38. Τοῖς τε δὲ ἀρχιπολεμικοῖς, τὸ πρῶτον

The six generals are condemned and executed.

That proposition was shortly afterwards carried into effect by disposing the two urns for each tribe, and collecting the votes of the citizens individually. The condemnatory vote prevailed, and all the eight generals were thus found guilty; whether by a large or a small majority, we should have been glad to learn, but are not told. The majority was comπρῶτος ἔκριντο τῆς ἑκρυπτομένης ἐπιπορομένης δὲ Μενελάου, καὶ πόλιν διαχειριστοὺς γενομένους, ἔκριντο τῆς τῆς βουλῆς.

I cannot think that the explanation of this passage given either by Schömann (De Comitibus Athen. part ii. l. p. 160 seq.) or by Meier and Schömann (Der Attische Prozess, b. iii. p. 296; b. iv. p. 696) are satisfactory. The idea of Schömann, that in consequence of the unconquerable resistance of Sokratēs, the voting upon this question was postponed until the next day, appears to me completely inconsistent with the account of Xenophon; and, though countenanced by a passage in the Pseudo-Platonic dialogue called Axiochus (c. 12), altogether loose and untrustworthy. It is plain to me that the question was put without Sokratēs, and could be legally put by the remaining Prytanes, in spite of his resistance. The word ἐπιποροία must doubtless bear a meaning somewhat different here to its technical sense before the dikastery; and different also, I think, to the other sense which Meier and Schömann ascribe to it, of a formal engagement to prefer at some future time an indictment or ὑποψὴ παρανόμων. It seems to me here to denote, an objection taken on formal grounds, and sustained by oath either tendered or actually taken, to the decision of the Prytanes or presidents. These latter had to declare on which side the show of hands in the assembly preponderated: but there surely must have been some power of calling in question their decision, if they declared falsely, or if they put the question in a treacherous, perplexing, or obscure manner. The Athenian assembly did not admit of an appeal to a division, like the Spartan assembly or like the English House of Commons; though there were many cases in which the votes at Athens were taken by pebbles in an urn, and not by show of hands.

Now it seems to me that Meneklēs here exercised the privilege of calling in question the decision of the Prytanes, and constraining them to take the vote over again. He may have alleged that they did not make it clearly understood which of the two propositions was to be put to the vote first—that they put the proposition of Kallixenos first, without giving due notice—or perhaps that they misreported the numbers. By what followed, we see that he had good grounds for his objection.

posed mostly of those who acted under a feeling of genuine resentment against the generals, but in part also of the friends and partisans of Theramenes¹, not inconsiderable in number. The six generals then at Athens—Periklēs (son of the great statesman of that name by Aspasia), Diomedon, Erasinidēs, Thrasylus, Lysias, and Aristokratēs—were then delivered to the Eleven, and perished by the usual draught of hemlock; their property being confiscated, as the decree of the senate prescribed.

Respecting the condemnation of these unfortunate men, pronounced without any of the recognised tutelary preliminaries for accused persons, there can be only one opinion. It was an act of violent injustice and illegality, deeply dishonouring the men who passed it, and the Athenian character generally. In either case, whether the generals were guilty or innocent, such censure is deserved; for judicial precautions are not less essential in dealing with the guilty than with the innocent. But it is deserved in an aggravated form, when we consider that the men against whom such injustice was perpetrated, had just come from achieving a glorious victory. Against the democratical constitution of Athens, it furnishes no ground for censure—nor against the habits and feelings which that constitution tended to implant in the individual citizen. Both the one and the other strenuously forbade the deed; nor could the Athenians ever have so dishonoured themselves, if they had not, under a momentary ferocious excitement, risen in insurrection not less against the forms of their own democracy, than against the most sacred restraints of their habitual constitutional morality.

Injustice of the proceeding—violation of the democratical maxims and sentiments.

¹ Diodor. xiii. 101. In regard to these two component elements of the majority, I doubt not that the statement of Diodorus is correct. But he represents, quite erroneously, that the generals were condemned by the vote of the assembly, and led off from the assembly to execution. The assembly only decreed that the subsequent urn-voting should take place, the result of which was necessarily uncertain beforehand. Accordingly the speech which Diodorus represents Diomedon to have made in the assembly, after the vote of the assembly had been declared, cannot be true history:—"Athenians, I wish that the vote which you have just passed may prove beneficial to the city. Do you take care to fulfill those vows to Zeus Soter, Apollo, and the Venerable Goddesses, under which we gained our victory, since fortune has prevented us from fulfilling them ourselves." It is impossible that Diomedon can have made a speech of this nature, since he was not then a condemned man; and after the condemnatory vote, no assembly can well have been held; since the sentence was peremptory, that the generals, if condemned, should be handed over to the Eleven. The sentiment, however, is one so natural for Diomedon to express, that he may well be imagined to have said something of the kind to the presiding Archon or to the Eleven, though there was no opportunity for saying it to the assembled people.

If we wanted proof of this, the facts of the immediate future would abundantly supply it. After a short time had elapsed, every man in Athens became heartily ashamed of the deed¹. A vote of the public assembly was passed², decreeing that those who had misguided the people on this occasion ought to be brought to judicial trial, that Kallixenus with four others should be among the number, and that bail should be taken for their appearance. This was accordingly done, and the parties were kept under custody of the sureties themselves, who were responsible for their appearance on the day of trial. But presently both foreign misfortunes and internal sedition began to press too heavily on Athens to leave any room for other thoughts, as we shall see in the next chapter. Kallixenus and his accomplices found means to escape, before the day of trial arrived, and remained in exile until after the dominion of the Thirty and the restoration of the democracy. Kallixenus then returned under the general amnesty. But the general amnesty protected him only against legal pursuit, not against the hostile memory of the people. "Detested by all, he died of hunger"—says Xenophon¹; a memorable proof how much the condemnation of these six generals shocked the standing democratical sentiment at Athens.

¹ I translate here literally the language of Sokrates in his Defence (Plato, Apol. c. 20)—κατασφαιρὸν, ὡς ἐν τῷ ἱερῷ χρόνῳ νόστον ἐποίησθε.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 39. This vote of the public assembly was known at Athens by the name of Probolis. The assembled people discharged on this occasion an extra-judicial function, something like that of a Grand Jury.

From what cause did this temporary burst of wrong arise, so foreign to the habitual character of the people? Even under the strongest political provocation, and towards the most hated traitors, (as Euryptolemus himself remarked by citing the case of Aristarchus,) after the Four Hundred as well as after the Thirty, the Athenians never committed the like wrong—never deprived an accused party of the customary judicial securities. How then came they to do it here, where the generals condemned were not only not traitors, but had just signalized themselves by a victorious combat? No Theramenes could have brought about this phenomenon; no deep-laid oligarchical plot is, in my judgment, to be called in as an explanation². The true explanation

Cause of the popular
excitement.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 40. παντοίῃσι τοῖς μέτροις, λιγὸν ἀνδύμενος.

² This is the supposition of Sievers, Forchhammer, and some other learned men; but, in my opinion, it is neither proved nor probable.

is different, and of serious moment to state. Political hatred, intense as it might be, was never dissociated, in the mind of a citizen of Athens, from the democratical forms of procedure: but the men, who stood out here as actors, had broken loose from the obligations of citizenship and commonwealth, and surrendered themselves, heart and soul, to the family sympathies and antipathies; feelings, first kindled, and justly kindled, by the thought that their friends and relatives had been left to perish unheeded on the wrecks—next, inflamed into preternatural and overwhelming violence by the festival of the Apaturia, where all the religious traditions connected with the ancient family tie, all those associations which imposed upon the relatives of a murdered man the duty of pursuing the murderer, were expanded into detail and worked up by their appropriate renovating solemnity. The garb of mourning and the shaving of the head—phenomena unknown at Athens either in a political assembly or in a religious festival—were symbols of temporary transformation in the internal man. He could think of nothing but his drowning relatives, together with the generals as having abandoned them to death, and his own duty as survivor to ensure to them vengeance and satisfaction for such abandonment. Under this self-justifying impulse, the shortest and surest proceeding appeared the best, whatever amount of political wrong it might entail: nay, in this case it

* If Thucydides had lived to continue his history so far down as to include this memorable event, he would have found occasion to notice τὸ ἐγγυρὸν (kinship) as being not less capable of ἀποφασιστικῶν πράξεων (unscrupulous daring) than τὸ ἐκαστικόν (faction). In his reflections on the Cerkiraean disturbances (iii. 82) he is led to dwell chiefly on the appeared the only proceeding really sure, since the interposition of the proper judicial delays, coupled with severance of trial on successive days according to the psephism of Kannónus, would probably have saved the lives of five out of the six generals,* if not of all the six. When we reflect that such absorbing sentiment was common, at one and the same time, to a large proportion of the Athenians, we shall see the explanation of that misguided vote, both of the Senate and of the Ekklesia, which sent the six generals to an illegal ballot—and of the subsequent ballot which condemned them. Such is the natural behaviour of those who, having for the moment forgotten their sense of political commonwealth, become degraded into exclusive family-men. The family affections, productive as they are of much gentle sympathy and mutual happiness in the interior circle, are also liable to generate disregard, malice, sometimes even ferocious vengeance, towards others. Powerful towards good generally, they are not less powerful occasionally towards evil; and require, not less than the selfish propensities, constant subordinating control from that moral reason which contemplates for its end the security and happiness of all. And when a man, either from low civilization, has never known this large moral reason—or when from some accidental stimulus, righteous in the origin, but wrought up into fanaticism by the latter—the antipathies of faction, of narrow political brotherhood or conspiracy for the attainment and maintenance of power—as most powerful in generating evil deeds: had he described the proceedings after the battle of Arginusæ, he would have seen that the sentiment of kinship, looked at on its antipathetic or vindictive side, is pregnant with the like tendencies.

conspiring force of religious as well as family sympathies, he comes to place his pride and virtue in discarding its supremacy—there is scarcely any amount of evil or injustice which he may not be led to perpetrate, by a blind obedience to the narrow instincts of relationship. “Ces pères de famille sont capables de tout”—was the satirical remark of Talleyrand upon the gross public jobbing so largely practised by those who sought place or promotion for their sons. The same words, understood in a far more awful sense and generalized for other cases of relationship, sum up the moral of this melancholy proceeding at Athens.

Lastly, it must never be forgotten that the generals themselves were also largely responsible in the case. Through the unjustifiable fury of the movement against them, they perished like innocent men—without trial—“inauditi et indefensi, tamquam innocentes, perierunt ;” but it does not follow that they were really innocent. I feel persuaded that neither with an English, nor French, nor American fleet, could such events have taken place as those which followed the victory of Arginusæ. Neither admiral nor seamen, after gaining a victory and driving off the enemy, could have endured the thoughts of going back to their anchorage, leaving their own disabled wrecks unmanageable on the waters, with many living comrades aboard, helpless, and depending upon extraneous succour for all their chance of escape. That the generals at Arginusæ did this, stands confessed by their own advocate Euryptolemus¹, though they must have known well

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 7, 31. Ἐπειδὴ γὰρ ἐπαύσατο τὴν ναυ-

the condition of disabled ships after a naval combat, and some ships even of the victorious fleet were sure to be disabled. If these generals, after their victory, instead of sailing back to land, had employed themselves first of all in visiting the crippled ships, there would have been ample time to perform this duty, and to save all the living men aboard, before the storm came on. This is the natural inference, even upon their own showing; this is what any English, French, or American naval commander would have thought it an imperative duty to do. What degree of blame is imputable to Theramenês, and how far the generals were discharged by shifting the responsibility to him, is a point which we cannot now determine. But the storm, which is appealed to as a justification of both, rests upon evidence too questionable to serve that purpose, where the neglect of duty was so serious, and cost the lives probably of more than 1000 brave men. At least, the Athenian people at home, when they heard the criminations and recriminations between the generals on one side and Theramenês on the other—each of them in his character of accuser implying that the storm was no valid obstacle, though each, if pushed for a defence, fell back upon it as a resource in case of need—the Athenian people could μαχίῃ πρὸς τὴν γῆν κατέπλευσαν, διωκόμεν μὲν δαίμονα, ἀναχθῆναι δὲ ἐπὶ κέρει θνήσκουσιν ἀναρῆσθαι τὰ ναύηματα καὶ τοὺς ναυογούς, Ἑρασμίδης δὲ, ἐπὶ τοῖς ἐν Μυτιλήνῃ πολεμίοις, τὴν ταχίστην πλεῖν ἀπαντας Ὀρόσικλους ὃ ἀμφότερα ἔφη γενέσθαι, ἢ τοὺς μὲν αὐτοῦ αὐτοκτείνουσι, τοὺς δὲ ἐπὶ τοῖς πολεμίοις πλείονας· καὶ δοξάζουσιν ταῦτα, &c.

I remarked a few pages before, that the case of Erasinidês stood in some measure apart from that of the other generals. He proposed, according to this speech of Eucryptolemus, that all the fleet should at once go again to Mitylênê; which would of course have left the men on the wrecks to their fate.

not but look upon the storm more as an afterthought to excuse previous omissions, than as a terrible reality nullifying all the ardour and resolution of men bent on doing their duty. It was in this way that the intervention of Theramenes chiefly contributed to the destruction of the generals, not by those manœuvres ascribed to him in Xenophon : he destroyed all belief in the storm as a real and all-covering hindrance. The general impression of the public at Athens—in my opinion, a natural and unavoidable impression—was that there had been most culpable negligence in regard to the wrecks, through which negligence alone the seamen on board perished. This negligence dishonours, more or less, the armament at Arginusæ as well as the generals : but the generals were the persons responsible to the public at home, who felt for the fate of the deserted seamen more justly as well as more generously than their comrades in the fleet.

In spite, therefore, of the guilty proceeding to which a furious exaggeration of such sentiment drove the Athenians—in spite of the sympathy which this has naturally and justly procured for the condemned generals—the verdict of impartial history will pronounce that the sentiment itself was well-founded, and that the generals deserved censure and disgrace. The Athenian people might with justice proclaim to them—“ Whatever be the grandeur of your victory, we can neither rejoice in it ourselves, nor allow you to reap honour from it, if we find that you have left many hundreds of those who helped in gaining it to be drowned on board the wrecks, without making any effort to save them, when such effort might well have proved successful." And the condemnation here pronounced, while it served as a painful admonition to subsequent Athenian generals; provided at the same time an efficacious guarantee for the preservation of combatants on the wrecks or swimming for their lives after a naval victory. One express case in point may be mentioned. Thirty years afterwards (a.c. 376) the Athenian admiral Chabrias defeated, though not without considerable loss, the Lacedæmonian fleet near Naxos. Had he pursued them vigorously, he might have completed his victory by destroying all or most of them; but recollecting what had happened after the battle of Arginusæ, he abstained from pursuit, devoted his attention to the wrecks of his own fleet, saved from death those citizens who were yet living, and picked up the dead for interment¹.

¹ Diodor. xv. 35.

Γαρόντος δὲ (Χαβρίας) ἐπὶ τοῦ προτερήματος, καὶ πᾶσι τῶν πολέμων οὕτως φεγγεῖ διακρίσας, ἀπέσχετο πητελᾶς τοῦ διαγμοῦ, διαμαρσθεῖς τῆς ἐν Ἀργινοῦσις ναυμαχίας, ἐν ᾗ τοῖς νικησάντι στρατηγοῖς ὁ δῆμος ἀπὲρ μεγάλης εὐεργεσίας θανάτῳ περιέβαλεν, αἰτιασάμενος ὅτι τοῖς τετελευτηκόσι ἐπὶ τῇ ναυμαχίᾳ οἷα ἔθαψεν, εὐλαβήθη μὴ ποτε τῇ περιστάσει ὁμοίᾳ γενομένη κινδυνεύσῃ παθεῖν παμπλήρη. Δοίειν ἀποστῆναι τοῦ δίκαιου, ἀπελίσχετο τῶν πολιτῶν τοὺς διανεχομένους, καὶ τοὺς μὲν ἔτι ζῶντας δίδωσεν, τοὺς δὲ τετελευτηκότας ἔθαψεν. Εἰ δὲ μὴ περὶ ταῦτος ἐγένετο τῇ ἐπιμέλειαν, βολίαις ἂν ἅπαντα τῶν πολέμων σπύλον διέφθειρε.

Here Diodorus, in alluding to the battle of Arginusæ, repeats the mistake which he had before made, as if the omission there concerned only dead bodies and not living men. But when he describes what was done by Chabrias at Naxos, he puts forward the preservation of living citizens not merely as a reality, but as the most prominent reality of the proceeding.

CHAPTER LXV.

FROM THE BATTLE OF ARGINUSÆ TO THE RESTORATION OF THE DEMOCRACY AT ATHENS, AFTER THE EXPULSION OF THE THIRTY.

B.C. 406.

Alleged
propositions of peace from Sparta to Athens—
doubtful.

THE victory of Arginusæ gave for the time decisive mastery of the Asiatic seas to the Athenian fleet; and is even said to have so discouraged the Lacedæmonians, as to induce them to send propositions of peace to Athens. But this statement is open to much doubt, and I think it most probable that no such propositions were made¹. Great as the victory

¹ The statement rests on the authority of Aristotle, as referred to by the Scholiast on the last verse of the Rana of Aristophanes. And this, so far as I know, is the only authority: for when Mr. Fynes Clinton (Fest. Hellen. ad ann. 406) says that Archinês (De Fals. Legat. p. 38. c. 24) mentions the overtures of peace—I think that no one who looks at that passage will be inclined to found any inference upon it.

Against it we may observe—

1. Xenophon does not mention it. This is something, though far from being conclusive when standing alone.
2. Diodorus does not mention it.
3. The terms alleged to have been proposed by the Lacedæmonians are exactly the same as those said to have been proposed by them after the death of Mindarus at Kyzikus, viz.—

To evacuate Dekaleia—and each party to stand as they were. Not only the terms are the same—but also the person who stood prominent in opposition is in both cases the same—Xenophon. The overtures after Arginusæ are in fact a second edition of those after the battle of Kyzikus.

Now, the supposition that on two several occasions the Lacedæmonians made propositions of peace, and that both are left unnoticed by Xenophon—appears to me highly improbable. In reference to the propositions after the battle of Kyzikus, the testimony of Diodorus outweighs, in my judgement, the silence of Xenophon; but here Diodorus is silent also.

In addition to this, the exact sameness of the two alleged events was, we look in vain for any positive results accruing to Athens. After an unsuccessful attempt on Chios, the victorious fleet went to Samos, where it seems to have remained until the following year, without any farther movements than were necessary for the purpose of procuring money.

Meanwhile Eteonikus, who collected the remains of the defeated Peloponnesian fleet at Chios, being left unsupplied with money by Cyrus, found himself much straitened, and was compelled to leave the seamen unpaid. During the later summer and autumn, these men maintained themselves by labouring for hire on the Chian lands; but when winter came, this resource ceased, so that they found themselves unable to procure even clothes or shoes. In such forlorn condition, many of them entered into a conspiracy to assail and plunder the town of Chios; a day was named for the enterprise, and it was agreed that the conspirators should know each other by wearing a straw or reed. Informed of the design, Eteonikus was at the same time intimidated by the number of these straw-bearers: he saw that if he dealt with the conspirators openly and ostensibly, they might perhaps rush to arms and succeed in plundering the town: at any rate a conflict would arise in which many of the allies would be slain, which would produce the worst effect upon all future operations. Accordingly, resorting to stratagem, he took with him a guard of fifteen men

Eteonikus
at Chios—distress of his seamen —conspiracy suppressed.

makes me think that the second is only a duplication of the first, and that the Scholiast, in citing from Aristotle, mistook the battle of Arginuse for that of Kyzikus, which latter was by far the more decisive of the two.

armed with daggers, and marched through the town of Chios. Meeting presently one of these straw-bearers—a man with a complaint in his eyes, coming out of a surgeon's house—he directed his guards to put the man to death on the spot. A crowd gathered round, with astonishment as well as sympathy, and inquired on what ground the man was put to death; upon which Eteonikus ordered his guards to reply, that it was because he wore a straw. The news being diffused, the remaining persons who wore straws became so alarmed as to throw their straws away¹.

Eteonikus availed himself of such panic to demand money from the Chians, as a condition of carrying away his starving and perilous armament. Having obtained from them a month's pay, he immediately put the troops on ship-board, taking pains to encourage them and make them fancy that he was unacquainted with the recent conspiracy.

The Chians and the other allies of Sparta presently assembled at Ephesus to consult, and resolved, in conjunction with Cyrus, to despatch envoys to the Ephors, requesting that Lysander might be sent out a second time as admiral. It was not the habit of Sparta ever to send out the same man as admiral a second time, after his year of service. Nevertheless the Ephors complied with the request substantially; sending out Arakus as admiral, but Lysander along with him under the title of secretary, invested with all the real powers of command.

Lysander, having reached Ephesus about the beginning of B.C. 405, immediately applied himself with vigour to renovate both Lacedæmonian power and his own influence. The partisans in the various allied cities, whose favour he had assiduously cultivated during his last year's command—the clubs and factious combinations which he had organized and stimulated into a partnership of mutual ambition—all hailed his return with exultation. Discountenanced and kept down by the generous patriotism of his predecessor Kallikratidas, they now sprang into renewed activity, and became zealous in aiding Lysander to refit and augment his fleet. Nor was Cyrus less hearty in his preference than before. On arriving at Ephesus, Lysander went speedily to visit him at Sardis, and solicited a renewal of the pecuniary aid. The young prince said in reply that all the funds which he had received from Susa had already been expended, with much more besides; in testimony of which he exhibited a specification of the sums furnished to each Peloponnesian officer. Nevertheless such was his partiality for Lysander, that he complied even with the additional demand now made, so as to send him away satisfied. The latter was thus enabled to return to Ephesus in a state for restoring the effective condition of his fleet. He made good at once all the arrears of pay due to the seamen—constituted new trierarchs—summoned Eteonikus with the fleet from Chios together with all the other scattered squadrons—and directed that fresh triremes should be immediately put on the stocks at Antandrus¹.

Solicitations from Chios and elsewhere that Lysander should be sent out again.

B.C. 405.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 1-4.

Arrival of Lysander at Ephesus—zeal of his partisans—
Cyrus.

In none of the Asiatic towns was the effect of Lysander's second advent felt more violently than

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 10-12.

Violent revolution at Miletus by the partisans of Lysander.

at Miletus. He had there a powerful faction or association of friends, who had done their best to hamper and annoy Kallikratidas on his first arrival, but had been put to silence, and even forced to make a show of zeal, by the straightforward resolution of that noble-minded admiral. Eager to reimburse themselves for this humiliation, they now formed a conspiracy, with the privity and concurrence of Lysander, to seize the government for themselves. They determined (if Plutarch and Diodorus are to be credited) to put down the existing democracy, and establish an oligarchy in its place. But we cannot believe that there could have existed a democracy at Miletus, which had now been for five years in dependence upon Sparta and the Persians jointly. We must rather understand the movement as a conflict between two oligarchical parties; the friends of Lysander being more thoroughly self-seeking and anti-popular than their opponents—and perhaps even crying them down, by comparison, as a democracy. Lysander lent himself to the scheme—fanned the ambition of the conspirators, who were at one time disposed to a compromise—and even betrayed the government into a false security, by promises of support which he never intended to fulfill. At the festival of the Dionysia, the conspirators, rising in arms, seized forty of their chief opponents in their houses, and three hundred more in the market-place; while the government—confiding in the promises of Lysander, who affected to reprove, but secretly continued instigating, the insurgents—made but a faint resistance. The three hundred and forty leaders thus seized, probably men who had gone heartily along with Kallikratidas, were all put to death; and a still larger number of citizens, not less than 1000, fled into exile. Milētus thus passed completely into the hands of the friends and partisans of Lysander¹.

It would appear that factious movements in other towns, less revolting in respect of bloodshed and perfidy, yet still of similar character to that of Milētus, marked the reappearance of Lysander in Asia; placing the towns more and more in the hands of his partisans. While thus acquiring greater ascendancy among the allies, Lysander received a summons from Cyrus to visit him at Sardis. The young prince had just been sent for to come and visit his father Darius, who was both old and dangerously ill in Media. About to depart for this purpose, he carried his confidence in Lysander so far as to delegate to him the management of his satrapy and his entire revenues. Besides his admiration for the superior energy and capacity of the Greek character, with which he had only recently contracted acquaintance—and besides his esteem for the personal disinterestedness of Lysander, attested as it had been by the conduct of the latter in the first visit and banquet at Sardis—Cyrus was probably induced to this step by the fear of raising up to himself a rival, if he trusted the like power to any Persian grandee. At the same time that he handed over all his tributes and his reserved funds to Lysander, he assured him of his steady friendship both towards himself and towards the Lacedæmonians; and concluded by entreating that he would by no means engage in any general action with the Athenians, unless at great advantage in point of numbers. The defeat of Arginusæ having strengthened his preference for this dilatory policy, he promised that not only the Persian treasures, but also the Phenician fleet, should be brought into active employment for the purpose of crushing Athens¹.

Cyrus goes to visit his dying father—confides his tributes to Lysander.

¹ Diodor. xiii. 104; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 8.

Thus armed with an unprecedented command of Persian treasure, and seconded by ascendent factions in all the allied cities, Lysander was more powerful than any Lacedæmonian commander had ever been since the commencement of the war. Having his fleet well-paid, he could keep it united and direct it whither he chose without the necessity of dispersing it in roving squadrons for the purpose of levying money. It is probably from a corresponding necessity that we are to explain the inaction of the Athenian fleet at Samos: for we hear of no serious operations undertaken by it, during the whole year following the victory of Arginusæ, although under the command of an able and energetic man, Konon—together with Philoklēs and Adeimantus; to whom were added, during the spring of 405 B.C., three other generals, Tydeus, Menander, and Kephisodotus. It appears that Theramēnēs also was put up and elected one of the generals, but rejected when submitted to the confirmatory examination called the *Dokimasy*². The fleet comprised 180 triremes, rather a greater number than that of Lysander; to whom they in vain offered battle near his station at Ephesus. Finding him not disposed to a general action, they seem to have dispersed to plunder Chios,

B.C. 405.

Inaction of the Athenian fleet after the battle of Arginusæ. Operations of Lysander.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 14: Plutarch, Lysand. c. 9.

² Lysias, Orat. xiii. cont. Agorast. sect. 13.

and various portions of the Asiatic coast; while Lysander, keeping his fleet together, first sailed southward from Ephesus—stormed and plundered a semi-Hellenic town in the Kerameikan Gulf, named Kedreïæ, which was in alliance with Athens—and thence proceeded to Rhodes¹. He was even bold enough to make an excursion across the Ægean to the coast of Ægina and Attica, where he had an interview with Agis, who came from Deceleia to the sea-coast². The Athenians were preparing to follow him thither when they learnt that he had recrossed the Ægean, and he soon afterwards appeared with all his fleet at the Hellespont, which important pass they had left unguarded. Lysander went straight to Abydos, still the great Peloponnesian station in the strait, occupied by Thorax as harmost with a land-force; and immediately proceeded to attack, both by sea and land, the neighbouring town of Lampsakus, which was taken by storm. It was wealthy in every way, and abundantly stocked with bread and wine, so that the soldiers obtained a large booty; but Lysander left the free inhabitants untouched³.

The Athenian fleet seems to have been employed in plundering Chios when it received news that the Lacedæmonian commander was at the Hellespont engaged in the siege of Lampsakus. Either from the want of money, or from other causes which we do not understand, Konon and his colleagues were partly

Both fleets
at the Hellespont.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 15, 16.

² This flying visit of Lysander across the Ægean to the coasts of Attica and Ægina is not noticed by Xenophon, but it appears both in Diodorus and in Plutarch (Diodor. xiii. 104; Plutarch. Lysand. c. 9).

³ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 18, 19; Diodor. xiii. 104; Plutarch. Lysand. c. 9.

inactive, partly behindhand with Lysander, throughout all this summer. They now followed him to the Hellespont, sailing out on the sea-side of Chios and Lesbos, away from the Asiatic coast, which was all unfriendly to them. They reached Eleus, at the southern extremity of the Chersonese, with their powerful fleet of 180 triremes, just in time to hear, while at their morning meal, that Lysander was already master of Lampsakus; upon which they immediately proceeded up the strait to Sestos, and from thence, after stopping only to collect a few provisions, still farther up—to a place called *Ægospotami*¹.

Ægospotami or Goat's River—a name of fatal sound to all subsequent Athenians—was a place which had nothing to recommend it except that it was directly opposite to Lampsakus, separated by a breadth of strait about one mile and three-quarters. But it was an open beach, without harbour, without good anchorage, without either houses or inhabitants or supplies; so that everything necessary for this large army had to be fetched from Sestos, about one mile and three-quarters distant even by land, and yet more distant by sea, since it was necessary to round a headland. Such a station was highly inconvenient and dangerous to an ancient naval armament, without any organized commissariat; for the seamen, being compelled to go to a distance from their ships in order to get their meals, were not easily reassembled. Yet this was the station chosen by the Athenian generals, with the full design of compelling Lysander to fight a battle. But the Lacedæmonian

Athenian
fleet at Ægospo-
tami.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 20, 21.

admiral, who was at Lampsakus in a good harbour, with a well-furnished town in his rear and a land-force to cooperate, had no intention of accepting the challenge of his enemies at the moment which suited their convenience. When the Athenians sailed across the strait the next morning, they found all his ships fully manned,—the men having already taken their morning meal,—and ranged in perfect order of battle, with the land-force disposed ashore to lend assistance; but with strict orders to await attack and not to move forward. Not daring to attack him in such a position, yet unable to draw him out by manœuvring all the day, the Athenians were at length obliged to go back to Ægospotami. But Lysander directed a few swift sailing vessels to follow them, nor would he suffer his own men to disembark until he thus ascertained that their seamen had actually dispersed ashore¹.

For four successive days this same scene was repeated; the Athenians becoming each day more confident in their own superior strength, and more full of contempt for the apparent cowardice of the enemy. It was in vain that Alkibiadēs—who from his own private forts in the Chersonese witnessed what was passing—rode up to the station and remonstrated with the generals on the exposed condition of the fleet on this open shore; urgently advising them to move round to Sestos, where they would be both close to their own supplies and safe from attack, as Lysander was at Lampsakus—and from whence they could go forth to fight whenever

Battle of Ægospo-
tami—surprise and capture of the entire Athenian
fleet.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 22-24; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 10; Thodor. xiii. 105.

they chose. But the Athenian generals, especially Tydeus and Menander, disregarded his advice, and even dismissed him with the insulting taunt, that they were now in command, not he¹. Continuing thus in their exposed position, the Athenian seamen on each successive day became more and more careless of their enemy, and rash in dispersing the moment they returned back to their own shore. At length, on the fifth day, Lysander ordered the scout ships, which he sent forth to watch the Athenians on their return, to hoist a bright shield as a signal, as soon as they should see the ships at their anchorage and the crews ashore in quest of their meal. The moment he beheld this welcome signal, he gave orders to his entire fleet to row across as swiftly as possible from Lampsakus to Ægospotami, while Thorax marched along the strand with the land-force in case of need. Nothing could be more complete or decisive than the surprise of the Athenian fleet. All the triremes were caught at their moorings ashore, some entirely deserted, others with one or at most two of the three tiers of rowers

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 25; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 10; Plutarch, Alkib. c. 36.

Diodorus (xiii. 165) and Cornelius Nepos (Alcib. c. 8) represent Alkibiades as wishing to be re-admitted to a share in the command of the fleet, and as promising, if that were granted, that he would assemble a body of Thracians, attack Lysander by land, and compel him to fight a battle or retire. Plutarch (Alcib. c. 37) alludes also to promises of this sort held out by Alkibiades.

Yet it is not likely that Alkibiades should have talked of anything so obviously impossible. How could he bring a Thracian land-force to attack Lysander who was on the opposite side of the Hellespont? How could he carry a land-force across in the face of Lysander's fleet?

The representation of Xenophon (followed in my text) is clear and intelligible.

which formed their complement. Out of all the total of 180, only twelve were found in tolerable order and preparation¹; the trireme of Konon himself, together with a squadron of seven under his immediate orders—and the consecrated ship called Paralus, always manned by picked Athenian seamen, being among them. It was in vain that Konon, on seeing the fleet of Lysander approaching, employed his utmost efforts to get his fleet manned and in some condition for resistance. The attempt was desperate, and the utmost which he could do was to escape himself with the small squadron of twelve, including the Paralus. All the remaining triremes, nearly 170 in number, were captured by Lysander on the shore, defenceless, and seemingly without the least attempt on the part of any one to resist. He landed and made prisoners most of the crews ashore, though some of them fled and found shelter in the neighbouring forts. This prodigious and unparalleled victory was obtained, not merely without the loss of a single ship, but almost without that of a single man².

Of the number of prisoners taken by Lysander—which must have been very great, since the total crews of 180 triremes were not less than 36,000 men³—we hear only of 3000 or 4000 native Athe-

Capture of the Athenian commanders, all except Konon.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 29; Lysias, Orat. xxi. (Ἀπολ. Δαμοδ.) s. 12.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 28; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 11; Plutarch, Alkibiad. c. 36; Cornel. Nepos, Lysanul. c. 8; Polyæn. i. 45, 2.

Diodorus (xiii. 106) gives a different representation of this important military operation; far less clear and trustworthy than that of Xenophon.

³ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 28: τὰς δ' ἄλλας πέντε (καὶ) Λύσανδρος ἔλαβε πρὸς τῇ γῇ τοὺς δὲ πλείστους ἄνδρας ἐκ τῇ γῇ ἐνέειλε· οἱ δὲ καὶ ἔφυγον ἐς τὰ τεχνόδρια.

nians, though this number cannot represent all the native Athenians in the fleet. The Athenian generals Philoklès and Adeimantus were certainly taken, and seemingly all except Konon. Some of the defeated armament took refuge in Sestos, which however surrendered with little resistance to the victor. He admitted them to capitulation, on condition of their going back immediately to Athens, and nowhere else; for he was desirous to multiply as much as possible the numbers assembled in that city, knowing well that it would be the sooner starved out. Konon too was well-aware that to go back to Athens, after the ruin of the entire fleet, was to become one of the certain prisoners in a doomed city; and to meet, besides, the indignation of his fellow-citizens, so well deserved by the generals collectively. Accordingly he resolved to take shelter with Evagoras, prince of Salamis in the island of Cyprus, sending the Paralus with some others of the twelve fugitive triremes to make known the fatal news at Athens. But before he went thither, he crossed the strait—with singular daring under the circumstances—to Cape Abarnis in the territory of Lampsakus, where the great sails of Lysander's triremes (always taken out when a trireme was made ready for fighting) lay seemingly unguarded. These sails he took away, so as to lessen the enemy's powers of pursuit, and then made the best of his way to Cyprus¹.

On the very day of the victory, Lysander sent off the Milesian privateer Theopompus to proclaim it at Sparta, who, by a wonderful speed of rowing, ¹ Xenoph. Hællæp. ii. 1, 29; Diodor. xiii. 100; the latter is discordant, however, on many points.

Slaughter of the captive generals and prisoners.

arrived there and made it known on the third day after starting. The captured ships were towed off and the prisoners carried across, to Lampsakus, where a general assembly of the victorious allies was convened, to determine in what manner the prisoners should be treated. In this assembly the most bitter inculpations were put forth against the Athenians, as to the manner in which they had recently dealt with their captives. The Athenian general Philoklēs, having captured a Corinthian and Andrian trireme, had put the crews to death by hurling them headlong from a precipice. It was not difficult, in Grecian warfare, for each of the belligerents to cite precedents of cruelty against the other; but in this debate some speakers affirmed that the Athenians had deliberated what they should do with their prisoners, in case they had been victorious at Ægospotami; and that they had determined—chiefly on the motion of Philoklēs, but in spite of the opposition of Adeimantus—that they would cut off the right hands of all who were captured. Whatever opinion Philoklēs may have expressed personally, it is highly improbable that any such determination was ever taken by the Athenians¹. In this assembly of the allies, however, besides all that could be said against Athens with truth, doubtless the most extravagant falsehoods found ready credence. All the Athenian prisoners captured at Ægospotami, 3000 or 4000 in number, were massacred forthwith—Philoklēs himself at their head¹. The latter, taunted by Lysander with his cruel execution of the Corinthian and Andrian crews, disdained to return any answer, but placed himself in conspicuous vestments at the head of the prisoners led out to execution. If we may believe Pausanias, even the bodies of the prisoners were left unburied.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 31. This story is given with variations in Plutarch. Lysand. c. 9, and by Cicero de Offic. iii. 11. It is there the right thumb which is to be cut off—and the determination is alleged to have been taken in reference to the Æginetans.

Never was a victory more complete in itself, more overwhelming in its consequences, or more thoroughly disgraceful to the defeated generals taken collectively, than that of Ægospotami. Whether it was in reality very glorious to Lysander, is doubtful; for the general belief afterwards—not merely at Athens, but seemingly in other parts of Greece also—held that the Athenian fleet had been sold to perdition by the treason of some of its own commanders. Of such a suspicion both Konon and Philoklēs stand clear. Adeimantus was named as the chief traitor, and Tydeus along with him². Konon even preferred an accusation against Adeimantus to this effect³, probably by letter written home from Cyprus, and

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 32; Pausan. ix. 32, 6; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 13.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 1, 32; Lysias cont. Alcib. A. s. 38; Pausan. iv. 17, 2; x. 9, 5; Isokratēs ad Philipp. Or. v. sect. 70. Lysias, in his Δίκες Ἐπιδρόφου (s. 58), speaks of the treason, yet not as a matter of certainty. We cannot make out distinctly how many of the Athenian generals were captured at Ægospotami.

Cornelius Nepos (Lysand. c. 1; Alcib. c. 8) notices only the disorder of the Athenian armament, not the corruption of the generals, as having caused the defeat. Nor does Diodorus notice the corruption (xiii. 105).

Both these authors seem to have copied from Theopompus, in describing the battle of Ægospotami. His description differs on many points from that of Xenophon (Theopomp. Fragn. 8, ed. Didot).

³ Demosthen. de Fals. Legat. p. 401. c. 57.

The Athenian fleet supposed to have been betrayed by its own commanders.

perhaps by some formal declaration made several years afterwards, when he returned to Athens as victor from the battle of Knidus. The truth of the charge cannot be positively demonstrated, but all the circumstances of the battle tend to render it probable, as well as the fact that Konon alone among all the generals was found in a decent state of preparation. Indeed we may add, that the utter impotence and inertness of the numerous Athenian fleet during the whole summer of 405 B.C., conspire to suggest a similar explanation. Nor could Lysander, master as he was of all the treasures of Cyrus, apply any portion of them more efficaciously than in corrupting one or more of the six Athenian generals, so as to nullify all the energy and ability of Konon.

The great defeat of Ægospotami took place about September 405 A.C. It was made known at Peiræus by the Paralus, which arrived there during the night, coming straight from the Hellespont. Such a moment of distress and agony had never been experienced at Athens. The terrible disaster in Sicily had become known to the people by degrees, without any authorized reporter; but here was the official messenger, fresh from the scene, leaving no room to question the magnitude of the disaster or the irreparable ruin impending over the city. The wailing and cries of woe, first beginning in Peiræus, were transmitted by the guards stationed on the Long Walls up to the city. "On that night (says Xenophon) not a man slept; not merely from sorrow for the past calamity, but from terror for the future fate with which they themselves were now menaced, a retribution for what they had themselves

A.C. 405,
Sept.

Distress and agony
at Athens, when the defeat of Ægospotami was made known
there.

inflicted on the Æginetans, Melians, Skionæans, and others." After this night of misery, they met in public assembly on the following day, resolving to make the best preparations they could for a siege, to put the walls in full state of defence, and to block up two out of the three ports¹. For Athens thus to renounce her maritime action, the pride and glory of the city ever since the battle of Salamis—and to confine herself to a defensive attitude within her own walls—was a humiliation which left nothing worse to be endured except actual famine and surrender.

Lysander was in no hurry to pass from the Hellespont to Athens. He knew that no farther cornships from the Euxine, and few supplies from other quarters, could now reach Athens; and that the power of the city to hold out against blockade must necessarily be very limited; the more limited, the greater the numbers accumulated within it. Accordingly, he permitted the Athenian garrisons which capitulated, to go only to Athens, and nowhere else². His first measure was to make himself master of Chalkêdon and Byzantium, where he placed the Lacedæmonian Sthenelaus as harmost with a garrison. Next he passed to Lesbos, where he made similar arrangements at Mitylênê and other cities. In them, as well as in the other cities which now came under his power, he constituted an oligarchy of ten native citizens, chosen from among his most daring and unscrupulous partisans, and called a Dekarchy or Dekadarchy, to govern in conjunction with the Lacedæmonian harmost. Eteonikus was sent to the Thracian cities which had been in dependence on Athens to introduce similar changes. In Thasus, however, this change was stained by much bloodshed: there was a numerous philo-Athenian party whom Lysander caused to be allured out of their place of concealment into the temple of Heraklēs, under the false assurance of an amnesty: when assembled under this pledge, they were all put to death¹. Sanguinary proceedings of the like character, many in the presence of Lysander himself, together with large expulsions of citizens obnoxious to his new dekarchies, signalized everywhere the substitution of Spartan for Athenian ascendancy². But nowhere, except at Samos, did the citizens or the philo-Athenian party in the cities continue any open hostility, or resist by force Lysander's entrance and his revolutionary changes. At Samos they still held out: the people had too much dread of that oligarchy, whom they had expelled in the insurrection of 412 B.C., to yield without a farther struggle³.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 3; Diodor. xiii. 107.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 2; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 13.

¹ Cornelius Nepos, Lysand. c. 2; Polyæn. i. 45, 4. It would appear that this is the same incident which Plutarch (Lysand. c. 19) recounts as if the Milesians, not the Thasians, were the parties suffering. It cannot well be the Milesians, however—if we compare chapter 8 of Plutarch's Life of Lysander.

² Plutarch, Lysand. c. 13. πολλὰς παρανομίας αὐτὸς σφάγις καὶ συνεκίδνατο τοὺς τῶν φίλων ἐχθροὺς, &c.

³ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 6. εἴθις δὲ καὶ ἡ ἄλλη Ἑλλὰς ἀφίσταται Ἀθηναίῳ, πλὴν Σαμίῳ· αὐτοὶ δὲ, σφάγις τῶν γεωργῶν ποιήσαντες, κατέκταν τὴν πόλιν.

I interpret the words σφάγις τῶν γεωργῶν ποιήσαντες to refer to the violent revolution at Samos described in Thucyd. viii. 21—whereby the oligarchy were dispossessed and a democratical government established. The word σφάγις is used by Xenophon (Hellen. v. 4, 14) in a subsequent passage to describe the conspiracy and revolution effected by Pelopidas and his friends at Thebes. It is true that we might rather have expected the preterite participle πρὸςποιήσαντες than the aorist ποιή-

With this single reserve, every city in alliance or dependence upon Athens submitted without resistance both to the supremacy and the subversive measures of the Lacedæmonian admiral.

Miserable condition of the Athenian Kleruchs and of the friends of Athens in the allied dependencies. Suffering in Athens.

The Athenian empire was thus annihilated, and Athens left altogether alone. What was hardly less painful—all her Kleruchs or out-citizens whom she had formerly planted in Ægina, Melos and elsewhere throughout the islands, as well as in the Chersonese, were now deprived of their properties and driven home¹. The leading philo-Athenians, too, at Thasus, Byzantium, and other dependent cities², were forced to abandon their homes in the like state of destitution, and to seek shelter at Athens. Everything thus contributed to aggravate the impoverishment, and the manifold suffering, physical as well as moral, within her walls. Notwithstanding the warres. But this employment of the aorist participle in a preterite sense is not uncommon with Xenophon: see παρηγορησαι, ἐξέας—i. 1, 31; γεννησέναι—i. 7, 11; ii. 2, 20.

It appears to me highly improbable that the Samians should have chosen this occasion to make a fresh massacre of their oligarchical citizens, as Mr. Mitford represents. The democratical Samians must have been now humbled and intimidated, seeing their subjugation approaching; and only determined to hold out by finding themselves already so deeply compromised through the former revolution. Nor would Lysander have spared them personally afterwards, as we shall find that he did when he had them substantially in his power (ii. 3, 6), if they had now committed any fresh political massacre.

¹ Xenoph. Memorab. ii. 8, 1; ii. 10, 4; Xenoph. Sympos. iv. 31. Compare Demosthen. cont. Leptin. c. 24. p. 491.

A great number of new proprietors acquired land in the Chersonese through the Lacedæmonian sway, doubtless in place of these dispossessed Athenians; perhaps by purchase at a low price, but most probably by appropriation without purchase (Xenoph. Hellen. iv. 8, 5).

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 2, 1; Demosthen. cont. Leptin. c. 14. p. 474. Elephantus and the other Thasian exiles received the grant of ἀνέλευσις, or immunity from the peculiar charges imposed upon metics at Athens.

pressure of present calamity, however, and yet worse prospects for the future, the Athenians prepared as best they could for an honourable resistance.

It was one of their first measures to provide for the restoration of harmony, and to interest all in the defence of the city, by removing every sort of disability under which individual citizens might now be suffering. Accordingly Patrokleidēs—having first obtained special permission from the people, without which it would have been unconstitutional to make any proposition for abrogating sentences judicially passed, or releasing debtors regularly inscribed in the public registers—submitted a decree such as had never been mooted since the period when Athens was in a condition equally desperate, during the advancing march of Xerxes. All debtors to the state, either recent or of long standing—all official persons now under investigation by the Logistæ or about to be brought before the dikastery on the usual accountability after office—all persons who were liquidating by instalment debts due to the public, or had given bail for sums thus owing—all persons who had been condemned either to total disfranchisement, or to some specific disqualification or disability—nay, even all those who, having been either members or auxiliaries of the Four Hundred, had stood trial afterwards, and had been condemned to any one of the above-mentioned penalties—all these persons were pardoned and released; every register of the penalty or condemnation being directed to be destroyed. From this comprehensive pardon were excepted—Those among the Four Hundred who had fled from Athens without standing their trial—Those who had been condemned either to exile or to death by the Areopagus or any of the other constituted tribunals for homicide, or for subversion of the public liberty. Not merely the public registers of all the condemnations thus released were ordered to be destroyed, but it was forbidden, under severe penalties, to any private citizen to keep a copy of them, or to make any allusion to such misfortunes¹.

Amnesty proposed by Patrokleidēs, and adopted.

Pursuant to the comprehensive amnesty and forgiveness adopted by the people in this decree of Patrokleidēs, the general body of citizens swore to each other a solemn pledge of mutual harmony in the acropolis². The reconciliation thus introduced enabled them the better to bear up under their distress³; especially as the persons relieved by the amnesty were for the most part not men politically disaffected, like the exiles. To restore the latter, was a measure which no one thought of: indeed a large proportion of them had been and were still at Dekeleia, assisting the Lacedæmonians in their warfare against Athens⁴. But even the most prudent internal measures could do little for Athens

Oath of mutual harmony sworn in the acropolis.

¹ This interesting decree or prephasia of Patrokleidēs is given at length in the Oration of Andokidēs de Mysteriis, s. 76-80—Ἄνδρες Ἀθηναῖοι, μὴ πενήθετε ἰδίᾳ μηδὲ ἑξῆσι, μηδὲ μετὰ πλείονος μηδέποτε.

² Andokid., de Myst. s. 76. καὶ εἰς τὴν ἀλλήλων περὶ ὁμοίας δοῦναι τὴν ἐκποσίαν.

³ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 11. τοῖς ἀτίμοις ἐπίτιμοις παύσαντες ἐμπίμπου.

⁴ Andokidēs de Mysteriis, s. 80-101; Lysias, Orat. xviii. De Bonis Niimi Frat. sect. 9.

At what particular moment the severe condemnatory decrees had been passed by the Athenian assembly against the exiles serving with the Lacedæmonian garrison at Dekeleia—we do not know. The decree is mentioned by Lykurgus cont. Leokrat. sect. 122, 123, p. 164.

in reference to her capital difficulty—that of procuring subsistence for the numerous population within her walls, augmented every day by outlying garrisons and citizens. She had long been shut out from the produce of Attica by the garrison at Dekeleia: she obtained nothing from Eubœa, and since the late defeat of Ægospotami, nothing from the Euxine, from Thrace, or from the islands. Perhaps some corn may still have reached her from Cyprus, and her small remaining navy did what was possible to keep Peiræus supplied¹, in spite of the menacing prohibitions of Lysander, preceding his arrival to block it up effectually; but to accumulate any stock for a siege, was utterly impossible.

At length, about November 405 a.c., Lysander reached the Saronic Gulf, having sent intimation beforehand both to Agis and to the Lacedæmonians, that he was approaching with a fleet of 200 triremes. The full Lacedæmonian and Peloponnesian force (all except the Argeians), under King Pausanias, was marched into Attica to meet him, and encamped in the precinct of Acadêmus, at the gates of Athens; while Lysander, first coming to Ægina with his overwhelming fleet of 150 sail,—next, ravaging Salamis,—blocked up completely the harbour of Peiræus. It was one of his first measures to collect together the remnant which he could find of the Æginetan and Melian populations, whom Athens had expelled and destroyed; and to restore to them the possession of their ancient islands².

Arrival of Lysander.
Athens is blocked up by sea and land.

¹ Isokrâtes adv. Kallimachum, sect. 71; compare Andokidês de Re-ditu suo, sect. 21, and Lysias cont. Diogenem, Or. xxxii. sect. 22, about Cyprus and the Chersonese, as ordinary sources of supply of corn to Athens.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 9; Diodor. xiii. 107.

Resolute holding-out of the Athenians
—their propositions for capitalating are refused.

Though all hope had now fled, the pride, the resolution, and the despair of Athens, still enabled her citizens to bear up: nor was it until some men actually began to die of hunger that they sent propositions to entreat peace. Even then their propositions were not without dignity. They proposed to Agis to become allies of Sparta, retaining their walls entire and their fortified harbour of Peiræus. Agis referred the envoys to the Ephors at Sparta, to whom he at the same time transmitted a statement of their propositions. But the Ephors, not deigning even to admit the envoys to an interview, sent messengers to meet them at Sellasia on the frontier of Laconia, desiring that they would go back and come again prepared with something more admissible—and acquainting them at the same time that no proposition could be received which did not include the demolition of the Long Walls, for a continuous length of ten stadia. With this gloomy reply the envoys returned. Notwithstanding all the suffering in the city, the senate and people would not consent even to take such humiliating terms into consideration. A senator named Archestratus, who advised that they should be accepted, was placed in custody, and a general vote was passed¹, on the proposition of Kleophon, forbidding any such motion in future.

Pretences of Theramenis—he is sent as envoy—his studied delay.

Such a vote demonstrates the courageous patience both of the senate and the people; but unhappily it supplied no improved prospects, while the suffering within the walls continued to become more and more aggravated. Under these circumstances, Thera-menês offered to go as envoy to Lysander and Sparta, affirming that he should be able to detect what the real intention of the Ephors was in regard to Athens, —whether they really intended to root out the population and sell them as slaves. He pretended further to possess personal influence, founded on circumstances which he could not divulge, such as would very probably ensure a mitigation of the doom. He was accordingly sent, in spite of strong protest from the senate of Areopagus and others; yet with no express powers to conclude, but simply to inquire and report. We hear with astonishment that he remained more than three months as companion of Lysander, who (he alleged) had detained him thus long, and had only acquainted him, after the fourth month had begun, that no one but the Ephors had any power to grant peace. It seems to have been the object of Theramenês, by this long delay, to wear out the patience of the Athenians, and to bring them into such a state of intolerable suffering that they would submit to any terms of peace which would only bring provisions into the town. In this scheme he completely succeeded; and considering how great were the privations of the people even at the moment of his departure, it is not easy to understand how they could have been able to sustain protracted and increasing famine for three months longer¹.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 12-15; Lysias cont. Agorat. § 10-12.

We make out little that is distinct respecting these last moments of imperial Athens. We find only an

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 16; Lysias, Orat. xiii. cont. Agorist. sect. 12; Lysias, Orat. xii. cont. Eratosthen. sect. 65-71.

See an illustration of the great suffering during the siege, in Xenophon, Apolog. Socrat. s. 18.

Misery and famine in Athens—
death of
Kleophon.

heroic endurance displayed, to such a point that numbers actually died of starvation, without any offer to surrender on humiliating conditions¹. Amidst the general acrimony, and exasperated special antipathies, arising out of such a state of misery, the leading men who stood out most earnestly for prolonged resistance became successively victims to the prosecutions of their enemies. The demagogue Kleophon was condemned and put to death, on the accusation of having evaded his military duty; the senate, whose temper and proceedings he had denounced, constituting itself a portion of the Dikastery which tried him—contrary both to the forms and the spirit of Athenian judicatures². Such proceedings, however, though denounced by orators in subsequent years as having contributed to betray the city into the hands of the enemy, appear to have been without any serious influence on the result, which was brought about purely by famine.

By the time that Theramenes returned after his long absence, so terrible had the pressure become

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 15-21: compare Isokrates, Areopagit. Or. vii. sect. 73.

² Lysias, Orat. xiii. cont. Agarat. sect. 15, 16, 37; Orat. xxx. cont. Nikomach. sect. 13-17.

This seems the most probable story as to the death of Kleophon, though the accounts are not all consistent, and the statement of Xenophon, especially (Hellen. i. 7, 35), is not to be reconciled with Lysias. Xenophon conceived Kleophon as having perished earlier than this period, in a sedition (ἐν τῷ χρόνῳ τῷ ἐκείνῳ ἐν ᾧ Κλεοφῶν ἀνέβη), before the flight of Kallixenus from his recognizance. It is scarcely possible that Kallixenus could have been still under recognizance, during this period of suffering between the battle of Ægospotami and the capture of Athens. He must have escaped before that battle. Neither long detention of an accused party in prison, before trial—nor long postponement of trial when he was under recognizance—were at all in Athenian habits.

that he was sent forth again with instructions to conclude peace upon any terms. On reaching Selasia, and acquainting the Ephors that he brought with him unlimited powers for peace, he was permitted to come to Sparta, where the assembly of the Peloponnesian confederacy was convened, to settle on what terms peace should be granted. The leading allies, especially Corinthians and Thebans, recommended that no agreement should be entered into, nor any farther measure kept, with this hated enemy now in their power; but that the name of Athens should be rooted out, and the population sold for slaves. Many of the other allies seconded the same views, which would have probably commanded a majority, had it not been for the resolute opposition of the Lacedæmonians themselves; who declared unequivocally that they would never consent to annihilate or enslave a city which had rendered such capital service to all Greece at the time of the great common danger from the Persians¹. Lysander far-

The famine becomes intolerable—Theramenes is sent to obtain peace on any terms—debate about the terms at Sparta.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 19; vi. 5, 35-46; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 15.

The Thebans, a few years afterwards, when they were soliciting aid from the Athenians against Sparta, disavowed this proposition of their delegate Erianthus, who had been the leader of the Boeotian contingent serving under Lysander at Eguspotami, honoured in that character by having his statue erected at Delphi, along with the other allied leaders who took part in the battle, and along with Lysander and Eteonikus (Pausan. x. 9, 4).

It is one of the exaggerations frequent with Isokratēs, to serve a present purpose, when he says that the Thebans were the only parties, among all the Peloponnesian confederates, who gave this harsh anti-Athenian vote (Isokratēs, Orat. Plataic. Or. xiv. sect. 34).

Demosthenēs says that the Phokians gave their vote in the same spirit against the Theban proposition (Demosth. de Fals. Legat. c. 22, p. 361).

It seems from Diodor. xv. 63, and Polyæn. i. 45, 5, as well as from some passages in Xenophon himself, that the motives of the Lacedæ-

Peace is granted by Sparta, against the general sentiment of the allies.

ther calculated on so dealing with Athens, as to make her into a dependency, and an instrument of increased power, to Sparta apart from her allies. Peace was accordingly granted on the following conditions: That the Long Walls and the fortifications of the Peiræus should be destroyed: That the Athenians should evacuate all their foreign possessions, and confine themselves to their own territory: That they should surrender all their ships of war: That they should re-admit all their exiles: That they should become allies of Sparta, following her leadership both by sea and land, and recognising the same enemies and friends¹.

Surrender of Athens—extreme wretchedness—number of deaths from famine.

With this document, written according to Lacedæmonian practice on a Skytalê, (or roll intended to go round a stick, of which the Lacedæmonian commander had always one, and the Ephors another, corresponding,) Theramènes went back to Athens. As he entered the city, a miserable crowd flocked round him, in distress and terror lest he should have failed altogether in his mission. The dead and the dying had now become so numerous, that peace at any price was a boon: nevertheless, when he announced in the assembly the terms of which he was bearer, strongly recommending submission to the Lacedæmonians as the only course now open—there was still a high-spirited minority who entered their protest, and preferred death by famine to such in-monians, in thus resisting the proposition of the Thebans against Athens, were founded in policy more than in generosity.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 30; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 14; Diodor. xiii. 107. Plutarch gives the express words of the Lacedæmonian decree, some of which words are very perplexing. The conjecture of G. Hermann—αὶ χερσὶν instead of ἀ χερσὶν—has been adopted into the text of Plutarch by Sintenis, though it seems very uncertain.

supportable disgrace. The large majority however accepted them, and the acceptance was made known to Lysander¹.

It was on the 16th day of the Attic month Munychion² (about the middle or end of March) that this victorious commander sailed into the Peiræus—twenty-seven years (almost exactly) after that surprise of Plataea by the Thebans, which opened the Peloponnesian war. Along with him came the Athenian exiles, several of whom appear to have been serving with his army³, and assisting him with their counsel. To the population of Athens generally, his entry was an immediate relief, in spite of the cruel degradation, or indeed political extinction, with which it was accompanied. At least it averted the sufferings and horrors of famine, and permitted a decent interment of the many unhappy victims who had already perished. The Lacedæmonians, both naval and military force, under Lysander and Agis, continued in occupation of Athens until the conditions of the peace had been fulfilled. All the triremes in Peiræus were carried away by Lysander, except twelve, which he permitted the Athenians to retain: the Ephors in their Skytalê had left it to his discretion what number he would thus allow⁴. The unfinished ships in the dockyards were burnt,

B.C. 404.
Lysander enters Athens—return of the exiles—demolition of the Long Walls—dismantling of Peiræus—fleet given up.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 23. Lysias (Orat. xii. cont. Erastosth. s. 71) lays the blame of this wretched and humiliating peace upon Theramenes, who plainly ought not to be required to bear it: compare Lysias, Orat. xiii. cont. Agorast. s. 12-20.

² Plutarch, Lysand. c. 15. He says however that this was also the day on which the Athenians gained the battle of Salamis. This is incorrect: that victory was gained in the month Boedromion.

³ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 18.

⁴ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 20-ii. 3, 8, Plutarch, Lysand. c. 14. He gives the contents of the Skytalê verbatim.

and the arsenals themselves ruined¹. To demolish the Long Walls and the fortifications of Peiræus, was however a work of some time; and a certain number of days were granted to the Athenians, within which it was required to be completed. In the beginning of the work, the Lacedæmonians and their allies all lent a hand, with the full pride and exultation of conquerors; amidst women playing the flute and dancers crowned with wreaths; mingled with joyful exclamations from the Peloponnesian allies, that this was the first day of Grecian freedom². How many days were allowed for the humiliating duty imposed upon Athenian hands, of demolishing the elaborate, tutelary, and commanding works of their forefathers—we are not told. But the business was not completed within the interval named, so that the Athenians did not come up to the letter of the conditions, and had therefore by strict construction forfeited their title to the peace granted³. The interval seems however to have been prolonged; probably considering that for the real labour, as well as the melancholy character, of the work to be done, too short a time had been allowed at first.

It appears that Lysander, after assisting at the solemn ceremony of beginning to demolish the walls, and making such a breach as left Athens without

¹ Plutarch, Lysand. c. 15; Lysias cont. Agorat. § 50, ἐν δὲ τῷ τείχῳ ἡ καταστροφή, καὶ αἱ εἰς τοὺς πυλῶναις παραδόχῃς, καὶ τὰ νεώρια καθάρματα, &c.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 23. καὶ τὰ τεῖχος κατασκευῆς ἐν ἀνδραγαθίᾳ πολλῇ προθυμίᾳ, καὶ ἡρώδεσσι δούκῃσι τῆς πόλεως τῇ Ἑλλάδι ἀρχῇ τῆς ἀναστροφῆς.

Plutarch, Lysand. c. 15.

³ Lysias cont. Eratosth. Or. iii. sect. 75, p. 431 R; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 15; Diodor. xiv. 3.

any substantial means of resistance—did not remain to complete the work, but withdrew with a portion of his fleet to undertake the siege of Samos which still held out, leaving the remainder to see that the conditions imposed were fulfilled¹. After so long an endurance of extreme misery, doubtless the general population thought of little except relief from famine and its accompaniments, without any disposition to contend against the fiat of their conquerors. If some high-spirited men formed an exception to the pervading depression, and still kept up their courage against better days—there was at the same time a party of totally opposite character, to whom the prostrate condition of Athens was a source of revenge for the past, exultation for the present, and ambitious projects for the future. These were partly the remnant of that faction which had set up (seven years before) the oligarchy of Four Hundred—and still more, the exiles, including several members of the Four Hundred², who now flocked in from all quarters. Many of them had been long serving at Deceleia, and had formed a part of the force blockading Athens. These exiles now revisited the acropolis as conquerors, and saw with delight the full accomplishment of that foreign occupation at which many of them had aimed seven years before, when they constructed the fortress of Eetioncia, as a means of ensuring their own power. Though the conditions imposed extinguished at once the imperial character,

The exiles and the oligarchical party in Athens—their triumphant behaviour and devotion to Lysander.

¹ Lysander dedicated a golden crown to Athénè in the acropolis—which is recorded in the inscriptions among the articles belonging to the goddess.

See Boeckh, Corp. Inscr. Insc. Attic. Nos. 150-152, p. 235.

² Lysias, Or. xiii. cont. Agorai s. 80.

the maritime power, the honour, and the independence of Athens, these men were as eager as Lysander to carry them all into execution; because the continuance of the Athenian democracy was now entirely at his mercy, and because his establishment of oligarchies in the other subdued cities plainly intimated what he would do in this great focus of Grecian democratical impulse.

Kritias and other exiles —past life of Kritias.

Among these exiles were comprised Aristodemus and Aristotelês,—both seemingly persons of importance, the former having at one time been one of the Hellenotamixæ, the first financial office of the imperial democracy, and the latter an active member of the *Four Hundred*¹; also Chariklês, who had been so distinguished for his violence in the investigation respecting the Hermæ—and another man, of whom we now for the first time obtain historical knowledge in detail—Kritias, son of Kalkeschrus. He had been among the persons accused as having been concerned in the mutilation of the Hermæ, and seems to have been for a long time important in the political, the literary, and the philosophical world of Athens. To all three, his abilities qualified him to do honour. Both his poetry, in the Solonian or moralising vein,—and his eloquence, published specimens of which remained in the Au-

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. B. 2, 18-ii. 3, 46; Plutarch, Vit. X. Orator. Vit. Lysurg. init.

M. E. Meier, in his Commentary on Lykurgus, construes this passage of Plutarch differently, so that the person therein specified as exile would be, not Aristodemus, but the grandfather of Lykurgus. But I do not think this construction justified: see Meier, Comm. de Lysurg. Vitâ. p. iv. (Hall, 1847.)

Respecting Chariklês, see Isokratês, Orat. xvi. De Bigis, s. 52.

gustan age,—were of no ordinary merit. His wealth was large, and his family among the most ancient and conspicuous in Athens: one of his ancestors had been friend and companion of the lawgiver Solon. He was himself maternal uncle of the philosopher Plato¹, and had frequented the society of Sokratēs so much as to have his name intimately associated in the public mind with that remarkable man. We know neither the cause, nor even the date of his exile, except so far, as that he was not in banishment immediately after the revolution of the Four Hundred—and that he was in banishment at the time when the generals were condemned after the battle of Arginusæ². He had passed the time, or a part of the time, of his exile in Thessaly, where he took an active part in the sanguinary feuds carried on among the oligarchical parties of that lawless country. He is said to have embraced, along with a leader named (or surnamed) Prometheus, what passed for the democratical side in Thessaly; arming the Penestæ or serfs against their masters³. What the conduct and dispositions of Kritias had ¹ See Stallbaum's Preface to the Charmidēs of Plato, his note on the Timæus of Plato, p. 20 E, and the Scholia on the same passage.

Kritias is introduced as taking a conspicuous part in four of the Platonic dialogues—Protagoras, Charmidēs, Timæus, and Kritias (the last, as it now exists, only a fragment)—not to mention the Eryxias.

The small remains of the elegiac poetry of Kritias are to be found in Schneidewin, Dulcet. Poet. Græc. p. 136 seq. Both Cicero (De Orat. ii. 22, 23) and Dionys. Hal. (Judic. de Lysia, c. 2. p. 454; Jud. de Isæo, p. 627) notice his historical compositions.

About the concern of Kritias in the mutilation of the Hermæ, as affirmed by Diogenetēs, see Andokidēs de Mysteriis, s. 47. He was first cousin of Andokidēs, by the mother's side.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 35.

³ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 35; Memorab. i. 2, 24.

been before this period, we are unable to say. But he brought with him now, on returning from exile, not merely an unmeasured and unprincipled lust of power, but also a rancorous impulse towards spoliation and bloodshed¹ which outran even his ambition, and ultimately ruined both his party and himself.

Kritias at the head of the oligarchs at Athens.

Of all these returning exiles, animated with mingled vengeance and ambition, Kritias was decidedly the leading man, like Antiphon among the Four Hundred; partly from his abilities, partly from the superior violence with which he carried out the common sentiment. At the present juncture, he and his fellow-exiles became the most important persons in the city, as enjoying most the friendship and confidence of the conquerors. But the oligarchical party at home were noway behind them, either in servility or in revolutionary fervour, and an understanding was soon established between the two. Probably the old faction of the Four Hundred, though put down, had never wholly died out: at any rate, the political Hetæries or clubs, out of which it was composed, still remained, prepared for fresh co-operation when a favourable moment should arrive; and the catastrophe of Ægospotami had made it plain to every one that such moment could not be far distant. Accordingly a large portion, if not the majority, of the senators, became ready to lend themselves to the destruction of the democracy, and only anxious to ensure places among the oligarchy in prospect²: while the supple Theramenes

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, ἐπεὶ δὲ αὐτὸς μὲν (Kritias) προεστῆς ἦν καὶ πολλοὶς ἀποστρεφόμενοι, ἄνε καὶ φροῦδοι ἐπὶ τοῦ δήμου, &c.

² Lysias cont. Agorat, Or. xiii. s. 23, p. 132.

—resuming his place as oligarchical leader, and abusing his mission as envoy to wear out the patience of his half-famished countrymen—had, during his three months' absence in the tent of Lysander, concerted arrangements with the exiles for future proceedings¹.

As soon as the city surrendered, and while the work of demolition was yet going on, the oligarchical party began to organise itself. The members of the political clubs again came together, and named a managing committee of Five, called Ephors in compliment to the Lacedæmonians, to direct the general proceedings of the party—to convene meetings when needful—to appoint subordinate managers for the various tribes—and to determine what propositions were to be submitted to the public assembly². Among these five Ephors were Kritias and Eratosthenês; probably Theramênês also.

Oligarchical leaders named at Athens.

But the oligarchical party, though thus organized and ascendant, with a compliant senate and a dispirited people, and with an auxiliary enemy actually in possession—still thought themselves not powerful enough to carry their intended changes without seizing the most resolute of the democratical leaders. Accordingly a citizen named Theokritus tendered Seizure of Strombichides and other eminent democrats.

¹ Lysias cont. Erastoth. Or. xii. s. 78. p. 128. Theramênês is described (in his subsequent defence) ἀνελθὼν μὲν τοῖς φιλόποσι· οὐκ δὲ αὐτοὺς κατέλθους, &c.

The general narrative of Xenophon, meagre as it is, harmonises with this.

² Lysias cont. Erastoth. Or. xii. s. 44. p. 124. Ἐπειδὴ δὲ ἡ συμμοχία καὶ ἡ συμφορὰ τῇ πόλει ἐγένετο, δημοκρατίας ἐν ὄψει, ὅθεν τῆς στάσεως ἤρξαν, πέντε ἄνθρωποι ἑφφοροι κατέστησαν ἐκ τῶν καλουμένων ἑταίρων, συναγωγῇ μὲν τῶν πολιτῶν, ἀρχοῦνται δὲ τῶν συνομωτῶν, ἐκίστανται δὲ τῶν ἐμετέρων πλήθει πράττοντες.

an accusation to the senate against the general Strombichidēs, together with several others of the democratical generals and taxiarchs; supported by the deposition of a slave or lowborn man, named Agoratus. Although Nikias and several other citizens tried to prevail upon Agoratus to leave Athens, furnished him with the means of escape, and offered to go away with him themselves from Munychia until the political state of Athens should come into a more assured condition¹—yet he refused to retire, appeared before the senate, and accused the generals of being concerned in a conspiracy to break up the peace; pretending to be himself their accomplice. Upon his information, given both before the

¹ Lysias cont. Agorat. Or. xiii. s. 23, (p. 132)—s. 35, p. 133. Καὶ παραμυθισαυτες διὰ πλοῖα Μουνυχίαν, ἐδέξατο αὐτοῦ (Ἀγοράτου) παρὶ τῶν πλοίων ἀπλῆθιν Ἀθηναίης, καὶ αὐτοὶ ἔφασαν συνεπλευσύνεσθαι, ἵνα τὰ πρᾶγματα εὐεστέρῃ, &c.

Lysias represents this accusation of the generals, and this behaviour of Agoratus, as having occurred before the surrender of the city, but after the return of Theramenes bringing back the final terms imposed by the Lacedæmonians. He thus so colours it, that Agoratus, by getting the generals out of the way, was the real cause why the degrading peace brought by Theramenes was accepted. Had the generals remained at large (he affirms), they would have prevented the acceptance of this degrading peace, and would have been able to obtain better terms from the Lacedæmonians (see Lysias cont. Agor. s. 16-20).

Without questioning generally the matters of fact set forth by Lysias in this oration (delivered a long time afterwards, see s. 90), I believe that he misdates them, and represents them as having occurred before the surrender, whereas they really occurred after it. We know from Xenophon, that when Theramenes came back the second time with the real peace, the people were in such a state of famine, that farther waiting was impossible: the peace was accepted immediately that it was proposed; cruel as it was, the people were glad to get it (Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 22). Besides, how could Agoratus be conveyed with two vessels out of Munychia, when the harbour was closely blocked up? and what is the meaning of ἵνα τὰ πρᾶγματα εὐεστέρῃ, referred to a summit just before the surrender?

senate and before an assembly at Munychia, the generals, the taxiarchs, and several other citizens, men of high worth and courageous patriots, were put into prison, as well as Agoratus himself, to stand their trial afterwards before a dikastery consisting of 2000 members. One of the parties thus accused, Menestratus, being admitted by the public assembly (on the proposition of Hagnodorus the brother-in-law of Kritias) to become accusing witness, named several additional accomplices, who were also forthwith placed in custody¹.

Though the most determined defenders of the democratical constitution were thus eliminated, Kritias and Theramênês still farther ensured the success of their propositions by invoking the presence of Lysander from Samos. The demolition of the walls had been completed, the main blockading army had disbanded, and the immediate pressure of famine had been removed—when an assembly was held to determine on future modifications of the constitution. A citizen named Drakontidês² moved that a Board of Thirty should be named, to draw up laws for the future government of the city, and to manage provisionally the public affairs, until that task should be completed. Among the Thirty persons proposed, pre-arranged by Theramênês and the oligarchical five Ephors, the most prominent names were those of Kritias and Theramênês: there were, besides, Drakontidês himself—Onomaklês, one of the Four Hundred who had escaped—Aristo-

Nomination of the Thirty, under the dictation of Lysander.

¹ Lysias cont. Agorat. Or. xlii. s. 38, 60, 68.

² Lysias cont. Eratosth. Or. xii. s. 74; compare Aristotle ap. Schol. ad Aristophan. Vesp. 157.

telês and Chariklês, both exiles newly returned—Eratosthenês—and others whom we do not know, but of whom probably several had also been exiles or members of the Four Hundred¹. Though this was a complete abrogation of the constitution, yet so conscious were the conspirators of their own strength, that they did not deem it necessary to propose the formal suspension of the Graphê Paranomôn, as had been done prior to the installation of the former oligarchy. Still, notwithstanding the seizure of the leaders and the general intimidation prevalent, a loud murmur of repugnance was heard in the assembly at the motion of Drakontidês. But Theramenês rose up to defy the murmur, telling the assembly that the proposition numbered many partisans even among the citizens themselves, and that it had besides the approbation of Lysander and the Lacedæmonians. This was presently confirmed by Lysander himself, who addressed the assembly in person. He told them, in a menacing and contemptuous tone, that Athens was now at his mercy, since the walls had not been demolished before the day specified, and consequently the conditions of the promised peace had been violated. He added that if they did not adopt the recommendation of Theramenês, they would be forced to take thought for their personal safety instead of for their political constitution. After a notice at once so plain and so crushing, farther resistance was vain. The dissentients all quitted the assembly in sadness and indignation; while a remnant—according to Lysias, inconsiderable in number as well as worthless in character—stayed to vote acceptance of the motion¹.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 2.

Seven years before, Theramenes had carried, in conjunction with Antiphon and Phrynichus, a similar motion for the installation of the Four Hundred; extorting acquiescence by domestic terrorism as well as by multiplied assassinations. He now, in conjunction with Kritias and the rest, a second time extinguished the constitution of his country, by the still greater humiliation of a foreign conqueror dictating terms to the Athenian people assembled in their own Pnyx. Having seen the Thirty regularly constituted, Lysander retired from Athens to finish the siege of Samos, which still held out. Though blocked up both by land and sea, the Samians obstinately defended themselves for some months longer until the close of the summer. Nor was it until the last extremity that they capitulated; obtaining permission for every freeman to depart in safety, but with no other property except a single garment. Lysander handed over the city and the properties to the ancient citizens—that is, to the oligarchy and their partisans who had been partly expelled, partly disfranchised, in the revolution eight years before. But he placed the government of Samos, as he had dealt with the other cities, in the hands of one of his Dekarchies, or oligarchy of Ten Samians chosen by himself; leaving Thorax as Lacedæmonian harmost, and doubtless a force under him².

Conquest of Samos by Lysander—
oligarchy
restored
there.

Having thus finished the war, and trodden out

¹ Lysias cont. Eratosth. Or. xii. s. 74-77.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 6-8.

Triumphant return of Lysander to Sparta—his prodigious ascendancy throughout Greece.

the last spark of resistance, Lysander returned in triumph to Sparta. So imposing a triumph never fell to the lot of any Greek, either before or afterwards. He brought with him every trireme out of the harbour of Peiræus, except twelve left to the Athenians as a concession: he brought the prow-ornaments of all the ships captured at Ægospotami and elsewhere: he was loaded with golden crowns, voted to him by the various cities; and he farther exhibited a sum of money not less than 470 talents, the remnant of those treasures which Cyrus had handed over to him for the prosecution of the war¹. That sum had been greater, but is said to have been diminished by the treachery of Gylippus, to whose custody it had been committed, and who sullied by such mean peculation the laurels which he had so gloriously earned at Syracuse². Nor was it merely the triumphant evidences of past exploits which now decorated this returning admiral. He wielded besides an extent of real power greater than any individual Greek either before or after. Imperial Sparta—as she had now become—was as it were personified in Lysander, who was master of almost all the insular, Asiatic and Thracian cities, by means of the harmosts and the native Dekarchies named by himself and selected from his creatures. To this state of things we shall presently return, when we have followed the eventful history of the Thirty at Athens.

These Thirty men—the parallel of the Dekarchies whom Lysander had constituted in the other cities

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 8.

² Plutarch, Lysand. c. 16; Diodor. xiii. 106.

—were intended for the same purpose, to maintain the city in a state of humiliation and dependence upon Lacedæmon, and upon Lysander as the representative of Lacedæmon. Though appointed, in the pretended view of drawing up a scheme of laws and constitution for Athens, they were in no hurry to commence this duty. They appointed a new senate, composed of compliant, assured, and oligarchical persons; including many of the returned exiles who had been formerly in the Four Hundred, and many also of the preceding senators who were willing to serve their designs¹. They farther named new magistrates and officers; a new Board of Eleven, to manage the business of police and the public force, with Satyrus, one of their most violent partisans, as chief; a Board of Ten, to govern in Peiræus²; an archon to give name to the year, Pythodôrus—and a second or King-Archon, Patroklês³, to offer the customary sacrifices on behalf of the city. While thus securing their own ascendancy, and placing all power in the hands of the most violent oligarchical partisans, they began by professing reforming principles of the strictest virtue; denouncing the abuses of the past democracy, and announcing their determination to purge the city of evil-doers⁴. The phi-

Proceedings of the Thirty at Athens—feelings of oligarchical men like Plato.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 2, 11; Lysias cont. Agorat. Orat. xiii. sect. 23-29.

Tisias, the brother-in-law of Chariklês, was a member of this senate (Isokratês, Or. xvi. De Bigis, s. 53).

² Plato, Epist. vii. p. 324 B.; Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 54.

³ Isokratês cont. Kallimach. Or. xviii. s. 6. p. 372.

⁴ Lysias, Orat. xii. cont. Eratoth. s. 5. p. 121. 'Ἐπειδὴ δ' οἱ τραγικοὶ ποταμοὶ μὲν καὶ σκεύηματα ὄντες εἰς τὴν ἀρχὴν καταστάναι, φαίνοντες χρῆσαι τῷ δήμῳ καθαρῶς ταῖς πόλιν, καὶ τοῖς λοιποῖς πολίταις ἐπ' ἀρετῇ καὶ δικαιοσύνῃ τραπέσθαι, &c.

losopher Plato—then a young man about twenty-four years old, of anti-democratical politics, and nephew of Kritias—was at first misled, together with various others, by these splendid professions; he conceived hopes, and even received encouragement from his relations, that he might play an active part under the new oligarchy¹. Though he soon came to discern how little congenial his feelings were with theirs, yet in the beginning doubtless such honest illusions contributed materially to strengthen their hands.

The Thirty begin their executions—Strombichidēs and the imprisoned generals put to death—other democrats also.

In execution of their design to root out evil-doers, the Thirty first laid hands on some of the most obnoxious politicians under the former democracy—"men (says Xenophon) whom every one knew to live by making calumnious accusations (called Sycophancy), and who were pronounced in their enmity to the oligarchical citizens." How far most of these men had been honest or dishonest in their previous political conduct under the democracy, we have no means of determining. But among them were comprised Strombichidēs and the other democratical officers who had been imprisoned under the information of Agoratus; men whose chief crime consisted in a strenuous and inflexible attachment to the democracy. The persons thus seized were brought to trial before the new senate appointed by the Thirty—contrary to the vote of the people, which had decreed that Strombichidēs and his companions should be tried before a dikastery of 2000 citizens². But the dikastery, as well as all the other democratical institutions, were now abrogated, and no judicial body was left except the newly constituted senate. Even to that senate, though composed of their own partisans, the Thirty did not choose to entrust the trial of the prisoners, with that secrecy of voting which was well known at Athens to be essential to the free and genuine expression of sentiment. Whenever prisoners were tried, the Thirty were themselves present in the senate-house, sitting on the benches previously occupied by the Prytanes: two tables were placed before them, one signifying condemnation—the other, acquittal; and each senator was required to deposit his pebble, openly before them, either on one or on the other¹. It was not merely judgment by the senate—but judgment by the senate under pressure and intimidation by the all-powerful Thirty. It seems probable that neither any semblance of defence, nor any exculpatory witnesses, were allowed; but even if such formalities were not wholly dispensed with, it is certain that there was no real trial, and that condemnation was assured beforehand. Among the great numbers whom the Thirty brought before the senate, not a single man was acquitted except the informer Agoratus, who was brought to trial as an accomplice along with Strombichidēs and his companions, but was liberated in recompense for the information which he had given against them². The statement of Isokratēs, Lysias, and others—that the victims of the Thirty, even when brought before the senate, were put to death untried—is authentic and trustworthy: many were even put to death by simple order from the Thirty themselves, without any cognizance of the senate †.

¹ Plato, Epist. vii. p. 324 B. C.

² Lysias cont. Agorat. 4. 38.

Senate appointed by the Thirty—it only trusted to act under their intimidation. Numerous executions without trial.

¹ Lysias cont. Agorat. s. 40.

² Lysias cont. Agorat. s. 41.

In regard to the persons first brought to trial, however,—whether we consider them, as Xenophon intimates, to have been notorious evil-doers, or to have been innocent sufferers by the reactionary vengeance of returning oligarchical exiles, as was the case certainly with Strombichidēs and the officers accused along with him,—there was little necessity for any constraint on the part of the Thirty over the senate. That body itself partook of the sentiment which dictated the condemnation, and acted as a willing instrument; while the Thirty themselves were unanimous,—Theramenes being even more zealous than Kritias in these executions, to demonstrate his sincere antipathy towards the extinct democracy‡. As yet too, since all the persons condemned (justly or unjustly) had been marked politicians,—so, all other citizens who had taken no conspicuous part in politics, even if they disapproved of the condemnations, had not been led to conceive any apprehension of the like fate for themselves. Here then Theramenes, and along with him a portion of the Thirty as well as of the senate, were inclined to pause. While enough had been done to satiate their antipathies, by the death of the most obnoxious leaders of the democracy—they at the same time conceived the oligarchical government to be securely established, and contended that farther bloodshed would only endanger its stability, by spreading alarm, multiplying enemies, and alienating friends as well as neutrals.

The senate began by condemning willingly every one brought before them.

† Lysias cont. Erastosth. s. 18; Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 51; Isokrat. Orit. xx. cont. Lochit. s. 14. p. 397.

‡ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 12, 28, 38. Αὐτοὶ (Theramenes) μέγιστα ἐξομῶνται ἑαυτοὺς, τοὺς πρώτους ἐκτελούμεναι ἐκ τῶν διὰ τὴν ἀντιπάθειαν, &c.

But these were not the views either of Kritias or of the Thirty generally, who surveyed their position with eyes very different from the unstable and cunning Theramenès, and who had brought with them from exile a long arrears of vengeance yet to be appeased. Kritias knew well that the numerous population of Athens were devotedly attached, and had good reason to be attached, to their democracy; that the existing government had been imposed upon them by force, and could only be upheld by force; that its friends were a narrow minority, incapable of sustaining it against the multitude around them all armed; that there were still many formidable enemies to be got rid of, so that it was indispensable to invoke the aid of a permanent Lacedæmonian garrison in Athens, as the only condition not only of their stability as a government, but even of their personal safety. In spite of the opposition of Theramenès—Æschinès and Aristotelès, two among the Thirty, were despatched to Sparta to solicit aid from Lysander; who procured for them a Lacedæmonian garrison under Kallibius as harmost, which they engaged to maintain without any cost to Sparta, until their government should be confirmed by putting the evil-doers out of the way'. Kallibius was not only installed as master of the acropolis—full as it was of the mementos of Athenian glory—but was farther so caressed and won over by the Thirty, that he lent himself to everything which they asked.

Discord among the Thirty—dissentient views of Kritias and Theramenès.

* Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 13. ὅτι δὲ τοῖς πολεμικοῖς ἰακοῦσαν παρὰμενοὶ καταστήσαντο τὴν πολιτείαν.

Lacedæmonian garrison introduced—multiplied executions by Kritias and the Thirty.

They had thus a Lacedæmonian military force constantly at their command, besides an organized band of youthful satellites and assassins, ready for any deeds of violence; and they proceeded to seize and put to death many citizens, who were so distinguished for their courage and patriotism, as to be likely to serve as leaders to the public discontent. Several of the best men in Athens thus successively perished, while Thrasybulus, Anytus, and many others, fearing a similar fate, fled out of Attica, leaving their property to be confiscated and appropriated by the oligarchs¹; who passed a decree of exile against them in their absence, as well as against Alkibiadēs².

Opposition of Theramenes to these measures—violence and rapacity still further increased—rich and oligarchical men put to death.

These successive acts of vengeance and violence were warmly opposed by Theramenes, both in the Council of Thirty and in the senate. The persons hitherto executed (he said) had deserved their death because they were not merely noted politicians under the democracy, but also persons of marked hostility to oligarchical men. But to inflict the same fate on others, who had manifested no such hostility, simply because they had enjoyed influence under the democracy, would be unjust: "Even you and I (he reminded Kritias) have both said and done many things for the sake of popularity." But Kritias replied—"We cannot afford to be scrupulous: we are engaged in a scheme of aggressive ambition, and must get rid of those who are best able to hinder us. Though we are Thirty in number, and not one—our government is not the less a despotism, and must be guarded by the same jealous precautions. If you think otherwise, you must be simple-minded indeed.” Such were the sentiments which animated the majority of the Thirty not less than Kritias, and which prompted them to an endless string of seizures and executions. It was not merely the less obnoxious democratical politicians who became their victims, but men of courage, wealth, and station, in every vein of political feeling: even oligarchical men, the best and most high-principled of that party, shared the same fate. Among the most distinguished sufferers were, Lykurgus¹, belonging to one of the most eminent sacred Gentes in the state; a wealthy man named Antiphon, who had devoted his fortune to the public service with exemplary patriotism during the last years of the war, and had furnished two well-equipped triremes at his own cost; Leon, of Salamis; and even Nikeratus (son of Nikias, who had perished at Syracuse), a man who inherited from his father not only a large fortune, but a known repugnance to democratical politics, together with his uncle Eukratès, brother of the same Nikias². These were only a few among the numerous victims, who were seized—pronounced to be guilty by the senate or by the Thirty themselves—handed over to Satyrus and the Eleven—and condemned to perish by the customary draught of hemlock.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 15, 23, 42; Isokrat. cont. Kallimach. Or. xviii. s. 30, p. 375.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 42—ii. 4, 14. οὐ δὲ αὖτ' οἷον ἄνευ ἀδικούμεν, ἀλλ' οἷόν ἐστιν ἀποκτείναντες ἐφ' ὅσον ἐπιβόηται, &c.

Isokratēs, Orat. xvi. De Bigis, s. 46, p. 355.

The circumstances accompanying the seizure of

¹ Plutarch, Vit. X. Orator. p. 838.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 39-41; Lysias, Orat. xviii. De Bonis Nicie Fratri, s. 5-8.

Plan of Kritias to gain adherents by forcing men to become accomplices in deeds of blood—resistance of Sokratēs.

Leon deserve particular notice. In putting to death him and the other victims, the Thirty had several objects in view, all tending to the stability of their dominion. First, they thus got rid of citizens generally known and esteemed, whose abhorrence they knew themselves to deserve, and whom they feared as likely to head the public sentiment against them. Secondly, the property of these victims, all of whom were rich, was seized along with their persons, and was employed to pay the satellites whose agency was indispensable for such violences—especially Kallibius and the Lacedæmonian hoplites in the acropolis. But besides murder and spoliation, the Thirty had a farther purpose, if possible, yet more nefarious. In the work of seizing their victims, they not only employed the hands of these paid satellites, but also sent along with them citizens of station and respectability, whom they constrained by threats and intimidation to lend their personal aid in a service so thoroughly odious. By such participation, these citizens became compromised and imbrued in crime, and as it were, consenting parties in the public eye to all the projects of the Thirty¹; exposed to the same general hatred as the latter,

¹ Plato, Apol. Socr. c. 20. p. 32. Ἐπειδὴ δὲ ἀταρχία ἐγένετο, οἱ τριῶντα καὶ μετὰ τὸν Κριτίαν μετὰ τὸν αἰὲν εἰς τὸ θάνατον προσέταξαν ἄνθρωποις ἐς Σαλαμίους ἀίοντα τὰς Σαλαμίους, ἐν ἀποβάνῳ εἰς δὲ καὶ ἄλλοις ἰσχυροῖς πολλοῖς προσείτατον, βουλόμενοι ὅτι πλείστοις ἀναπλήσαι αἰτίαν.

Isokrat. cont. Kallimach. Or. xviii. s. 23. p. 374. ἰσχυροῖς καὶ προσείτατον ἰξαρμαστῶν. Compare also Iyias, Or. xii. cont. Ermosth. s. 32.

We learn, from Antokidēs de Myster. s. 54, that Melétus was one of the parties who actually arrested Leon, and brought him up for condemnation. It is not probable that this was the same person who afterwards accused Sokratēs. It may possibly have been his father, who bore the same name; but there is nothing to determine the point.

and interested for their own safety in maintaining the existing dominion. Pursuant to their general plan of implicating unwilling citizens in their misdeeds, the Thirty sent for five citizens to the Tholus or Government-house, and ordered them, with terrible menaces, to cross over to Salamis and bring back Leon as prisoner. Four out of the five obeyed: the fifth was the philosopher Sokratēs, who refused all concurrence and returned to his own house, while the other four went to Salamis and took part in the seizure of Leon. Though he thus braved all the wrath of the Thirty, it appears that they thought it expedient to leave him untouched. But the fact that they singled him out for such an atrocity—an old man of tried virtue, both private and public, and intellectually commanding, though at the same time intellectually unpopular—shows to what an extent they carried their system of forcing unwilling participants; while the farther circumstance that he was the only person who had the courage to refuse, among four others who yielded to intimidation, shows that the policy was for the most part successful¹. The inflexible resistance of Sokratēs on this occasion stands as a worthy parallel to his conduct as Prytanis in the public assembly held on the conduct of the generals after the battle of Arginusæ (described in the preceding chapter), wherein he obstinately refused to concur in putting an illegal question.

Such multiplied cases of execution and spoliation naturally filled the city with surprise, indignation, and terror. Groups of malcontents got together,

¹ Plato, Apol. Sokrat. ut sup.; Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 9-23.

Terror and discontent
in the city
—the Thirty nominate a body of Three Thousand
as partners hoplites.

and exiles became more and more numerous. All these circumstances furnished ample material for the vehement opposition of Theramenes, and tended to increase his party; not indeed among the Thirty themselves, but to a certain extent in the senate, and still more among the body of the citizens. He warned his colleagues that they were incurring daily an increased amount of public odium, and that their government could not possibly stand, unless they admitted into partnership an adequate number of citizens, with a direct interest in its maintenance. He proposed that all those competent by their property to serve the state either on horseback or with heavy armour, should be constituted citizens; leaving all the poorer freemen, a far larger number, still disfranchised¹. Kritias and the Thirty rejected this proposition; being doubtless convinced—as the Four Hundred had felt seven years before, when Theramenes demanded of them to convert their fictitious total of Five Thousand into a real list of as many living persons—that “to enroll so great a number of partners, was tantamount to a downright democracy².” But they were at the same time not insensible to the soundness of his advice: moreover they began to be afraid of him personally, and to

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 17, 19, 48. From a. 48, we see that Theramenes actually made this proposition—τὸ μὲντοι εἶναι τοῖς δυναμένοις καὶ μὲν ἵππων καὶ μὲν ἀρπύτων ἀφελὼν τὴν πολειάν, πρόσθεν δριστὸν ἔγγειμην εἶναι, καὶ εἶναι αὐτὸ μεταβάλλομαι.

This proposition, made by Theramenes and rejected by the Thirty, explains the comment which he afterwards made when they drew up their special catalogue or roll of 3000; which comment otherwise appears unsuitable.

² Thucyd. viii. 89–92. τὸ μὲν καταστήσαι μετόχους τοσοῦτον, ἀνέστις ἢ δημοκρατία.

suspect that he was likely to take the lead in a popular opposition against them, as he had previously done against his colleagues of the Four Hundred. They therefore resolved to comply in part with his recommendations, and accordingly prepared a list of 3000 persons to be invested with the political franchise; chosen, as much as possible, from their own known partisans and from oligarchical citizens. Besides this body, they also counted on the adherence of the Horsemen, among the wealthiest citizens of the state. These Horsemen or Knights, taking them as a class—the thousand good men of Athens, whose virtues Aristophanes sets forth in hostile antithesis to the alleged demagogic vices of Kleon—remained steady supporters of the Thirty, throughout all the enormities of their career¹. What privileges or functions were assigned to the chosen 3000, we do not hear, except that they could not be condemned without the warrant of the senate, while any other Athenian might be put to death by the simple fiat of the Thirty².

A body of partners thus chosen—not merely of fixed number, but of picked oligarchical sentiments—was by no means the addition which Theramenes desired. While he commented on the folly of supposing that there was any charm in the number 3000—as if it embodied all the merit of the city, and nothing else but merit—he admonished them that it was still insufficient for their defence: their rule was one of pure force, and yet inferior in force to those over whom it was exercised. Again the Thirty acted upon his admonition, but in a way very different from that which he contemplated. They proclaimed a general muster, and examination of arms, to all the hoplites in Athens. The 3000 were drawn up in arms all together in the market-place; but the remaining hoplites were disseminated in small scattered companies and in different places. After the review was over, these scattered companies went home to their meal, leaving their arms piled at the various places of muster. But the adherents of the Thirty, having been forewarned and kept together, were sent at the proper moment, along with the Lacedæmonian mercenaries, to seize the deserted arms, which were deposited under the custody of Kallibius in the acropolis. All the hoplites in Athens, except the Three Thousand and the remaining adherents of the Thirty, were disarmed by this crafty manœuvre, in spite of the fruitless remonstrance of Theramènes¹.

They disarm the remaining hoplites of the city.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 18, 19; ii. 4, 2, 8, 24.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 51.

Murders and spoliation
by the Thirty.
Seizure of the arms.

Kritias and his colleagues, now relieved from all fear either of Theramènes, or of any other internal opposition, gave loose, more unsparingly than ever, to their malevolence and rapacity; putting to death both many of their private enemies, and many rich victims for the purpose of spoliation. A list of suspected persons was drawn up, in which each of their adherents was allowed to insert such names as he chose, and from which the victims were generally taken². Among informers who thus gave in names for destruction, Batrachus and Æschylidēs¹ stood conspicuous. The thirst of Kritias for plunder as well as for bloodshed only increased by gratification²; and it was not merely to pay their mercenaries, but also to enrich themselves separately, that the Thirty stretched everywhere their murderous agency, which now mowed down metics as well as citizens. Theognis and Peison, two of the Thirty, affirmed that many among the metics were hostile to the oligarchy, besides being opulent men. Accordingly, the resolution was adopted that each of the rulers should single out any of these victims that he pleased, for execution and pillage; care being taken to include a few poor persons in the seizure, so that the real purpose of the spoilers might be faintly disguised.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 20, 41: compare Lysias, Orat. xii. cont. Eratosth. s. 41.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 21; Isokritēs adv. Euthymum, s. 5, p. 401;

It was in execution of such scheme that the orator Lysias and his brother Polemarchus were both taken into custody. Both were metics, wealthy men, and engaged in a manufactory of shields, wherein they employed 120 slaves. Theognis and Peison, with some others, seized Lysias in his house, while entertaining some friends at dinner; and having driven away his guests, left him under the guard of Peison, sending their attendants to register and appropriate his valuable slaves. Lysias tried to prevail on Peison to accept a bribe and let him escape; which Seizure of Lysias the rhetor and his brother Polemarchus. The former escapes—the latter is executed.

Isokratēs cont. Kallimach. s. 23. p. 375; Lysias, Or. xxv. Διγ. Κορυλ. Ἀνθ. s. 21. p. 173.

The two passages of Isokratēs sufficiently designate what this list of κορυλῶες must have been; but the name by which he calls it—ὁ μὲν ἀναιδῶδες (or Παιδαῖδες) κορυλῶες—is not easy to explain.

¹ Lysias, Orat. vi. cont. Andokid. s. 46; Or. xii. cont. Eratosth. s. 49.

² Xenoph. Memor. i. 2. 12. Κριτίας μὲν γὰρ τὸν ἐκ τῆς ἀδυναμίας πῦρ καὶ ἀναιδῶδες τε καὶ Παιδαῖδες ἐποίητο, &c.

the latter at first promised to do, and having thus obtained access to the money-chest of the prisoner, laid hands upon all its contents, amounting to between three and four talents. In vain did Lysias implore that a trifle might be left for his necessary subsistence: the only answer vouchsafed was, that he might think himself fortunate if he escaped with life. He was then conveyed to the house of a person named Damnippus, where Theognis already was, having other prisoners in charge. At the earnest entreaty of Lysias, Damnippus tried to induce Theognis to connive at his escape, on consideration of a handsome bribe; but while this conversation was going on, the prisoner availed himself of an unguarded moment to get off through the back door—which fortunately was open, together with two other doors through which it was necessary to pass. Having first obtained refuge in the house of a friend in Peiræus, he took boat during the ensuing night for Megara. Polemarchus, less fortunate, was seized in the street by Eratosthenês, one of the Thirty, and immediately lodged in the prison, where the fatal draught of hemlock was administered to him, without delay, without trial, and without liberty of defence. While his house was plundered of a large stock of gold, silver, furniture and rich ornaments—while the golden earrings were torn from the ears of his wife—and while 700 shields, with 120 slaves, were confiscated, together with the workshop and the two dwelling-houses;—the Thirty would not allow even a decent funeral to the deceased, but caused his body to be carried away on a hired bier from the prison, with covering and a few scanty appurtenances supplied by the sympathy of private friends'.

Amidst such atrocities, increasing in number and turned more and more to shameless robbery, the party of Theramènes daily gained ground, even in the senate; many of whose members profited nothing by satiating the private cupidity of the Thirty, and began to be weary of so revolting a system, as well as alarmed at the host of enemies which they were raising up. In proposing the late seizure of the metics, the Thirty had desired Theramènes to make choice of any victim among that class, to be destroyed and plundered for his own personal benefit. But he rejected the suggestion emphatically, denouncing the enormity of the measure in the indignant terms which it deserved. So much was the antipathy of Kritias and the majority of the Thirty against him, already acrimonious from the effects of a long course of opposition, exasperated by this refusal—so much did they fear the consequences of incurring the obloquy of such measures for themselves, while Theramènes enjoyed all the credit of opposing them—so satisfied were they that their government could not stand with this dissension among its own members—that they resolved to destroy him at all cost. Having canvassed as many of the senators as they could, to persuade them that Theramènes was conspiring against the oligarchy, they caused the most daring of their satellites to attend one day in the senate-house, close to the

Increased
exaggeration of Kritias and the majority of the Thirty
against Theramènes.

¹ Lyxias, Or. xii. cont. Eratosthen. s. 8, 21. Lyxias prosecuted Eratosthenes before the dikastery some years afterwards, as having caused the death of Polemarchus. The foregoing details are found in the oration spoken as well as composed by himself.

railing which fenced in the senators, with daggers concealed under their garments. So soon as Theramenês appeared, Kritias rose and denounced him to the senate as a public enemy, in an harangue which Xenophon gives at considerable length, and which is so full of instructive evidence, as to Greek political feeling; that I here extract the main points in abridgement:—

Theramenês is denounced by Kritias in the senate—speech of Kritias.

“If any of you imagine, Senators, that more people are perishing than the occasion requires, reflect, that this happens everywhere in a time of revolution—and that it must especially happen in the establishment of an oligarchy at Athens, the most populous city in Greece, and where the population has been longest accustomed to freedom. You know as well as we do, that democracy is to both of us an intolerable government, as well as incompatible with all steady adherence to our protectors the Lacedæmonians. It is under their auspices that we are establishing the present oligarchy, and that we destroy, as far as we can, every man who stands in the way of it; which becomes most of all indispensable, if such a man be found among our own body. Here stands the man—Theramenês—whom we now denounce to you as your foe not less than ours. That such is the fact, is plain from his unmeasured censures on our proceedings; from the difficulties which he throws in our way whenever we want to despatch any of the demagogues. Had such been his policy from the beginning, he would indeed have been our enemy, yet we could not with justice have proclaimed him a villain. But it is he who first originated the alliance which binds us to Sparta—who struck the first blow at the democracy—who chiefly instigated us to put to death the first batch of accused persons ; and now, when you as well as we have thus incurred the manifest hatred of the people, he turns round and quarrels with our proceedings, in order to ensure his own safety, and leave us to pay the penalty. He must be dealt with not only as an enemy, but as a traitor, to you as well as to us ; a traitor in the grain, as his whole life proves. Though he enjoyed through his father Agnon a station of honour under the democracy, he was foremost in subverting it, and setting up the Four Hundred : the moment he saw that oligarchy beset with difficulties, he was the first to put himself at the head of the people against them ; always ready for change in both directions, and a willing accomplice in those executions which changes of government bring with them. It is he, too, who—having been ordered by the generals after the battle of Arginusæ to pick up the men on the disabled ships, and having neglected the task—accused and brought to execution his superiors, in order to get himself out of danger. He has well earned his surname of The Buskin, fitting both legs, but constant to neither : he has shown himself reckless both of honour and friendship, looking to nothing but his own selfish advancement ; and it is for us now to guard against his doublings, in order that he may not play us the same trick. We cite him before you as a conspirator and a traitor, against you as well as against us. Look to your own safety, and not to his. For depend upon it, that if you let him off, you will hold out powerful encouragement to your worst enemies ; while if you condemn him, you will crush their best hopes, both within and without the city."

Theramènes was probably not wholly unprepared for some such attack as this. At any rate he rose up to reply to it at once—

Reply of Thera-ménès.

"First of all, Senators, I shall touch upon the charge against me which Kritias mentioned last—the charge of having accused and brought to execution the generals. It was not I who began the accusation against them, but they who began it against me. They said, that they had ordered me upon the duty, and that I had neglected it: my defence was, that the duty could not be executed, in consequence of the storm: the people believed and exonerated me, but the generals were rightfully condemned on their own accusation, because they said that the duty might have been performed—while yet it had remained unperformed. I do not wonder indeed that Kritias has told such falsehoods against me; for at the time when this affair happened, he was an exile in Thessaly, employed in raising up a democracy, and arming the Penestæ against their masters. Heaven grant that nothing of what he perpetrated there may occur at Athens! I agree with Kritias indeed, that whoever wishes to cut short your government, and strengthens those who conspire against you, deserves justly the severest punishment. But to whom does this charge best apply? To him, or to me? Look at the behaviour of each of us, and then judge for yourselves. At first we were all agreed, so far as the condemnation of the known and obnoxious demagogues. But when Kritias and his friends began to seize men of station and dignity, then it was that I began to oppose them. I knew that the seizure of men like Leon, Nikias, and Antiphon, would make the best men in the city your enemies. I opposed the execution of the metics, well-aware that all that body would be alienated. I opposed the disarming of the citizens, and the hiring of foreign guards. And when I saw that enemies at home and exiles abroad were multiplying against you, I dissuaded you from banishing Thrasybulus and Anytus, whereby you only furnished the exiles with competent leaders. The man who gives you this advice, and gives it you openly, is he a traitor—or is he not rather a genuine friend? It is you and your supporters, Kritias, who by your murders and robberies strengthen the enemies of the government and betray your friends. Depend upon it, that Thrasybulus and Anytus are much better pleased with your policy than they would be with mine. You accuse me of having betrayed the Four Hundred; but I did not desert them until they were themselves on the point of betraying Athens to her enemies. You call me the Buskin, as trying to fit both parties. But what am I to call you, who fit neither of them? who under the democracy were the most violent hater of the people—and who under the oligarchy have become equally violent as a hater of oligarchical merit? I am, and always have been, Kritias, an enemy both to extreme democracy and to oligarchical tyranny. I desire to constitute our political community out of those who can serve it on horseback and with heavy armour: I have proposed this once, and I still stand to it. I side not either with democrats or despots, to the exclusion of the dignified citizens. Prove that I am now, or ever have been, guilty of such crime, and I shall confess myself deserving of ignominious death."

Extreme violence of Kritias and
the Thirty.

This reply of Theramenes was received with such a shout of applause by the majority of the senate, as showed that they were resolved to acquit him. To the fierce antipathies of the mortified Kritias, the idea of failure was intolerable: indeed he had now carried his hostility to such a point, that the acquittal of his enemy would have been his own ruin. After exchanging a few words with the Thirty, he retired for a few moments, and directed the Eleven with the body of armed satellites to press close on the railing whereby the senators were fenced round,—while the court before the senate-house was filled with the mercenary hoplites. Having thus got his force in hand, Kritias returned and again addressed the senate—"Senators (said he), I think it the duty of a good president, when he sees his friends around him duped, not to let them follow their own counsel. This is what I am now going to do: indeed these men, whom you see pressing upon us from without, tell us plainly that they will not tolerate the acquittal of one manifestly working to the ruin of the oligarchy. It is an article of our new constitution, that no man of the Select Three Thousand shall be condemned without your vote; but that any man not included in that list may be condemned by the Thirty. Now I take upon me, with the concurrence of all my colleagues, to strike this Theramenes out of that list; and we, by our authority, condemn him to death."

Though Theramenes had already been twice concerned in putting down the democracy, yet such was the habit of all Athenians to look for protection from constitutional forms, that he probably accounted himself safe under the favourable verdict of the senate, and was not prepared for the monstrous and despotic sentence which he now heard from his enemy. He sprang at once to the Senatorial Hearth—the altar and sanctuary in the interior of the senate-house—and exclaimed—"I too, Senators, stand as your suppliant, asking only for bare justice. Let it be not in the power of Kritias to strike out me or any other man whom he chooses:—let my sentence as well as yours be passed according to the law which these Thirty have themselves prepared. I know but too well, that this altar will be of no avail to me as a defence; yet I shall at least make it plain—that these men are as impious towards the gods as they are nefarious towards men. As for you, worthy Senators, I wonder that you will not stand forward for your own personal safety, since you must be well-aware, that your own names may be struck out of the Three Thousand just as easily as mine."

Condemnation of Theramenes.

But the senate remained passive and stupefied by fear, in spite of these moving words; which perhaps were not perfectly heard, since it could not be the design of Kritias to permit his enemy to speak a second time. It was probably while Theramenes was yet speaking, that the loud voice of the herald was heard, calling the Eleven to come forward and take him into custody. The Eleven advanced into the senate, headed by their brutal chief Satyrus, and followed by their usual attendants. They went straight up to the altar, from whence Satyrus, aided by the attendants, dragged him by main force, while Kritias said to them—"We hand over to you this man Theramenês, condemned according to the law. Seize him, carry him off to prison, and there do the needful." Upon which, Theramenês was dragged out of the senate-house and carried in custody through the market-place, exclaiming with a loud voice against the atrocious treatment which he was suffering. "Hold your tongue (said Satyrus to him), or you will suffer for it."—"And if I do hold my tongue (replied Theramenês), shall not I suffer for it also?"

He was conveyed to prison, where the usual draught of hemlock was speedily administered. After he had swallowed it, there remained a drop at the bottom of the cup, which he jerked out on the floor (according to the playful convivial practice called the Kottabus, which was supposed to furnish an omen by its sound in falling, and after which the person who had just drunk handed the goblet to the guest whose turn came next)—"Let this (said he) be for the gentle Kritias¹."

The scene just described, which ended in the execution of Theramenês, is one of the most striking and tragical in ancient history; in spite of the bald and meagre way in which it is recounted by Xenophon, who has thrown all the interest into the

Death of Theramenês—remarks on his character.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 56.

two speeches. The atrocious injustice by which Theramenes perished—as well as the courage and self-possession which he displayed at the moment of danger, and his cheerfulness even in the prison, not inferior to that of Sokratēs three years afterwards—naturally enlist the warmest sympathies of the reader in his favour, and have tended to exalt the positive estimation of his character. During the years immediately succeeding the restoration of the democracy¹, he was extolled and pitied as one of the first martyrs to oligarchical violence: later authors went so far as to number him among the chosen pupils of Sokratēs². But though Theramenes here became the victim of a much worse man than himself, it will not for that reason be proper to accord to him our admiration, which his own conduct will not at all be found to deserve. The reproaches of Kritias against him, founded on his

¹ See Lysias, Or. xii. cont. Eratosth. s. 66.

² Diodor. xiv. 5. Diodorus tells us that Sokratēs and two of his friends were the only persons who stood forward to protect Theramenes, when Satyrus was dragging him from the altar. Plutarch (Vit. X. Orat. p. 836) ascribes the same act of generous forwardness to Isokratēs. There is no good ground for believing it, either of one or of the other. None but senators were present; and as this senate had been chosen by the Thirty, it is not likely that either Sokratēs, or Isokratēs, were among its members. If Sokratēs had been a member of it, the fact would have been noticed and brought out in connection with his subsequent trial.

The manner in which Plutarch (Consolat. ad Apollon. c. 6. p. 105) states the death of Theramenes—that he was “tortured to death” by the Thirty—is an instance of his loose speaking.

Compare Cicero about the death of Theramenes (Tuscul. Disp. i. 40, 96). His admiration for the manner of death of Theramenes doubtless contributed to make him rank that Athenian with Themistoklēs and Periklēs (De Orat. iii. 16, 59). Aristotle too, (Plutarch, Nikias, c. 2) speaks with esteem of Theramenes, ranking him in the same general category with Nikias and Thukydides (son of Milesias), though with considerable deduction and blame on the score of duplicity.

conduct during the previous conspiracy of the Four Hundred, were in the main well-founded. After having been one of the foremost originators of that conspiracy, he deserted his comrades as soon as he saw that it was likely to fail; and Kritias had doubtless present to his mind the fate of Antiphon, who had been condemned and executed under the accusation of Theraménès—together with a reasonable conviction that the latter would again turn against his colleagues in the same manner, if circumstances should encourage him to do so. Nor was Kritias wrong in denouncing the perfidy of Theraménès with regard to the generals after the battle of Arginusæ; the death of whom he was partly instrumental in bringing about, though only as an auxiliary cause, and not with that extreme stretch of nefarious stratagem, which Xenophon and others have imputed to him. He was a selfish, cunning, and faithless man—ready to enter into conspiracies, yet never foreseeing their consequences—and breaking faith to the ruin of colleagues whom he had first encouraged, when he found them more consistent and thoroughgoing in crime than himself¹.

increased
vanity of Kritias and
the Thirty.

Such high-handed violence, by Kritias and the majority of the Thirty—carried though, even against a member of their own Board, by intimidation of the Senate—left a feeling of disgust and dissension among their own partisans from which their power never recovered. Its immediate effect, however, was to render them, apparently and in their own estimation, more powerful than ever. All open manifestation of dissent being now silenced, they proceeded to the uttermost limits of cruel and licentious tyranny. They made proclamation that every one not included in the list of Three Thousand should depart without the walls, in order that they might be undisturbed masters within the city: a policy before resorted to by Periander of Corinth and other Grecian despots¹. The numerous fugitives expelled by this order distributed themselves partly in Peiræus, partly in the various demes of Attica. Both in one and the other, however, they were seized by order of the Thirty, and many of them put to death, in order that their substance and lands might be appropriated either by the Thirty themselves or by some favoured partisan². The denunciations of Batrachus, Æschylidēs, and other delators, became more numerous than ever, in order to obtain the seizure and execution of their private enemies; and the oligarchy were willing to purchase any new adherent by thus gratifying his antipathies or his rapacity³. The subsequent orators affirmed that more than 1500 victims were put to death without trial by the Thirty⁴: on this numerical estimate little stress is to be laid, but the total was doubtless prodigious. It became more and

¹ The epithets applied by Aristophanes to Theraménès (Ran. 541-566) coincide pretty exactly with those in the speech (just noticed) which Xenophon ascribes to Kritias against him.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 1; Lysias, Orat. xii. cont. Erastosth. s. 97; Orat. xxxi. cont. Philon. s. 8, 9; Herakleut. Pontic. c. 5; Diogen. Laert. i. 98.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. c. ὅγον δὲ ἐκ τῶν χωρίων, ὃς αἰετοὶ καὶ οἱ φίλοι τοῖς ταῖς ἀγροῖς ἔχουσιν φερόμενος δὲ ἐκ τῶν Πειραιῶν, καὶ ἐνερτίδων πολλοὶς ἀγνοῖται, ἐπέπλησεν Μέγας καὶ Θόβας τῶν ἐπιχωροῦντων.

³ Lysias, Or. xii. cont. Erastosth. s. 49; Or. xxv. Democrat. Subvers. Apolog. s. 20; Or. xxvi. cont. Evandr. s. 23.

⁴ Æschinēs, Fals. Legat. c. 24. p. 266, and cont. Ktesiph. c. 86. p. 455; Isokratēs, Or. iv. Panegy. s. 131; Or. vii. Areopag. s. 76.

more plain that no man was safe in Attica, so that Athenian emigrants, many in great poverty and destitution, were multiplied throughout the neighbouring territories—in Megara, Thebes, Orôpus, Chalkis, Argos, &c.¹ It was not everywhere that these distressed persons could obtain reception, for the Lacedæmonian government, at the instance of the Thirty, issued an edict prohibiting all the members of their confederacy from harbouring fugitive Athenians; an edict which these cities generously disobeyed², though probably the smaller Peloponnesian cities complied. Without doubt this decree was procured by Lysander, while his influence still continued unimpaired.

But it was not only against the lives, properties, and liberties, of Athenian citizens that the Thirty made war. They were not less solicitous to extinguish the intellectual force and education of the city; a project so perfectly in harmony both with the sentiment and practice of Sparta, that they counted on the support of their foreign allies. Among the ordinances which they promulgated was one, expressly forbidding every one³ "to teach

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 1; Diodor. xiv. 6; Lysias, Or. xxiv. s. 28; Or. xxxi. cont. Philon. s. 10.

² Lysias, Or. xii. cont. Erentoth. s. 98, 99—παντάχοθεν δεχημένους; Plutarch, Lysand. c. 99; Diodor. xiv. 6; Demosth. de Rhod. Libert. c. 10.

³ Xenoph. Memor. i. 2, 31. Καὶ ἐν ταῖς πόλεσιν ἔγραψε, λόγους εἶχον μὴ διδάσκειν.—Isokratēs, cont. Sophist. Or. xiii. s. 12. τῆς παιδείας τῆς τοῦ λόγου.

Plutarch (Themistoklēs, c. 19) affirms that the Thirty oligarchs during their rule altered the position of the rostrum in the Pnyx (the place where the democratical public assemblies were held); the rostrum had before looked towards the sea, but they turned it so as to make it look towards the land, because the maritime service and the associations the art of words"; if I may be allowed to translate literally the Greek expression, which bore a most comprehensive signification, and denoted every intentional communication of logical, rhetorical or argumentative improvement—of literary criticism and composition—and of command over those political and moral topics which formed the ordinary theme of discussion. Such was the species of instruction which Sokratês and other Sophists, each in his own way, communicated to the Athenian youth. The great foreign Sophists (not Athenian), such as Prodikus and Protagoras had been, (though perhaps neither of these two was now alive) were doubtless no longer in the city, under the calamitous circumstances which had been weighing upon every citizen since the defeat of Ægospotami. But there were abundance of native teachers or Sophists, inferior in merit to these distinguished names, yet still habitually employed, with more or less success, in communicating a species of instruction held indispensable to every liberal Athenian. The edict of the Thirty was in fact a general suppression of the higher class of teachers or professors, above the rank of the elementary (teacher of letters or) grammarist. If such an edict could have been maintained in force for a generation, combined with the other mandates of the Thirty—the city out of which Sophoklês and Euripidês had just died, and in which Plato and Isokratês were in vigorous age (the former twenty-five, the latter twenty-nine), would have connected with it were the chief stimulants of democratical sentiment. This story has been often copied and re-asserted as if it were an undoubted fact; but M. Forchhammer (Topographie von Athen, p. 289, in Kieler, Philol. Studien, 1841) has shown it to be untrue and even absurd.

been degraded to the intellectual level of the meanest community in Greece. It was not uncommon for a Grecian despot to suppress all those assemblies wherein youths came together for the purpose of common training, either intellectual or gymnastic; as well as the public banquets and clubs or associations,—as being dangerous to his authority, and tending to elevation of courage, and to a consciousness of political rights among the citizens¹.

The enormities of the Thirty had provoked severe comments from the philosopher Sokratês, whose life was spent in conversation on instructive subjects with those young men who sought his society, though he never took money from any pupil. Such comments having excited attention, Kritias and Chariklês sent for him, reminded him of the prohibitive law, and peremptorily commanded him to abstain for the future from all conversation with youths. Sokratês met the order by putting some questions, to those who gave it, in his usual style of puzzling scrutiny; destined to expose the vagueness of the terms—and to draw the line, or rather to show that no definite line could be drawn—between that which was permitted and that which was forbidden. But he soon perceived that his interrogations produced only a feeling of disgust and wrath, menacing to his own safety. The tyrants ended by repeating their interdict in yet more peremptory terms, and by giving Sokratês to understand, that they were not ignorant of the censures which he had cast upon them².

Though our evidence does not enable us to make out the precise dates of these various oppressions

¹ Aristot. Polit. v. 9, 2.

² Xenoph. Memorab. i. 2. 33-39.

Sokratês
and the Thirty.

Growing insecurity
of the Thirty.

of the Thirty, yet it seems probable that this prohibition of teaching must have been among their earlier enactments; at any rate, considerably anterior to the death of Theraménès, and the general expulsion, out of the walls, of all except the privileged Three Thousand. Their dominion continued, without any armed opposition made to it, for about eight months from the capture of Athens by Ly-sander—that is, from about April to December 404 B.C. The measure of their iniquity then became full. They had accumulated against themselves, both in Attica and among the exiles in the circum-jacent territories, suffering and exasperated enemies; while they had lost the sympathy of Thebes, Me-gara, and Corinth—and were less heartily supported by Sparta.

During these important eight months, the general feeling throughout Greece had become materially different both towards Athens and towards Sparta. At the moment when the long war was first brought to a close—fear, antipathy, and vengeance against Athens had been the reigning sentiment, both among the confederates of Sparta and among the revolted members of the extinct Athenian empire; a sentiment which prevailed among them indeed to a greater degree than among the Spartans themselves—who resisted it, and granted to Athens a capitulation at a time when many of their allies pressed for the harshest measures. To this resolution they were determined partly by the still remaining force of ancient sympathy,—partly by the odium which would have been sure to follow the act of expelling the Athenian population, however it might be talked of beforehand as a meet punishment—partly too by the policy of Lysander, who contemplated the keeping of Athens in the same dependence on Sparta and on himself, and by the same means, as the other outlying cities in which he had planted his Dekarchies.

Gradual alteration of feeling in Greece, since the capture of Athens.

Demand by the allies of Sparta to share in the spoils of the war—refused by Sparta.

So soon as Athens was humbled, deprived of her fleet and walled port, and rendered innocuous—the great bond of common fear which had held the allies to Sparta disappeared; and while the paramount antipathy on the part of those allies towards Athens gradually died away, a sentiment of jealousy and apprehension of Sparta sprang up in its place, on the part of the leading states among them. For such a sentiment there was more than one reason. Lysander had brought home not only a large sum of money, but valuable spoils of other kinds, and many captive triremes, at the close of the war. As the success had been achieved by the joint exertions of all the allies, so the fruits of it belonged in equity to all of them jointly—not to Sparta alone. The Thebans and Corinthians preferred a formal claim to be allowed to share; and if the other allies abstained from openly backing the demand, we may fairly presume that it was not from any different construction of the equity of the case, but from fear of offending Sparta. In the testimonial erected by Lysander at Delphi, commemorative of the triumph, he had included not only his own brazen statue, but that of each commander of the allied contingents; thus formally admitting the allies to share in the honorary results, and tacitly sanctioning their claim to the lucrative results also. Nevertheless the demand made by the Thebans and Corinthians was not only repelled, but almost resented as an insult; especially by Lysander, whose influence was at that moment almost omnipotent¹.

That the Lacedæmonians should have withheld from the allies a share in this money, demonstrates still more the great ascendancy of Lysander—because there was a considerable party at Sparta itself, who protested altogether against the reception of so much gold and silver, as contrary to the ordinances of Lykurgus, and fatal to the peculiar morality of Sparta. An ancient Spartan, Skiraphidas or Phlogidas, took the lead in calling for exclusive adherence to the old Spartan money—heavy iron difficult to carry. Nor was it without difficulty that Lysander and his friends obtained admission for the treasure into Sparta; under special proviso, that it should be for the exclusive purposes of the government, and that no private citizen should ever circulate gold or silver². The existence of such traditional repugnance among the Spartans would have seemed likely to induce them to be just towards their allies, since an equitable distribution of the treasure would have gone far to remove the difficulty; yet they nevertheless kept it all.

¹ Justin (vi. 10) mentions the demand thus made and refused. Plutarch (Lysand. c. 27) states the demand as having been made by the Thebans alone, which I disbelieve. Xenophon, according to the general disorderly arrangement of facts in his Hellenica, does not mention the circumstance in its proper place, but alludes to it on a subsequent occasion as having before occurred (Hellen. iii. 5, 5). He also specifies by name no one but the Thebans as having actually made the demand; but there is a subsequent passage, which shows that not only the Corinthians, but other allies also, sympathised in it (iii. 5, 12).

² Plutarch, Lysand. c. 17; Plutarch, Institut. Lacon. p. 239.

Unparalleled ascendancy of Lysander.

But besides such special offence given to the allies, the conduct of Sparta in other ways showed that she intended to turn the victory to her own account. Lysander was at this moment all-powerful, playing his own game under the name of Sparta. His position was far greater than that of the regent Pausanias had been after the victory of Platæa; and his talents for making use of the position incomparably superior. The magnitude of his successes, as well as the eminent ability which he had displayed, justified abundant eulogy; but in his case, the eulogy was carried to the length of something like worship. Altars were erected to him; pæans or hymns were composed in his honour; the Ephesians set up his statue in the temple of their goddess Artemis, while the Samians not only erected a statue to him at Olympia, but even altered the name of their great festival—the Heræa—to *Lysandria*¹. Several contemporary poets—Antiloehus, Chœrilus, Nikératus, and Antimachus—devoted themselves to sing his glories and profit by his rewards.

His overweening ambition—oppressive dominion of Sparta.

Such excess of flattery was calculated to turn the head even of the most virtuous Greek. With Lysander, it had the effect of substituting, in place of that assumed smoothness of manner with which he began his command, an insulting harshness and arrogance corresponding to the really unmeasured ambition which he cherished². His ambition prompted him to aggrandise Sparta separately, without any thought of her allies, in order to exercise dominion in her name. He had already established Dekarchies, or oligarchies of Ten, in many of the insular and Asiatic cities, and an oligarchy of Thirty in Athens; all composed of vehement partisans chosen by himself, dependent upon him for support, and devoted to his objects. To the eye of an impartial observer in Greece, it seemed as if all these cities had been converted into dependencies of Sparta, and were intended to be held in that condition; under Spartan authority, exercised by and through Lysander¹. Instead of that general freedom which had been promised as an incentive to revolt against Athens, a Spartan empire had been constituted in place of the extinct Athenian: with a tribute, amounting to 1000 talents annually, intended to be assessed upon the component cities and islands².

¹ Pausanias, vi. 3, 6. The Samian oligarchical party owed their recent restoration to Lysander.

² Plutarch, Lysand. c. 18, 19.

It is easy to see that under such a state of feeling on the part of the allies of Sparta, the enormities perpetrated by the Thirty at Athens and by the Lysandrian dekarchies in the other cities, would be heard with sympathy for the sufferers; and without that strong anti-Athenian sentiment which had reigned a few months before. But—what was of still greater importance—even at Sparta itself, opposition began to spring up against the measures and the person of Lysander. If the leading men at Sparta had felt jealous even of Brasidas, who offended them only by unparalleled success and merit as a commander¹—much more would the same feeling be aroused against Lysander, who displayed an overweening insolence, and was worshiped with an ostentatious flattery, not inferior to that of Pausanias after the battle of Plataea. Another Pausanias, son of Pleistoanax, was now king of Sparta, in conjunction with Agis. Upon him the feeling of jealousy against Lysander told with especial force, as it did afterwards upon Agesilaus the successor of Agis; not unaccompanied probably with suspicion (which subsequent events justified) that Lysander was aiming at some interference with the regal privileges. Nor is it unfair to suppose that Pausanias was animated by motives more patriotic than mere jealousy; and that the rapacious cruelty, which everywhere dishonoured the new oligarchies, both shocked his better feelings and inspired him with fears for the stability of the system. A farther circumstance which weakened the influence of Lysander at Sparta was the annual change of Ephors, which took place about the end of September or beginning of October. Those Ephors, under whom his grand success and the capture of Athens had been consummated, and who had lent themselves entirely to his views, passed out of office in September 404 B.C., and gave place to others more disposed to second Pausanias.

Disgust excited in Greece by the enormities of the Thirty.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 30. Οὕτω δὲ προχωροῦντας, Περικλῆος δὲ βασιλείᾳ (of Sparta), φθονήσας Λυσάνδρῳ εἰ καταργασμένους ταῦτα ἅμα μὲν εὐδοκίησεν, ἅμα δὲ ἰδίᾳ ποιήσοιτο τὰς Ἀθήνας, πείσας τῶν Ἐφόρων τρεῖς, ἑξάγχι φρουρὰς. Συνείποντο δὲ καὶ οἱ ξέμαρχοι πάντες, πλὴν Βωωτῶν καὶ Κορινθίων. Οὕτως δὲ ἄλλοι μὲν ἔτι οὐ νομίζοντες εὐαρεσκῆναι ἢ στρατιωόμενοι ἐπ' Ἀθηναίους, μηδὲν παρὰ σκοπὸν ποιούντας ἱερὰτος δὲ ταῦτα, ἔτι ἐγγύς ποτε Λακεδαιμονίων Βουλόμενοι τὴν τῶν Ἀθηναίων χώραν οἰκίσαι καὶ πικρῆς ποιήσασθαι. Compare also iii. 5, 12, 13, respecting the sentiments entertained in Greece about the conduct of the Lacedaemonians.

² Diodor. xiv. 10-13.

I remarked, in the preceding chapter, how much more honourable for Sparta, and how much less unfortunate for Athens and for the rest of Greece, the close of the Peloponnesian war would have been—if Kallikratidas had gained and survived the battle of Arginusæ, so as to close it then, and to acquire for himself that personal ascendancy which the victorious general was sure to exercise over the numerous re-arrangements consequent on peace. We see how important was the personal character of the general so placed, when we follow the proceedings of Lysander during the year after the battle of Ægospotami. His personal views were the grand determining circumstance throughout Greece; regulating both the measures of Sparta and the fate of the conquered cities. Throughout the latter, rapacious and cruel oligarchies were organized—of Ten in most cities, but of Thirty in Athens—all acting under the power and protection of Sparta, but in real subordination to his ambition. Because he happened to be under the influence of a selfish thirst for power, the measures of Sparta were divested not merely of all Pan-hellenic spirit, but even, to a great degree, of reference to her own confederates—and concentrated upon the acquisition of imperial preponderance for herself. Now if Kallikratidas had been the ascendent person at this critical juncture, not only such narrow and baneful impulses would have been comparatively inoperative, but the leading state would have been made to set the example of recommending, of organizing, and if necessary, of enforcing, arrangements favourable to Pan-hellenic brotherhood. Kallikratidas would not only have refused to lend himself to Dekarchies governing by his force and for his purposes, in the subordinate cities—but he would have discountenanced such conspiracies, wherever they tended to arise spontaneously. No ruffian like Kritias, no crafty schemer like Theramênês, would have reckoned upon his aid as they presumed upon the friendship of Lysander. Probably he would have left the government of each city to its own natural tendencies, oligarchical or democratical; interfering only in special cases of actual and pronounced necessity. Now the influence of an ascendent state, employed for such purposes and emphatically discarding all private ends for the accomplishment of a stable Pan-hellenic sentiment and fraternity—employed too thus, at a moment when so many of the Greek towns were in the throes of re-organization, having to take up a new political course in reference to the altered circumstances—is an element of which the force could hardly have failed to be prodigious as well as beneficial. What degree of positive good might have been wrought, by a noble-minded victor under such special circumstances—we cannot presume to affirm in detail. But it would have been no mean advantage, to have preserved Greece from beholding and feeling such enormous powers in the hands of a man like Lysander; through whose management the worst tendencies of an imperial city were studiously magnified by the exorbitance of individual ambition. It was to him exclusively that the Thirty in Athens, and the Dekarchies elsewhere, owed both their existence and their means of oppression.

¹ Thucyd. iv.

Kallikratidas compared with Lysander.

Sympathy
at Thebes and elsewhere with the Athenian exiles.

It has been necessary thus to explain the general changes which had gone on in Greece and in Grecian feeling during the eight months succeeding the capture of Athens in March 404 B.C., in order that we may understand the position of the Thirty oligarchs or Tyrants at Athens, and of the Athenian population both in Attica and in exile, about the beginning of December in the same year—the period which we have now reached. We see how it was that Thebes, Corinth, and Megara, who in March had been the bitterest enemies of the Athenians, had now become alienated both from Sparta and from the Lysandrian Thirty, whom they viewed as viceroys of Athens for separate Spartan benefit. We see how the basis was thus laid of sympathy for the suffering exiles who fled from Attica; a feeling which the recital of the endless enormities perpetrated by Kritias and his colleagues inflamed every day more and more. We discern at the same time how the Thirty, while thus incurring enmity both in and out of Attica, were at the same time losing the hearty support of Sparta, from the decline of Lysander's influence, and the growing opposition of his rivals at home.

In spite of formal prohibition from Sparta—obtained doubtless under the influence of Lysander—the Athenian emigrants had obtained shelter in all the states bordering on Attica. It was from Bœotia that they struck the first blow. Thrasybulus, Anytus, and Archinus, starting from Thebes with the sympathy of the Theban public and with substantial aid from Ismenias and other wealthy citizens

Thrasybulus seizes Phyle—repulses
the Thirty in their attack.

—at the head of a small band of exiles stated variously at 30, 60, 70, or somewhat above 100 men¹, —seized Phylê, a frontier fortress in the mountains north of Attica, lying on the direct road between Athens and Thebes. Probably it had no garrison; for the Thirty, acting in the interest of Lacedæmonian predominance, had dismantled all the outlying fortresses in Attica²; so that Thrasybulus accomplished his purpose without resistance. The Thirty marched out from Athens to attack him, at the head of a powerful force, comprising the Lacedæmonian hoplites who formed their guard, the Three Thousand privileged citizens, and all the Knights or Horsemen. Probably the small company of Thrasybulus was reinforced by fresh accessions of exiles, as soon as he was known to have occupied the fort. For by the time that the Thirty with their assailing force arrived, he was in condition to repel a vigorous assault made by the younger soldiers, with considerable loss to the aggressors.

Farther success of Thrasybulus—the Thirty return to Athens.

Disappointed in their direct attack, the Thirty laid plans for blockading Phylê, where they knew that there was no stock of provisions. But hardly had their operations commenced, when a snow-storm fell, so abundant and violent, that they were forced to abandon their position and retire to Athens, leaving much of their baggage in the hands of the garrison at Phylê. In the language of Thrasybulus, this storm was characterized as providential, since the weather had been very fine until the moment preceding—and since it gave time to receive reinforcements which made him 700 strong¹. Though the weather was such, that the Thirty did not choose to keep their main force in the neighbourhood of Phylê, and perhaps the Three Thousand themselves were not sufficiently hearty in the cause to allow it—yet they sent their Lacedæmonians and two tribes of Athenian Horsemen to restrain the excursions of the garrison. This body Thrasybulus contrived to attack by surprise. Descending from Phylê by night, he halted within a quarter of a mile of their position until a little before daybreak, when the night-watch had just broken up², and when the grooms were making a noise in rubbing down the horses. Just at that moment the hoplites from Phylê rushed upon them at a running pace—found every man unprepared, some even in their beds—and dispersed them with scarcely any resistance. One hundred and twenty hoplites and a few horsemen were slain, while abundance of arms and stores were captured and carried back to Phylê in triumph³. News of the defeat was speedily conveyed to the city, from whence the remaining Horsemen immediately came forth to the rescue, but could do nothing more than protect the carrying off of the dead.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 2; Diodor. xiv. 32; Pausan. i. 29, 3; Lysias, Or. xiii. cont. Agorat. sect. 84; Justin, v. 9; Æschinês cont. Ktesiphon. c. 62. p. 437; Demosth. cont. Timokrat. c. 34. p. 742. Æschinês allots more than 100 followers to the captors of Phylê.

The sympathy which the Athenian exiles found at Thebes is attested in a fragment of Lysias—op. Dionys. Hal. Jud. de Lysia, p. 594 (Fragn. 47. ed. Bekker).

² Lysias, Or. xii. cont. Eratosth. s. 41. p. 124.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 2, 5, 14.

² See an analogous case of a Lacedæmonian army surprised by the Thebans at this dangerous hour—Xenoph. Hellen. vii. c. 16; compare Xenoph. Magistr. Equit. vii. 12.

³ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 5, 7. Diodorus (xiv. 32, 33) represents the occasion of this battle somewhat differently. I follow the account of Xenophon.

This successful engagement sensibly changed the relative situation of parties in Attica; encouraging the exiles as much as it depressed the Thirty. Even among the partisans of the latter at Athens, dissension began to arise. The minority which had sympathised with Theraménès, as well as that portion of the Three Thousand who were least compromised as accomplices in the recent enormities, began to waver so manifestly in their allegiance, that Kritias and his colleagues felt some doubt of being able to maintain themselves in the city. They resolved to secure Eleusis and the island of Salamis, as places of safety and resource in case of being compelled to evacuate Athens. They accordingly went to Eleusis with a considerable number of the Athenian Horsemen; under pretence of examining into the strength of the place and the number of its defenders, so as to determine what amount of farther garrison would be necessary. All the Eleusinians disposed and qualified for armed service were ordered to come in person and give in their names to the 'Thirty', in a building having its postern opening on to the sea-beach; along which were posted the Horsemen and the attendants from Athens. Each Eleusinian hoplite, after having presented himself and returned his name to the Thirty, was ordered to pass out through this exit, where each man successively found himself in the power of the Horsemen, and was fettered by the attendants. Lysimachus, the Hipparch or commander of the Horsemen, was directed to convey all these prisoners to Athens, and hand them over to the custody of the Eleven¹. Having thus seized and carried away from Eleusis every citizen whose sentiments or whose energy they suspected, and having left a force of their own adherents in the place, the Thirty returned to Athens. At the same time, it appears, a similar visit and seizure of prisoners was made by some of them in Salamis². On the next day, they convoked at Athens their Three Thousand privileged hoplites—together with all the remaining horsemen who had not been employed at Eleusis or Salamis—in the Odeon, half of which was occupied by the Lacedæmonian garrison under arms. "Gentlemen (said Kritias, addressing his countrymen), we keep up the government not less for your benefit than for our own. You must therefore share with us in the danger, as well as in the honour, of our position. Here are these Eleusinian prisoners awaiting sentence: you must pass a vote condemning them all to death, in order that your hopes and fears may be identified with ours." He then pointed to a spot immediately before him and in his view, directing each man to deposit upon it his pebble of condemnation visibly to every one³.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 8. I apprehend that ἀπορροφῆσθαι here refers to prospective military service; as in xi. 5, 29, and in Cyropæd. ii. 1, 18, 19. The words in the context—πῶς φελακῆς προσδεῖσθαι—attest that such is the meaning; though the commentators, and Sturz in his Lexicon Xenophonticum, interpret differently.

Discord among the oligarchy at Athens—seizure of the Eleusinians.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 8.

² Both Lysias (Orat. xii. cont. Erastosth. s. 53; Orat. xiii. cont. Agorat. s. 47) and Diodorus (xiv. 32) connect together these two similar proceedings at Eleusis and at Salamis. Xenophon mentions only the affair at Eleusis.

³ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 9. Δείξας δὲ τι χάριον, ἐπ' αὐτὸ ἐκείνου

I have before remarked that at Athens, open voting was well known to be the same thing as voting under constraint: there was no security for free and genuine suffrage except by making it secret as well as numerous. Kritias was obeyed, without reserve or exception: probably any dissentient would have been put to death on the spot. All the prisoners, seemingly three hundred in number¹, were condemned by the same vote, and executed forthwith.

Though this atrocity gave additional satisfaction and confidence to the most violent friends of Kritias, it probably alienated a greater number of others, and weakened the Thirty instead of strengthening them. It contributed in part, we can hardly doubt, to the bold and decisive resolution now taken by Thrasybulus, five days after his late success, of marching by night from Phylê to Peiræus². His force, though somewhat increased, was still no more than 1000 men; altogether inadequate by itself to any considerable enterprise, had he not counted on positive support and junction from fresh comrades, together with a still greater amount of negative support from disgust or indifference towards the Thirty. He was indeed speedily joined by many sympathising countrymen, but few of them, since the general disarming manœuvre of the oligarchs, had heavy armour. Some had light shields and φανερόν φέρειν τὴν ψῆφον. Compare Lysias, Or. xiii. cont. Agorast. s. 40, and Thucyd. iv. 74, about the conduct of the Megarian oligarchical leaders—καὶ ταῦτα περὶ ἀναγκάσας τοὺς δῆμος ψῆφον φανερόν διεργάζεσθαι, &c.

Thrasybulus established himself in Peiræus.

¹ Lysias (Orat. xii. cont. Eratosth. s. 53) gives this number.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 10, 13. ἡμέραν κίματον, &c.

darts, but others were wholly unarmed, and could merely serve as throwers of stones¹.

Peiræus was at this moment an open town, deprived of its fortifications as well as of those Long Walls which had so long connected it with Athens. It was however of large compass, and required an ampler force to defend it than Thrasybulus could muster. Accordingly, when the Thirty marched out of Athens the next morning to attack him, with their full force of Athenian hoplites and Horsemen, and with the Lacedæmonian garrison besides—he in vain attempted to maintain against them the great carriage-road which led down to Peiræus. He was compelled to concentrate his forces in Munychia—the easternmost portion of the aggregate called Peiræus, nearest to the Bay of Phalærum, and comprising one of those three ports which had once sustained the naval power of Athens. Thrasybulus occupied the temple of Artemis Munychia, and the adjoining Bendideion, situated in the midst of Munychia, and accessible only by a street of steep ascent. In the rear of his hoplites, whose files were ten deep, were posted the darters and slingers; the ascent being so steep that these latter could cast their missiles over the heads of the hoplites in their front. Presently Kritias and the Thirty, having first mustered in the market-place of Peiræus (called the Hippodamian Agora), were seen approaching with their superior numbers; mounting the hill in close array, with hoplites not less than fifty in depth. Thrasybulus, after an animated exhortation to his soldiers, reminding them of the wrongs which they had to attack him and are defeated—Kritias is slain.

The Thirty

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 12.

avenge, and dwelling upon the advantages of their position, which exposed the close ranks of the enemy to the destructive effect of missiles and would force them to crouch under their shields so as to be unable to resist a charge with the spear in front—waited patiently until they came within distance, standing in the foremost rank with the prophet (habitually consulted before a battle) by his side. The latter, a brave and devoted patriot, while promising victory, had exhorted his comrades not to charge until some one on their own side should be slain or wounded: he at the same time predicted his own death in the conflict. When the troops of the Thirty advanced near enough in ascending the hill, the light-armed in the rear of Thrasybulus poured upon them a shower of darts over the heads of their own hoplites, with considerable effect. As they seemed to waver, seeking to cover themselves with their shields and thus not seeing well before them—the prophet, himself seemingly in arms, set the example of rushing forward, was the first to close with the enemy, and perished in the onset. Thrasybulus with the main body of hoplites followed him, charged vigorously down the hill, and after a smart resistance, drove them back in disorder, with the loss of seventy men. What was of still greater moment—Kritias and Hippomachus, who headed their troops on the left, were among the slain; together with Charmidês son of Glaukon, one of the ten oligarchs who had been placed to manage Peiræus.

This great and important advantage left the troops of Thrasybulus in possession of seventy of the enemy's dead, whom they stripped of their arms, but not of their clothing, in token of respect for fellow-countrymen'. So disheartened, lukewarm, and disunited were the hoplites of the Thirty, in spite of their great superiority of number, that they sent to solicit the usual truce for burying the dead. Such request being of course granted, the two contending parties became intermingled with each other in the performance of the funeral duties. Amidst so impressive a scene, their common feelings as Athenians and fellow-countrymen were forcibly brought back, and many friendly observations were interchanged among them. Kleokritus—herald of the Mysts or communicants in the Eleusinian mysteries, belonging to one of the most respected Gentes in the state—was among the exiles. His voice was peculiarly loud, and the function which he held enabled him to obtain silence while he addressed to the citizens serving with the Thirty a touching and emphatic remonstrance:—"Why are you thus driving us into banishment, fellow-citizens? Why are you seeking to kill us? We have never done you the least harm: we have partaken with you in religious rites and festivals: we have been your companions in chorus, in school, and in army: we have braved a thousand dangers with you by land and sea in defence of our common safety and freedom. I adjure you by our common gods, paternal and maternal—by our common kindred and companionship—desist from thus wronging your country in obedience to these nefarious Thirty, who have

Colloquy during the burial-truce—language of Kleokritus.

* Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 19; Cornel. Nepos, Thrasybul. c. 2.

slain as many citizens in eight months, for their own private gains, as the Peloponnesians in ten years of war. These are the men who have plunged us into wicked and odious war one against another, when we might live together in peace. Be assured that your slain in this battle have cost us as many tears as they have cost you¹."

Discouragement of the oligarchs at Athens—disposition of the Thirty and appointment of the Ten—the Thirty go to Eleusis.

Such affecting appeals, proceeding from a man of respected station like Kleokritus and doubtless from others also, began to work so sensibly on the minds of the citizens from Athens, that the Thirty were obliged to give orders for immediately returning: which Thrasybulus did not attempt to prevent, though it might have been in his power to do so². But their ascendancy had received a shock from which it never fully recovered. On the next day they appeared downcast and dispirited in the senate, which was itself thinly attended; while the privileged Three Thousand, marshaled in different companies on guard, were everywhere in discord and partial mutiny. Those among them who had been most compromised in the crimes of the Thirty, were strenuous in upholding the existing authority; while such as had been less guilty protested against the continuance of so unholy a war, declaring that the Thirty could not be permitted to bring Athens to utter ruin. And though the Knights or Horsemen still continued steadfast partisans, resolutely opposing all accommodation with the exiles³, yet the

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 22.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 22; Lysias, Orat. xii. cont. Eratosth. s. 55—οὐ μὲν γὰρ ἐκ Περσῶν καὶ Ἰνδοῦ καὶ Ἰβηρῶν ἐλθόντες εὐαὶ καὶ ἀνδραγαθίᾳ, &c.

³ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 24.

Thirty were also seriously weakened by the death of Kritias—the ascendent and decisive head, and at the same time the most cruel and unprincipled among them; while that party, both in the senate and out of it, which had formally adhered to Theramenes, now again raised its head. A public meeting among them was held, in which what may be called the opposition party among the Thirty—that which had opposed the extreme enormities of Kritias—became predominant. It was determined to depose the Thirty, and to constitute a fresh oligarchy of Ten, one from each tribe¹. But the members of the Thirty were held to be individually re-eligible; so that two of them, Eratosthenes and Pheidon, if not more—adherents of Theramenes and unfriendly to Kritias and Chariklēs²—with others of the same vein of sentiment, were chosen among the Ten. Chariklēs and the more violent members, having thus lost their ascendancy, no longer deemed themselves safe at Athens, but retired to Eleusis, which they had had the precaution to occupy beforehand. Probably a number of their partisans, and the Lacedæmonian garrison also, retired thither along with them.

The nomination of this new oligarchy of Ten was plainly a compromise, adopted by some from sincere disgust at the oligarchical system and desire to come to accommodation with the exiles—by others, from a conviction that the only way of maintaining the oligarchical system, and repelling the exiles, was to constitute a new oligarchical Board, dismissing that which had become obnoxious. The latter was the purpose of the Horsemen, the main upholders of the first Board as well as of the second; and such also was soon seen to be the policy of Eratosthenes and his colleagues. Instead of attempting to agree upon terms of accommodation with the exiles in Peiræus generally, they merely tried to corrupt separately Thrasybulus and the leaders, offering to admit ten of them to a share of the oligarchical power at Athens, provided they would betray their party. This offer having been indignantly refused, the war was again resumed between Athens and Peiræus—to the bitter disappointment, not less of the exiles, than of that portion of the Athenians who had hoped better things from the new Board of Ten¹.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 23.

² Lycurg. Orat. xii. cont. Eratosth. s. 55, 56—οἱ δὲ συνεισέτες εἰς αὐτὸν ἐκπαρτάμενοι Χαρακλῆν καὶ Φεῖδον καὶ τῶν τοῦτων ἐμπροστίων, &c.

The Ten
carry on the war against the exiles.

But the forces of oligarchy were more and more enfeebled at Athens², as well by the secession of all the more violent spirits to Eleusis, as by the mistrust, discord, and disaffection, which now reigned within the city. Far from being able to abuse power like their predecessors, the Ten did not even fully confide in their Three Thousand hoplites, but were obliged to take measures for the defence of the city in conjunction with the Hipparch and the Horsemen, who did double duty—on horseback in the daytime, and as hoplites with their shields along the walls at night, for fear of surprise—employing the Odeon as their head-quarters. The Ten sent envoys to Sparta to solicit farther aid; while the Thirty sent envoys thither also, from Eleusis, for the same purpose; both representing that the Athenian people had revolted from Sparta, and required farther force to reconquer them¹.

¹ The facts which I have here set down result from a comparison of Lysons, Omt. xii. cont. Eratosth. s. 53, 59, 94—Φειδίας, αἰρεθείς ἐμὸς ἐκλλάξεν καὶ συρωγγοῖν. Diodor. xiv. 32; Justin, v. 9.

² Isokratēs, Or. xviii. cont. Kallimach. s. 25.

Such foreign aid became daily more necessary to them, since the forces of Thrasybulus in Peiræus grew stronger, before their eyes, in numbers, in arms, and in hope of success; exerting themselves, with successful energy, to procure additional arms and shields—though some of the shields, indeed, were no better than wood-work or wicker-work whitened over². Many exiles flocked in to their aid: others sent donations of money or arms. Among the latter the orator Lysias stood conspicuous, transmitting to Peiræus a present of 200 shields as well as 2000 drachms in money, and hiring besides 300 fresh soldiers; while his friend Thrasydæus, the leader of the democratical interest at Elis, was induced to furnish a loan of two talents³. Others also lent money; some Bœotians furnished two talents, and a person named Gelarchus contributed the large sum of five talents, repaid in after-times by the people⁴. Proclamation was made by Thrasybulus, that all metics who would lend aid should be put on the footing of isotely, or equal payment of taxes with citizens, exempt from the metic-tax and other special burthens. Within a

Increasing strength of Thrasybulus.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 24, 28.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 25.

³ Plutarch, Vit. X. Orator. p. 835; Lysias, Or. xxxi. cont. Philon. s. 19-34.

Lysias and his brother had carried on a manufactory of shields at Athens. The Thirty had plundered it; but some of the stock may probably have been saved.

⁴ Demosth. cont. Leptin. c. 32. p. 502; Lysias cont. Nikomach. Or. xxx. s. 29.

short time he had got together a considerable force both in heavy-armed and light-armed, and even seventy horsemen; so that he was in condition to make excursions out of Peiræus, and to collect wood and provisions. Nor did the Ten venture to make any aggressive movement out of Athens, except so far as to send out the Horsemen, who slew or captured stragglers from the force of Thrasybulus. Lysimachus the Hipparch (the same who had commanded under the Thirty at the seizure of the Eleusinian citizens) having made prisoners some young Athenians bringing in provisions from the country for the consumption of the troops in Peiræus, put them to death—in spite of remonstrances from several even of his own men; for which cruelty Thrasybulus retaliated, by putting to death a horseman named Kallistratus, made prisoner in one of their marches to the neighbouring villages¹.

In the established civil war which now raged in Attica, Thrasybulus and the exiles in Peiræus had decidedly the advantage; maintaining the offensive, while the Ten in Athens, and the remainder of the Thirty at Eleusis, were each thrown upon their defence. The division of the oligarchical force into these two sections doubtless weakened both, while the democrats in Peiræus were hearty and united. Presently however the arrival of a Spartan auxiliary force altered the balance of parties. Lysander, whom the oligarchical envoys had expressly requested to be sent to them as general, prevailed with the Ephors to grant their request. While he himself went to Eleusis and got together a Peloponne-

Arrival of Lysander in Attica with a Spartan force.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 27.

sian land-force, his brother Libys conducted a fleet of forty triremes to block up Peiræus, and 100 talents were lent to the Athenian oligarchs out of the large sum recently brought from Asia into the Spartan treasury¹.

The arrival of Lysander brought the two sections of oligarchs in Attica again into co-operation, restrained the progress of Thrasybulus, and even reduced Peiræus to great straits by preventing all entry of ships or stores. Nor could anything have prevented it from being reduced to surrender, if Lysander had been allowed free scope in his operations. But the general sentiment of Greece had by this time become disgusted with his ambitious policy, and with the oligarchies which he had everywhere set up as his instruments; a sentiment not without influence on the feelings of the leading Spartans, who, already jealous of his ascendancy, were determined not to increase it farther by allowing him to conquer Attica a second time, in order to plant his own creatures as rulers at Athens².

Under the influence of these feelings, King Pausanias obtained the consent of three out of the five Ephors to undertake himself an expedition into Attica, at the head of the forces of the confederacy, for which he immediately issued proclamation. Op-

Straitened condition of the exiles in Peiræus.

Spartan King Pausanias conducts an expedition into Attica; opposed to Lysander.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 28; Diodor. xiv. 33; Lysias, Orat. xii. cont. Erastosth. s. 60.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 29. Οὗτοι δὲ προχωροῦντες, Πανσανίαν ὁ βασιλεὺς, φθοῖσθαι Λυσάνδρου, εἰ καταργησόμενοι τούτοις ἡμεῖς μὲν εἰδομένησα, ἡμεῖς δὲ ἰδίᾳ πειρώμεσθαι τὰς Ἀθήνας, μίτρας τῶν Ἐφόρων ἐρεῖ, ἔχοντες φασίην.

Diodor. xiv. 33. Πανσανίας δὲ..... φθάνει μὲν τῷ Λυσάνδρῳ, θεωρῶν δὲ τὴν Σπάρτην ἀποφύκειν παρὰ τοῖς Ἕλλησι, &c.

Plutarch, Lysand. c. 21.

posed to the political tendencies of Lysander, he was somewhat inclined to sympathise with the democracy, not merely at Athens, but elsewhere also—as at Mantinea¹. It was probably understood that his intentions towards Athens were lenient and anti-Lysandrian, so that the Peloponnesian allies obeyed the summons generally. Yet the Bœotians and Corinthians still declined, on the ground that Athens had done nothing to violate the late convention; a remarkable proof of the altered feelings of Greece during the last year, since down to the period of that convention, these two states had been more bitterly hostile to Athens than any others in the confederacy. They suspected that even the expedition of Pausanias was projected with selfish Lacedæmonian views, to secure Attica as a separate dependency of Sparta, though detached from Lysander².

On approaching Athens, Pausanias, joined by Lysander and the forces already in Attica, encamped in the garden of the Academy near the city gates. His sentiments were sufficiently known beforehand to offer encouragement; so that the vehement reaction against the atrocities of the Thirty, which the presence of Lysander had doubtless stifled, burst forth without delay. The surviving relatives of the victims slain beset him even at the Academy in his camp, with prayers for protection and cries of vengeance against the oligarchs. Among those victims (as I have already stated) were Nikêratus the son, and Eukratês the brother, of Nikias who had perished at Syracuse, the friend and proxenus of Sparta at Athens. The orphan children, both of Nikêratus

His dispositions unfavourable to the oligarchy: reaction against the Thirty.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 2, 3.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 30.

and Eukratēs, were taken to Pausanias by their relative Diognētus, who implored his protection for them, recounting at the same time the unmerited execution of their respective fathers, and setting forth their family claims upon the justice of Sparta. This affecting incident, which has been specially made known to us¹, doubtless did not stand alone, among so many families suffering from the same cause. Pausanias was furnished at once with ample grounds, not merely for repudiating the Thirty altogether, and sending back the presents which they tendered to him²—but even for refusing to identify himself unreservedly with the new Oligarchy of Ten which had risen upon their ruins. The voice of complaint—now for the first time set free, with some hopes of redress—must have been violent and unmeasured, after such a career as that of Kritias and his colleagues; while the fact was now fully manifested, which could not well have come forth into evidence before, that the persons despoiled and murdered had been chiefly opulent men, and very frequently even oligarchical men—not politicians of the former democracy. Both Pausanias, and the Lacedæmonians along with him, on reaching Athens, must have been strongly affected by the facts which they learnt, and by the loud cry for sympathy and redress which poured upon them from the most innocent and respected families. The predisposition both of the King and the Ephors against the policy of Lysander was materially strengthened; as well as their inclination to bring about an accommodation of parties, instead of upholding by foreign force an anti-popular Few.

¹ Lysias, Or. xviii. De Bonis Nisiis Frat. s. 8-10.

² Lysias, ut sup. s. 11, 12. ἴδεν Πανουρίας ἡρώτα εἶναι αἰὲς τῇ δήμῳ, παρὶδεσθαι ποιούμενοι πρὸς τοὺς ἄλλους Λακεδαιμονίους τὰς ἡμετέρας συμφορὰς τῶν τῶν τριάντα ποσηρίας.....

Οὕτω δ' ἡλευσέμεθα, καὶ πᾶσι δαίνα ἰδουμένῃσι πεποθήσει, ὅταν Πανουρίας τὰ μὲν παρὰ τῶν τριάντα ξένην οἷα ἔθληται λαβεῖν, τὰ δὲ παρ' ἡμῶν ἐδέξαιτο.

Pausanias attacks Pei-raeus: his partial success.

Such convictions would become farther confirmed as Pausanias saw and heard more of the real state of affairs. At first he held a language decidedly adverse to Thrasybulus and the exiles, sending to them a herald, and requiring them to disband and go to their respective homes¹. The requisition not being obeyed, he made a faint attack upon Peiræus, which had no effect. Next day he marched down with two Lacedæmonian moræ or large military divisions, and three tribes of the Athenian Horsemen, to reconnoitre the place, and see where a line of blockade could be drawn. Some light troops annoyed him, but his troops repulsed them, and pursued them even as far as the theatre of Peiræus, where all the forces of Thrasybulus were mustered, heavy-armed as well as light-armed. The Lacedæmonians were here in a disadvantageous position, probably in the midst of houses and streets, so that all the light-armed of Thrasybulus were enabled to set upon them furiously from different sides, and drive them out again with loss—two of the Spartan polemarchs being here slain. Pausanias was obliged to retreat to a little eminence about half a mile off, where he mustered his whole force, and formed his hoplites into a very deep phalanx. Thrasybulus on his side was so encouraged by the recent success of his light-armed, that he ventured to bring out his heavy-armed, only eight deep, to an equal conflict on the open ground. But he was here completely worsted, and driven back into Peiræus with the loss of 150 men; so that the Spartan King was able to retire to Athens after a victory and a trophy erected to commemorate it¹.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 31. This seems the meaning of the phrase ἀνέειν ἐν τῷ λατρίῳ, as we may see by x. 38.

The issue of this battle was one extremely fortunate for Thrasybulus and his comrades; since it left the honours of the day with Pausanias, so as to avoid provoking enmity or vengeance on his part—while it showed plainly that the conquest of Peiræus, defended by so much courage and military efficiency, would be no easy matter. It disposed Pausanias still farther towards an accommodation; strengthening also the force of that party in Athens which was favourable to the same object, and adverse to the Ten Oligarchs. This opposition-party found decided favour with the Spartan King, as well as with the Ephor Naukleidas who was present along with him. Numbers of Athenians, even among those Three Thousand by whom the city was now exclusively occupied, came forward to deprecate farther war with Peiræus, and to entreat that Pausanias would settle the quarrel so as to leave them all at amity with Lacedæmon. Xenophon indeed, according to that narrow and partial spirit which pervades his Hellenica, notices no sentiment in Pausanias except his jealousy of Lysander; and treats the opposition against the Ten at Athens as having been got up by his intrigues¹. But it seems plain that this is not a correct account. Pausanias did not create the discord, but found it already existing; and had to choose which of the parties he would adopt. The Ten took up the oligarchical game after it had been thoroughly dishonoured and ruined by the Thirty: they inspired no confidence, nor had they any hold upon the citizens in Athens, except in so far as these latter dreaded reactionary violence, in case Thrasybulus and his companions should re-enter by force. Accordingly, when Pausanias was there at the head of a force competent to prevent such dangerous reaction, the citizens at once manifested their dispositions against the Ten, and favourable to peace with Peiræus. To second this pacific party was at once the easiest course for Pausanias to take, and the most likely to popularise Sparta in Greece; whereas he would surely have entailed upon her still more bitter curses from without, not to mention the loss of men to herself, if he had employed the amount of force requisite to uphold the Ten, and subdue Peiræus. To all this we have to add his jealousy of Lysander, as an important predisposing motive, but only as auxiliary among many others.

Peace-party in Athens—sustained by Pausanias.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4. 31-34.

Under such a state of facts, it is not surprising to learn that Pausanias encouraged solicitations for peace from Thrasybulus and the exiles, and that he granted them a truce to enable them to send envoys to Sparta. Along with these envoys went Kephisophon and Melitus, sent for the same purpose of entreating peace, by the party opposed to the Ten at Athens; under the sanction both of Pausanias and of the accompanying Ephors. On the other hand, the Ten, finding themselves discountenanced by Pausanias, sent envoys of their own to outbid the others. They tendered themselves, their walls, and their city, to be dealt with as the Lacedæmonians chose; requiring that Thrasybulus, if he pretended to be the friend of Sparta, should make the same unqualified surrender of Peiræus and Munychia. All the three sets of envoys were heard before the three Ephors remaining at Sparta and the Lacedæmonian assembly; who took the best resolution which the case admitted—to bring to pass an amicable settlement between Athens and Peiræus, and to leave the terms to be fixed by fifteen commissioners, who were sent thither forthwith to sit in conjunction with Pausanias. This Board determined, that the exiles in Peiræus should be re-admitted to Athens; that an accommodation should take place; and that no man should be molested for past acts, except the Thirty, the Eleven (who had been the instruments of all executions), and the Ten who had governed in Peiræus. But Eleusis was recognized as a government separate from Athens, and left (as it already was) in possession of the Thirty and their coadjutors; to serve as a refuge for all those who might feel their future safety compromised at Athens in consequence of their past conduct¹.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 35. Διότι καὶ τοῖς ἐν τῷ Ἰσθμῷ (Pausanias) καὶ ἐκείνῳ πρὸς ἡμᾶς προσέειπε ὅτι πλείστοις συλλεγομένοις, λέγουσι, &c.

As soon as these terms were proclaimed, accepted,

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 39; Diodor. xiv. 33.

The Spartans evacuated Attica—Thrasylbulus and the exiles are restored—harangue of Thrasylbulus.

and sworn to by all parties, Pausanias with all the Lacedæmonians evacuated Attica. Thrasylbulus and the exiles marched up in solemn procession from Peiræus to Athens. Their first act was to go up to the acropolis, now relieved from its Lacedæmonian garrison, and there to offer sacrifice and thanksgiving. On descending from thence, a general assembly was held, in which—unanimously and without opposition, as it should seem—the democracy was restored. The government of the Ten, which could have no basis except the sword of the foreigner, disappeared as a matter of course; but Thrasylbulus, while he strenuously enforced upon his comrades from Peiræus a full respect for the oaths which they had sworn, and an unreserved harmony with their newly acquired fellow-citizens, admonished the assembly emphatically as to the past events. "You city-men (he said), I advise you to take just measure of yourselves for the future; and to calculate fairly, what ground of superiority you have, so as to pretend to rule over us. Are you juster than we? Why, the Demos, though poorer than you, never at any time wronged you for purposes of plunder; while you, the wealthiest of all, have done many base deeds for the sake of gain. Since then you have no justice to boast of, are you superior to us on the score of courage? There cannot be a better trial, than the war which has just ended. Again—can you pretend to be superior in policy? you, who—having a fortified city, an armed force, plenty of money, and the Peloponnesians for your allies—have been overcome by men who had nothing of the kind to aid them? Can you boast of your hold over the Lacedæmonians? Why, they have just handed you over, like a vicious dog with a clog tied to him, to the very Demos whom you have wronged—and are now gone out of the country. But you have no cause to be uneasy for the future. I adjure you, my friends from Peiræus, in no point to violate the oaths which we have just sworn. Show, in addition to your other glorious exploits, that you are honest and true to your engagements¹.

The archons, the Senate of Five Hundred, the public assembly, and the Dikasteries, appear to have been now revived, as they had stood in the democracy prior to the capture of the city by Lysander. This important restoration seems to have taken place some time in the spring of 403 B.C., though we cannot exactly make out in what month. The first archon now drawn was Eukleidēs, who gave his name to this memorable year; a year never afterwards forgotten by Athenians.

Eleusis was at this time, and pursuant to the late convention, a city independent and separate from Athens, under the government of the Thirty, and comprising their warmest partisans. It was not likely that this separation would last; but the Thirty were themselves the parties to give cause for its termination. They were getting together a mercenary force at Eleusis, when the whole force of Athens was marched to forestall their designs. The generals at Eleusis came forth to demand a conference, but were seized and put to death; the Thirty themselves, and a few of the most obnoxious individuals, of the democracy.*

*Restoration

Capture of Eleusis—entire reunion of Attica—flight of the survivors of the Thirty.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 40–42.

fled out of Attica; while the rest of the Eleusinian occupants were persuaded by their friends from Athens to come to an equal and honourable accommodation. Again Eleusis became incorporated in the same community with Athens; oaths of mutual amnesty and harmony being sworn by every one¹.

We have now passed that short, but bitter and sanguinary interval, occupied by the Thirty, which succeeded so immediately upon the extinction of the empire and independence of Athens, as to leave no opportunity for pause or reflection. A few words respecting the rise and fall of that empire are now required—summing up as it were the political moral of the events recorded in my two last volumes, between 477 and 405 B.C.

I related in the forty-fifth chapter the steps by which Athens first acquired her empire—raised it to its maximum, including both maritime and inland dominion—then lost the inland portion of it; which loss was ratified by the Thirty years' Truce concluded with Sparta and the Peloponnesian confederacy in 445 B.C. Her maritime empire was based upon the confederacy of Delos, formed by the islands in the Ægean and the towns on the sea-board immediately after the battles of Plataea and Mykalæ, for the purpose not merely of expelling the Persians from the Ægean, but of keeping them away permanently. To the accomplishment of this important object Sparta was altogether inadequate; nor would it ever have been accomplished, if Athens had not displayed a combination of military energy, naval discipline, power of organization, and honourable devotion to a great Pan-hellenic purpose—such as had never been witnessed in Grecian history.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. B. 4, 43; Justin, v. 11. I do not comprehend the allusion in Lysias, Orat. xiv. Δημ. καταλ. Ἀπολ. s. 11—οἱ δὲ πάντες τῶν Ἐλευσίνων ἀπογραφέντων, ἐξελθόντες μετ' ἑμῶν, ἐπολιόρευοντο μὲν αὐτῶν.

The Confederacy of Delos was formed by the free and spontaneous association of many different towns, all alike independent; towns which met in synod and deliberated by equal vote—took by their majority resolutions binding upon all—and chose Athens as their chief to enforce these resolutions, as well as to superintend generally the war against the common enemy. But it was, from the beginning, a compact which permanently bound each individual state to the remainder. None had liberty either to recede, or to withhold the contingent imposed by authority of the common synod, or to take any separate step inconsistent with its obligations to the confederacy. No union less stringent than this could have prevented the renewal of Persian ascendancy in the Ægean. Seceding or disobedient states were thus treated as guilty of treason or revolt, which it was the duty of Athens, as chief, to repress. Her first repressions, against Naxos and other states, were undertaken in prosecution of such duty, in which if she had been wanting, the confederacy would have fallen to pieces, and the common enemy would have reappeared.

Now the only way by which the confederacy was saved from falling to pieces, was by being transformed into an Athenian empire. Such transformation (as Thucydides plainly intimates¹) did not arise from the ambition or deep-laid projects of Athens, but from the reluctance of the larger confederates to discharge the obligations imposed by the common synod, and from the unwarlike character of the confederates generally—which made them desirous to commute military service for money-payment, while Athens on her part was not less anxious to perform the service and obtain the money. By gradual and unforeseen stages, Athens thus passed from consulate to empire; in such manner that no one could point out the precise moment of time when the confederacy of Delos ceased, and when the empire began. Even the transfer of the common fund from Delos to Athens, which was the palpable manifestation of a change already realized, was not an act of high-handed injustice in the Athenians, but warranted by prudential views of the existing state of affairs, and even proposed by a leading member of the confederacy².

But the Athenian empire came to include (between 460–446 B.C.) other cities not parties to the confederacy of Delos. Athens had conquered her ancient enemy the island of Ægina, and had acquired supremacy over Megara, Boeotia, Phokis and

¹ Thucyd. i. 97.

² See Vol. V. of this History, ch. xlv, p. 465.

Lokris, and Achaia in Peloponnesus. The Megarians joined her to escape the oppression of their neighbour Corinth: her influence over Bœotia was acquired by allying herself with a democratical party in the Bœotian cities, against Sparta who had been actively interfering to sustain the opposite party and to renovate the ascendancy of Thebes. Athens was, for the time, successful in all these enterprises; but if we follow the details, we shall not find her more open to reproach on the score of aggressive tendencies than Sparta or Corinth. Her empire was now at its maximum; and had she been able to maintain it—or even to keep possession of the Megarid separately, which gave her the means of barring out all invasions from Peloponnesus—the future course of Grecian history would have been materially altered. But her empire on land did not rest upon the same footing as her empire at sea. The exiles in Megara and Bœotia, &c., and the anti-Athenian party generally in those places—combined with the rashness of her general Tolmidēs at Koroneia—deprived her of all her land-dependencies near home, and even threatened her with the loss of Eubœa. The peace concluded in 445 B.C. left her with all her maritime and insular empire (including Eubœa), but with nothing more; while by the loss of Megara she was now open to invasion from Peloponnesus.

On this footing she remained at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war fourteen years afterwards. I have shown that that war did not arise (as has been so often asserted) from aggressive or ambitious schemes on the part of Athens, but that, on the contrary, the aggression was all on the side of her enemies; who were full of hopes that they could put her down with little delay; while she was not merely conservative and defensive, but even discouraged by the certainty of destructive invasion, and only dissuaded from concessions, alike imprudent and inglorious, by the extraordinary influence and resolute wisdom of Periklès. That great man comprehended well both the conditions and the limits of Athenian empire. Athens was now understood (especially since the revolt and reconquest of the powerful island of Samos in 440 B.C.) by her subjects and enemies as well as by her own citizens, to be mistress of the sea. It was the care of Periklès to keep that belief within definite boundaries, and to prevent all waste of the force of the city in making new or distant acquisitions which could not be permanently maintained. But it was also his care to enforce upon his countrymen the lesson of maintaining their existing empire unimpaired, and shrinking from no effort requisite for that end. Though their whole empire was now staked upon the chances of a perilous war, he did not hesitate to promise them success, provided that they adhered to this conservative policy.

Following the events of the war, we shall find that Athens did adhere to it for the first seven years; years of suffering and trial, from the destructive annual invasion, the yet more destructive pestilence, and the revolt of Mitylène—but years which still left her empire unimpaired, and the promises of Periklès in fair chance of being realized. In the seventh year of the war occurred the unexpected victory at Sphakteria and the capture of the Lacedæmonian prisoners. This placed in the hands of the Athenians a capital advantage, imparting to them prodigious confidence of future success, while their enemies were in a proportional degree disheartened. It was in this temper that they first departed from the conservative precept of Periklès, and attempted to recover (in 424 B.C.) both Megara and Bœotia. Had the great statesman been alive¹, he might have turned this moment of superiority to better account, and might perhaps have contrived even to get possession of Megara (a point of unspeakable importance to Athens, since it protected her against invasion) in exchange for the Spartan captives. But the general feeling of confidence which then animated all parties at Athens, determined them in 424 B.C. to grasp at this and much more by force. They tried to reconquer both Megara and Bœotia: in the former they failed, though succeeding so far as to capture Nisæa; in the latter they not only failed, but suffered the disastrous defeat of Delium.

It was in the autumn of that same year 424 B.C., too, that Brasidas broke into their empire in Thrace, and robbed them of Akanthus, Stageira, and some other towns, including their most precious possession—Amphipolis. Again it seems that the Athenians—partly from the discouragement caused by the disaster at Delium, partly from the ascendancy of Nikias and the peace-party—departed from the conservative policy of Periklès; not by ambitious over-action, but by inaction—omitting to do all that might have been done to arrest the progress of Brasidas. We must however never forget, that their capital loss—Amphipolis—was owing altogether to the improvidence of their officers, and could not have been obviated even by Periklès.

¹ See Vol. VI. ch. lii. p. 460 of this History.

But though that great man could not have prevented the loss, he would assuredly have deemed no efforts too great to recover it; and in this respect his policy was espoused by Kleon, in opposition to Nikias and the peace-party. The latter thought it wise to make the truce for a year; which so utterly failed of its effect, that Nikias was obliged, even in the midst of it, to conduct an armament to Pallênê in order to preserve the empire against yet farther losses. Still Nikias and his friends would hear of nothing but peace; and after the expedition of Kleon against Amphipolis in the ensuing year (which failed partly through his military incapacity, partly through the want of hearty concurrence in his political opponents), they concluded what is called the peace of Nikias in the ensuing spring. In this, too, their calculations are not less signally falsified than in the previous truce: they stipulate that Amphipolis shall be restored, but it is as far from being restored as ever. To make the error still graver and more irreparable, Nikias, with the concurrence of Alkibiadês, contracts the alliance with Sparta a few months after the peace, and gives up the captives, the possession of whom was the only hold which Athens as yet had upon the Spartans.

We thus have, during the four years succeeding the battle of Delium (424–420 B.C.), a series of departures from the conservative policy of Periklès; departures, not in the way of ambitious over-acquisition, but of languor and unwillingness to make efforts even for the recovery of capital losses. Those who see no defects in the foreign policy of the democracy except those of over-ambition and love of war, pursuant to the jests of Aristophanès—overlook altogether these opposite but serious blunders of Nikias and the peace-party.

Next comes the ascendancy of Alkibiadès, leading to the two years' campaign in Peloponnesus in conjunction with Elis, Argos, and Mantinea, and ending in the complete re-establishment of Lacedæmonian supremacy. Here was a diversion of Athenian force from its legitimate purpose of preserving or re-establishing the empire, for inland projects which Periklès could never have approved. The island of Melos undoubtedly fell within his general conceptions of tenable empire for Athens. But we may regard it as certain that he would have recommended no new projects, exposing Athens to the reproach of injustice, so long as the lost legitimate possessions in Thrace remained unconquered.

We now come to the expedition against Syracuse. Down to that period, the empire of Athens (except the possessions in Thrace) remained undiminished, and her general power nearly as great as it had ever been since 445 B.C. That expedition was the one great and fatal departure from the Periklean policy, bringing upon Athens an amount of disaster from which she never recovered; and it was doubtless an error of over-ambition. Acquisitions in Sicily, even if made, lay out of the conditions of permanent empire for Athens; and however imposing the first effect of success might have been, they would only have disseminated her strength, multiplied her enemies, and weakened her in all quarters. But though the expedition itself was thus indisputably ill-advised, and therefore ought to count to the discredit of the public judgment at Athens—we are not to impute to that public an amount of blame in any way commensurate to the magnitude of the disaster, except in so far as they were guilty of unmeasured and unconquerable esteem for Nikias. Though Periklēs would have strenuously opposed the project, yet he could not possibly have foreseen the enormous ruin in which it would end; nor could such ruin have been brought about by any man existing, save Nikias. Even when the people committed the aggravated imprudence of sending out the second expedition, Demosthenēs doubtless assured them that he would speedily either take Syracuse or bring back both armaments, with a fair allowance for the losses inseparable from failure; and so he would have done, if the obstinacy of Nikias had permitted. In measuring therefore the extent of misjudgment fairly imputable to the Athenians for this ruinous undertaking, we must always recollect, that first the failure of the siege, next the ruin of the armament, did not arise from intrinsic difficulties in the case, but from the personal defects of the commander.

After the Syracusan disaster, there is no longer any question about adhering to, or departing from the Periklean policy. Athens is like Patroklos in the Iliad, after Apollo has stunned him by a blow on the back and loosened his armour. Nothing but the slackness of her enemies allowed her time for a partial recovery, so as to make increased heroism a substitute for impaired force, even against doubled and tripled difficulties. And the years of struggle which she now went through are among the most glorious events in her history. These years present many misfortunes, but no serious misjudgment; not to mention one peculiarly honourable moment, after the overthrow of the Four Hundred. I have in the two preceding chapters examined into the blame imputed to the Athenians for not accepting the overtures of peace after the battle of Kyzikus, and for dismissing Alkibiadēs after the battle of Notium. On both points their conduct has been shown to be justifiable. And after all, they were on the point of partially recovering themselves in 408 B.C., when the unexpected advent of Cyrus set the seal to their destiny.

The bloodshed after the recapture of Mitylênê and Skionê, and still more that which succeeded the capture of Melos, are disgraceful to the humanity of Athens, and stand in pointed contrast with the treatment of Samos when reconquered by Periklēs. But they did not contribute sensibly to break down her power; though being recollected with aversion after other incidents were forgotten, they are alluded to in later times as if they had caused the fall of the empire¹.

¹ This I apprehend to have been in the mind of Xenophon—De Reipublicis, v. 6, "ἔπειτα, ἐπεὶ ὡμῶς ἄγαν δόξαται προστατεύειν ἢ πάλαι διεπρήθη τὴν ἀρχήν, &c.

I have thought it important to recall, in this short summary, the leading events of the seventy years preceding 405 B.C., in order that it may be understood to what degree Athens was politically or prudentially to blame for the great downfall which she then underwent. Her downfall had one great cause—we may almost say, one single cause—the Sicilian expedition. The empire of Athens both was, and appeared to be, in exuberant strength when that expedition was sent forth; strength more than sufficient to bear up against all moderate faults or moderate misfortunes, such as no government ever long escapes. But the catastrophe of Syracuse was something overpassing in terrific calamity all Grecian experience and all power of foresight. It was like the Russian campaign of 1812 to the Emperor Napoleon; though by no means imputable, in an equal degree, to vice in the original project. No Grecian power could bear up against such a death-wound, and the prolonged struggle of Athens after it is not the least wonderful part of the whole war.

Nothing in the political history of Greece is so remarkable as the Athenian empire; taking it as it stood in its completeness, from about 460–413 B.C. (the date of the Syracusan catastrophe), or still more, from 460–424 B.C. (the date when Brasidas made his conquests in Thrace). After the Syracusan catastrophe, the conditions of the empire were altogether changed; it was irretrievably broken up, though Athens still continued an energetic struggle to retain some of the fragments. But if we view it as it had stood before that event, during the period of its integrity, it is a sight marvellous to contemplate, and its working must be pronounced, in my judgment, to have been highly beneficial to the Grecian world. No Grecian state except Athens could have sufficed to organise such a system, or to hold, in partial, though regulated, continuous and specific communion, so many little states, each animated with that force of political repulsion instinctive in the Grecian mind. This was a mighty task, worthy of Athens, and to which no state except Athens was competent. We have already seen in part, and we shall see still farther, how little qualified Sparta was to perform it: and we shall have occasion hereafter to notice a like fruitless essay on the part of Thebes.

As in regard to the democracy of Athens generally, so in regard to her empire—it has been customary with historians to take notice of little except the bad side. But my conviction is, and I have shown grounds for it in Chap. xlvii., that the empire of Athens was not harsh and oppressive, as it is commonly depicted. Under the circumstances of her dominion—at a time when the whole transit and commerce of the Ægean was under one maritime system, which excluded all irregular force—when Persian ships of war were kept out of the waters, and Persian tribute-officers away from the sea-board—when the disputes inevitable among so many little communities could be peaceably redressed by the mutual right of application to the tribunals at Athens—and when these tribunals were also such as to present to sufferers a refuge against wrongs done even by individual citizens of Athens herself (to use the expression of the oligarchical Phrynichus¹)—the condition of the maritime Greeks was materially better than it had been before, or than it will be seen to become afterwards. Her empire, if it did not inspire attachment, certainly provoked no antipathy, among the bulk of the citizens of the subject-communities, as is shown by the party-character of the revolts against her. If in her imperial character she exacted obedience, she also fulfilled duties and ensured protection—to a degree incomparably greater than was ever realized by Sparta. And even if she had been ever so much disposed to cramp the free play of mind and purpose among her subjects—a disposition which is no way proved—the very circumstances of her own democracy, with its open antithesis of political parties, universal liberty of speech, and manifold individual energy, would do much to prevent the accomplishment of such an end, and would act as a stimulus to the dependent communities even without her own intention.

Without being insensible either to the faults or to the misdeeds of imperial Athens, I believe that her empire was a great comparative benefit, and its extinction a great loss, to her own subjects. But still more do I believe it to have been a good, looked at with reference to Pan-hellenic interests. Its maintenance furnished the only possibility of keeping out foreign intervention, and leaving the destinies of Greece to depend upon native, spontaneous, untrammelled Grecian agencies. The downfall of the Athenian empire is the signal for the arms and corruption of Persia again to make themselves felt, and for the re-enslavement of the Asiatic Greeks under her tribute-officers. What is still worse, it leaves the Grecian world in a state incapable of repelling any energetic foreign attack, and open to the overruling march of "the man of Macedon" half a century afterwards. For such was the natural tendency of the Grecian world to political non-integration or disintegration, that the rise of the Athenian empire, incorporating so many states into one system, is to be regarded as a most extraordinary accident. Nothing but the genius, energy, discipline, and democracy of Athens, could have brought it about; nor even she, unless favoured and pushed on by a very peculiar train of antecedent events. But having once got it, she might perfectly well have kept it; and had she done so, the Hellenic world would have remained so organized as to be able to repel foreign intervention, either from Susa or from Pella. When we reflect how infinitely superior was the Hellenic mind to that of all surrounding nations and races—how completely its creative agency was stifled, as soon as it came under the Macedonian dictation—and how much more it might perhaps have achieved, if it had enjoyed another century or half-century of freedom, under the stimulating headship of the most progressive and most intellectual of all its separate communities—we shall look with double regret on the ruin of the Athenian empire, as accelerating, without remedy, the universal ruin of Grecian independence, political action, and mental grandeur.

¹ Thucyd. viii. 46.

CHAPTER LXVL

FROM THE RESTORATION OF THE DEMOCRACY TO THE DEATH OF ALKIBIADES.

THE period intervening between the defeat of Ægospotami (October 405 B.C.), and the re-establishment of the democracy as sanctioned by the convention concluded with Pausanias (some time in the summer of 403 B.C.), presents two years of cruel and multifarious suffering to Athens. For seven years before, indeed, ever since the catastrophe at Syracuse, she had been struggling with hardships—contending against augmented hostile force while her own means were cut down in every way—crippled at home by the garrison of Dekeleia—stripped to a great degree both of her tribute and her foreign trade—and beset by the snares of her own oligarchs. In spite of circumstances so adverse, she had maintained the fight with a resolution not less surprising than admirable; yet not without sinking more and more towards impoverishment and exhaustion. The defeat of Ægospotami closed the war at once, and transferred her from her period of struggle to one of concluding agony. Nor is the last word by any means too strong for the reality. Of these two years, the first portion was marked by severe physical privation, passing by degrees into absolute famine, and accompanied by the intolerable sentiment of despair and helplessness against her enemies, after two generations of imperial grandeur—

Miserable condition of Athens
during the two preceding
years.

not without a strong chance of being finally consigned to ruin and individual slavery; while the last portion comprised all the tyranny, murders, robberies, and expulsions, perpetrated by the Thirty, overthrown only by heroic efforts of patriotism on the part of the exiles—which a fortunate change of sentiment, on the part of Pausanias, and the leading members of the Peloponnesian confederacy, ultimately crowned with success.

After such years of misery, it was an unspeakable relief to the Athenian population to regain possession of Athens and Attica; to exchange their domestic tyrants for a renovated democratical government; and to see their foreign enemies not merely evacuate the country, but even bind themselves by treaty to future friendly dealing. In respect of power, indeed, Athens was but the shadow of her former self. She had no empire, no tribute, no fleet, no fortifications at Peiræus, no long walls, not a single fortified place in Attica except the city itself. Of all these losses, however, the Athenians probably made little account, at least at the first epoch of their re-establishment; so intolerable was the pressure which they had just escaped, and so welcome the restitution of comfort, security, property, and independence, at home. The very excess of tyranny committed by the Thirty gave a peculiar zest to the recovery of the democracy. In their hands, the oligarchical principle (to borrow an expression from Mr. Burke¹) “had produced in fact and instantly,

Immediate relief caused by the restoration—unanimous sentiment towards the renewed democracy.

¹ “I confess, Gentlemen, that this appears to me as bad in the principle, and far worse in the consequences, than an universal suspension the grossest of those evils with which it was pregnant in its nature ;" realizing the promise of that plain-spoken oligarchical oath, which Aristotle mentions as having been taken in various oligarchical cities—to contrive as much evil as possible to the people¹. So much the more complete was the reaction of sentiment towards the antecedent democracy, even in the minds of those who had been before discontented with it. To all men, rich and poor, citizens and metics, the comparative excellence of the democracy, in respect of all the essentials of good government, was now manifest. With the exception of those who had identified themselves with the Thirty as partners, partisans, or instruments, there was scarcely any one who did not feel that his life and of the Habeas Corpus Act.....Far from softening the features of such a principle, and thereby removing any part of the popular odium or natural terrors attending it, I should be sorry that anything framed in contradiction to the spirit of our constitution did not instantly produce in fact, the grossest of the evils with which it was pregnant in its nature. It is by lying dormant a long time, or being at first very rarely exercised, that arbitrary power steals upon a people. On the next unconstitutional act, all the fashionable world will be ready to say—Your prophecies are ridiculous, your fears are vain, you see how little of the misfortunes which you formerly foreboded is come to pass. Thus, by degrees, that artful softening of all arbitrary power, the alleged infrequency or narrow extent of its operation, will be received as a sort of aphorism—and Mr. Hume will not be singular in telling us that the felicity of mankind is no more disturbed by it, than by earthquakes or thunder, or the other more unusual accidents of nature." (Burke, Letter to the Sheriffs of Bristol, 1777: Burke's Works, vol. iii. p. 146-150, oct. edit.)

¹ Aristot. Polit. i. 7, 19. Καὶ τῷ δήμῳ κακόντιν ἐργάσαι, καὶ βουλεύεσθαι ἐν τῷ ὅτι ἔχει κακόν.

The complimentary epitaph upon the Thirty, cited in the Schol. on Æschines—praising them as having curbed, for a short time, the insolence of the accursed Demos of Athens—is in the same spirit: see K. F. Hermann, Staats-Alterthümer der Griechen, s. 70, note 9.

property had been far more secure under the former democracy, and would become so again if that democracy were revived¹.

It was the first measure of Thrasybulus and his companions, after concluding the treaty with Pausanias and thus re-entering the city, to exchange solemn oaths, of amnesty for the past, with those against whom they had just been at war. Similar oaths of amnesty were also exchanged with those in Eleusis, as soon as that town came into their power. The only persons excepted from this amnesty were the Thirty, the Eleven who had presided over the execution of all their atrocities, and the Ten who had governed in Peiræus. Even these persons were not peremptorily banished: opportunity was offered to them to come in and take their trial of accountability (universal at Athens in the case of every magistrate on quitting office); so that if acquitted, they would enjoy the benefit of the amnesty as well as all others². We know that Eratosthenês, one of the Thirty, afterwards returned to Athens; since there remains a powerful harangue of Lysias invoking justice against him as having brought to death Polemarchus (the brother of Lysias). Eratosthenês was one of the minority of the Thirty who sided generally with Theramenês, and opposed to a considerable degree the extreme violences of Kritias—although personally concerned in that seizure and execution of the rich metics which Theramenês had resisted, and which was one of the grossest misdeeds

Amnesty—
treatment
of the Thirty and
the Ten.

¹ Plato, Epistol. vii. p. 324. Καὶ ὅπως δὴ πον τοῖς ἀνδράσι ἐν χρόνῳ ὀλίγω χρόνῳ ἀποδείξαντες τὴν ἐμπροσθεν πολιτείαν, &c.

² Andokidês de Mysteriis, s. 90.

even of that dark period. He and Pheidon—being among the Ten named to succeed the Thirty after the death of Kritias, when the remaining members of that deposed Board retired to Eleusis—had endeavoured to maintain themselves as a new oligarchy, carrying on war at the same time against Eleusis and against the democratical exiles in Peiræus. Failing in this, they had retired from the country, at the time when the exiles returned, and when the democracy was first re-established. But after a certain interval, the intense sentiments of the moment having somewhat subsided, they were encouraged by their friends to return, and came back to stand their trial of accountability. It was on that occasion that Lysias preferred his accusation against Eratosthenés, the result of which we do not know, though we see plainly (even from the accusatory speech) that the latter had powerful friends to stand by him, and that the dikasts manifested considerable reluctance to condemn¹. We learn moreover ¹ All this may be collected from various passages of the Orat. xii. of Lysias. Eratosthenés did not stand alone on his trial, but in conjunction with other colleagues, though of course (pursuant to the psaphism of Kannónus) the vote of the dikasts would be taken about each separately—ἀλλὰ παρὰ Ἐρατοσθέου καὶ τῶν τεινῶν συνερχόντων δίκαυ λαμβάνειν,..... μὲν ἀποδοὶ μὲν τοῖς τριῶντα ἐπιβουλεύετε, παρώτατος δ' ὄψεται μὲν τῆς τύχης, ἣ τοῦτον παρήσκει τῇ πόλει, κάκειος ὑμῖν αἰεὶς βοηθήσεται (s. 80, 81); compare s. 36.

The number of friends prepared to back the defence of Eratosthenés, and to obtain his acquittal, chiefly by representing that he had done the least mischief of all the Thirty—that all that he had done had been under fear of his own life—that he had been the partisan and supporter of Theraménès, whose memory was at that time popular—may be seen in sections 51, 55, 65, 87, 88, 91.

There are evidences also of other accusations brought against the Thirty before the senate of Arrapagus (Lysias, Or. xi. cont. Theomnest. A. s. 31, B. s. 12).

from the same speech, that such was the detestation of the Thirty among several of the states surrounding Attica, as to cause formal decrees for their expulsion or for prohibiting their coming¹. The sons, even of such among the Thirty as did not return, were allowed to remain at Athens, and enjoy their rights of citizens, unmolested²; a moderation rare in Grecian political warfare.

The first public vote of the Athenians, after the conclusion of peace with Sparta and the return of the exiles, was to restore the former democracy purely and simply, to choose by lot the nine Archons and the Senate of Five Hundred, and to elect the generals—all as before. It appears that this restoration of the preceding constitution was partially opposed by a citizen named Phormisius, who, having served with Thrasybulus in Peiræus, now moved that the political franchise should for the future be restricted to the possessors of land in Attica. His proposition was understood to be supported by the Lacedæmonians, and was recommended as calculated to make Athens march in better harmony with them. It was presented as a compromise between oligarchy and democracy, excluding both the poorer freemen and those whose property lay either in moveables or in land out of Attica; so that the aggregate number of the disfranchised would have been five thousand persons. Since Athens now had lost her fleet and maritime empire, and since the importance of Peiræus was much curtailed not merely by these losses, but by demolition of its separate walls and of the long walls—Phormisius and others conceived the opportunity favourable for striking out the maritime and trading multitude from the roll of citizens. Many of these men must have been in easy and even opulent circumstances; but the bulk of them were poor; and Phormisius had of course at his command the usual arguments, by which it is attempted to prove that poor men have no business with political judgment or action. But the proposition was rejected; the orator Lysias being among its opponents, and composing a speech against it which was either spoken, or intended to be spoken, by some eminent citizen in the assembly¹.

Disfranchising proposition of Phormisius.

¹ Lysias, Or. xii. cont. Erastosth. s. 36.

² Demosth. adv. Boeotum de Dotæ Matern. c. 6. p. 1018.

Unfortunately we have only a fragment of the speech remaining, wherein the proposition is justly criticised as mischievous and unseasonable, depriving Athens of a large portion of her legitimate strength, patriotism, and harmony, and even of substantial men competent to serve as hoplites or horsemen—at a moment when she was barely rising from absolute prostration. Never certainly was the fallacy which connects political depravity or incapacity with a poor station, and political virtue or judgment with wealth—more conspicuously unmasked than in reference to the recent experience of Athens. The remark of Thrasybulus was most true²—that a greater number of atrocities, both against person and against property, had been committed in a few months by the Thirty, and abetted by the class of Horsemen, all rich men—than the poor majority of the Demos had sanctioned during two generations of democracy. Moreover we know, on the authority of a witness unfriendly to the democracy, that the poor Athenian citizens, who served on ship-board and elsewhere, were exact in obedience to their commanders; while the richer citizens who served as hoplites and horsemen and who laid claim to higher individual estimation, were far less orderly in the public service¹.

The proposition rejected—speech composed by Lysias against it.

¹ Dionys. Hal. Jul. de Lysia, c. 32, p. 526; Lysias, Orat. xxxiv., Bekk.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 41.

The motion of Phormisius being rejected, the antecedent democracy was restored without qualification, together with the ordinances of Drako, and the laws, measures, and weights of Solon. But on closer inspection, it was found that the latter part of the resolution was incompatible with the amnesty which had been just sworn. According to the laws of Solon and Drako, the perpetrators of enormities under the Thirty had rendered themselves guilty, and were open to trial. To escape this consequence, a second psephism or decree was passed, on the proposition of Tisamenus, to review the laws of Solon and Drako, and re-enact them with such additions and amendments as might be deemed expedient. Five Hundred citizens had just been chosen by the people as Nomothetæ or Law-makers, at the same time when the Senate of Five Hundred was taken by lot: out of these Nomothetæ, the Senate now chose a select few, whose duty it was to consider all propositions for amendment or addition to the laws of the old democracy, and post them up for public inspection before the statues of the Eponymous

Revision of
the laws—
the Nomothetæ.

¹ Xenoph. Memor. iii. 5, 19.

Heroes, within the month then running¹. The Senate, and the entire body of Five Hundred Nomothetæ, were then to be convened, in order that each might pass in review, separately, both the old laws and the new propositions; the Nomothetæ being previously sworn to decide righteously. While this discussion was going on, every private citizen had liberty to enter the senate, and to tender his opinion with reasons for or against any law. All the laws which should thus be approved, (first by the senate, afterwards by the Nomothetæ) but no others—were to be handed to the magistrates, and inscribed on the walls of the Portico called Pœkilê, for public notoriety, as the future regulators of the city. After the laws were promulgated by such public inscrip-

¹ Andokidês de Mystericis, s. 83. Ὁμόσων δ' ἂν προσέλθῃ. (νόμον) οἷδε ἀρχαῖοι νομοθέται ἐπὶ τῆς βουλῆς ἀναγραφόμενοι ἐν σήμῳ ἐκτιθέμενοι πρὸς τοῖς ἐπαύριον, ποσσὶς τῷ βουλευμένῳ, καὶ παραδιδόντων τὰς ἀρχαῖς ἐν τῷδε τῷ μηνί. τοῖς δὲ παραδιδόμενοι νόμοις διαμνηστέω πρότερον ἢ βουλῇ καὶ οἱ νομοθέται αἱ περὶ τὰς πόλιν, οὗτοι αἱ ἀρχαὶ εἰσάγοντο, ἐπειδὴ ἀμφοτέρωθεν.

Putting together the two sentences in which the Nomothetæ are here mentioned, Reiske and F. A. Wolf (Prolegom. ad Demosthen. com. Leptin. p. cxxix.) think that there were two classes of Nomothetæ; one class chosen by the senate, the other by the people. This appears to me very improbable. The persons chosen by the senate were invested with no final or decisive function whatever; they were simply chosen to consider what new propositions were fit to be submitted for discussion, and to provide that such propositions should be publicly made known. Now any persons simply invested with this character of a preliminary committee, would not (in my judgment) be called Nomothetæ. The reason why the persons here mentioned were so called, was, that they were a portion of the Five Hundred Nomothetæ, in whom the power of peremptory decision ultimately rested. A small committee would naturally be entrusted with this preliminary duty; and the members of that small committee were to be chosen by one of the bodies with whom ultimate decision rested, but chosen out of the other.

tion, the Senate of Areopagus was enjoined to take care that they should be duly observed and enforced by the magistrates. A provisional committee of twenty citizens was named, to be generally responsible for the city during the time occupied in this revision¹.

As soon as the laws had been revised and publicly inscribed in the Peekilê pursuant to the above decree, two concluding laws were enacted which completed the purpose of the citizens.

The first of these laws forbade the magistrates to act upon, or permit to be acted upon, any law not among those inscribed; and declared that no psephism, either of the senate or of the people, should overrule any law². It renewed also the old prohibition (dating from the days of Kleisthenês, and the first origin of the democracy), to enact a special law inflicting direct hardship upon any individual Athenian apart from the rest, unless by the votes of 6000 citizens voting secretly.

The second of the two laws prescribed, that all the legal adjudications and arbitrations which had been passed under the antecedent democracy should be held valid and unimpeached—but formally annulled all which had been passed under the Thirty. It farther provided that the laws now revised and inscribed, should only take effect from the archon-

¹ Andokidês de Mysteriis, s. 81-85.

² Andokidês de Myster. s. 87. ψήφισμα δὲ μηδὲν, μήτε βουλῆς μήτε δήμου, (νόμον) κυριώτερον εἶναι.

It seems that the word νόμον ought properly to be inserted here: see Demosth. cont. Aristokrat. c. 23. p. 649.

Compare a similar use of the phrase—μηδὲν κυριώτερον εἶναι—in Demosthen. cont. Lakrit. c. 9. p. 937.

Decree that no criminal inquiries should be carried back beyond the archonship of Kleisthenês—s.c. 403.

ship of Eukleidēs; that is, from the nomination of archons made after the recent return of Thrasybulus and renovation of the democracy¹.

By these ever-memorable enactments, all acts done prior to the nomination of the archon Eukleidēs and his colleagues (in the summer of 403 B.C.) were excluded from serving as grounds for criminal process against any citizen. To ensure more fully

¹ Andokidēs de Myster. s. 87. We see (from Demosthen. cont. Timokrat. c. 15, p. 718) that Andokidēs has not cited the law fully. He has omitted the words—ἀκούσθαι δ' ἐπὶ τῶν τριάκοντα ἐπὶ τοῦ δήμου, ἡ δὲ ἰδία ἡ δημοσίᾳ ἀκούσθαι—these words not having any material connection with the point at which he was aiming. Compare Esclines cont. Timarch. c. 9, p. 25—καὶ ἔστι ταῦτα ἀκούσθαι, ὡς περὶ τὰ ἐπὶ τῶν τριάκοντα, ἡ τὸ πρὸ Εὐκλείδου, ἡ εἰ τις ἄλλη πόσις τιαντὴ ἐγένετο προδοσία.....

Tisamenus is probably the same person of whom Lysias speaks contemptuously—Or. xxx. cont. Nikomach. s. 36.

Meier (De Bonis Damnatissim. p. 71) thinks that there is a contradiction between the decree proposed by Tisamenus (Andok. de Myst. s. 83), and another decree proposed by Dioklēs, cited in the Oration of Demosth. cont. Timokr. c. 11, p. 718. But there is no real contradiction between the two, and the only semblance of contradiction that is to be found, arises from the fact that the law of Dioklēs is not correctly given as it now stands. It ought to be read thus:—

Διακλῆθι γὰρ, ταῦς νόμοις τοῖς πρὸ Εὐκλείδου τεθένται ἐν δημοκρατίᾳ, καὶ ὅσοι ἐπ' Εὐκλείδου ἐτίθενται, καὶ εἰς ἀνεγγραμμένους, [ἐπ' Εὐκλείδου] κείμενοι εἶναι τοῖς δὲ μετ' Εὐκλείδου τεθένται καὶ τοιοῦτοι τιθεμένοι, κείμενοι εἶναι ἀπὸ τῆς ἡμέρας ἢ ἡμέρας ἐτίθη, πληρὲς εἰς τὴν προσγεγραπται χρόνος ὅταν αἱ ἀρχαί. Ἐγγράψω δὲ, τοῖς μὲν οὖν κείμενοι, τῶν γραμμάτων τῆς διακλῆς, τριάκοντα ἡμερῶν τὸ δὲ λοιπὸν, ἢ δὲ τετραχὺς γραμμάτων, προσγραφέτω παρακλήρη τὸν νόμον κείμεν εἶναι ἀπὸ τῆς ἡμέρας ἢ ἐτίθη.

The words ἐπ' Εὐκλείδου, which stand between brackets in the second line, are inserted on my own conjecture; and I venture to think that any one who will read the whole law through and the comments of the orator upon it, will see that they are imperatively required to make the sense complete. The entire scope and purpose of the law is to regulate clearly the time from which each law shall begin to be valid.

As the first part of the law reads now, without these words, it has no pertinence—no bearing on the main purpose contemplated by Dioklēs in the second part, nor on the reasonings of Demosthenes afterwards. It is easy to understand how the words ἐπ' Εὐκλείδου should have dropt that this should be carried into effect, a special clause was added to the oath taken annually by the senators, as well as to that taken by the Heliastic dikasts. The senators pledged themselves by oath not to receive any impeachment, or give effect to any arrest, founded on any fact prior to the archonship of Eukleidēs, excepting only against the Thirty and the other individuals expressly shut out from the amnesty, and now in exile¹. To the oath annually taken by the Heliasts, also, was added the clause—"I will not remember past wrongs, nor will I abet any one else who shall remember them; on the contrary², I will give my vote pursuant to the existing laws:" which laws proclaimed themselves as only taking effect from the archonship of Eukleidēs.

A still farther precaution was taken to bar all actions for redress or damages founded on acts done prior to the archonship of Eukleidēs. On the motion of Archinus (the principal colleague of Thraout, seeing that ἐπ' Εὐκλείδου immediately precedes: another error has been in fact introduced, by putting ἀπ' Εὐκλείδου in the former case instead of ἐπ' Εὐκλείδου—which error has been corrected by various recent editors, on the authority of some MSS.

Further precautions to ensure the observance of the amnesty.

The law of Dioklēs, when properly read, fully harmonises with that of Timonēus. Meier wonders that there is no mention made of the δομαστία νόμος by the Nomothetæ, which is prescribed in the decree of Timonēus. But it was not necessary to mention this expressly, since the words δομῶν ἐόντων ἀπαγεγραμμένων presuppose the ἡμετέραν δομαστίαν.

¹ Andokidēs de Mysteriis, s. 91. καὶ ὡς ἐβόημι ἐνδείξιν οὐδὲ ἀπαγογὴν ἐκκα τῶν πρότερον γεγενημένων, πλην τῶν φευγόντων.

² Andokid. de Mysteriis, s. 91. καὶ οὐ μνησκαίωσα, οὐδὲ ἄλλῃ (sc. ἄλλῃ μνησκαίοντι) πείσομαι, ψηφισῶμι δὲ κατὰ τοὺς καίμηνους νόμους.

This clause does not appear as part of the Heliastic oath given in Demosthen. cont. Timokrat. c. 36, p. 746. It was extremely significant and valuable for the few years immediately succeeding the renovation of the democracy. But its value was essentially temporary, and it was doubtless dropped within twenty or thirty years after the period to which it specially applied.

sybulus at Phylê), a law was passed, granting leave to any defendant against whom such an action might be brought, to plead an exception in bar (or Paragraphê) upon the special ground of the amnesty and the legal prescription connected with it. The legal effect of this Paragraphê or exceptional plea, in Attic procedure, was to increase both the chance of failure, and the pecuniary liabilities in case of failure, on the part of the plaintiff; also to better considerably the chances of the defendant. This enactment is said to have been moved by Archinus, on seeing that some persons were beginning to institute actions at law, in spite of the amnesty; and for the better prevention of all such claims¹.

¹ The Orest. xviii. of Isokratês—Paragraphê eust. Kallimachum—informs us on these points—especially sections 1–4.

Kallimachus had entered an action against the client of Isokratês for 10,000 drachmæ (s. 15–17), charging him as an accomplice of Patroklês (the King-Archon under the Ten who immediately succeeded the Thirty, prior to the return of the exiles), in seizing and confiscating a sum of money belonging to Kallimachus. The latter, in commencing this action, was under the necessity of paying the fees called prytaneia; a sum proportional to what was claimed, and amounting to 30 drachmæ, when the sum claimed was between 1000 and 10,000 drachmæ. Suppose that action had gone to trial directly, Kallimachus, if he lost his cause, would have to forfeit his prytaneia, but he would forfeit no more. Now according to the Paragraphê permitted by the law of Archinus, the defendant is allowed to make oath that the action against him is founded upon a fact prior to the archonship of Eukleidis; and a cause is then tried first, upon that special issue, upon which the defendant is allowed to speak first, before the plaintiff. If the verdict, on this special issue, is given in favour of the defendant, the plaintiff is not only disabled from proceeding farther with his action, but is condemned besides to pay to the defendant the forfeit called Epobely; that is, one-sixth part of the sum claimed. But if, on the contrary, the verdict on the special issue be in favour of the plaintiff, he is held entitled to proceed farther with his original action, and to receive besides at once, from the plaintiff, the like forfeit or epobely. Information on these regulations of procedure in the Attic dikaasteria may be found in Meier and Schö-

By such additional enactments, security was taken that the proceedings of the courts of justice should be in full conformity with the amnesty recently sworn, and that, neither directly nor indirectly, should any person be molested for wrongs done anterior to Eukleidēs. And in fact the amnesty was faithfully observed: the re-entering exiles from Peiræus, and the Horsemen with other partisans of the Thirty in Athens, blended again together into one harmonious and equal democracy.

Eight years prior to these incidents, we have seen the oligarchical conspiracy of the Four Hundred, for a moment successful, and afterwards overthrown; and we have had occasion to notice, in reference to that event, the wonderful absence of all reactionary violence on the part of the victorious people, at a moment of severe provocation for the past and extreme apprehension for the future. We noticed that Thucydides, no friend to the Athenian democracy, selected precisely that occasion—on which some manifestation of vindictive impulse might have been supposed likely and natural—to bestow the most unqualified eulogies on their moderate and gentle bearing. Had the historian lived to describe the reign of the Thirty and the restoration which followed it, we cannot doubt that his expressions would have been still warmer and more emphatic in the same sense. Few events in history, either ancient or modern, are more astonishing than the behaviour of the Athenian people, on recovering their democracy after the overthrow of the Thirty: and when we view it in conjunction with the like harsh reactionary feeling, both after the Thirty and after the Four Hundred.

Absence of

phenomenon after the deposition of the Four Hundred, we see that neither the one nor the other arose from peculiar caprice or accident of the moment; both depended upon permanent attributes of the popular character. If we knew nothing else except the events of these two periods, we should be warranted in dismissing, on that evidence alone, the string of contemptuous predicates—giddy, irascible, jealous, unjust, greedy, &c.—one or other of which Mr Mitford so frequently pronounces, and insinuates even when he does not pronounce them, respecting the Athenian people¹. A people, whose habitual temper and morality merited these epithets, could not have acted as the Athenians acted both

¹ Wachsmuth—who admits into his work with little or no criticism, everything which has ever been said against the Athenian people, and indeed against the Greeks generally—affirms, contrary to all evidence and probability, that the amnesty was not really observed at Athens. (Wachsm. Hellen. Alterth. ch. ix. s. 71. vol. ii. p. 267.)

The simple and distinct words of Xenophon—coming as they do from the mouth of so very hostile a witness—are sufficient to refute him—καὶ οὐδένων ἀπέχεσθαι ὃ μὴ μὴ μνηστειχόμενοι, ἔτι καὶ οὐ ἀπὸ γὰρ ἐπιδεικνύμενοι, καὶ τοῖς ἀπὸ τοῦ ἐμπελόμενοι δὲ δῆμος (Hellen. ii. 4, 43).

The passages to which Wachsmuth makes reference do not in the least establish his point. Even if actions at law or accusations had been brought, in violation of the amnesty, this would not prove that the people violated it; unless we also knew that the dikastery had affirmed those actions. But he does not refer to any actions or accusations preferred on any such ground. He only notices some cases in which, accusation being preferred on grounds subsequent to Eukleides, the accuser makes allusion in his speech to other matters anterior to Eukleides. Now every speaker before the Athenian dikastery thinks himself entitled to call up before the dikasts the whole past life of his opponent, in the way of analogous evidence going to attest the general character of the latter, good or bad. For example, the accuser of Sokratēs mentions, as a point going to impeach the general character of Sokratēs, that he had been the teacher of Kritias; while the philosopher in his defence alludes to his own resolution and virtue as Prytanis in the assembly by which the generals were condemned after the battle of Arginusæ. Both these allusions come out as evidences to general character.

after the Four Hundred and after the Thirty. Particular acts may be found in their history which justify severe censure; but as to the permanent elements of character, both moral and intellectual, no population in history has ever afforded stronger evidence than the Athenians on these two memorable occasions.

If we follow the acts of the Thirty, we shall see that the Horsemen and the privileged Three Thousand hoplites in the city had made themselves partisans in every species of flagitious crime which could possibly be imagined to exasperate the feelings of the exiles. The latter on returning saw before them men who had handed in their relations to be put to death without trial—who had seized upon and enjoyed their property—who had expelled them all from the city, and a large portion of them even from Attica—and who had held themselves in mastery not merely by the overthrow of the constitution, but also by inviting and subsidizing foreign guards. Such atrocities, conceived and ordered by the Thirty, had been executed by the aid, and for the joint benefit (as Kritias justly remarked¹) of those occupants of the city whom the exiles found on returning. Now Thrasybulus, Anytus, and the rest of these exiles, saw their property all pillaged and appropriated by others during the few months of their absence: we may presume that their lands—which had probably not been sold, but granted to individual members or partisans of the Thirty²—were restored to them; but the moveable property could not be reclaimed, and the losses to which they remained subject were prodigious. The men who had caused and profited by these losses¹—often with great brutality towards the wives and families of the exiles, as we know by the case of the orator Lysias—were now at Athens, all individually well known to the sufferers. In like manner, the sons and brothers of Leon and the other victims of the Thirty, saw before them the very citizens by whose hands their innocent relatives had been consigned without trial to prison and execution². The amount of wrong suffered had been infinitely greater than in the time of the Four Hundred, and the provocation, on every ground public and private, violent to a degree never exceeded in history. Yet with all this

Generous and reasonable behaviour of the Demos—contrasted with that of the oligarchy.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 9.

² Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 4, 1. ὅγῃ δὲ ἐκ τῆς χωρίας (αἱ ἐπιείκεια) ἦν, αὐτοὶ καὶ οἱ φίλοι τούτους ἀγγιστὶ ἔχουσιν.

¹ Isokratēs cont. Kallimach. Or. xviii. s. 30.

Ἑραστῖδης μὲν καὶ Ἄντορας, μέγιστος μὲν ἀποκίρται τῶν ἐκ τῆς πόλεως πολλῶν δὲ ἀποστερημένοι χρημάτων, εἰδότες δὲ τὰς ἀπογραφὰς, οὐκ οὐδὲν τοῦτο αὐτοῖς δίκαιον λαγχάνειν οὐδὲ μετισταθεῖν, ἀλλ' εἰ καὶ περὶ τῶν ἄλλων μᾶλλον ἐνέριον δύνανται διαπράττειν, ἀλλ' οὐκ περὶ γε τῶν ἐκ τῆς πολιτείας ἴσως ἔχει τοῖς ἄλλοις ἀξιώσει.

On the other hand the young Alkibiadēs (in the Orat. xvi. of Isokratēs, De Bigis, s. 56) is made to talk about others recovering their property—τὰς ἄλλων κομιζόμενος τὴν οὐσίαν. My statement in the text reconciles these two. The young Alkibiadēs goes on to state that the people had passed a vote to grant compensation to him for the confiscation of his father's property, but that the power of his enemies had disappointed him of it. We may well doubt whether such votes ever really passed.

It appears however that Batrachus, one of the chief informers who brought in victims for the Thirty, thought it prudent to live afterwards out of Attica (Lysias cont. Andokid. Or. vi. s. 46), though he would have been legally protected by the amnesty.

² Andokidēs de Mysteriis, s. 24. Μέγιστος δ' αὖ αὐτοῖς ἀπήγαγεν ἐπὶ τῶν τριῶντα Λέοντα, ὃς ἑμὲν ἅπαντες ἴσμεν, καὶ ἀνέθανεν ἐκείναις ἡμέραις Μέγιστος τοῦτον τοῖς παῖσι τοῖς τοῦ Λέοντος οὐκ ἴσμεν φέροντα διώκειν, ἐπὶ τοῖς ἡμέραις δὲ χρῆσθαι ἀπ' Εὐκλείδου ἀρχόντος ἐπεὶ ὡς γὰρ οὐκ ἀπήγαγεν, οὐδ' αὐτὸς ἀνέλιγαι.

sting fresh in their bosoms, we find the victorious multitude, on the latter occasion as well as on the former, burying the past in an indiscriminate amnesty, and anxious only for the future harmonious march of the renovated and all-comprehensive democracy. We see the sentiment of commonwealth in the Demos, twice contrasted with the sentiment of faction in an ascendent oligarchy¹; twice triumphant over the strongest counter-motives, over the most bitter recollections of wrongful murder and spoliation, over all that passionate rush of reactionary appetite which characterises the moment of political restoration. "Bloody will be the reign of that king, who comes back to his kingdom from exile"—says the Latin poet: bloody indeed had been the rule of Kritias and those oligarchs who had just come back from exile: "harsh is a Demos (observes Æschylus) which has just got clear of misery²." But the Athenian Demos, on coming back from Peiræus, exhibited the rare phænomenon of a restoration after cruel wrong suffered, sacrificing all the strong impulse of retaliation to a generous and deliberate regard for the future march of the commonwealth. Thucydidēs remarks that the moderation of political antipathy which prevailed at Athens after the victory of the people over the Four Hundred, was the main cause which revived Athens from her great public depression and danger³. Much more forcibly does this remark apply to the restoration after the Thirty, when the public condition of Athens was at the lowest depth

¹ Thucyd. vi. 39. δῆμος, εὐρύτερον ἀνομιέσθαι, ἀλγοαρχίας δὲ μέρος.

² Æschylus, Sept. ad Thebas, v. 1047.

Τραχὺς γὰρ μένουσιν δῆμος ἱεφεργὺς κακῶ.

³ Thucyd. viii. 97.

of abasement, from which nothing could have rescued her except such exemplary wisdom and patriotism on the part of her victorious Demos. Nothing short of this could have enabled her to accomplish that partial resurrection—into an independent and powerful single state, though shorn of her imperial power—which will furnish material for the subsequent portion of our history.

While we note the memorable resolution of the Athenian people to forget that which could not be remembered without ruin to the future march of the democracy—we must at the same time observe that which they took special pains to preserve from being forgotten. They formally recognised all the adjudged cases and all the rights of property as existing under the democracy anterior to the Thirty. "You pronounced, fellow-citizens (says Andokidēs), that all the judicial verdicts and all the decisions of arbitrators passed under the democracy should remain valid; in order that there might be no abolition of debts, no reversal of private rights, but that every man might have the means of enforcing contracts due to him by others¹." If the Athenian people had been animated by that avidity to despoil the rich, and that subjection to the passion of the moment, which Mr. Mitford imputes to them in so many chapters of his history—neither motive nor opportunity was now wanting for wholesale confiscation; of which the rich themselves, during the dominion of the Thirty, had set abundant example. The amnesty as to political wrong, and the indelible memory as to the rights of property, stand alike conspicuous as evidences of the real character of the Athenian Demos.

¹ Andokidēs de Mystericis, s. 38. Τὴν μὲν δίκην, ἃ ἄνδρες, καὶ τὰς δίκαιας ἐκαστοῦτε κερίας εἶναι, ὅπως ἐν δημοκρασίᾳ τῇ πόλει ἐγένετο, ὥστε μὴτε χρεὼς ἀποκταῖ εἰς μὴτε δίκην ἀνδίκου γένοιτο, ἀλλὰ τὰν ὅλων συμβέβαιον αἰ πράξειν εἶναι.

If we wanted any farther proof of their capacity of taking the largest and soundest views on a difficult political situation, we should find it in another of their measures at this critical period. The Ten who had succeeded to the oligarchical presidency of Athens after the death of Kritias and the expulsion of the Thirty, had borrowed from Sparta the sum of one hundred talents, for the express purpose of making war on the exiles in Peiræus. After the peace, it was necessary that such sum should be repaid, and some persons proposed that recourse should be had to the property of those individuals and that party who had borrowed the money. The apparent equity of the proposition was doubtless felt with peculiar force at a time when the public treasury was in the extreme of poverty. But nevertheless both the democratical leaders and the people decidedly opposed it, resolving to recognize the debt as a public charge; in which capacity it was afterwards liquidated, after some delay arising from an unsupplied treasury¹.

Repayment to the Lacedæmonians.

All that was required from the Horsemen or Knights who had been active in the service of the Thirty, was that they should repay the sums which had been advanced to them by the latter as outfit. Such advance to the Horsemen, subject to subsequent repayment, and seemingly distinct from the regular military pay—appears to have been a cus-

The Horsemen or Knights.

¹ Isokratēs, Areopagit. Or. vii. s. 77; Demosth. cont. Leptin. c. 5. p. 460.

tomary practice under the previous democracy¹; but we may easily believe that the Thirty had carried it to an abusive excess, in their anxiety to enlist or stimulate partisans—when we recollect that they resorted to means more nefarious for the same end. There were of course great individual differences among these Knights, as to the degree in which each had lent himself to the misdeeds of the oligarchy. Even the most guilty of them were not molested, and they were sent four years afterwards to serve with Agesilaus in Asia, at a time when the Lacedæmonians required from Athens a contingent of cavalry²; the Demos being well-pleased to be able to provide for them an honourable foreign service. But the general body of Knights suffered so little disadvantage from the recollection of the Thirty, that many of them in after-days became senators, generals, hipparchs, and occupants of other considerable posts in the state³.

¹ Lysias pro Mantitheo, Or. xvi. s. 6-8. I accept substantially the explanation which Harpokration and Photius give of the word καρδιαιῶν, in spite of the objections taken to it by M. Boeckh, which appear to me not founded upon any adequate ground. I cannot but think that Reiske is right in distinguishing καρδιαιῶν from the pay—μισθός.

See Boeckh, Public Economy of Athens, b. ii. sect. 19, p. 250. In the Appendix to this work (which is not translated into English along with the work itself) he farther gives the Fragment of an Inscription which he considers to bear upon this resumption of καρδιαιῶν from the Horsemen or Knights after the Thirty. But the Fragment is so very imperfect, that nothing can be affirmed with any certainty concerning it: see the Staatshaush. der Athener, Appendix, vol. ii. pp. 207, 208.

² Xenoph. Hellen. iii. 1, 4.

³ Lysias, Or. xvi. pro Mantitheo, s. 9, 10; Lysias, cont. Evand. Or. xxvi. s. 21-25.

We see from this latter oration (s. 26) that Thrasybulus helped some of the chief persons, who had been in the city and had resisted the return of the exiles, to get over the difficulties of the Oligarchy (or εὐκρα-

Although the decree of Tisamenus—prescribing a revision of the laws without delay, and directing that the laws when so revised should be posted up for public view, to form the sole and exclusive guide of the Dikasteries—had been passed immediately after the return from Peiræus and the confirmation of the amnesty, yet it appears that considerable delay took place before such enactment was carried into full effect. A person named Nikomachus, being charged with the duty, stands accused of having performed it tardily as well as corruptly. He as well as *Tisamenus*¹ was a scribe or secretary; under which name were included a class of paid officers, highly important in the detail of business at Athens, though seemingly men of low birth, and looked upon as filling a subordinate station, open to sneers from unfriendly orators. The boards, the magistrates, and the public bodies were so frequently changed at Athens, that the continuity of public business could only have been maintained by paid secretaries of this character, who devoted themselves constantly to the duty².

Revision of
the laws—
Nikomachos.

transition into character, previously to being admitted to take possession of any office, to which a man had been either elected or drawn by lot) in after-years. He spoke in favour of Erasides, in order that the latter might be accepted as King-Archon.

¹ I presume confidently that Tisamenus the scribe, mentioned in Lysias cont. Nikomach. s. 37, is the same person as Tisamenus named in Andokides de Mysteries (s. 83) as the proposer of the memorable psephism.

² See M. Boeckh's Public Economy of Athens, b. ii. c. 8, p. 186, Eng. Tr., for a summary of all that is known respecting these γραμματεῖς or secretaries.

The expression in Lysias cont. Nikomach. s. 38—οἱ ἐπογραμματοῦ-οι οὐκ ἐξέρχονται διὰ τὸν αὐτὸν τῇ ἀρχῇ τῇ αὐτῇ—is correctly explained by M. Boeckh as having a very restricted meaning, and as only applying Nikomachus had been named, during the democracy anterior to the Thirty, for the purpose of preparing a fair transcript, and of posting up afresh (probably in clearer characters and in a place more convenient for public view) the old laws of Solon. We can well understand that the renovated democratical feeling—which burst out after the expulsion of the Four Hundred and dictated the vehement psephism of Demophantus—might naturally also produce such a commission as this, for which Nikomachus, both as one of the public scribes or secretaries, and as an able speaker¹, was a suitable person. His accuser (for whom Lysias composed his thirtieth oration now remaining) denounces him as having not only designedly lingered in the business, for the purpose of prolonging the period of remuneration—but even as having corruptly tampered with the old laws, by new interpolations as well as by omissions. How far such charges may have been merited, we have no means of judging; but even assuming Nikomachus to have been both honest and diligent, he would find no small difficulty in properly discharging his duty of *Anagrapheus*² or “Writer-to two successive years. And I think we may doubt whether in practice it was rigidly adhered to; though it is possible to suppose that these secretaries alternated among themselves from one board or office to another. Their great usefulness consisted in the fact, that they were constantly in the service, and thus kept up the continuous march of the details.

¹ Lysias, Or. xxx. cont. Nikomach. s. 22.

² Lysias, Or. xxx. cont. Nikomach. s. 33. Wachsmuth calls him erroneously Antigraphus instead of Anagrapheus (Hellen. Alterth. vol. ii. ii. p. 267).

It seems by Orat. vii. of Lysias (s. 20, 36, 39) that Nikomachus was at enmity with various persons who employed Lysias as their logograph or speech-writer.

up" of all the old laws of Athens, from Solon downward. Both the phraseology of these old laws, and the alphabet in which they were written, were in many cases antiquated and obsolete¹; while there were doubtless also cases in which one law was at variance, wholly or partially, with another. Now such contradictions and archaisms would be likely to prove offensive, if set up in a fresh place and with clean, new characters; while Nikomachus had no authority to make the smallest alteration, and might naturally therefore be tardy in a commission which did not promise much credit to him in its result.

These remarks tend to show that the necessity of a fresh collection and publication (if we may use that word) of the laws, had been felt prior to the time of the Thirty. But such a project could hardly be realized without at the same time revising the laws, as a body, removing all flagrant contradictions, and rectifying what might glaringly displease the age either in substance or in style. Now the psephism of Tisamenus, one of the first measures of the renewed democracy after the Thirty, both prescribed such revision and set in motion a revising body; but an additional decree was now proposed and carried by Archinus, relative to the alphabet in which the revised laws should be drawn up. The Ionic alphabet—that is, the full Greek alphabet of twenty-four letters, as now written and printed—had been in use at Athens universally, for a considerable time, apparently for two generations; but from tenacious adherence to ancient custom, the laws had still continued to be consigned to writing in the old Attic alphabet of only sixteen or eighteen letters. It was now ordained that this scanty alphabet should be discontinued, and that the revised laws, as well as all future public acts, should be written up in the full Ionic alphabet¹.

Adoption of the fuller Ionic alphabet, in place of the old Attic, for writing up the laws.

¹ Lysias, Or. x. cont. Theonnest. A. s. 16-20.

Partly through this important reform, partly through the revising body, partly through the agency of Nikomachus, who was still continued as Anagrapheus—the revision, inscription, and publication of the laws in their new alphabet was at length completed. But it seems to have taken two years to perform—or at least two years elapsed before Nikomachus went through his trial of accountability². He appears to have made various new propositions of his own, which were among those adopted by the Nomothetæ: for these his accuser attacks him, on the trial of accountability, as well as on the still graver allegation of having corruptly falsified the decisions of that body—writing up what they had not sanctioned, or suppressing that which they had sanctioned³.

The archonship of Eukleidēs, succeeding immediately to the Anarchy, (as the archonship of Pythodōrus, or the period of the Thirty, was denominated,) became thus a cardinal point or epoch in Athenian history. We cannot doubt that the laws Memorable epoch of the archonship of Eukleidēs. The rhetor Lysias.

¹ See Taylor, Vit. Lysim., p. 53, 54; Frauz, Element. Epigraphicæ Græc. Introd. p. 18-24.

² Lysias cont. Nikom. s. 3. His employment had lasted six years altogether: four years before the Thirty—two years after them—s. 7. At least this seems the sense of the orator.

³ I presume this to be the sense of s. 21 of the Oration of Lysias against him—εἰ μὲν νόμους ἐτίθηγε περὶ τῆς ἀναγραφῆς, &c.: also s. 33-45—παρκαλοῦμεν ἐν τῇ κρίσει τιμωρεῖσθαι τοὺς τῶν ἐμετέρων νομοθεσιῶν ἀφανίζοντας, &c.

The tenor of the oration, however, is unfortunately obscure.

came forth out of this revision considerably modified, though unhappily we possess no particulars on the subject. We learn that the political franchise was, on the proposition of Aristophon, so far restricted for the future; that no person could be a citizen by birth except the son of citizen parents on both sides; whereas previously, it had been sufficient if the father alone was a citizen¹. The rhetor Lysias, by station a metic, had not only suffered great loss, narrowly escaping death from the Thirty (who actually put to death his brother Polemarchus)—but had contributed a large sum to assist the armed efforts of the exiles under Thrasybulus in Peiræus. As a reward and compensation for such antecedents, the latter proposed that the franchise of citizen should be conferred upon him; but we are told that this decree, though adopted by the people, was afterwards indicted by Archinus as illegal or informal, and canceled. Lysias, thus disappointed of the citizenship, passed the remainder of his life as an Isoteles, or non-freeman on the best condition, exempt from the peculiar burdens upon the class of metics².

Such refusal of citizenship to an eminent man like Lysias, who had both acted and suffered in the cause of the democracy, when combined with the decree of Aristophon above noticed, implies a degree of augmented strictness which we can only partially explain. It was not merely the renewal of her democracy for which Athens had now to provide. She had also to accommodate her legislation and administration to her future march as an isolated state, without empire or foreign dependencies. For this purpose material changes must have been required: among others, we know that the Board of Hellenotamiae (originally named for the collection and management of the tribute at Delos, but attracting to themselves gradually more extended functions, until they became ultimately, immediately before the Thirty, the general paymasters of the state) was discontinued, and such among its duties as did not pass away along with the loss of the foreign empire, were transferred to two new officers—the treasurer at war, and the manager of the Theōrikon or religious festival-fund¹.

Other changes at Athens—abolition of the Boast of Hellen—restriction of the right of citizenship.

¹ Isæus, Or. viii. De Kiron, Sect. s. 61; Demosthenes, cont. Eubulid, c. 10, p. 1307.

² Plutarch, Vit. X. Græci. (Lysias) p. 836; Taylor, Vit. Lysias, p. 53.

Respecting these two new departments, the latter of which especially became so much extended as to comprise most of the disbursements of a peace-establishment, I shall speak more fully hereafter; at present I only notice them as manifestations of the large change in Athenian administration consequent upon the loss of the empire. There were doubtless many other changes arising from the same cause, though we do not know them in detail; and I incline to number among such the alteration above noticed respecting the right of citizenship. While the Athenian empire lasted, the citizens of Athens were spread over the Ægean in every sort of capacity—as settlers, merchants, navigators, soldiers, &c., which must have tended materially to encourage intermarriages between them and the women of other Grecian insular states. Indeed we are even told that an express permission of connubium with Athenians was granted to the inhabitants of Eubœa¹—a fact (noticed by Lysias) of some moment in illustrating the tendency of the Athenian empire to multiply family ties between Athens and the allied cities. Now, according to the law which prevailed before Eukleidês, the son of every such marriage was by birth an Athenian citizen; an arrangement at that time useful to Athens, as strengthening the bonds of her empire—and eminently useful in a larger point of view, among the causes of Pan-hellenic sympathy. But when Athens was deprived both of her empire and her fleet, and confined within the limits of Attica—there no longer remained any motive to continue such a regulation, so that the exclusive city-feeling, instinctive in the Grecian mind, again became predominant. Such is perhaps the explanation of the new restrictive law proposed by Aristophon.

¹ See respecting this change Boeckh, Public Econ. of Athens, ii. 7. p. 180 seq. Eng. Tr.

Thrasybulus and the gallant handful of exiles who had first seized Phylê, received no larger reward than 1000 drachmæ for a common sacrifice and votive offering, together with wreaths of olive as a token of gratitude from their countrymen*. The debt which Athens owed to Thrasybulus was indeed such as could not be liquidated by money. To his individual patriotism, in great degree, we may ascribe not only the restoration of the democracy, but its good behaviour when restored. How different would have been the consequences of the restoration and reward to Thrasybulus and

Honorary
the exiles.

¹ Lysias, Fragn. Or. xxxiv. De non dissolvendâ Republicâ, s. 3—ἀλλὰ καὶ Εὐβοίων ἐννομιῶν ἐνωσμένη, &c.

² Æschinês, cont. Ktesiphon. c. 62, p. 437; Cornel. Nepos, Thrasybul. c. 4.

the conduct of the people, had the event been brought about by a man like Alkibiadès, applying great abilities principally to the furtherance of his own cupidity and power!

At the restoration of the democracy, however, Alkibiadès was already no more. Shortly after the catastrophe at Ægospotami, he had sought shelter in the satrapy of Pharnabazus, no longer thinking himself safe from Lacedæmonian persecution in his forts on the Thracian Chersonese. He carried with him a good deal of property, though he left still more behind him in these forts; how acquired, we do not know. But having crossed apparently to Asia by the Bosphorus, he was plundered by the Thracians in Bithynia, and incurred much loss before he could reach Pharnabazus in Phrygia. Renewing the tie of personal hospitality which he had contracted with Pharnabazus four years before¹, he now solicited from the satrap a safe conduct up to Susa. The Athenian envoys—whom Pharnabazus, after his former pacification with Alkibiadès in 408 B.C., had engaged to escort to Susa, but had been compelled by the mandate of Cyrus to detain as prisoners—were just now released from their three years' detention, and enabled to come down to the Propontis²; and Alkibiadès, by whom this mission had originally been projected, tried to prevail on the satrap to perform the promise which he had originally given, but had not been able to fulfill. The hopes of the sanguine exile, reverting back to the history of Themistoklès, led him to anticipate the same success at ¹ Xenoph. Hellen. i. 3, 12. τὸν τε τὰς ἐπὶ τῶν ἰσθμῶν καὶ τῶν ἀλλήλων πόλεων ἐκκέντησαν.

² Xenoph. Hellen. i. 4, 7.

Susa as had fallen to the lot of the latter: nor was the design impracticable, to one whose ability was universally renowned, and who had already acted as minister to Tissaphernès.

The court of Susa was at this time in a peculiar position. King Darius Nothus, having recently died, had been succeeded by his eldest son Artaxerxes Mnemon¹; but the younger son Cyrus, whom Darius had sent for during his last illness, tried after the death of the latter to supplant Artaxerxes in the succession—or at least was suspected of so trying. Being seized and about to be slain, the queen-mother Parysatis prevailed upon Artaxerxes to pardon him, and send him again down to his satrapy along the coast of Ionia, where he laboured strenuously, though secretly, to acquire the means of dethroning his brother; a memorable attempt, of which I shall speak more fully hereafter. But his schemes, though carefully masked, did not escape the observation of Alkibiadès, who wished to make a merit of revealing them at Susa, and to become the instrument of defeating them. He communicated his suspicions as well as his purpose to Pharnabazus; whom he tried to awaken by alarm of danger to the empire, in order that he might thus get himself forwarded to Susa as informant and auxiliary.

Pharnabazus was already jealous and unfriendly in spirit towards Lysander and the Lacedæmonians (of which we shall soon see plain evidence)—and perhaps towards Cyrus also, since such were the habitual relations of neighbouring satraps in the Persian empire. But the Lacedæmonians and Cyrus Artaxerxes Mnemon the new king of Persia. Plans of Cyrus—Alkibiadès wishes to reveal them at Susa.

The Lacedæmonians conjointly with Cyrus require Pharnabazus to put him to death.

¹ Xenoph. Anab. i. 1; Diodor. xiii. 108.

were now all-powerful on the Asiatic coast, so that he probably did not dare to exasperate them, by identifying himself with a mission so hostile, and an enemy so dangerous, to both. Accordingly he refused compliance with the request of Alkibiadês; granting him nevertheless permission to live in Phrygia, and even assigning to him a revenue. But the objects at which the exile was aiming soon became more or less fully divulged, to those against whom they were intended. His restless character, enterprise, and capacity, were so well known as to raise exaggerated fears as well as exaggerated hopes. Not merely Cyrus—but the Lacedæmonians, closely allied with Cyrus—and the Dekarchies, whom Lysander had set up in the Asiatic Grecian cities, and who held their power only through Lacedæmonian support—all were uneasy at the prospect of seeing Alkibiadês again in action and command, amidst so many unsettled elements. Nor can we doubt that the exiles whom these Dekarchies had banished, and the disaffected citizens who remained at home under their government in fear of banishment or death, kept up correspondence with him, and looked to him as a probable liberator. Moreover the Spartan king Agis still retained the same personal antipathy against him, which had already (some years before) procured the order to be despatched, from Sparta to Asia, to assassinate him. Here are elements enough, of hostility, vengeance, and apprehension, afloat against Alkibiadês—without believing the story of Plutarch, that Kritias and the Thirty sent to apprise Lysander that the oligarchy at Athens could not stand, so long as Alkibiadês was alive. The truth is, that though the Thirty had included him in the list of exiles¹, they had much less to dread from his assaults or plots, in Attica, than the Lysandrian Dekarchies in the cities of Asia. Moreover his name was not popular even among the Athenian democrats, as will be shown hereafter when we come to recount the trial of Sokratès. Probably therefore the alleged intervention of Kritias and the Thirty, to procure the murder of Alkibiadès, is a fiction of the subsequent encomiasts of the latter at Athens, in order to create for him claims to esteem as a friend and fellow-sufferer with the democracy.

A special despatch (or Skytalê) was sent out by the Spartan authorities to Lysander in Asia, enjoining him to procure that Alkibiadès should be put to death. Accordingly Lysander communicated this order to Pharnabazus, within whose satrapy Alkibiadès was residing, and requested that it might be put in execution. The whole character of Pharnabazus shows that he would not perpetrate such a deed, towards a man with whom he had contracted ties of hospitality, without sincere reluctance and great pressure from without; especially as it would have been easy for him to connive underhand at the escape of the intended victim. We may therefore be sure that it was Cyrus, who, informed of the revelations contemplated by Alkibiadès, enforced the requisition of Lysander; and that the joint demand of the two was too formidable even to be evaded, much less openly disobeyed. Accordingly Pharnabazus despatched his brother Magæus and his uncle Sisamithres with a band of armed men, to assassinate Assassination of Alkibiadès by order of Pharnabazus.

¹ Xenoph. Hellen. ii. 3, 42; Isokratès. Or. xvi. De Bigis, s. 46.

Alkibiadès in the Phrygian village where he was residing. These men, not daring to force their way into his house, surrounded it and set it on fire. Yet Alkibiadès, having contrived to extinguish the flames, rushed out upon his assailants with a dagger in his right-hand, and a cloak wrapped round his left to serve as a shield. None of them dared to come near him; but they poured upon him showers of darts and arrows until he perished, undefended as he was either by shield or by armour. A female companion with whom he lived—Timandra—wrapped up his body in garments of her own, and performed towards it all the last affectionate solemnities¹.

Character
of Alki-biades.

Such was the deed which Cyrus and the Lacedæmonians did not scruple to enjoin, nor the uncle and brother of a Persian satrap to execute; and by which this celebrated Athenian perished, before he had attained the age of fifty. Had he lived, we cannot doubt that he would again have played some conspicuous part—for neither his temper nor his abilities would have allowed him to remain in the shade—but whether to the advantage of Athens or not, is more questionable. Certain it is, that taking his life throughout, the good which he did to her bore no proportion to the far greater evil. Of the

¹ I put together what seems to me the most probable account of the death of Alkibiades from Pintarch, Alkib. c. 38, 39; Diodorus, xiv. 11 (who cites Ephorus, compare Ephor. Fragm. 126, ed. Didot); Cornelius Nepos, Alkibiad. c. 10; Justin, v. 8; Isocrates, Or. xvi. De Bigis, s. 50.

There were evidently different stories, about the antecedent causes and circumstances, among which a selection must be made. The extreme perfidy ascribed by Ephorus to Pharnabazus appears to me not at all in the character of that satrap.

disastrous Sicilian expedition, he was more the cause than any other individual; though that enterprise cannot properly be said to have been caused by any individual: it emanated rather from a national impulse. Having first, as a counsellor, contributed more than any other man to plunge the Athenians into this imprudent adventure, he next, as an exile, contributed more than any other man (except Nicias) to turn that adventure into ruin, and the consequences of it into still greater ruin. Without him, Gylippus would not have been sent to Syracuse—Dekeleia would not have been fortified—Chios and Miletus would not have revolted—the oligarchical conspiracy of the Four Hundred would not have been originated. Nor can it be said that his first three years of political action as Athenian leader, in a speculation peculiarly his own—the alliance with Argos, and the campaigns in Peloponnesus—proved in any way advantageous to his country. On the contrary, by playing an offensive game where he had hardly sufficient force for a defensive, he enabled the Lacedæmonians completely to recover their injured reputation and ascendancy through the important victory of Mantinea. The period of his life really serviceable to his country, and really glorious to himself, was that of three years ending with his return to Athens in 407 B.C. The results of these three years of success were frustrated by the unexpected coming-down of Cyrus as satrap: but, just at the moment when it behoved Alkibiadēs to put forth a higher measure of excellence, in order to realise his own promises in the face of this new obstacle — at that critical moment we find him spoiled by the unexpected welcome which had recently greeted him at Athens, and falling miserably short even of the former merit whereby that welcome had been earned.

If from his achievements we turn to his dispositions, his ends, and his means—there are few characters in Grecian history who present so little to esteem, whether we look at him as a public or as a private man. His ends are those of exorbitant ambition and vanity; his means rapacious as well as reckless, from his first dealing with Sparta and the Spartan envoys, down to the end of his career. The manœuvres whereby his political enemies first procured his exile were indeed base and guilty in a high degree. But we must recollect that if his enemies were more numerous and violent than those of any other politician in Athens, the generating seed was sown by his own overweening insolence, and contempt of restraints, legal as well as social.

On the other hand, he was never once defeated either by land or sea. In courage, in ability, in enterprise, in power of dealing with new men and new situations, he was never wanting; qualities, which, combined with his high birth, wealth, and personal accomplishments, sufficed to render him for the time the first man in every successive party which he espoused—Athenian, Spartan, or Persian—oligarchical or democratical. But to none of them did he ever inspire any lasting confidence; all successively threw him off. On the whole, we shall find few men in whom eminent capacities for action and command are so thoroughly marred by an assemblage of bad moral qualities, as Alkibiadēs¹.

¹ Cornelius Nepos says (Alcib. c. 11) of Alkibiadēs—"Hunc infamatum a plerisque tres gravissimi historici summis laudibus extulerunt: Thucydides, qui ejusdem ætatis fuit; Theopompus, qui fuit post aliquando natus; et Timæus: qui quidem duo maledicentissimi, nescio quo modo, in illo uno laudando consierunt."

We have no means of appreciating what was said by Theopompus and Timæus. But as to Thucydides, it is to be recollected that he extols only the capacity and warlike enterprise of Alkibiadēs—nothing beyond; and he had good reason for doing so. His picture of the dispositions and conduct of Alkibiadēs is the reverse of eulogy.

The Oration xvi. of Isokratēs, De Bigis, spoken by the son of Alkibiadēs, goes into a laboured panegyric of his father's character, but is prodigiously inaccurate, if we compare it with the facts stated in Thucydides and Xenophon. But he is justified in saying—σίδερον τοῦ πατρὸς ἡγομένην ἔπαινον ἔχειν ἰστέον αἰ πολέμους (s. 23).

CHAPTER LXVII.

THE DRAMA.—RHETORIC AND DIALECTICS.—THE SOPHISTS.

Athens immediately after Eukleides—political history little known.

RESPECTING the political history of Athens during the few years immediately succeeding the restoration of the democracy, we have unfortunately little or no information. But in the spring of 399 B.C., between three and four years after the beginning of the archonship of Eukleides, an event happened of paramount interest to the intellectual public of Greece as well as to philosophy generally—the trial, condemnation, and execution, of Sokratès. Before I recount that memorable incident, it will be proper to say a few words on the literary and philosophical character of the age in which it happened. Though literature and philosophy are now becoming separate departments in Greece, each exercises a marked influence on the other; and the state of dramatic literature will be seen to be one of the causes directly contributing to the fate of Sokratès.

Extraordinary development of dramatic genius.

During the century of the Athenian democracy between Kleisthenès and Eukleides, there had been produced a development of dramatic genius, tragic and comic, never paralleled before or afterwards. Æschylus, the creator of the tragic drama, or at least the first composer who rendered it illustrious, had been a combatant both at Marathon and Salamis; while Sophoklès and Euripidès, his two eminent followers (the former, one of the generals of the Athenian armament against Samos in 440 B.C.) expired both of them only a year before the battle of Ægospotami—just in time to escape the bitter humiliation and suffering of that mournful period. Out of the once numerous compositions of these poets we possess only a few, yet sufficient to enable us to appreciate in some degree the grandeur of Athenian tragedy; and when we learn that they were frequently beaten, even with the best of their dramas now remaining, in fair competition for the prize against other poets whose names only have reached us—we seem warranted in presuming that the best productions of these successful competitors, if not intrinsically finer, could hardly have been inferior in merit to theirs¹.

The tragic drama belonged essentially to the festivals in honour of the god Dionysus; being originally a chorus sung in his honour, to which were successively superadded—first, an Iambic monologue,—next, a dialogue with two actors,—lastly, a regular plot with three actors, and the chorus itself interwoven into the scene. Its subjects were from the beginning, and always continued to be, persons either divine or heroic, above the level of historical life and borrowed from what was called the mythical past. The Persæ of Æschylus, indeed, forms a splendid exception; but the two analogous dramas of his contemporary, Phrynichus,—the Phœnissæ and the capture of Milētus—were not successful enough to invite subsequent tragedians to meddle with contemporary events. To three serious dramas or a trilogy—at first connected together by sequence of subject more or less loose, but afterwards unconnected and on distinct subjects, through an innovation introduced by Sophoklēs, if not before—the tragic poet added a fourth or satyrical drama; the characters of which were satyrs, the companions of the god Dionysus, and other heroic or mythical persons exhibited in farce. He thus made up a total of four dramas or a tetralogy, which he got up and brought forward to contend for the prize at the festival. The expense of training the chorus and actors was chiefly furnished by the Chorēgi, wealthy citizens, of whom one was named for each of the ten tribes, and whose honour and vanity were greatly interested in obtaining the prize. At first, these exhibitions took place on a temporary stage, with nothing but wooden supports and scaffolding; but shortly after the year 500 B.C., on an occasion when the poets Æschylus and Pratinas were contending for the prize, this stage gave way during the ceremony, and lamentable mischief was the result. After that misfortune, a permanent theatre of stone was provided. To what extent the project was realised before the invasion of Xerxes, we do not accurately know; but after his destructive occupation of Athens, the theatre, if any existed previously, would have to be rebuilt or renovated along with other injured portions of the city.

Gradual enlargement of tragedy.

¹ The Œdipus Tyrannus of Sophoklēs was surpassed by the rival composition of Philoklēs. The Medea of Euripidēs stood only third for the prize; Euphronion, son of Æschylus, being first, Sophoklēs second. Yet these two tragedies are the masterpieces now remaining of Sophoklēs and Euripidēs.

Abundance of new tragedy at Athens.

It was under that great development of the power of Athens which followed the expulsion of Xerxes, that the theatre with its appurtenances attained full magnitude and elaboration, and Attic tragedy its maximum of excellence. Sophoklēs gained his first victory over Æschylus in 468 B.C. : the first exhibition of Euripidēs was in 455 B.C. The names, though unhappily the names alone, of many other competitors have reached us : Philoklēs, who gained the prize even over the Cēdipus Tyrannus of Sophoklēs ; Euphōrion son of Æschylus, Xenoklēs and Nikomachus, all known to have triumphed over Euripidēs ; Neophron, Achæus, Ion, Agathon, and many more. The continuous stream of new tragedy, poured out year after year, was something new in the history of the Greek mind. If we could suppose all the ten tribes contending for the prize every year, there would be ten tetralogies (or sets of four dramas each, three tragedies and one satyrical farce) at the Dionysiac festival, and as many at the Lenæan. So great a number as sixty new tragedies composed every year¹, is not to be thought of ; yet we do not know what was the usual number of competing tetralo-

¹ The careful examination of Welcker (Griech. Tragödie, vol. i. p. 76) makes out the titles of eighty tragedies unquestionably belonging to Sophoklēs—over and above the satyrical dramas in his Tetralogies. Welcker has considerably cut down the number admitted by previous authors, carried by Fabricius as high as 178, and even by Boeckh as high as 109 (Welcker, ut sup. p. 62).

The number of dramas ascribed to Euripidēs is sometimes 92, sometimes 75. Elmsley (in his remarks on the Argument to the Medea, p. 72) thinks that even the larger of these numbers is smaller than what Euripidēs probably composed ; since the poet continued composing for fifty years, from 455 to 405 B.C., and was likely during each year to have composed one, if not two, tetralogies ; if he could prevail upon the archon to grant him a chorus, that is, the opportunity of representing. The Dikaskalios took no account of any except such as gained the first, second or third prize. Welcker gives the titles, and an approximative guess at the contents, of 51 lost tragedies of the poet, besides the 17 remaining (p. 443).

Aristarchus the tragedian is affirmed by Suidas to have composed 70

gies: it was at least three—since the first, second and third are specified in the Didaskalies or Theatrical Records—and probably greater than three. It was rare to repeat the same drama a second time, unless after considerable alterations; nor would it be creditable to the liberality of a Chorêgus to decline the full cost of getting up a new tetralogy. Without pretending to determine with numerical accuracy how many dramas were composed in each year, the general fact of unexampled abundance in the productions of the tragic muse is both authentic and interesting.

Accessibility of the theatre to the poorest citizens.

Moreover—what is not less important to notice—all this abundance found its way to the minds of the great body of the citizens, not excepting even the poorest. For the theatre is said to have accommodated 30,000 persons¹: here again it is unsafe to rely upon numerical accuracy, but we cannot doubt that it was sufficiently capacious to give to most of the citizens, poor as well as rich, ample opportunity of profiting by these beautiful compositions. At first, the admission to the theatre was gratuitous; but as the crowd, of strangers as well as freemen, was found both excessive and disorderly, the system was adopted of asking a price, seemingly at the time when the permanent theatre was put in complete order after the destruction caused by Xerxes. The theatre was let by contract to a manager who engaged to defray (either in whole or part) the habitual cost incurred by the state in the tragedies, of which only two gained the prize. As many as 120 compositions are ascribed to Neophron, 44 to Acharis, 40 to Ion (Weicker, ib. p. 889).

¹ Plato, Symposium, v. 3. p. 175.

representation, and who was allowed to sell tickets of admission. At first it appears that the price of tickets was not fixed, so that the poor citizens were overbid, and could not get places. Accordingly Periklês introduced a new system, fixing the price of places at three oboli (or half a drachma) for the better, and one obolus for the less good. As there were two days of representation, tickets covering both days were sold respectively for a drachma and two oboli. But in order that the poor citizens might be enabled to attend, two oboli were given out from the public treasure to each citizen (rich as well as poor, if they chose to receive it) on the occasion of the festival. A poor man was thus furnished with the means of purchasing his place and going to the theatre without cost, on both days, if he chose; or, if he preferred it, he might go on one day only—or might even stay away altogether and spend both the two oboli in any other manner. The higher price obtained for the better seats purchased by the richer citizens, is here to be set against the sum disbursed to the poorer; but we have no data before us for striking the balance, nor can we tell how the finances of the state were affected by it¹.

Such was the original Theôrikon or festival-pay introduced by Periklês at Athens; a system of distributing the public money, gradually extended to

Theôrikon or festival-pay.

¹ For these particulars, see chiefly a learned and valuable compilation—G. C. Schneider, Das Attische Theater-Weesen, Weimar 1835—furnished with copious notes; though I do not fully concur in all his details, and have differed from him on some points. I cannot think that more than two oboli were given to any one citizen at the same festival; at least, not until the distributions became extended, in times posterior to the Thirty: see M. Schneider's Book, p. 17; also Notes, 29-196.

other festivals in which there was no theatrical representation, and which in later times reached a mischievous excess; having begun at a time when Athens was full of money from foreign tribute,—and continuing, with increased demand, at a subsequent time when she was comparatively poor and without extraneous resources. It is to be remembered that all these festivals were portions of the ancient religion, and that according to the feelings of that time, cheerful and multitudinous assemblages were essential to the satisfaction of the god in whose honour the festival was celebrated. Such disbursements were a portion of the religious, even more than of the civil, establishment. Of the abusive excess which they afterwards reached, however, I shall speak in a future volume: at present I deal with the Theôrikon only in its primitive function and effect, of enabling all Athenians indiscriminately to witness the representation of the tragedies.

We cannot doubt that the effect of these compositions upon the public sympathies, as well as upon the public judgment and intelligence, must have been beneficial and moralizing in a high degree. Though the subjects and persons are legendary, the relations between them are all human and simple—exalted above the level of humanity, only in such measure as to present a stronger claim to the bearer's admiration or pity. So powerful a body of poetical influence has probably never been brought to act upon the emotions of any other population; and when we consider the extraordinary beauty of these immortal compositions, which first stamped tragedy as a separate department of poetry, and gave to the tragedies on the public mind

Effect of
of Athens.

it a dignity never since reached, we shall be satisfied that the tastes, the sentiments, and the intellectual standard, of the Athenian multitude, must have been sensibly improved and exalted by such lessons. The reception of such pleasures through the eye and the ear, as well as amidst a sympathising crowd, was a fact of no small importance in the mental history of the people. It contributed to exalt their imagination, like the grand edifices and ornaments added during the same period to their acropolis. Like them, too, and even more than they—tragedy was the monopoly of Athens; for while tragic composers came thither from other parts of Greece (Achæus from Eretria, and Ion from Chios, at a time when the Athenian empire comprised both those places) to exhibit their genius,—nowhere else were original tragedies composed and acted, though hardly any considerable city was without a theatre¹.

The three great tragedians—Æschylus, Sophoklēs and Euripidēs,—distinguished above all their competitors, as well by contemporaries as by subsequent critics, are interesting to us, not merely from the positive beauties of each, but also from the differences between them in handling, style and sentiment, and from the manner in which these differences illustrate the insensible modification of the Athenian mind. Though the subjects, persons, and events of tragedy always continued to be borrowed from the legendary world, and were thus kept above the level of contemporaneous life²—yet the dramatic

Æschylus, Sophoklēs and Euripidēs—modifications of tragedy.

¹ See Plato, Lachis, c. 6. p. 183 B.; and Welcker, Griech. Tragöd. p. 330.

² Upon this point, compare Welcker, Griech. Tragöd. vol. ii. p. 1102.

manner of handling them is sensibly modified, even in Sophoklēs as compared with Æschylus—and still more in Euripidēs, by the atmosphere of democracy, political and judicial contention, and philosophy, encompassing and acting upon the poet.

In Æschylus, the ideality belongs to the handling not less than to the subjects: the passions appealed to are the masculine and violent, to the exclusion of Aphroditē and her inspirations¹: the figures are vast and majestic, but exhibited only in half-light and in shadowy outline: the speech is replete with bold metaphor and abrupt transition,—“grandiloquent even to a fault” (as Quintilian remarks), and often approaching nearer to Oriental vagueness than to Grecian perspicuity. In Sophoklēs, there is evidently a closer approach to reality and common life: the range of emotions is more varied, the figures are more distinctly seen, and the action more fully and conspicuously worked out. Not only we have a more elaborate dramatic structure, but a more expanded dialogue, and a comparative simplicity of speech like that of living Greeks: and we find too a certain admixture of rhetorical declamation, amidst the greatest poetical beauty which the Grecian drama ever attained. But when we advance to Euripidēs, this rhetorical element becomes still more prominent and developed. The ultra-natural sublimity of the legendary characters disappears: love and compassion are invoked to a degree which Æschylus would have deemed inconsistent with the dignity of the heroic person: moreover there are appeals to the reason, and argumentative controversies, which that grandiloquent poet would have despised as petty and forensic cavils. And—what was worse still, judging from the Æschylean point of view—there was a certain novelty of speculation, an intimation of doubt on reigning opinions, and an air of scientific refinement, often spoiling the poetical effect.

¹ See Aristophan. Ran. 1046. The Antigone (780 seq.) and the Trachiniae (496) are sufficient evidence that Sophoklēs did not agree with Æschylus in this renunciation of Aphroditē.

Such differences between these three great poets are doubtless referable to the working of Athenian politics and Athenian philosophy on the minds of the two later. In Sophoklēs, we may trace the companion of Herodotus¹—in Euripidēs, the hearer of Anaxagoras, Sokratēs, and Prodikus²; in both, the familiarity with that wide-spread popularity of speech, and real, serious debate of politicians and competitors before the dikastery, which both had ¹ The comparison of Herodot. iii. 119 with Soph. Antig. 905 proves a community of thought which seems to me hardly explicable in any other way. Which of the two obtained the thought from the other, we cannot determine.

The reason given, by a woman whose father and mother were dead, for preferring a brother either to husband or child—that she might find another husband and have another child, but could not possibly have another brother—is certainly not a little far-fetched.

² See Valckenauer, Diatribe in Eurip. Frag. c. 23. Quintilian, who had before him many more tragedies than those which we now possess, remarks how much more useful was the study of Euripidēs, than that of Æschylus or Sophoklēs, to a young man preparing himself for forensic oratory:—

“Illud quidem nemo non fatetur, is qui se ad agendum comparaverint, utiliter longe Euripidem fore. Namque is et vi et sermone (quod ipsum reprehendunt quibus gravitas et cothurnus et sonus Sophocles videtur esse sublimior) magis accedit oratorio generi: et sententiis densus, et rebus ipsis; et in his quæ a sapientibus tradita sunt, pæne ipsis par; et in dicendo et respondendo cuilibet eorum, qui fuerunt in foro disertis, comparandus. In affectibus vero tum omnibus miris, tum in his qui miseratione constant, facile præcipuus.” (Quintil. Inst. Orat. x. 1.)

ever before their eyes, but which the genius of Sophoklès knew how to keep in due subordination to his grand poetical purpose.

The transformation of the tragic muse from Æschylus to Euripidès is the more deserving of notice, as it shows us how Attic tragedy served as the natural prelude and encouragement to the rhetorical and dialectical age which was approaching. But the democracy, which thus insensibly modified the tragic drama, imparted a new life and ampler proportions to the comic; both the one and the other being stimulated by the increasing prosperity and power of Athens during the half century following 480 a.c. Not only was the affluence of strangers and visitors to Athens continually augmenting, but wealthy men were easily found to incur the expense of training the chorus and actors. There was no manner of employing wealth which seemed so appropriate to Grecian feeling, or tended so much to procure influence and popularity to its possessors, as that of contributing to enhance the magnificence of the national and religious festivals¹. This was the general sentiment both among rich and among poor; nor is there any criticism more unfounded than that which represents such an obligation as hard and oppressive upon rich men. Most of them spent more than they were legally compelled to spend in this way, from the desire of exalting their popularity. The only real sufferers were, the peo-

¹ Aristophan. Plutus, 1160:—

Πλοῦται γὰρ ἐστὶ τοῦτο ἀναγκαῖον, ἵνα οἱ δῶκεται γυμνασίᾳ καὶ ποικίλῳ.

Compare the speech of Alkibiadès, Thuc. vi. 16, and Theophrastus ap. Cic. de Officiis, ii. 16.

ple, considered as interested in a just administration of law; since it was a practice which enabled many rich men to acquire importance who had no personal qualities to deserve it,—and which provided them with a stock of factitious merits to be pleaded before the Dikastery, as a set-off against substantive accusations.

The full splendour of the comic Muse was considerably later than that of the tragic. Even down to 460 B.C. (about the time when Periklès and Ephialtès introduced their constitutional reforms), there was not a single comic poet of eminence at Athens; nor was there apparently a single undisputed Athenian comedy before that date, which survived to the times of the Alexandrine critics, Magnès, Kratès, and Kratinus—probably also Chionidès and *Ekphantidès*¹—all belong to the period beginning about (Olympiad 80 or) 460 B.C.; that is, the generation preceding Aristophanès, whose first composition dates in 427 B.C. The condition and growth of Attic comedy before this period seems to have been unknown even to Aristotle, who intimates that the archon did not begin to grant a chorus for comedy, or to number it among the authoritative solemnities of the festival, until long after the practice had been established for tragedy. Thus the comic chorus in that early time consisted of volunteers, without any chorégus publicly assigned to bear the expense of teaching them or getting up the piece—so that there was little motive

Growth and development of Comedy at Athens.

¹ See Meineke, Hist. Critic. Comicor. Græcor. vol. i. p. 26 seq.

Gryssar and Mr. Clinton, following Suidas, place Chionidès before the Persian invasion; but the words of Aristotle rather countenance the later date (Poetic. c. 3).

for authors to bestow care or genius in the preparation of their song, dance, and scurrilous monody or dialogue. The exuberant revelry of the phallic festival and procession—with full license of scoffing at any one present, which the god Dionysus was supposed to enjoy—and with the most plain-spoken grossness as well in language as in ideas—formed the primitive germ, which under Athenian genius ripened into the old comedy¹. It resembled in many

¹ See respecting these licentious processions, in connexion with the Iambus and Archilochus, vol. iv. of this History, ch. xxix. p. 108.

Aristotle (Poetic. c. 4) tells us that these phallic processions, with liberty to the leaders (οἱ ἐξάρχοντες) of scoffing at every one, still continued in many cities of Greece in his time: see Herod. v. 83, and Sextus apud Athenæum, xiv. p. 622; also the striking description of the rural Dionysia in the Acharnæ of Aristophanes, 235, 255, 1115. The scoffing was a part of the festival, and supposed to be agreeable to Dionysus—*ὃς τοῖς Διονυσίοις ἐφευγμένον κέρδ' ἔργον καὶ τὸ σκώμμα μέγιστον εὖ δόκει τῇ ἐστέρῃ καὶ ὁ θεὸς ἰσως χαίρει, φλογόμεν τὰ αἶν' (Lucum, Piscator. c. 25). Compare Aristophanes, Rane. 367, where the poet seems to imply that no one has a right to complain of being ridiculed in the μεγίστῃ τελευτῇ Διονύσου.*

The Greek word for comedy—κωμῳδία, τὸ κωμῳδεῖν—at least in its early sense, had reference to a bitter, insulting, crimination, ridicule: κωμῳδεῖν καὶ κακῶς λέγειν (Xenophon, Repub. Ath. ii. 23)—κωμῳποιεῖν τε καὶ κωμῳδεῖσθαι ἀλλήλους καὶ αἰσχρολογεῖσθαι (Plato de Repub. iii. 8. p. 332). A remarkable definition of κωμῳδία appears in Bekker's Anecdota Græca, ii. 747, 10—Κωμῳδία ἐστὶν ἡ ἐν μέσῳ λαῶν κωμῳγία, ἔργον ἀμωσέειν—"public exposure to scorn before the assembled people:" and this idea of it as a penal visitation of evil-doers is preserved in Platonius and the anonymous writers on comedy, prefixed to Aristophanes. The definition which Aristotle (Poetic. c. 11) gives of it, is too mild for the primitive comedy: for he tells us himself that Kratês, immediately preceding Aristophanes, was the first author who departed from the λαμπρὸς λόγος: this "luminous vein" was originally the common character. It doubtless included every variety of ridicule, from innocent mirth to scornful contempt and odium; but the predominant character tended decidedly to the latter.

Compare Will. Schneider, Attisches Theater-Wesen, Notes, p. 99-95; Bernhardt, Griechische Literatur, sect. 67, p. 292.

Flügel (in his History of Comic Literature), speaking of the unsparring wit of Rabelais, gives a notice and specimens of the general coarseness respects the satyric drama of the tragedians, but was distinguished from it by dealing not merely with the ancient mythical stories and persons, but chiefly with contemporary men and subjects of common life—dealing with them often, too, under their real names, and with ridicule the most direct, poignant, and scornful. We see clearly how fair a field Athens would offer for this species of composition, at a time when the bitterness of political contention ran high—when the city had become a centre for novelties from every part of Greece—when tragedians, rhetors, and philosophers, were acquiring celebrity and incurring odium—and when the democratical constitution laid open all the details of political and judicial business, as well as all the first men of the state, not merely to universal criticism, but also to unmeasured libel.

Out of all the once abundant compositions of Attic comedy, nothing has reached us except eleven plays of Aristophanès. That poet himself singles out Magnès, Kratès, and Kratinus, among predecessors whom he describes as numerous, for honourable mention; as having been frequently, though not uniformly, successful. Kratinus appears to have been not only the most copious, but also the most distinguished, among all those who preceded Aristophanès; a list comprising Hermippus, Telekleidès, and the other bitter assailants of Periklès. It was Kratinus who first extended and systematised the licence of the phallic festival, and the “careless before Ari-stophanès

Comic poets
—Kratinus, etc.

of style which marked all the productions of that author's time—mysteries, masks, sermons, &c., “the habit of calling all things by their simplest and most direct names,” &c.

laughter of the festive crowd¹," into a drama of regular structure, with actors three in number, according to the analogy of tragedy. Standing forward, against particular persons exhibited or denounced by their names, with a malignity of personal slander not inferior to the Iambist Archilochus, and with an abrupt and dithyrambic style somewhat resembling Æschylus—Kratinus made an epoch in comedy as the latter had made in tragedy; but was surpassed by Aristophanēs, as much as Æschylus had been surpassed by Sophoklēs. We are told that his compositions were not only more rudely bitter and extensively libellous than those of Aristophanēs², but also destitute of that richness of illustration and felicity of expression which pervades all the wit of the latter, whether good-natured or malignant. In Kratinus, too, comedy first made herself felt as a substantive agent and partisan in the political warfare of Athens. He espoused the cause of Kimon against Periklēs³; eulogising the former, while he bitterly derided and vituperated the latter. Hermippus, Telekleidēs, and most of the contemporary comic writers followed the same

¹ Χαῖρ', ὃ μὲν ἀχαιοὶ γὰρ οὐκ οἶδ' αὖτις τῶν ἐπὶ τῶν αἰσθημάτων.

Τῆς ἡμετέρας σοφίας κριτὴς ἄριστος πάντων, &c.

Kratini Fragm. Incert. 51; Meineke, Fr. Com. Græcor. ii. p. 193.

² Respecting Kratinus, see Platinus and the other writers on the Attic comedy, prefixed to Aristophanēs in Bekker's edition, pp. vi. ix. xi. xiii. &c.; also Meineke, Historia Comic. Græc. vol. i. p. 50 seq.

.....Ὁ δὲ γὰρ, ὅσπερ Ἀριστοφάνης, ἐπιτρέχει τὴν χάριν τοῖς σκώμμασι ποιεῖ (Κρατῖνος), ἀλλ' ἀπλῶς, καὶ κατὰ τὴν παραίτησιν, γυμνῇ τῇ κεφαλῇ τίθει τὰς βλασφημίας κατὰ τῶν ἀμαρτανόδων.

³ See Kratinus—'Archilochus'—Frag. 1, and Plutarch, Kimon, 10. Ἡ κωμῳδία πολιτικὴν ἐστὶν ἐν ταῖς δράμασι καὶ φιλοσοφίᾳ, ἥ τῃς περὶ τὸν Κρατῖνον καὶ Ἀριστοφάνην ἐπὶ ἑσποίων, &c. (Dionys. Halikarn. Ars Rhetoric. c. 11.)

political line in assailing that great man, together with those personally connected with him, Aspasia and Anaxagoras: indeed Hermippus was the person who indicted Aspasia for impiety before the Dikastery. But the testimony of Aristophanês¹ shows that no comic writer, of the time of Periklês, equalled Kratinus either in vehemence of libel or in popularity.

It is remarkable that in 440 B.C., a law was passed forbidding comic authors to ridicule any citizen by name in their compositions; which prohibition, however, was rescinded after two years; an interval marked by the rare phenomenon of a lenient comedy from Kratinus². Such enactment denotes a struggle in the Athenian mind, even at that time, against the mischief of making the Dionysiac festival an occasion for unmeasured libel against citizens publicly named and probably themselves present. And there was another style of comedy taken up by Kratês—distinct from the Iambic or Archilochian vein worked by Kratinus—in which comic incident was attached to fictitious characters and woven into a story, without recourse to real individual names or direct personality. This species of comedy (analogous to that which Epicharmus had before exhibited at Syracuse) was continued by Pherekratês as of citizens by name in Comedy—forbidden for a time —then renewed—Kratês and the milder

Exposure
Comedy.

¹ Aristophan. Equit. 525 seq.

² A comedy called Ὀδυσσεύς (plur. numb. corresponding to the title of another of his comedies—Ἀρχαλοχῶν). It had a chorus, as one of the Fragmenta shows; but few or no choric songs—nor any Parabasis, or address by the chorus, assuming the person of the poet, to the spectators.

See Bergk, De Reliquiis Comœd. Antiq. p. 142 seq.; Meineke, Frag. Cratini, vol. ii. p. 93. Ὀδυσσεύς; compare also the first volume of the same work, p. 43; also Runkel, Cratini Fragm. p. 38 (Leips. 1827).

the successor of Kratês. Though for a long time less popular and successful than the poignant food served up by Kratinus and others, it became finally predominant after the close of the Peloponnesian war, by the gradual transition of what is called the Old Comedy into the Middle and New Comedy.

Aristo-
phanes.

But it is in Aristophanês that the genius of the old libellous comedy appears in its culminating perfection. At least we have before us enough of his works to enable us to appreciate his merits; though perhaps Eupolis, Ameipsias, Phrynichus, Plato (Comicus) and others, who contended against him at the festivals with alternate victory and defeat, would be found to deserve similar praise, if we possessed their compositions. Never probably will the full and unshackled force of comedy be so exhibited again. Without having Aristophanês actually before us, it would have been impossible to imagine the unmeasured and unsparing licence of attack assumed by the old comedy upon the gods, the institutions, the politicians, philosophers, poets, private citizens specially named—and even the women, whose life was entirely domestic—of Athens. With this universal liberty in respect of subject, there is combined a poignancy of derision and satire, a fecundity of imagination and variety of turns, and a richness of poetical expression—such as cannot be surpassed, and such as fully explains the admiration expressed for him by the philosopher Plato, who in other respects must have regarded him with unquestionable disapprobation. His comedies are popular in the largest sense of the word, addressed to the entire body of male citizens on a day consecrated to festivity, and providing for them amusement or derision with a sort of drunken abundance; out of all persons or things standing in any way prominent before the public eye. The earliest comedy of Aristophanès was exhibited in 427 B.C., and his Muse continued for a long time prolific, since two of the dramas now remaining belong to an epoch eleven years after the Thirty and the renovation of the democracy—about 392 B.C. After that renovation, however (as I have before remarked), the unmeasured sweep and libellous personality of the old comedy was gradually discontinued: the comic Chorus was first cut down, and afterwards suppressed, so as to usher in what is commonly termed the Middle Comedy, without any Chorus at all. The 'Plutus' of Aristophanès indicates some approach to this new phase; but his earlier and more numerous comedies (from the 'Acharneis' in 425 B.C. to the 'Frogs' in 405 B.C., only a few months before the fatal battle of Ægospotami) exhibit the continuous, unexhausted, untempered, flow of the stream first opened by Kratinus.

Such abundance both of tragic and comic poetry, each of first-rate excellence, formed one of the marked features of Athenian life, and became a powerful instrument in popularising new combinations of thought with variety and elegance of expression. While the tragic Muse presented the still higher advantage of inspiring elevated and benevolent sympathies, more was probably lost than gained by the lessons of the comic Muse—not only bringing out keenly all that was really ludicrous or contemptible in the phenomena of the day, but manufacturing scornful laughter, quite as often, out of that which was innocent or even meritorious, as well as out of boundless private slander. The 'Knights' and the 'Wasps' of Aristophanès, however, not to mention other plays, are a standing evidence of one good point in the Athenian character; that they bore with good-natured indulgence the full outpouring of ridicule and even of calumny interwoven with it, upon those democratical institutions to which they were sincerely attached. The democracy was strong enough to tolerate unfriendly tongues either in earnest or in jest; the reputations of men who stood conspicuously forward in politics, on whatever side, might also be considered as a fair mark for attacks, inasmuch as that measure of aggressive criticism, which is tutelary and indispensable, cannot be permitted, without the accompanying evil, comparatively much smaller, of excess and injustice¹; though even here we may remark that excess of bitter personality is among the most conspicuous sins of Athenian literature generally. But the warfare of comedy, in the persons of Aristophanès and other composers, against philosophy, literature, and eloquence—in the name of those good old times of ignorance, "when an Athenian seaman knew no-

Comedy in its effect on the Athenian mind.

¹ Aristophanès boasts that he was the first comic composer who selected great and powerful men for his objects of attack: his predecessors (he affirms) had meddled only with small vermin and rags (ἄν τὰ μικρὰ κακίστους δέ, καὶ τοὺς φθινοῖς πολυμοῦσται) (Pac. 724-736; Vesp. 1030).

But this cannot be true in point of fact, since we know that no man was more bitterly assailed by the comic authors of his day than Pericles. It ought to be added, that though Aristophanès doubtless attacked the powerful men, he did not leave the smaller persons unmolested.

thing more than how to call for his barley-cake, and cry *Yo-ho*¹; and the retrograde spirit which induces them to exhibit moral turpitude as the natural consequence of the intellectual progress of the age—are circumstances going far to prove an unfavourable and degrading influence of Comedy on the Athenian mind.

In reference to individual men, and to Sokratēs²

¹ Aristoph. Ran. 1067 (also Vesp. 1095). Æschylus reproaches Euripides—

Εἴς' αὖ λαλῶν ἐπιπαθεῖναι καὶ στομολίαν ἐδίδαξας.

"Ἢ ῥεκίνοσας τὰς τε παλαιότητας, καὶ τὰς πηγὰς ἐνέτραψας τῶν μετρίων στομολογμένων, καὶ τοὺς παράλους ἀπέειπας

Ἀστυγορεῖν τοῖς ἀρχαίοις. Καίτοι τότε γ', ἥνικ' ἐγὼ ζῶω, οὐκ ἠπίσταυτ' ἄλλ' ἢ μάζαν καλεῖσαι καὶ ῥυττυπαὶ εἶπειν.

Τὸ ῥυττυπαὶ seems to have been the peculiar cry or chorus of the seamen on shipboard, probably when some joint pull or effort of force was required: compare Vesper, 909.

² See about the effect on the estimation of Sokratēs, Ranke, Commentat. de Vitâ Aristophanis, p. CDXLJ.

Compare also the remarks of Cicero (De Repub. iv. 11; vol. iv. p. 476, ed. Orell.) upon the old Athenian comedy and its unrestrained licence. The laws of the Twelve Tables at Rome condemned to death any one who composed and published libellous verses against the reputation of another citizen.

Among the constant butts of Aristophanēs and the other comic composers, was the dithyrambic poet Kinesias, upon whom they discharged their wit and bitterness, not simply as an indifferent poet, but also on the ground of his alleged impiety, his thin and feeble bodily frame, and his wretched health. We see the effect of such denunciations in a speech of the orator Lysias, composed on behalf of Phinias, against whom Kinesias had brought an indictment or Graphê Parmomōn, Phinias treats these abundant lampoons as if they were good evidence against the character of Kinesias—Θαυμάζω ἢ εἰ μὴ βαρὺς φέροιτο δεῖ Κινεσίας ἔσθαι ὁ τοῖς λόγῳ βαρὺν, δεῖ μὲν πάντες ἐπιστασθῆαι ἀνελέστατον ἀπάστων καὶ παρασημάτωσαν γεγονέναι. Οὐχ οὕτως ἔστιν ὁ ποιητὴς περὶ θεῶν ἐξαμαρτάνων, ὁ τοῖς μὲν ἄλλοις υἰσχρὸν ἔστι καὶ λέγειν, τῶν καμνηλοδιδάσκων καλῶς ἢ ἀκούετε καθ' ἕκαστον ἐμμελῶν; See Lysias, Fragm. 31, ed. Bekker; Atheniensis, xii. p. 551.

Dr. Thirlwall estimates more lightly than I do the effect of these abundant libels of the old comedy: see his review of the Attic tragedy and comedy in a very excellent chapter of his History of Greece, ch. xviii. vol. iii. p. 42.

Mistaken estimate of the comic writers, as good witnesses or just critics.

especially, the Athenians seem to have been unfavourably biassed by the misapplied wit and genius of Aristophanes in 'The Clouds,' aided by other comedies of Eupolis and Ameipsias and Eupolis; but on the general march of politics, philosophy, or letters, these composers had little influence. Nor were they ever regarded at Athens in the light in which they are presented to us by modern criticism—as men of exalted morality, stern patriotism, and genuine discernment of the true interests of their country—as animated by large and steady views of improving their fellow-citizens, but compelled, in consequence of prejudice or opposition, to disguise a far-sighted political philosophy under the veil of satire—as good judges of the most debateable questions, such as the prudence of making war or peace—and excellent authority to guide us in appreciating the merits or demerits of their contemporaries, inasmuch that the victims of their lampoons are habitually set down as worthless men¹. There can-

¹ The view which I am here combating is very general among the German writers; in proof of which, I may point to three of the ablest recent critics on the old comedy—Bergk, Meiske, and Ranke—all most useful writers for the understanding of Aristophanes.

Respecting Cratinus, Bergk observes—"Erat enim Cratinus, pariter atque ceteri principum antiquarum comediae, vir egregie moratus, idemque antiqui moris tenax. . . . Cum Cratinus quasi divinitus videret ex hac libertate mox tanquam ex stirpe aliqua nimiam licentiam existere et nasci, statim his initiis graviter adversatus est, videturque Cimonem tanquam exemplum boni et honesti eras proposuisse," &c.

"Nam Cratinus cum esset ingenio et ceteris morum gravitate, agerrime tulit rem publicam præceptis in perniciem ruere: omnem igitur operam atque omne studium eo contulit, ut imagines ipsius vite ante oculos posita amica et res divina et humana emendaretur, humanamque vitam ad honestatem colendam inveneretur. Hoc sibi primum et propositum Cratinus, et propositum strenue persequutus est. Sed si ipsam Veritatem, cujus imago oculis obversabatur, oculis subieceret, reverendi erant se latius obverret eos qui spectarent, nihilque purius eorum, qua not be a greater misconception of the old comedy than to regard it in this point of view; yet it is summo studio persequeretur, obtineret. Quare eximiam quādam arte pulchram effigiem hilarumque formam fluxit, ita tamen ut ad veritatem sublimemque ejus speciem referret omnia: sic cum ludicris miscet seria, ut et vulgus haberet qui delectaretur; et qui plus ingenio valeret, ipsam veritatem, quæ ex omnibus fabularum partibus perlaceret, mente et cogitatione comprehenderent."....."Jam vero Cratinum in fabulis componendis id voice spectariisæ quod esset verum, ne veteres quidem latuit.....Aristophanes autem idem et seculus semper est et sæpe profusus." (Bergk, De Reliquis Comæd. Antiq. pp. 1, 10, 20, 233, &c.)

The criticism of Ranke (Commentatio de Vita Aristophanis, p. cxxli), cccxiv, cccxlii, cccxlix, cccclxxiii, cdxxxiv, &c.) adopts the same strain of eulogy as to the lofty and virtuous purposes of Aristophanes. Compare also the eulogy bestowed by Meineke on the moral value of the old comedy (Historia Comæ. Græc. p. 39, 50, 165, &c.), and similar praises by Westermann—Geschichte der Beredsamkeit in Griechenland und Rom. sect. 36.

In one of the arguments prefixed to the 'Pax' of Aristophanes, the author is so full of the conception of these poets as public instructors or advisers, that he tells us absurdly enough, they were for that reason called διδάσκαλοι—οἳ δὲ γὰρ συμβούλους διέφερον ὥς τε αὐτοὺς καὶ διδάσκαλους ὀνόμαζον ὅτι πάντα τὰ πρόσφορα διὰ χρημάτων αὐτοὺς εἰδίδασκον (p. 244, ed. Bekk.).

"Eupolis, atque Cratinus, Aristophanesque poetæ, Atque alii, quorum Comædia præca virorum est,
Si quis erit dignus describi, quod malus, aut fur,
Aut mæchus foret, aut siccus, aut alioqui
Famulus, multâ cum libertate notabant."

This is the early judgment of Horace (Serm. i. 4. 1): his later opinion on the Fescennina licentia, which was the same in spirit as the old i Grecian comedy, is much more judicious (Epistol. ii. 1, 145): compare Art. Poetic. 224. To assume that the persons derided or vilified by these comic authors must always have deserved what was said of them, is indeed a striking evidence of the value of the maxim—"Fortius calumniare; semper aliquid restat." Without doubt their indiscriminate libel sometimes wounded a suitable subject; in what proportion of cases, we have no means of determining; but the perusal of Aristophanes tends to justify the epithets which Lucian puts into the mouth of Dialogus respecting Aristophanes and Eupolis—not to favour the opinions of the authors whom I have cited above (Lucian, Jov. Accus. vol. ii. p. 832). He calls Eupolis and Aristophanes δεινὸς ἄνθρωπος ἐπισκομητικὸς τὰ κακὰ καὶ χλευάζων τὰ καλοῖς ἔχοντα.

When we notice what Aristophanes himself says respecting the other astonishing how many subsequent writers (from Diodorus and Plutarch down to the present day) have thought themselves entitled to deduce their facts of Grecian history, and their estimate of Grecian men, events, and institutions—from the comedies of Aristophanes. Standing pre-eminent as the latter does in comic genius, his point of view is only so much the more determined by the ludicrous associations suggested to his fancy, so that he thus departs the more widely from the conditions of a faithful witness or candid critic. He presents himself to provoke the laugh, mirthful or spiteful, of comic poets, his predecessors and contemporaries, we shall find it far from countenancing the exalted censorial function which Bergk and others ascribe to them (see the Parabasis in the Nubes, 530 seq., and in the Pax, 723). It seems especially preposterous to conceive Kratinus in that character; of whom what we chiefly know, is his habit of drunkenness, and the downright, unadorned, vituperation in which he indulged: see the Fragments and story of his last play—Perissos (in Meineke, vol. ii. p. 116; also Meineke, vol. i. p. 48 seq.).

Meineke copies (p. 46) from Suidas a statement (v. Ἐπὶ τῶν διαδόρεσσι) to the effect that Kratinus was ταξίαρχος τῆς Οἰνῆδος φυλῆς. He construes this as a real fact: but there can hardly be a doubt that it is only a joke made by his contemporary comedians upon his fondness for wine; and not one of the worst among the many such jests which seem to have been then current. Runkel also, another editor of the Fragments of Kratinus (Cratini Fragmenta, Lipsæ 1827, p. 2—M. M. Runkel), construes this ταξίαρχος τῆς Οἰνῆδος φυλῆς as if it were a serious function; though he tells us about the general character of Kratinus—"De Vita ipsâ et moribus pœne nihil dicere possumus: hoc solum constat, Cratinum poculis et merorum amori valde deditum fuisse."

Great numbers of Aristophanic jests have been transcribed as serious matter-of-fact, and have found their way into Grecian history. Whoever follows chapter vii. of K. F. Hermann's Griechische Staats-Alterthümer, containing the Innere Geschichte of the Athenian democracy, will see the most sweeping assertions made against the democratical institutions, on the authority of passages of Aristophanes: the same is the case with several of the other most learned German manuals of Grecian affairs.

the festival crowd—assembled for the gratification of these emotions, and not with any expectation of serious or reasonable impressions¹. Nor does he at all conceal how much he is mortified by failure; like the professional jester or “laughter-maker” at the banquets of rich Athenian citizens²—the parallel of Aristophanes as to purpose, however unworthy of comparison in every other respect.

This rise and development of dramatic poetry in Greece—so abundant, so varied, and so rich in genius—belongs to the fifth century B.C. It had been in the preceding century nothing more than an unpretending graft upon the primitive chorus, and was then even denounced by Solon (or in the dictum ascribed to Solon) as a vicious novelty, tending—by its simulation of a false character and by its effusion of sentiments not genuine or sincere—to corrupt the integrity of human dealings³; a charge of corruption, not unlike that which Aristophanes worked up a century afterwards, in his

Aversion of Solon to the drama when nascent.

¹ Horat. de Art. Poetic. 212-224.

² *Indoctus quid cuius speret, liberque laborum,
Rusticus urbano confusus, turpis honesto?.....
Illecebris erat et gratâ novitate morandus
Spectator, fumesque aseris, et potius, et exlex.*

³ See the Parabasis of Aristophanes in the Nubes (535 seq.) and in the Vespæ (1015-1045).

Compare also the description of Philippos the γελῶντις or Jester in the Symposium of Xenophon; most of which is extremely Aristophanic, ii. 10, 14. The comic point of view is assumed throughout that piece; and Sokratēs is introduced on one occasion as apologising for the intrusion of a serious reflection (τὸ σπουδαίου, viii. 41). The same is the case throughout much of the Symposium of Plato; though the scheme and purpose of this latter are very difficult to follow.

² Plutarch, Solon, c. 29. Compare the same general view, set forth in Plato, Legg. iv. p. 719 C. See the previous volumes of this History, ch. xxi. vol. ii. p. 195; ch. xxix. vol. iv. p. 113.

'Clouds,' against physics, rhetoric and dialectics in the person of Sokratès. But the properties of the graft had overpowered and subordinated those of the original stem; so that dramatic poetry was now a distinct form, subject to laws of its own, and shining with splendour equal, if not superior, to the elegiac, choric, lyric, and epic poetry which constituted the previous stock of the Grecian world.

Such transformations in the poetry—or, to speak more justly, in the literature, for before the year 500 B.C., the two expressions were equivalent—of Greece, were at once products, marks, and auxiliaries, in the expansion of the national mind. Our minds have now become familiar with dramatic combinations, which have ceased to be peculiar to any special form or conditions of political society. But if we compare the fifth century B.C. with that which preceded it, the recently born drama will be seen to have been a most important and impressive novelty: and so assuredly it would have been regarded by Solon, the largest mind of his own age, if he could have risen again a century and a quarter after his death, to witness the Antigonè of Sophoklès, the Medea of Euripidès, or the Acharneis of Aristophanès.

Its novelty does not consist merely in the high order of imagination and judgment required for the construction of a drama at once regular and effective. This indeed is no small addition to Grecian poetical celebrity as it stood in the days of Solon, Alkæus, Sappho, and Stesichorus: but we must remember that the epical structure of the Odyssey, so ancient and long acquired to the Hellenic world, implies a reach of architectonic talent quite equal to that exhibited in the most symmetrical drama of Sophoklês. The great innovation of the dramatists consisted in the rhetorical, the dialectical, and the ethical spirit which they breathed into their poetry. Of all this, the undeveloped germ doubtless existed in the previous epic, lyric, and gnomic composition; but the drama stood distinguished from all three by bringing it out into conspicuous amplitude, and making it the substantive means of effect. Instead of recounting exploits achieved or sufferings undergone by the heroes—instead of pouring out his own single-minded impressions in reference to some given event or juncture—the tragic poet produces the mythical persons themselves to talk, discuss, accuse, defend, confute, lament, threaten, advise, persuade, or appease—among one another, but before the audience. In the drama (a singular misnomer) nothing is actually done: all is talk, assuming what is done, as passing, or as having passed, elsewhere. The dramatic poet, speaking continually, but at each moment through a different character, carries on the purpose of each of his characters by words calculated to influence the other characters and appropriate to each successive juncture. Here are rhetorical exigencies from beginning to end¹; while since the whole interest of the piece turns upon some contention or struggle carried on by speech—since debate, consultation, and retort, never cease—since every character, good or evil, temperate or violent, must be supplied with suitable language to defend his proceedings, to attack or repel opponents, and generally to make good the relative importance assigned to him—here again dialectical skill in no small degree is indispensable.

Dramatic poetry as compared with the former kinds of poetry.

¹ Respecting the rhetorical cast of tragedy, see Plato, Gorgias, c. 57, p. 502 D.

Plato disapproves of tragedy on the same grounds as of rhetoric.

Ethical sentiment, interest and debate, infused into the drama.

Lastly, the strength and variety of ethical sentiment infused into the Grecian tragedy, is among the most remarkable characteristics which distinguish it from the anterior forms of poetry. "To do or suffer terrible things"—is pronounced by Aristotle to be its proper subject-matter; and the internal mind and motives of the doer or sufferer, on which the ethical interest fastens, are laid open by the Greek tragedians with an impressive minuteness which neither the epic nor the lyric could possibly parallel. Moreover the appropriate subject-matter of tragedy is pregnant not only with ethical sympathy, but also with ethical debate and speculation. Characters of mixed good and evil—distinct rules of duty, one conflicting with the other—wrong done, and justified to the conscience of the doer, if not to that of the spectator, by previous wrong suffered,—all these are the favourite themes of Æschylus and his two great successors. Klytemnestra kills her husband Agamemnon on his return from Troy: her defence is, that he had deserved this treatment at her hands for having sacrificed his own and her daughter, Iphigeneia. Her son Orestes kills her, under a full conviction of the duty of avenging his father, and even under the sanction of Apollo. The retributive Eumenides pursue him for the deed, and Æschylus brings all the parties before the court of Areopagus with Athênê as president ; where the case, being fairly argued, with the Eumenides as accusers and Apollo as counsel for the prisoner, ends by an equality of votes in the court : upon which Athênê gives her casting-vote to absolve Orestès. Again—let any man note the conflicting obligations which Sophoklês so forcibly brings out in his beautiful drama of the Antigonê. Kreon directs that the body of Polyneikês, as a traitor and recent invader of the country, shall remain unburied : Antigonê, sister of Polyneikês, denounces such interdict as impious, and violates it, under an overruling persuasion of fraternal duty. Kreon having ordered her to be buried alive, his youthful son Hæmon, her betrothed lover, is plunged into a heart-rending conflict between abhorrence of such cruelty on the one side, and submission to his father on the other. Sophoklês sets forth both these contending rules of duty in an elaborate scene of dialogue between the father and the son. Here are two rules both sacred and respectable, but the one of which cannot be observed without violating the other. Since a choice must be made, which of the two ought a good man to obey ? This is a point which the great poet is well-pleased to leave undetermined. But if there be any among the audience in whom the least impulse of intellectual speculation is alive, he will by no means leave it so, without some mental effort to solve the problem, and to discover some grand and comprehensive principle from whence all the moral rules emanate—a principle such as may instruct his conscience in those cases generally, of not unfrequent occurrence, wherein two obligations conflict with each other. The tragedian not only appeals more powerfully to the ethical sentiment than poetry had ever done before, but also, by raising these grave and touching questions, addresses a stimulus and challenge to the intellect, spurring it on to ethical speculation.

The drama formed the stage of transition to rhetoric, dialectics, and ethical philosophy.

Putting all these points together, we see how much wider was the intellectual range of tragedy, and how considerable is the mental progress which it betokens, as compared with the lyric and gnomie poetry, or with the Seven Wise Men and their authoritative aphorisms—which formed the glory, and marked the limit, of the preceding century. In place of unexpanded results, or the mere communication of single-minded sentiment, we have even in Æschylus, the earliest of the great tragedians, a large latitude of dissent and debate—a shifting point of view—a case better or worse, made out for distinct and contending parties—and a divination of the future advent of sovereign and instructed reason. It was through the intermediate stage of tragedy that Grecian literature passed into the Rhetoric, Dialectics, and Ethical speculation, which marked the fifth century B.C.

Practical value and necessity of rhetorical accomplishments.

Other simultaneous causes, arising directly out of the business of real life, contributed to the generation of these same capacities and studies. The fifth century B.C. is the first century of democracy, at Athens, in Sicily, and elsewhere: moreover, at that period, beginning from the Ionic revolt and the Persian invasions of Greece, the political relations between one Grecian city and another became more complicated, as well as more continuous; requiring a greater measure of talent in the public men who managed them. Without some power of persuading or confuting—of defending himself against accusation, or in case of need, accusing others—no man could possibly hold an ascendent position. He had probably not less need of this talent for private, informal, conversations to satisfy his own political partisans, than for addressing the public assembly formally convoked. Even as commanding an army or a fleet, without any laws of war or habits of professional discipline, his power of keeping up the good humour, confidence and prompt obedience of his men, depended not a little on his command of speech¹. Nor was it only to the leaders in political life that such an accomplishment was indispensable. In all the democracies—and probably in several governments which were not democracies but oligarchies of an open character—the courts of justice were more or less numerous, and the procedure oral and public: in Athens especially, the Dikasteries (whose constitution has been explained in a former chapter) were both very numerous, and paid for attendance. Every citizen had to go before them in person, without being able to send a paid advocate in his place, if he either required redress for wrong offered to himself, or was accused of wrong by another². There was no man therefore who might not be cast or condemned, or fail in his own suit, even with right on his side—unless he possessed some powers of speech to unfold his case to the Dikasts, as well as to confute the falsehoods, and disentangle the sophistry, of an opponent. Moreover—to any man of known family and station, it would be a humiliation hardly less painful than the loss of the cause, when standing before the Dikastery with friends and enemies around him, to find himself unable to carry on the thread of a discourse without halting or confusion. To meet such liabilities, from which no citizen, rich or poor, was exempt, a certain training in speech became not less essential than a certain training in arms. Without the latter, he could not do his duty as an hoplite in the ranks for the defence of his country; without the former, he could not escape danger to his fortune or honour, and humiliation in the eyes of his friends, if called before a Dikastery; nor could he lend assistance to any of those friends who might be placed under the like necessity.

¹ See the discourse of Sokrates, insisting upon this point, as part of the duties of a commander (Xen. Mem. iii. 3. 11).

² This necessity of some rhetorical accomplishments is enforced not less emphatically by Aristotle (Rhetoric, i. 1. 3) than by Kaliklès in the Gorgias of Plato, c. 91, p. 486 B.

Here then were ample motives, arising out of practical prudence not less than from the stimulus of ambition, to cultivate the power of both continuous harangue, and of concise argumentation, or interrogation and reply¹: motives for all, to acquire a

¹ See the description which Cicero gives of his own laborious oratorical training:—

"Ego hoc tempore omni, noctes et dies, in omnium doctrinarum meditatione versabar. Eram cum Stoico Diodoto, quem cum habitavisset apud me mecumque vixisset, nuper est domi meae mortuus. A quo quum in aliis rebus, tum studiosissime in dialecticâ versabar; quæ quasi contracta et nutrita eloquentia putanda est; sine quâ etiam tu, Brute, judicavisti, te illam justam eloquentiam, quam dialecticam dilatatum esse putant, consequi non posse. Huic ego doctore, et ejus artibus variis et multis, ita enim tamen deditus, ut ab exercitationibus oratoris nullus dies vacaret." (Cicero, Brutus, 20, 309.)

certain moderate aptitude in the use of these weapons—for the ambitious few, to devote much labour and to shine as accomplished orators.

Such political and social motives, it is to be remembered, though acting very forcibly at Athens, were by no means peculiar to Athens, but prevailed more or less throughout a large portion of the Grecian cities, especially in Sicily, when all the governments became popularised after the overthrow of the Gelonian dynasty. And it was in Sicily and Italy, that the first individuals arose, who acquired permanent name both in Rhetoric and Dialectics: Empedoklēs of Agrigentum in the former—Zeno of Elea (in Italy) in the latter¹.

Rhetoric and dialectics.

Both these distinguished men bore a conspicuous part in politics, and both on the popular side; Empedoklēs against an oligarchy, Zeno against a despot. But both also were yet more distinguished as philosophers, and the dialectical impulse in Zeno, if not the rhetorical impulse in Empedoklēs, came more from his philosophy than from his politics. Empedoklēs (about 470–440 B.C.) appears to have held intercourse at least, if not partial communion of doctrine, with the dispersed philosophers of the Pythagorean league; the violent subversion of which, at Kroton and elsewhere, I have related in a previous chapter². He constructed a system of physics and cosmogony, distinguished for first broaching the doctrine of the Four elements, and set forth in a poem composed by himself: besides which he seems to have had much of the mystical

Empedoklēs of Agrigen-tum—first name in the rhetorical movement.

¹ Aristotel. ap. Diog. Laert. viii. 67.

² See my preceding vol. iv. ch. xxxvii.

tone and miraculous pretensions of Pythagoras; professing not only to cure pestilence and other distempers, but to teach how old age might be averted and the dead raised from Hades—to prophesy—and to raise and calm the winds at his pleasure. Gorgias his pupil deposed that he had been present at the magical ceremonies of Empedoklēs¹. The impressive character of his poem is sufficiently attested by the admiration of Lucretius², and the rhetoric ascribed to him may have consisted mainly in oral teaching or exposition of the same doctrines. Tisias and Korax of Syracuse, who are also mentioned as the first teachers of rhetoric—and the first who made known any precepts about the rhetorical practice—were his contemporaries; while the celebrated Gorgias was his pupil.

Zeno of Eleg—first name in the dialectical
movement.

The dialectical movement emanated at the same time from the Eleatic school of philosophers—Zeno, and his contemporary the Samian Melissus (460–440)—if not from their common teacher Parmenides. Melissus also, as well as Zeno and Empedoklēs, was a distinguished citizen as well as a philosopher; having been in command of the Samian fleet at the time of the revolt from Athens, and having in that capacity gained a victory over the Athenians.

All the philosophers of the fifth century B.C., prior to Sokratēs, inheriting from their earliest poetical

¹ Diogen. Laërt. viii. 58, 59, who gives a remarkable extract from the poem of Empedoklēs, attesting these large pretensions.

See Brundis, Handbuch der Gr. Röm. Philos. part i. sect. 47, 48, p. 192; Sturz, ad Empedoclis Frag. p. 36.

² De Rerum Naturâ, l. 719.

predecessors the vast and unmeasured problems which had once been solved by the supposition of divine or superhuman agents, contemplated the world, physical and moral, all in a mass, and applied their minds to find some hypothesis which would give them an explanation of this totality¹, or at least appease curiosity by something which looked like an explanation. What were the elements out of which sensible things were made? What was the initial cause or principle of those changes which appeared to our senses? What was change?—was it generation of something integrally new and destruction of something pre-existent—or was it a decomposition and recombination of elements still continuing? The theories of the various Ionic philosophers and of Empedoklēs after them, admitting one, two, or four elementary substances, with Friendship and Enmity to serve as causes of motion or change—the Homœomeries of Anaxagoras, with Nous or Intelligence as the stirring and regularizing agent—the atoms and void of Leukippus and Demokritus—all these were different hypotheses answering to a similar vein of thought. All of them, though assuming that the sensible appearances of school—Parmenides.

Elastic

¹ Some striking lines of Empedoklēs are preserved by Sextus Empiricus, adv. Mathemat. vii. 115; to the effect that every individual man gets through his short life, with no more knowledge than is comprised in his own slender fraction of observation and experience: he struggles in vain to find out and explain the totality—but neither eye, nor ear, nor reason can assist him:—

Παῖρ' αὖ δὲ ζωῆς ὁδὸν μέγας ἀβρῆσαντες,
 Ὀκλίμενοι, κωπτοῖο δίκην ἀβρίστες, ἀπέπτω
 Αἰνὰ μέγαν πεισθίστην, ὅτε προσέκυρσε ἑαυτοῖς, Πᾶντο' ἐλευσόμενα. Τὸ δὲ ἄλλαν ἐπείχεται εἰρεῖν
 Αἰτῶν· οὐδ' ἐπαδματὶ τὸ δ' ἀβρίστην, οὐδ' ἐπακουστέν, Οὐδὲ κόρην περιληπτῆν.

things were delusive and perplexing, nevertheless were borrowed more or less directly from some of these appearances, which were employed to explain and illustrate the whole theory, and served to render it plausible when stated as well as to defend it against attack. But the philosophers of the Eleatic school—first Xenophanês, and after him Parmenidês—took a distinct path of their own. To find that which was real, and which lay as it were concealed behind or under the delusive phenomena of sense, they had recourse only to mental abstractions. They supposed a Substance or Something not perceivable by sense, but only cogitable or conceivable by reason; a One and All, continuous and finite, which was not only real and self-existent, but was the only reality—eternal, immoveable and unchangeable, and the only matter knowable. The phenomena of sense, which began and ended one after the other, (they thought) were essentially delusive, uncertain, contradictory among themselves, and open to endless diversity of opinion¹. Upon these, nevertheless, they announced an opinion; adopting two elements—heat and cold—or light and darkness.

Parmenidês set forth this doctrine of the One and All in a poem, of which but a few fragments now remain, so that we understand very imperfectly the positive arguments employed to recommend it. The matter of truth and knowledge, such

Zeno and Melissus —their dialectic attacks upon the opponents of Parmenidês.

¹ See Parmenidis Fragmenta, ed. Karsten, v. 30, 55, 60; also the Dissertation annexed by Karsten, sect. 3, 4. p. 148 seq.; sect. 12. p. 221 seq.

Compare also Mullach's edition of the same Fragmenta, annexed to his edition of the Aristotelian treatise, De Melisso, Xenophane, et Gorgia, p. 144.

as he alone admitted, was altogether removed from the senses and divested of sensible properties, so as to be conceived only as an Ens Rationis, and described and discussed only in the most general words of the language. The exposition given by Parmenidēs in his poem¹, though complimented by Plato, was vehemently controverted by others, who deduced from it many contradictions and absurdities. As a part of his reply,—and doubtless the strongest part,—Parmenidēs retorted upon his adversaries; an example followed by his pupil Zeno with still greater acuteness and success. Those who controverted his ontological theory—that the real, ultra-phenomenal, substance, was One,—affirmed it to be not One, but Many; divisible, moveable, changeable, &c. Zeno attacked this latter theory, and proved that it led to contradictions and absurdities still greater than those involved in the proposition of Parmenidēs². He impugned the testimony of sense, affirming that it furnished premises for conclusions which contradicted each other, and that it was unworthy of trust³. Parmenidēs⁴ had

¹ Plato, Parmenidēs, p. 128 B. οὐ μὲν (Parmenidēs) γὰρ ἐν τοῖς αἰσθητοῖς ἐκ φύς εἶναι τὸ πῦρ, καὶ τοῖσιν τεκμήριον παρέχει καλῶς τε καὶ εὖ, &c.

² See the remarkable passage in the Parmenidēs of Plato, p. 128 B, C, D.

³ Ἐπεὶ δὲ τὸ γε ἀληθὲς βοηθεῖν τι ταῦτα τὰ γράμματα τῷ Παρμενίδῳ λόγῳ πρὸς τοὺς ἀπαιρουμένους αὐτὸν κωμῶδιν, ὡς εἰ ἐν ἑστὶ, πολλὰ καὶ γελοῖα συμβαλέει πύσχειν τῷ λόγῳ καὶ ἐνώστια αἰσθῶ. Ἀπελέρει δὲ αὖ ταῦτα τὸ γράμμα πρὸς τοὺς τὰ πολλὰ λέγοντας, καὶ ἀναποδίδωσι ταῦτα καὶ πλείους, τοῦτο βοδόμενον δηλοῦν, ὡς ἐπὶ γελοιότατον πύσχοι δὲ αὐτῶν ἡ ἐπὶθέσις—ἡ εἰ πολλὰ ἐστίν—ἡ ἢ τοῦ ἐν εἶναι, εἴ τις λευκῶς ἐπεφύει.

⁴ Plato, Phædrus, c. 44, p. 261 D. See the citations in Brandis, Gesch. der Gr. Röm. Philosophie, part. i. p. 117 seq.

⁵ Parmenid. Fragm. v. 101, ed. Mullach.

denied that there was any such thing as real change either of place or colour: Zeno maintained change of place, or motion, to be impossible and self-contradictory; propounding many logical difficulties, derived from the infinite divisibility of matter, against some of the most obvious affirmations respecting sensible phenomena. Melissus appears to have argued in a vein similar to that of Zeno, though with much less acuteness; demonstrating indirectly the doctrine of Parmenidēs by deducing impossible inferences from the contrary hypothesis¹.

Zeno at Athens—his conversation both with Peisiklēs and with Sokratēs.

Zeno published a treatise to maintain the thesis above described, which he also upheld by personal conversations and discussions, in a manner doubtless far more efficacious than his writing; the oral teaching of these early philosophers being their really impressive manifestation. His subtle dialectic arguments were not only sufficient to occupy all the philosophers of antiquity, in confuting them more or less successfully, but have even descended to modern times as a fire not yet extinguished². The great effect produced among the speculative minds of Greece by his writing and conversation, is attested both by Plato and Aristotle. He visited Athens, gave instruction to some eminent Athenians, for high pay—and is said to have conversed both with Periklēs and with Sokratēs, at a time when the latter was very young; probably between 450–440 B.C.¹

¹ See the Fragments of Melissus collected by Mullach, in his publication cited in a previous note, p. 81 seq.

² The reader will see this in Bayle's Dictionary, article, Zeno of Elia. Simplicius (in his commentary on Aristot. Physic. p. 255) says that Zeno first composed written dialogues—which cannot be believed without more certain evidence. He also particularizes a puzzling question addressed by Zeno to Protagoras. See Brandis, Gesch. der Griech. Rom. Philos. i. p. 409.—Zeno ἦτορ μὲν οὐδὲν εἰδέναι (sc. περὶ τῶν μέτρων), διὰ τὸ μὴ εἶναι τούτων ἐν τῷ αἰσθητῷ. Plutarch. ap. Eusebium, Prepar. Evangel. i. 23 D.

His appearance constitutes a remarkable era in Grecian philosophy, because he first brought out the extraordinary aggressive or negative force of the dialectic method. In this discussion respecting the One and the Many, positive grounds on either side were alike scanty: each party had to set forth the contradictions deducible from the opposite hypothesis, and Zeno professed to show that those of his opponents were the more flagrant. We thus see that along with the methodised question and answer, or dialectic method, employed from henceforward more and more in philosophical inquiries—

Early manifestation, and powerful efficacy, of the negative arm in Grecian philosophy.

¹ Compare Plutarch, Periklēs, c. 3; Plato, Parmenidēs, p. 126, 127; Plato, Alkibiad. I. ch. 14. p. 119 A.

That Sokratēs had in his youth conversed with Parmenidēs, when the latter was an old man, is stated by Plato more than once, over and above his dialogue called Parmenidēs, which professes to give a conversation between the two, as well as with Zeno. I agree with Mr. Fyues Clinton, Brandis, and Karsten—in thinking that this is better evidence, about the date of Parmenidēs than any of the vague indications which appear to contradict it, in Diogenes Laërtius and elsewhere. But it will be hardly proper to place the conversation between Parmenidēs and Sokratēs (as Mr. Clinton places it—Fest. II. vol. II. App. c. 21. p. 364) at a time when Sokratēs was only fifteen years of age. The ideas which the ancients had about youthful propriety would not permit him to take part in conversation with an eminent philosopher, at so early an age as fifteen, when he would not yet be entered on the roll of citizens, or be qualified for the smallest function, military or civil. I cannot but think that Sokratēs must have been more than twenty years of age when he thus conversed with Parmenidēs.

Sokratēs was born in 469 B.C. (perhaps 468 B.C.); he would therefore be twenty years of age in 449; assuming the visit of Parmenidēs to Athens to have been in 448 B.C., since he was then sixty-five years of age, he would be born in 513 B.C. It is objected that, if this date be admitted, Parmenidēs could not have been a pupil of Xenophanes: we should thus be compelled to admit (which perhaps is the truth) that he learnt the doctrine of Xenophanes at second-hand.

comes out at the same time the negative tendency, the probing, testing, and scrutinising force—of Grecian speculation. The negative side of Grecian speculation stands quite as prominently marked, and occupies as large a measure of the intellectual force of their philosophers, as the positive side. It is not simply to arrive at a conclusion, sustained by a certain measure of plausible premise—and then to proclaim it as an authoritative dogma, silencing or disparaging all objectors—that Grecian speculation aspires. To unmask not only positive falsehood, but even affirmation without evidence, exaggerated confidence in what was only doubtful, and show of knowledge without the reality—to look at a problem on all sides, and set forth all the difficulties attending its solution—to take account of deductions from the affirmative evidence, even in the case of conclusions accepted as true upon the balance—all this will be found pervading the march of their greatest thinkers. As a condition of all progressive philosophy, it is not less essential that the grounds of negation should be freely exposed, than the grounds of affirmation. We shall find the two going hand in hand, and the negative vein indeed the more impressive and characteristic of the two, from Zeno downwards in our history. In one of the earliest memoranda illustrative of Grecian dialectics—the sentences wherein Plato represents Parmenidēs and Zeno as bequeathing their mantle to the youthful Sokratēs, and giving him precepts for successfully prosecuting those researches which his marked inquisitive impulse promised—this large and comprehensive point of view is emphatically inculcated. He is admonished to set before him both sides of every hypothesis, and to follow out both the negative and the affirmative chains of argument with equal perseverance and equal freedom of scrutiny; neither daunted by the adverse opinions around him, nor deterred by sneers against wasting time in fruitless talk; since the multitude are ignorant that without thus travelling round all sides of a question, no assured comprehension of the truth is attainable¹.

We thus find ourselves, from the year 450 B.C. downwards, in presence of two important classes of men in Greece, unknown to Solon or even to Kleisthenes—the Rhetoricians, and the Dialecticians; for whom (as has been shown) the ground had been gradually prepared by the politics, the poetry, and the speculation, of the preceding period.

Both these two novelties—like the poetry and other accomplishments of this memorable race—grew up from rude indigenous beginnings, under

Rhetoric and dialectics—men of active life and men of speculation—two separate lines of intellectual activity.

¹ Plato, Parmenides, p. 135, 136.

Parmenides speaks to Sokratēs—Καλὴ μὲν αὖ καὶ θύια, εὖ ἴσθι, ἡ ὁμή. θε ἔρμῃ ἐπὶ τοῖς λόγους· ἔλκουσι δὲ σαυτῶν καὶ γυναισὶν μᾶλλον διὰ τῆς διακρίσεως ἀχρόστατοι εἰσὶ καὶ καλοκρίντες ἐπὶ τῶν πολλῶν ἀποδοχῶν, ὥς ἐστι νῦν εἰ. εἰ δὲ μὴ, οὐ διαφρίσεται ἡ ἀλήθεια. Τίς αὖν ὁ πρός, φάσαι (τὸν Σωκράτη). ὁ Παρμενίδης, τῆς γυναισῶν. Οἷός, εἰσὶν (τὸν Παρμενίδην) ὡς περ ἦσαν Ζήνωνος..... Χρή δὲ καὶ τοῦτο εἶναι πρὸς τούτῳ σκοπεῖν, μὴ μόνον, εἰ ἴσταις ἑαυτὸν, ἐποτιθίμενος, σκοπεῖν τὰ συμβαίνοντα ἐκ τῆς ἐποτίσεως—ἀλλὰ καὶ, εἰ μὴ ἴσταις τὸ αὐτὸ τοῦτο, ἐποτιθεσθαι—εἰ βούλει μᾶλλον γυναισῶν..... Ἀκούουσι γὰρ οἱ πολλοὶ ὅτι, ἀπὸ τούτου τῆς διὰ πάντων διεξόδου καὶ πλάτης, ἀδύνατον ἐντεχέστα τῷ ἀληθεῖ κινῆσθαι. See also Plato's Kratylus, p. 428 E, about the necessity of the investigator looking both before and behind—ἄνω πρόσσω καὶ ὀπίσσω.

See also the Parmenides, p. 130 E.—in which Sokratēs is warned respecting the ἀδύνατος διέναι—against enslaving himself to the opinions of men; compare Plato, Sophists, p. 227 B, C.

native stimulus unborrowed and unassisted from without. The rhetorical teaching was an attempt to assist and improve men in the power of continuous speech as addressed to assembled numbers, such as the public assembly or the dikastery; it was therefore a species of training sought for by men of active pursuits and ambition, either that they might succeed in public life, or that they might maintain their rights and dignity if called before the court of justice. On the other hand, the dialectic business had no direct reference to public life, to the judicial pleading, or to any assembled large number. It was a dialogue carried on by two disputants, usually before a few hearers, to unravel some obscurity, to reduce the respondent to silence and contradiction, to exercise both parties in mastery of the subject, or to sift the consequences of some problematical assumption. It was spontaneous conversation¹ systematized and turned into some predetermined channel; furnishing a stimulus to thought, and a means of improvement not attainable in any other manner—furnishing to some also, a source of profit or display. It opened a line of serious intellectual pursuit to men of a speculative or inquisitive turn, who were deficient in voice, in boldness, in continuous memory, for public speaking; or who desired to keep themselves apart from the political and judicial animosities of the moment.

Although there were numerous Athenians, who

¹ See Aristotle, De Sophist. Elenchus, c. 11. p. 172, ed. Bekker; and his Topica, iv. 5. p. 154; where the different purposes of dialogue are enumerated and distinguished.

combined, in various proportions, speculative with practical study, yet generally speaking, the two veins of intellectual movement—one towards active public business, the other towards enlarged opinions and greater command of speculative truth, with its evidences—continued simultaneous and separate. There subsisted between them a standing polemical controversy and a spirit of mutual detraction. If Plato despised the sophists and the rhetors, Isokratēs thinks himself not less entitled to disparage those who employed their time in debating upon the unity or plurality of virtue¹. Even among different teachers, in the same intellectual walk, also, there prevailed but too often an acrimonious feeling of personal rivalry, which laid them all so much the more open to assault from the common enemy of all mental progress—a feeling of jealous ignorance, stationary or wistfully retrospective, of no mean force at Athens, as in every other society, and of course blended at Athens with the indigenous democratical sentiment. This latter sentiment² of Standing antithesis between these two intellectual classes—vein of ignorance at Athens, hostile to both.

¹ See Isokratēs, Orat. x.; Helenæ Encomium, s. 2-7; compare Orat. xv. De Permutatione, of the same author, s. 90.

I hold it for certain that the first of these passages is intended as a criticism upon the Platonic dialogues (as in Or. v. ad Philip. s. 84), probably the second passage also. Isokratēs, evidently a cautious and timid man, avoids mentioning the names of contemporaries, that he may provoke the less animosity.

² Isokratēs alludes much to this sentiment, and to the men who looked upon gymnastic training with greater favour than upon philosophy, in the Orat. xv. De Permutatione, s. 267 et seq. A large portion of this oration is in fact a reply to accusations, the same as those preferred against mental cultivation by the Δεισιμαῖοι ἄνθρωποι in the Nubes of Aristophanes, 947 seq.—favourite topics in the mouths of the pugilists “with smashed ears” (Plato, Gorgias, c. 71. p. 515 E, ταῖς καὶ ἰσχυραῖς καὶ σπασμέναις ὠτίσιν).

antipathy to new ideas, and new mental accomplishments, has been raised into factitious importance by the comic genius of Aristophanès,—whose point of view modern authors have too often accepted; thus allowing some of the worst feelings of Grecian antiquity to influence their manner of conceiving the facts. Moreover they have rarely made any allowance for that force of literary and philosophical antipathy, which was no less real and constant at Athens than the political; and which made the different literary classes or individuals perpetually unjust one towards another¹. It was the blessing and the glory of Athens, that every man could speak out his sentiments and his criticisms with a freedom unparalleled in the ancient world, and hardly paralleled even in the modern, in which a vast body of dissent both is, and always has been, condemned to absolute silence. But this known latitude of censure ought to have imposed on modern authors a peremptory necessity of not accepting implicitly the censure of any one, where the

¹ There is but too much evidence of the abundance of such jealousies and antipathies during the times of Plato, Aristotle, and Isokrates: see Stahl's Aristotelia, ch. iii. vol. i. p. 37, 68.

Aristotle was extremely jealous of the success of Isokrates, and was himself much assailed by pupils of the latter, Kephixodôrys and others—as well as by Dikæarchus, Eubulidès, and a numerous host of writers in the same tone—εργασίας ὅσας τῶν ἐπιδεικνύμενος Ἀδουρόταλαι: see the Fragmenta of Dikæarchus, vol. ii. p. 225, ed. Didot.—“De ingenio ejus (observes Cicero in reference to Epicurus, de Finitibus, ii. 25, 30) in his disputationibus, non de moribus, queritur. Sit ista in Græcorum levitate perversitas, qui maledictis instantur eos, a quibus de veritate dissentiant.” This is a taint noway peculiar to Grecian philosophical controversy, but it has nowhere been more infectious than among the Greeks, and modern historians cannot be too much on their guard against it.

party inculcated has left no defence; at the very least, of construing the censure strictly, and allowing for the point of view from which it proceeds. From inattention to this necessity, almost all the things and persons of Grecian history are presented to us on their bad side: the libels of Aristophanes, the sneers of Plato and Xenophon, even the interested generalities of a plaintiff or defendant before the Dikastery—are received with little cross-examination as authentic materials for history.

If ever there was need to invoke this rare sentiment of candour, it is when we come to discuss the history of the persons called Sophists, who now for the first time appear as of note; the practical teachers of Athens and of Greece, misconceived as well as misesteemed.

The primitive education at Athens consisted of two branches; gymnastics, for the body—music, for the mind. The word music is not to be judged according to the limited signification which it now bears. It comprehended from the beginning everything appertaining to the province of the Nine Muses—not merely learning the use of the lyre, or how to bear part in a chorus, but also the hearing, learning, and repeating, of poetical compositions, as well as the practice of exact and elegant pronunciation—which latter accomplishment, in a language like the Greek with long words, measured syllables, and great diversity of accentuation between one word and another, must have been far more difficult to acquire than it is in any modern European language. As the range of ideas enlarged, so the words

Gradual enlargement of the field of education at Athens—increased knowledge and capacity of the musical teachers.

music and musical teachers acquired an expanded meaning, so as to comprehend matter of instruction at once ampler and more diversified. During the middle of the fifth century B.C. at Athens, there came thus to be found, among the musical teachers, men of the most distinguished abilities and eminence; masters of all the learning and accomplishments of the age, teaching what was known of astronomy, geography, and physics, and capable of holding dialectical discussions with their pupils, upon all the various problems then afloat among intellectual men. Of this character were Lamprus, Agathoklēs, Pythokleidēs, Damon, &c. The two latter were instructors of Periklēs; and Damon was even rendered so unpopular at Athens, partly by his large and free speculations, partly through the political enemies of his great pupil, that he was ostracised, or at least sentenced to banishment¹. Such men were competent companions for Anaxagoras and Zeno, and employed in part on the same studies; the field of acquired knowledge being not then large enough to be divided into separate, exclusive compartments. While Euripidēs frequented the company, and acquainted himself with the opinions of Anaxagoras—Ion of Chios (his rival as a tragic poet, as well as the friend of Kimon) bestowed so much thought upon physical subjects as then conceived, that he set up a theory of his own, propounding the doctrine of three elements in nature¹—air, fire, and earth.

¹ See Plato (Protagoras, c. 8. p. 315 D.; Laches, c. 3. p. 180 D.; Menexenus, c. 3. p. 236 A.; Alkibiad. i. c. 14. p. 118 C); Plutarch, Periklēs, c. 4.

Periklēs had gone through dialectic practice in his youth (Xenoph. Memor. i. 2. 46).

Now such musical teachers as Damon and the others above-mentioned, were Sophists, not merely in the natural and proper Greek sense of that word, but, to a certain extent, even in the special and restricted meaning which Plato afterwards thought proper to confer upon it². A Sophist, in the genuine sense of the word, was a wise man—a clever man—one who stood prominently before the public as distinguished for intellect or talent of some kind. Thus Solon and Pythagoras are both called Sophists; Thamyra the skilful bard is called a Sophist³; Sokratēs is so denominated, not merely by Aristo-

The Sophists—true Greek meaning of that word—invidious sentiment implied in it.

¹ Isokratēs, Or. xv. De Permutat. s. 287.

Compare Brandis, Gesch. der Gr. Röm. Philosophie, part i. s. 48, p. 196.

² Isokratēs calls both Anaxagoras and Damon, Sophists (Or. xv. De Permut. s. 251). Plutarch, Periklēs, c. 4. 'Ὁ δὲ Δάμων τοῦτος, ἄλλος δὲ σοφιστής, καταδύσθαι μὲν εἰς τὸ τὴν μουσικὴν ἔργον, ἐπιχειροῦντος πρὸς τοῖς πολλοῖς τῷ δεινότητι.

So Protagoras too (in the speech put into his mouth by Plato, Protag. c. 8, p. 316) says, very truly, that there had been Sophists from the earliest times of Greece. But he says also (what Plutarch says in the citation just above) that these earlier men refused, intentionally and deliberately, to call themselves Sophists, for fear of the odium attached to the name; and that he (Protagoras) was the first person to call himself openly a Sophist.

The denomination by which a man is known, however, seldom depends upon himself, but upon the general public, and upon his critics, friendly or hostile. The unfriendly spirit of Plato did much more to attach the title of Sophists specially to these teachers, than any assumption of their own.

³ Herodot. i. 29; ii. 49; iv. 95. Diogenēs of Apollonia, contemporary of Herodotus, called the Ionic philosophers or physiologists by the name Sophists: see Brandis, Gesch. der Griech. Röm. Philosophie, c. LVII. note O. About Thamyra, see Welcker, Griech. Tragöd. Sophoklēs, p. 421—

Εἰς αὐτὴν σοφιστὴς καλὴν παραπαίω χάλιν, &c.

The comic poet Kratinos called all the poets, including Homer and phanès, but by Æschinès¹: Aristotle himself calls Aristippus, and Xenophon calls Antisthenès, both of them disciples of Sokratès, by that name²: Xenophon³, in describing a collection of instructive books, calls them "the writings of the old poets and Sophists," meaning by the latter word prose-writers generally: Plato is alluded to as a Sophist, even by Isokratès⁴: Æschinès (the disciple of Sokratès, not the orator) was so denominated by his contemporary Lysias⁵: Isokratès himself was harshly criticised as a Sophist, and defends both himself and his profession: lastly, Timon (the friend and admirer of Pyrrho, about 300–280 B.C.), who bitterly satirised all the philosophers, designated them all, including Plato and Aristotle, by the general name of Sophists⁶.

Hesiod, sophistai: see the Fragments of his drama Ἀρχαίοιοι in Meineke, Fragm. Comicor. Græcor. vol. ii. p. 16.

¹ Æschinès eunt. Timarch. c. 34. Æschinès calls Demosthenès also a Sophist, c. 27.

We see plainly from the terms in Plato's Politicus, c. 38. p. 299 B.—μετεωρολόγοι, ἀστρονομὴν καὶ σοφιστὴν—that both Sokratès and Plato himself were designated as Sophists by the Athenian public.

² Aristotle. Metaphysic. iii. 2. p. 996; Xenophon, Sympos. iv. 1.

Aristippus is said to have been the first of the disciples of Sokratès who took money for instruction (Diogen. Laert. ii. 65).

³ Xenoph. Memor. iv. 2. 1. γράμματα πολλὰ συνελεγγμένως ποιητῶν τε καὶ σοφιστῶν τῶν εὐδοκίμωντων...

The word sophistῶν is here used just in the same sense as τοῖς ἀγασίμοις τῶν πύλων σοφῶν ἀνδρῶν, οἳ ἐκείνους κατέδιδον ἐν βιβλίῳ γράψαντες, &c. (Memor. i. 6. 14). It is used in a different sense in another passage (i. 1. 11) to signify teachers who gave instruction on physical and astronomical subjects, which Sokratès and Xenophon both disapproved.

⁴ Isokratès, Orat. v. ad Philipp. s. 14: see Heindorf's note on the Euthydemus of Plato, p. 305 C. s. 79.

⁵ Atheniensis, xiii. p. 612 P.; Lysias, Fragm. 2. Bekk.

⁶ Diogen. Laert. ix. 65. Ἐστὶν οὖν μοι, ὡς πολυπράγμονες ἐστε σοφιστῶν (Diogen. Laert. viii. 74).

Demetrius of Træzen numbered Empedoklès as a Sophist. Isokratès speaks of Empedoklès, Ion, Alkæmon, Parmenidès, Melissus,

In this large and comprehensive sense the word was originally used, and always continued to be so understood among the general public. But along with this idea, the title Sophist also carried with it or connoted a certain invidious feeling. The natural temper of a people generally ignorant towards superior intellect—the same temper which led to those charges of magic so frequent in the middle ages—appears to be an union of admiration with something of an unfavourable sentiment¹—dislike, or apprehension, as the case may be, unless where the latter element has become neutralised by habitual respect for an established profession or station: at any rate the unfriendly sentiment is so often intended, that a substantive word in which it is implied without the necessity of any annexed predicate, is soon found convenient. Timon, who hated the philosophers, thus found the word Sophist exactly suitable, in sentiment as well as meaning, to his purpose in addressing them.

Now when (in the period succeeding 450 B.C.) the rhetorical and musical teachers came to stand before the public at Athens in such increased eminence, they of course, as well as other men intellectually celebrated, became designated by the appropriate

The name Sophist applied by Plato in a peculiar sense, in his polemics against the eminent paid teachers.

Gorgias, all as οἱ παλαιὸι σοφισταί—all as having taught different περὶ τελεολογίας about the elements of the physical world (Isok. de Permut. s. 288).

¹ Eurip. Med. 289—

Ὥρῃ δ' ὅτι ποθ' ὅστις ἀντίφρων πέφκε' ἀνὴρ.
 Παῖδας περισσῶς ἐκδιδάσκεισθαι σοφιστῇ.
 Καρὶς γὰρ ἄλλα, ἢ ἐχούσι, ἀργίας, Φθόνου πρὸς αὐτῶν ἀλφεινοῦσι δινομεῖ.

The words ὁ περισσῶς σοφίης seem to convey the same unfriendly sentiment as the word σοφιστῇ.

name of Sophists. But there was one characteristic peculiar to themselves whereby they drew upon themselves a double measure of that invidious sentiment which lay wrapped up in the name. They taught for pay : of course therefore the most eminent among them taught only the rich, and earned large sums : a fact naturally provocative of envy, to some extent, among the many who benefited nothing by them, but still more among the inferior members of their own profession. But even great minds, like Sokratēs and Plato, though much superior to any such envy, cherished in that age a genuine and vehement repugnance against receiving pay for teaching. We read in Xenophon¹, that Sokratēs

¹ Xenoph. Memor. i. 2, 6. In another passage, the Sophist Antiphon (whether this is the celebrated Antiphon of the deme Ithamnus, is uncertain ; the commentators lean to the negative) is described as conversing with Sokratēs, and saying that Sokratēs of course must imagine his own conversation to be worth nothing, since he asked no price from his scholars. To which Sokratēs replies—

"Ὁ Ἀντιφῶν, παρ' ἡμῖν νομίζεται, τὴν ἔραυ καὶ τὴν σοφίαν ὁμοίαι μὲν καλόν, ὁμοίαι δὲ αἰσχρόν, διακρίσθαι εἶναι. Τὴν τε γὰρ ἔραυ, ἴαν μὲν τις ἀργυρίου πωλῇ τῇ βουλομένῃ, πόρνη αὐτὸν ἀπακαλοῦσιν· ἴαν δὲ τι, ἢ ἢ γὰρ καλόν τε εὐχαρίαι ἰμασθῇ ὅσα, τούτων φίλον ἑαυτῷ ποιῆται, σάφηναι νομίζομεν. Καὶ τὴν σοφίαν ἀπαύτως τοῖσι μὲν ἀργυρίου τῇ βουλομένῃ πωλοῦνται, σοφισταὶ ὥσπερ πόρνη ἀπακαλοῦσιν ὅσα δὲ, ἢ ἢ γὰρ εὐφραδὴ ὅσα, διδάσκειν ὅτι ἢ ἔχῃ εὐχαρίαι, φίλον ποιῆται, τοῦτο νομίζομεν, ἢ τῇ καλῇ εὐχαρίαι πολὺν προσέχει, ταῦτα ποιεῖ" (Xenoph. Memor. i. 6, 13).

As an evidence of the manners and sentiment of the age, this passage is extremely remarkable. Various parts of the oration of Æschines against Timarchus, and the Symposium of Plato (p. 217, 218), both receive and give light to it.

Among the numerous passages in which Plato expresses his dislike and contempt of teaching for money, see his Sophistes, c. 9. p. 223. Plato indeed thought that it was unworthy of a virtuous man to accept salary for the discharge of any public duty : see the Republic, i. 19. p. 347. The comic writer Euphrosion, however, (see Athenæus, xi. 509 ; Meineke, Fr. Com. Gr. iii. p. 332) taunts the disciples of Plato and pupils of the Academy as receivers of pay for teaching ; making sticonsidered such a bargain as nothing less than servitude, robbing the teacher of all free choice as to persons or proceeding; and that he assimilated the relation between teacher and pupil to that between two lovers or two intimate friends, which was thoroughly dishonoured, robbed of its charm and reciprocity, and prevented from bringing about its legitimate reward of attachment and devotion, by the intervention of money payment. However little in harmony with modern ideas¹, such was the conscientious sentiment of Sokratēs and Plato; who therefore considered the name Sophist, denoting intellectual celebrity combined with an odious association, as pre-eminently suitable to the leading teachers for pay. The splendid genius, the lasting influence, and the reiterated polemics, of Plato, have stamped it upon the men against whom he wrote as if it were their recognised, legitimate, and peculiar designation: though it is certain, that if, in the middle of the Peloponnesian war, any Athenian had drawn no distinction between them and Thrasymachus on this point. Athenæus construes the taunt as including Plato himself; which goes beyond the strict meaning of the words.

¹ Ovid, dwelling upon the same general analogy of the relations between lovers (Amores, l. 10, 38), insists on the baseness of accepting money as a reward for pleading in behalf of persons accused before justice. "Turpe roas emptā miseris defendere linguā."—That it was dishonourable to receive pay for judicial pleading, was the general idea and dominant sentiment of the Romans, in the time of the Republic, and in the early period of the Empire. The Lex Cincia (passed about 200 a.c.) prohibited such receipt altogether. In practice, as we might expect, the prohibition came to be more and more evaded, though it seems to have been at times formally renewed. But the sentiment, in honourable Romans, continued unaltered certainly down to the days of Tacitus. See Tacit. Ann. xi. 5-7; Livy, xxxiv. 4. A limited maximum of fee was first permitted under Claudius. See Walter, Röm. Recht, s. 751.

been asked,—“Who are the principal Sophists in your city?”—he would have named Sokratēs among the first; for Sokratēs was at once eminent as an intellectual teacher, and personally unpopular—not because he received pay, but on other grounds which will be hereafter noticed: and this was the precise combination of qualities which the general public naturally expressed by a Sophist. Moreover, Plato not only stole the name out of general circulation in order to fasten it specially upon his opponents the paid teachers, but also connected with it express discreditable attributes, which formed no part of its primitive and recognized meaning, and were altogether distinct from, though grafted upon, the vague sentiment of dislike associated with it. Aristotle, following the example of his master, gave to the word Sophist a definition substantially the same as that which it bears in the modern languages¹—“an imposturous pretender to knowledge, a man who employs what he knows to be fallacy, for the purpose of deceit and of getting money.” And he did this at a time when he himself, with his estimable contemporary Isokratēs, were considered at Athens to come under the designation of Sophists, and were called so by every one who disliked either their profession or their persons².

¹ Aristot. Rhetoric. i. 1, 4—where he explains the Sophist to be a person who has the same powers as the Dialectician, but abuses them for a bad purpose—ὁ γὰρ σοφιστὴς, οἷε ἐκ τῆς διανοίας, ἀλλ’ ἐκ τῆς προαίρεως..... Ἐκεῖ δὲ, σοφιστὴς μὲν, κατὰ τὴν προαίρεσιν, διανοητικὸς δὲ, κατὰ τὴν προαίρεσιν ἀλλὰ κατὰ τὴν διανοίαν. Again in the first chapter of the treatise de Sophisticis Elenchis—ὁ σοφιστὴς, χρηματιστὴς ἀπὸ φαντασίης σοφίας, ἀλλ’ οἷε εἶναι, &c.

² Respecting Isokratēs, see his Orat. xv. De Permutatione, wherein it is evident that he was not only ranked as a Sophist by others, but Great thinkers and writers, like Plato and Aristotle, have full right to define and employ words in a sense of their own, provided they give due notice. But it is essential that the reader should keep in mind the consequences of such change, and not mistake a word used in a new sense for a new fact or phenomenon. The age with which we are now dealing (the last half of the fifth century B.C.) is commonly distinguished in the history of philosophy as the age of Sokratês and the Sophists. The Sophists are spoken of as a new class of men, or sometimes in language which implies a new doctrinal sect or school, as if they then sprang up in Greece for the first time—ostentatious impostors, flattering and duping the rich youth for their own personal gain, undermining the morality of Athens public and private, and encouraging their pupils to the unscrupulous prosecution of ambition and cupidity. They are even affirmed to have succeeded in corrupting the general morality, so that Athens had become miserably degenerated and vicious in the latter years of the Peloponnesian war, as compared with what she was in the time of Miltiadês and Aristeidês. Sokratês, on the contrary, is usually described as a holy man combating and exposing these false prophets—standing up as the champion also considered himself as such, though the appellation was one which he did not like. He considers himself as such, as well as Gorgias—οἱ καλοῦμενοι σοφισταί—sect. 166, 169, 213, 231.

Misconceptions arising from Plato's peculiar use of the word Sophist.

Respecting Aristotle, we have only to read (not merely the passage of Timon cited in a previous note, but also) the bitter slander of Timæus (Frag. 70. ed. Didot, Polybius, xii. 8), who called him σοφιστῆν ὀψιμαθῆ καὶ μισθῶν ἐκάρχοντα, καὶ τὰ πολυμήγερος λαρσίῳ ἀρτίῳ ἐπισκελετικῷ, πρὸς δὲ ταῦτα, εἰς πάντας ἀλλὰ καὶ σήμερ' ἡμετέροισιν—κότα πρὸς δὲ, γαστρίμαργον, ὀφθαλμῶν, ἐπὶ ἀνάμνιν φερόμενον ἐν παντί.

of morality against their insidious artifices¹. Now though the appearance of a man so very original as Sokratês was a new fact, of unspeakable importance—the appearance of the Sophists was no new fact: what was new was the peculiar use of an old word; which Plato took out of its usual meaning, and fastened upon the eminent paid teachers of the Sokratic age.

Paid teachers or Sophists of the Sokratic age—Protagoras, Gorgias, &c.

The paid teachers, with whom, under the name of The Sophists, he brings Sokratês into controversy, were Protagoras of Abdera, Gorgias of Leontini, Polus of Agrigentum, Hippias of Elis, Prodikus of Keos, Thrasymachus of Chalkêdon, Euthydêmus and Dionysodôrus of Chios: to whom Xenophon adds Antiphon of Athens. These men—whom modern writers set down as The Sophists, and denounce as the moral pestilence of their age—were not distinguished in any marked or generic way from their predecessors. Their vocation was to train up youth for the duties, the pursuits, and the successes, of active life, both private and public. Others had done this before; but these teachers brought to the task a larger range of knowledge, with a greater multiplicity of scientific and other topics—not only more impressive powers of composition and speech, serving as a personal example to the pupil, but also a comprehension of the elements of good speaking, so as to be able to give him precepts conducive to that accomplishment¹—a considerable treasure of accumulated thought on moral and political subjects, calculated to make their conversation very instructive—and discourse ready prepared, on general heads or common places, for their pupils to learn by heart². But this, though a very important extension, was nothing more than an extension, differing merely in degree—of that which Damon and others had done before them. It arose from the increased demand which had grown up among the Athenian youth, for a larger measure of education and other accomplishments; from an elevation in the standard of what was required from every man who aspired to occupy a place in the eyes of his fellow-citizens. Protagoras, Gorgias, and the rest, supplied this demand with an ability and success unknown before their time: hence they gained a distinction such as none of their predecessors had attained, were prized all over Greece, travelled from city to city with general admiration, and obtained considerable pay. While such success, among men personally strangers to them, attests unequivocally their talent and personal dignity; of course it also laid them open to increased jealousy, as well from inferior teachers, as from the lovers of ignorance generally; such jealousy manifesting itself (as I have before explained) by a greater readiness to stamp them with the obnoxious title of Sophists.

¹ In the general point of view here described, the Sophists are presented by Ritter, Geschichte der Griech. Philosophie, vol. i. book vi. chap. 1-3, p. 577 seq., 629 seq.; by Brandt, Gesch. der Gr. Röm. Philos. sect. lxxxiv-lxxxvii. vol. i. p. 516 seq.; by Zeller, Geschichte der Philosophie, ii. pp. 65, 69, 166, &c.; and indeed by almost all who treat of the Sophists.

The hostility of Plato against these teachers (for it is he, and not Sokratês, who was peculiarly hostile to them, as may be seen by the absence of any such marked antithesis in the Memorabilia of Xenophon) may be explained without at all supposing in them that corruption which modern writers have been so ready not only to admit but to magnify. It arose from the radical difference between his point of view and theirs. He was a great reformer and theorist: they undertook to qualify young men for doing themselves credit, and rendering service to others, in active Athenian life. Not only is there room for the concurrent operation of both these veins of thought and action, in every progressive society; but the intellectual outfit of the society can never be complete without the one as well as the other. It was the glory of Athens that both were there adequately represented, at the period which we have now reached. Whoever peruses Plato's immortal work—'The Republic'—will see that he dissented from society, both democratical and oligarchical, on some of the most fundamental points of public and private morality; and throughout most of his dialogues his quarrel is not less with the statesmen, past as well as present, than with the paid teachers, of Athens. Besides this ardent desire for radical reform of the state, on principles of his own, distinct from every recognized political party or creed—Plato was also unrivalled as a speculative genius and as a dialectician; both which capacities he put forth, to amplify and illustrate the ethical theory and method first struck out by Sokratēs, as well as to establish comprehensive generalities of his own.

¹ Compare Isokratês, Orat. xiii. cont. Sophistas, s. 19-21.

² Aristot. Sophist. Elench. c. 33; Cicero, Brut. c. 12.

Plato and the Sophists—two different points of view—the reformer and theorist against the practical teacher.

Now his reforming, as well as his theorising tendencies, brought him into polemical controversy with all the leading agents by whom the business of practical life at Athens was carried on. In so far as Protagoras or Gorgias talked the language of theory, they were doubtless much inferior to Plato, nor would their doctrines be likely to hold against his acute dialectics. But it was neither their duty, nor their engagement, to reform the state, or discover and vindicate the best theory on ethics. They professed to qualify young Athenians for an active and honourable life, private as well as public, in Athens (or in any other given city): they taught them "to think, speak, and act," in Athens; they of course accepted, as the basis of their teaching, that type of character which estimable men exhibited and which the public approved, in Athens—not undertaking to recast the type, but to arm it with new capacities and adorn it with fresh accomplishments. Their direct business was with ethical precept, not with ethical theory: all that was required of them as to the latter, was, that their theory should be sufficiently sound to lead to such practical precepts as were accounted virtuous by the most estimable society in Athens. It ought never to be forgotten, that those who taught for active life were bound by the very conditions of their profession to adapt themselves to the place and the society as it stood. With the theorist Plato, not only there was no such obligation, but the grandeur and instructiveness of his speculations were realized only by his departing from it, and placing himself on a loftier pinnacle of vision; while he himself not only admits, but even exaggerates, the unfitness and repugnance, of men taught in his school, for practical life and duties¹.

¹ See a striking passage in Plato, Theætet. c. 21. p. 173, 174.

¹ Professor Maurice, in his History of Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy (vi. 2. 1, 6), remarks as follows: "We at once accept Mr. Grote's definition of the Sophist as the Platonist and the true one. He was the professor of wisdom: he taught men how to think, speak, and act. We wish for no other and no worse account of him. If modern authors have thrown any darker shades into their picture, we believe they have done him a benefit instead of an injury. Their clumsy exaggeration hides the essential ugliness which Mr. Grote's flattering sketch brings out in full relief."

The essential ugliness here noticed, is described by Professor Maurice as consisting in the fact, that—"Each held out the acquisition of political power as the prize to be obtained. There was their common point of agreement: possibly there was no other. The young Athenians wanted to know how to think, act, and speak on all subjects, that they might guide the people according to their pleasure. For this purpose they sought the aid of a sophist or professor." (s. 9, p. 105.) "By the necessity of his calling, the Sophist who taught to think, to act, and to speak, would come to regard the best part of his profession as that which included both the others. He would become a rhetorician and a teacher of rhetoric. If his object was to influence the mind of a mob, he was at least in considerable danger of leading his pupils to give the word sophistry that force with which we are most familiar" (p. 109).

What Professor Maurice calls the "essential ugliness," resides (according to his own showing), not in the Sophists, but in the young Athenians whom the Sophists taught. These young men wanted political power. To gratify ambition was their end and aim. But this was an end which the Sophists did not implant. They found it pre-existing, learnt from other quarters; and they had to deal with it as a fact. Let us read what Xenophon says about Proxenus and Gorgias. "Proxenus the Boeotian, even in his early youth, desired to become a man competent to achieve great deeds; and through this desire he gave money to Gorgias the Leontine. Having frequented his society, Proxenus conceived himself to have thus become fit for command, for alliance with the first men of his time, and for requiting to them all the good service which they might render to him" (Πρόξενος δὲ ὁ Βοιωτὸς εἰδὼς μὲν μετὰ πολλοῦ δὲ ἐπιθυμίας γενέσθαι ἀνὴρ τὰ μέγιστα πράττειν ἰκανός· καὶ διὰ ταῦτα τῆς ἐπιθυμίας ὅσων ἀρχήνους Γοργίῳ τῷ Λεοντίνῳ. Ἐπεὶ δὲ συνεγένετο ἔπειτα, ἰκανός ᾤδῃ νομίζων εἶναι καὶ ἀρχεῖν καὶ, φίλος δὲ τοῖς πρώτοις, μὴ ἡττάνθαι ἐνέγγυτον), &c. (Anabasis, ii. 6, 16.) So again in the Protagoras of Plato, Sokratēs introduces Hippokratēs to Protagoras with these words—"This Hippokratēs is a youth of one of our great and

To understand the essential difference between the practical and the theoretical point of view, we

The Sophists were professional teachers for active life, like Isokrates and Quintilian.

wealthy Athenian families, and is not inferior in talents to any of his contemporaries. He desires to become renowned in the city (ἀλλόγυνος γένεσθαι ἐν τῇ πόλει) and he thinks he shall be most likely to attain this object through your society." (Plato, Protag. c. 12. p. 163 A.)

Here we see that the end and aim was not one inspired by the Sophist to his pupils, but set by the pupils to themselves; just like the ends of Alkibiades and Kritias, when they sought the society of Sokratēs. And it is the end which Professor Maurice conceives as the great vice and generating cause of evil.

For the means, however, though not for the end, the Sophist is fairly responsible. What were the means which he communicated? The power of persuasion, with its appropriate stock of knowledge, memorial aptitude, and command of words, subject to the control of free public discussion or counter-persuasion from others. To call this acquisition an evil, can only pass current under that untenable assumption which represents speech as a mere organization for deceit; against which I need not add anything to the protest of Aristotle and Quintilian.

That speech may be used for good or for evil, is indisputable: speech in all its forms, not less the colloquy of Sokratēs than the oratory of Demosthenēs; speech not less in the mouth of a rude Spartan (who was as great a deceiver as any man in Greece) than in that of an accomplished Athenian; nay, not merely speech, but writing, which is only another mode of reaching the public feeling and conviction. The ambitious man may and will misemploy all these weapons to his own purposes. There is but one way to lessen the proportion of evil belonging to them. It is to ensure free scope to those who would persuade for better purposes: to multiply the number of competent speakers, with the opportunities of discussion; and thus to create a public of competent hearers and judges. Nowhere was so near an approach made to this object as at Athens, nor were there any persons who contributed more directly towards it than the Sophists. For not only they increased the number of speakers capable of enlisting the attention of the public, and thus of making discussion agreeable to the hearers; but even as to the use of oratorical fallacies, their numerous pupils served as checks upon each other. If they taught one ambitious man to deceive, they also taught another how to expose his deceit, and a third how to approach the subject on a different side, so as to divert attention, and prevent the exclusive predominance of any one fallacy.

It will probably be argued by Professor Maurice that the personal contentions of ambitious political rivals are a miserable apparatus for the conduct of society. Granting this to be true, it is still a prodigious improvement (for which we are indebted altogether to Greece, and chiefly need only look to Isokratès, the pupil of Gorgias, and himself a Sophist. Though not a man of com-

to Athens, with the Sophists as auxiliaries) to have brought these ambitious rivals to contend with the tongue only, and not with the sword. But if the remark be true at all, it is not less applicable to English than to Athenian politics; to every country where any free scope is left for human energy. By what else has England been governed for the last century and a half, except by these struggles of rival parties and ambitious politicians? If Plato disparaged the debates in the Athenian assembly and dikastery, would he have felt any greater esteem for those in the Houses of Lords and Commons? If he thought himself entitled to despise the whole class of Athenian statesmen, Themistoklès and Periklès among them, as "mere servants of the city (δῆλοντες τῆς πόλεως—Plato, Gorgias, c. 154. p. 152 A, 155 A); supplying Athens with docks, harbours, walls, and such like follies, but making no provision for the moral improvement of the citizens"—would his judgment have been more favourable on Walpole and Pulteney—Pitt and Fox—Peel and Russell—the 'Times' and the 'Chronicle'?

When we try Athens by the ideal standard of Sokratès and Plato, we ought in fairness to apply the same criticism to other societies also, which will be found just as little competent to stand the scrutiny. And those who, like Professor Maurice, assume that intellectual and persuasive power in the hands of an ambitious man is an instrument of evil—which is implied in the assertion that the Sophist, to whom he owes the improvement of such power, is a teacher of evil—will find that they are passing sentence upon the leading men in the English House of Lords and Commons, not less than upon the prominent politicians of Athens. In both the "essential ugliness" is found—if that be the name which it deserves—of qualifying themselves to think, speak, and act, in order that they may gain or keep "political power as the prize," and may "guide the people according to their pleasure."

It will probably be said that this is not absolutely true of all English politicians, but only of some; that others among them, more or fewer, have devoted their knowledge and eloquence to persuading for public-minded purposes, and with beneficial results. Such reserves, if made for England, ought to be made for Athens also; which is quite enough as a reply to the censure pronounced by Professor Maurice against the Sophist. The Sophist imparted intellectual and persuasive force to the high-minded politicians, as well as to the ambitious. To those pupils who combined in different proportions the one and the other class of motives (as must have happened very frequently), his teaching tended to foster the better rather than the worse. The very topics upon which he talked ensured such a tendency: the materials, out of which persuasion is to be manufactured, must be, for the most manding abilities, Isokrates was one of the most estimable men of Grecian antiquity. He taught for money, and taught young men to "think, speak, and act," all with a view to an honourable life of active citizenship; not concealing his marked disparagement¹ of speculative study and debate, such part, of a public-minded, lofty, and beneficent bearing—though an ambitious talker may choose to misemploy them for his own personal power-seeking.

As to the influence of ambitious motives in politicians, when subject to the necessity of persuasion and to the control of free discussion—though I do not concur in the sweeping censure of Professor Maurice, I admit that it is partly evil as well as good, and that it rarely leads to great or material improvement, beyond the actual state of society which the ambitious man finds. But the Sophist does not represent ambition. He represents intellectual and persuasive force, reflecting and methodised so as to operate upon the minds of free hearers, yet under perfect liberty of opposition: persuasion against the ambitious man, as well as by him or for him. It is this which I am here upholding against Professor Maurice, as not only no evil, but (in my judgment) one of the grand sources of good in Athens, and essential to human improvement everywhere else. There are only two modes of governing society, either by persuasion or by coercion. Discredit the arguments of the Sophist as much as you can by others of an opposite tendency: but when you discredit his weapon of intellectual and persuasive force, as if it were nothing better than cheat and imposture, manufactured and sold for the use of ambitious men—you leave open no other ascendancy over men's minds, except the crushing engine of extraneous coercion with assumed infallibility.

¹ Isokratēs, Orat. v. (ad Philip.) s. 14; Orat. x. (Enc. Hel.) s. 2; Orat. xiii. adv. Sophist. s. 9 (compare Hamdorf's note ad Platon. Euthydem. s. 79); Orat. xii. (Panath.) s. 126; Orat. xv. (Perm.) s. 90.

Isokratēs, in the beginning of his Orat. x. Encom. Helen. censures all the speculative teachers—first Antisthenēs and Plato (without naming them, but identifying them sufficiently by their doctrines), next Protagoras, Gorgias, Melissos, Zeno, &c., by name, as having wasted their time and teaching on fruitless paradox and controversy. He insists upon the necessity of teaching with a view to political life and to the course of actual public events—abandoning these useless studies (s. 6).

It is remarkable that what Isokratēs recommends is just what Protagoras and Gorgias are represented as actually doing (each doubtless in his own way) in the dialogues of Plato; who censures them for being too as the dialogues of Plato and the dialectic exercises generally. He defends his profession much in the practical, while Isokratēs, commenting on them from various publications which they left, treats them only as teachers of useless speculations.

In the Oratio De Permutatione, composed when he was eighty-two years of age (s. 10—the orations above cited are earlier compositions, especially Orat. xiii. against the Sophists, see s. 206), Isokratēs stands upon the defensive, and vindicates his profession against manifold aspersions. It is a most interesting oration, as a defence of the educators of Athens generally, and would serve perfectly well as a vindication of the teaching of Protagoras, Gorgias, Hippias, &c. against the reproaches of Plato.

This oration should be read, if only to get at the genuine Athenian sense of the word Sophists, as distinguished from the technical sense which Plato and Aristotle fasten upon it. The word is here used in its largest sense, as distinguished from Idiōtēs (s. 159): it meant literary men or philosophers generally, but especially the professional teachers: it carried however an obnoxious sense, and was therefore used as little as possible by themselves—as much as possible by those who disliked them.

Isokratēs, though he does not willingly call himself by this unpleasant name, yet is obliged to acknowledge himself unreservedly as one of the profession, in the same category as Gorgias (s. 165, 179, 211, 213, 231, 256), and defends the general body as well as himself; distinguishing himself of course from the bad members of the profession—those who pretended to be Sophists, but devoted themselves to something different in reality (s. 230).

This professional teaching, and the teachers, are signified indiscriminately by these words—οἱ σοφισταί—οἱ περὶ τὴν φιλοσοφίαν διαιρούμενοι—τὴν φιλοσοφίαν ἰδίῳ διαβιβλῆναι (s. 44, 157, 159, 179, 211, 217, 219)—ἡ τῶν λόγων παιδεία—ἡ τῶν λόγων μελέτη—ἡ φιλοσοφία—ἡ τῆς φρονήσεως ἀσκησις—τῆς ἐμῆς, εἴτε βουλευτικῆς καλῆς ἀγαθῶς, εἴτε φιλοσοφίας, εἴτε διαιρουμένης (s. 53, 187, 189, 193, 196). All these expressions mean the same process of training—that is, general mental training as opposed to bodily (s. 194, 199), and intended to cultivate the powers of thought, speech, and action—περὶ τὸ λέγειν καὶ φρονεῖν—τοῦ φρονεῖν εὖ καὶ λέγειν—εὖ λέγειν καὶ πράττειν (s. 221, 261, 285, 296, 330). So again in the Buciris, Isokratēs represents Polykratēs as a σοφιστής, making an income by φιλοσοφία or by ἡ περὶ τοὺς λόγους παιδεία, sect. 1, 2, 44, 45, 50, 51.

Isokratēs does not admit any such distinction between the philosopher and dialectician on the one side—and the Sophist on the other—as Plato and Aristotle contend for. He does not like dialectical exercises, same way as his master Gorgias, or Protagoras, would have defended it, if we had before us vindications from their pens. Isokratès at Athens, and Quintilian, a man equally estimable at Rome, are in their general type of character and professional duty, the fair counterpart of those whom Plato arraigns as The Sophists.

We know these latter chiefly from the evidence of Plato, their pronounced enemy: yet even his evidence, when construed candidly and taken as a whole, will not be found to justify the charges of corrupt and immoral teaching, impostrous pretence of knowledge, &c. which the modern historians pour forth in loud chorus against them. I know few characters in history who have been so hardly dealt with as these so-called Sophists. They bear the penalty of their name, in its modern sense; a misleading association, from which few modern writers take pains to emancipate either themselves or their readers—though the English or French word Sophist is absolutely inapplicable to Protagoras or Gorgias, who ought to be called rather "Professors or Public Teachers." It is really surprising to examine the expositions prefixed, by learned men like Stallbaum and others, to the Platonic dialogues entitled Protagoras, Gorgias, Euthydèmus, Theætétus, &c., where Plato introduces Sokratès either in personal controversy with one or other of these Sophists, or as canvassing their opinions. We continually read yet he admits them to be useful for youth, as a part of intellectual training, on condition that all such speculations shall be dropped, when the youth come into active life (s. 280, 287).

Misinterpretations of the dialogues of Plato as carrying evidence against the Sophists.

This is the same language as that of Kalliklès in the Gorgias of Plato, c. 40. p. 484.

from the pen of the expositor such remarks as these—"Mark how Plato puts down the shallow and worthless Sophist"—the obvious reflection, that it is Plato himself who plays both games on the chess-board, being altogether overlooked. And again—"This or that argument, placed in the mouth of Sokratēs, is not to be regarded as the real opinion of Plato: he only takes it up and enforces it at this moment, in order to puzzle and humiliate an ostentatious pretender!"—a remark which converts Plato

¹ Stallbaum, Proleg. ad Platon. Protagor. p. 23. "Hoc vero ejus judicio ita utitur Socrates, ut eum dehinc dialecticæ subtilitate in summum consilii inopiam conjiciat. Colligit enim inde satis captiosas res, ita comparatis justitiam, quippe quæ a sanctitate diversa sit, plane nihil sanctitatis habituram, ac vicissim sanctitati nihil fore commune cum justitiâ. Respondet quidem ad hæc Protagoræ, justitiam ac sanctitatem non per omnia sibi similes esse, nec tamen etiam prorsus dissimiles videri. Sed etsi verissime est hæc ejus sententia, tamen comparatione illâ a partibus faciei repetitâ, in fraudem inductus, et quid sit, in quo omnis virtutis natura continetur, ignarus, sese ex his difficultatibus nileo non potest expedire," &c.

Again, p. 24. "Itaque Socrates, missâ hujus rei disputatione, repente ad alia progreditur, scilicet similibus laqueis hominem deinceps denovo irritaturus."....."Nemini facile obscurum erit, hoc quoque loco, Protagoræ argutis conclusionibus deludi atque callide eo permoveri," &c.p. 25: "Quæcumque nemo erit, quin videat callide deludi Protagoræ," &c.p. 34. "Quod si autem ea, quæ in Protagorâ Sophistæ videndi causâ e vulgi atque sophistarum ratione disputantur, in Gorgiâ ex ipsius philosophi mente et sententiâ vel brevius proponuntur vel copiosius disputantur," &c.

Compare similar observations of Stallbaum, in his Prolegom. ad Theætet. p. 12, 22; ad Menon. p. 16; ad Euthydæmum. p. 26, 30; ad Lachetum. p. 11; ad Lysidem. p. 79, 80, 87; ad Hippiam Major. p. 154-156.

"Facile apparet Socratem argutâ, quæ verbo philosobus inest, dilogiâ interlocutorum (Hippiam Sophistam) in fraudem inducere."....."Illud quidem pro certo et explorato habemus, non serio sed videndi æron-dique Sophistæ grætid gravissimum illam sententiam in dubitationem vocari, ideoque iis conclusionibus labefectari, quas quilibet paulo attentior facile intelligat non ad fidem faciendam, sed ad lulum jocumque, esse comparatas."

into an insincere disputant and a Sophist in the modern sense, at the very moment when the commentator is extolling his pure and lofty morality as an antidote against the alleged corruption of Gorgias and Protagoras.

Plato has devoted a long and interesting dialogue to the inquiry, What is a Sophist? and it is curious to observe that the definition which he at last brings out suits Sokratēs himself, intellectually speaking, better than any one else whom we know. Cicero defines the Sophist to be one who pursues philosophy for the sake of ostentation or of gain¹; which, if it is to be held as a reproach, will certainly bear hard upon the great body of modern teachers, who are determined to embrace their profession and to discharge its important duties, like other professional men, by the prospect either of deriving an income or of making a figure in it, or both—whether they have any peculiar relish for the occupation or not. But modern writers, in describing Protagoras or Gorgias, while they adopt the sneering language of Plato against teaching for pay, low purposes, tricks to get money from the rich, &c.—use terms which lead the reader to believe that there was something in these Sophists peculiarly greedy, exorbitant, and truckling; something beyond the mere fact of asking and receiving remuneration. Now not only there is no proof that any of them (speaking of those conspicuous in the profession) were thus dishonest or exorbitant, but in the case of Protagoras, even his enemy Plato furnishes a proof that he was not so. In the Platonic dialogue termed Protagoras, that Sophist is introduced as describing the manner in which he proceeded respecting remuneration from his pupils. "I make no stipulation beforehand: when a pupil parts from me, I ask from him such a sum as I think the time and the circumstances warrant; and I add, that if he deems the demand too great, he has only to make up his own mind what is the amount of improvement which my company has procured to him, and what sum he considers an equivalent for it. I am content to accept the sum so named by himself, only requiring him to go into a temple and make oath that it is his sincere belief¹." It is not easy to imagine a more dignified way of dealing than this, nor one which more thoroughly attests an honourable reliance on the internal consciousness of the scholar; on the grateful sense of improvement realised, which to

The Sophists as paid teachers—no proof that they were greedy or exorbitant—proceeding of Protagoras.

¹ Plato, Sophistes, c. 52, p. 268.

² Cicero, Academ. iv. 23. Xenophon, at the close of his treatise De Venatione (c. 13), introduces a sharp censure upon the Sophists, with very little that is specific or distinct. He accuses them of teaching command and artifice of words, instead of communicating useful maxims—of speaking for purposes of deceit, or for their own profit, and addressing themselves to rich pupils for pay—while the philosopher gives his lessons to every one gratuitously, without distinction of persons. This is the same distinction as that taken by Sokratēs and Plato, between the Sophist and the Philosopher: compare Xenoph. De Vertigali v. 4.

¹ Plato, Protagoras, c. 16, p. 328 B. Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 58) says that Protagoras demanded 100 minæ as pay: little stress is to be laid upon such a statement, nor is it possible that he could have had one fixed rate of pay. The story told by Aulus Gellius (v. 10) about the suit at law between Protagoras and his disciple Euathlus, is at least amusing and ingenious. Compare the story of the rhetor Skopelionus, in Philostratus, Vit. Sophist. i. 21, 4.

Isokritēs (Or. xv. de Perm. s. 166) affirms that the gains made by Gorgias or by any of the eminent Sophists had never been very high; that they had been greatly and maliciously exaggerated; that they were very inferior to those of the great dramatic actors (s. 168).

every teacher constitutes a reward hardly inferior to the payment that proceeds from it, and which (in the opinion of Sokratês) formed the only legitimate reward. Such is not the way in which the corruptors of mankind go to work.

That which stood most prominent in the teaching of Gorgias and the other Sophists, was, that they cultivated and improved the powers of public speaking in their pupils; one of the most essential accomplishments to every Athenian of consideration. For this, too, they have been denounced by Ritter, Brandis, and other learned writers on the history of philosophy, as corrupt and immoral. "Teaching their pupils rhetoric (it has been said), they only enabled them to second unjust designs, to make the worse appear the better reason, and to delude their hearers, by trick and artifice, into false persuasion and show of knowledge without reality. Rhetoric (argues Plato in the dialogue called Gorgias) is no art whatever, but a mere unscientific knack, enslaved to the dominant prejudices, and nothing better than an imposterous parody on the true political art." Now though Aristotle, following the Platonic vein, calls this power of making the worse appear the better reason, "the promise of Protagoras"—the accusation ought never to be urged as it bore specially against the teachers of the

The Sophists as rhetorical teachers—groundless accusations against them in that capacity, made also against Sokratês, Isokratis, and others.

¹ Aristot. Rhetoric ii. 26. Ritter (p. 582) and Brandis (p. 521) quote very unfairly the evidence of the 'Clouds' of Aristophanes, as establishing this charge, and that of corrupt teaching generally, against the Sophists as a body. If Aristophanes is a witness against any one, he is a witness against Sokratês, who is the person singled out for attack in the 'Clouds.' But these authors, not admitting Aristophanes as an evidence against Sokratês whom he does attack, nevertheless quote him as an evidence against men like Protagoras and Gorgias whom he does not attack.

Socratic age. It is an argument against rhetorical teaching generally; against all the most distinguished teachers of pupils for active life, throughout the ancient world, from Protagoras, Gorgias, Isokratēs, &c. down to Quintilian. Not only does the argument bear equally against all, but it was actually urged against all. Isokratēs¹ and Quintilian both defend themselves against it: Aristotle² was assailed by it, and provides a defence in the beginning of his treatise on Rhetoric: nor was there ever any man, indeed, against whom it was pressed with greater bitterness of calumny than Sokratēs—by Aristophanēs in his comedy of the ‘Clouds,’ as well as by other comic composers. Sokratēs complains of it in his defence before his judges³; characterising such accusations in their true point of view, as being “the stock reproaches against all who pursue philosophy.” They are indeed only one of the manifestations, ever varying in form though the same in spirit, of the antipathy of ignorance against dissenting innovation or superior

¹ Isokratēs, Or. xv. (De Permut.) s. 16. οὐς δὲ λέγει μὲν (the accuser) ὡς ἐγὼ τοῖς ἥτινα λόγους κρείττους δέοναι ποιεῖν, &c.

Ibid. s. 32. πειρᾶται μὲν διαβιβάζειν, ὡς διαφθεῖραι τοὺς νεωτέρους, λέγειν δὲ δόξασι καὶ παρὰ τὰ δίκαιον ἐν τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς πλεονεκεῖν, &c.

Again, s. 59, 65, 95, 98, 187 (where he represents himself, like Sokratēs in his defence, as vindicating philosophy generally against the accusation of corrupting youth), 233, 256.

² Plutarch, Alexander, c. 74.

³ Plato, Sok. Apolog. c. 10, p. 23 D. τὰ κατὰ πάντων τῶν φιλοσοφούντων πρόχειρα ταῦτα λέγουσι, ὅτι τὰ μετέωρα καὶ τὰ ἐπὶ γῆς, καὶ θεοὺς μὴ νομίζουσιν, καὶ τοὺς ἥτινα λόγους κρείττους ποιεῖν (διδάσκω). Compare a similar expression in Xenophon, Memorab. i. 2, 31. τὸ ἐπὶ τῶν φιλοσόφων ἐπὶ τῶν πολλῶν ἐπιτηδεύουσιν, &c.

The same unfairness, in making this point tell against the Sophists exclusively, is to be found in Westermann, Geschichte der Griech. Beredsamkeit, sect. 30, 64.

mental accomplishments ; which antipathy, intellectual men themselves, when it happens to make on their side in a controversy, are but too ready to invoke. Considering that we have here the materials of defence, as well as of attack, supplied by Sokratès and Plato, it might have been expected that modern writers would have refrained from employing such an argument to discredit Gorgias or Protagoras ; the rather, as they have before their eyes, in all the countries of modern Europe, the profession of lawyers and advocates, who lend their powerful eloquence without distinction to the cause of justice or injustice, and who, far from being regarded as the corruptors of society, are usually looked upon, for that very reason among others, as indispensable auxiliaries to a just administration of law.

Though writing was less the business of these Sophists than personal teaching, several of them published treatises. Thrasy-machus and Theodôrus both set forth written precepts on the art of Rhetoric¹ ; precepts which have not descended to us, but which appear to have been narrow and special, bearing directly upon practice, and relating chiefly to the proper component parts of an oration. To Aristotle, who had attained that large and comprehensive view of the theory of Rhetoric which still remains to instruct us in his splendid treatise, the views of Thrasy-machus appeared unimportant, serving to him only as hints and materials. But their

Thrasy-machus—
his rhetorical precepts—Prodicus—
his discrimination of words analogous in meaning.

¹ See the last chapter of Aristotle De Sophisticis Elenchis. He notices these early rhetorical teachers, also, in various parts of the treatise on Rhetoric.

Quintilian however still thought the precepts of Theodôrus and Thrasy-machus worthy of his attention (Inst. Orat. iii. 3).

effect must have been very different when they first appeared, and when young men were first enabled to analyse the parts of an harangue, to understand the dependence of one upon the other, and call them by their appropriate names ; all illustrated, let us recollect, by oral exposition on the part of the master, which was the most impressive portion of the whole.

Prodikus, again, published one or more treatises intended to elucidate the ambiguities of words and to point out the different significations of terms apparently, but not really, equivalent. For this Plato often ridicules him, and the modern historians of philosophy generally think it right to adopt the same tone. Whether the execution of the work was at all adequate to its purpose, we have no means of judging ; but assuredly the purpose was one pre-eminently calculated to aid Grecian thinkers and dialecticians ; for no man can study their philosophy without seeing how lamentably they were hampered by enslavement to the popular phraseology, and by inferences founded on mere verbal analogy. At a time when neither dictionary nor grammar existed, a teacher who took care, even punctilious care, in fixing the meaning of important words of his discourse—must be considered as guiding the minds of his hearers in a salutary direction ; salutary, we may add, even to Plato himself, whose speculations would most certainly have been improved by occasional hints from such a monitor.

Protagoras, too, is said to have been the first who discriminated, and gave names to the various modes and forms of address—an analysis well-calculated to assist his lessons on right speaking¹: he appears also to have been the first who distinguished the three genders of nouns. We hear further of a treatise which he wrote on wrestling—or most probably on gymnastics generally; as well as a collection of controversial dialogues². But his most celebrated treatise was one entitled 'Truth,' seemingly on philosophy generally. Of this treatise we do not even know the general scope or purport. In one of his treatises, he confessed his inability to satisfy himself about the existence of the gods, in these words³—“Respecting the gods, I neither know whether they exist, nor what are their attributes; the uncertainty of the subject, the shortness of human life, and many other causes, debar me from this knowledge.” That the believing public of Athens were seriously indignant at this passage, and that it caused the author to be threatened with prosecution and forced to quit Athens—we can perfectly understand; though there seems no sufficient proof of the tale that he was drowned in his outward voyage. But that modern historians of philosophy, who consider the Pagan gods to be fictions, and the religion to be repugnant to any reasonable mind, should concur in denouncing Protagoras on this ground as a corrupt man, is to me less intelligible,

Protagoras
—his treatise on Truth—his opinions about the Pagan gods.

¹ Quintilian, Instit. Orat. iii. 4, 10; Aristot. Rhetor. iii. 5. See the passages cited in Preller, Histor. Philos. Græc. iv. p. 132, note d, who affirms respecting Protagoras—“alia inani grammaticorum principiorum ostentatione novare conabatur”—which the passages cited do not prove.

² Isokrates, Or. x. Encour. Helen. s. 3; Diogen. Laërt. ix. 54.

³ Diogen. Laërt. ix. 51; Sext. Empir. adv. Math. ix. 56; Παρὶ μὲν θεῶν οὐκ ἔχω εἰπεῖν, οὐτε εἰ εἰσιν, οὐδ' ὅποια τινὲς εἰσι· πολλὰ γὰρ τὰ καλίστα αἰεῖναι, ἃ τε ἀληθῆ, καὶ βραχὺς ὥς ὁ βίος τοῦ ἀνθρώπου.

I give the words partly from Diogenes, partly from Sextus, as I think they would be most likely to stand.

Xenophanês¹, and probably many other philosophers, had said the same thing before him. Nor is it easy to see what a superior man was to do, who could not adjust his standard of belief to such fictions—or what he could say, if he said any thing, less than the words cited above from Protagoras; which appear as far as we can appreciate them standing without the context, to be a brief mention, in modest and circumspect phrases, of the reason why he said nothing about the gods, in a treatise where the reader would expect to find much upon the subject². Certain it is that in the Platonic dialogue, called 'Protagoras,' that Sophist is introduced speaking about the gods exactly in the manner that any orthodox Pagan might naturally adopt.

The other fragment preserved of Protagoras relates to his view of the cognitive process, and of truth generally. He taught that "Man is the measure of all things, both of that which exists, and of that which does not exist:" a doctrine canvassed and controverted by Plato, who represents that Protagoras affirmed knowledge to consist in sensation, and considered the sensations of each individual man to be, to him, the canon and measure of truth. We know scarce any thing of the elu-

¹ Xenophanês ap. Sext. Emp. adv. Mathem. vii. 49.

² The satirical writer Timon (ap. Sext. Emp. ix. 57), speaking in very respectful terms about Protagoras, notices particularly the guarded language which he used in this sentence about the gods; though this precaution did not enable him to avoid the necessity of flight. Protagoras spoke—

Πῶς οὐκ ἔχον φυλάξῃς ἐπισκεῖσθαι τὰ μὲν αἰεὶ
Χροίσαντες, ἀλλὰ φευγῆς ἐντραίειν, ὅθρα μὴ αἴσας Σωφροσύνης πίνον ψυχῶν πάντων Ἀδῶα δῶα.

His view of the cognitive process and its relative nature.

cidations or limitations with which Protagoras may have accompanied his general position: and if even Plato, who had good means of knowing them, felt it ungenerous to insult an orphan doctrine whose father was recently dead, and could no longer defend it¹—much more ought modern authors, who speak with mere scraps of evidence before them, to be cautious how they heap upon the same doctrine insults much beyond those which Plato recognises. In so far as we can pretend to understand the theory, it was certainly not more incorrect than several others then afloat, from the Eleatic school and other philosophers; while it had the merit of bringing into forcible relief, though in an erroneous manner, the essentially relative nature of cognition²—relative, not indeed to the sensitive faculty alone, but

¹ Plato, Theætet. 18. p. 164 E. ὄφρι ἄν, οἶμαι, ὃ φῶς, εἴπερ γε ἔπαρξεν τῷ ἐνέρον λόγον ἔξω—ἀλλὰ πολλὰ ἄν ἤμεν· νῦν δὲ ὄρφανος αὐτὸς ἔσται ἡμεῖς προσηλαζίζομεν.....ἀλλὰ δὲ αὐτοὶ κισδυεύσομεν τοῦ δικαίου ἔξω· αὐτῷ βοηθεῖν.

This theory of Protagoras is discussed in the dialogue called Theætetus, p. 152 seq., in a long, but desultory way.

See Sextus Empiric. Pyrrhonic. Hypot. i. 216-219, et contra Mathematicos, vii. 60-64. The explanation which Sextus gives of the Protagorean doctrine, in the former passage, cannot be derived from the treatise of Protagoras himself; since he makes use of the word ἐλεγχ in the philosophical sense, which was not adopted until the days of Plato and Aristotle.

It is difficult to make out what Diogenes Laërtius states about other tenets of Protagoras, and to reconcile them with the doctrine of "man being the measure of all things," as explained by Plato (Diog. Laërt. ix. 51, 57).

² Aristotle (in one of the passages of his Metaphysics—wherein he discusses the Protagorean doctrine—x. i. p. 1053 B.) says that this doctrine comes to nothing more than saying, that man, so far as cognizant, or so far as perceptive, is the measure of all things; in other words, that knowledge, or perception, is the measure of all things. This Aristotle says—is trivial, and of no value, though it sounds like something of importance—Πρωταγόρας δ' ἀπορώσας φησι πάντας εἶναι μέτρον, ὥστερ ἂν εἰ τὸν ἐπιστάμενον εἴποις ἢ τὸν ἀλθευόμενον· ταῦτα δ' to that reinforced and guided by the other faculties of man, memorial and ratiocinative. And had it been even more incorrect than it really is, there would be no warrant for those imputations which modern authors build upon it, against the morality of Protagoras. No such imputations are countenanced in the discussion which Plato devotes to the doctrine: indeed, if the vindication which he sets forth against himself on behalf of Protagoras be really ascribable to that Sophist, it would give an exaggerated importance to the distinction between Good and Evil, into which the distinction between Truth and Falsehood is considered by the Platonic Protagoras as resolvable. The subsequent theories of Plato and Aristotle respecting cognition, were much more systematic and elaborate, the work of men greatly superior in speculative genius to Protagoras: but they would not have been what they were, had not Protagoras as well as others gone before them, with suggestions more partial and imperfect.

ὅτι ἔχουσιν ὁ μὲν ἀσθενὲς ὁ δὲ ἐπιστήμη· ἢ φαίμεν ἵνα μὲν τοῦ ἐπὶ κοινού. Οὐδὲν δὲ λέγειν περὶ τὸν φαίμεν τι λέγειν.

It appears to me that to insist upon the essentially relative nature of cognisable truth, was by no means a trivial or unimportant doctrine, as Aristotle pronounces it to be: especially when we compare it with the unmeasured conceptions of the objects and methods of scientific research, which were so common in the days of Protagoras.

Compare Metaphysic. iii. 5. p. 1008, 1009, where it will be seen how many other thinkers of that day carried the same doctrine seemingly further than Protagoras.

Protagoras remarked that the observed movements of the heavenly bodies did not coincide with that which the astronomers represented them to be, and to which they applied their mathematical reasonings. This remark was a criticism on the mathematical astronomers of his day—λέγειν τοῖς γεωμέτραις (Aristot. Metaph. iii. 2. p. 998 A). We know too little how far his criticism may have been deserved, to assent to the general strictures of Ritter, Gesch. der Phil. vol. 4. p. 633.

From Gorgias there remains one short essay, preserved in one of the Aristotelian or Pseudo-Aristotelian treatises¹, on a metaphysical thesis. He professes to demonstrate that nothing exists; that if anything exist, it is unknowable; and granting it even to exist and to be knowable by any one man, he could never communicate it to others. The modern historians of philosophy here prefer the easier task of denouncing the scepticism of the Sophist, instead of performing the duty incumbent on them of explaining his thesis in immediate sequence with the speculations which preceded it. In our sense of the words, it is a monstrous paradox: but construing them in their legitimate filiation from the Eleatic philosophers immediately before him, it is a plausible, not to say conclusive, deduction from principles which they would have acknowledged². The word Existence, as they understood it, did not mean phenomenal, but ultra-phenomenal existence. They looked upon the phenomena of sense as always coming and going—as something essentially transitory, fluctuating, incapable of being surely known, and furnishing at best grounds only for conjecture. They searched by cogitation for what they presumed to be the really existent Something or Substance—the Noumenon, to use a Kantian phrase—lying behind or under the phenomena, his treatise on physical subjects—misrepresentations of the scope of it.

Gorgias—

¹ See the treatise entitled De Melisso, Xenophane, et Gorgia in Bekker's edition of Aristotle's Works, vol. i. p. 979 seq.; also the same treatise with a good preface and comments by Mullach, p. 62 seq.: compare Sextus Emp. adv. Mathemat. vii. 65, 87.

² See the note of Mullach, on the treatise mentioned in the preceding note, p. 72. He shows that Gorgias followed in the steps of Zeno and Melissus.

which Noumenon they recognised as the only appropriate subject of knowledge. They discussed much (as I have before remarked) whether it was One or Many—Noumenon in the singular, or Noumena in the plural. Now the thesis of Gorgias related to this ultra-phænomenal existence, and bore closely upon the arguments of Zeno and Melissus, the Eleatic reasoners of his elder contemporaries. He denied that any such ultra-phænomenal Something, or Noumenon, existed, or could be known, or could be described. Of this tripartite thesis, the first negation was neither more untenable, nor less untenable, than that of those philosophers who before him had argued for the affirmative: on the two last points, his conclusions were neither paradoxical nor improperly sceptical, but perfectly just,—and have been ratified by the gradual abandonment, either avowed or implied, of such ultra-phænomenal researches among the major part of philosophers. It may fairly be presumed that these doctrines were urged by Gorgias for the purpose of diverting his disciples from studies which he considered as unpromising and fruitless; just as we shall find his pupil Isokratês afterwards enforcing the same view, discouraging speculations of this nature, and recommending rhetorical exercise as preparation for the duties of an active citizen¹. Nor must we forget that Sokratês himself discouraged physical speculations even more decidedly than either of them.

If the censures cast upon the alleged scepticism

¹ Isokratês De Permutatione, Or. xv. s. 287; Xenoph. Memorab. i. 1, 14.

of Gorgias and Protagoras are partly without sufficient warrant, partly without any warrant at all—much more may the same remark be made respecting the graver reproaches heaped upon their teaching on the score of immorality or corruption. It has been common with recent German historians of philosophy to translate from Plato and dress up a fiend called “Die Sophistik” (Sophistic)—whom they assert to have poisoned and demoralised, by corrupt teaching, the Athenian moral character, so that it became degenerate at the end of the Peloponnesian war, compared with what it had been in the time of Miltiadês and Aristeidês.

Unfounded accusations against the Sophists.

Now, in the first place, if the abstraction “Die Sophistik” is to have any definite meaning, we ought to have proof that the persons styled Sophists had some doctrines, principles, or method, both common to them all and distinguishing them from others. But such a supposition is untrue: there were no such common doctrines, or principles, or method, belonging to them. Even the name by which they are known did not belong to them, any more than to Sokratês and others; they had nothing in common except their profession, as paid teachers, qualifying young men “to think, speak, and act” (these are the words of Isokratês, and better words it would not be easy to find) with credit to themselves as citizens. Moreover, such community of profession did not at that time imply so much analogy of character as it does now, when the path of teaching has been beaten into a broad and visible high road, with measured distances, and stated intervals: Protagoras and Gorgias found predeces-

They were not a sect or school, with common doctrines or method: they were a profession, with strong individual peculiarities.

sors indeed, but no binding precedents to copy; so that each struck out more or less a road of his own. And accordingly, we find Plato, in his dialogue called 'Protagoras,' wherein Protagoras, Prodikus, and Hippias are all introduced—imparting a distinct type of character and distinct method to each, not without a strong admixture of reciprocal jealousy between them; while Thrasymachus, in the Republic, and Euthydēmus, in the dialogue so called, are again painted each with colours of his own, different from all the three above-named. We do not know how far Gorgias agreed in the opinion of Protagoras—"Man is the measure of all things:" and we may infer even from Plato himself, that Protagoras would have opposed the views expressed by Thrasymachus in the first book of the Republic. It is impossible therefore to predicate anything concerning doctrines, methods, or tendencies, common and peculiar to all the Sophists. There were none such; nor has the abstract word—"Die Sophistik"—any real meaning, except such qualities (whatever they may be) as are inseparable from the profession or occupation of public teaching. And if, at present, every candid critic would be ashamed to cast wholesale aspersions on the entire body of professional teachers—much more is such censure unbecoming in reference to the ancient Sophists, who were distinguished from each other by stronger individual peculiarities.

If, then, it were true that in the interval between 480 B.C. and the end of the Peloponnesian war, a great moral deterioration had taken place in Athens and in Greece generally, we should have to search for some other cause than the imaginary abstraction called Sophistic. But—and this is the second point—the matter of fact here alleged is as untrue, as the cause alleged is unreal. Athens, at the close of the Peloponnesian war, was not more corrupt than Athens in the days of Miltiadès and Aristeidès. If we revert to that earlier period, we shall find that scarcely any acts of the Athenian people have drawn upon them sharper censure (in my judgment, unmerited) than their treatment of these very two statesmen; the condemnation of Miltiadès, and the ostracism of Aristeidès. In writing my history of that time, far from finding previous historians disposed to give the Athenians credit for public virtue, I have been compelled to contend against a body of adverse criticism, imputing to them gross ingratitude and injustice. Thus the contemporaries of Miltiadès and Aristeidès, when described as matter of present history, are presented in anything but flattering colours; except their valour at Marathon and Salamis, which finds one unanimous voice of encomium. But when these same men have become numbered among the mingled recollections and fancies belonging to the past—when a future generation comes to be present, with its appropriate stock of complaint and denunciation—then it is that men find pleasure in dressing up the virtues of the past, as a count in the indictment against their own contemporaries. Aristophanès¹, writing during the Peloponnesian war, denounced the Demos of his day as degenerated from the virtue of that Demos which had surrounded Miltiadès and Aristeidès; while Isokratès², writing as an old man between 350-340 B.C., complains in like manner of his own time, boasting how much better the state of Athens had been in his youth: which period of his youth fell exactly during the life of Aristophanês, in the last half of the Peloponnesian war.

The Athenian character was not really corrupted, between 480 B.C. and 405 A.C.

¹ Aristophan. Equit. 1316-1321.

² Isokratès, Or. xv. De Permutation. s. 170.

Such illusions ought to impose on no one without a careful comparison of facts; and most assuredly that comparison will not bear out the allegation of increased corruption and degeneracy, between the age of Miltiadês and the end of the Peloponnesian war. Throughout the whole of Athenian history, there are no acts which attest so large a measure of virtue and judgment pervading the whole people, as the proceedings after the Four Hundred and after the Thirty. Nor do I believe that the contemporaries of Miltiadês would have been capable of such heroism; for that appellation is by no means too large for the case. I doubt whether they would have been competent to the steady self-denial of retaining a large sum in reserve during the time of peace, both prior to the Peloponnesian war and after the peace of Nikias—or of keeping back the reserve fund of 1000 talents, while they were forced year after year to pay taxes for the support of the war¹—or of acting upon the prudent, yet painfully trying, policy recommended by Periklês, so as to sustain an annual invasion without either going out to fight or purchasing peace by ignominious concessions. If bad acts such as Athens committed during the later years of the war, for example, the massacre of the Melian population, were not done equally by the contemporaries of Miltiadès, this did not arise from any superior humanity or principle on their part, but from the fact that they were not exposed to the like temptation, brought upon them by the possession of imperial power. The condemnation of the six generals after the battle of Arginusæ, if we suppose the same conduct on their part to have occurred in 490 B.C., would have been decreed more rapidly and more unceremoniously than it was actually decreed in 406 B.C. For at that earlier date there existed no psephism of Kannônus, surrounded by prescriptive respect—no Graphê Paranomôn—no such habits of established deference to a Dikastery solemnly sworn, with full notice to defendants and full time of defence measured by the water-glass—none of those securities which a long course of democracy had gradually worked into the public morality of every Athenian, and which (as we saw in a former chapter) interposed a serious barrier to the impulse of the moment, though ultimately overthrown by its fierceness. A far less violent impulse would have sufficed for the same mischief in 490 B.C., when no such barriers existed. Lastly, if we want a measure of the appreciating sentiment of the Athenian public, towards a strict and decorous morality in the narrow sense, in the middle of the Peloponnesian war, we have only to consider the manner in which they dealt with Nikias. I have shown, in describing the Sicilian expedition, that the gravest error which the Athenians ever committed, that which shipwrecked both their armament at Syracuse and their power at home, arose from their unmeasured esteem for the respectable and pious Nikias, which blinded them to the grossest defects of generalship and public conduct. Disastrous as such misjudgment was, it counts at least as a proof that the moral corruption, alleged to have been operated in their characters, is a mere fiction. Nor let it be supposed that the nerve and resolution which once animated the combatants of Marathon and Salamis, had disappeared in the latter years of the Peloponnesian war. On the contrary, the energetic and protracted struggle of Athens, after the irreparable calamity at Syracuse, forms a worthy parallel to her resistance in the time of Xerxes, and maintained unabated that distinctive attribute which Periklēs had set forth as the main foundation of her glory—that of never giving way before misfortune¹. Without any disparagement to the armament at Salamis, we may remark that the patriotism of the fleet at Samos, which rescued Athens from the Four Hundred, was equally devoted and more intelligent; and that the burst of effort, which sent a subsequent fleet to victory at Arginusæ, was to the full as strenuous.

¹ Two years before the invasion by Xerxes, the Athenians did indeed forego a dividend about to be distributed to each of the citizens out of the silver mines of Laureum, in order that the money might be applied to building of triremes. This was honourable to them in every way: but it is by no means to be compared, for self-denial and estimate of future chances, to the effort of paying money more than once out of their pockets, in order that they might leave untouched the public fund of 1000 talents.

If then we survey the eighty-seven years of Athenian history, between the battle of Marathon and the renovation of the democracy after the Thirty, we shall see no ground for the assertion, so often made, of increased and increasing moral and political corruption. It is my belief that the people had become both morally and politically better, and that their democracy had worked to their improvement. The remark made by Thucydides, on the occasion of the Korkyræan bloodshed—on the violent and reckless political antipathies, arising out of the confluence of external warfare with internal party-feud¹—wherever else it may find its application, has no bearing upon Athens: the proceedings after the Four Hundred and after the Thirty prove the contrary. And while Athens may thus be vindicated on the moral side, it is indisputable that her population had acquired a far larger range of ideas and capacities than they possessed at the time of the battle of Marathon. This indeed is the very matter of fact deplored by Aristophanes, and admitted by those writers, who, while denouncing the Sophists, connect such enlarged range of ideas with the dissemination of the pretended sophistical poison. In my judgment, not only the charge against the Sophists as poisoners, but even the existence of such poison in the Athenian system, deserves nothing less than an emphatic denial.

¹ Thucyd. ii. 64.—γνώσε δ' ἄνθρωποι μέγιστον αὐτῆς (τῆς πόλεως) ἔχουσαν ἐν πᾶσι ἀνθρώποις, διὰ τὸ ταῖς συμφοραῖς μὴ εἶναι.

Let us examine again the names of these professional teachers, beginning with Prodikus, one of the

Prodikos—
The Choice of Hercules.

¹ Thucydides (iii. 82) specifies very distinctly the cause to which he ascribes the bad consequences which he depicts. He makes no allusion to Sophists or sophistical teaching; though Brandis (Gesch. der Gr. Röm. Philos. i. p. 518, not. f.) drags in "the sophistical spirit of the statesmen of that time," as if it were the cause of the mischief, and as if it were to be found in the speeches of Thucydides, i. 76. v. 103.

There cannot be a more unwarranted assertion; nor can a learned man like Brandis be ignorant, that such words as "the sophistical spirit" (Der sophistische Geist) are understood by a modern reader in a sense totally different from its true Athenian sense.

most renowned. Who is there that has not read the well-known fable called "The Choice of Hercules," which is to be found in every book professing to collect impressive illustrations of elementary morality? Who does not know that its express purpose is, to kindle the imaginations of youth in favour of a life of labour for noble objects, and against a life of indulgence? It was the favourite theme on which Prodikus lectured, and on which he obtained the largest audience¹. If it be of striking simplicity and effect even to a modern reader, how much more powerfully must it have worked upon the audience for whose belief it was specially adapted, when set off by the oral expansions of its author! Xenophon wondered that the Athenian Dikasts dealt with Sokratês as a corruptor of youth: Isokratês wondered that a portion of the public made the like mistake about himself: and I confess my wonder to be not less, that not only Aristophanês², but even the modern writers on Grecian philosophy, should rank Prodikus in the same unenviable catalogue³. This

¹ Xenoph. Memor. II. 1. 21-34.—Καὶ Προδίκος δὲ ἁσυχὸς ἐν τῷ συγγράμματι τῷ περὶ Ἡμιθέου, ὅπερ δὴ καὶ πλείστοις ἐπιδείκνυνται, δασύτως περὶ τῆς ἀρετῆς ἀποφαίνεσθαι, &c.

Xenophon here introduces Sokratês himself as bestowing much praise on the moral teaching of Prodikus.

² See Fragment iii. of the Trochmieri of Aristophanês—Meineke, Fragment. Aristoph. p. 1140.

³ Upon Prodikus and his fable called the "Choice of Hercules," Professor Maurice remarks as follows (Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy, iv. 2. l. 11. p. 109).—"The effect of the lesson which it inculcates is good or evil, according to the object which the reader proposes to himself. If he wishes to acquire the power of draining marshes and killing noxious beasts, all must bless him for not yielding to the voice of the Goddess of Pleasure. If he merely seeks to be the strongest of men, by resisting the enchantress, it might have been better for the world and for himself, that he should have yielded to her blandishments. Mr. Grote is not is the only composition¹ remaining from him—indeed the only composition remaining from any one likely to have forgotten the celebrated paradox of Gibbon respecting the clergy—"That their virtues are more dangerous to society than their vices." On the hypothesis which Gibbon no doubt adopted, that this order is divided into those who deny themselves for the sake of obtaining dominion over their fellow-countrymen, and those who yield to animal indulgence—his dictum may be easily admitted. The monk who restrains his appetites that he may be more followed and idolized as a confessor, does more harm to others, is probably more evil in himself, than the sleek abbot who is given up to his hawks and hounds. The principle is of universal application. We must know whether Prodikus departed from the general rule of the professional class, by not holding out political power as his prize—before we can pronounce him a useful teacher, because he taught his pupils how they might obtain the bone and nerve of Pericles."

With the single reserve of what Professor Maurice calls "the general rule of the professorial class," against which assertion I have already shown cause in a previous note—I fully admit not merely the justice, but the importance, of his general remark above transcribed. I recognise no merit in self-denial, unless in so far as the self-denying person becomes thereby the instrument of increased security and happiness to others or to himself—or unless it be conducive to the formation of a character of which such is the general result. And respecting Prodikus himself, I willingly accept the challenge. He marks out, in the most distinct and emphatic manner, the achievement of good to others, and the acquisition of esteem from others, as going together, and constituting in combination the prize for which the youthful Heraklés is exhorted to struggle—εἰς ἐπὶ φίλων ἐθέλει ἀγαθὰ ποιεῖν, τοὺς φίλους εὐεργετεῖν—εἰς ἐπὶ τοὺς πολλοὺς ἐπιθιμῆι τιμᾶσθαι, τὴν πόλιν ὠφελεῖν—εἰς ἐπὶ τῆς Ἑλλάδος πάσης ἀξιοῖν ἐπ' ἀρετῇ θαυμάζεσθαι, τὴν Ἑλλάδα περὶ αὐτὸν εὖ ποιεῖν, &c. (Xen. Mem. ii. 1. 28). I select these few words, but the whole tenor and spirit of the fable is similar.

Indeed the very selection of Heraklés as an ideal to be followed, is of itself a proof that the Sophist did not intend to point out the acquisition of personal dominion and preeminence, except in so far as they naturally sprang from services rendered, as the grand prize to be contended for by his pupils. For Heraklés is, in Greek conception, the type of those who work for others—one condemned by his destiny to achieve great, difficult, and unrewarded, exploits at the bidding of another (Σειδᾶς and Diogenianus, vi. 7, under the words τετραπὸς γόνυ—εἰς τῶν ἄλλων τινέωνται, &c.)

¹ Xenophon gives only the substance of Prodikus's lecture, not his exact words. But he gives what may be called the whole substance, so that we can appreciate the scope as well as the handling of the author.

of the Sophists, excepting the thesis of Gorgias above noticed. It serves, not merely as a vindication of Prodikus against such reproach, but also as a warning against implicit confidence in the sarcastic remarks of Plato—which include Prodikus as well as the other Sophists—and in the doctrines which he puts into the mouth of the Sophists generally, in order that Sokratēs may confute them. The commonest candour would teach us, that if a polemical writer of dialogue chooses to put indefensible doctrine into the mouth of the opponent, we ought to be cautious of condemning the latter upon such very dubious proof.

Welcker and other modern authors treat Prodikus as “the most innocent” of the Sophists, and except him from the sentence which they pass upon the class generally. Let us see therefore what Plato himself says about the rest of them, and first about Protagoras. If it were not the established practice with readers of Plato to condemn Protagoras beforehand, and to put, upon every passage relating to him, not only a sense as bad as it will bear, but much worse than it will fairly bear—they would probably carry away very different inferences from the Platonic dialogue called by that Sophist’s name, and in which he is made to bear a chief part. That dialogue is itself enough to prove that Plato did not conceive Protagoras either as a corrupt, or unworthy,

We cannot say the same of an extract given (in the Pseudo-Platonic Dialogue Axiochus, c. 7, 8) from a lecture said to have been delivered by Prodikus—respecting the miseries of human life pervading all the various professions and occupations. It is impossible to make out distinctly either how much really belongs to Prodikus, or what was his scope and purpose, if any such lecture was really delivered.

Protagoras
—real estimate exhibited of him by Plato.

or incompetent, teacher. The course of the dialogue exhibits him as not master of the theory of ethics, and unable to solve various difficulties with which that theory is expected to grapple; moreover, as no match for Sokratēs in dialectics, which Plato considered as the only efficient method of philosophical investigation. In so far therefore as imperfect acquaintance with the science or theory upon which rules of art, or the precepts bearing on practice, repose, disqualifies a teacher from giving instruction in such art or practice—to that extent Protagoras is exposed as wanting. And if an expert dialectician, like Plato, had passed Isokratēs or Quintilian, or the large majority of teachers past or present, through a similar cross-examination as to the theory of their teaching—an ignorance not less manifest than that of Protagoras would be brought out. The antithesis which Plato sets forth, in so many of his dialogues, between precept or practice, accompanied by full knowledge of the scientific principles from which it must be deduced, if its rectitude be disputed—and unscientific practice, without any such power of deduction or defence—is one of the most valuable portions of his speculations: he exhausts his genius to render it conspicuous in a thousand indirect ways, and to shame his readers, if possible, into the loftier and more rational walk of thought. But it is one thing to say of a man, that he does not know the theory of what he teaches, or of the way in which he teaches; it is another thing to say, that he actually teaches that which scientific theory would not prescribe as the best; it is a third thing, graver than both, to say that his teaching is not only below the exigences of science, but even corrupt and demoralising. Now of these three points, it is the first only which Plato in his dialogue makes out against Protagoras: even the second, he neither affirms nor insinuates; and as to the third, not only he never glances at it, even indirectly, but the whole tendency of the discourse suggests a directly contrary conclusion. As if sensible that when an eminent opponent was to be depicted as puzzled and irritated by superior dialectics, it was but common fairness to set forth his distinctive merits also—Plato gives a fable, and expository harangue, from the mouth of Protagoras¹, upon the question whether virtue is teachable. This harangue is, in my judgment, very striking and instructive; and so it would have been probably accounted, if commentators had not read it with a pre-established persuasion that whatever came from the lips of a Sophist must be either ridiculous or immoral². It is the only part of Plato's works wherein any account is rendered of the growth of that floating, uncertified, self-propagating, body of opinion, upon which the cross-examining analysis of Sokratēs is brought to bear—as will be seen in the following chapter.

¹ Plato, Protagoras, p. 320 D. c. 11 et seq., especially p. 322 D, where Protagoras lays it down that no man is fit to be a member of a social community who has not in his bosom both dike and aidos—that is, a sense of reciprocal obligation and right between himself and others—and a sensibility to esteem or reproach from others. He lays these fundamental attributes down as what a good ethical theory must assume or exact in every man.

² Of the unjust asperity and contempt with which the Platonic commentators treat the Sophists, see a specimen in Ast, Ueber Platons Leben und Schriften, p. 70, 71—where he comments on Protagoras and this fable.

Protagoras professes to teach his pupils "good counsel" in their domestic and family relations, as well as how to speak and act in the most effective manner for the weal of the city. Since this comes from Protagoras, the commentators of Plato pronounce it to be miserable morality: but it coincides, almost to the letter, with that which Isokratēs describes himself as teaching, a generation afterwards, and substantially even with that which Xenophon represents Sokratēs as teaching: nor is it easy to set forth, in a few words, a larger scheme of practical duty¹.

¹ Protagoras says—Τὸ δὲ μάθημά ἐστιν, εἰβουλία περὶ τε τῶν οἰκείων ὅπως ἂν ἄριστα τῶν αὐτοῦ οἰκίαν διακοί, καὶ περὶ τῶν τῆς πόλεως, ὅπως τὰ τῆς πόλεως διευτάτατος εἶη καὶ πρᾶτται καὶ λέγεται. (Plato, Protagoras, c. 9. p. 318 E.)

A similar description of the moral teaching of Protagoras and the other Sophists, yet comprising a still larger range of duties, towards parents, friends, and fellow-citizens in their private capacities—is given in Plato, Meno. p. 91 B, E.

Isokratēs describes the education which he wished to convey almost in the same words—Τοῖς τὰ τοιαῦτα μαθήματα καὶ μελετῶνται ἐξ ἑῶ καὶ τὸν οἴον οἶκος καὶ τὰ κοινὰ τὰ τῆς πόλεως καλῶς διακρίνονται, ὡς περ ἔπειτα καὶ ποιητέον καὶ φιλοσοφετέον καὶ πάντα πρακτέον ἐστὶ (Or. xv. De Permutat. s. 304: compare 289).

Xenophon also describes, almost in the same words, the teaching of Sokratēs. Kriton and others sought the society of Sokratēs, οἷα ἴσα δημογυρικοὶ ἢ δαιμονικοὶ γένοιτο, ἀλλ' ἴσα καλοὶ τε εὐγαθεὶ γινώσκοντες, καὶ οὐκ οἰκίσται καὶ οἰκείους καὶ φίλους καὶ πόλεις καὶ πολίτας δαίμονιο καλῶς χρῆσθαι (Memor. i. 2, 48). Again, i. 2, 64—Φανερόν ἦν Σωκράτην τῶν ἀνθρώπων τοῦτο πικρῆς ἐπιθυμίας ἔχοντα, τοῦτω μὲν παῖων, τῆς δὲ καλλίστης καὶ μεγαλοπρεπεστάτης ἀρετῆς, ἥ πόλεις τε καὶ οἶκοι εὖ οἰκοῦσι, προτρέπων ἐπιθυμῶν. Compare also i. 6, 15; ii. 1, 19; iv. 1, 2; iv. 5, 10.

When we perceive how much analogy Xenophon establishes—so far as regards practical precept, apart from theory or method—between Sokratēs, Protagoras, Prodikus, &c., it is difficult to justify the representations of the commentators respecting the Sophists: see Stallbaum, Proleg. ad Platon. Menon. p. 8. "Etenim virtutis nomen, cum propter ambiguitatem magnitudinem valde esset ambiguum et obscurum, Sophistae interpretabantur sic, ut, missa vera honestatis et probitatis vi, amice de prudentiâ civili ac domesticâ cogitari vellent, eoque modo totam vir-

And if the measure of practical duty, which Protagoras devoted himself to teach, was thus serious and extensive, even the fraction of theory assigned to him in his barangue, includes some points better than that of Plato himself. For Plato seems to have conceived the Ethical End, to each individual, as comprising nothing more than his own permanent happiness and moral health; and in this very dialogue, he introduces Sokratès as maintaining virtue to consist only in a right calculation of a man's own personal happiness and misery. But here we find Protagoras speaking in a way which implies a larger, and in my opinion, a juster, appreciation of the Ethical End, as including not only reference to a man's own happiness, but also obligations towards the happiness of others. Without at all agreeing in the harsh terms of censure which various critics pronounce upon that theory which Sokratès is made to set forth in the Platonic Protagoras, I consider his conception of the Ethical End essentially narrow and imperfect, not capable of being made to serve as basis for deduction of the best ethical precepts. Yet such is the prejudice with which the history of the Sophists has been written, that the tutem ad callidum quoddam utilitatis vel proutem vel publice consequenda artificium revocarent."....."Pervidit hanc opinionis istius perversitatem, ejusque turpitudinem intimo sensit pectore, vir sanctissimi animi, Socrates, &c." Stallbaum speaks to the same purpose in his Prolegomena to the Protagoras, p. 10, 11; and to the Euthydemus, p. 21, 22.

Those who, like these censors on the Sophists, think it base to recommend virtuous conduct by the mutual security and comfort which it procures to all parties, must be prepared to condemn on the same ground a large portion of what is said by Sokratès throughout the Memorabilia of Xenophon, Μὴ κατὰ πόλιν τὰς ἀνιστορίας ἀρδύειν, &c. (iii. 4. 12); see also his Economic xi. 10.

commentators on Plato accuse the Sophists of having originated what they ignorantly term "the base theory of utility," here propounded by Sokratēs himself; complimenting the latter on having set forth those larger views which in this dialogue belong only to Protagoras¹.

So far as concerns Protagoras, therefore, the evi-

¹ Stallbaum, Prolegomena ad Platonis Menonem, p. 9. "Etenim Sophistæ, quum virtutis exercitationem et ad utilitates externas referrent, et facultate quâdam atque consuetudine ejus, quod utile videretur, reperire, absolvi statuerent—Socrates ipse, rejectâ utilitatis turpitudinis, vim naturamque virtutis unice ad id quod bonum honestumque est, revocavit: voluitque esse in eo, ut quis recti bonique sensu ac scientiâ polleret, ad quam tanquam ad certissimam normam atque regulam actiones suas omnes dirigeret atque poneret."

Whoever will compare this criticism with the Protagoras of Plato, c. 36, 37—especially p. 357 B.—wherein Sokratēs identifies good with pleasure and evil with pain, and wherein he considers right conduct to consist in justly calculating the items of pleasure and pain one against the other—ἡ μετρίτης τέχνη—will be astonished how a critic on Plato could write what is above cited. I am aware that there are other parts of Plato's dialogues in which he maintains a doctrine different from that just alluded to. Accordingly Stallbaum (in his Prolegomena to the Protagoras, p. 30) contends that Plato is here setting forth a doctrine not his own, but is reasoning on the principles of Protagoras, for the purpose of entrapping and confounding him—"Que hic de fortitudine disceruntur, ea item cavendum est ne protenus pro decretis vere Platonici habeantur. Disputat enim Socrates plerumque omnia ad mentem ipsius Protagoræ, ita quidem ut eum per eam ipsius rationem in fraudem et errorem inducat."

I am happy to be able to vindicate Plato against the disgrace of so dishonest a spirit of argumentation as that which Stallbaum ascribes to him. Plato most certainly does not reason here upon the doctrines or principles of Protagoras; for the latter begins by positively denying the doctrine, and is only brought to admit it in a very qualified manner—c. 35, p. 351 D. He says in reply to the question of Sokratēs—Οὐκ εἶδα ἀπλῶς οὕτως, ὡς σὺ ἔρωτες, εἰ ἐμοὶ ἀποκρίσθαι ἔστιν, ὡς τὰ ἡδύα τε ἀγαθὰ ἐστὶν ἀπαντα καὶ τὰ ἀσφαρὲς κακά· ἀλλὰ μοὶ δοκεῖ οὐ μόνον πρὸς τὴν νῦν ἀποκρίσιν ἐμοὶ ἀσφαλέστερον εἶναι ἀπεκρίσθαι, ἀλλὰ καὶ πρὸς πάντα τοὺς ἄλλους ἕως τὸν ἐμὸν, ὅτι ἐστὶ μὲν ἡ τῶν ἡδύων οὐκ ἐστὶν ἀγαθὰ ἐστὶν δὲ καὶ ἡ τῶν ἀσφαρῶν οὐκ ἐστὶν κακά, ἐντὶ δὲ ἡ ἐστὶ, καὶ τρίτον δ' οὐδέτερον, οὕτε κακὰ οὗτ' ἀγαθὰ.

There is something peculiarly striking in this appeal of Protagoras to Hippias of Elis—how he is represented by Plato.

dence of Plato himself may be produced to show that he was not a corrupt teacher, but a worthy companion of Prodikus; worthy also of that which we know him to have enjoyed—the society and conversation of Periklês. Let us now examine what Plato says about a third Sophist—Hippias of Elis; who figures both in the dialogue called ‘Protagoras,’ and in two distinct dialogues known by the titles of ‘Hippias Major and Minor.’ Hippias is represented as distinguished for the wide range of his accomplishments, of which in these dialogues he ostentatiously boasts. He could teach astronomy, geometry, and arithmetic—which subjects Protagoras censured him for enforcing too much upon his pupils; so little did these Sophists agree in any one scheme of doctrine or education. Besides this, he was a poet, a musician, an expositor of the poets, and a lecturer with a large stock of composed matter—on subjects moral, political, and even legendary—treasured up in a very retentive memory. He was a citizen much employed as envoy by his fellow-citizens: to crown all, his manual dexterity was such that he professed to have made with his own hands all the attire and ornaments which he wore on his person. If, as is sufficiently probable, he was a vain and his whole past life, as rendering it impossible for him to admit what he evidently looked upon as a base theory, as Stallbaum pronounces it to be. Yet the latter actually ventures to take it away from Sokratês, who not only propounds it confidently, but reasons it out in a clear and forcible manner—and of fastening it on Protagoras, who first disclaims it and then only admits it under reserve! I deny the theory to be base, though I think it an imperfect theory of ethics. But Stallbaum, who calls it so, was bound to be doubly careful in looking into his proof before he ascribed it to any one. What makes the case worse, is that he fastens it not only on Protagoras, but on the Sophists collectively, by that monstrous fiction which treats them as a doctrinal sect.

ostentatious man—defects not excluding an useful and honourable career—we must at the same time give him credit for a variety of acquisitions such as to explain a certain measure of vanity¹. The style in which Plato handles Hippias is very different from that in which he treats Protagoras. It is full of sneer and contemptuous banter, insomuch that even Stallbaum², after having repeated a great many times that this was a vile Sophist who deserved no better treatment, is forced to admit that the petulance is carried rather too far, and to suggest that the dialogue must have been a juvenile work of Plato. Be this as it may, amidst so much unfriendly handling, not only we find no imputation against Hippias of having preached a low or corrupt morality, but Plato inserts that which furnishes good, though indirect, proof of the contrary. For Hippias is made to say that he had already delivered, and was about to deliver again, a lecture composed by himself with great care, wherein he enlarged upon the aims and pursuits which a young man ought to follow. The scheme of his discourse was, that after the capture of Troy, the youthful Neoptolemus was introduced as asking the advice of Nestor about his own future conduct; in reply to which, Nestor sets forth to him what was the plan of life incumbent on a young man of honourable aspirations, and unfolds to him the full details of regulated and virtuous conduct by which it ought to be filled up¹. The selection of two such names, among the most venerated in all Grecian legend, as monitor and pupil, is a stamp clearly attesting the vein of sentiment which animated the composition. Morality preached by Nestor for the edification of Neoptolemus, might possibly be too high for Athenian practice; but most certainly it would not err on the side of corruption, selfishness, or over-indulgence. We may fairly presume that this discourse composed by Hippias would not be unworthy, in spirit and purpose, to be placed by the side of 'The Choice of Hercules,' nor its author by that of Prodikus as a moral teacher.

¹ See about Hippias, Plato, Protagoras, c. 9. p. 318 E.; Stallbaum, Prolegom. ad Platon. Hipp. Maj. p. 147 seq.; Cicero, de Orator. iii. 33; Plato, Hipp. Minor, c. 10. p. 368 B.

² Stallbaum, Proleg. ad Plat. Hipp. Maj. p. 130.

Gorgias,
Pölus, and Kalliklès.

The dialogue entitled 'Gorgias' in Plato, is carried on by Sokratès with three different persons one after the other—Gorgias, Pölus, and Kalliklès. Gorgias (of Leontini in Sicily) as a rhetorical teacher, acquired greater celebrity than any man of his time, during the Peloponnesian war: his abundant powers of illustration, his florid ornaments, his artificial structure of sentences distributed into exact antithetical fractions—all spread a new fashion in the art of speaking, which for the time was very popular, but afterwards became discredited. If the line could be clearly drawn between rhetors and sophists, Gorgias ought rather to be ranked with the former¹. In the conversation with Gorgias, Sokratès exposes the fallacy and imposture of rhetoric and rhetorical teaching, as cheating an ignorant audience into persuasion without knowledge, and as framed to satisfy the passing caprice, without any regard to the permanent welfare and improvement of the people. Whatever real inculcation may be conveyed in these arguments against a rhetorical teacher, Gorgias must bear in common with Isokratēs and Quintilian, and under the shield of Aristotle. But save and except rhetorical teaching, no dissemination of corrupt morality is ascribed to him by Plato; who indeed treats him with a degree of respect which surprises the commentators¹.

¹ Plato, Menon, p. 95 A.; Foss, De Gorgia Leontino, p. 27 seq.

The tone of the dialogue changes materially when it passes to Pōlus and Kalliklēs, the former of whom is described as a writer on rhetoric, and probably a teacher also². There is much insolence in Pōlus, and no small asperity in Sokratēs. Yet the former maintains no arguments which justify the charge of immorality against himself or his fellow-teachers. He defends the tastes and sentiments common to every man in Greece, and shared even by the most estimable Athenians—Periklēs, Nīkias, and Aristokratēs³; while Sokratēs prides himself on standing absolutely alone, and having no support except from his irresistible dialectics, whereby he is sure of extorting reluctant admission from his adversary.

Doctrine
advanced by Pōlus.

¹ See the observations of Groen van Prinsterer and Stallbaum—Stallbaum ad Platon. Gorg. c. 1.

² Plato, Gorgias, c. 17. p. 462 B.

³ Plato, Gorgias, c. 27. p. 472 A. Καὶ εἷν (αὐτὰς) Sokratēs) περὶ ὧν σὺ λέγεις εὐρίων σοι πάντες συμφέρονται ταῖτα Ἀθηναῖοι καὶ ξένοι—μαρτυρήσουσι σοι, ὡς μὲν Βούλῃ, Νικίας ὁ Νικηράτου καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ μετ' αὐτοῦ—ὡς δὲ Βούλῃ, Ἀριστοκράτην ὁ Σκελλίου—ὡς δὲ Βούλῃ, ὁ Περικλῆς ὅλος οἰκία, ἡ ἅλλη συγγένεια, ἥτινα δὲ Βούλῃ εἴς ἐσθλὰ ἐκέλευσθαι. Ἄλλ' ἐγὼ σοι εἶς ὧν οὐχ ὁμολογῶ..... Ἐγὼ δὲ δὲ μὴ σὶ αὐτὸς εἶνα δοῦναι μάρτυρα παρήσχωμι ὁμολογοῦντα περὶ ὧν λέγω, αὐδὲν ὁμοῦ ἀξίον λόγον μοι πεπερασθαι περὶ ὧν ἂν ἡμῖν ὁ λόγος ᾖ.

How far Sokratês may be right, I do not now inquire: it is sufficient that Pôlus, standing as he does amidst company at once so numerous and so irreproachable, cannot be fairly denounced as a poisoner of the youthful mind.

Doctrines advanced by Kalliklês—anti-social.

Pôlus presently hands over the dialogue to Kalliklês, who is here represented, doubtless, as laying down doctrines openly and avowedly anti-social. He distinguishes between the law of nature and the law (both written and unwritten, for the Greek word substantially includes both) of society. According to the law of nature (Kalliklês says) the strong man—the better or more capable man—puts forth his strength to the full for his own advantage, without limit or restraint; overcomes the resistance which weaker men are able to offer; and seizes for himself as much as he pleases of the matter of enjoyment. He has no occasion to restrain any of his appetites or desires; the more numerous and pressing they are, so much the better for him—since his power affords him the means of satiating them all. The many, who have the misfortune to be weak, must be content with that which he leaves them, and submit to it as best they can. This (Kalliklês says) is what actually happens in a state of nature; this is what is accounted just, as is evident by the practice of independent communities, not included in one common political society, towards each other; this is justice, by nature, or according to the law of nature. But when men come into society, all this is reversed. The majority of individuals know very well that they are weak, and that their only chance of security or comfort consists in establishing laws to restrain the strong man, reinforced by a moral sanction of praise and blame devoted to the same general end. They catch him like a young lion whilst his mind is yet tender, and fascinate him by talk and training into a disposition conformable to that measure and equality which the law enjoins. Here, then, is justice according to the law of society; a factitious system built up by the many for their own protection and happiness, to the subversion of the law of nature, which arms the strong man with a right to encroachment and license. Let a fair opportunity occur, and the favourite of Nature will be seen to kick off his harness, tread down the laws, break through the magic circle of opinion around him, and stand forth again as lord and master of the many; regaining that glorious position which nature has assigned to him as his right. Justice by nature—and justice by law and society—are thus, according to Kalliklès, not only distinct, but mutually contradictory. He accuses Sokratès of having jumbled the two together in his argument¹.

It has been contended by many authors that this anti-social reasoning (true enough, in so far as it states simple² matter-of-fact and probability—im-

Kalliklès is not a Sophist.

¹ This doctrine asserted by Kalliklès will be found in Plato, Gorgias, c. 39, 40, p. 483, 484.

² See the same matter-of-fact strongly stated by Sokratès in the Memorab. of Xenophon, ii. 1, 13.

persons called Sophists at Athens¹. I deny this assertion emphatically. Even if I had no other evidence to sustain my denial, except what has been already extracted, from the unfriendly writings of Plato himself, respecting Protagoras and Hippias—with what we know from Xenophon about Prodikus—I should consider my case made out as vindicating the Sophists generally from such an accusation. If ¹ Schleiermacher (in the Prolegomena to his translation of the Theætetus, p. 183) represents that Plato intended to refute Aristippus in the person of Kalliklēs; which supposition he sustains by remarking that Aristippus affirmed that there was no such thing as justice by nature, but only by law and convention. But the affirmation of Kalliklēs is the direct contrary of that which Schleiermacher ascribes to Aristippus. Kalliklēs not only does not deny justice by nature, but affirms it in the most direct manner—explains what it is, that it consists in the right of the strongest man to make use of his strength without any regard to others—and puts it above the justice of law and society, in respect to authority.

Ritter and Brandis are yet more incorrect in their accusations of the Sophists, founded upon this same doctrine. The former says (p. 581)—“It is affirmed as a common tenet of the Sophists—there is no right by nature, but only by convention:” compare Brandis, p. 521. The very passages to which these writers refer, as far as they prove anything, prove the contrary of what they assert: and Præller actually imputes the contrary tenet to the Sophists (Histor. Philosoph. v. 4. p. 130, Hamburg 1838) with just as little authority. Both Ritter and Brandis charge the Sophists with wickedness for this alleged tenet—for denying that there was any right by nature, and allowing no right except by convention; a doctrine which had been maintained before them by Amphilochus (Diogen. Laert. ii. 16). Now Plato (Legg. x. p. 889), whom these writers refer to, charges certain wise men—σοφῶς ἰδωμεν et sol σοφῶν (he does not mention Sophists)—with wickedness, but on the ground directly opposite: because they did acknowledge a right by nature, of greater authority than the right laid down by the legislator; and because they encouraged pupils to follow this supposed right of nature, disobeying the law; interpreting the right of nature as Kalliklēs does in the Gorgias!

Teachers are thus branded as wicked men by Ritter and Brandis, for the negative, and by Plato (if he here means the Sophists), for the affirmative doctrine.

refutation to the doctrine of Kalliklès were needed, it would be obtained quite as efficaciously from Prodikus and Protagoras as from Sokratès and Plato.

But this is not the strongest part of the vindication.

First, Kalliklès himself is not a Sophist, nor represented by Plato as such. He is a young Athenian citizen, of rank and station, belonging to the deme Acharnæ; he is intimate with other young men of condition in the city, has recently entered into active political life, and bends his whole soul towards it; he disparages philosophy, and speaks with utter contempt about the Sophists¹. If then it were even just (which I do not admit) to infer from opinions put into the mouth of one Sophist, that the same were held by another or by all of them—it would not be the less unjust to draw the like inference from opinions professed by one who is not a Sophist, and who despises the whole profession.

Secondly, if any man will read attentively the course of the dialogue, he will see that the doctrine of Kalliklès is such as no one dared publicly to propound. So it is conceived both by Kalliklès himself, and by Sokratès. The former first takes up the conversation by saying that his predecessor Pôlus had become entangled in a contradiction, because he had not courage enough openly to announce an unpopular and odious doctrine; but he (Kalliklès) was less shamefaced, and would speak out

The doctrine put into his mouth could never have been laid down in any public lecture among the Athenians.

¹ Plato, Gorgias, c. 37. p. 481 D; c. 41. p. 485 B, D; c. 42. p. 487 C; c. 50. p. 495 B; c. 70. p. 515 A. οὐ μὲν γὰρ αὐτὸς ἀρετὴν ἀρχὴν κηρύττειν τὰ τῶν σοφιστῶν πεινυμένα: compare c. 55. p. 500 C. His contempt for the Sophists, c. 75. p. 519 E, with the note of Heindorf.

boldly that doctrine which others kept to themselves for fear of shocking the hearers. "Certainly (says Sokratēs to him) your audacity is abundantly shown by the doctrine which you have just laid down—you set forth plainly that which other people think, but do not choose to utter¹." Now, opinions of which Pōlus, an insolent young man, was afraid to proclaim himself the champion, must have been revolting indeed to the sentiments of hearers. How then can any reasonable man believe, that such opinions were not only openly propounded, but seriously inculcated as truth upon audiences of youthful hearers, by the Sophists? We know that the teaching of the latter was public in the highest degree; publicity was pleasing as well as profitable to them; among the many disparaging epithets heaped upon them, ostentation and vanity are two of the most conspicuous. Whatever they taught, they taught publicly; and I contend, with full conviction, that had they even agreed with Kalliklēs in this opinion, they could neither have been sufficiently audacious, nor sufficiently their own enemies, to make it a part of their public teaching; but would have acted like Pôlus, and kept the doctrine to themselves.

¹ Plato, Gorgias, c. 38. p. 482 E. ἐν ταύτῃ γὰρ αὐτῇ τῇ δολογίᾳ αὐτὸς ἐπὶ αὐτῷ ἀποδοκιμασιὴν ἐν τοῖς λόγοις ἐπιστομίσθη (Pōlus), ἀσχυθεὶς δ' ἐνταῦθα εἰπεῖν σὺ γὰρ τῷ ὄντι, ὦ Σόκρατες, εἰς τοιαῦτα λέγεις φαρτικά καὶ δημηγορικά, φέροντες τῇ ἀλήθειᾳ ὀφείλουσιν..... ὥστε οὐκ οὐκ αἰσχύνεται καὶ μὴ τολμᾷ λέγειν ἑπεὶ σοὶ, ἀπαρτίζονται ἐνταῦθα λέγοντες.

Καὶ μὴν (says Sokratēs to Kalliklēs, c. 42. p. 487 D.) ὅτι γε οἱ αἱ παρρησιαίεσθαι καὶ μὴ αἰσχύνεσθαι, αὐτοῖς τε φησὶ, καὶ ὁ λόγος, ἐν πολλοῖς πρότερον ἔλεγε, δολογίᾳ σοι. Again, c. 47. p. 492 D. Οὐκ ἔγωγε γε, ὦ Καλλικλέης, ἐπιτίσχει τῷ λόγῳ παρρησιαζόμενος σαφῶς γὰρ σὺ κῦν λέγεις ὅτι οἱ ἄλλοι διακροῦνται μὲν, λέγειν δὲ αὐτὸν ὀφείλουσιν.

Again, from Kalliklēs—ὁ ἐγὼ σοὶ τὸ παρρησιαζόμενος λέγω—c. 46. p. 491 E.

Thirdly, this latter conclusion will be rendered doubly certain, when we consider of what city we are now speaking. Of all places in the world, the democratical Athens is the last in which the doctrine advanced by Kalliklês could possibly have been professed by a public teacher; or even by Kalliklês himself, in any public meeting. It is unnecessary to remind the reader how profoundly democratical was the sentiment and morality of the Athenians—how much they loved their laws, their constitution, and their political equality—how jealous their apprehension was of any nascent or threatening despotism. All this is not simply admitted, but even exaggerated, by Mr. Mitford, Wachsmuth, and other anti-democratical writers, who often draw from it materials for their abundant censures. Now the very point which Sokratês (in this dialogue called 'Gorgias') seeks to establish against Kalliklês, against the Rhetors, and against the Sophists,—is, that they courted, flattered, and truckled to the sentiment of the Athenian people, with degrading subservience; that they looked to the immediate gratification simply, and not to permanent moral improvement of the people—that they had not courage to address to them any unpalatable truths, however salutary, but would shift and modify opinions in every way so as to escape giving offence¹—that no man who put himself prominently forward at Athens had any chance of success, unless he became moulded and assimilated, from the core, to the people and their type of sentiment¹. Granting such charges to be true, how is it conceivable that any Sophist, or any Rhetor, could venture to enforce upon an Athenian public audience the doctrine laid down by Kalliklès? To tell such an audience—"Your laws and institutions are all violations of the law of nature, contrived to disappoint the Alkibiadès or Napoleon among you of his natural right to become your master, and to deal with you petty men as his slaves. All your unnatural precautions, and conventional talk, in favour of legality and equal dealing, will turn out to be nothing better than pitiful impotence², as soon as he finds a good opportunity of standing forward in his full might and energy—so as to put you into your proper places, and show you what privileges Nature intends for her favourites!" Conceive such a doctrine propounded by a lecturer to assembled Athenians! A doctrine just as revolting to Nikias passage of the Gorgias, c. 37, p. 451 D, E, the substance of which is thus stated by Stallbaum in his note—"Carpit Socrates Calliclès levitatem, mobili populi turbæ nunquam non blandientis et aulantis."

¹ This quality is imputed by Sokratês to Kalliklês in a remarkable

It is one of the main points of Sokratès in the dialogue, to make out that the practice (for he will not call it an art) of Sophists, as well as Rhetors, aims at nothing but the immediate gratification of the people, without any regard to their ultimate or durable benefit—that they are branches of the widely-extended knack of flattery (Gorgias, c. 19, p. 464 D; c. 20, p. 465 C; c. 56, p. 501 C; c. 75, p. 520 B).

¹ Plato, Gorgias, c. 68, p. 513. Οὐ γὰρ μιστὴρ δεῖ εἶναι, ἀλλ' αὐτοφῶνι ὁμοίον τούτοις, εἰ μέλλει τι γνηστὸν ἀπεργάζεσθαι εἰς φιλίαν τῷ Ἀθηναίῳ δήμῳ..... Οὗτοι οὖν πε τούτους ὁμοειδέτατοι ἀπεργάζονται, οἷός τε ποιῆσαι, δεῖ ἐπιδιδόναι πολιτικῶς εἶναι, πολιτικῶς καὶ ῥητορικῶς τῷ αὐτῶν γὰρ ἔστι λεγόμενον τῶν λόγων ἱκανοὶ χεῖρουσι, τῷ δὲ ἀλλοτρίῳ ἀχθῆναι.

² Plato, Gorgias, c. 46, p. 492 C (the words of Kalliklès). Τὰ δὲ ἄλλα ταῦτα ὄντι τὰ καλλυπνίσματα, τὰ παρὰ φύσιν ζυνθήματα, ἀνθρώπων φλυαρία καὶ ἀλλοτρία ἔστιν.

as to Kleon, and which even Alkibiadès would be forced to affect to disapprove; since it is not simply anti-popular—not simply despotic—but the drunken extravagance of despotism. The Great man as depicted by Kalliklès stands in the same relation to ordinary mortals, as Jonathan Wild the Great in the admirable parody of Fielding.

That Sophists, whom Plato accuses of slavish flattery to the democratical ear, should gratuitously insult it by the proposition of such tenets—is an assertion not merely untrue, but utterly absurd. Even as to Sokratès, we know from Xenophon how much the Athenians were offended with him, and how much it was urged by the accusers on his trial, that in his conversations he was wont to cite with peculiar relish the description (in the second book of the Iliad) of Odysseus following the Grecian crowd when running away from the agora to get on ship-board, and prevailing upon them to come back—by gentle words addressed to the chiefs, but by blows of his stick, accompanied with contemptuous reprimand, to the common people. The indirect evidence thus afforded that Sokratès countenanced unequal dealing and ill-usage towards the Many, told much against him in the minds of the Dikasts. What would they have felt then towards a Sophist who publicly professed the political morality of Kalliklès? The truth is—not only was it impossible that any such morality, or any thing of the same type even much diluted, could find its way into the educational lectures of professors at Athens,—but the fear would be in the opposite direction. If the Sophist erred in either way, it would be in that which Sokratès imputes—by making his lectures over-democratical. Nay, if we suppose any opportunity to have arisen of discussing the doctrine of Kalliklês, he would hardly omit to flatter the ears of the surrounding democrats by enhancing the beneficent results of legality and equal dealing, and by denouncing this "natural despot" or undisclosed Napoleon as one who must either take his place under such restraints, or find a place in some other city.

I have thus shown, even from Plato himself, that the doctrine ascribed to Kalliklês neither did enter, nor could have entered, into the lectures of a Sophist or professed teacher. The same conclusion may be maintained respecting the doctrine of Thrasymachus in the first book of the 'Republic.' Thrasymachus was a rhetorical teacher, who had devised precepts respecting the construction of an oration and the training of young men for public speaking. It is most probable that he confined himself, like Gorgias, to this department, and that he did not profess to give moral lectures, like Protagoras and Prodikus. But granting him to have given such, he would not talk about justice in the way in which Plato makes him talk, if he desired to give any satisfaction to an Athenian audience. The mere brutality and ferocious impudence of demeanour, even to exaggeration, with which Plato invests him—is in itself a strong proof that the doctrine, ushered in with such a preface, was not that of a popular and acceptable teacher, winning favour in public audiences. He defines justice to be "the interest of the superior power; that rule, which, in every society, the dominant power prescribes, as being for its own advantage." A man is just (he says) for the advan-

Doctrine of Thrasymachus in the 'Republic' of Plato.

tage of another, not for his own : he is weak, cannot help himself, and must submit to that which the stronger authority, whether despot, oligarchy, or commonwealth, commands.

The theory is essentially different from the doctrine of Kalliklès, as set forth a few pages back ; for Thrasymachus does not travel out of society to insist upon anterior rights dating from a supposed state of nature—he takes societies as he finds them, recognizing the actual governing authority of each as the canon and constituent of justice or injustice. Stallbaum and other writers have incautiously treated the two theories as if they were the same ; and with something even worse than want of caution, while they pronounce the theory of Thrasymachus to be detestably immoral, announce it as having been propounded not by him only, but by The Sophists—thus, in their usual style, dealing with the Sophists as if they were a school, sect, or partnership with mutual responsibility. Whoever has followed the evidence which I have produced respecting Protagoras and Prodikus, will know how differently these latter handled the question of justice.

But the truth is, that the theory of Thrasymachus, though incorrect and defective, is not so detestable as these writers represent. What makes it seem detestable, is, the style and manner in which he is made to put it forward, which causes the just man to appear petty and contemptible, while it surrounds the unjust man with enviable attributes. Now this is precisely the circumstance which revolts the common sentiments of mankind, as it revolts also the critics who read what is said by Thrasymachus. The moral sentiments exist in men's minds in complex and powerful groups, associated with some large words and emphatic forms of speech. Whether an ethical theory satisfies the exigences of reason, or commands and answers to all the phenomena—a common audience will seldom give themselves the trouble to consider with attention: but what they imperiously exact—and what is indispensable to give the theory any chance of success, is, that it shall exhibit to their feelings the just man as respectable and dignified, and the unjust man as odious and repulsive. Now that which offends in the language ascribed to Thrasymachus, is, not merely the absence, but the reversal, of this condition—the presentation of the just man as weak and silly, and of injustice in all the prestige of triumph and dignity. And for this very reason I venture to infer that such a theory was never propounded by Thrasymachus to any public audience in the form in which it appears in Plato. For Thrasymachus was a rhetor, who had studied the principles of his art: now we know that these common sentiments of an audience, were precisely what the rhetors best understood, and always strove to conciliate. Even from the time of Gorgias, they began the practice of composing beforehand declamations upon the general heads of morality, which were ready to be introduced into actual speeches as occasion presented itself, and in which appeal was made to the moral sentiments foreknown as common, with more or less of modification, to all the Grecian assemblies. The real Thrasymachus, addressing any audience at Athens, would never have wounded these sentiments, as the Platonic Thrasymachus is made to do in the 'Republic.' Least of all would he have done this, if it be true of him, as Plato asserts of the Rhetors and Sophists generally, that they thought about nothing but courting popularity, without any sincerity of conviction.

Such doctrine not common to all the Sophists—what is offensive in it is, the manner in which it is put forward.

Though Plato thinks fit to bring out the opinion of Thrasy-machus with accessories unnecessarily offensive, and thus to enhance the dialectical triumph of Sokratēs by the brutal manners of the adversary—he was well-aware that he had not done justice to the opinion itself, much less confuted it. The proof of this is, that in the second book of the 'Republic,' after Thrasy-machus has disappeared, the very same opinion is taken up by Glaukon and Adeimantus, and set forth by both of them (though they disclaim entertaining it as their own), as suggesting grave doubts and difficulties which they desire to hear solved by Sokratēs. Those who read attentively the discourses of Glaukon and Adeimantus, will see that the substantive opinion ascribed to Thrasy-machus, apart from the brutality with which he is made to state it, does not even countenance the charge of immoral teaching against him—much less against the Sophists generally. Hardly anything in Plato's compositions is more powerful than those discourses. They present in a perspicuous and forcible manner, some of the most serious difficulties with which ethical theory is required to grapple. And Plato can answer them only in one way—by taking society to pieces, and reconstructing it in the form of his imaginary republic. The speeches of Glaukon and Adeimantus form the immediate preface to the striking and elaborate description which he goes through, of his new state of society; nor do they receive any other answer than what is implied in that description. Plato indirectly confesses that he cannot answer them, assuming social institutions to continue unreformed; and his reform is sufficiently fundamental¹.

Opinion of Thrasy-machus afterwards brought out by Glaukon—with less brutality, and much greater force of reason.

I omitted to notice the Dialogue of Plato entitled Euthydemus, wherein Sokratēs is introduced in conversation with the two persons called Sophists, Euthydemus and Dionysodoros, who are represented as propounding a number of verbal quibbles, assertions of double sense, arising from equivocal grammar or syntax—fallacies of mere diction, without the least plausibility as to the sense—specimens of jest and hoax (p. 278 B.). They are described as extravagantly conceited, while Sokratēs is painted with his usual affectation of deference and modesty. He himself, during a part of the dialogue, carries on conversation in his own dialectical manner with the youthful Kleinias; who is then handed over to be taught by Euthydemus and Dionysodoros; so that the contrast between their style of questioning, and that of Sokratēs, is forcibly brought out.

To bring out this contrast, appears to me the main purpose of the dialogue—as has already been remarked by Socher and others (see Stallbaum, Prolegom. ad Euthydem. pp. 15-65): but its construction, its manner, and its result (previous to the concluding conversation between Sokratēs and Kriton separately), is so thoroughly comic, that Ast, on this and other grounds, rejects it as spurious and unworthy of Plato (see Ast, über Platons Leben und Schriften, p. 414-418).

Without agreeing in Ast's inference, I recognise the violence of the caricature which Plato has here presented under the characters of Euthydemus and Dionysodoros. And it is for this reason, among many others, that I protest the more emphatically against the injustice of Stallbaum and the commentators generally, who consider these two persons as disciples of Protagoras, and samples of what is called "Sophistica"—the Sophistical Practice—the Sophists generally. There is not the smallest ground for considering these two men as disciples of Protagoras, who is presented to us, even by Plato himself, under an aspect as totally different from them as it is possible to imagine. Euthydemus and Dionysodoros are described, by Plato himself in this very dialogue, as old men who had been fencing-masters, and who had only within the last two years applied themselves to the eristic or controversial dialogue (Euthyd. c. I. p. 272 C.; c. 3. p. 273 E.). Schleiermacher himself accounts their personal importance so mean, that he thinks Plato could not have intended to attack them, but meant to attack Antisthenes and the Megaric school of philosophers (Prolegom. ad Euthydem. vol. iii. p. 403, 404, of his translation of Plato). So con-

I call particular attention to this circumstance, without which we cannot fairly estimate the Sophists, or practical teachers of Athens, face to face with their accuser-general—Plato. He was a great and systematic theorist, whose opinions on ethics, politics, cognition, religion, &c., were all wrought into harmony by his own mind, and stamped with that peculiarity which is the mark of an original intellect. So splendid an effort of speculative genius is among the marvels of the Grecian world. His dissent from all the societies which he saw around him, not merely democratical, but oligarchical and despotic also, was of the deepest and most radical character.

Plato
against the Sophists
generally.
His category of accusation compre-hends all society, with all the poets and statesmen.

temptible does Plato esteem them, that Krito blames Sokratēs for having so far degraded himself as to be seen talking with them before many persons (p. 305 B. c. 30).

The name of Protagoras occurs only once in the dialogue, in reference to the doctrine, started by Euthydemus, that false propositions or contradictory propositions were impossible, because no one could either think about, or talk about, that which was not or the non-existent (p. 284 A; 285 C.). This doctrine is said by Sokratēs to have been much talked of "by Protagoras and by men yet earlier than he." It is idle to infer from such a passage any connection or analogy between these men and Protagoras—as Stallbaum labours to do throughout his Prolegomena; affirming (in his note on p. 285 C.) most incorrectly, that Protagoras maintained this doctrine about τὸ μὴ ᾗ or the non-existent, because he had too great faith in the evidence of the senses—whereas we know from Plato that it had its rise with Parmenidēs, who rejected the evidence of the senses entirely (see Plato, Sophist. 24. p. 237 A. with Heindorf and Stallbaum's notes). Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 8, 53) falsely asserts that Protagoras was the first to broach the doctrine, and even cites as his witness Plato in the Euthydemus, where the exact contrary is stated. Whoever broached it first—it was a doctrine following plausibly from the then received Realism, and Plato was long perplexed before he could solve the difficulty to his own satisfaction (Thaet. p. 187 D.).

I do not doubt that there were in Athens persons who abused the dialectical exercise for frivolous puzzles, and it was well for Plato to compose a dialogue exhibiting the contrast between these men and Sokratēs. But to treat Euthydemus and Dionysodorus as samples of "The Sophists," is altogether unwarranted.

Nor did he delude himself by the belief, that any partial amendment of that which he saw around could bring about the end which he desired: he looked to nothing short of a new genesis of the man and the citizen, with institutions calculated from the beginning to work out the full measure of perfectibility. His fertile scientific imagination realized this idea in the 'Republic.' But that very systematic and original character, which lends so much value and charm to the substantive speculations of Plato, counts as a deduction from his trustworthiness as critic or witness, in reference to the living agents whom he saw at work in Athens and other cities, as statesmen, generals, or teachers. His criticisms are dictated by his own point of view, according to which the entire society was corrupt, and all the instruments who carried on its functions were of essentially base metal. Whoever will read either the 'Gorgias' or the 'Republic,' will see in how sweeping and indiscriminate a manner he passes his sentence of condemnation. Not only all the Sophists and all the Rhetors¹—but all the musicians and dithyrambic or tragic poets—all the statesmen, past as well as present, not excepting even the great Periklēs—receive from his hands one common stamp of dishonour. Every one of these men are numbered by Plato among the numerous category of flatterers, who minister to the immediate gratification and to the desires of the people, without looking to their permanent improvement, or making them morally better. "Periklēs and Kimon (says Sokratēs in the 'Gorgias') are nothing but servants or ministers who supply the immediate appetites and tastes of the people; just as the baker and the confectioner do in their respective departments, without knowing or caring whether the food will do any real good—a point which the physician alone can determine. As ministers, they are clever enough: they have provided the city amply with tribute, walls, docks, ships, and such other follies: but I (Sokratês) am the only man in Athens who aim, so far as my strength permits, at the true purpose of politics—the mental improvement of the people¹. So wholesale a condemnation betrays itself as the offspring, and the consistent offspring, of systematic peculiarity of vision—the prejudice of a great and able mind.

¹ Plato, Gorgias, c. 57, 58, p. 502, 503.

It would be not less unjust to appreciate the Sophists or the statesmen of Athens from the point of view of Plato, than the present teachers and politicians of England or France from that of Mr. Owen or Fourier. Both the one and the other class laboured

It is unjust to try either the Sophists, or the statesmen of Athens, by the standard of Plato.

¹ Plato, Gorgias, c. 72, 73, p. 517 (Sokratês speaks). 'Ἀληθεὶς ἄνθρωπος ἐμπροσθεν λόγου ἦσαν, ὅτι αὐτοὶ ἡμεῖς ἴσμεν ἄνθρωποι ἀγαθὸν γεγονότα τὰ πολιτικά ἐν τῇδε τῇ πόλει.

'Ὁ δαιμόνιος, οὐδ' ἐγὼ φέγω τοῦτον (Periklēs and Kimon) οὐ γὰρ διακρίναντε εἴνα πύλαι, ἀλλὰ μοι δοκοῖσι τῶν γε τῶν διακοσιώτεροι γεγονότων καὶ μύλλων αὐτῇ τε ἐμπορίῃ τῇ πόλει ὡς ἐπιφέρει. Ἀλλὰ γὰρ μεταβιβάζειν τὰς ἐπιθιμίας καὶ μὴ ἐπιτρέψαι, πείθοντες καὶ βιαζόμενοι ἐπὶ τούτῳ, ὅθεν ἡμεῖς ἡμεῖς ἴσμεν οἱ πολῖται, ὅς ἐστις εἰς αὐτὸν, οὐδὲν τιτύει διέφορος ἐκείνου. ὅπερ μόνον ἔργον ἐστὶ ἀγαθὸν πολιτοῦ.

'Ἄνευ γὰρ σωφροσύνης καὶ δικαιοσύνης, λιμέντες καὶ τείχων καὶ ναυῶν καὶ φόρων καὶ τοιοῦτων φθναριῶν ἐμπληθύνει τὴν πόλιν (c. 74, p. 519 A.).

Ὁλῆμι (says Sokratês, c. 77, p. 521 D.) μετ' ἀλόγων Ἀθηναίων, ὅτι μὴ εἴπω μῖσος, ἐπιχειρῶν τῇ ὡς ἀληθῶς πολιτικῇ τέξει καὶ πράττειν τὰ πολιτικά μόνον τῶν τῶν, ὅτε αὐτὸς αὐτὸς πρὸς χάριν λέγειν τὰς λόγους αὐτὸς λέγει ἐκδοῦναι, ἀλλὰ πρὸς τὸ βέλτερον, αὐτὸς πρὸς τὸ βέλτερον, ὅς.

for society as it stood at Athens: the statesmen carried on the business of practical politics, the Sophist trained up youth for practical life in all its departments, as family men, citizens, and leaders—to obey as well as to command. Both accepted the system as it stood, without contemplating the possibility of a new birth of society: both ministered to certain exigences, held their anchorage upon certain sentiments, and bowed to a certain morality, actually felt among the living men around them. That which Plato says of the statesmen of Athens is perfectly true—that they were only servants or ministers of the people. He, who tried the people and the entire society by comparison with an imaginary standard of his own, might deem all these ministers worthless in the lump, as carrying on a system too bad to be mended; but nevertheless the difference between a competent and an incompetent minister—between Periklēs and Nikias—was of unspeakable moment to the security and happiness of the Athenians. What the Sophists on their part undertook was, to educate young men so as to make them better qualified for statesmen or ministers; and Protagoras would have thought it sufficient honour to himself—as well as sufficient benefit to Athens, which assuredly it would have been—if he could have inspired any young Athenian with the soul and the capacities of his friend and companion Periklēs.

So far is Plato from considering the Sophists as the corruptors of Athenian morality, that he distinctly protests against that supposition, in a remarkable passage of the 'Republic.' It is (he says) the whole people, or the society, with its established morality, intelligence, and tone of sentiment, which is intrinsically vicious; the teachers of such a society must be vicious also, otherwise their teaching would not be received; and even if their private teaching were ever so good, its effect would be washed away, except in some few privileged natures, by the overwhelming deluge of pernicious social influences¹. Nor let any one imagine (as modern readers are but too ready to understand it) that this poignant censure is intended for Athens so far forth as a democracy. Plato was not the man to preach king-worship, or wealth-worship, as social or political remedies: he declares emphatically that not one of the societies then existing was such that a truly philosophical nature could be engaged in active functions under it². These passages would be alone sufficient to repel the assertions of those who denounce the Sophists as poisoners of Athenian morality, on the alleged authority of Plato.

Plato distinctly denies that Athenian corruption was to be imputed to the Sophists.

Nor is it at all more true that they were men of mere words, and made their pupils no better—a charge just as vehemently pressed against Sokratēs

The Sophists were not teachers of mere words, apart from action.

¹ This passage is in Republ. vi. 6. p. 492 seq. I put the first words of the passage (which is too long to be cited, but which richly deserves to be read, entire) in the translation given by Stallbaum in his note.

Sokratēs says to Adeimantus—"An tu quoque putas esse quidem sophistas, homines privatos, qui corrumpunt juventutem in quacunque re mentione dignā; nec illud tamen animadvertisti et tibi persuasisti, quod multo magis debebas, ipsos Athenienses turpissimos esse aliorum corruptores?"

Yet the commentator who translates this passage, does not scruple (in his Prolegomena to the Republic, p. xlv, xlv, as well as to the Dialogus) to heap upon the Sophists aggravated charges, as the actual corruptors of Athenian morality.

² Plato, Republ. vi. 11. p. 497 B. μηδὲ πῶς ἀγίως εἶνα τὰς τῶν σοφιστῶν τοῦ φιλοσόφου φύσεως, &c.

Compare Plato, Epistol. vii. p. 325 A.

as against the Sophists—and by the same class of enemies, such as Anytus¹, Aristophanēs, Eupolis, &c. It was mainly from Sophists like Hippias that the Athenian youth learnt what they knew of geometry, astronomy, and arithmetic: but the range of what is called special science, possessed even by the teacher, was at that time very limited; and the matter of instruction communicated was expressed under the general title of “Words or Discourses,” which were always taught by the Sophists, in connection with thought and in reference to a practical use. The capacities of thought, speech, and action—are conceived in conjunction by Greeks generally, and by teachers like Isokratēs and Quintilian especially; and when young men in Greece, like the Bœotian Proxenus, put themselves under training by Gorgias or any other Sophist—it was with a view of qualifying themselves, not merely to speak, but to act².

Most of the pupils of the Sophists (as of Sokratēs³ himself) were young men of wealth; a fact, at which Plato sneers, and others copy him, as if it

¹ Anytus was the accuser of Sokratēs: his enmity to the Sophists may be seen in Plato, Meno, p. 91 C.

² Xenoph. Anab. ii. 6. Πρόξενος—εὐθεὶς μερίσσειας ἐν ἐπιθέμῳ γε-νέσθαι ἀπὸ τὰ μέγιστα πράττειν ἰκανός· καὶ διὰ ταύτην τῇ ἐπιθε-μίᾳ ἔδωκε Γοργίᾳ ἀγέρας τῇ Λεοντίᾳ. . . . Τούτους δ’ ἐπιθίμῳ, σφόδρα ἰσθῆλον αὐ καὶ τοῦτο εἶχε, ὅτι τοῦτον οὐδεὶς ἐν θέλει πᾶσθαι μετὰ ἀδικίας, ἀλλὰ σὺν τῇ δικαίᾳ καὶ καλῇ φρενὶ οὖν τοῦτον τυγχάνειν, ἀπὸ δὲ τοῦτον μὴ.

Proxenus, as described by his friend Xenophon, was certainly a man who did no dishonour to the moral teaching of Gorgias.

The connection between thought, speech, and action, is seen even in the jests of Aristophanēs upon the purposes of Sokratēs and the Sophists:—

Νεκρὸν πρῶτον καὶ βασιλείαν καὶ τῇ γλώττῃ πολεμίζων (Nubes, 418).

³ Plato, Apol. Sokr. c. 10. p. 23 C; Protagoras, p. 328 C.

proved that they cared only about high pay. But I do not hesitate to range myself on the side of Isokratês¹, and to contend that the Sophist himself had much to lose by corrupting his pupils (an argument used by Sokratês in defending himself before the Dikastery, and just as valid in defence of Protagoras or Prodikus²) and strong personal interest in sending them forth accomplished and virtuous—that the best-taught youth were decidedly the most free from crime and the most active towards good—that among the valuable ideas and feelings which a young Athenian had in his mind as well as among the good pursuits which he followed, those which he learnt from the Sophists counted nearly as the best—that, if the contrary had been the fact, fathers would not have continued so to send their sons, and pay their money. It was not merely that these teachers counteracted in part the temptations to dissipated enjoyment, but also that they were personally unconcerned in the acrimonious slander and warfare of party in his native city—that the topics with which they familiarized him were, the general interests and duties of men and citizens—that they developed the germs of morality in the ancient legends (as in Prodikus's fable), and amplified in his mind all the undefined cluster of associations connected with the great words of morality—that they vivified in him the sentiment of Pan-hellenic brotherhood—and that in teaching him the art of persuasion³, they could not but make him feel the depend-

General
good effect of their teaching upon the youth.

¹ See Isokr. Or. xv. De Perm. s. 218, 233, 235, 245, 254, 257.

² Plato, Apol. Sokrat. c. 13. p. 25 D.

³ See these points strikingly put by Isokratês—in the Orat. xv. De Permutatione, throughout, especially in sect. 294, 297, 305, 307—and ence in which he stood towards those who were to be persuaded, together with the necessity under which he lay of so conducting himself as to conciliate their good will.

The intimations given in Plato, of the enthusiastic reception which Protagoras, Prodikus, and other Sophists¹ met with in the various cities—the description which we read (in the dialogue called Protagoras) of the impatience of the youthful Hippokratēs, on hearing of the arrival of that Sophist, inasmuch that he awakens Sokratēs before daylight, in order to obtain an introduction to the new-comer and profit by his teaching—the readiness of such rich young men to pay money, and to devote time and trouble, for the purpose of acquiring a personal superiority apart from their wealth and station—the ardour with which Kallias is represented as employing his house for the hospitable entertainment, and his fortune for the aid, of the Sophists—all this makes upon my mind an impression directly the reverse of that ironical and contemptuous phraseology with which it is set forth by Plato. Such Sophists had nothing to recommend them except superior knowledge and intellectual force, combined with an imposing personality, making itself felt in their lectures and conversation. It is to this that the admiration was shown; and the fact that it was so shown, brings to view the best attributes of the Greek, especially the Athenian mind. It exhibits those qualities of which Periklēs made emphatic again by Xenoph. Memorab. i. 2, 10, in reference to the teaching of Sokratēs.

¹ See a striking passage in Plato's Republic, x. c. 4, p. 600 C.

boast in his celebrated funeral oration¹—conception of public speech as a practical thing, not meant as an excuse for inaction, but combined with energetic action, and turning it to good account by full and open discussion beforehand—profound sensibility to the charm of manifested intellect, without enervating the powers of execution or endurance. Assuredly a man like Protagoras, arriving in a city with all his train of admiration laid before him, must have known very little of his own interest or position, if he began to preach a low or corrupt morality. If it be true generally, as Voltaire has remarked, that “any man who should come to preach a relaxed morality would be pelted,” much more would it be true of a Sophist like Protagoras, arriving in a foreign city with all the prestige of a great intellectual name, and with the imagination of youths on fire to hear and converse with him,—that any similar doctrine would destroy his reputation at once. Numbers of teachers have made their reputation by inculcating overstrained asceticism; it will be hard to find an example of success in the opposite vein².

¹ Thucyd. ii. 40. φιλοσοφοῦμεν ἄνευ μάλασις—ὡς τοὺς λόγους τοῖς ἔργοις βλάβη ἡγοῦμεθα—διαφερόμεθα δὲ καὶ τοῖς ἔργοις, ὥστε τοῖς λόγοις τε οἱ αἱρετοὶ μάλιστα καὶ περὶ τῶν ἐπιχειρήσεων ἐλεγοῦντο.

² In an able and interesting criticism on these volumes (in the ‘Quarterly Review,’ No. clxxv. Art. ii. p. 53) the general drift of my remarks on the Sophists is stated in the following terse and perspicuous manner:—

“It is enough here to state, as briefly as possible, the contrast between Mr. Grote’s view and the popular representation of the Sophists. According to the common notion, they were a sect; according to him, they were a class or profession. According to the common view, they were the propagators of demoralizing doctrines, and of what from them are termed ‘sophistical’ argumentations. According to Mr. Grote, they were the regular teachers of Greek morality, neither above nor below the standard of the age. According to the common view, Socrates was the great opponent of the Sophists, and Plato his natural successor in the same combat. According to Mr. Grote, Socrates was the great representative of the Sophists, distinguished from them only by his higher eminence, and by the peculiarity of his life and teaching. According to the common view, Plato and his followers were the authorized teachers, the established clergy of the Greek nation,—and the Sophists the dissenters. According to Mr. Grote, the Sophists were the established clergy, and Plato was the dissenter—the Socialist, who attacked the sophists (as he attacked the poets and the statesmen) not as a particular sect, but as one of the existing orders of society."

CHAPTER LXVIII.

SOKRATES.

THAT the professional teachers called Sophists in Greece were intellectual and moral corruptors—and that much corruption grew up under their teaching in the Athenian mind—are common statements which I have endeavoured to show to be erroneous. Corresponding to these statements is another, which represents Sokratēs as one whose special merit it was to have rescued the Athenian mind from such demoralising influences ;—a reputation, which he neither deserves nor requires. In general, the favourable interpretation of evidence, as exhibited towards Sokratēs, has been scarcely less marked than the harshness of presumption against the Sophists. Of late, however, some authors have treated his history in an altered spirit, and have manifested a disposition to lower him down to that which they regard as the Sophistical level. M. Forchhammer's treatise—"The Athenians and Sokratēs, or Lawful Dealing against Revolution"—goes even further, and maintains confidently that Sokratēs was most justly condemned as a heretic, a traitor, and a corruptor of youth. His book, the conclusions of which I altogether reject, is a sort of retribution to the Sophists, as extending to their alleged opponent the same bitter and unfair spirit of construction with that under which they have so long unjustly suffered. But when we impartially consider the evidence, it will appear that Sokratēs deserves our admiration and esteem, not indeed as an anti-Sophist, but as combining with the qualities of a good man, a force of character and an originality of speculation as well as of method, and a power of intellectually working on others—generically different from that of any professional teacher—without parallel either among contemporaries or successors.

Different spirit shown towards Sokratēs and towards the Sophists.

Birth and family of Sokratês.

The life of Sokratês comprises seventy years, from 469 to 399 B.C. His father Sophroniskus being a sculptor, the son began by following the same profession, in which he attained sufficient proficiency to have executed various works; especially a draped group of the Charites or Graces, preserved in the acropolis and shown as his work down to the time of Pausanias¹. His mother Phænaretê was a midwife, and he had a brother by the mother's side named Patrokles². Respecting his wife Xanthippê, and his three sons, all that has passed into history is the violent temper of the former, and the patience of her husband in enduring it. The position and family of Sokratês, without being absolutely poor, were humble and unimportant; but he was of genuine Attic breed, belonging to the ancient gens Dædalidæ, which took its name from Dædalus the mythical artist as progenitor.

His physical and moral qualities.

The personal qualities of Sokratês, on the other hand, were marked and distinguishing, not less in body than in mind. His physical constitution was healthy, robust, and enduring, to an extraordinary degree. He was not merely strong and active as an hoplite on military service, but capable of bearing fatigue or hardship, and indifferent to heat or cold, in a measure which astonished all his companions. He went barefoot in all seasons of the year, even during the winter campaign at Potidæa, under the severe frosts of Thrace; and the same homely clothing sufficed to him for winter as well as for summer. Though his diet was habitually simple as well as abstemious, yet there were occasions, of religious festival or friendly congratulation, on which every Greek considered joviality and indulgence to be becoming. On such occasions, Sokratēs could drink more wine than any guest present, yet without being overcome or intoxicated¹. He abstained, on principle, from all extreme gymnastic training, which required, as necessary condition, extraordinary abundance of food². It was his professed purpose to limit, as much as possible, the number of his wants, as a distant approach to the perfection of the gods, who wanted nothing; to control such as were natural, and prevent the multiplication of any that were artificial³. Nor can there be any ¹ See the Symposium of Plato as well as that of Xenophon, both of which profess to depict Sokratēs at one of these jovial moments. Plato, Symposium, c. 31, p. 214 A; c. 35, &c., 39 ad finem; Xenoph. Symp. ii. 26—where Sokratēs requests that the wine may be handed round in small cups, but that they may succeed each other quickly, like drops of rain in a shower. Compare Athenæus, xi. p. 504 F.

¹ Pausanias, i. 22, § 1; ix. 35, 2.

² Plato, Euthydem. c. 24. p. 297 D.

The view which Plato takes of indulgence in wine, as affording a sort of test of the comparative self-command of individuals, and measuring the facility with which any man may be betrayed into folly and extravagance—and the regulation to which he proposes to submit the practice—may be seen in his treatise De Legibus, i. p. 649; ii. p. 671-674. Compare Xenoph. Memorab. i. 2, 1; i. 6, 10.

² Xenoph. Memorab. i. 2, 4. τὸ μὲν ὑπερβολικὸν ἐκτρέφει ἀνθρώπου, &c.

³ Xenoph. Mem. i. 6, 10. Even Antisthenēs (disciple of Sokratēs, doubt that his admirable bodily temperament contributed materially to facilitate such a purpose, and assist him in the maintenance of that self-mastery, contented self-sufficiency, and independence of the favour¹ as well as of the enmity of others—which were essential to his plan of intellectual life. His friends, who communicate to us his great bodily strength and endurance, are at the same time full of jests upon his ugly physiognomy—his flat nose, thick lips, and prominent eyes, like a satyr or Silenus². Nor can we implicitly trust the evidence of such very admiring witnesses, as to the philosopher's exemption from infirmities of temper; for there seems good proof that he was by natural temperament violently irascible—a defect, which he generally kept under severe control, but which occasionally betrayed him into great improprieties of language and demeanour³.

and the originator of what was called the Cynic philosophy), while he pronounced virtue to be self-sufficient for conferring happiness, was obliged to add that the strength and vigour of Sokratēs were required as a further condition—αὐτάρκειν τῆς ἀρετῆς πρὸς εὐδαιμονίαν, μηδὲν ἐπαρκεῖν ἔτι μὴ τῆς Σωκρατικῆς ἰσχύος—Winckelmann, Antisthen. Fragment. p. 47; Diog. Laert. vi. 11.

¹ See his reply to the invitation of Archelaus king of Macedonia, indicating the repugnance to accept favours which he could not return (Aristot. Rhetor. ii. 24).

² Plato, Sympos. c. 32. p. 215. A; Xenoph. Sympos. c. 5; Plato, Theætet. p. 143 D.

³ This is one of the traditions which Aristoxenus, the disciple of Aristotle, heard from his father Spithameus, who had been in personal communication with Sokratēs. See the Fragmenta of Aristoxenus, Fragm. 27, 28; sp. Frag. Hist. Græc. p. 280. ed. Didot.

It appears to me that Fragm. 28 contains the statement of what Aristoxenus really said about the irascibility of Sokratēs; while the expressions of Fragm. 27, ascribed to that author by Plutarch, are unmeasured.

Fragm. 28 also substantially contradicts Fragm. 26, in which Dio-

Of those friends, the best known to us are Xenophon and Plato, though there existed in antiquity various dialogues composed, and memoranda put together, by other hearers of Sokratēs, respecting his conversations and teaching, which are all now lost¹. The 'Memorabilia' of Xenophon profess to record actual conversations held by Sokratēs, and are prepared with the announced purpose of vindicating him against the accusations of Melētus and his other accusers on the trial, as well as against unfavourable opinions, seemingly much circulated respecting his character and purposes. We thus have in it a sort of partial biography, subject to such deductions from its evidentiary value as may be requisite for imperfection of memory, intentional decoration, and partiality. On the other hand, the purpose of Plato in the numerous dialogues wherein he introduces Sokratēs, is not so clear—and is explained very differently by different commentators. Plato was a great speculative genius, who came to genes asserts, on the authority of Aristoxenus—what is not to be believed, even if Aristoxenus had asserted it—that Sokratēs made a regular trade of his teaching, and collected perpetual contributions: see Xenoph. Memor. i. 2, 6; i. 5, 6.

I see no reason for the mistrust with which Preller (Hist. Philosophie, c. v. p. 139) and Ritter (Geschich. d. Philos. vol. ii. ch. 2. p. 19) regard the general testimony of Aristoxenus about Sokratēs.

¹ Xenophon (Mem. i. 4, 1) alludes to several such biographers, or collectors of anecdotes about Sokratēs. Yet it would seem that most of these Sokratikoi eirai (Cicero ad Attic. xiv. 9, 1) did not collect anecdotes or conversations of the master, after the manner of Xenophon; but composed dialogues, manifesting more or less of his method and ἥθος, after the type of Plato. Simon the leather-cutter however took memoranda of conversations held by Sokratēs in his shop, and published several dialogues purporting to be such (Diog. Laert. ii. 123). The Socratici eirai are generally praised by Cicero (Tusc. D. ii. 3, 8) for the elegance of their style.

form opinions of his own distinct from those of Sokratēs, and employed the name of the latter as spokesman for these opinions in various dialogues. How much, in the Platonic Sokratēs, can be safely accepted either as a picture of the man or as a record of his opinions—how much, on the other hand, is to be treated as Platonism—or in what proportions the two are intermingled—is a point not to be decided with certainty or rigour. The 'Apology of Sokratēs,' the 'Kriton,' and the 'Phædon' (in so far as it is a moral picture, and apart from the doctrines advocated in it) appear to belong to the first category; while the political and social views of the 'Republic,' the cosmic theories in the 'Timæus,' and the hypothesis of Ideas, as substantive existences apart from the phenomenal world, in the various dialogues wherever it is stated—certainly belong to the second. Of the ethical dialogues, much may be probably taken to represent Sokratēs more or less platonized.

But though the opinions put by Plato into the mouth of Sokratēs are liable to thus much of uncertainty, we find, to our great satisfaction, that the pictures given by Plato and Xenophon of their common master are in the main accordant; differing only as drawn from the same original by two authors radically different in spirit and character. Xenophon, the man of action, brings out at length those conversations of Sokratēs which had a bearing on practical conduct and were calculated to correct vice or infirmity in particular individuals; such being the matter which served his purpose as an apologist, at the same time that it suited his intellectual taste.

Their pictures of Sokratēs are in the main accordant.

But he intimates nevertheless very plainly, that the conversation of Sokratēs was often, indeed usually, of a more negative, analytical, and generalising tendency¹; not destined for the reproof of positive or special defect, but to awaken the inquisitive faculties and lead to the rational comprehension of vice and virtue as referable to determinate general principles. Now this latter side of the master's physiognomy, which Xenophon records distinctly, though without emphasis or development, acquires almost exclusive prominence in the Platonic picture. Plato leaves out the practical, and consecrates himself to the theoretical, Sokratēs; whom he divests in part of his identity, in order to enrol him as chief speaker in certain larger theoretical views of his own. The two pictures therefore do not contradict each other, but mutually supply each other's defects, and admit of being blended into one consistent whole. And respecting the method of Sokratēs—a point more characteristic than either his precepts or his theory—as well as respecting the effect of that method on the minds of hearers—both Xenophon and Plato are witnesses substantially in unison: though, here again, the latter has made the method his own, worked it out on a scale of enlargement and perfection, and given to it a permanence which it could never have derived from its original author, who

¹ Xenophon, Memor. i. 1, 16. Αἰτὸν δὲ περὶ τῶν ἀνθρωπείων διὰ διδασκῆναι, σκοπεῖν, τί εὐσεβείη, τί ἀσεβείη· τί καλόν, τί αἰσχρόν· τί δίκαιον, τί ἀδίκον· τί ἀνδρία, τί δειλία· τί σωφροσύνη, τί μανία· τί πόλις, τί πολιτικός· τί ἀρχὴ ἀνθρώπων, τί ἀρχικὸς ἀνθρώπων, &c.

Compare i. 2, 50; iii. 8, 3, 4; iii. 9; iv. 4, 5; iv. 6, 1. σκοπεῖν οὖν τοῖς σπουδαίοις, τί ἵκανον εἴη τῶν βουτῶν, οὐδέποτε ἔλπετο.

only talked and never wrote. It is fortunate that our two main witnesses about him, both speaking from personal knowledge, agree to so great an extent.

Habits of Sokratēs.

Both describe in the same manner his private life and habits; his contented poverty, justice, temperance in the largest sense of the word, and self-sufficing independence of character. On most of these points too, Aristophanēs and the other comic writers, so far as their testimony counts for any thing, appear as confirmatory witnesses; for they abound in jests on the coarse fare, shabby and scanty clothing, bare feet, pale face, poor and joyless life, of Sokratēs¹. Of the circumstances of his life we are almost wholly ignorant. He served as an hoplite at Potidæa, at Delium, and at Amphipolis; with credit apparently in all, though exaggerated encomiums on the part of his friends provoked an equally exaggerated scepticism on the part of Athenæus and others. He seems never to have filled any political office until the year (B.C. 406) in which the battle of Arginusæ occurred, in which year he was member of the Senate of Five Hundred, and one of the Prytanes on that memorable day when the proposition of Kallixenus against the six generals was submitted to the public assembly: his determined refusal, in spite of all personal hazard, to put an unconstitutional question to the vote, has been already recounted. That during his long life he strictly obeyed the laws¹, is proved by the fact that none of his numerous enemies ever arraigned him before a court of justice: that he discharged all the duties of an upright man and a brave as well as pious citizen, may also be confidently asserted. His friends lay especial stress upon his piety, that is upon his exact discharge of all the religious duties considered as incumbent upon an Athenian².

¹ Aristoph. Nubes, 105, 121, 362, 414; Aves, 1282; Eupolis, Fragment, Incert. ix., x., xi., ap. Meineke, p. 552; Ancipias, Fragmenta, Komus, p. 703, Meineke—Diogen. Laërt. ii. 28.

The later comic writers ridiculed the Pythagoreans, as well as Zeno the Stoic, on grounds very similar: see Diogenes Laërt. vii. 1, 24.

Though these points are requisite to be established, in order that we may rightly interpret the character of Sokratēs—it is not from them that he has derived his eminent place in history. Three peculiarities distinguish the man. 1. His long life passed in contented poverty, and in public, apostolic, dialectics. 2. His strong religious persuasion—or belief of acting under a mission and signs from the gods; especially his Dæmon or Genius—the special religious warning of which he believed himself to be frequently the subject. 3. His great intellectual originality, both of subject and of method, and his power of stirring and forcing the germ of inquiry and ratiocination in others. Though these three characteristics were so blended in Sokratēs that it is not easy to consider them separately—yet in each respect, he stood distinguished from all Greek philosophers before or after him.

At what time Sokratēs relinquished his profession as a statuary, we do not know; but it is certain that all the middle and later part of his life, at least, was devoted exclusively to the self-imposed task of teach-

Leading peculiarities of Sokratēs.

His constant publicity of life and indiscriminate conversation.

¹ Plato, Apol. Solir. c. 1. Νῦν ἔγωγε πᾶσι τοῖς ἀδικησάντων ἀνδράσι βασιλεύω, ἐπεὶ γεγονόσι πλείους ἰσομήνοισιν.

² Xenoph. Memor. i. 1, 2-20; i. 3, 1-3.

ing; excluding all other business, public or private, and to the neglect of all means of fortune. We can hardly avoid speaking of him as a teacher, though he himself disclaimed the appellation¹: his practice was to talk or converse—or to *prattle without end*², if we translate the derisory word by which the enemies of philosophy described dialectic conversation. Early in the morning he frequented the public walks, the gymnasia for bodily training, and the schools where youths were receiving instruction: he was to be seen in the market-place at the hour when it was most crowded, among the booths and tables where goods were exposed for sale: his whole day was usually spent in this public manner³. He talked with any one, young or old, rich or poor, who sought to address him, and in the hearing of all who chose to stand by: not only he never either asked or received any reward, but he made no distinction of persons, never withheld his conversation from any one, and talked upon the same general topics to all. He conversed with politicians, Sophists, military men, artisans, ambitious or studious youths, &c. He visited all persons of interest in the city, male or female: his friendship with Aspasia is well known, and one of the most interesting chap-

¹ Plato, Apol. Sokr. c. 21. p. 33 A. ἐγὼ δὲ διδάσκαλος μὲν οὐδ' αὖτος πέποιθε ἐγείρειν: compare c. 4. p. 19 E.

Xenoph. Memor. iii. 14, 16. Σωκράτης—ἐπισκώπτει τὴν ἑαυτοῦ ἀπαγγελίαν—Plat. Ap. Sok. c. 18. p. 31 B.

² Ἀδελύχης—see Ruhken's Animadversiones in Xenoph. Memor. p. 293. of Schneider's edition of that treatise. Compare Plato, Sophistæ, c. 23. p. 225 E.

³ Xenoph. Mem. i. 1. 10; Plato, Apol. Sok. l. p. 17 D; 18. p. 31 A. οἷον δὲ μοι δοκεῖ, ὃ θεὸς ἐπὶ τῇ πόλει προσηνέστερος τοιοῦτόν τινα, δι' ἑαυτοῦ ἐγείρειν καὶ πείθειν, καὶ ἀναδίδωκεν ἐν ἑαυτῷ, οὐδὲν κείνῳ, τῇ ἡμέρῃ ὅλην παραταχὴ προσκαθίζου.

ters¹ of Xenophon's Memorabilia recounts his visit to, and dialogue with Theodotê—a beautiful Hetæra or Female Companion. Nothing could be more public, perpetual, and indiscriminate as to persons, than his conversation. But as it was engaging, curious, and instructive to hear, certain persons made it their habit to attend him in public as companions and listeners. These men, a fluctuating body, were commonly known as his disciples or scholars; though neither he nor his personal friends ever employed the terms teacher and disciple to describe the relation between them². Many of them came, attracted by his reputation, during the later years of his life, from other Grecian cities; Megara, Thebes, Elis, Kyrênê, &c.

Now no other person in Athens, or in any other Grecian city, appears ever to have manifested himself in this perpetual and indiscriminate manner as a public talker for instruction. All teachers either took money for their lessons, or at least gave them

Reason why Sokratês was shown up by Aristophanês on the stage.

¹ Xen. Mem. iii. 11.

² Xenophon in his Memorabilia speaks always of the companions of Sokratês, not of his disciples—oi συνειρηται αὐτῷ—oi συνεπισκώμενοι (l. 6, 1)—oi συνδιατριβήσαντες—oi συγγυμνάσαντες—oi ἑταῖροι—oi ἐπιλοβήσαντες αὐτῷ—oi συνῶνται (iv. 8, 2.)—oi μετ' αὐτοῦ (iv. 2, 1)—oi ἐκτρέφοντες (i. 2, 60). Aristippus also, in speaking to Plato, talked of Sokratês as ὁ ἑταῖρος ἡμῶν—Aristot. Rhetor. ii. 24. His enemies spoke of his disciples, in an invective sense—Plato, Ap. Sok. c. 21. p. 33 A.

It is not to be believed that any companions can have made frequent visits, either from Megara and Thebes, to Sokratês at Athens, during the last years of the war, before the capture of Athens in 404 a.c. And in point of fact, the passage of the Platonic Theætetus represents Eukleïdês of Megara as alluding to his conversations with Sokratês only a short time before the death of the latter (Plato, Theætetus, c. 2. p. 142 E.). The story given by Aulus Gellius—that Eukleïdês came to visit Sokratês by night in women's clothes, from Megara to Athens—seems to me an absurdity, though Deycks (De Megaricarum Doctrinâ, p. 5) is inclined to believe it.

apart from the multitude in a private house or garden, to special pupils, with admissions and rejections at their own pleasure. By the peculiar mode of life which Sokratês pursued, not only his conversation reached the minds of a much wider circle, but he became more abundantly known as a person. While acquiring a few attached friends and admirers, and raising a certain intellectual interest in others, he at the same time provoked a large number of personal enemies. This was probably the reason why he was selected by Aristophanês and the other comic writers, to be attacked as a general representative of philosophical and rhetorical teaching; the more so, as his marked and repulsive physiognomy admitted so well of being imitated in the mask which the actor wore. The audience at the theatre would more readily recognise the peculiar figure which they were accustomed to see every day in the market-place, than if Prodikus or Protagoras, whom most of them did not know by sight, had been brought on the stage; nor was it of much importance either to them or to Aristophanês, whether Sokratês was represented as teaching what he did really teach, or something utterly different.

His persuasion of a special religious mission.

This extreme publicity of life and conversation was one among the characteristics of Sokratês, distinguishing him from all teachers either before or after him. Next was, his persuasion of a special religious mission, restraints, impulses, and communications, sent to him by the gods. Taking the belief in such supernatural intervention generally, it was indeed noway peculiar to Sokratês: it was the ordinary faith of the ancient world, insomuch that the attempts to resolve phenomena into general laws were looked upon with a certain disapprobation, as indirectly setting it aside. And Xenophon¹ accordingly avails himself of such general fact, in replying to the indictment for religious innovation of which his master was found guilty, to affirm that the latter pretended to nothing beyond what was included in the creed of every pious man. But this is not an exact statement of the matter in debate; for it slurs over at least, if it does not deny, that speciality of inspiration from the gods, which those who talked with Sokratēs (as we learn even from Xenophon) believed, and which Sokratēs himself believed also². Very different is his own representation, as put forth in the defence before the Dikastery. He had been accustomed constantly to hear, even from his childhood, a divine voice; interfering, at moments when he was about to act, in the way of restraint, but never in the way of instigation. Such prohibitory warning was wont to come upon him very

¹ Xenoph. Mem. i. 1, 2, 3.

² See the conversation of Sokratēs (reported by Xenophon, Mem. i. 4, 15) with Aristodemus, respecting the gods—"What will be sufficient to persuade you (asks Sokratēs) that the gods care about you?" "When they send me special monitors, as you say that they do to you (replies Aristodemus), to tell me what to do, and what not to do." To which Sokratēs replied, that they answer the questions of the Athenians, by replies of the oracle—and that they send prodigies (τέρατα) by way of information to the Greeks generally. He further advises Aristodemus to pay assiduous court (θεραπεύειν) to the gods, in order to see whether they will not send him monitory information about doubtful events (i. 4, 18).

So again in his conversation with Euthydemus, the latter says to him—οἱ δὲ, ὦ Σώκρατες, εὐχόμενοι εἰσι φιλικώτερον ὅ· τοῖς ἄλλοις χρηθεῖναι, οἷός μιν ἐκπαράμεναι ἐπὶ τοῖς προσημιμένοις, ἃς χρὴ ποιεῖν καὶ ἃ μὴ (iv. 3, 12).

Compare i. 1, 19; and iv. 8, 11—where the fact of perpetual communion and advice from the gods is employed as an evidence to prove the superior piety of Sokratēs.

frequently, not merely on great, but even on small occasions, intercepting what he was about to do or to say¹. Though later writers speak of this as the dæmon or genius of Sokratēs, he himself does not personify it, but treats it merely as a "divine sign, a prophetic or supernatural voice²." He was accustomed not only to obey it implicitly, but to speak of it publicly and familiarly to others, so that ¹ Plato, Ap. Sok. c. 19, p. 31 D. Τοῦτον δὲ αὐτὸν ἔστιν (that is, the reason why Sokratēs had never entered on public life) ὃ ὕμεις ἐμοῦ πολλὰκις ἀκροάσασθε πολλαχῶς λέγοντας, ὅτι μοι δοκεῖ τι καὶ δαιμόνιος γίνεται, ὃ δὲ καὶ ἐν τῇ γραφῇ ἐπισκευαζὼν Μέλητος ἐγράψατο. Ἐποὶ δὲ τοῖτ' ἐστὶν ἐκ παιδὸς ἀρξάμενον, φασὶ τι γεγονέναι, ὃ ὅταν γίνηται, αὐτὸ ἀποτρέπον με τοῦτον ὃ ἂν μάλιστ' ἀπείποι, προτρέπον δὲ αἰετοῦ. Τοῦτ' ἐστὶν ὃ μοι ἐκαστοῦνται τὸ εὐλαϊκὸν πράττειν.

Again, c. 31, p. 40 A, he tells the Dikasts, after his condemnation—
 Ἡ γὰρ εὐδοκίᾳ μοι μανταὶ ἢ τοῦ δαιμόνιον ἐκ μὲν τῇ πρόσθεν χρόνῳ παρὰ πάντ' ὑπερὶ αὐτοῦ ἦν καὶ πάντ' ἐπὶ μικροῖς ἐκαστοῦνται, εἴ τι μάλιστ' ἐκ μὲν ἀρξάμενος πράττειν. Νυνὶ δὲ ξυμβέβηκε μοι, ὅταν ὁρᾷτε καὶ αὐτοὶ, ταῦτ', ὃ γὰρ δὴ αἰδέσθην ὅτι καὶ συμβέβηκε ἰσχυρὰ κακῶν εἶναι. Ἐποὶ δὲ ὅταν ἐξίσωτε εὐδὸν οὐκ ὀκνῶν ἡμεῖς τὰ τοῦ θεοῦ σημεῖα, αὐτὸ ἥνικα ἀνέβαινον ἐπαινοῦν ἐπὶ τῷ δικαστήριον, εἴτ' ἐν τῇ λόγῳ μάλιστα τι εἶναι καίτοι ἐν ἄλλοις λόγοις πολλαχῶς δὲ με ἔπεισχε λέγοντα μεταξὺ.

He goes on to infer that his line of defence has been right, and that his condemnation is no misfortune to him, but a benefit—seeing that the sign has not manifested itself.

I agree in the opinion of Schleiermacher (in his Preface to his translation of the Apology of Sokratēs, part i. vol. ii. p. 185, of his general translation of Plato's works), that this defence may be reasonably taken as a reproduction by Plato of what Sokratēs actually said to the Dikasts on his trial. In addition to the reasons given by Schleiermacher, there is one which may be noticed. Sokratēs predicts to the Dikasts, that if they put him to death, a great number of young men will forthwith put themselves forward to take up the vocation of cross-questioning, who will give them more trouble than he has ever done (Plat. Ap. Sok. c. 30, p. 39 D). Now there is no reason to believe that such prediction was realized. If therefore Plato puts an erroneous prophecy into the mouth of Sokratēs, this is probably because Sokratēs really made one.

² The words of Sokratēs plainly indicate this meaning: see also a good note of Schleiermacher—appended to his translation of the Platonic Apology—Platonis Werke, part i. vol. ii. p. 432.

the fact was well known both to his friends and to his enemies. It had always forbidden him to enter on public life: it forbade him, when the indictment was hanging over him, to take any thought for a prepared defence¹: and so completely did he march with a consciousness of this bridle in his mouth, that when he felt no check, he assumed that the turning which he was about to take was the right one. Though his persuasion on the subject was unquestionably sincere, and his obedience constant—yet he never dwelt upon it himself as anything grand, or awful, or entitling him to peculiar deference; but spoke of it often in his usual strain of familiar playfulness. To his friends generally, it seems to have constituted one of his titles to reverence, though neither Plato nor Xenophon scruples to talk of it in that jesting way which doubtless they caught from himself². But to his enemies and to the Athenian public, it appeared in the light of an offensive heresy; an impious innovation on the orthodox creed, and a desertion of the recognized gods of Athens.

Such was the Dæmon or Genius of Sokratês as described by himself and as conceived in the genuine Platonic dialogues; a voice always prohibitory, and bearing exclusively upon his own personal conduct³.

His Dæmon or Genius
—other inspirations.

¹ Xenoph. Men. iv. 8, 5.

² Xenoph. Sympos. viii. 5; Plato, Euthydem. c. 5, p. 272 E.

³ See Plato (Theætet. c. 7, p. 151 A; Phædrus, c. 20, p. 242 C; Republic, vi. 10, p. 496 C)—in addition to the above citations from the Apology.

The passage in the Euthyphron (c. 2, p. 3 B) is somewhat less specific. The Pseudo-Platonic dialogue Theætet retains the strictly prohibitory attribute of the voice, as never in any case impelling; but extends the range of the warning, as if it was heard in cases not simply

That which Plutarch and other admirers of Sokratēs conceived as a Daemon or intermediate Being between gods and men, was looked upon by the fathers of the Christian church as a devil—by LeClerc as one of the fallen angels—by some other modern commentators, as mere ironical phraseology on the part of Sokratēs himself¹. Without presuming to determine the question raised in the former hypotheses, I believe the last to be untrue, and that the conviction of Sokratēs on the point was quite sincere. A circumstance little attended to, but deserving peculiar notice, and stated by himself—is, that the restraining voice began when he was a child, and continued even down to the end of his life: it had thus become an established persuasion, long before his philosophical habits began. But though this peculiar form of inspiration belonged exclusively to him, there were also other ways in which he believed himself to have received the special mandates of the gods, not simply checking him when he was about to take a wrong turn, but spurring him on, directing, and peremptorily exacting from him, a positive course of proceeding. Such personal to Sokratēs himself, but referring to the conduct of his friends also (Theægēs, c. 11, 12. p. 128, 129).

Xenophon also neglects the specific attributes, and conceives the voice generally as a divine communication with instruction and advice to Sokratēs, so that he often prophesied to his friends and was always right (Memor. i. 1, 2-4, iv. 8, 1).

¹ See Dr. Forster's note on the Euthyphron of Plato, c. 2. p. 3.

The treatise of Plutarch (De Genio Socratis) is full of speculation on the subject, but contains nothing about it which can be relied upon as matter of fact. There are various stories about prophecies made by Sokratēs, and verified by the event, c. 11, p. 582.

See also this matter discussed, with abundant references, in Zeller, Philosophie der Griechen, v. ii. p. 25-28.

distinct mission had been imposed upon him by dreams, by oracular intimations, and by every other means which the gods employed for signifying their special will¹.

Of these intimations from the oracle, he specifies particularly² one, in reply to a question put at Delphi, by his intimate friend, and enthusiastic admirer, Chærephon. The question put was, whether any other man was wiser than Sokratês; to which the Pythian priestess replied, that no other man was wiser³. Sokratês affirms that he was greatly perplexed on hearing this declaration from so infallible an authority,—being conscious to himself that he possessed no wisdom on any subject, great or small. At length, after much meditation and a distressing mental struggle, he resolved to test the accuracy of the infallible priestess, by taking measure of the wisdom of others as compared with his own. Selecting a leading politician, accounted wise both by others and by himself, he proceeded to converse with him and put scrutinising questions; the answers to which satisfied him, that this man's supposed wisdom was really no wisdom at all. Having made such a discovery, Sokratês next tried to demonstrate to the politician himself how much he wanted of being wise; but this was impossible: the latter still remained as fully persuaded of his own wisdom as

Oracle from Delphi declaring that no man was wiser than he.

¹ Plato, Ap. Sok. c. 22. p. 33 C. Ἐπεὶ δὲ τοῦτο, ὡς ἐγὼ φημι, προερέτατος ἐστὶ τοῦ θεοῦ πρᾶττεν καὶ ἐκ μαρτυριῶν καὶ ἐξ ἐνυπνίων, καὶ παρὶ τῶν τε, ᾗ περὶ τίς ποτε καὶ ἄλλῃ θεῶν μοῖρα ἀνθρώπων καὶ ὁμοῦν προείραξε πρᾶττεν.

² Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 5. p. 21 A. Sokratês offers to produce the testimony of the brother of Chærephon (the latter himself being dead) to attest the reality of this question and answer.

before. "The result which I acquired (says Sokratês) was, that I was a wiser man than he, for neither he nor I knew anything of what was truly good and honourable; but the difference between us was, that he fancied he knew them, while I was fully conscious of my own ignorance: I was thus wiser than he, inasmuch as I was exempt from that capital error." So far therefore the oracle was proved to be right. Sokratês repeated the same experiment successively upon a great number of different persons, especially those in reputation for distinguished abilities; first, upon political men and rhetors, next upon poets of every variety, and upon artists as well as artisans. The result of his trial was substantially the same in all cases. The poets indeed composed splendid verses, but when questioned even about the words, the topics, and the purpose, of their own compositions, they could give no consistent or satisfactory explanations; so that it became evident that they spoke or wrote, like prophets, as unconscious subjects under the promptings of inspiration. Moreover their success as poets filled them with a lofty opinion of their own wisdom on other points also. The case was similar with artists and artisans; who, while highly instructed, and giving satisfactory answers, each in his own particular employment, were for that reason only the more convinced that they also knew well other great and noble subjects. This great general mistake more than countervailed their special capacities, and left them, on the whole, less wise than Sokratês¹.

"In this research and scrutiny (said Sokratês on his defence) I have been long engaged, and am still engaged. I interrogate every man of reputation: I prove him to be defective in wisdom; but I cannot prove it so as to make him sensible of the defect. Fulfilling the mission imposed upon me, I have thus established the veracity of the god, who meant to pronounce that human wisdom was of little reach or worth, and that he who, like Sokratēs, felt most convinced of his own worthlessness as to wisdom, was really the wisest of men¹. My service to the god has not only constrained me to live in constant poverty² and neglect of political estimation, but has brought upon me a host of bitter enemies in those whom I have examined and exposed; while the bystanders talk of me as a wise man, because they give me credit for wisdom respecting all the points on which my exposure of others turns."—

¹ Plato, Ap. Sok. c. 7, 8, p. 22.

 "Whatever be the danger and obloquy which I may incur, it would be monstrous indeed, if having maintained my place in the ranks as an hoplite under your generals at Delium and Potidæa, I were now, from fear of death or anything else, to disobey the oracle and desert the post which the god has assigned to me—the duty of living for philosophy and cross-questioning both myself and others³. And should

His mission to test the value conceit of wisdom in others.

¹ Plato, Ap. Sok. c. 9. p. 23. I give here the sense rather than the exact words—Οἱ τοὶ ἐμῶν σφώτατος ἐστιν, δοτὶς ὡς περ Σωκράτης ἐργαζομαι ὅτι οὐδένος ἀξίος ἐστι τῇ ἀληθείᾳ πρὸς σφῆρας.

Ταῦτ' ἐγὼ μὲν εἶμι καὶ εἰς περιώνον ζητῶ καὶ ἐρευνῶ κατὰ τὸν θεόν, καὶ τῶν ἀστῶν καὶ τῶν ξένων δε τινα πλάσμα σφῶν εἶναι· καὶ ἐπειδὴν μοι μὴ δοκῇ, τῷ θεῷ βοηθῶς ἐνδείκνυσθαι ὅτι οὐκ ἐστι σοφός.

² Plato, Ap. Sok. c. 9. p. 23 A-C.

...ἐν περίῳ μὲν εἶμι, διὰ τῆς τοῦ θεοῦ λάτρεως.

³ Plato, Ap. Sok. c. 17. p. 29. Τοῦ δὲ θεοῦ πάμπαντος, ὡς ἐγὼ φήθην καὶ ἐπέλαβον, φιλοσοφεῖντά με δεῖν εἶναι, καὶ ἐξετάζοντα ἐμαυτὸν καὶ τοὺς you even now offer to acquit me, on condition of my renouncing this duty,—I should tell you, with all respect and affection, that I will obey the god rather than you, and that I will persist until my dying day, in cross-questioning you, exposing your want of wisdom and virtue, and reproaching you until the defect be remedied¹. My mission as your monitor is a mark of the special favour of the god to you; and if you condemn me, it will be your loss; for you will find none other such². Perhaps you will ask me, Why cannot you go away, Sokratês; and live among us in peace and silence? This is the hardest of all questions for me to answer to your satisfaction. If I tell you that silence on my part would be disobedience to the god, you will think me in jest and not believe me. You will believe me still less, if I tell you that the greatest blessing which can happen to man is, to carry on discussions every day about virtue and those other matters which you hear me canvassing when I cross-examine myself as well as others—and that life without such examination is no life at all. Nevertheless so stands the fact, incredible as it may seem to you³."

ἄλλους, ἀταῦθα δὲ φεβηθεὶς ἢ θύσας ἢ ἄλλο ὅτιοις πρῶγμα λίσσομαι τῆς τάξης.

¹ Plato, Ap. Sok. c. 17. p. 29 C.

² Plato, Ap. Sok. c. 18. p. 30 D.

³ Plato, Ap. Sok. c. 28. p. 38 A. 'Εάν τε γὰρ λέγω, ὅτι τῷ θεῷ ἀπειθεῖν ἐστὶν ἄντι, καὶ ἐὰν τοῦτ' ἀδύνατον ἡσυχίας εἶναι, οὐ πείσεσθί μοι ὡς ἐμπαισιμόνῃ· εἰς τ' οὐ λέγω ὅτι καὶ τυγχάνει μέγιστον ἀγαθὸν ἐκ ἀνθρώπων τοῦτο, ἐκίστασι ἡμέραι περὶ ἀρετῆς καὶ λόγου πειρίσθαι καὶ οὕτω διδόναι, περὶ ᾧ ἡμεῖς ἱκανοὶ ἴσμεν, ἀνελγισμένον καὶ ἐμπατὸν καὶ ἄλλους ἰξτάζοντας—ὃ δὲ ἀρετισταὶς βίος οὐ βιωτὸς ἀνθρώπων (these last striking words are selected by Dr. Hutchisson as the motto for his Synopsis Philosophiæ Moralitæ)—ταῦτα δὲ εἶτι ἕκτον πείσεσθί μοι λέγουσι.

I have given rather ample extracts from the Platonic Apology, because no one can conceive fairly the character of Sokratēs who does not enter into the spirit of that impressive discourse. We see in it plain evidence of a marked supernatural mission which he believed himself to be executing, and which would not allow him to rest or employ himself in other ways. The oracular answer brought by Chærephon from Delphi, was a fact of far more importance in his history than the so-called Dæmon, about which so much more has been said. That answer, together with the dreams and other divine mandates concurrent to the same end, came upon him in the middle of his life, when the intellectual man was formed and when he had already acquired a reputation for wisdom among those who knew him. It supplied a stimulus which brought into the most pronounced action a pre-existing train of generalising dialectics and Zenonian negation—an intellectual vein with which the religious impulse rarely comes into confluence. Without such a motive, to which his mind was peculiarly susceptible, his conversation would probably have taken the same general turn, but would assuredly have been restricted within much narrower and more cautious limits. For nothing could well be more unpopular and obnoxious than the task which he undertook of cross-examining, and convicting of ignorance, every distinguished man whom he could approach. So violent indeed was the enmity which he occasionally provoked, that there were instances (we are told) in which he was struck or maltreated¹, and very frequently laughed to scorn. Though he acquired much admiration from auditors, especially youthful auditors,—and from a few devoted adherents—yet the philosophical motive alone would not have sufficed to prompt him to that systematic, and even obtrusive, cross-examination which he adopted as the business of his life.

Confluence of the religious motive with the inquisitive and intellectual impulse in his mind—numerous enemies whom he made.

¹ Diogen. Laërt. ii. 21.

Sokratēs a religious missionary, doing the work of philosophy.

This then is the second peculiarity which distinguishes Sokratēs,—in addition to his extreme publicity of life and indiscriminate conversation. He was not simply a philosopher, but a religious missionary doing the work of philosophy—"an elenctic or cross-examining god (to use an expression which Plato puts into his mouth respecting an Eleatic philosopher) going about to examine and convict the infirm in reason¹." Nothing of this character belonged either to Parmenidēs and Anaxagoras before him, or to Plato and Aristotle after him. Both Pythagoras and Empedoklēs did indeed lay claim to supernatural communications, mingled with their philosophical teaching. But though there be thus far a general analogy between them and Sokratēs, the modes of manifestation were so utterly different, that no fair comparison can be instituted.

Intellectual peculiarities of Sokratēs.

The third and most important characteristic of Sokratēs—that, through which the first and second became operative—was his intellectual peculiarity. His influence on the speculative mind of his age was marked and important, as to subject, as to method, and as to doctrine.

¹ Plato, Sophistēs, c. I. p. 216—the expression is applied to the Eleatic Stranger who sustains the chief part in that dialogue—Τέχῃ δὲ οὐκ οὐ καὶ οἱ αἰεὶ τοῦ ἐπιστήμης συνέπειρα, φαύλου ἥντις ὁρᾷ ἐν τοῖς λόγοις ἐκφυρόμενος καὶ διέχων, θεὸς ὢν τις ἀληθευτικός.

He was the first who turned his thoughts and discussions distinctly to the subject of ethics. With the philosophers who preceded him, the subject of examination had been Nature or the Kosmos¹ as one undistinguishable whole, blending together cosmogony, astronomy, geometry, physics, metaphysics, &c. The Ionic as well as the Eleatic philosophers, Pythagoras as well as Empedoklēs, all set before themselves this vast and undefined problem; each framing some system suited to his own vein of imagination, religious, poetical, scientific, or sceptical. According to that honourable ambition for enlarged knowledge, however, which marked the century following 480 B.C., and of which the professional men called Sophists were at once the products and the instruments—arithmetic, geometry and astronomy, as much as was then known, were becoming so far detached sciences, as to be taught separately to youth. Such appears to have been the state of science when Sokratēs received his education. He received at least the ordinary amount of instruction in all²: he devoted himself as a young man to the society and lessons of the physical philosopher Archelaus³ (the disciple of Anaxagoras),

He opened ethics as a new subject of scientific discussion.

¹ Xenoph. Mem. i. 1, 11. Οὐδὲ γὰρ περὶ τῆς τῶν πάντων φύσεως, ἢ περὶ τοῦ ἁλλῶν αἱ ἐκείνοι, ἐκείνοιο, σκοπῶς ὅτιαι ὁ καλοῦμαι ἐκὼ τῶν σοφιστῶν Κόσμος ἔχει, &c.

Plato, Phædon, c. 45, p. 96 B. ταύτης τῆς νοφίας, ἢ δὴ καλεῖται περὶ φύσεως ἱστορίας.

² Xenoph. Memor. iv. 7, 3-5.

³ Ion, Chios, Fragn. 9. ap. Didot. Fragn. Historic. Græcor. Diogen. Laert. ii. 16-19.

Ritter (Gesch. der Philos. vol. ii. ch. 2, p. 19) calls in question the assertion that Sokratēs received instruction from Archelaus; in my judgement, without the least reason, since Ion of Chios is a good contemporary witness. He even denies that Sokratēs received any instrucwhom he accompanied from Athens to Samos; and there is even reason to believe that during the earlier part of his life he was much devoted to what was then understood as the general study of Nature¹. A man of his earnest and active intellect was likely first to manifest his curiosity as a learner—"to run after and track the various discourses of others, like a Laconian hound," if I may borrow an expression applied to him by Plato²—before he struck out any novelties of his own. And in Plato's dialogue called 'Parmenidès,' Sokratès appears as a young man full of ardour for the discussion of the Parmenidean theory, looking up with reverence to Parmenidès

tion in philosophy at all, on the authority of a passage in the Symposium of Xenophon, where Sokratès is made to speak of himself as ἡμῖν δὲ ὅπως αἰσώμεθα τὴν τῆς φιλοσοφίας ἄσπιν (1, 5). But it appears to me that that expression implies nothing more than a succeeding antithesis (so frequent both in Plato and Xenophon) to the costly lessons given by Protagoras, Gorgias and Prodikos. It cannot be understood to deny instruction given to Sokratès in the earlier portion of his life.

¹ I think that the expression in Plato's Phaedo, c. 102, p. 96 A. applies to Sokratès himself, and not to Plato—εἰ γὰρ ἐνὰ πᾶσι—means the mental tendencies of Sokratès when a young man.

Respecting the physical studies probably sought and cultivated by Sokratès in the earlier years of his life, see the instructive Dissertation of Tyrhisen—Ueber den Prozess des Sokratès—in the Bibliothek der Alten Literatur und Kunst—Erstes Stück, p. 43.

² Plato, Parmenid. p. 128 C. οἱ τοὶ ὄντες γὰρ αἱ Ἀδελφαὶ πεῖσαντες, εἰ μετὰ τοῖς καὶ ἔχουσιν τὰ λεχόμενα, &c.

Whether Sokratès can be properly said to have been the pupil of Anaxagoras and Archelaus, is a question of little moment, which hardly merited the scepticism of Bayle (Anaxagoras, note R; Archelaus, note A: compare Schmalzsch, Anaxagore Fragmente, p. 23, 27). That he would seek to acquaint himself with their doctrines, and improve himself by communicating personally with them, is a matter so probable, that the slenderest testimony suffices to make us believe it. Moreover, as I have before remarked, we have here a good contemporary witness, Ion of Chios, to the fact of his intimacy with Archelaus. In no other sense than this could a man like Sokratès be said to be the pupil of any one.

and Zeno, and receiving from them instructions in the process of dialectical investigation. I have already in the preceding chapter¹ noted the tenor of that dialogue as illustrating the way in which Grecian philosophy presents itself, even at the first dawn of dialectics, as at once negative and positive, recognizing the former branch of method no less than the latter as essential to the attainment of truth. I construe it as an indication respecting the early mind of Sokratês, imbibing this conviction from the ancient Parmenidês and the mature and practised Zeno—and imposing upon himself as a condition of assent to any hypothesis or doctrine, the obligation of setting forth conscientiously all that could be said against it, not less than all that could be said in its favour; however laborious such a process might be, and however little appreciated by the multitude². Little as we know the circumstances which went to form the remarkable mind of Sokratês, we may infer from this dialogue that he owes in part his powerful negative vein of dialectics to "the double-tongued and all-objecting Zeno"³.

To a mind at all exigent on the score of proof, physical science as handled in that day was indeed likely to appear not only unsatisfactory, but hopeless; and Sokratês, in the maturity of his life, deserted it altogether. The contradictory hypotheses Circumstances which turned the mind of Sokratês towards ethical speculations.

¹ See the chapter immediately preceding, p. 473.

² See the remarkable passage in Plato's Parmenidês, p. 135 C to 136 E, of which a portion has already been cited in my note to the preceding chapter, referred to in the note above.

³ Tanon the Sillographus ap. Diogen. Laërt. ix. 25.

Ἀμφερεργασίας δὲ μέγα σθένος ὡς ἀναγὰς Ζήνωνος, πάντως ἐπιδέκτορος, &c.

which he heard, with the impenetrable confusion which overhung the subject, brought him even to the conviction, that the gods intended the machinery by which they brought about astronomical and physical results to remain unknown, and that it was impious, as well as useless, to pry into their secrets¹. His master Archelaus, though mainly occupied with physics, also speculated more or less concerning moral subjects—concerning justice and injustice, the laws, &c. ; and is said to have maintained the tenet, that justice and injustice were determined by law or convention, not by nature. From him, perhaps, Sokratēs may have been partly led to turn his mind in this direction. But to a man disappointed with physics, and having in his bosom a dialectical impulse powerful, unemployed, and restless—the mere realities of Athenian life, even without Archelaus, would suggest human relations, duties, action and suffering, as the most interesting materials for contemplation and discourse. Sokratēs could not go into the public assembly, the Dikastery, or even the theatre—without hearing discussions about what was just or unjust, honourable or base, expedient or hurtful, &c., nor without having his mind conducted to the inquiry, what was the meaning of these large words which opposing disputants often invoked with equal reverential confidence. Along with the dialectic and generalising power of Sokratēs, which formed his bond of connection with such minds as Plato—there was at the same time a vigorous practicality, a large stock of positive Athenian experience, with which Xenophon chiefly sympathised, and which he has brought out in his 'Memorabilia.' Of these two intellectual tendencies, combined with a strong religious sentiment, the character of Sokratēs is composed; and all of them were gratified at once, when he devoted himself to admonitory interrogation on the rules and purposes of human life; from which there was the less to divert him, as he had neither talents nor taste for public speaking.

¹ Xenoph. Mem. iv. 7, 6. "Ὅλας δὲ τῶν αἰσίων, ἧ ἕκαστα ὁ θεὸς μηχανῶται, φημιστοτὴν γίνεσθαι ἀνθρώπων· ὅτε γὰρ εὐρετὰ ἀνθρώποις αὐτὰ ἐνέμιζεν εἶναι, ὅτε χαρίζεσθαι θεοῖς ἂν ἔγχετο τὸν ζητῶντα, ὃ δὲ οὐκ ὀφείλει αἰετὶ ἐβουλεύεσθαι. Καθουσίῃσι δ' ἂν ἔφη καὶ παραφροῇσι τὸν ταῦτα μεμνῶντα, οἷόν τι ἦεν ἡ Ἀναξαγόρας παρεφρίσασθαι, ὃ τὰ μέγιστα φροῇσι ἐπὶ τῇ τὰς τῶν θεῶν μηχανῇ ἐξηγεῖσθαι.

That "the proper study of mankind is man"¹—Sokratēs was the first to proclaim. He recognised the security and happiness of man both as the single end of study, and as the limiting principle whereby it ought to be circumscribed. In the present state to which science has attained, nothing is more curious than to look back at the rules which this eminent man laid down. Astronomy—now exhibiting the maximum of perfection, with the largest and most exact power of predicting future phænomena, which human science has ever attained—was pronounced by him to be among the divine mysteries which it was impossible to understand, and madness to investigate—as Anaxagoras had foolishly pretended to do. He admitted indeed that there was advantage in knowing enough of the movements of the heavenly bodies to serve as an index to the change of seasons, and as guides for voyages, journeys by

Limits of scientific study as laid down by Sokratēs.

¹ Xenoph. Mem. i. 1, 16. Ἀνὴρ δὲ περὶ τὰς ἀνθρωπείων ἀεὶ διελίσσεται, &c. Compare the whole of this chapter.

land, or night-watches. But thus much (he said) might easily be obtained from pilots and watchmen; while all beyond was nothing but waste of valuable time, exhausting that mental effort which ought to be employed in profitable acquisitions. He reduced geometry to its literal meaning of land-measuring, necessary so far as to enable any one to proceed correctly in the purchase, sale, or division of land, which any man of common attention might do almost without a teacher—but silly and worthless, if carried beyond, to the study of complicated diagrams¹. Respecting arithmetic, he gave the same qualified permission of study; but as to general physics, or the study of Nature, he discarded it altogether: “Do these inquirers (he asked) think that they already know human affairs well enough, that they thus begin to meddle with divine? Do they think that they shall be able to excite or calm the winds and the rain at pleasure, or have they no other view than to gratify an idle curiosity? Surely they must see that such matters are beyond human investigation. Let them only recollect how much the greatest men, who have attempted the investigation, differ in their pretended results, holding opinions extreme and opposite to each other, like those of madmen!”² Such was the view which Sokratēs took of physical science and its prospects³.

¹ Xenoph. Mem. iv. 7, 5.

² Xenoph. Mem. i. 1, 12-15. Plato entertained much larger views on the subject of physical and astronomical studies than either Sokratēs or Xenophon: see Plato, Phædrus, c. 120, p. 270 A; and Republic, vii. c. 6-11, p. 522 seq.

³ His treatise De Legibus, however, written in his old age, falls below this tone.

It is the very same scepticism in substance, and carried farther in degree, though here invested with a religious colouring—for which Ritter and others so severely denounce Gorgias. But looking at matters as they stood in 440–430 B.C., it ought not to be accounted even surprising, much less blameable. To an acute man of that day, physical science as then studied may well be conceived to have promised no result; and even to have seemed worse than barren, if (like Sokratês) he had an acute perception how much of human happiness was forfeited by immorality, and by corrigible ignorance—how much might be gained by devoting the same amount of earnest study to this latter object. Nor ought we to omit remarking, that the objection of Sokratês—"You may judge how unprofitable are these studies, by observing how widely the students differ among themselves"—remains in high favour down to the present day, and may constantly be seen employed against theoretical men or theoretical arguments, in every department.

Sokratês desired to confine the studies of his hearers to human matters as distinguished from divine; the latter comprehending astronomy and physics. He looked at all knowledge from the point of view of human practice, which had been assigned by the gods to man as his proper subject for study and learning, and with reference to which, therefore, they managed all the current phenomena upon principles of constant and intelligible sequence: so that everyone who chose to learn, might learn—while those who took no such pains suffered for their neglect. Even in these, however, the most careful study was not by itself completely sufficient; for the gods did not condescend to submit all the phenomena to constant antecedence and consequence, but reserved to themselves the capital turns and junctures for special sentence¹. Yet here again, if a man had been diligent in learning all that the gods permitted to be learnt—and if, besides, he was assiduous in pious court to them and in soliciting special information by way of prophecy—they would be gracious to him, so far as to signify beforehand how they intended to act in putting the final band and in settling the undecipherable portions of the problem². The kindness of the gods in replying through their oracles, or sending information by sacrificial signs or prodigies, in cases of grave difficulty—was, in the view of Sokratēs, one of the most signal evidences of their care for the human race³. To seek access to these prophecies, or indications of special divine intervention to come, was the proper supplementary business of any one who had done as much for himself as could be done by patient study⁴. But as it was madness in a man to solicit special information from the gods on matters which they

He confines study to human affairs, as distinguished from divine—to man and society.

¹ Xenoph. Mem. i. 1, 7. Καὶ τοὺς μάλιστα οἰκονομοῦσι τε καὶ πόλεις καλῶς οἰκίσουσιν, μαντικῇ ἱκῆν προσδεῖσθαι. Τεκτονικὸν μὲν γὰρ, ἢ χαλκευτικόν, ἢ γεωργικόν, ἢ ἀνθρώπων ἀρχικόν, ἢ τῶν τιμωτῶν ἔργων ἐξιστασιώων, ἢ λογιστικόν, ἢ οἰκονομικόν, ἢ στρατηγικόν γινώσκειν—πάντα τὰ τοιαῦτα μαθήματα καὶ ἀνθρώπων γεωργίᾳ αἰρετὴν ἐκδίδωκεν εἶναι. Τὰ δὲ μέγιστα τῶν ἐν τοῖς τοῖς θεοῖς ἐαυτοῖς καταλείπεσθαι, ὥς οἶδεν δῆλον εἶναι τοῖς ἀνθρώποις, &c.

² Xenoph. Mem. i. 1, 9-19. Ἐκῆν δὲ δεῖν, ὃ μὲν μαθήματα ποιεῖν ἔπος ἐστὶν αἱ θεαὶ, μαθεῖν δὲ δὲ μὴ δῖον τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ εἶναι, παρὶσθαι δὲ μαντικῇ παρὰ τῶν θεῶν πειθόμενον· τοὺν γὰρ θεῶν, οἷς ἂν ἰκίῃ, &c.

³ Xenoph. Mem. i. 4, 15; iv. 3, 12. When Xenophon was deliberating whether he should take military service under Cyrus the younger, he consulted Sokratēs, who advised him to go to Delphi and submit the case to the oracle (Xen. Anabasis, iii. 1, 5).

⁴ Xenoph. Mem. iv. 7, 10.

allowed him to learn by his own diligence—so it was not less madness in him to investigate as a learner that which they chose to keep back for their own specialty of will¹.

Such was the capital innovation made by Sokratēs in regard to the subject of Athenian study, bringing down philosophy (to use the expression of Cicero)² from the heavens to the earth; and such his attempt to draw the line between that which was, and was not, scientifically discoverable: an attempt, remarkable, inasmuch as it shows his conviction that the scientific and the religious point of view mutually excluded one another, so that where the latter began the former ended. It was an innovation, inestimable, in respect to the new matter which it let in; of little import, as regards that which it professed to exclude. For in point of fact, physical science, though partially discouraged, was never absolutely excluded, through any prevalence of that systematic disapproval which he, in common with the multitude of his day, entertained: if it became comparatively neglected, this arose rather from the greater popularity, and the more abundant and accessible matter, of that which he introduced. Physical or astronomical science was narrow in amount, known only to few; and even with those few it did not admit of being expanded, enlivened, or turned to much profitable account in discussion. But the moral and political phenomena, on which Sokratēs turned the light of speculation, were abundant, varied, familiar, and interesting to every one; comprising (to translate a Greek line which he was fond of quoting) "all the good and evil which has befallen you in your home¹;" connected too, not merely with the realities of the present, but also with the literature of the past, through the gnomic and other poets.

Importance of the innovation—multitude of new and accessible phenomena brought under discussion.

¹ Xenoph. Mem. i. 1, 9; iv. 7, 6. ² Cicero, Tusc. Disp. v. 4, 10.

The motives which determined this important innovation, as to subject of study, exhibit Sokratēs chiefly as a religious man and a practical, philanthropic preceptor—the Xenophontic hero. His innovations, not less important, as to method and doctrine, place before us the philosopher and dialectician—the other side of his character, or the Platonic hero; faintly traced indeed, yet still recognised and identified, by Xenophon.

Innovations of Sokratēs as to method—dialectic
method—inductive discourses —definitions.

"Sokratēs (says the latter²) continued incessantly discussing human affairs (the sense of this word will be understood by what has been said above, p. 578), investigating—What is piety? What is impiety? What is the honourable and the base? What is the just and the unjust? What is temperance, or unsound mind? What is courage or cowardice? What is a city? What is the character fit for a citizen? What is authority over men? What is the character befitting the exercise of such authority? and other similar questions. Men who knew these matters he accounted good and honourable; men who were ignorant of them, he assimilated to slaves."

Sokratēs (says Xenophon again, in another passage) considered that the dialectic process consisted in coming together and taking common counsel to distinguish and distribute things into Genera or Families, so as to learn what each separate thing really was. To go through this process carefully was indispensable, as the only way of enabling a man to regulate his own conduct, aiming at good objects and avoiding bad. To be so practised as to be able to do it readily, was essential to make a man a good leader or adviser of others. Every man who had gone through the process, and come to know what each thing was, could also of course define it and explain it to others; but if he did not know, it was no wonder that he went wrong himself, and put others wrong besides¹. Moreover, Aristotle says—"To Sokratēs we may unquestionably assign two novelties—Inductive Discourses—and the Definitions of general terms²."

¹ Ὅτι τοι ἐν οἰκίᾳ καλῶς καὶ ἀγαθῶς καὶ κακῶς.

² Xenoph. Mem. i. 1, 16.

¹ Xenoph. Mem. iv. 5, 11, 12. Ἄλλα τοῖς ἐγχεῖται μῶροις ἔχεισι σκοπεῖν τὰ κράτιστα τῶν πραγμάτων, καὶ λόγῳ καὶ ἔργῳ διαλέγεσθαι κατὰ γένη, τὰ μὲν ἀγαθὰ προμεινίσθαι, τῶν δὲ κακῶν ἀπέχεσθαι. Καὶ οὕτως ἔφη ἀρίστους τε καὶ εὐδαιμονιστάτους ἄνδρας γίγνεσθαι, καὶ διαλέγεσθαι διαιτηστάτους. Ἐφη δὲ καὶ τὸ διαλέγεσθαι ἡμεροσθέσαι, ἐκ τοῦ συνίσταται κοινῇ βουλευέσθαι διαλέγοντας κατὰ γένη τὰ πρόγματα· δεῖν οὖν περᾶσθαι ἐπὶ μάλιστα πρὸς τοῦτο ἱτοιμασμένους παρασκευάζειν, καὶ τοῦτον μάλιστα ἐπιμελεῖσθαι ἐκ τούτων γὰρ γίγνεσθαι ἄνδρας ἀρίστους τε καὶ ἡγεμονιστάτους καὶ διαλεκτικιστάτους.

Surely the etymology here given by Xenophon or Sokratēs of the word διαλέγεσθαι, cannot be considered as satisfactory?

Again, iv. 6, 1. Σωκράτης δὲ τοῖς μὲν εἰδότες τι ἑκάστῳ εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν ἐνέμιξε καὶ τοῖς ἄλλοις ἢ ἐγγίγασθαι διδάσκει· τοῖς δὲ μὴ εἰδότες, αὐτὸς ἔφη θαυμαστόν εἶναι, αὐτοῖς δὲ σφάλλεσθαι καὶ ἄλλους σφάλλειν. Ὡς ἴσως σκοπεῖν μὲν τοῖς σοφοῖς, τι ἑκάστῳ εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν, οὐδέποτε ἔλγῃ· Πάντα μὲν οὖν, ᾧ διωρίζετο, πολὺ ἢ ἔργῳ εἰς διαφέρεσθαι ἐκ οὐρανοῦ δὲ καὶ τὸν τρόπον τῆς ἐπισκοφῆς δηλώσαντες οἱ μὲν, τοσαῦτα λέξαι.

² Aristot. Metaphys. i. 6, 3, p. 987 b. Σωκράτους δὲ περὶ μὲν τὰ ἡθικά πραγματευομένου, περὶ δὲ τῆς διαιτητικῆς αὐτοῦ—ἐν μέρει κινεῖται τὸ καθόλου ζητοῦντος καὶ περὶ ὁρισμῶν ἐπιστήσαντος πρῶτον τὴν διάνοιαν, &c. Again, xiii. 4, 6-8 p. 1078 b. Δύο γὰρ ἴσους ἂν τι ἢ ἀποδοῇ Σωκράτης δεινότης, τοῖς ἑ' ἐπαχτικοῖς λόγους καὶ τὰ ὀρίζεσθαι καθόλου· compare xiii. 9, 35, p. 1086 b; Cicero, Topic. i. 42.

These two attributes, of the discussions carried on by Sokratēs, explain

Commencement of analytical consciousness of the mental operations
—genera
and species.

I borrow here intentionally from Xenophon in preference to Plato; since the former, tamely describing a process which he imperfectly appreciated, identifies it so much the more completely with the real Sokratēs—and is thus a better witness than Plato, whose genius not only conceived but greatly enlarged it for didactic purposes of his own. In our present state of knowledge, some mental effort is required to see anything important in the words of Xenophon; so familiar has every student been rendered with the ordinary terms and gradations of logic and classification,—such as Genus—Definition—Individual things as comprehended in a Genus—what each thing is, and to what genus it belongs, &c. But familiar as these words have now become, they denote a mental process, of which, in 440–430 B.C., few men besides Sokratēs had any conscious perception. Of course men conceived and described things in classes, as is implied in the very form and language, and in the habitual junction of predicates with subjects in common speech. They explained their meaning clearly and forcibly in particular cases: they laid down maxims, argued questions, stated premises, and the epithet attached to him by Timon the Sillographer, that he was the leader and originator of the accurate talkers or precisians—

Ἐκ δ' ἄρα τῶν ἀπείλπει λοβοξόων, ἐκτροχίσχων, Ἐλλήνων ἐπαινοῦν ἀκριβολόγων ἀποφύγων,
Μικτῆρ, μετρομέμετοι, ὑπερτιβεῖς, εἰρωνεύοντες.

(ap. Diog. Laërt. ii. 19.)

To a large proportion of hearers of that time (as of other times), accurate thinking and talking appeared petty and in bad taste—ἡ ἀκριβολογία μικροπρεπὲς (Aristot. Ethic. Nikomach. iv. 4. p. 1122 b; also Aristot. Metaphys. ii. 3. p. 995 a). Even Plato thinks himself obliged to make a sort of apology for it (Theaet. c. 102. p. 184 C). No doubt Timon used the word ἀκριβολόγων in a sneering sense.

drew conclusions, on trials in the Dikastery, or debates in the assembly: they had an abundant poetical literature, which appealed to every variety of emotion: they were beginning to compile historical narrative, intermixed with reflection and criticism. But though all this was done, and often admirably well done, it was wanting in that analytical consciousness which would have enabled any one to describe, explain, or vindicate what he was doing. The ideas of men—speakers as well as hearers, the productive minds as well as the recipient multitude—were associated together in groups favourable rather to emotional results, or to poetical, rhetorical, narrative and descriptive effect, than to methodical generalisation, to scientific conception, or to proof either inductive or deductive. That reflex act of attention which enables men to understand, compare, and rectify, their own mental process, was only just beginning. It was a recent novelty on the part of the rhetorical teachers, to analyse the component parts of a public harangue, and to propound some precepts for making men tolerable speakers. Protagoras was just setting forth various grammatical distinctions, while Prodikus discriminated the significations of words nearly equivalent and liable to be confounded. All these proceedings appeared then so new¹ as to incur the ridicule even of Plato: yet they were branches of that same analytical tendency which Sokratès now carried into scientific inquiry. It may be doubted whether any one before him ever used the words Genus and Species (originally meaning Family and Form) in the philosophical sense now exclusively appropriated to them. Not one of those many names (called by logicians names of the second intention), which imply distinct attention to various parts of the logical process, and enable us to consider and criticise it in detail—then existed. All of them grew out of the schools of Plato, Aristotle, and the subsequent philosophers, so that we can thus trace them in their beginning to the common root and father, Sokratès.

¹ How slowly grammatical analysis proceeded among the Greeks, and how long it was before they got at what are now elementary ideas in every instructed man's mind—may be seen in Gräfenhahn, Geschichte der Klassischen Philologie im Alterthum, s. 89-92, &c. On this point, these Sophists seem to have been decidedly in advance of their age.

Sokratès
compared with previous philosophers.

To comprehend the full value of the improvements struck out by Sokratès, we have only to examine the intellectual paths pursued by his predecessors or contemporaries. He set to himself distinct and specific problems—"What is justice? What is piety, courage, political government? What is it which is really denoted by such great and important names, bearing upon the conduct or happiness of man?" Now it has been already remarked that Anaxagoras, Empedoklès, Demokritus, the Pythagoreans, all had still present to their minds those vast and undivided problems which had been transmitted down from the old poets; bending their minds to the invention of some system which would explain them all at once, or assist the imagination in conceiving both how the Kosmos first began, and how it continued to move on¹. Ethics and physics,

¹ This same tendency, to break off from the vague aggregate then conceived as Physics, is discernible in the Hippokratic treatises, and even in the treatise de Antiqua Medicinâ, which M. Littre places first man and nature, were all blended together; and the Pythagoreans, who explained all Nature by numbers and numerical relations, applied the same explanation to moral attributes—considering justice to be symbolised by a perfect equation, or by four, the first of all square numbers¹. These early philosophers endeavoured to find out the beginnings, the component elements, the moving cause or causes, of things in the mass²; but the logical distribution into Genus, Species, and individuals, does not seem in his edition, and considers to be the production of Hippokratēs himself, in which case it would be contemporary with Sokratēs. On this subject of authorship, however, other critics do not agree with him; see the question examined in his vol. i. ch. xii. p. 295 seq.

Hippokratēs (if he be the author) begins by deprecating the attempt to connect the study of medicine with physical or astronomical hypothesis (c. 2), and farther protests against the procedure of various medical writers and Sophists, or philosophers, such as Empedoklēs, who set themselves to make out "what man was from the beginning, how he began first to exist, and in what manner he was constructed" (c. 20). This does not belong (he says) to medicine, which ought indeed to be studied as a comprehensive whole, but as a whole determined by and bearing reference to its own end: "You ought to study the nature of man, what he is with reference to that which he eats and drinks, and to all his other occupations or habits, and to the consequences resulting from each"—ὅτι ἄνθρωπος ἀσθενῶν πρὸς τὰ ἐσθίειν καὶ πίνειν, καὶ ἄνθρωπος πρὸς τὰ ἄλλα ἐπιτελεῖσθαι, καὶ ἄνθρωπος ἀπ' ἐκείνων ἐκείνης ἐπιτελεῖσθαι.

The spirit, in which Hippokratēs here approaches the study of medicine, is exceedingly analogous to that which dictated the innovation of Sokratēs in respect to the study of Ethics. The same character pervades the treatise, De Aere, Locis et Aquis—a definite and predetermined field of inquiry—and Hippocratic treatises generally.

¹ Aristotel. Metaphys. i. 5. p. 985, 986. τὰ μὲν τοιαῦτα τῶν ἀριθμῶν πῶς διακαιοῦνται, τὰ δὲ τοιαῦτα ψυχῇ καὶ σώει, ἕτερον δὲ καί ποτε, &c. Ethica Magna, i. 1. ἡ διακαιοῦν ἀριθμῶν ἰσότης ἴσος: see Brandis, Gesch. der Gr. Röm. Philos. lxxii. lxxiii. p. 492.

² Aristotel. Metaphys. iii. 3. p. 998 A. Ὅλος Ἐμπεδοκλῆς πῦρ καὶ ὕδωρ καὶ τὰ μετὰ ταῦτα, στοιχειᾷ φησὶ εἶναι ἐξ ὧν ἐστὶ τὰ ἄνθρωπον ἐκπαρχόντων, ἀλλ' οὐκ ὡς γένη λέγει ταῦτα τῶν ὄντων. That generic division to have suggested itself to them, or to have been made a subject of distinct attention by any one before Sokratēs. To study Ethics, or human dispositions and ends, apart from the physical world, and according to a theory of their own, referring to human good and happiness as the sovereign and comprehensive end¹; to treat each of the great and familiar words designating moral attributes, as logical aggregates comprehending many judgments in particular cases, and connoting a certain harmony or consistency of purpose among the separate judgments; to bring many of these latter into comparison, by a scrutinising dialectical process, so as to test the consistency and completeness of the logical aggregate and subdivision was unknown or unpractised by these early men, is noticed by Plato (Sophist. c. 114. p. 267 D).

Aristotle thinks that the Pythagoreans had some faint and obscure notion of the logical genus—ἐπὶ τοῦ τι εἶναι ὁρίζοντα πᾶς λέγειν καὶ ὁρίζεσθαι, λέγει δὲ ἀπλῶς ἐπαγαγεῖσθαι (Metaphys. i. 5, 29. p. 986 B). But we see by comparing two other passages in that treatise (xiii. 4, 6. p. 1078 b with i. 5, 2. p. 985 b) that the Pythagorean definitions of αὐτὸς, τὸ ἅμα, &c. were nothing more than certain numerical fancies; so that these words cannot fairly be said to have designated, in their view, logical genera. Nor can the ten Pythagorean μεταβολαί, or parallel series of contraries, be called by that name; arranged in order to gratify a fancy about the perfection of the number ten, which fancy afterwards seems to have passed to Aristotle himself when drawing up his ten predicaments.

See a valuable Exegetica upon the Aristotelian expressions τι εἶναι—τι ἦν εἶναι, &c., appended to Schwegler's edition of Aristotle's Metaphysica, vol. ii. p. 369. p. 373.

About the few and imperfect definitions which Aristotle seems also to ascribe to Demokritos, see Trendelenburg, Comment. ad Aristot. De Animā, p. 212.

¹ Aristotle remarks about the Pythagoreans, that they referred the virtues to number and numerical relations—not giving to them a theory of their own—οὐς γὰρ ἀπὸ τοῦ εἰς τοῖς ἀριθμοῖς ἀνέγειν οὐκ ἀλλὰ τὰς ἀρετὰς τῇ θεωρίᾳ ἐποιεῖτο (Ethic. Magn. i. 1).

or general notion, as it stood in every man's mind :—all these were parts of the same forward movement which Sokratēs originated.

It was at that time a great progress to break down the unwieldy mass conceived by former philosophers as science ; and to study Ethics apart, with a reference, more or less distinct, to their own appropriate end. Nay, we see (if we may trust the 'Phædon' of Plato¹) that Sokratēs, before he resolved on such pronounced severance, had tried to construct, or had at least yearned after, an undivided and reformed system including Physics also under the Ethical end ; a scheme of optimistic physics, applying the general idea "What was best" as the commanding principle from whence physical explanations were to be deduced ; which he hoped to find, but did not find, in Anaxagoras. But it was a still greater advance to seize, and push out in conscious application, the essential features of that logical process, upon the correct performance of which all our security for general truth depends. The notions of Genus, subordinate Genera, and individuals as comprehended under them (we need not here notice the points on which Plato and Aristotle differed from each other and from the modern conceptions on that subject), were at that time newly brought into clear consciousness in the human mind. The profusion of logical distribution employed in some of the dialogues of Plato, such as the Sophistēs and the Politicus, seems partly traceable to his wish to familiarise hearers with that which was then a novelty, as well as to enlarge its development, and diversify its mode of application. He takes numerous indirect opportunities of bringing it out into broad light, by putting, into the mouths of his dialogists, answers implying complete inattention to it, exposed afterwards in the course of the dialogue by Sokratēs¹. What was now begun by Sokratēs, and improved by Plato, was embodied as part in a comprehensive system of formal logic by the genius of Aristotle; a system which was not only of extraordinary value in reference to the processes and controversies of its time, but which also, having become insensibly worked into the minds of instructed men, has contributed much to form what is correct in the habits of modern thinking. Though it has been now enlarged and recast, by some modern authors (especially by Mr. John Stuart Mill in his admirable System of Logic) into a structure commensurate with the vast increase of knowledge and extension of positive method belonging to the present day—we must recollect that the distance, between

Great step made by Sokratēs in laying the foundation of formal logic, afterwards expanded by Plato, and systematised by Aristotle.

¹ Plato, Phædon, c. 102 seq. p. 96, 97.

¹ As one specimen among many, see Plato, Theætet. c. 11. p. 146 D. It is maintained by Brandis, and in part by C. Heyder (see Heyder, Kritische Darstellung und Vergleichung der Aristotelischen und Hegelschen Dialektik, part i. p. 85, 129), that the logical process, called Division, is not to be considered as having been employed by Sokratēs along with Definition, but begins with Plato: in proof of which they remark that in the two Platonic dialogues called Sophistēs and Politicus, wherein this process is most abundantly employed, Sokratēs is not the conductor of the conversation.

Little stress is to be laid on this circumstance, I think; and the terms in which Xenophon describes the method of Sokratēs (διαλέγεσθαι κατὰ γένος καὶ ἐπὶ ὅμοιοις, Mem. iv. 5, 12) seem to imply the one process as well as the other; indeed it was scarcely possible to keep them apart, with so abundant a talker as Sokratēs. Plato doubtless both enlarged and systematised the Method in every way, and especially made greater use of the process of Division, because he pushed the Dialogue further into positive scientific research than Sokratēs.

the best modern logic and that of Aristotle, is hardly so great as that between Aristotle and those who preceded him by a century—Empedoklēs, Anaxagoras, and the Pythagoreans; and that the movement in advance of these latter commences with Sokratēs.

By Xenophon, by Plato, and by Aristotle, the growth as well as the habitual use of logical classification is represented as concurrent with and dependent upon dialectics. In this methodised discussion, so much in harmony with the marked sociability of the Greek character, the quick recurrence of short question and answer was needful as a stimulus to the attention, at a time when the habit of close and accurate reflection on abstract subjects had been so little cultivated. But the dialectics of Sokratēs had far greater and more important peculiarities than this. We must always consider his method in conjunction with the subjects to which he applied it. As those subjects were not recondite or special, but bore on the practical life of the house, the market-place, the city, the Dikastery, the gymnasium, or the temple, with which every one was familiar—so Sokratēs never presented himself as a teacher, nor as a man having new knowledge to communicate. On the contrary, he disclaimed such pretensions, uniformly and even ostentatiously. But the subjects on which he talked were just those which every one professed to know perfectly and thoroughly, and on which every one believed himself in a condition to instruct others, rather than to require instruction for himself. On such questions as these—What is justice?—What is piety?—What is a democracy?—What is a law?—every man fancied that he could give a confident opinion, and even wondered that any other person should feel a difficulty. When Sokratès, professing ignorance, put any such question, he found no difficulty in obtaining an answer, given offhand, and with very little reflection. The answer purported to be the explanation or definition of a term—familiar indeed, but of wide and comprehensive import—given by one who had never before tried to render to himself an account of what it meant. Having got this answer, Sokratès put fresh questions applying it to specific cases, to which the respondent was compelled to give answers inconsistent with the first; thus showing that the definition was either too narrow, or too wide, or defective in some essential condition. The respondent then amended his answer, but this was a prelude to other questions, which could only be answered in ways inconsistent with the amendment; and the respondent, after many attempts to disentangle himself, was obliged to plead guilty to the inconsistencies, with an admission that he could make no satisfactory answer to the original query, which had at first appeared so easy and familiar. Or if he did not himself admit this, the hearers at least felt it forcibly. The dialogue, as given to us, commonly ends with a result purely negative, proving that the respondent was incompetent to answer the question proposed to him, in a manner consistent and satisfactory even to himself. Sokratès, as he professed from the beginning to have no positive theory to support, so he maintains to the end the same air of a learner, who would be glad to solve the difficulty if he could, but regrets to find himself disappointed of that instruction which the respondent had promised.

Dialectical process employed by Sokratēs—essential connexion between method and subject.

We see by this description of the cross-examining path of this remarkable man, how intimate was the bond of connexion between the dialectic method and the logical distribution of particulars into species and genera. The discussion first raised by Sokratēs turns upon the meaning of some large generic term: the queries whereby he follows it up, bring the answer given into collision with various particulars which it ought not to comprehend, yet does—or with others, which it ought to comprehend, but does not. It is in this manner that the latent and undefined cluster of association, which has grown up round a familiar term, is as it were penetrated by a fermenting leaven, forcing it to expand into discernible portions, and bringing the appropriate function which the term ought to fulfill, to become a subject of distinct consciousness. The inconsistencies into which the hearer is betrayed in his various answers proclaim to him the fact that he has not yet acquired anything like a clear and full conception of the common attribute which binds together the various particulars embraced under some term which is ever upon his lips—or perhaps enable him to detect a different fact, not less important, that there is no such common attribute, and that the generalisation is merely nominal and fallacious. In either case, he is put upon the train of thought which leads to a correction of the generalisation, and lights him on to that which Plato¹ calls seeing the One in the Many, and the Many in the One. Without any predecessor to copy, Sokratēs fell as it were instinctively into that which Aristotle¹ describes as the double track of the dialectic process—breaking up the One into Many and recombining the Many into One. The former duty, at once the first and the most essential, Sokratēs performed directly by his analytical string of questions—the latter, or synthetical process, was one which he did not often directly undertake, but strove so to arm and stimulate the hearer's mind, as to enable him to do it for himself. This One and Many denote the logical distribution of a multifarious subject-matter under generic terms, with clear understanding of the attributes implied or connoted by each term, so as to discriminate those particulars to which it really applies. At a moment when such logical distribution was as yet novel as a subject of consciousness, it could hardly have been probed and laid out in the mind by any less stringent process than the cross-examining dialectics of Sokratēs—applied to the analysis of some attempts at definition hastily given by respondents; that "inductivediscourse and search for (clear general notions or) definitions of general terms," which Aristotle so justly points out as his peculiar innovation.

Essential connexion also between the dialectic process and the logical distribution of subject-matter—One in Many and Many in One.

¹ Plato, Phædrus, c. 109. p. 265 D; Sophistēs, c. 83. p. 253 E.

I have already adverted to the persuasion of religious mission under which Sokratēs acted in pur-

¹ Aristot. Topic. viii. 14. p. 164, b. 2. 'Ἐστὶ μὲν γὰρ ὡς ἀπλῶς εἰπεῖν διαλεκτικὴς, ὁ προτατικὸς καὶ ἐνστατικὸς. Ἐστὶ δὲ τὸ μὲν προτείνεσθαι, ἐν ποιεῖν τὰ πλείω (θεῖ γὰρ ἐν ὅλῳ λαμβάνειν πρὸς ὃ ὁ λόγος) τὸ δ' ἐκταράσθαι, τὸ ἐκ πολλῶν ἢ γὰρ διαιρεῖ ἢ διαιρεῖ, τὸ μὲν διδοῖς, τὸ δ' αἰ, τὴν προτείνουμένην.

It was from Sokratēs that dialectic skill derived its great extension and development (Aristot. Metaphys. xiii. 4, p. 1078 b).

suing this system of conversation and interrogation. He probably began it in a tentative way¹, upon a modest scale, and under the pressure of logical embarrassment weighing on his own mind. But as he proceeded, and found himself successful as well as acquiring reputation among a certain circle of friends, his earnest soul became more and more penetrated with devotion to that which he regarded as a duty. It was at this time probably, that his friend Chærephon came back with the oracular answer from Delphi (noticed a few pages above) to which Sokratēs himself alludes as having prompted him to extend the range of his conversation, and to question a class of persons whom he had not before ventured to approach—the noted politicians, poets, and artisans. He found them more confident than humbler individuals in their own wisdom, but quite as unable to reply to his queries without being driven to contradictory answers.

Persuasion of religious mission in Sokratēs, prompting him to extend his colloquial cross-examination to noted men.

Such scrutiny of the noted men in Athens is made to stand prominent in the 'Platonic Apology,' because it was the principal cause of that unpopularity which Sokratēs at once laments and accounts for before the Dikasts. Nor can we doubt that it was the most impressive portion of his proceedings, in the eyes both of enemies and admirers, as well as the most flattering to his own natural temper. Nevertheless it would be a mistake to present this part of the general purpose of Sokratēs—or of his divine

His cross-examining purpose was not confined to noted men, but of universal application.

¹ What Plato makes Sokratēs say in the Euthyphron, c. 12. p. 11 D—ἄρα εἴμ' ἐρεφός, &c., may be accounted as true at least in the beginning of the active career of Sokratēs; compare the Hippias Minor, c. 18. p. 376 B; Laches, c. 33. p. 200 E.

mission, if we adopt his own language,—as if it were the whole; and to describe him as one standing forward merely to unmask select leading men, politicians, sophists, poets, or others, who had acquired unmerited reputation, and were puffed up with foolish conceit of their own abilities, being in reality shallow and incompetent. Such an idea of Sokratēs is at once inadequate and erroneous. His conversation (as I have before remarked) was absolutely universal and indiscriminate; while the mental defect which he strove to rectify was one not at all peculiar to leading men, but common to them with the mass of mankind—though seeming to be exaggerated in them, partly because more is expected from them, partly because the general feeling of self-estimation stands at a higher level, naturally and reasonably, in their bosoms, than in those of ordinary persons. That defect was, the “seeming and conceit of knowledge without the reality,” on human life with its duties, purposes, and conditions—the knowledge of which Sokratēs called emphatically “human wisdom,” and regarded as essential to the dignity of a freeman; while he treated other branches of science as above the level of man¹, and

¹ Xenoph. Memor. i. 1, 12-16. Πότερὸς ποτε νομίζοντες ἰσχυρῶς ἔδει τὰνθρώποισι εἰδέναι ἐρχομένη (the physical philosophers) ἐπὶ τὸ περὶ τῶν τιούτων φροντίζειν ἢ τὰ μὲν ἀνθρώποισι περὶέντες, τὰ δὲ δαίμονια σκοποῦντες, ἡγούμενοι τὰ προήκοντα σπάντεν..... Αὐτοὶ δὲ περὶ τῆς ἀνθρωπείας αἰεὶ διελέγετο, σκοπῶν, τί εἰσέλαι, τί ἀρετῆς αὐτὴ περὶ τῶν ἄλλων, ἃ τοῖς μὲν εἰδότες ἡγήντο καλοῖς καὶ καλοῖς εἶναι, τοὺς δὲ ἡγροῦντας ἀνδραποδῶσαι ἢ δυνάμει καλῆσθαι.

Plato, Apolog. Sok. c. 5, p. 20 D. ἥτις ἵσταν ἴσως ἀνθρωπείῃ σοφίᾳ τῷ ὄντι γὰρ εὐδαιμόνιᾳ τῆς τοῦ εἶναι σοφός οὖτος δὲ τὰς δὲ, οὐκ ἀπὸ τῆς τοῦ, μίση τῶν δὲ κατ' ἀνθρώπων σοφίας σοφοὶ εἰναι, &c. Compare c. 9, p. 23 A.

as a stretch of curiosity, not merely superfluous, but reprehensible. His warfare against such false persuasion of knowledge, in one man as well as another, upon those subjects (for with him, I repeat, we must never disconnect the method from the subjects)—clearly marked even in Xenophon, is abundantly and strikingly illustrated by the fertile genius of Plato, and constituted the true missionary scheme which pervaded the last half of his long life: a scheme far more comprehensive, as well as more generous, than those anti-Sophistic polemics which are assigned to him by so many authors as his prominent object¹.

In pursuing the thread of his examination, there was no topic upon which Sokratēs more frequently insisted, than the contrast between the state of men's knowledge on the general topics of man and society—and that which artists or professional men possessed in their respective special crafts. So perpetually did he reproduce this comparison, that

Leading ideas which directed the scrutiny of Sokratēs—contrast between the special professions and the general duties of social life.

¹ It is this marrow purpose that Plutarch ascribes to Sokratēs, Questiones Platonicæ, p. 299 E: compare also Tennemann, Geschicht. der Philos. part ii. art. i. vol. ii. p. 81.

Amidst the customary outpouring of groundless censure against the Sophists, which Tennemann here gives, one assertion is remarkable. He tells us that it was the more easy for Sokratēs to put down the Sophists, since their shallowness and worthlessness, after a short period of vogue, had already been detected by intelligent men, and was becoming discredited.

It is strange to find such an assertion made, for a period between 420–399 B.C., the era when Protagoras, Prodikos, Hippodamos, &c. reached the maximum of celebrity.

And what are we to say about the statement, that Sokratēs put down the Sophists, when we recollect that the Megaric school and Antisthenēs—both emanating from Sokratēs—are more frequently attacked than any one else in the dialogues of Plato, as having all those sceptical and disputatious propensities with which the Sophists are reproached?

his enemies accused him of wearing it threadbare¹. Take a man of special vocation—a carpenter, a brazier, a pilot, a musician, a surgeon—and examine him on the state of his professional knowledge—you will find him able to indicate the persons from whom, and the steps by which, he first acquired it: he can describe to you his general aim, with the particular means which he employs to realise the aim, as well as the reason why such means must be employed and why precautions must be taken to combat such and such particular obstructions: he can teach his profession to others: in matters relating to his profession, he counts as an authority, so that no extra-professional person thinks of contesting the decision of a surgeon in case of disease, or of a pilot at sea. But while such is the fact in regard to every special art, how great is the contrast in reference to the art of righteous, social, and useful living, which forms, or ought to form, the common business alike important to each and to all! On this subject Sokratēs² remarked that every one felt perfectly well-

¹ Plato, Gorgias, c. 101. p. 491 A.

Kalliklēs. 'Οτι αἱ ταῦτα λέγεις, ὦ Σόκратες. Σοκράτης. Οὐ μέντοι γε, ὦ Καλλικλέης, ἀλλὰ περὶ τῶν αὐτῶν. Καλλικλēs. Νῆ τοις θεοῖς, ἀνεχόμεν γε δεῖ στυγρίας καὶ κραφείας καὶ μαγειρίους λέγας καὶ ἰατρούς, οὐδὲν παύειν. Compare Plato, Symposium, p. 221 E; also Xenoph. Memor. i. 2, 37; iv. 5, 5.

² It is not easy to refer to specific passages in manifestation of the contrast set forth in the text, which however runs through large portions of many Platonic dialogues, under one form or another: see the Menon, c. 27-31. p. 90-94; Protagoras, c. 28, 29, p. 319, 320; Politicus, c. 38. p. 269 D; Laches, c. 11, 12. p. 185, 186; Gorgias, c. 121. p. 501 A; Alcibiades, i. c. 12-14. p. 108, 109, 110, c. 20, p. 113 C. D.

Xenoph. Mem. iii. 5, 21, 22; iv. 2, 20-23; iv. 4, 5; iv. 6, 1. Of these passages, iv. 2, 20, 23 is among the most remarkable.

It is remarkable that Sokratēs (in the Platonic Apology, c. 7, p. 22), when he is describing his wanderings (πλάνη) to test supposed know-informed, and confident in his own knowledge—yet no one knew from whom, or by what steps, he had learnt: no one had ever devoted any special reflection either to ends, or means, or obstructions: no one could explain or give a consistent account of the notions in his own mind, when pertinent questions were put to him: no one could teach another, as might be inferred (he thought) from the fact that there were no professed teachers, and that the sons of the best men were often destitute of merit: every one knew for himself, and laid down general propositions confidently, without looking up to any other man as knowing better—yet there was no end of dissension and dispute on particular cases¹.

Such was the general contrast which Sokratēs sought to impress upon his hearers by a variety of questions bearing on it, directly or indirectly. One way of presenting it, which Plato devoted much of his genius to expand in dialogue, was, to discuss, Whether virtue be really teachable? How was it that superior men like Aristeidēs and Periklēs² acquired the eminent qualities essential for guiding and governing Athens—since they neither learnt them under any known master, as they had studied music and gymnastics—nor could ensure the same excellences to their sons, either through their own agency or through that of any master? Was it not dialogues—discussion whether virtue is teachable.

Platonic

ledge, first in the statesman, next in the poets, lastly in the artisans and craftsmen—finds satisfaction only in the answers which these latter made to him on matters concerning their respective trades or professions. They would have been wise men, had it not been for the circumstance, that because they knew these particular things, they fancied that they knew other things also.

¹ Plato, Euthyphrōn, c. 8. p. 7 D; Xen. Mem. iv. 4. 8.

² Xenoph. Mem. iv. 2, 2; Plato, Meno, c. 33. p. 94.

rather the fact, that virtue, as it was never expressly taught, so it was not really teachable; but was vouchsafed or withheld according to the special volition and grace of the gods? If a man has a young horse to be broken or trained, he finds without difficulty a professed trainer, thoroughly conversant with the habits of the race¹, to communicate to the animal the excellence required; but whom can he find to teach virtue to his sons, with the like preliminary knowledge and assured result? Nay, how can any one either teach virtue, or affirm virtue to be teachable, unless he be prepared to explain what virtue is, and what are the points of analogy and difference between its various branches—justice, temperance, fortitude, prudence, &c.? In several of the Platonic dialogues, the discussion turns on the analysis of these last-mentioned words—the 'Lachês' and 'Protagoras' on courage, the 'Charmidês' on temperance, the 'Euthyphrôn' on holiness.

By these and similar discussions did Sokratês, and Plato amplifying upon his master, raise indirectly all the important questions respecting society, human aspirations and duties, and the principal moral qualities which were accounted virtuous in individual men. As the general terms, on which his conversation turned, were among the most current and familiar in the language, so also the abundant instances of detail, whereby he tested the hearer's rational comprehension and consistent application of such large terms, were selected from the best-known phenomena of daily life²; bringing home

Consent of knowledge without real knowledge—universal prevalence of it.

¹ Compare Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 4, p. 20 A; Xen. Mem. iv. 2, 25.

² Xenoph. Memor. iv. 6, 15. *Ὅμοιαι δὲ αἰετὸς τι τῷ λόγῳ διαίτη, διὰ the inconsistency, if inconsistency there was, in a manner obvious to every one. The answers made to him—not merely by ordinary citizens, but by men of talent and genius, such as the poets or the rhetors, when called upon for an explanation of the moral terms and ideas set forth in their own compositions¹—revealed alike that state of mind against which his crusade, enjoined and consecrated by the Delphian oracle, was directed—the semblance and conceit of knowledge without real knowledge. They proclaimed confident, unhesitating persuasion, on the greatest and gravest questions concerning man and society, in the bosoms of persons who had never bestowed upon them sufficient reflection to be aware that they involved any difficulty. Such persuasion had grown up gradually and unconsciously, partly by authoritative communication, partly by insensible transfusion, from others; the process beginning antecedent to reason as a capacity—continuing itself with little aid and no control from reason—and never being finally revised. With the great terms and current propositions concerning human life and society, a complex body of association had become accumulated from countless particulars, each separately trivial and lost to the memory—knit together by a powerful sentiment, and imbibed as it were by each man from the atmosphere of authority and example around him. Upon this basis the fancied knowledge really rested; and reason, when invoked at all, was called τῶν μάλιστα ὁμολογουμένων ἐπορεύετο, νομίζων ταύτην εἰς ἀσφάλειαν εἶναι λόγον· τοιγαροῦν πολὺ μάλιστα ὡς ἐγὼ οἶδω, ὅτε λέγει, τοῦ ἀκούοντος ὁμολογουμένου παρέχει.

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 7. p. 22 C: compare *Γ*², Ion, p. 533, 534.

in simply as a handmaid, expositor, or apologist of the pre-existing sentiment; as an accessory after the fact, not as a test or verification. Every man found these persuasions in his own mind, without knowing how they became established there; and witnessed them in others, as portions of a general fund of unexamined common-place and credence. Because the words were at once of large meaning, embodied in old and familiar mental processes, and surrounded by a strong body of sentiment,—the general assertions in which they were embodied appeared self-evident and imposing to every one: so that in spite of continual dispute in particular cases, no one thought himself obliged to analyse the general propositions themselves, or to reflect whether he had verified their import, and could apply them rationally and consistently¹.

Such confident persuasion, without science, belonged at that time to astronomy and physics, as well as to the subjects of man and society—it is now confined to the latter.

The phenomenon here adverted to is too obvious, even at the present day, to need further elucidation as matter of fact. In morals, in politics, in political economy, on all subjects relating to man and society—the like confident persuasion of knowledge without the reality is sufficiently prevalent: the like generation and propagation, by authority and example, of unverified convictions, resting upon strong sentiment, without consciousness of the steps or conditions of their growth; the like enlistment of reason as the one-sided advocate of a pre-established sentiment; the like illusion, because every man is familiar with the language, that therefore every man is master of the complex facts, judgments, and tendencies, involved in its signification—and competent both to apply comprehensive words and to assume the truth or falsehood of large propositions, without any special analysis or study¹.

¹ Ἄλλα μὲν οὖν λέγει (says Sokratēs to Euthydēmos) ἴσμεν, οὐδὲν γὰρ ἀποδείκναι ἐκείνους εἰδήσι, οὐδ' ἰσχυρὰ (Xen. Mem. iv. 2, 36): compare Plato, Alkibiad. i. c. 14. p. 110 A.

There is one important difference, however, to note, between our time and that of Sokratès. In his day, the impressions not only respecting man and society, but also respecting the physical world, were of this same self-sown, self-propagating, and unscientific character. The popular astronomy of the Sokratic age was an aggregate of primitive, superficial observations and imaginative inferences, passing unexamined from elder men to younger, accepted with unsuspecting faith, and consecrated by intense sentiment. Not only men like Nikias, or Anytus and Melétus, but even Sokratès himself, protested against the impudence of Anaxagoras, when he degraded the divine Helios and Seléné into a sun and moon of calculable motions and magnitudes. But now, the development of the scientific point of view, with the vast increase of methodised physical and mathematical knowledge, has taught every one that such primitive astronomical and physical convictions were nothing better than

¹ "Moins une science est avancée, moins elle a été bien traitée, et plus elle a besoin d'être enseignée. C'est ce qui me fait beaucoup désirer qu'on ne renonce pas en France à l'enseignement des sciences idéologiques, morales, et politiques; qui, après tout, sont des sciences comme les autres—à la différence près, que ceux qui ne les ont pas étudiées sont persuadés de si bonne foi de les savoir, qu'ils se croient en état d'en décider." (Destutt de Tracy, Eléments d'Idéologie, Préface, p. xxxiv. ed. Paris, 1827.)

"a fancy of knowledge without the reality¹." Every one renounces them without hesitation, seeks his conclusions from the scientific teacher, and looks to the proofs alone for his guarantee. A man who has never bestowed special study on astronomy knows that he is ignorant of it: to fancy that he knows it, without such preparation, would be held an absurdity. While the scientific point of view has thus acquired complete predominance in reference to the physical world, it has made little way comparatively on topics regarding man and society—wherein "fancy of knowledge without the reality" continues to reign, not without criticism and opposition, yet still as a paramount force. And if a new Sokratês were now to put the same questions in the market-place to men of all ranks and professions, he would find the like confident persuasion and unsuspecting dogmatism as to generalities—the like faltering blindness, and contradiction, when tested by cross-examining details.

In the time of Sokratês, this last comparison was not open, since there did not exist, in any department, a body of doctrine scientifically constituted: but the comparison which he actually took, borrowed from the special trades and professions, brought him to an important result. He was the first to see, (and the idea pervades all his speculations), that as, in each art or profession, there is an end to be attained,—a theory, laying down the means and conditions whereby it is attainable—and precepts, deduced from that theory—such precepts, collectively taken, directing and covering nearly the entire field of practice, but each precept separately taken, liable to conflict with others, and therefore liable to cases of exception; so all this is not less true, or admits not less of being realized, respecting the general art of human living and society. There is a grand and all-comprehensive End—the security and happiness, as far as practicable, of each and all persons in the society¹: there may be a theory,

¹ "There is no science which, more than astronomy, stands in need of such a preparation, or draws more largely on that intellectual liberality which is ready to adopt whatever is demonstrated, or concede whatever is rendered highly probable, however new and uncommon the points of view may be, in which objects the most familiar may thereby become placed. Almost all its conclusions stand in open and striking contradiction with those of superficial and vulgar observation, and with what appears to every one, until he has understood and weighed the proofs to the contrary, the most positive evidence of his senses. Thus the earth on which he stands, and which has served for ages as the unshaken foundation of the firmest structures either of art or nature, is divested by the astronomer of its attribute of fixity, and conceived by him as turning swiftly on its centre, and at the same time moving onward through space with great rapidity, &c." (Sir John Herschel, Astronomy, Introduction, sect. 2.)

Socrates first lays down the idea of ethical science, comprising the appropriate ethical end with theory and precepts.

¹ Xenoph. Memor. iv. 1, 2. Ἐπεκμαίρετο (Sokratēs) δὲ τὰς ἀγαθὰς φρίσκει, ἐκ τοῦ ταχέ τε μαθήσκειν οἷς προσέχοντε, καὶ μηχανεύειν ἃ ἂν μάθωσι, καὶ ἐπιθυμῶσι τῶν μαθημάτων εἶναι, δι' ἃ ἔστιν αἰεὶς τε καλῶς οἰκεῖν καὶ πόλιν, καὶ τὸ ὅλον ἀνθρώποις τε καὶ ἀνθρώποις πρόγρμσι εὖ χρησθαι. Τοῖς γὰρ τοιοῖτοις ἡγεῖται παιδευέσθαι εἰς ἃ μάλιστα αἰεὶς τε εὐδαιμονίας εἶναι καὶ τῶν ἐσθίων αἰεὶς οἰκεῖν, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἄλλους ἀνθρώπους καὶ πόλιν δύνασθαι εὐδαιμονίας ποιῆσαι.

Id. iii. 2, 4. Καὶ οὕτω ἐπισκοπῶν, τίς εἴη ἀγαθὴ ἡγεμονία ἀρετῇ, τὰ μὲν ἄλλα περιήρει, κατέλειπε δὲ, τὸ εὐδαιμονίας ποιεῖν, ἃν ἂν ἔγγηται.

Id. iii. 8, 3, 4, 5; iv. 6, 8. He explains τὸ ἀγαθὸν to mean τὸ ὠφέλιμον—μέγα δὲ τοῦ ὠφελίμου πάντα καὶ αὐτὸς ἀνεπινοῶν καὶ συνδυάζει τὰς συνάσεις (iv. 7, 8). Compare Plato, Gorgias, c. 66, 67. p. 474 D. 475 A.

Things are called ἀγαθὰ καὶ καλὰ on the one hand, and κακὰ καὶ αἰσχρὰ on the other, in reference each to its distinct end, of averting or mitigating, in the one case—of bringing on or increasing in the other—different modes of human suffering. So again, iii. 9, 4, we find laying down those means and conditions under which the nearest approach can be made to that end: there may also be precepts, prescribing to the phrases—ὁ δὲ πράττειν—ἀρτὴν πράττειν—τὰ συμφερόμεντα αἰτοῖς πράττειν—all used as equivalents.

Plato, Symposium, p. 205 A. Κρῆται γὰρ ἀγαθῶν εὐδαιμονοῖσι ἴσονται—καὶ οὐκ αἰετὶ προσδέει ἐρίσθαι, ἵνα τι δεῖ βούλεται εὐδαιμονοῖν εἶναι; ἀλλὰ τίλος δοκεῖ ἔχειν ὃ ἀνέστημι: compare Euthydem., c. 20, p. 279 A; c. 25, p. 281 D.

Plato, Alkibiades, ii. c. 13. p. 145 C. Ὅστις ἄρα τι τῶν τοιαύτων οἶδεν, εἴη μὲν παρίσταναι αὐτῷ ἢ τοῦ βελτίστου ἐπιστήμῃ—αὐτὴ δ' ἦν ἢ αὐτῷ δῆπου ἥπερ καὶ ἢ τοῦ ἀφελίμου—φροῦδος γὰρ αὐτὸν φήσκει καὶ ἀποχρῶστα ξυμβούλου, καὶ τῇ πόλει καὶ αὐτὸν αὐτῷ τὸν δὲ μὴ εὐνοῦντα, τοῖσιν αὖτις τούτοις: compare Plato, Republic, vi. p. 504 E. The fact that this dialogue, called Alkibiades II., was considered by some as belonging not to Plato, but to Xenophon or Æschines Socraticus, does not detract from its value as evidence about the speculations of Sokratēs (see Diogen. Laërt. ii. 61, 62; Athenæus, v. p. 220).

Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 17. p. 30 A. οὐδὲν γὰρ ἄλλο πράττειν περιέρχομαι, ἢ πείθειν ἱμῶν καὶ νεωτέρους καὶ πρεσβυτέρους, μήτε σωματίαν ἐπιμελεῖσθαι μήτε χρημάτων πρῶτον μὴτε αὐτῶ σφόδρα, ὥς τῆς ψυχῆς, ὅπως ἔσῃ ἀρίστη ἴσται: λέγων ὅτι οὐκ ἐκ χρημάτων ἀρετὴ γίγνεται, ἀλλ' ἵξῃ ἀρετῆς χρήματα καὶ τὰλλα ἀγαθὰ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις ἀπαντα καὶ ἰδία καὶ δημοσία.

Zeller (Die Philosophie der Griechen, vol. ii. p. 61–64) admits as a fact this reference of the Socratic Ethics to human security and happiness as their end; while Brandis (Gesch. der Gr. Röm. Philosoph. ii. p. 40 seq.) resorts to inadmissible suppositious, in order to avoid admitting it and to expunge away the direct testimony of Xenophon. Both of these authors consider this doctrine as a great taint in the philosophical character of Sokratēs. Zeller even says, what he intends for strong censure, that “the eudæmonistic basis of the Socratic Ethics differs from the Sophistical moral-philosophy, not in principle, but only in result” (p. 61).

I protest against this allusion to a Sophistical moral philosophy, and have shown my grounds for the protest in the preceding chapter. There was no such thing as Sophistical moral philosophy. Not only the Sophists were no sect or school, but farther—not one of them ever aimed (so far as we know) at establishing any ethical theory: this was the great innovation of Sokratēs. But it is perfectly true, that between the preceptorial exhortation of Sokratēs, and that of Protagoras or Prodikos, there was no great or material difference; and this Zeller seems to admit.

every man the conduct and character which best enables him to become an auxiliary towards its attainment, and imperatively restraining him from acts which tend to hinder it—precepts deduced from the theory, each one of them separately taken being subject to exceptions, but all of them taken collectively governing practice, as in each particular art¹. Sokratēs and Plato talk of “the art of dealing with human beings”—“the art of behaving in society”—“that science which has for its object to make men happy,” &c. They draw a marked distinction between art, or rules of practice deduced from a theoretical survey of the subject-matter, and taught with precognition of the end—and mere artless, irrational, knack or dexterity, acquired by simple copying or assimilation, through a process of which no one could render account².

Plato, with that variety of indirect allusion which is his characteristic, continually constrains the reader to look upon human and social life as having its own ends and purposes no less than each

Earnestness with which Sokratēs inculcated self-examination—effect of his conversation upon others.

¹ The existence of cases forming exceptions to each separate moral precept, is brought to view by Sokratēs in Xen. Mem. iv. 2, 15–19; Plato, Republic, i. 6. p. 331, C, D, E; ii. p. 382 C.

² Plato, Phaedrus, c. 88, p. 89 E. ὅσα τέχνη τῆς περὶ τὰς ἀνθρώπων ἐνομιμῆς χαλεπὰ ἐπιχειρεῖ τὰς ἀνθρώπων· εἰ γὰρ πᾶσι μετὰ τέχνης ἐχρησθῆναι δοτὰρ ἔχει, οὕτως δε ἡγήσασθε, &c. ἡ πολιτικὴ τέχνη, Protagoras, c. 27, p. 319 A. Gorgias, c. 163, p. 521 D.

Compare Apol. Sok. c. 4. p. 20 A, B; Euthydēmos, c. 50, p. 292 E—τίς ποτ' ἐστὶν ἐπιστήμη ἐκείνη, ἥ ἡμῶς εὐδαίμονας ποιήσκει;...

The marked distinction between τέχνη, as distinguished from ἀρετὴ or ἐπιστήμη—ἐργασία or ἐμπειρία, is noted in the Phaedrus, c. 95, p. 260 E, and in Gorgias, c. 42, p. 463 B; c. 45, p. 463 A; c. 121, p. 501 A—a remarkable passage. That there is in every art, some assignable end to which its precepts and conditions have reference, is again laid down in the Sophistēs, c. 37, p. 232 A.

separate profession or craft; and impels him to transfer to the former that conscious analysis as a science, and intelligent practice as an art, which are known as conditions of success in the latter¹. It was in furtherance of these rational conceptions—“ Science and Art ”—that Sokratēs carried on his crusade against “ that conceit of knowledge without reality,” which reigned undisturbed in the moral world around him, and was only beginning to be slightly disturbed even as to the physical world. To him the precept, inscribed in the Delphian temple—“ Know Thyself ”—was the holiest of all texts, which he constantly cited, and strenuously enforced upon his hearers; interpreting it to mean, Know what sort of a man thou art, and what are thy capacities, in reference to human use². His manner of enforcing it was alike original and effective, and though he was dexterous in varying his topics³ and queries according to the individual person with

¹ This fundamental analogy, which governed the reasoning of Sokratēs, between the special professions, and social living generally—transferring to the latter the idea of a preconceived End, a Theory, and a regulated Practice or Art, which are observed in the former—is strikingly stated in one of the Aphorisms of the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, vi. 35—Οὐχ ὅρα, πῶς οἱ βίαντες οὐκ ἐν τῇ ἀρχῇ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου πρὸς τοὺς ἰδίους, ἀλλ’ ἐν τῇ ἀρχῇ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου τοῦ λόγου τῆς τέχνης, καὶ τοῦτον ἀποστήναι οὐκ ἐπομένους; Οὐ δεινόν, εἰ ὁ ἀρχαίτερος, καὶ ὁ ὑπὸς, μᾶλλον αἰδέσθωται τὸν τῆς ἰδίας τέχνης λόγον, ἢ ὁ ἀνθρώπος τὸν ἑαυτοῦ, ὅς αὐτῷ ἀπὸς ἐστὶ πρὸς τοὺς θεοὺς.

² Plato (Phaedr. c. 8. p. 229 E; Charmidēs, c. 26. p. 164 E; Alcibiad. i. p. 124 A; 129 A; 131 A).

Xenoph. Mem. iv. 2, 24-26. οὐκ ἐστὶν ἑαυτὸν ἐπιμελεσθῆναι, ἀλλ’ ἐστὶν πρὸς τὴν ἀνθρώπινον χρῆσιν, ἵνα μὴ τὴν αὐτοῦ δόξαν. Cicero (de Legib. i. 22, 59) gives a paraphrase of this well-known text, far more vague and timid than the conception of Sokratēs.

³ See the striking conversations of Sokratēs with Glaukon and Charmidēs, especially that with the former, in Xen. Mem. iii. c. 6, 7.

whom he had to deal, it was his first object to bring the hearer to take just measure of his own real knowledge or real ignorance. To preach, to exhort, even to confute particular errors, appeared to Sokratēs useless, so long as the mind lay wrapped up in its habitual mist, or illusion of wisdom: such mist must be dissipated before any new light could enter. Accordingly, the hearer being usually forward in announcing positive declarations on those general doctrines, and explanations of those terms, to which he was most attached and in which he had the most implicit confidence, Sokratēs took them to pieces, and showed that they involved contradiction and inconsistency; professing himself to be without any positive opinion, nor ever advancing any until the hearer's mind had undergone the proper purifying cross-examination¹.

It was this indirect and negative proceeding, which ¹ There is no part of Plato in which this doxosophy, or false conceit of wisdom, is more earnestly reprobated than in the Sophistēs—with notice of the Elenchus, or cross-examining exposure, as the only effectual cure for such fundamental vice of the mind; as the true purifying process (Sophistēs, c. 33-35, p. 240, 231).

See the same process illustrated by Sokratēs, after his questions put to the slave of Menon (Plato, Menon, c. 18, p. 84 B; Charmidēs, c. 30, p. 166 D).

As the Platonic Sokratēs, even in the Defence where his own personality stands most manifest, denounces as the worst and deepest of all mental defects, this conceit of knowledge without reality—ἡ ἀμαθία ἀντὶ τῆς ἐπιστήμης, ἢ τοῦ αἰετῶς εἶδέναι ἢ οὐκ εἶδέναι, c. 17, p. 29 B—so the Xenophontic Sokratēs, in the same manner, treats this same mental infirmity as being near to madness, and distinguishes it carefully from simple want of knowledge or conscious ignorance—Μανίαν γὰρ μὴτ' εἶναι μὴ εἶη εἶναι σοφίαν, οὐ μέντοι γὰρ τῆς ἀπεπιστημοσύνης μανίαν ἐκείνην. Τὸ δὲ ἴσμεν αὐτὸν, καὶ ἂν μὴ εἴη οὐδὲ δοξάζειν, καὶ αἰετῶς γινώσκειν, ἐγγυτέρω μανίαν ἐλογίζετο εἶναι (Mem. iii. 9, 6). Such conviction thus stands foremost in the mental character of Sokratēs, and on the best evidence, Plato and Xenophon united.

though only a part of the whole, stood out as his most original and most conspicuous characteristic, and determined his reputation with a large number of persons who took no trouble to know anything else about him. It was an exposure no less painful than surprising to the person questioned; producing upon several of them an effect of permanent alienation, so that they never came near him again¹, but reverted to their former state of mind without any permanent change. But on the other hand, the ingenuity and novelty of the process was highly interesting to hearers, especially youthful hearers, sons of rich men and enjoying leisure; who not only carried away with them a lofty admiration of Sokratēs, but were fond of trying to copy his negative polemics². Probably men like Alkibiadēs and Kritias frequented his society chiefly for this purpose of acquiring a quality which they might turn to some account in their political career. His constant habit of never suffering a general term to remain undetermined, but applying it at once to particulars—the homely and effective instances of which he made choice—the string of interrogatories each advancing towards a result, yet a result not foreseen by any one—the indirect and circuitous manner whereby the subject was turned

¹ Xenoph. Mem. iv. 2. 40). Πολλοὶ μὲν οὖν τῷ αὐτῷ διατιθέμενοι ἐκὸς Σωκράτους οὐκ ἐστὶ αὐτῷ προσήμιον, οὐ καὶ διακινεῖται ἐνέμψας.

² Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 2. p. 23 A. Οἴονται γὰρ με ἑαυτάτοις οἱ παρόντες ταῦτα αὐτὸς εἶναι σοφίαν, ἃ ἢ ἄλλος ἐξηλέγξω.

Ibid. c. 10. p. 23 C. Πρὸς δὲ τοῖσι τοῖσι, οἱ εἴμι μοι ἐπικαλουμένους, οἱ μάλιστα ἐχολή ἐστιν, οἱ τῷ πλοουσιώτερον, αὐτόματοι χαίρουσιν ἀκούοντες ἐξετάζοντες τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ, καὶ αὐτοὶ πολλὰ ἐπὶ μνησθῆναι, εἴτα ἐπιχειροῦσιν ἄλλους ἐξετάζειν, &c.

Compare also ibid. c. 22. p. 33 C; c. 27. p. 37 D.

round, and at last approached and laid open by a totally different face—all this constituted a sort of prerogative in Sokratēs, which no one else seems to have approached. Its effect was enhanced by a voice and manner highly plausible and captivating—and to a certain extent, by the very eccentricity of his Silenic physiognomy¹. What is termed “his irony”—or assumption of the character of an ignorant learner asking information from one who knew better than himself—while it was essential² as an excuse for his practice as a questioner, contributed also to add zest and novelty to his conversation; and totally banished from it both didactic pedantry and seeming bias as an advocate; which, to one who talked so much, was of no small advantage. After he had acquired celebrity, this uniform profession of ignorance in debate was usually construed as mere affectation, and those who merely heard him occasionally, without penetrating into his intimacy, often suspected that he was amusing himself with ingenious paradox³. Timon the Sa-

¹ This is an interesting testimony preserved by Aristoxenus, on the testimony of his father Spintharus, who heard Sokratēs (Aristox. Frag. 28. ed. Diels). Spintharus said, respecting Sokratēs—οτι ο πολλοίς αὐτῷ γε πικνωτέροις ἐπενεχόμενος ἐξ τῶν αὐτῶν εἶναι τῆς τε φωνῆς καὶ τοῦ στίβου καὶ τοῦ ἐμφανισμένου ὄψεος, καὶ πρὸς αὐτῷ τε τοῖς ἀρχαίοις τῆς καὶ εἰδούς ἰδιώτερα.

It seems evident also, from the remarkable passage in Plato's Symposium, c. 19, p. 215 A, that he too must have been much affected by the singular physiognomy of Sokratēs: compare Xenoph. Sympos. iv. 19.

² Aristot. de Sophist. Elench. c. 32. p. 183. b. 6. Compare also Plutarch, Quæst. Platonicæ p. 299 E. Τὸς οὖν διειρητοῖς λόγοις ὡς περ καθαρῶς ἔχων φάρμακον, ὁ Σωκράτης ἀξιόπιστος ἦν ἐνίοις ἐλέγχων, τῇ μὲν ἀποφαινεσθαι καὶ μᾶλλον ἔπαυτο, ὁμοῖα ὅστις κατὰ τὴν ἀλήθειαν, οἷα αὐτὸς ἰδίῳ ὁρᾷ βοηθεῖ.

³ Xenoph. Men. iv. 4, 9.

Plato, Gorgias, c. 81. p. 481 B. ἀποιδόξαι καὶ Σωκράτης ἡ παιδεία;

tirist, and Zeno the Epicurean, accordingly described him as a buffoon who turned every one into ridicule, especially men of eminence¹.

Precepttorial and positive exhortation of Sokratēs chiefly brought out by Xeno-
phon.

It is by Plato that the negative and indirect vein of Sokratēs has been worked out and immortalized: while Xenophon, who sympathised little in it, complains that others looked at his master too exclusively on this side, and that they could not conceive him as a guide to virtue, but only as a stirring and propulsive force². One of the principal objects of his 'Memorabilia' is, to show, that Sokratēs, after having worked upon novices sufficiently with the negative line of questions, altered his tone, desisted from embarrassing them, and addressed to them precepts not less plain and simple than directly useful in practice³. I do not at all doubt that this Republic, l. c. 11. p. 337 A. αὐτὴ ἡ αἰσίνη ἢ εὐαθὴς εἰρωνεία Σωκράτους, &c. (Apol. Sok. c. 28. p. 38 A).

¹ Diog. Laert. ii. 16; Cicero, De Nat. Deor. i. 34, 93. Cicero (Brutus, 85, 292) also treats the irony of Sokratēs as intended to mock and humiliate his fellow-dialogists, and it sometimes appears so in the dialogues of Plato. Yet I doubt whether the real Sokratēs could have had any pronounced purpose of this kind.

² The beginning of Xen. Mem. i. 4, 1 is particularly striking on this head—Εἰ δὲ τις Σωκράτην νομίζουσιν (ὡς ἔστιν γράφουσι τε καὶ λέγουσι περὶ αὐτοῦ τεκμαιρόμενοι) προτρέψασθαι μὲν διδασκῶν ἐν' ἀρετῇ κρείττους γενέσθαι, προτρέγειν δὲ ἐν' αὐτῇ οὐκ ἱκανῶς—σχεψάμενοι μὴ μίτον δ' ἰκέλει καλὸν κτηρίον ἵκετα τοὺς πάντας. αἰορῶνται εἰδέναι ἐρωτῶν ἤλαττεν, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἡ λέγειν συνδυασμένη τοῖς συνωτρύβουσιν, δοκίμαζοντες, εἰ ἱκανῶς ἢ βελτίους ποιεῖ τοὺς αὐτότους.

³ Xenophon, after describing the dialogue wherein Sokratēs examines and humiliates Euthydemus, says at the end—Ὁ δὲ (Sokratēs) ὡς ἔγωγε αὐτὸν οὕτως ἔχοντα, θύισσα μὲν αὐτόν διατάραιεν, ἀπλῆστατα δὲ καὶ παφίστατα ἐξηγοῖτο ἃ τε ἐνόμιζεν εἰδέναι εἶναι, καὶ ἃ ἐπιτηδεύειν κρείττους εἶναι.

Again, iv. 7, 1. Ὅτι μὲν οὖν ἀπλῆς τὴν αὐτοῦ γῶσιν ἀπεφαίνετο Σωκράτης περὶ τοῦ ἐμβαλόντος αὐτῶν, δοκεῖ μοι ὁμῶς ἐν τῶν εἰρημίων εἶναι, &c.

His readers were evidently likely to doubt, and required proof, that was often the fact, and that the various dialogues in which Xenophon presents to us the philosopher inculcating self-control, temperance, piety, duty to parents, brotherly love, fidelity in friendship, diligence, benevolence, &c., on positive grounds—are a faithful picture of one valuable side of his character, and an essential part of the whole. Such direct admonitory influence was common to Sokratēs with Prodikus and the best of the Sophists.

It is however neither from the virtue of his life, nor from the goodness of his precepts (though both were essential features in his character), that he derives his peculiar title to fame, but from his originality and prolific efficacy in the line of speculative philosophy. Of that originality, the first portion (as has been just stated) consisted in his having been the first to conceive the idea of an Ethical Science with its appropriate End, and with precepts capable of being tested and improved; but the second point, and not the least important, was, his peculiar method—and extraordinary power of exciting scientific impulse and capacity in the minds of others. It was not by positive teaching that this effect was produced. Both Sokratēs and Plato thought that little mental improvement could be produced by expositions directly communicated, or by new written matter lodged in the memory¹. It was necessary that

This was not the peculiarity of Sokratēs—his powerful method of stirring up the analytical faculties.

Sokratēs could speak plainly, directly, and positively: so much better known was the other side of his character.

¹ Plato, Sophistēs, c. 17. p. 230 A. μετὰ δὲ πολλὰὶ πόσιν τὸ εὐθεταῖον εἶδος τῆς παιδείας ἐπαυρῶν ἀνέρεω, &c. Compare a fragment of Demokritus, in Mullach's edition of the Fragmenta Demokriti, p. 175. Fr. Moral. 59. Τὸν ἀλόγεον πλεονέχει δὲ εὐθεταῖον ματαιοποίησι.

Compare Plato, Epistol. vii. p. 343, 344.

mind should work upon mind, by short question and answer, or an expert employment of the dialectic process¹, in order to generate new thoughts and powers: a process, which Plato, with his exuberant fancy, compares to copulation and pregnancy, representing it as the true way, and the only effectual way, of propagating the philosophic spirit.

Negative and indirect scrutiny of Sokrates produced strong thirst, and active efforts, for the attainment of positive truth.

We should greatly misunderstand the negative and indirect vein of Sokratēs, if we suppose that it ended in nothing more than simple negation. On busy or ungifted minds, among the indiscriminate public who heard him, it probably left little permanent effect of any kind, and ended in a mere feeling of admiration for ingenuity, or perhaps dislike of paradox: on practical minds like Xenophon, its effect was merged in that of the preceptorial exhortation. But where the seed fell upon an intellect having the least predisposition or capacity for systematic thought, the negation had only the effect of driving the hearer back at first, giving him a new impetus for afterwards springing forward. The Socratic dialectics, clearing away from the mind its mist of fancied knowledge, and laying bare the real ignorance, produced an immediate effect like the touch of the torpedo². The newly-created consciousness of ignorance was alike unexpected, painful, and humiliating—a season of doubt and discomfort, yet combined with an internal working and yearning after truth, never before experienced. Such intellectual quickening, which could never commence until the mind had been disabused of its original illusion of false knowledge, was considered by Sokratēs not merely as the index and precursor, but as the indispensable condition, of future progress. It was the middle point in the ascending mental scale; the lowest point being ignorance unconscious, self-satisfied, and mistaking itself for knowledge; the next above, ignorance conscious, unmasked, ashamed of itself, and thirsting after knowledge as yet unpossessed; while actual knowledge, the third and highest stage, was only attainable after passing through the second as a preliminary¹. This second was a sort of pregnancy, and every mind either by nature incapable of it, or in which, from want of the necessary conjunction, it had never arisen—was barren for all purposes of original or self-appropriated thought. Sokratēs regarded it as his peculiar vocation and skill (employing another Platonic metaphor), while he had himself no power of reproduction, to deal with such pregnant and troubled minds in the capacity of a midwife; to assist them in that mental parturition whereby they were to be relieved, but at the same time to scrutinise narrowly the offspring which they brought forth, and if it should prove distorted or unpromising, to cast it away with the

¹ Compare two passages in Plato's Protagoras, c. 49, p. 329 A, and c. 54, p. 348 D; and the Phaedrus, c. 138-140, p. 276 A, E.

² Plato, Men. c. 13, p. 80 A: ἀσπίδατος τῇ πλησίον γάρον τῇ θαλάσσιᾳ.

¹ This tripartite graduation of the intellectual scale is brought out by Plato in the Symposium, c. 29. p. 204 A, and in the Lysis, c. 33. p. 218 A.

The intermediate point of the scale is what Plato here (though not always) expresses by the word φιλόσοφος in its strict etymological sense—"a lover of knowledge;" one who is not yet wise, but who, having learnt to know and feel his own ignorance, is anxious to become wise—and has thus made what Plato thought the greatest and most difficult step towards really becoming so.

rigour of a Lykurgian nurse, whatever might be the reluctance of the mother-mind to part with its newborn¹. There is nothing which Plato is more fertile in illustrating, than this relation between the teacher and the scholar, operating not by what it put into the latter, but by what it evolved out of him; by creating an uneasy longing after truth—aiding in the elaboration necessary for obtaining relief—and testing whether the doctrine elaborated possessed the real lineaments, or merely the delusive semblance, of truth.

There are few things more remarkable than the description given of the colloquial magic of Sokratēs and its vehement effects, by those who had them-

¹ The effect of the interrogatory procedure of Sokratēs in forcing on the minds of youth a humiliating consciousness of ignorance and an eager anxiety to be relieved from it, is not less powerfully attested in the simpler language of Xenophon, than in the metaphorical variety of Plato. See the conversation with Euthydēmos in the Memorabilia of Xenophon, iv. 2; a long dialogue which ends by the confession of the latter (c. 39)—“Αισχυρίζε με ταῦτα ὁμολογῶν διηγουμένῳ ἢ ἐμὴ φιλοσύνη καὶ φροσύνη μὲ κατίστανε ἢ μοι σιγῶν κινδυνεύω γὰρ ἀπλῶς οὐδὲν εἰδέναι. Καὶ πάντεσσι δίδωμι ἔχων ἀπὸ λῆθους καὶ νομίσαι ἐπὶ ὅτι ἀνδράποδοι εἶναι: συμπαρὶ i. 1, 16.

This same expression—“thinking himself no better than a slave”—is also put by Plato into the mouth of Alkibiadēs, when he is describing the powerful effect wrought on his mind by the conversation of Sokratēs (Symposium, c. 39, p. 215, 216)—Περικλέους δὲ δούλου καὶ ἄλλων ἀγαθῶν ῥητόρων ἐν μὲν ἡγήμην, τοιαῦτα δ' οὐδὲν ἔπαυχοι, οὐδὲ νεορόβητόν μοι ἡ ψυχὴ οὐδ' ἔχασταται ὥς ἀνδράποδοι διακειμέναι. Ἄλλ' ἐπὶ τοῖσιν τοῦ Μαρσίου πολλοῖσι δὴ οὕτω διετίθη, ὥστε μοι δοῖται μὴ βουδέν εἶναι ἔχοντα ὡς ἔχω.

Compare also the Meno, c. 13, p. 79 E, and Theætet. c. 17, 22, p. 148 E, 151 C, where the metaphor of pregnancy, and of the obstetric art of Sokratēs, is expanded—παισχυνοὺς δὲ δὴ οἱ ἐμοὶ ἐγγεγεννημένοι καὶ τοῖς ταῖς τοῖς τισινοῦσι: ὡδίουσι γὰρ καὶ ἀπορίαι ἐμπερικλυταὶ τισὶν τε καὶ ἡμέραις ἀπὸ μάλιν ἢ ἐσέσαι. Ταῦτα τε τῆς ὡδίας ἐγείρειν τε καὶ ἀποσπένειν ἢ ἐμὴ τέχνη δύνανται.—Ἔστιτε δὲ, οἱ δὲ μὴ μοι δοῖσιν ἐγγεγεννημένοι εἶναι, γινώσκοντες ὅτι οὐδέ οἱ ἐμοὶ δέονται, πάντεσσι ἐμὴν προσηύκει, &c.

selves heard it and felt its force. Its suggestive and stimulating power was a gift so extraordinary, as well to justify any abundance of imagery on the part of Plato to illustrate it¹. On the subjects to which he applied himself—man and society—his hearers had done little but feel and affirm: Sokratès undertook to make them think, weigh, and examine themselves and their own judgments—until the latter were brought into consistency with each other as well as with a known and venerable end. The generalisations embodied in their judgments had grown together and coalesced in a manner at once so intimate, so familiar, yet so unverified, that the particulars implied in them had passed out of notice: so that Sokratès, when he recalled these particulars out of a forgotten experience, presented to the hearer his own opinions under a totally new point of view. His conversations (even as they appear in the reproduction of Xenophon, which presents but a mere skeleton of the reality) exhibit the main features of a genuine inductive method, struggling against the deep-lying, but unheeded, errors of the early intellect acting by itself, without conscious march or scientific guidance—of the intellectus sibi permissus—upon which Bacon so emphatically dwells. Amidst abundance of instantiæ negativæ, the scientific value of which is dwelt upon in the 'Novum Organon'²,—and negative instances Inductive process of scrutiny, and Baconian spirit, of Sokratès.

¹ There is a striking expression of Xenophon, in the Memorabilia, about Sokratès and his conversation (i. 2, 14):—

"He dealt with every one just as he pleased in his discussions," says Xenophon—τοῖς δὲ διαλεγόμενος αὐτῷ πᾶσι χρόνισεν ἐν τοῖς λόγοις ὅπως ἐβούλετο.

² I know nothing so clearly illustrating both the subjects and the too so dexterously chosen as generally to show the way to new truth, in place of that error which they method chosen by Sokratēs, as various passages of the immortal criticisms in the Novum Organum.—When Sokratēs (as Xenophon tells us) devoted his time to questioning others “What is piety? What is justice? What is temperance, courage, political government?” &c., we best understand the spirit of his procedure by comparing the sentence which Bacon pronounces upon the first notions of the intellect—as radically vicious, confused, badly abstracted from things, and needing complete re-examination and revision—without which (he says) not one of them could be trusted:—

“Quod vero attinet ad notiones primas intellectūs, nihil est eorum, quæ intellectus sibi permixtas congestit, quia nobis pro suspecto sit, nec ullo modo ratum nisi novo iudicio se stiterit, et secundum illud pronuntiatum fuerit.” (Distributio Operis, prefixed to the N. O. p. 168 of Mr. Montagu’s edition.)—“Serum sane rebus perditis ulihibetur remedium, postquam mens ex quotidiana vitæ consuetudine, et auditionibus, et doctrinæ inquinatis occupata, et vanissimis aliois obsessa fuerit,.....Restat unica salus ac sanitas, ut opus veritatis universam de integro resumatur; ac mens, jam ab ipso principio, nullo modo sibi permittatur, sed perpetuo regatur.” (Id. Prefatio, p. 186.)—“Syllogismus ex propositionibus constat, propositiones ex verbis, verba notionum tesserae sunt. Itaque si notiones ipsæ (id quod basis rei est) confusæ sint et temere a rebus abstractæ, nihil in his quæ superstruuntur est firmitellius. Itaque spes est una in inductione verâ. In notitiis nihil sanæ est, nec in logicis, nec in physicis. Nam Substantia, non Qualitas, Agere, Pati, ipsius Esse, bonæ notiones sunt; multo minus Genus, Locus, Densum, Tenuis, Humidum, Siccum, Generatio, Corruptio, Attrahere, Fugare, Elementum, Materia, Forma, et id Genus; sed omnes phantastice et male terminantur. Notiones infimarum specierum, Hominis, Canis, et prehensivum immediatarum sensus, Albi, Nigri, non fallunt magnopere: reliquæ omnes (quibus homines hæcenus nisi sunt) aberrationes sunt, nec debitis modis a rebus abstractæ et exaltatæ.” (Aphor. 14, 15, 16.)—“Nemo adhuc tantâ mentis constantiâ et rigore inventus est, ut derreverit et alii imposuerit, theoria et notiones communes penitus abolere, et intellectus abruptum et æquum ad participationem de integro applicare. Itaque ratio illa quæ habemus, ex nulla fide et multa etiam eorum, necnon ex puerilibus, quas primo ætatis, notitiis, ferrago quædam est et coarctata.” (Aphor. 27.)—“Nil magis philosophi officiosè deprehendimus, quam quid res quæ familiaris sunt et frequenter occurrunt, contemplationem hominum non teneant et detineant, sed recipiantur obiter, neque eorum causæ queri soleant; ut non seipso requiratur informatio de rebus ignotis, quam attentis in notis.” (Aphor. 119.)

These passages, and many others to the same effect which might be set aside—there is a close pressure on the hearer's mind, to keep it in the distinct track of particulars, extracted from the Novum Organon, afford a clear illustration and an interesting parallel to the spirit and purpose of Sokrates. He sought to test the fundamental notions and generalisations respecting man and society, in the same spirit in which Bacon approached those of physics: he suspected the unconscious process of the growing intellect, and desired to revise it, by comparison with particulars—and from particulars too the most clear and certain, but which, from being of vulgar occurrence, were least attended to. And that which Sokrates described in his language as "concept of knowledge without the reality," is identical with what Bacon designates as the primary notions—the puerile notions—the abstractions—of the intellect left to itself, which have become so familiar and appear so certainly known, that the mind cannot shake them off, and has lost all habit, we might almost say all power, of examining them.

The stringent process (or electric shock, to use the simile in Plato's Meno) of the Sokratic Elenchus, afforded the best means of re-awakening this lost power. And the manner in which Plato speaks of the cross-examining Elenchus, as "the great and sovereign purification, without which every man, be he the great King himself, is unschooled, dirty, and full of uncleanness in respect to the main conditions of happiness"—(καὶ τὸν ἐλεγχὸν λεγόντες ὡς ἄρα μέγιστον καὶ ἐκραιώτατον τῆς καθάρσεως ἐστίν, καὶ τὸν ἀδελφάντων αὐτομασίαν, ὡς καὶ τοῦ καὶ μέγας βασιλεὺς ὡς, τὸ μέγιστον ἀκαθάρτος ὄντα ἀπαιδευτὸν τε καὶ αἰσχροῦ γεγενημένον ταῦτα, ἢ καθάρσεως καὶ ἀλλοτρίους ἐκπεσεῖν τὴν ὁρμὴν ἐκπεσεῖν εὐδοκίαν εἶναι—Plato, Sophist. c. 34. p. 230 E.) precisely corresponds to that "cross-examination of human reason in its native or spontaneous process," which Bacon specifies as one of the three things essential to the expurgation of the intellect, so as to qualify it for the attainment of truth—"Itaque doctrina ista de expurgatione intellectus, ut ipse ad veritatem habilis sit, tribus redargutionibus absolvitur; redargutione philosophiarum, redargutione demonstrationum, et redargutione rationis humane native." (Nov. Organ. Distributio Operis, p. 170. ed. Montagu.)

To show further how essential it is (in the opinion of the best judges) that the native intellect should be purged or purified, before it can properly apprehend the truths of physical philosophy—I transcribe the introductory passage of Sir John Herschel's "Astronomy":—

"In entering upon any scientific pursuit, one of the student's first endeavours ought to be to prepare his mind for the reception of truth, by dismissing, or at least lessening his hold on, all such crude and hastily adapted notions respecting the objects and relations he is about to examine, as may tend to embarrass or mislead him; and to strengthen as conditions of every just and consistent generalisation; and to divert it from becoming enslaved to unexamined formulæ, or from delivering mere intensity of persuasion under the authoritative phrase of reason. Instead of anxiety to plant in the hearer a conclusion ready-made and accepted on trust, the questioner keeps up a prolonged suspense, with special emphasis laid upon the particulars tending both affirmatively and negatively; nor is his purpose answered, until that state of knowledge and apprehended evidence is created, out of which the conclusion starts as a living product, with its own root and self-sustaining power, consciously linked with its premises. If this conclusion so generated be not the same as that which the questioner himself adopts, it will at least be some other, worthy of a competent and examining mind taking its own independent view of the appropriate evidence. And amidst all the variety and divergence of particulars which we find enforced in the language himself, by something of an effort and a resolve, for the unprejudiced admission of any conclusion which shall appear to be supported by careful observation and logical argument; even should it prove adverse to notions he may have previously formed for himself, or taken up, without examination, on the credit of others. Such an effort is, in fact, a commencement of that intellectual discipline which forms one of the most important ends of all science. It is the first movement of approach towards that state of mental purity which alone can fit us for a full and steady perception of moral beauty as well as physical adaptation. It is the 'euphrasy and rûe,' with which we must purge our sight before we can receive, and contemplate as they are, the livements of truth and nature." (Sir John Herschel, Astronomy—Introduction.)

I could easily multiply citations from other eminent writers on physical philosophy, to the same purpose. All of them prescribe this intellectual purification. Sokratês not only prescribed it, but actually administered it, by means of his Elenchus, in reference to the subjects on which he talked.

of Sokratēs, the end, towards which all of them point, is one and the same, emphatically signified—the good and happiness of social man.

It is not then to multiply proselytes or to procure authoritative assent—but to create earnest seekers, analytical intellects, foreknowing and consistent agents, capable of forming conclusions for themselves and of teaching others—as well as to force them into that path of inductive generalisation whereby alone trustworthy conclusions can be formed—that the Socratic method aspires. In many of the Platonic dialogues, wherein Sokratēs is brought forward as the principal disputant, we read a series of discussions and arguments, distinct, though having reference to the same subject—but terminating either in a result purely negative, or without any definite result at all. The commentators often attempt, but in my judgment with little success, either by arranging the dialogues in a supposed sequence or by various other hypotheses—to assign some positive doctrinal conclusion as having been indirectly contemplated by the author. But if Plato had aimed at any substantive demonstration of this sort, we cannot well imagine that he would have left his purpose thus in the dark, visible only by the microscope of a critic. The didactic value of these dialogues—that, wherein the genuine Socratic spirit stands most manifest—consists, not in the positive conclusion proved, but in the argumentative process itself, coupled with the general importance of the subject upon which evidence negative and affirmative is brought to bear.

This connects itself with that which I remarked

Socratic method tends to create minds capable of forming conclusions for themselves—not to plant conclusions ready-made.

Grecian dialectics—their many-sided handling of subjects—force of the negative arm.

in the preceding chapter, when mentioning Zeno and the first manifestations of dialectics, respecting the large sweep, the many-sided argumentation, and the strength as well as forwardness of the negative arm—in Grecian speculative philosophy. Through Sokratès, this amplitude of dialectic range was transmitted from Zeno first to Plato and next to Aristotle. It was a proceeding natural to men who were not merely interested in establishing, or refuting, some given particular conclusion—but who also (like expert mathematicians in their own science) loved, esteemed, and sought to improve, the dialectic process itself, with the means of verification which it afforded; a feeling, of which abundant evidence is to be found in the Platonic writings¹. Such pleasure in the scientific operation—though not merely innocent, but valuable both as a stimulant and as a guarantee against error, and though the corresponding taste among mathematicians is always treated with the sympathy which it deserves—incurs much unmerited reprobation from modern historians of philosophy, under the name of love of disputation, caviling, or sceptical subtlety.

The subjects to which they were applied—man and society—essentially requires such handling—reason why.

But over and above any love of the process, the subjects to which dialectics were applied, from Sokratès downwards,—man and society, ethics, politics, metaphysics, &c., were such as particularly called for this many-sided handling. On topics like these, relating to sequences of fact which depend upon a multitude of co-operating or conflicting causes, it is impossible to arrive, by any one thread of positive reasoning or induction, at absolute doctrine which a man may reckon upon finding always true, whether he remembers the proof or not; as is the case with mathematical, astronomical, or physical truth. The utmost which Science can ascertain, on subjects thus complicated, is an aggregate, not of peremptory theorems and predictions, but of tendencies¹; by studying the action of each separate cause, and combining them together as well as our means admit. The knowledge of tendencies thus obtained, though falling much short of certainty, is highly important for guidance: but it is plain that conclusions of this nature—resulting from multifarious threads of evidence—true only on a balance, and always liable to limitation—can never be safely detached from the proofs on which they rest, or taught as absolute and consecrated formulæ².

¹ See particularly the remarkable passage in the Philæbus, c. 18. p. 16 seq.

¹ See this point instructively set forth in Mr. John Stuart Mill's System of Logic, vol. ii. book vi. p. 565. 1st edition.

² Lord Bacon remarks in the Novum Organon (Aph. 71) —

"Erant autem sapientia Græcorum professoria, et in disputationes effusa, quod genus inquisitioni veritatis adversissimum est. Itaque nomen illud Sophistarum—quod per contemptum ab us, qui se philosophos haberi voluerunt, in antiquos rhetores repositum et traductum est, Gorgium, Protagoram, Hippium, Polum—etiam universo generi competit, Platoni, Aristoteli, Zenoni, Epicuro, Theophrasto, et eorum successoribus, Chrysippo, Carneadi, reliquis."

Bacon is quite right in effacing the distinction between the two lists of persons whom he compares, and in saying that the latter were just as much Sophists as the former, in the sense which he here gives to the word as well as in every other legitimate sense. But he is not justified in imputing to either of them this many-sided argumentation as a fault, looking to the subjects upon which they brought it to bear. His remark has application to the simpler physical sciences, but none to the moral. It had great pertinence and value, at the time when he brought it forward, and with reference to the important reforms which he was seeking to accomplish in physical science. In so far as Plato, Aristotle, or the other Greek philosophers, apply their deductive method to physical subjects, they come justly under Bacon's censure. But

They require to be kept in perpetual and conscious association with the evidences, affirmative and negative, by the joint consideration of which their truth is established; nor can this object be attained by any other means than by ever-renovated discussion, instituted from new and distinct points of view, and with free play to that negative arm which is indispensable as stimulus not less than as control. To ask for nothing but results—to decline the labour of verification—to be satisfied with a ready-made stock of established positive arguments as proof—and to decry the doubter or negative reasoner, who starts new difficulties, as a common enemy—this is a proceeding sufficiently common, in ancient as well as in modern times. But it is nevertheless an abnegation of the dignity and even of the functions of speculative philosophy. It is the direct reverse of the method both of Sokratēs and Plato, who, as inquirers, felt that, for the great subjects which they treated, multiplied threads of reasoning, coupled with the constant presence of the cross-examining Elenchus, were indispensable. Nor is it less at variance with the views of Aristotle (though a man very different from either of them), who goes round his subject on all sides, states and considers all its difficulties, and insists emphatically on the necessity of having all these difficulties brought out in full force, as the incitement and guide to positive philosophy, as well as the test of its sufficiency¹.

here again, the fault consisted less in disputing too much, than in too hastily admitting false or inaccurate axioms without dispute.

¹ Aristot. Metaphysic. iii. 1. 2-5, p. 995 a.

The indispensable necessity, to a philosopher, of having before him

Understanding thus the method of Sokratēs, we shall be at no loss to account for a certain variance on his part (and a still greater variance on the part of Plato, who expanded the method in writing so much more) with the Sophists, without supposing the latter to be corrupt teachers. As they aimed at qualifying young men for active life, they accepted all the difficulties and doubts of the problem which he tries to solve, and of looking at a philosophical question with the same alternate attention to its affirmative and negative side, as is shown by a judge to two litigants—is strikingly set forth in this passage: I transcribe a portion of it—Ἐστὶ δὲ τοῖς εἰσφορήσι βουλομένοις προήργον τὸ διαπορήσει καλῶς ἢ γὰρ ἑσπερον εὐπορία λύσει τῶν πρότερον ἀπορησάντων ἐστὶ, λύσει δ' οὐκ ἔστιν ἀγνοῦντας τὰς διαφορὰς..... Διὸ δὲ τὰς διαφορὰς θεωρησάντων πάντας πρότερον, ταῦτα τε χίμαι, ἐπὶ δὲ τὰ τοῖς ζητούμενοι ἴσεν τοῦ διαπορήσει πρώτον, ὁμοίους εἶναι τοῖς πρὸς δὲ βαδίζοντες ἀγνοοῖσι, καὶ πρὸς ταῖς αἰδ' αἶ ποτε τὸ ζητούμενον εὑρήσει, ἢ μὴ, γινώσκουσιν τὸ γὰρ τῶν αὐτῶν μὲν οὐκ ὁδῶν, τῶν δὲ προηγορηκότων ὁδῶν. Ἐπὶ δὲ βέλτερος ἀνάγκῃ ἔχουσιν πρὸς τὰ κρίναι, τὸν ὅσπερ ἀντιβλέποντες καὶ τῶν ἀμφισβητούντων λόγων ἀεχέουσα σύστασις.

Real distinction and variance between Sokratēs and the Sophists.

A little further on, in the same chapter (iii. 1, 19. p. 996 a), he makes a remarkable observation. Not merely is it difficult, on these philosophical subjects, to get at the truth—but it is not easy to perform well even the preliminary task of discerning and setting forth the ratiocinative difficulties which are to be dealt with—Περὶ γὰρ ταῦτα ἀπίστευτον αἰ μὲν χαλεπὴν τὸ εὐπορήσῃ τῆς ἀληθείας, ἀλλ' οὐδὲ τὸ διαπορήσει λόγῳ ῥᾳδίον καλῶς. Διαπορήσει means the same as διεξέλθει τὰς ἀπορίας (Bonitz, not. ad loc.). “to go through the various points of difficulty.”

This last passage illustrates well the characteristic gift of Sokratēs, which was exactly what Aristotle calls τὸ διαπορήσει λόγῳ καλῶς—to force on the hearer's mind those ratiocinative difficulties which served both as spur and as guide towards solution and positive truth—towards comprehensive and correct generalisation, with clear consciousness of the common attribute binding together the various particulars included.

The same care to admit and even invite the development of the negative side of a question—to accept the obligation of grappling with all the difficulties—to assimilate the process of inquiry to a judicial pleading—is to be seen in other passages of Aristotle; see Ethic. Nikomach. vii. 1. 5; De Animā, i. 2. p. 403 b; De Caelo, i. 10. p. 279 b; Topica, i. 2. p. 101 a—(Χρησόμενοι δὲ ἢ βαλάντιος) πρὸς τὰς κατὰ φιλοσοφίαν ἐπιστάσεις, οἱ διωκόμενοι πρὸν ἀμφότερα διαπορήσει, μῶς ἐν ἐκείνοις κατοφρόμηται τὴν ἀλήθειαν καὶ τὸ ψεῦδος. Compare also Cicero, Tusc. Disput. ii. 3, 9;

the current ethical and political sentiment, with its unexamined commonplaces and inconsistencies, merely seeking to shape it into what was accounted a meritorious character at Athens. They were thus exposed, along with others—and more than others, in consequence of their reputation—to the analytical cross-examination of Sokratès, and were quite as little able to defend themselves against it.

Prodigious efficacy of Sokratès in forming new philosophical minds.

Whatever may have been the success of Protagoras or any other among these Sophists, the mighty originality of Sokratès achieved results not only equal at the time, but incomparably grander and more lasting in reference to the future. Out of his intellectual school sprang not merely Plato, himself a host—but all the other leaders of Grecian speculation for the next half-century, and all those who continued the great line of speculative philosophy down to later times. Eukleidès and the Megaric school of philosophers—Aristippus and the Kyrenaic—Antisthenès and Diogenès, the first of those called the Cynics—all emanated more or less directly from the stimulus imparted by Sokratès, though each followed a different vein of thought¹. Ethics continue to be what Sokratès had first made them, a distinct branch of philosophy, alongside of which politics, rhetoric, logic, and other speculations relating to man and society, gradually arranged themselves; all of them more popular, as well as more keenly con-troverted, than physics, which at that time presented comparatively little charm, and still less of attainable certainty. There can be no doubt that the individual influence of Sokratēs permanently enlarged the horizon, improved the method, and multiplied the ascendent minds, of the Grecian speculative world, in a manner never since paralleled. Subsequent philosophers may have had a more elaborate doctrine, and a larger number of disciples who imbibed their ideas; but none of them applied the same stimulating method with the same efficacy—none of them struck out of other minds that fire which sets light to original thought—none of them either produced in others the pains of intellectual pregnancy, or extracted from others the fresh and unborrowed offspring of a really parturient mind.

¹ Cicero (de Orator. iii. 16, 61; Tuscul. Disput. v. 4, 11)—“Cujus (Socratis) multiplex ratio disputandi, rerumque varietas, et ingenii magnitudo, Platonis ingenio et literis consecrata, plura genera essent dissentientium philosophorum.” Ten distinct varieties of Socratic philosophers are enumerated; but I lay little stress on the exact number.

Having thus touched upon Sokratēs, both as first opener of the field of Ethics to scientific study—and as author of a method, little copied and never paralleled since his time, for stimulating in other men's minds earnest analytical inquiry—I speak last about his theoretical doctrine. Considering the fanciful, far-fetched ideas, upon which alone the Pythagoreans and other predecessors had shaped their theories respecting virtues and vices, the wonder is that Sokratēs, who had no better guides to follow, should have laid down an ethical doctrine which has the double merit of being true, as far as it goes, legitimate, and of comprehensive generality; though it errs, mainly by stating a part of the essential conditions of virtue¹ (sometimes also a part of the Ethical

General theory of Sokratēs on ethics—he resolved virtue into knowledge or wisdom.

¹ In setting forth the Ethical End, the language of Sokratēs (as far as we can judge from Xenophon and Plato) seems to have been not End), as if it were the whole. Sokratēs resolved all virtue into knowledge or wisdom; all vice, into ignorance or folly. To do right was the only way to impart happiness, or the least degree of unhappiness compatible with any given situation: now this was precisely what every one wished for and aimed at—only that many persons, from ignorance, took the wrong road; and no man was wise enough always to take the right. But as no man was willingly his own enemy, so no man ever did wrong willingly; it was because he was not fully or correctly informed of the consequences of his own actions; so that the proper remedy to apply was enlarged teaching of consequences and improved judgment. To make him willing to be taught, the only condition required was to make him conscious of his own ignorance; the want of which consciousness was the real cause both of indocility and of vice.

That this doctrine sets forth one portion of the essential conditions of virtue, is certain; and that too the most commanding portion, since there can be no assured moral conduct except under the supremacy of reason. But that it omits to notice, what is not less essential to virtue, the proper con-always consistent with itself. He sometimes stated it as if it included a reference to the happiness, not merely of the agent himself, but of others besides—both, as co-ordinate elements; at other times, he seems to speak as if the end was nothing more than the happiness of the agent himself, though the happiness of others was among the greatest and most essential means. The former view is rather countenanced by Xenophon, the best witness about his master, so that I have given it as belonging to Sokratēs, though it is not always adhered to. The latter view appears most in Plato, who assimilates the health of the soul to the health of the body—an End essentially self-regarding.

¹ Cicero, de Orator. i. 47, 204.

This doctrine defective as stating a part for the whole.

dition of the emotions, desires, &c., taking account only of the intellect—is also certain; and has been remarked by Aristotle¹ as well as by many others. It is fruitless, in my judgment, to attempt by any refined explanation, to make out that Sokratēs meant by “knowledge,” something more than what is directly implied in the word. He had present to his mind, as the grand depravation of the human being, not so much vice as madness; that state in which a man does not know what he is doing. Against the vicious man, securities, both public and private, may be taken, with considerable effect; against the madman there is no security except perpetual restraint. He is incapable of any of the duties incumbent on social man, nor can he, even if he wishes, do good either to himself or to others. The sentiment which we feel towards such an unhappy being is indeed something totally different from moral reprobation, such as we feel for the vicious man who does wrong knowingly. But Sokratēs took measure of both with reference to the purposes of human life and society, and pronounced that the latter was less completely spoiled for those purposes than the former. Madness was ignorance at its extreme pitch, accompanied too by the circumstance that the madman himself was unconscious of his own ignorance, acting under a sincere persuasion that he knew what he was doing. But short of this extremity, there were many varieties and gradations in the scale of ignorance, which, if accompanied by false conceit of knowledge, differed from madness only in degree: and each of which disqualified a man from doing right, in proportion to the ground which it covered. The worst of all ignorance—that which stood nearest to madness—was when a man was ignorant of himself, fancying that he knew what he did not really know, and that he could do, or avoid, or endure, what was quite beyond his capacity; when for example, intending to speak the same truth, he sometimes said one thing, sometimes another—or, casting up the same arithmetical figures, made sometimes a greater sum, sometimes a less. A person who knows his letters, or an arithmetician, may doubtless write bad orthography or cast-up incorrectly, by design—but can also perform the operations correctly, if he chooses; while one ignorant of writing or of arithmetic, cannot do it correctly, even though he should be anxious to do so. The former therefore comes nearer to the good orthographer or arithmetician than the latter. So, if a man knows what is just, honourable, and good, but commits acts of a contrary character—he is juster, or comes nearer to being a just man, than one who does not know what just acts are, and does not distinguish them from unjust; for this latter cannot conduct himself justly, even if he desires it ever so much¹.

¹ Xenoph. Mem. iii. 9, 4; Aristot. Ethic. Nikomach. vi. 13, 3-5; Ethic. Eudem. i. 5; Ethic. Magn. i. 1-35.

¹ Xenoph. Mem. iii. 9, 6; iv. 2, 19-22, δικαιότερος δὲ τοῦ ἐναντιότερου καὶ δίκαιον τοῦ μὴ ἐναντιότερου—To call him the juster man of the two, when neither are just, can hardly be meant; I translate it according to what seems to me the meaning intended. So γραμματικότερος (in the sentence before) means, comes nearer to a good orthographer. The Greek derivative adjectives in -ότερος are very difficult to render precisely.

Compare Plato, Hippias Minor, c. 15 p. 372 D—where the same opinion is maintained. Hippias tells Sokratēs in that dialogue (c. 11.

The opinion here maintained illustrates forcibly the general doctrine of Sokratès. I have already observed that the fundamental idea which governed his train of reasoning, was, the analogy of each man's social life and duty to a special profession or trade. Now what is principally inquired after in regard to these special men, is their professional capacity; without this, no person would ever think of employing them, let their dispositions be ever so good; with it, good dispositions and diligence are presumed, unless there be positive grounds for suspecting the contrary. But why do we indulge such presumption? Because their pecuniary interest, their professional credit, and their place among competitors, are staked upon success, so that we reckon upon their best efforts. But in regard to that manifold and indefinite series of acts which constitute the sum total of social duty, a man has no such special interest to guide and impel him, nor can we presume in him those dispositions which will ensure his doing right, wherever he knows what right is. Mankind are obliged to give premiums for these dispositions, and to attach penalties to the contrary, by means of praise and censure: moreover the natural sympathies and antipathies of ordinary minds, which determine so powerfully the application of moral terms, run spontaneously in this direction, and even overshoot the limit which reason would prescribe. The analogy between the paid special duty, and the general social duty, fails in this particular. Even if Sokratès were correct as to the former (and this would be noway true), in making the intellectual conditions of good conduct stand for the whole—no such inference could safely be extended to the latter.

He was led to this general doctrine by the analogy of special professions.

Constant reference of Sokratês to duties of practice and detail.

Sokratês affirmed that "well-doing" was the noblest pursuit of man. "Well-doing" consisted in doing a thing well after having learnt it and practised it, by the rational and proper means: it was altogether disparate from good fortune, or success without rational scheme and preparation. "The best man (he said) and the most beloved by the gods, is, he who as a husbandman, performs well the duties of husbandry—as a surgeon, those of medical art—in political life, his duty towards the commonwealth. But the man who does nothing well, is neither useful—nor agreeable to the gods¹." This is the Sokratic view of human life: to look at it as an assemblage of realities and practical details—to translate the large words of the moral vocabulary into those homely particulars to which at bottom they refer—to take account of acts, not of dispositions apart from act (in contradiction to the ordinary flow of the moral sympathies)—to enforce upon every one, that what he chiefly required was teaching and practice as preparations for act; and that therefore ignorance, especially ignorance mistaking itself for knowledge, was his capital deficiency. The religion of Sokratês, as well as his ethics, had reference to practical human ends; nor had any man ever less of that transcendentalism in his mind, which his scholar Plato exhibits in such abundance.

¹ Xenoph. Memor. iii. 9, 14, 15.

It is indisputable, then, that Sokratēs laid down a general ethical theory which is too narrow, and which states a part of the truth as if it were the whole. But as it frequently happens with philosophers who make the like mistake—we find that he did not confine his deductive reasonings within the limits of the theory, but escaped the erroneous consequences by a partial inconsistency. For example—no man ever insisted more emphatically than he, on the necessity of control over the passions and appetites—of enforcing good habits—and on the value of that state of the sentiments and emotions which such a course tended to form¹. In truth, this

The derivative reasonings of Sokratēs were of larger range than his general doctrine.

¹ Xenoph. Mem. ii. 6, 39. ὅσα δ' ἐν ἀνθρώποις ἀρεταὶ λέγονται ταῖς τοῦ σώματος ἀναγκαστικαῖς ἐνέργειαι μαθεῖσθαι τε καὶ μελέτῃ ἀξιοποιοῦναι. Again, the necessity of practice or discipline is inculcated, iii. 9, 1. When Sokratēs enumerates the qualities requisite in a good friend, it is not merely superior knowledge which he talks of, but of moral excellence; continence, a self-sufficing temper, mildness, a grateful disposition (c. ii. 6, 1-5).

Moreover Sokratēs laid it down that continence or self-control was the very basis of virtue—τῇ ἐγκράτειᾳ ἀρετὴς ἀρχή (I. 5, 4). Also that continence was indispensable in order to enable a man to acquire knowledge (iv. 5, 10, 11).

Sokratēs here plainly treats ἐγκράτεια (continence or self-control) as not being a state of the intellectual man, and yet as being the very basis of virtue. He therefore does not seem to have applied consistently his general doctrine, that virtue consisted in knowledge, or in the excellence of the intellectual man, alone. Perhaps he might have said—Knowledge alone will be sufficient to make you virtuous; but before you can acquire knowledge, you must previously have disciplined your emotions and appetites. This merely eludes the objection, without saving the sufficiency of the general doctrine.

I cannot concur with Ritter (Gesch. der Philos. vol. ii. ch. 2. p. 78) in thinking that Sokratēs meant by knowledge or wisdom, a transcendental attribute, above humanity, and such as is possessed only by a god. This is by no means consistent with that practical conception of human life and its ends, which stands so plainly marked in his character.

Why should we think it wonderful that Sokratēs should propose a defective theory, which embraces only one side of a large and compliis one particular characteristic of his admonitions. He exhorted men to limit their external wants, to be sparing in indulgence, and to cultivate, even in preference to honours and advancement, those pleasures which would surely arise from a performance of duty, as well as from self-examination and the consciousness of internal improvement. This earnest attention, in measuring the elements and conditions of happiness, to the state of the internal associations as contrasted with the effect of external causes—as well as the pains taken to make it appear how much the latter depend upon the former for their power of conferring happiness, and how sufficient is moderate good fortune in respect to externals, provided the internal man be properly disciplined—is a vein of thought which pervades both Sokratès and Plato, and which passed from them, under various modifications, to most of the subsequent schools of ethical philosophy. It is probable that Protagoras or Prodikus, training rich youth for active life—without altogether leaving out such internal element of happiness, would yet dwell upon it less; a point of decided superiority in Sokratès.

Political opinions of Sokratès.

The political opinions of Sokratès were much akin to his ethical, and deserve especial notice, as having in part contributed to his condemnation by the Dikastery. He thought that the functions of government belonged legitimately to those who knew best how to exercise them for the advantage of the governed. "The legitimate King or Governor was not asked question? Considering that his was the first theory derived from data really belonging to the subject, the wonder is, that it was so near an approach to the truth.

the man who held the sceptre—nor the man elected by some vulgar persons—nor he who had got the post by lot—nor he who had thrust himself in by force, or by fraud—but he alone who knew how to govern well¹. Just as the pilot governed on ship-board, the surgeon in a sick man's house, the trainer in a palaestra—every one else being eager to obey these professional superiors, and even thanking and recompensing them for their directions, simply because their greater knowledge was an admitted fact. It was absurd (Sokratês used to contend) to choose public officers by lot, when no one would trust himself on shipboard under the care of a pilot selected by hazard², nor would any one pick out a carpenter or a musician in like manner.

We do not know what provisions Sokratês suggested for applying his principle to practice—for discovering who was the fittest man in point of knowledge—or for superseding him in case of his becoming unfit, or in case another fitter than he should arise. The analogies of the pilot, the surgeon, and professional men generally, would naturally conduct him to election by the people, renewable after temporary periods; since no one of these professional persons, whatever may be his positive knowledge, is ever trusted or obeyed except by the free choice of those who confide in him, and who may at any time make choice of another. But it does not appear that Sokratês followed out this part of the analogy. His companions remarked to him that his first-rate intellectual ruler would be a despot, who might, if he pleased, either refuse to listen to good advice, or even put to death those who gave it. "He will not act thus—(replied Sokratès) for if he does, he will himself be the greatest loser¹."

¹ Xen. Mem. iii. 9, 10, 11.² Xen. Mem. i. 2, 3.

We may notice in this doctrine of Sokratès the same imperfection as that which is involved in the ethical doctrine; a disposition to make the intellectual conditions of political fitness stand for the whole. His negative political doctrine is not to be mistaken: he approved neither of democracy nor of oligarchy. As he was not attached, either by sentiment or by conviction, to the constitution of Athens—so neither had he the least sympathy with oligarchical usurpers such as the Four Hundred and the Thirty. His positive ideal state, as far as we can divine it, would have been something like that which is worked out in the 'Cyropædia' of Xenophon.

In describing the persevering activity of Sokratès, as a religious and intellectual missionary, we have really described his life; for he had no other occupation than this continual intercourse with the Athenian public—his indiscriminate conversation, and invincible dialectics. Discharging faithfully and bravely his duties as an hoplite on military service—but keeping aloof from official duty in the Dikastery, the public assembly, or the Senate-house, except in that one memorable year of the battle of Arginussæ—he incurred none of those party animosities which an active public life at Athens often provoked. His life was legally blameless, nor had he ever been brought up before the Dikastery until his one final trial, when he was seventy years of age. That he stood conspicuous before the public eye in 423 B.C., at the time when the 'Clouds' of Aristophanês were brought on the stage—is certain. He may have been and probably was, conspicuous even earlier: so that we can hardly allow him less than thirty years of public, notorious, and efficacious discoursing, down to his trial in 399 B.C.

¹ Xen. Mem. iii. 9, 12: compare Plato, Gorgias, c. 56, p. 469, 470.

It was in that year that Melêtus, seconded by two auxiliaries, Anytus and Lykon, presented against him, and hung up in the appointed place (the portico before the office of the second or King-Archon), an indictment against him in the following terms:—"Sokratês is guilty of crime, first, for not worshipping the gods whom the city worships, but introducing new divinities of his own—next, for corrupting the youth. The penalty due is, death."

Accusation
against him
by Melêtus, Anytus and Lykon.

It is certain that neither the conduct nor the conversation of Sokratês had undergone any alteration for many years past; since the sameness of his manner of talking is both derided by his enemies and confessed by himself. Our first sentiment therefore (apart from the question of guilt or innocence) is one of astonishment, that he should have been prosecuted, at seventy years of age, for persevering in an occupation which he had publicly followed during twenty-five or thirty years preceding. Xenophon, full of reverence for his master, takes up the matter on much higher ground, and expresses himself in a feeling of indignant amazement that the Athenians could find anything to condemn in a man every way so admirable. But whoever attentively considers the picture which I have presented of the purpose, the working, and the extreme publicity of Sokratēs, will rather be inclined to wonder, not that the indictment was presented at last, but that some such indictment had not been presented long before. Such certainly is the impression suggested by the language of Sokratēs himself, in the 'Platonic Apology.' He there proclaims emphatically, that though his present accusers were men of consideration, it was neither their enmity, nor their eloquence, which he had now principally to fear; but the accumulated force of antipathy—the numerous and important personal enemies, each with sympathising partisans—the long-standing and uncontradicted calumnies¹—raised against him throughout his cross-examining career.

The real ground for surprise is, that that accusation had not been preferred before.

Inevitable unpopularity incurred by Sokratēs in his mission.

In truth, the mission of Sokratēs, as he himself describes it, could not but prove eminently unpopular and obnoxious. To convince a man that, of matters which he felt confident of knowing, and had never thought of questioning or even of studying, he is really profoundly ignorant, insomuch that he cannot reply to a few pertinent queries without involving himself in flagrant contradictions—is an operation highly salutary, often necessary, to his future improvement; but an operation of painful mental surgery, in which indeed the temporary pain experienced is one of the conditions almost indispensable to the future beneficial results. It is one which few men can endure without hating the operator at the time; although doubtless such hatred would not only disappear, but be exchanged for esteem and admiration, if they persevered until the full ulterior consequences of the operation developed themselves. But we know (from the express statement of Xenophon) that many, who underwent this first pungent thrust of his dialectics, never came near him again: he disregarded them as laggards¹, but their voices did not the less count in the hostile chorus. What made that chorus the more formidable, was, the high quality and position of its leaders. For Sokratês himself tells us, that the men whom he chiefly and expressly sought out to cross-examine, were the men of celebrity as statesmen, rhetors, poets, or artisans; those at once most sensitive to such humiliation, and most capable of making their enmity effective.

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 2. p. 18 B; c. 16. p. 29 A. 'Ὁ δὲ καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἡμετέροις ἔλεγον, ὅτι πολλὰ μοι ἀπέχθαι γένοιτο καὶ πρὸς πολλούς, εὖ ἔστιν οὐκ ἀληθὲς εἶναι. Καὶ τοῦτ' ἐστὶν ἡ ἐμὴ αἰρήνη, ἴσως αἰρῶ—ὁ Μέλητος, οἷός ἐστιν ἄνθρωπος, ἀλλ' ὃ τῶν πολλῶν ἀμειβομένη καὶ φθάνει.

The expression τῶν πολλῶν in this last line is not used in its most common signification, but is equivalent to ταῦτα τῶν πολλῶν.

When we reflect upon this great body of antipathy, so terrible both from number and from constituent items, we shall wonder only that Sokratês could have gone on so long standing in the marketplace to aggravate it, and that the indictment of Melêtus could have been so long postponed; since it was just as applicable earlier as later, and since the sensitive temper of the people, as to charges of irreligion, was a well-known fact². The truth is, that as history presents to us only one man who ever devoted his life to prosecute this duty of an elenchtic or cross-examining missionary—so there was but one city, in the ancient world at least, wherein he would have been allowed to prosecute it fortwenty-five years with safety and impunity; and that city was Athens. I have in a previous volume noted the respect for individual dissent of opinion, taste, and behaviour, among one another, which characterized the Athenian population, and which Periklès puts in emphatic relief as a part of his funeral discourse. It was this established liberality of the democratical sentiment at Athens which so long protected the noble eccentricity of Sokratès from being disturbed by the numerous enemies which he provoked: at Sparta, at Thebes, at Argos, Milètus, or Syracuse, his blameless life would have been insufficient as a shield, and his irresistible dialectic power would have caused him to be only the more speedily silenced. Intolerance is the natural weed of the human bosom, though its growth or development may be counteracted by liberalizing causes; of these, at Athens, the most powerful was, the democratical constitution as there worked, in combination with diffused intellectual and æsthetical sensibility, and keen relish for discourse. Liberty of speech was consecrated, in every man's estimation, among the first of privileges; every man was accustomed to hear opinions, opposite to his own, constantly expressed,—and to believe that others had a right to their opinions as well as himself. And though men would not, as a general principle, have extended such toleration to religious subjects—yet the established habit in reference to other matters greatly influenced their practice, and rendered them more averse to any positive severity against avowed dissenters from the received religious belief. It is certain that there was at Athens both a keener intellectual stimulus, and greater freedom as well of thought as of speech, than in any other city of Greece. The long toleration of Sokratès is one example of this general fact, while his trial proves little, and his execution nothing, against it—as will presently appear.

It was only from the general toleration of the Athenian democracy and population, that he was allowed to go on so long.

¹ Xen. Mem. iv. 2, 40. Πολλοὶ μὲν οὖν τῶν οὕτω διατεθέντων ἰσὺς ζωγράφους οὐδέτις αὐτῶν προσήεσται, οὐδὲ καὶ βλακωτέρους ἐνόμιζεν.

² Plato, Euthyphron, c. 2, p. 3 C. εἰδὼς ὅτι εὐθὺς ἀπὸ τὰ κοινὰ πρὸς τοὺς πολλοὺς.

There must doubtless have been particular circumstances, of which we are scarcely at all informed, which induced his accusers to prefer their indictment at the actual moment, in spite of the advanced age of Sokratès.

Particular circumstances which brought on the trial of Sokratès.

In the first place, Anytus, one of the accusers of Sokratès, appears to have become incensed against him on private grounds. The son of Anytus had manifested interest in his conversation, and Sokratès, observing in the young man intellectual impulse and promise, endeavoured to dissuade his father from bringing him up to his own trade of a leather-seller¹. It was in this general way that a great proportion of the antipathy against Sokratès was excited, as he himself tells us in the 'Platonic Apology.' The young men were those to whom he chiefly addressed himself, and who, keenly relishing his conversation, often carried home new ideas which displeased their fathers²; hence the general charge against Sokratès of corrupting the youth. Now this circumstance had recently happened in the peculiar case of Anytus, a rich tradesman, a leading man in politics, and just now of peculiar influence in the city, because he had been one of the leading fellow-labourers with Thrasybulus in the expulsion of the Thirty, manifesting an energetic and meritorious patriotism. He (like Thrasybulus and many trating what was often meant by a father, when he accused Sokratès, or one of the Sophists, of "corrupting his son;" also the extreme vengeance which he thought himself entitled to take. (Cypriod. iii. l. 14. 38. 40.)

Private offence of Anytus.

¹ See Xenoph. Apol. Sok. s. 29, 30. This little piece bears a very erroneous title, and may possibly not be the composition of Xenophon, as the commentators generally affirm; but it has every appearance of being a work of the time.

² Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 10, p. 23 C; e. 27, p. 37 E.

The Armenian prince, with his newly-married youthful son Tigranes, are represented as conversing with Cyrus, who asks the latter—"What is become of that man, the Sophist, who used to be always in your company, and to whom you were so much attached?"—"My father put him to death."—"For what offence?"—"Affirming that he corrupted me: though the man was of such an admirable character, that even when he was dying, he called me, and said, 'Be not angry with your father for killing me, for he does it from no bad intention, but from ignorance; and sins committed from ignorance ought to be reckoned as involuntary.'"—"Alas! poor man!" exclaimed Cyrus.—The father himself then spoke as follows: "Cyrus, you know that a husband puts to death any other man whom he finds commencing with (and corrupting) his wife. It is not that he corrupts her understanding, but that he robs the husband of her affection, and therefore the latter deals with him as an enemy. Just so did I hate this Sophist, because he made my son admire him more than me."—"By the Gods," replied Cyrus, "I think you have yielded only to human frailty (ἀνθρώπινην καὶ δοκίμην ἀσθενεῖαν). Forgive your father, Tigranes." Compare a similar train of thought, Cypriod. v. 5, 28.

As marital jealousy was held, both by Attic law and opinion, to be entitled to the gratification of its extreme vindictive impulse, so the same right is here claimed by analogy for paternal jealousy, even to the destruction of a man of exemplary character. The very strong sympathy expressed with offended jealousy is a circumstance deserving notice, and suggesting much reflection. And if we apply the principle of the case to real life at Athens, we shall comprehend how it was that Anytus and other fathers became so incensed against Sokratès and the Sophists of influence and ascendancy. The mere fact, that the youth became intensely attached to their conversation and society, would be often sufficient to raise bitter resentment, and was called by the name corruption.

others) had sustained great loss of property¹ during the oligarchical dominion; which perhaps made him the more strenuous in requiring that his son should pursue trade with assiduity, in order to restore the family fortunes. He seems moreover to have been an enemy of all teaching which went beyond the narrowest practicality; hating alike Sokratês and the Sophists².

While we can thus point out a recent occurrence, which had brought one of the most ascendent politicians in the city into special exasperation against Sokratês—another circumstance which weighed him down was, his past connexion with the deceased Kritias and Alkibiadês. Of these two men, the latter, though he had some great admirers, was on the whole odious; still more from his private insolence and enormities than from his public treason as an exile. But the name of Kritias was detested, and deservedly detested, beyond that of any other man in Athenian history, as the chief director of the unmeasured spoliation and atrocities committed by the Thirty. That Sokratês had educated both Kritias and Alkibiadês, was affirmed by the accusers, and seemingly believed by the general public, both at the time and afterwards³. That both of them had been among those who conversed with him, when young men, is an unquestionable fact; to what extent, or down to what period, the conversation was carried, we cannot distinctly ascertain. Xenophon affirms that both of them frequented his society

Unpopularity arising to Sokratês from his connexion with Kritias and Alkibiadês.

¹ Isokrat. Or. xviii. cont. Kallimach. s. 30.

² See Plato, Menon, c. 27, 28, p. 90, 91.

³ Æschinês, cont. Timarch. c. 34. p. 74. ἐπεὶς Σωκράτης τὸν νεώτερον ἐκτρέφειν, ὅτι Κριτίας ἑφ' αὐτῷ περὶ ἀδικίας, &c. Xenoph. Mem. i. 2, 12.

when young, to catch from him an argumentative facility which might be serviceable to their political ambition; that he curbed their violent and licentious propensities so long as they continued to come to him; that both of them manifested a respectful obedience to him, which seemed in little consonance with their natural tempers; but that they soon quitted him, weary of such restraint, after having acquired as much as they thought convenient of his peculiar accomplishment. The writings of Plato, on the contrary, impress us with the idea that the association of both of them with Sokratès must have been more continued and intimate; for both of them are made to take great part in the Platonic dialogues—while the attachment of Sokratès to Alkibiadès is represented as stronger than that which he ever felt towards any other man; a fact not difficult to explain, since the latter, notwithstanding his ungovernable dispositions, was distinguished in his youth not less for capacity and forward impulse, than for beauty—and since youthful beauty fired the imagination of the Greeks, especially that of Sokratès, more than the charms of the other sex¹. From the year 420 B.C., in which the activity of Alkibiadès as a political leader commenced, it seems unlikely that he could have seen much of Sokratès—and after the year 415 A.C., the fact is impossible; since in that year he became a permanent exile, with the exception of three or four months in the year 407 A.C. At the moment of the trial of Sokratès, therefore, his connexion with Alkibiadès must at least have been a fact long past and gone. Respecting Kritias, we make out less; and as he was a kinsman of Plato (one of the well-known companions of Sokratês, and present at his trial), and himself an accomplished and literary man, his association with Sokratês may have continued longer; at least a colour was given for so asserting. Though the supposition that any of the vices either of Kritias or Alkibiadês were encouraged, or even tolerated, by Sokratês, can have arisen in none but prejudiced or ill-informed minds—yet it is certain that such a supposition was entertained; and that it placed him before the public in an altered position after the enormities of the Thirty. Anytus, incensed with him already on the subject of his son, would be doubly incensed against him as the reputed tutor of Kritias.

¹ See Plato (Charmides, c. 3, p. 154 C; Lysis, c. 2, p. 204 B; Protagoras, c. 1, p. 309 A), &c.

Of Melêtus, the primary, though not the most important, accuser, we know only that he was a poet; of Lykon, that he was a rhetor. Both these classes had been alienated by the cross-examining dialectics to which many of their number had been exposed by Sokratês. They were the last men to bear such an exposure with patience; while their enmity, taken as a class rarely unanimous, was truly formidable when it bore upon any single individual.

We know nothing of the speeches of either of the accusers before the Dikastery, except what can be picked out from the remarks in Xenophon and the defence of Plato¹. Of the three counts of the indict-

Enmity of the poets and rhetors to Sokratês.

¹ The Sophist Polykratês, a few years after the death of Sokratês, chose the accusation of the latter as a theme for composing an harangue, which Quintilian appears to have perused, accepting it as the real dis-

Indictment —grounds of the accusers—effect of the 'Clouds' of Aristo-phanes, in creating prejudice against Sokratês.

ment, the second was the easiest for them to support, on plausible grounds. That Sokratês was a religious innovator, would be considered as proved by the peculiar divine sign of which he was wont to speak freely and publicly, and which visited no one except himself. Accordingly, in the 'Platonic Defence,' he never really replies to the second charge. He questions Melêtus before the Dikastery, and the latter is represented as answering, that he meant to accuse Sokratês of not believing in the gods at all¹; to which imputed disbelief Sokratês answers with an emphatic negative. In support of the first count, however—the charge of general disbelief in the gods recognized by the city—nothing in his conduct could be cited; for he was exact in his legal worship like other citizens—and even more than others, if Xenophon is correct². But it would appear that the old calumnies of the Aristophanic 'Clouds' were revived, and that the effect of that witty drama, together with similar efforts of Eupolis and others, perhaps hardly less witty—was still enduring; a striking proof that these comedians were no impotent libellers. Sokratês manifests greater apprehension of the effect of the ancient impressions, than of the speeches which had been just delivered against him: but these latter speeches would of course tell, by refreshing the sentiments of the past, and recourse pronounced in court by one of the accusers. It is plain from Isokratês, however, that the harangue was only a rhetorical exercise, and in his judgment, not a good one. See Quintilian, L. O. ii. 17, 4; iii. 1, 11; and Isokratês, Busiris, s. 4. The Argument prefixed to this last oration is full of errors.

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 14, p. 26 C.

² Xen. Mem. i. 2, 64; i. 3, 1.

viving the Aristophanic picture of Sokratēs as a speculator on physics as well as a rhetorical teacher for pleading, making the worse appear the better reason¹. Sokratēs in the 'Platonic Defence' appeals to the number of persons who had listened to his conversation, whether any of them had ever heard him say one word on the subject of physical studies²; while Xenophon goes further, and represents him as having positively discountenanced them, on the ground of impiety³.

As there were three distinct accusers to speak against Sokratēs, so we may reasonably suppose that they would concert beforehand on what topics each should insist; Melētus undertaking that which related to religion, while Anytus and Lykon would dwell on the political grounds of attack. In the 'Platonic Apology,' Sokratēs comments emphatically on the allegations of Melētus, questions him publicly before the Dikasts, and criticises his replies. He makes little allusion to Anytus, or to anything except what is formally embodied in the indictment; and treats the last count, the charge of corrupting youth, in connexion with the first, as if the corruption alleged consisted in irreligious teaching. But Xenophon intimates that the accusers, in enforcing this allegation of pernicious teaching, went into other matters quite distinct from the religious tenets of Sokratēs, and denounced him as having taught them lawlessness and disrespect, as well towards their parents as towards their country. We find mention made in Xenophon of accusatory grounds similar of corruption in teaching was partly founded on political grounds.

Accusation

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 3. p. 19 B. ² Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 3. p. 19 C.

³ Xen. Mem. i. 1, 13.

to those in the 'Clouds'—similar also to those which modern authors usually advance against the Sophists.

Sokratēs (said Anytus and the other accusers) taught young men to despise the existing political constitution, by remarking that the Athenian practice of naming Archons by lot was silly, and that no man of sense would ever choose in this way a pilot or a carpenter—though the mischief there arising from bad qualification was far less than in the case of the Archons¹. Such teaching (it was urged) destroyed in the minds of the hearers respect for the laws and constitution, and rendered them violent and licentious. As examples of the way in which it had worked, his two pupils Kritias and Alkibiadēs might be cited, both formed in his school; one, the most violent and rapacious of the Thirty recent oligarchs; the other, a disgrace to the democracy by his outrageous insolence and licentiousness²; both of them authors of ruinous mischief to the city.

Moreover the youth learnt from him conceit of their own superior wisdom, and the habit of insulting their fathers as well as of slighting their other kinsmen. Sokratēs told them (it was urged) that even their fathers, in case of madness, might be lawfully put under restraint, and that when a man needed service, those whom he had to look to were not his kinsmen as such, but the persons best qualified to render it: thus, if he was sick, he must consult a surgeon—if involved in a lawsuit, those who were most conversant with such a situation. Between friends also, mere good feeling and affection was of little use: the important circumstance was, that they should acquire the capacity of rendering mutual service to each other. No one was worthy of esteem except the man who knew what was proper to be done, and could explain it to others: which meant (urged the accuser) that Sokratès was not only the wisest of men, but the only person capable of making his pupils wise; other advisers being worthless compared with him¹.

¹ Xen. Mem. i. 2, 9.

² Xen. Mem. i. 2, 12.

He was in the habit too (the accusation proceeded) of citing the worst passages out of distinguished poets, and of perverting them to the mischievous purpose of spoiling the dispositions of youth; planting in them criminal and despotic tendencies. Thus he quoted a line of Hesiod—"No work is disgraceful; but indolence is disgraceful:" explaining it to mean, that a man might without scruple do any sort of work, base or unjust as it might be, for the sake of profit. Next, Sokratès was particularly fond of quoting those lines of Homer (in the second book of the Iliad) wherein Odysseus is described as bringing back the Greeks, who had just dispersed from the public agora in compliance with the exhortation of Agamemnôn, and were hastening to their ships. Odysseus caresses and flatters the chiefs, while he chides and even strikes the common men; though both were doing the same thing, and guilty of the same fault—if fault it was, to obey what the commander-in-chief had himself just suggested. Sokratès interpreted this passage (the accuser affirmed)

Perversion
of the poets alleged against him.

¹ Xen. Mem. i. 2, 49-53.

as if Homer praised the application of stripes to poor men and the common people¹.

Remarks of Xenophon upon these accusations.

Nothing could be easier than for an accuser to find matter for inculpation of Sokratès, by partial citations from his continual discourses, given without the context or explanations which had accompanied them—by bold invention, where even this partial basis was wanting—sometimes also by taking up real error, since no man who is continually talking, especially extempore, can always talk correctly. Few teachers would escape, if penal sentences were permitted to tell against them, founded upon evidence such as this. Xenophon, in noticing the imputations, comments upon them all, denies some, and explains others. As to the passages out of Hesiod and Homer, he affirms that Sokratès drew from them inferences quite contrary to those alleged²; which latter seem indeed altogether unreasonable, invented to call forth the deep-seated democratical sentiment of the Athenians, after the accuser had laid his preliminary ground by connecting Sokratès with Kritias and Alkibiadès. That Sokratès improperly depreciated either filial duty, or the domestic affections, is in like manner highly improbable. We may much more reasonably believe the assertion of Xenophon, who represents him to have exhorted the hearer “to make himself as wise, and as capable of rendering service, as possible; so that, when he wished to acquire esteem from father or brother or friend, he might not sit still in reliance on the simple fact of relationship, but might earn such feeling by doing them positive good¹." To tell a young man that mere good feeling would be totally insufficient, unless he were prepared and competent to carry it into action—is a lesson which few parents would wish to discourage. Nor would any generous parent make it a crime against the teaching of Sokratēs, that it rendered his son wiser than himself—which probably it would do. To restrict the range of teaching for a young man, because it may make him think himself wiser than his father—is only one of the thousand shapes in which the pleading of ignorance against knowledge was then, and still continues occasionally to be, presented.

¹ Xen. Mem. i. 2, 56-59.

² Xen. Mem. i. 2, 59.

Nevertheless it is not to be denied that these attacks of Anytus bear upon the vulnerable side of the Sokratic general theory of Ethics, according to which, virtue was asserted to depend upon knowledge. I have already remarked that this is true, but not the whole truth; a certain state of the affections and dispositions being not less indispensable, as conditions of virtue, than a certain state of the intelligence. An enemy therefore had some pretence for making it appear that Sokratēs, stating a part of the truth as the whole, denied or degraded all that remained. But though this would be a criticism not entirely unfounded against his general theory, it would not hold against his precepts or practical teaching, as we find them in Xenophon; for these

The charges touch upon the defective point of the Sokratic Ethical theory.

¹ Xen. Mem. i. 2, 55. Καὶ παρεκίδει ἐπιμαλίσθαι τοῦ ἐν φρονήματι εἶναι καὶ ἀφελιμώτατος, ἅπας, εἰς τε ἐπὶ πατρὶ ἐπὶ τε ἐπὶ ἀδελφοῦ ἐπὶ τε ἐπ' ἄλλων τιδὲν βούληται τιμᾶσθαι, μὴ τῷ οἰκίᾳ εἶναι πιστεύειν ἡμέλῃ, ἀλλὰ παρᾷται, ὅθ' ἐν ἑαυτῷ βούληται τιμᾶσθαι, τοῖσι τοῖσι ἀφελιμῶν εἶναι.

(as I have remarked) reach much wider than his general theory, and inculcate the cultivation of habits and dispositions not less strenuously than the acquisition of knowledge.

The censures affirmed to have been cast by Sokratès against the choice of Archons by lot at Athens, are not denied by Xenophon. The accuser urged that "by such censures Sokratès excited the young men to despise the established constitution, and to become lawless and violent in their conduct". This is just the same pretence, of tendency to bring the government into hatred and contempt, on which in former days prosecutions for public libel were instituted against writers in England, and on which they still continue to be abundantly instituted in France, under the first President of the Republic. There can hardly be a more serious political mischief than such confusion of the disapproving critic with a conspirator, and imposition of silence upon dissentient minorities. Nor has there ever been any case in which such an imputation was more destitute of colour than that of Sokratès, who appealed always to men's reason and very little to their feelings: so little indeed, that modern authors make his coldness a matter of charge against him; who never omitted to inculcate rigid observance of the law, and set the example of such observance himself. Whatever may have been his sentiments about democracy, he always obeyed the democratical government, nor is there any pretence for charging him with participation in oligarchical schemes. It was the Thirty, who for the first time in his long life, interdicted his teaching altogether, and were on the point almost of taking his life; while his intimate friend Chærephon was actually in exile with the democrats¹.

¹ Xen. Mem. i. 2, 9. τοὺς δὲ τοιαύτους λόγους ἐπαίρει ἔφη τοὺς αὐτοὺς καταφρονεῖν τῆς καθιερωμένης πολιτείας, καὶ ποιεῖν βιάσεις.

Xenophon lays great emphasis on two points, when defending Sokratēs against his accusers. First, the former was in his own conduct virtuous, self-denying, and strict in obedience to the law. Next, he accustomed his hearers to hear nothing except appeals to their reason, and impressed on them obedience only to their rational convictions. That such a man, with so great a weight of presumption in his favour, should be tried and found guilty as a corruptor of youth—the most undefined of all imaginable charges—is a grave and melancholy fact in the history of mankind. Yet when we see upon what light evidence modern authors are willing to admit the same charge against the Sophists, we have no right to wonder that the Athenians—when addressed, not through that calm reason to which Sokratēs appealed, but through all their antipathies, religious as well as political, public as well as private—were exasperated into dealing with him as the type and precursor of Kritias and Alkibiadēs.

After all, the exasperation, and the consequent verdict of guilty, were not wholly the fault of the Dikasts, nor wholly brought about by his accusers and his numerous private enemies. No such verdict would have been given unless by what we must call the consent and concurrence of Sokratēs himself. This is one of the most important facts of the case, in reference both to himself and to the Athenians.

The verdict against Sokratēs was brought upon him partly by his own concurrence.

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 5. p. 21 A; c. 20, p. 32 E; Xen. Mem. i, 2, 31.

Small majority by which he was condemned.

We learn from his own statement in the 'Platonic Defence,' that the verdict of Guilty was only pronounced by a majority of five or six, amidst a body so numerous as an Athenian Dikastery;—probably 557 in total number¹, if a confused statement in Diogenes Laërtius can be trusted. Now any one who reads that defence, and considers it in conjunction with the circumstances of the case and the feelings of the Dikasts, will see that its tenor is such as must have turned a much greater number of votes than six against him. And we are informed by the distinct testimony of Xenophon², that Sokratēs approached his trial with the feelings of one who hardly wished to be acquitted. He took no thought whatever for the preparation of his defence, and when his friend Hermogenēs remonstrated with him on the serious consequences of such an omission, he replied, first, that the just and blameless life, which he was conscious of having passed, was the best of all preparations for defence—next, that having once begun to meditate on what it would be proper for him to say, the divine sign had interposed to forbid him from proceeding. He went on to say, that it was no wonder that the gods should deem it better for him to die now, than to live longer. He had hitherto lived in perfect satisfaction, with a consciousness of progressive moral improvement, and with esteem, marked and unabated, from his friends. If his life were prolonged, old age would soon overpower him; he would lose in part his sight, his hearing, or his intelligence; and life with such abated efficacy and dignity would be intolerable to him. Whereas, if he were condemned now, he should be condemned unjustly, which would be a great disgrace to his judges, but none to him: nay, it would even procure for him increase of sympathy and admiration, and a more willing acknowledgment from every one that he had been both a just man and an improving preceptor¹.

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 25, p. 36 A; Diog. Laërt. ii. 41. Diogenes says that he was condemned by 281 ψηφοι πλείους τῶν ἀποδιδόντων. If Diogenes meant to assert that the verdict was found by a majority of 281 above the acquitting votes, this would be contradicted by the 'Platonic Apology,' which assures us beyond any doubt that the majority was not greater than five or six, so that the turning of three votes would have altered the verdict. But as the number 281 seems precise, and is not in itself untrustworthy, some commentators construe it, though the words as they now stand are perplexing, as the aggregate of the majority. Since the 'Platonic Apology' proves that it was a majority of five or six, the minority would consequently be 276, and the total 557.

² Xen. Mem. iv. 8, 4 seq. He learnt the fact from Hermogenēs, who heard it from Sokratēs himself.

These words, spoken before his trial, intimate a state of belief which explains the tenor of the defence and formed one essential condition of the final result. They prove that Sokratēs not only cared little for being acquitted, but even thought that the approaching trial was marked out by the gods as the term of his life, and that there were good reasons why he should prefer such a consummation as best for himself. Nor is it wonderful that he should entertain that opinion, when we recollect the entire ascendancy within him of strong internal conscience and intelligent reflection, built upon an originally fearless temperament, and silencing what Plato²

Sokratēs defended himself like one who did not care to be acquitted.

¹ Xen. Mem. iv. 8, 9, 10.

² Plato, Phædon, c. 60, p. 77 E. ἀλλ' ἵσως ἐν τῇ καὶ ἐν ἡμῖν παύσῃ, calls "the child within us, who trembles before death"—his great love of colloquial influence, and incapacity of living without it—his old age, now seventy years, rendering it impossible that such influence could much longer continue—and the opportunity afforded to him, by now towering above ordinary men under the like circumstances, to read an impressive lesson, as well as to leave behind him a reputation yet more exalted than that which he had hitherto acquired. It was in this frame of mind that Sokratēs came to his trial and undertook his unpremeditated defence, the substance of which we now read in the 'Platonic Apology.' His calculations, alike high-minded and well-balanced, were completely realised. Had he been acquitted after such a defence, it would have been not only a triumph over his personal enemies, but would have been a sanction on the part of the people and the popular Dikastery to his teaching—which indeed had been enforced by Anytus¹ in his accusing argument, in reference to acquittal generally, even before he heard the defence: whereas his condemnation, and the feelings with which he met it, have shed double and triple lustre over his whole life and character.

Prefaced by this exposition of the feelings of Sokratēs, the 'Platonic Defence' becomes not merely sublime and impressive, but also the manifestation of a rational and consistent purpose. It does indeed include a vindication of himself against two out of the three counts of the indictment—against the charge of not believing in the recognised gods of Athens, and that of corrupting the youth; respecting the second of the three, whereby he was charged with religious innovation, he says little or nothing. But it bears no resemblance to the speech of one standing on his trial, with the written indictment concluding "Penalty, Death"—hanging up in open court before him. On the contrary, it is an emphatic lesson to the hearers, embodied in the frank outpouring of a fearless and self-confiding conscience. It is undertaken, from the beginning, because the law commands; with a faint wish, and even not an unqualified wish,—but no hope,—that it may succeed¹. Sokratēs first replies to the standing antipathies against him without, arising from the number of enemies whom his cross-examining Elenchus had aroused against him, and from those false reports which the Aristophanic 'Clouds' had contributed so much to circulate. In accounting for the rise of these antipathies, he impresses upon the Dikasts the divine mission under which he was acting, not without considerable doubts whether they will believe him to be in earnest²; and gives that interesting exposition of his intellectual campaign, against "the conceit of knowledge without the reality," of which I have already spoken. He then

The 'Platonic Apology.'

ἔστιν τὰ τοιαῦτα φοβεῖται. Ταῦτος οὖν πεινόμενος πείθει μὴ δεδιέναι τὸν θάνατον, ὥσπερ τὰ μαρτυρεῖται.

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 17. p. 29 C.

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 2. p. 19 A. Προδοίμεν μὲν οὖν ὅτι ταῦτα αὐτῷ γενέσθαι, εἴτε ἄριστος καὶ ἐμὲ καὶ ἡμῶν, καὶ πλείον τι με ποιήσειν ἀπολογούμενον· οἷόν τι δὲ πρὸς χαλεπὸν εἶναι, καὶ οὐ πᾶσι με λαθεῖναι οἶός ἐστι. Ὅμως δὲ ταῦτα μὲν ἴσα ἐστὶ τῷ θεῷ φίλον, τῷ δὲ νόμῳ πιστότεον καὶ ἀπολογητέον.

² Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 5. p. 20 D. *Καὶ ἴσως μὲν δοξῶ τισιν ἐμὲ παιζειν—ὃ μάλιστα ἴσται, πᾶσις ἐμὲ τῆς ἀλήθειας ἐρῶ. Ἄγαν, c. 28. p. 37 E. *Εἴς τε γὰρ λέγω, ὅτι τῷ θεῷ ἀπειθεῖς τοῦτ' ἐστὶ, καὶ διὰ τοῦτ' ἀδύνατος ἡσυχίαν ἔχειν, οὐκ ἐπίσσεσθαι μοι ὅτι εἰρησυνεμένης.

goes into the indictment, questions Melétus in open court, and dissects his answers. Having rebutted the charge of irreligion, he reverts again to the imperative mandate of the gods under which he is acting, "to spend his life in the search for wisdom and in examining himself as well as others;" a mandate, which if he were to disobey, he would be then justly amenable to the charge of irreligion¹; and he announces to the Dikasts distinctly, that even if they were now to acquit him, he neither could nor would relax in the course which he had been pursuing². He considers that the mission imposed upon him is among the greatest blessings ever conferred by the gods upon Athens³. He deprecates those murmurs of surprise or displeasure, which his discourse evidently called forth more than once⁴—though not so much on his own account, as on that of the Dikasts, who will be benefited by hearing him, and who will hurt themselves and their city much more than him, if they should now pronounce condemnation⁵. It was not on his own account that he sought to defend himself, but on account of the Athenians, lest they by condemning him should sin against the gracious blessing of the god: they would not easily find such another, if they should put him to death⁶. Though

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 17, p. 29 A.

² Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 17, p. 30 B.

³ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 17, p. 30 A, B. οὐδέν μοι εἰδέναι ἐστὶν μᾶλλον ἀγαθὸν γενέσθαι ἢ τὸ ἐμὲ τῶν θεῶν ἱππεύειν.

⁴ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 18, p. 30 B.

⁵ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 18, p. 30 B. καὶ γὰρ, ὡς ἐγὼ οἶμαι, ἀνέστητε ἀκούοντες—ὅτι ἐμὲ ἀπαυτίζετε τοιοῦτος ὡς οὐκ ἐγὼ λέγω, οἷα ἐμὲ μᾶλλον πλάσσειν ἢ ὑμᾶς αὐτοὺς.

⁶ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 18, p. 30 E. πολλοὺ δέ μοι ἐγὼ ὑπὲρ ἑαυτοῦ ἀπολογισθῆναι, ὡς νῦν δεῖ οἴεσθαι, ἀλλὰ περὶ ὑμῶν μὴ ταῖς ἐξουμάργηται περὶ τῆς τοῦ his mission had spurred him on to indefatigable activity in individual colloquy, yet the divine sign had always forbidden him from taking active part in public proceedings: on the two exceptional occasions when he had stood publicly forward,—once under the democracy, once under the oligarchy,—he had shown the same resolution as at present;—not to be deterred by any terrors from that course which he believed to be just¹. Young men were delighted, as well as improved, by listening to his cross-examinations: in proof of the charge that he had corrupted them, no evidence had been produced—neither any of themselves, who having been once young when they enjoyed his conversation, had since grown elderly—nor any of their relatives; while he on his part could produce abundant testimony to the improving effect of his society, from the relatives of those who had profited by it².

“No man (says he) knows what death is, yet men fear it as if they knew well that it was the greatest of all evils; which is just a case of that worst of all ignorance—the conceit of knowing what you do not really know. For my part, this is the exact point on which I differ from most other men, if there be any one thing in which I am wiser than they: as I know nothing about Hades, so I do not pretend to any knowledge; but I do know well, that disobedience to a person better than myself, either God or man, is both an evil and a shame; nor will I ever embrace evil certain, in order to escape evil

Sentiment
of Sokratēs about death.

θεοῦ δύναιτο ἔμμεν ἑμοῦ καταφύγεσθαι, ὅτι γὰρ ἐπεὶ ἀνιστεύομεν, οὐ βολίαι ἄλλας τοιαύτας εὐρήσεται, &c.

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 20, 21. p. 33.

² Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 22.

which may for aught I know be a good¹. Perhaps you may feel indignant at the resolute tone of my defence: you may have expected that I should do as most others do in less dangerous trials than mine—that I should weep, beg and entreat for my life, and bring forward my children and relatives to do the same. I have relatives like other men, and three children; but not one of them shall appear before you for any such purpose. Not from any insolent dispositions on my part, nor any wish to put a slight upon you—but because I hold such conduct to be degrading to the reputation which I enjoy: for I have a reputation for superiority among you, deserved or undeserved as it may be. It is a disgrace to Athens when her esteemed men lower themselves, as they do but too often, by such mean and cowardly supplications; and you Dikasts, instead of being prompted thereby to spare them, ought rather to condemn them the more for so dishonouring the city². Apart from any reputation of mine, too, I should be a guilty man if I sought to bias you by supplications. My duty is to instruct and persuade you, if I can: but you have sworn to follow your convictions in judging according to the laws, not to make the laws bend to your partiality—and it is your duty so to do. Far be it from me to habituate you to perjury; far be it from you to contract any such habit. Do not therefore require of me proceedings dishonourable in reference to myself as well as criminal and impious in regard to you; especially at a moment when I am myself rebutting an accusation of impiety advanced by Melétus. I leave to you and to the god, to decide as may turn out best both for me and for you¹."

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 17, p. 29 B. Contrast this striking and truly Sokratic sentiment about the fear of death, with the commonplace way in which Sokratēs is represented as handling the same subject in Xenoph. Memor. i. 4, 7.

² Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 23, p. 34, 35. I translate the substance and not the words.

No one who reads the 'Platonic Apology' of Sokratēs will ever wish that he had made any other defence. But it is the speech of one who deliberately forgoes the immediate purpose of a defence—persuasion of his judges; who speaks for posterity, without regard to his own life—"solā posteritatis curā, et abruptis vitæ blandimentis²." The effect produced upon the Dikasts was such as Sokratēs anticipated beforehand, and heard afterwards without surprise as without discomposure, in the verdict of guilty. His only surprise was, at the extreme smallness of the majority whereby that verdict was passed³. And this is the true matter for astonishment. Never before had the Athenian Dikasts heard such a speech addressed to them. While all of them doubtless knew Sokratēs as a very able and very eccentric man, respecting his purposes and character they would differ; some regarding him with unqualified hostility, a few

Effect of his defence upon the Dikasts.

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 24. p. 35.

² These are the striking words of Tacitus (Hist. ii. 51) respecting the last hours of the Emperor Otho, after his suicide had been fully resolved upon, but before it had been consummated; an interval spent in the most careful and provident arrangements for the security and welfare of those around him—"ipsam viventem quidem relictum, sed solā posteritatis curā, et abruptis vitæ blandimentis."

³ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 25. p. 36 A. Οὐκ ἀνέλαττον μοι γίγναι τὸ γεγονὸς τοῦτο, ἀλλὰ πολὺ μᾶλλον θαυμάζω ἑαυτὸν τῶν φίλων τῶν γεγονότα ἀπαθῆναι. Οἱ γὰρ φίλοι ἔρωσι οὕτω παρ' ὀλίγων ἐκείνῳ, ἀλλὰ παρὰ πολλοῖ. &c.

others with respectful admiration, and a still larger number with simple admiration for ability, without any decisive sentiment either of antipathy or esteem. But by all these three categories, hardly excepting even his admirers, the speech would be felt to carry one sting which never misses its way to the angry feelings of the judicial bosom, whether the judges in session be one or a few or many—the sting of “affront to the court.” The Athenian Dikasts were always accustomed to be addressed with deference, often with subservience: they now heard themselves lectured by a philosopher who stood before them like a fearless and invulnerable superior, beyond their power, though awaiting their verdict: one who laid claim to a divine mission, which probably many of them believed to be an imposture—and who declared himself the inspired uprooter of “conceit of knowledge without the reality,” which purpose many would not understand, and some would not like. To many his demeanour would appear to betray an insolence not without analogy to Alkibiadēs or Kritias, with whom his accuser had compared him. I have already remarked, in reference to his trial, that considering the number of personal enemies whom he made, the wonder is, not that he was tried at all, but that he was not tried until so late in his life: I now remark in reference to the verdict, that, considering his speech before the Dikastery, we cannot be surprised that he was found guilty, but only that such verdict passed by so small a majority as five or six¹.

¹ Respecting the death of Sokratēs, M. Cousin observes as follows (in his translation of Plato, tom. i. p. 58, Preface to the Apology of Socrates):—

“Il y a plus: on voit qu’il a reconnu la nécessité de sa mort. Il dit

That the condemnation of Sokratès was brought on distinctly by the tone and tenor of his defence—is the express testimony of Xenophon. "Other persons on trial (he says) defended themselves in such manner as to conciliate the favour of the Dikasts, or flatter, or entreat them, contrary to the laws, and thus obtained acquittal. But Sokratès would resort to nothing of this customary practice of the Dikastery contrary to the laws. Though he might easily have been let off by the Dikasts, if he would have done anything of the kind even moderately, he preferred rather to adhere to the laws and die, than to save his life by violating them¹." Now no

Assertion of Xenophon that Sokratès might have been acquitted if he had chosen it.

expressément qu'il ne servirait à rien de l'absoudre, parcequ'il est décidé à mériter de nouveau l'accusation maintenant portée contre lui : que l'exil même ne peut le sauver, ses principes qu'il n'abandonnera jamais, et sa mission, qu'il poursuivra partout, devant le mettre toujours et partout dans la situation où il est : qu'enfin, il est inutile de reculer devant la nécessité, qu'il faut que sa destinée s'accomplisse, et que sa mort est venue. Socrate avait raison : sa mort était forcée, et le résultat inévitable de la lutte qu'il avait engagée contre le dogmatisme religieux et la fausse sagesse de son temps. C'est l'esprit de ce temps, et non pas Anytus, ni l'Aréopage, qui a mis en cause et condamné Socrate. Anytus, il faut le dire, étoit un citoyen recommandable : l'Aréopage, un tribunal équitable et modéré : et, s'il falloit s'étonner de quelque chose, ce seroit que Socrate ait été accusé si tard, et qu'il n'ait pas été condamné à une plus forte majorité."

[It is proper to remark, that Sokratès was tried before the Dikastery, not before the Areopagus.]

I am happy also to add, to the same effect, the judgment of another estimable authority—Professor Maurice, in his recent Work—Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy—(Part I. Ancient Philosophy, chap. vi. Div. ii. Sect. 2. 15):—

"How can such a man as Socrates, it has been often asked, have been compelled to drink hemlock? Must not the restored democracy of Athens have been worse, and more intolerant, than any power which ever existed on earth? Mr. Grote answers, we think, most reasonably, that the wonder is, how such a man should have been suffered to go on teaching for so long. No state, he adds, ever showed so much tolerance for differences of opinion as Athens."

¹ Xenoph. Mem. iv. 4, 4. Ἐπειὶς οὐδὲν ἐβόληται τοῖς δικασταῖς ἐν τῷ

one in Athens except Sokratēs, probably, would have construed the laws as requiring the tone of oration which he adopted; nor would he himself have so construed them, if he had been twenty years younger, with less of acquired dignity, and more years of possible usefulness open before him. Without debasing himself by unbecoming flattery or supplication, he would have avoided lecturing them as a master and superior¹—or ostentatiously asserting a divine mission for purposes which they would hardly understand—or an independence of their verdict which they might construe as defiance. The rhetor Lysias is said to have sent to him a composed speech for his defence, which he declined to use, not thinking it suitable to his dignity. But such a man as Lysias would hardly compose what would lower the dignity even of the loftiest client—though he would look to the result also; nor is there any doubt that if Sokratēs had pronounced it—or even a much less able speech, if inoffensive—he would have been acquitted. Quintilian² indeed expresses his satisfaction that Sokratēs maintained that towering dignity which brought out the rarest and most exalted of his attributes, but which at the same time renounced all chance of acquittal. Few persons will dissent δικαστηρίῳ παρὰ τοῖς νόμοις πειθεῖν· ἀλλὰ ῥηδύκεν ὡς ἀπαθείη ἐπὶ τοῖς δικαστέων, ἢ καὶ μετρίως τι τυκταὶ ἐνίοισι, προσέειπε μᾶλλον τοῖς νόμοις ἐμμένειν ἀπαθείῃ, ἢ παρανομοῖν ἔχει.

¹ Cicero (de Orat. i. 54. 231).—"Socrates ita in iudicio capitis pro se ipse dixit, ut non supplices aut rogas, sed augustus aut dominus videretur esse iudicium." So Epiktētus also remarked, in reference to the defence of Sokratēs—"By all means, abstain from supplication for mercy; but do not put it specially forward, that you will abstain, unless you intend, like Sokratēs, purposely to provoke the judges." (Arrian, Epiktēt. Diss. ii. 2. 18).

² Quintilian, Inst. Or. ii. 15. 30; et. i. 10; Dign. Latet. ii. 40.

from this criticism: but when we look at the sentence, as we ought in fairness to do, from the point of view of the Dikasts, justice will compel us to admit that Sokratès deliberately brought it upon himself.

If the verdict of guilty was thus brought upon Sokratès by his own consent and cooperation, much more may the same remark be made respecting the capital sentence which followed it. In Athenian procedure, the penalty inflicted was determined by a separate vote of the Dikasts, taken after the verdict of guilty. The accuser having named the penalty which he thought suitable, the accused party on his side named some lighter penalty upon himself; and between these two the Dikasts were called on to make their option—no third proposition being admissible. The prudence of an accused party always induced him to propose, even against himself, some measure of punishment which the Dikasts might be satisfied to accept, in preference to the heavier sentence invoked by his antagonist.

The sentence—how passed in Athenian procedure.

Now Melétus, in his indictment and speech against Sokratès, had called for the infliction of capital punishment. It was for Sokratès to make his own counter-proposition, and the very small majority, by which the verdict had been pronounced, afforded sufficient proof that the Dikasts were no way inclined to sanction the extreme penalty against him. They doubtless anticipated, according to the uniform practice before the Athenian courts of justice, that he would suggest some lesser penalty—fine, imprisonment, exile, disfranchisement, &c. And had he done this purely and simply, there can be little

Sokratès is called upon to propose some counter-penalty against himself—his behaviour.

doubt that the proposition would have passed. But the language of Sokratês, after the verdict, was in a strain yet higher than before it; and his resolution to adhere to his own point of view, disdaining the smallest abatement or concession, only the more emphatically pronounced. "What counter proposition shall I make to you (he said) as a substitute for the penalty of Melêtus? Shall I name to you the treatment which I think I deserve at your hands? In that case, my proposition would be that I should be rewarded with a subsistence at the public expense in the Prytaneum; for that is what I really deserve as a public benefactor—one who has neglected all thought of his own affairs, and embraced voluntary poverty, in order to devote himself to your best interests, and to admonish you individually on the serious necessity of mental and moral improvement. Assuredly I cannot admit that I have deserved from you any evil whatever; nor would it be reasonable in me to propose exile or imprisonment, which I know to be certain and considerable evils—in place of death, which may perhaps be not an evil, but a good. I might indeed propose to you a pecuniary fine; for the payment of that would be no evil. But I am poor and have no money: all that I could muster might perhaps amount to a mina; and I therefore propose to you a fine of one mina, as punishment on myself. Plato, and my other friends near me, desire me to increase this sum to thirty minæ, and they engage to pay it for me. A fine of thirty minæ, therefore, is the counter-penalty which I submit for your judgment¹."

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 26, 27, 28, p. 37, 38. I give, as well as I can,

Subsistence in the Prytaneum at the public expense, was one of the greatest honorary distinctions which the citizens of Athens ever conferred; an emphatic token of public gratitude. That Sokratēs therefore should proclaim himself worthy of such an honour, and talk of assessing it upon himself in lieu of a punishment, before the very Dikasts who had just passed against him a verdict of guilty—would be received by them as nothing less than a deliberate insult; a defiance of judicial authority, which it was their duty to prove, to an opinionated and haughty citizen, that he could not commit with impunity. The persons who heard his language with the greatest distress, were doubtless Plato, Krito, and his other friends around him; who, though sympathising with him fully, knew well that he was assuring the success of the proposition of Melētus¹, and would regret that he should thus throw away his life by what they would think an ill-placed and unnecessary self-exaltation. Had he proposed, with little or no preface, the substitute-fine of thirty minæ with which this part of his speech concluded, there is every reason for believing that the majority of Dikasts would have voted for it.

The sentence of death passed against him, by what majority we do not know. But Sokratēs neither altered his tone, nor manifested any regret for the language by which he had himself seconded the purpose of his accusers. On the contrary, he told the Dikasts, in a short address prior to his depart-

Aggravation of feeling in the Dikasts against him in consequence of his behaviour.

Sentence of death—resolute adherence of Sokratēs to his own convictions.

the substantive propositions, apart from the emphatic language of the original.

¹ See Plato, Krito, c. 5: p. 45 B.

ure for the prison, that he was satisfied both with his own conduct and with the result. The divine sign (he said) which was wont to restrain him, often on very small occasions, both in deeds and in words — had never manifested itself once to him throughout the whole day, neither when he came thither at first, nor at any one point throughout his whole discourse. The tacit acquiescence of this infallible monitor satisfied him not only that he had spoken rightly, but that the sentence passed was in reality no evil to him; that to die now was the best thing which could befall him¹. Either death was tantamount to a sound, perpetual, and dreamless sleep — which in his judgment would be no loss, but rather a gain, compared with the present life; or else, if the common mythes were true, death would transfer him to a second life in Hades, where he would find all the heroes of the Trojan war, and of the past generally — so as to pursue in conjunction with them the business of mutual cross-examination, and debate on ethical progress and perfection².

There can be no doubt that the sentence really appeared to Sokratēs in this point of view, and to his friends also, after the event had happened — though doubtless not at the time when they were about to lose him. He took his line of defence advisedly, and with full knowledge of the result. It supplied him with the fittest of all opportunities for manifesting, in an impressive manner, both his personal ascendancy over human fears and weakness, and the dignity of what he believed to be his divine mission. It took him away in his full grandeur and glory, like the setting of the tropical sun, at a moment when senile decay might be looked upon as close at hand. He calculated that his defence and bearing on the trial would be the most emphatic lesson which he could possibly read to the youth of Athens; more emphatic, probably, than the sum total of those lessons which his remaining life might suffice to give, if he shaped his defence otherwise. This anticipation of the effect of the concluding scene of his life, setting the seal on all his prior discourses, manifests itself in portions of his concluding words to the Dikasts, wherein he tells them that they will not, by putting him to death, rid themselves of the importunity of the cross-examining Elenchus; that numbers of young men, more restless and obtrusive than he, already carried within them that impulse, which they would now proceed to apply; his superiority having hitherto kept them back¹. It was thus the persuasion of Sokratès, that his removal would be the signal for numerous apostles, putting forth with increased energy that process of interrogatory test and spur to which he had devoted his life, and which doubtless was to him far dearer and more sacred than his life. Nothing could be more effective than his lofty bearing on his trial, for inflaming the enthusiasm of young men thus predisposed; and the loss of life was to him compensated by the missionary successors whom he calculated on leaving behind.

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 31, p. 40 B; c. 33, p. 41 D.

² Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 32, p. 40 C; p. 41 B.

Under ordinary circumstances, Sokratès would have drunk the cup of hemlock in the prison, on

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 30, p. 39 C.

Sokratès in prison for thirty days—he refuses to accept the means of escape—his serene death.

the day after his trial. But it so happened that the day of his sentence was immediately after that on which the sacred ship started on its yearly ceremonial pilgrimage from Athens to Delos, for the festival of Apollo. Until the return of this vessel to Athens, it was accounted unholy to put any person to death by public authority. Accordingly, Sokratès remained in prison—and we are pained to read, actually with chains on his legs—during the interval that this ship was absent, thirty days altogether. His friends and companions had free access to him, passing nearly all their time with him in the prison; and Krito had even arranged a scheme for procuring his escape, by a bribe to the gaoler. This scheme was only prevented from taking effect by the decided refusal of Sokratès to become a party in any breach of the law¹; a resolution, which we should expect as a matter of course, after the line which he had taken in his defence. His days were spent in the prison in discourse respecting ethical and human subjects, which had formed the charm and occupation of his previous life: it is to the last of these days that his conversation with Simmias, Kebès, and Phædon, on the immortality of the soul, is referred in the Platonic Dialogue called 'Phædon.' Of that conversation the main topics and doctrines are Platonic rather than Sokratic. But the picture which the dialogue presents of the temper and state of mind of Sokratès, during the last hours of his life, is one of immortal beauty and interest, exhibiting his serene and even playful equanimity, amidst the uncontrollable emotions of his surrounding friends—the genuine, unforced persuasion, governing both his words and his acts, of what he had pronounced before the Dikasts, that the sentence of death was no calamity to him¹—and the unabated maintenance of that earnest interest in the improvement of man and society, which had for so many years formed both his paramount motive and his active occupation. The details of the last scene are given with minute fidelity, even down to the moment of his dissolution; and it is consoling to remark that the cup of hemlock (the means employed for executions by public order at Athens) produced its effect by steps far more exempt from suffering than any natural death which was likely to befall him. Those who have read what has been observed above respecting the strong religious persuasions of Sokratēs, will not be surprised to hear that his last words, addressed to Krito immediately before he passed into a state of insensibility, were—"Krito, we owe a cock to Æsculapius: discharge the debt, and by no means omit it²."

¹ Plato, Krito, c. 2, 3 seq.

Thus perished the "parens philosophiæ"—the first of Ethical philosophers; a man who opened to Science both new matter, alike copious and valuable—and a new method, memorable not less for its originality and efficacy, than for the profound philosophical basis on which it rests. Though Greece produced great poets, orators, speculative philosophers, historians, &c., yet other countries, having the benefit of Grecian literature to begin with, have

Originality
of Sokratēs.

¹ Plato, Phædon, c. 77. p. 84 E.

² Plato, Phædon, c. 155. p. 119 A.

nearly equaled her in all these lines, and surpassed her in some. But where are we to look for a parallel to Sokratès, either in or out of the Grecian world? The cross-examining Elenchus, which he not only first struck out, but wielded with such matchless effect and to such noble purposes, has been mute ever since his last conversation in the prison; for even his great successor Plato was a writer and lecturer, not a colloquial dialectician. No man has ever been found strong enough to bend his bow; much less, sure enough to use it as he did. His life remains as the only evidence, but a very satisfactory evidence, how much can be done by this sort of intelligent interrogation; how powerful is the interest which it can be made to inspire—how energetic the stimulus which it can apply in awakening dormant reason and generating new mental power.

Views taken of Sokratès as a moral preacher and as a sceptic—the first inadequate—the second instructive.

It has been often customary to exhibit Sokratès as a moral preacher, in which character probably he has acquired to himself the general reverence attached to his name. This is indeed a true attribute, but not the characteristic or salient attribute, nor that by which he permanently worked on mankind. On the other hand, Arkesilaus, and the New Academy¹, a century and more afterwards, thought that

¹ Cicero, Academ. Post. i. 12, 44. "Cum Zenone Arkesilas sibi omne certamen instituit, non pertinaciam aut studio vincendi (ut mihi quidem videtur), sed enim rerum obscuritate, quæ ad confessionem ignorantie adduxerunt Socratem, et jam ante Socratem, Democritum, Anaxagoram, Empedoclem, omnes pene veteres; qui nihil cognosci, nihil percipi, nihil sciri posse, dicebant. . . . Itaque Arkesilas negabat, esse quidquam, quod sciri posset, ne illud quidem ipsum, quod Socrates sibi reliquisset; sic omnia latere in occultis." Compare Academ. Prior. ii. 23, 74; de Nat. Deor. i. 5, 11.

In another passage (Academ. Post. i. 4, 17) Cicero speaks (or rather they were following the example of Sokratēs (and Cicero seems to have thought so too) when they reasoned against every thing—and when they laid it down as a system, that against every affirmative position, an equal force of negative argument might be brought up as counterpoise. Now this view of Sokratēs is, in my judgment, not merely partial, but incorrect. He entertained no such systematic distrust of the powers of the mind to attain certainty. He laid down a clear (though erroneous) line of distinction between the knowable and the unknowable. About physics, he was more than a sceptic—he thought that man could know nothing: the gods did not intend that man should acquire any such information, and therefore managed matters in such a way as to be beyond his ken, for all except the simplest phænomena of daily wants: moreover, not only man could not acquire such information, but introduces Varro as speaking) rather confusedly. He talks of "illam Socraticam dubitationem de omnibus rebus, et nullā affirmatione adhibita, consuetudinem disserendi:" but a few lines before, he had said what implies that men might (in the opinion of Sokratēs) come to learn and know what belonged to human conduct and human duties.

Again (in Tusc. Disp. i. 4, 8) he admits that Sokratēs had a positive ulterior purpose in his negative questioning—"vetus et Socratica ratio contra alterius opinionem disserendi: nam ita facillime, quid veri similem esset, inveniri posset Socrates arbitratur."

Tannemann (Gesch. der Philos. ii. 5, vol. ii. p. 162-175) seeks to make out considerable analogy between Sokratēs and Pyrrho. But it seems to me that the analogy only goes thus far—that both agreed in repudiating all speculations not ethical (see the verses of Timon upon Pyrrho, Diog. Laërt. ix. 65). But in regard to Ethics, the two differed materially. Sokratēs maintained that Ethics were a matter of science, and the proper subject of study. Pyrrho on the other hand seems to have thought that speculation was just as useless, and science just as unattainable, upon Ethics as upon Physics; that nothing was to be attended to except feelings, and nothing cultivated except good dispositions.

ought not to labour after it. But respecting the topics which concern man and society, the views of Sokratēs were completely the reverse. This was the field which the gods had expressly assigned, not merely to human practice, but to human study and acquisition of knowledge; a field, wherein, with that view, they managed phenomena on principles of constant and observable sequence, so that every man who took the requisite pains might know them. Nay, Sokratēs went a step further—and this forward step is the fundamental conviction upon which all his missionary impulse hinges. He thought that every man not only might know these things, but ought to know them; that he could not possibly act well, unless he did know them; and that it was his imperious duty to learn them as he would learn a profession: otherwise he was nothing better than a slave, unfit to be trusted as a free and accountable being. Sokratēs felt persuaded that no man could behave as a just, temperate, courageous, pious, patriotic agent,—unless he taught himself to know correctly what justice, temperance, courage, piety, and patriotism, &c. really were. He was possessed with the truly Baconian idea, that the power of steady moral action depended upon, and was limited by, the rational comprehension of moral ends and means. But when he looked at the minds around him, he perceived that few or none either had any such comprehension, or had ever studied to acquire it—yet at the same time every man felt persuaded that he did possess it, and acted confidently upon such persuasion. Here then Sokratēs found that the first outwork for him to surmount, was, that universal "conceit of knowledge without the reality," against which he declares such emphatic war; and against which, also, though under another form of words and in reference to other subjects, Bacon declares war not less emphatically, two thousand years afterwards—"Opinio copiæ inter causas inopiæ est." Sokratês found that those notions respecting human and social affairs, on which each man relied and acted, were nothing but spontaneous products of the "intellectus sibi permissus,"—of the intellect left to itself either without any guidance, or with only the blind guidance of sympathies, antipathies, authority, or silent assimilation. They were products got together (to use Bacon's language) "from much faith and much chance, and from the primitive suggestions of boyhood," not merely without care or study, but without even consciousness of the process, and without any subsequent revision. Upon this basis the Sophists, or professed teachers for active life, sought to erect a superstructure of virtue and ability; but to Sokratês, such an attempt appeared hopeless and contradictory—not less impracticable than Bacon in his time pronounced it to be, to carry up the tree of science into majesty and fruit-bearing, without first clearing away those fundamental vices which lay unmolested and in poisonous influence round its root. Sokratês went to work in the Baconian manner and spirit; bringing his cross-examining process to bear, as the first condition to all further improvement, upon these rude, self-begotten, incoherent generalisations, which passed in men's minds for competent and directing knowledge. But he, not less than Bacon, performs this analysis, not with a view to finality in the negative, but as the first stage towards an ulterior profit—as the preliminary purification, indispensable to future positive result. In the physical sciences, to which Bacon's attention was chiefly turned, no such result could be obtained without improved experimental research, bringing to light facts new and yet unknown; but on those topics which Sokratēs discussed, the elementary data of the inquiry were all within the hearer's experience, requiring only to be pressed upon his notice, affirmatively as well as negatively, together with the appropriate ethical and political End; in such manner as to stimulate within him the rational effort requisite for combining them anew upon consistent principles.

If then the philosophers of the New Academy considered Sokratēs either as a sceptic, or as a partisan of systematic negation, they misinterpreted his character, and mistook the first stage of his process—that which Plato, Bacon, and Herschel call the purification of the intellect—for the ultimate goal. The Elenchus, as Sokratēs used it, was animated by the truest spirit of positive science, and formed an indispensable precursor to its attainment¹.

There are two points, and two points only, in topics concerning man and society, with regard to which Sokratēs is a sceptic—or rather, which he denies; and on the negation of which, his whole method and purpose turn. He denies, first, that men can know that on which they have bestowed no

Sokratēs,
positive and practical in his end—negative only in his means.

Two points on which Sokratēs is systematically negative.

¹ Plato, Apol. Sok. c. 7, p. 22 A. Δὲ δὲ ὑπὸ τῆς ἐπὶ τὸν πλάτωνα ἐκδοίχας, ὡς τὸν τὸν πλάτωνα πλάτωνα, &c.

conscious effort, no deliberate pains, no systematic study, in learning. He denies, next, that men can practise what they do not know¹; that they can be just, or temperate, or virtuous generally, without knowing what justice, or temperance, or virtue is. To imprint upon the minds of his hearers his own negative conviction, on these two points—is indeed his first object, and the primary purpose of his multifarious dialectical manœuvring. But though negative in his means, Sokratēs is strictly positive in his ends: his attack is undertaken only with distinct view to a positive result; in order to shame them out of the illusion of knowledge, and to spur them on and arm them for the acquisition of real, assured, comprehensive, self-explanatory, knowledge—as the condition and guarantee of virtuous practice. Sokratēs was indeed the reverse of a sceptic: no man ever looked upon life with a more positive and practical eye: no man ever pursued his mark with a clearer perception of the road which he was travelling: no man ever combined, in like manner, the absorbing enthusiasm of a missionary², with the acuteness, the originality, the inventive resource, and the generalising comprehension, of a philosopher.

¹ So Demokritus, Frags. ed. Mullach, p. 185. Fr. 131. οὐκ ἐστιν εἰδέναι, οὐκ ἐστιν ἀγνοεῖν, ὅτι μὴ μὴ τι...

² Aristotle (Problem. c. 30, p. 953 Bek.) numbers both Sokratēs and Plato (compare Plutarch, Lyand. c. 2) among those to whom he ascribes φύσιν μελανυχολικὴν—the black bile and choleric temperament. I do not know how to reconcile this with a passage in his Rhetoric (ii. 17), in which he ranks Sokratēs among the σελάτῃ persons (αἰσχροί). The first of the two assertions seems countenanced by the anecdotes respecting Sokratēs (in Plato, Symposium, p. 175 B, p. 220 C), that he stood in the same posture, quite unmoved, even for several hours continuously; absorbed in meditation upon some idea which had seized his mind.

Method of Sokratês, of universal application.

His method yet survives, as far as such method can survive, in some of the dialogues of Plato. It is a process of eternal value and of universal application. That purification of the intellect, which Bacon signalized as indispensable for rational or scientific progress, the Sokratic Elenchus affords the only known instrument for at least partially accomplishing. However little that instrument may have been applied since the death of its inventor, the necessity and use of it neither have disappeared, nor ever can disappear. There are few men whose minds are not more or less in that state of sham knowledge against which Sokratês made war: there is no man whose notions have not been first got together by spontaneous, unexamined, unconscious, uncertified association—resting upon forgotten particulars, blending together disparates or inconsistencies, and leaving in his mind old and familiar phrases, and oracular propositions, of which he has never rendered to himself account: there is no man, who, if he be destined for vigorous and profitable scientific effort, has not found it a necessary branch of self-education, to break up, disentangle, analyse, and reconstruct, these ancient, mental compounds—and who has not been driven to do it by his own lame and solitary efforts, since the giant of the colloquial Elenchus no longer stands in the marketplace to lend him help and stimulus.

To hear of any man¹, especially of so illustrious

¹ Dr. Thirlwall has given, in an Appendix to his fourth volume (Append. VII. p. 526 seq.), an interesting and instructive review of the recent sentiments expressed by Hegel, and by some other eminent German authors, on Sokratês and his condemnation. It affords me much satisfaction to see that he has bestowed such just animadversions a man, being condemned to death on such accusations as that of heresy and alleged corruption of youth—inspires at the present day a sentiment of indignant reprobation, the force of which I have no desire to enfeeble. The fact stands eternally recorded as one among the thousand misdeeds of intolerance, religious and political. But since amidst this catalogue each item has its own peculiar character, grave or light—we are bound to consider at what point of the scale the condemnation of Sokratês is to be placed, and what inferences it justifies in regard to the character of the Athenians. Now if we examine the circumstances of the case, we shall find them all extenuating; and so powerful indeed, as to reduce such inferences to their minimum, consistent with the general class to which the incident belongs.

Condemnation of Sokratês—one of the misdeeds of intolerance.

First, the sentiment now prevalent is founded upon a conviction that such matters as heresy and heretical teaching of youth are not proper for judicial cognizance. Even in the modern world, such a conviction is of recent date; and in the fifth century B.C. it was unknown. Sokratês himself would not have agreed in it; and all Grecian governments, oligarchical and democratical alike, recognised the opposite. The testimony furnished by Plato is on this point decisive. When we examine the two positive communities which he constructs, in the

Extenuating circumstances—principle of orthodox enforcement recognised generally in ancient times.

on the unmeasured bitterness, as well as upon the untenable views, of M. Forchhammer's treatise respecting Sokratês.

I dissent however altogether from the manner in which Dr. Thirlwall speaks about the Sophists, both in this Appendix and elsewhere. My opinion, respecting the persons so called, has been given at length in the preceding chapter.

treatises 'De Republica' and 'De Legibus,' we find that there is nothing about which he is more anxious, than to establish an unresisted orthodoxy of doctrine, opinion, and education. A dissenting and free-spoken teacher, such as Sokratès was at Athens, would not have been allowed to pursue his vocation for a week, in the Platonic Republic. Plato would not indeed condemn him to death; but he would put him to silence, and in case of need, send him away. This in fact is the consistent deduction, if you assume that the state is to determine what is orthodoxy and orthodox teaching—and to repress what contradicts its own views. Now all the Grecian states, including Athens, held this principle¹, of interference against the dissenting teacher. But at Athens, though the principle was recognised, yet the application of it was counteracted by resisting forces which it did not find elsewhere; by the democratical constitution with its liberty of speech and love of speech—by the more active spring of individual intellect—and by the toleration, greater there than anywhere else, shown to each man's peculiarities of every sort. In any other government of Greece, as well as in the Platonic Republic, Sokratès would have been quickly arrested in his career, even if not severely punished; in Athens, he was allowed to talk and teach publicly for twenty-five or thirty years, and then condemned when an old man. Of these two applications of the same mischievous principle, assuredly the latter is at once the more moderate and the less noxious.

Secondly, the force of this last consideration, as an extenuating circumstance in regard to the Athenians, is much increased, when we reflect upon the number of individual enemies whom Sokratès made to himself in the prosecution of his cross-examining process. Here were a multitude of individuals, including men personally the most eminent and effective in the city, prompted by special antipathies, over and above general convictions, to call into action the dormant state-principle of intolerance against an obnoxious teacher. If, under such provocation, he was allowed to reach the age of seventy, and to talk publicly for so many years, before any real Melètus stood forward—this attests conspicuously the efficacy of the restraining dispositions among the people, which made their practical habits more liberal than their professed principles.

¹ See Plato, Euthyphron, c. 3, p. 3 D.

Number of personal enemies made by Sokratès.

Thirdly, whoever has read the account of the trial and defence of Sokratès, will see that he himself contributed quite as much to the result as all the three accusers united. Not only he omitted to do all that might have been done without dishonour, to ensure acquittal—but he held positive language very nearly such as Melètus himself would have sought to put in his mouth. He did this deliberately; having an exalted opinion both of himself and his own mission, and accounting the cup of hemlock, at his age, to be no calamity. It was only by such marked and offensive self-exaltation that he brought on the first vote of the Dikastery, even then the narrowest majority, by which he was found guilty: it was only by a still more aggravated manifestation of the same kind, even to the pitch

His condemnation brought on by himself.

of something like insult, that he brought on the second vote, which pronounced the capital sentence. Now it would be uncandid not to allow for the effect of such a proceeding on the minds of the Dikastery. They were not at all disposed, of their own accord, to put in force the recognised principle of intolerance against him. But when they found that the man who stood before them charged with this offence, addressed them in a tone such as Dikasts had never heard before and could hardly hear with calmness—they could not but feel disposed to credit all the worst inferences which his accusers had suggested, and to regard Sokratês as a dangerous man both religiously and politically, against whom it was requisite to uphold the majesty of the court and constitution.

In appreciating this memorable incident, therefore, though the mischievous principle of intolerance cannot be denied, yet all the circumstances show that that principle was neither irritable nor predominant in the Athenian bosom; that even a large body of collateral antipathies did not readily call it forth against any individual; that the more liberal and generous dispositions, which deadened its malignity, were of steady efficacy, not easily overborne; and that the condemnation ought to count as one of the least gloomy items in an essentially gloomy catalogue.

Let us add, that as Sokratês himself did not account his own condemnation and death, at his age, to be any misfortune, but rather a favourable dispensation of the gods, who removed him just in time to escape that painful consciousness of intellectual decline, which induced Demokritus to prepare the poison for himself—so his friend Xenophon goes a step further, and while protesting against the verdict of guilty, extols the manner of death as a subject of triumph; as the happiest, most honourable, and most gracious way, in which the gods could set the seal upon an useful and exalted life¹.

It is asserted by Diodorus, and repeated with exaggerations by other later authors, that after the death of Sokratēs the Athenians bitterly repented of the manner in which they had treated him, and that they even went so far as to put his accusers to death without trial². I know not upon what authority this statement is made, and I disbelieve it altogether. From the tone of Xenophon's 'Memorabilia,' there is every reason to presume that the memory of Sokratēs still continued to be unpopular at Athens when that collection was composed. Plato, too, left Athens immediately after the death of his master, and remained absent for a long series of years: indirectly, I think, this affords a presumption that no such reaction took place in Athenian sentiment as that which Diodorus alleges; and the same presumption is countenanced by the man-

The Athenians did not repent it.

¹ Xen. Mem. iv. 8, 3—

"Denique Democritum postquam matura vetustas Admonuit memores motus languescere mentis, Sponte sua letho sese obvius obtulit ipse."

(Lucretius, iii. 1052.)

² Diodor. xiv. 37 with Wesseling's note; Diog. Laert. ii. 43; Argument. ad Isokrat. Or. xi. Buaris.

ner in which the orator Æschinès speaks of the condemnation, half a century afterwards. I see no reason to believe that the Athenian Dikasts, who doubtless felt themselves justified, and more than justified, in condemning Sokratès after his own speech—retracted that sentiment after his decease.

APPENDIX to VOL. VIII.

Vol. viii. ch. 62. p. 140. Thucyd. viii. 101. In the instructive MSS. notes of Mr. Scott and Mr. Munro, alluded to in my Appendix to Vol. VII., there occurs a criticism controverting my explanation of the voyage of Mindarus as described in this chapter of Thucydides.

Ὁ δὲ Μίνδαρος ἐν τοῦτοι καὶ αἱ ἐκ τῆς Χίου τῶς Πελοποννησίων ἤεν, ἐκκινησάμενοι ἐνταῦθα ἡμερῶς, καὶ λαβόντες παρὰ τῶν Χίων τρεῖς τεσσαράκοντάς τε καὶ πέντε Χίαι, τῇ τρίτῃ διὰ ταχέων ἀναλόνουσι ἐκ Χίου [οὐ] πελάγισι, ἵνα μὴ περιέχῃσι ταῖς ἐν τῇ Ἐρέτρῃ ναυσίν, ἀλλὰ ἐν ἀριστέρῃ τῇ Λέσβῳ ἔχοντες ἐπλεον ἐς τὴν ἡπειρόν.

The negative οὐ has been here introduced on conjecture before πελάγισι, by various recent editors, on the ground that the passage cannot be made to afford a reasonable meaning without it. In my note I contended that the passage might be properly construed without it, by supposing Mindarus to have sailed from the town of Chios "on the sea-side of the island"—that is, by the southern and western coast of the island; and then to have struck eastward between Chios and Lesbos to Karterii in the territory of Phakæa.

Both Mr. Scott and Mr. Munro dissent from my opinion. The former says:—

"Mr. Grote argues at considerable length against the admission of the negative into the text—a liberty which almost all recent editors have taken, attributing its omission to the fact of the preceding word (Χίου) terminating with the same two letters. I cannot agree with the explanation which Mr. G. proposes, for the following reasons—

"He imagines that Mindarus 'departed by the outer sea, or sailed on the sea-side round the southern and western coast of the island', and that during this circuit he landed twice on the shore of Chios for dinner and supper. And no doubt the vessels could not reach Karterii by noon of the same day, if they took this course. But how strange, that Thucydides who narrates the subsequent voyage so minutely, should omit to specify with more distinctness so unusual a step as a circuit round Chios, and say not a word of any landing upon it! Besides, ἐκ ἀπεναντίας τῇ Λέσβῳ ἔχοντες does not mean, (as Mr. G. has rendered it) 'when the fleet came to have Lesbos on the left hand', which it seems to me would require an aurist participle, but 'keeping Lesbos on the left hand', which would be a natural description of a course north-east from Chios; whereas according to Mr. G., the fleet would not be 'keeping Lesbos on the left hand' at all, until they had doubled the northern point of Chios: and if ἀναίπουσι ἐκ τῆς Χίου πελάγους be referred to this point of the voyage, (which it could scarcely be,) we should have no mention of the circumnavigation whatever, except by implication. Again, the words ἐκ τῇ ἀπεναντίας ἡπείρῳ seem naturally to mean the mainland opposite to Lesbos; and as to the Athenian garrison at Delphinium, if they had no ships, as seems probable, and were too far from Lesbos for signals to be visible, they may possibly have seen Mindarus, without having any means of communicating the intelligence to Thrasyllus. But indeed, from the 103rd chapter, it would seem that Mindarus passed the Athenian scouts unobserved, and that the Athenians themselves were surprised at it.

"I am surprised at Mr. G. finding so much difficulty in the construction of the sentence with the negative (p. 141.) for surely there are many passages of much greater difficulty, to which he makes no objections."

In this Mr. Munro agrees, and adds:—

"Not only is ἔχοντες against Mr. Grote's version of the passage, but ἀλλὰ also, in my opinion. Any one reading the text of Thucydides without εἰς, 'they stood out to sea in order not to fall in with the ships at Eresus', would imagine the meaning to be that they stood so far out to sea, westward of Eresus, as to be out of sight of land, and would then get hopelessly perplexed by the following words. It is difficult to believe that skirting the western coast of Chios could be expressed by ἀναίπουσι πελάγους: I suppose that Mindarus escaped Thrasyllus' scouts by passing them in the dark. . . ."

The reason, as it seems to me, why Thucydides dwelt so little on the voyage and landings of Mindarus on the west of Chios, is, that the Peloponnesian admiral was on friendly ground during all this part of his progress. He did not come into any danger or possible reach of the enemy, until he got between Lesbos and Chios, or between Lesbos and the continent: and then it is that Thucydides becomes more minute in specifying his halts as well as his movements.

As to the meaning of the words ἐν τῇ ἀντιτίμῳ ἡπείρῳ, I submit that in this case "the mainland opposite Chios," is a more suitable meaning than "the mainland opposite Lesbos": and that too, whether my conception of the voyage of Mindarus be admitted as correct, or not. Διαβόμενος ἐν (Thrasyllus) ὅτε ἐν τῇ Νίῳ εἰς (Mindarus), καὶ νομισας αὐτὸν καθίζειν αὐτῶν, πόρτοι μὲν κειρατήσαντο καὶ ἐν τῇ Λέσβῳ καὶ ἐν τῇ ἀντιτίμῳ ἡπείρῳ, εἰ ἄρα ποὺ κειρίετο αἱ νῆες, ἔπειτα μὴ λάθαιεν, &c. Thrasyllus, assuming that Mindarus would pass from Chios to the Hellespont through the strait between the north-eastern portion of Chios and the mainland, would doubtless plant his scouts on those portions of the mainland where they would be most certain of seeing him. Now the point of the mainland nearly facing the north-eastern portion of Chios was the most suitable station for this purpose, whatever supposition we adopt respecting the voyage of Mindarus. In fact, the north-western headland of Mount Mimas may be called, with equal propriety, opposite Chios, or opposite Lesbos. Thrasyllus felt assured that his scouts would see Mindarus pass by, but was disappointed. If Mindarus passed out by the northern strait, thus taking that course which Thrasyllus reckoned beforehand that he would take, I cannot explain to myself how the disappointment occurred: if he passed out by the south and west, it becomes perfectly explicable. Since Thrasyllus too had made express provision immediately before, to become informed of any movement of Mindarus, we can hardly suppose that he would have omitted to provide the garrison at Delphinium with means of communication: moreover, their fire signals, if they saw Mindarus, would at least be visible to the other scouts planted elsewhere, though they might not be visible so far as Lesbos. If (as Mr. Munro supposes) Mindarus passed by in the night, would not Thucydides have noticed that fact specially?

I cannot think (with Mr. Munro) that ἀντιπρὸς ἐν τῇ Νίῳ πλάγιον necessarily means that "they stood far out to sea." It surely cannot be considered as implying more than "on the seaward side of the island."

Both Mr. Scott and Mr. Munro object that ἔχοντες on my construction ought to be an aorist. I am sensible that there is force in this objection: yet I still think that ἔχοντες ἐλεος construes better on my supposition, than upon that of the text with οὐ conjecturally added. And here at least I have presumption in my favour, because I build upon the authorised text, in opposition to a negative introduced by conjecture.

.... Vol. viii. c. 62. p. 143. Thucyd. viii. 102. Οἱ δὲ Ἀθηναῖοι ἐν τῇ Σόστῃ ἐπὶ τῇ δευτέρᾳ εἰσὶν ναυσὶ ὄντες, ὡς αὐτοῖς οἱ τε φρεστωτοὶ ἐσθμαίνον καὶ παθάνοντο τὰ παρὰ ἑλπίδος πολλά ἐν τῇ πολέμῳ φανέστα, ἐγινωσκον δὲ ἐκπλεῖναι αἱ Πελοποννησιαί. Καὶ τῇ αὐτῇ ταύτῃ ταύτῃ ὡς εἶχε τὰ χεῖρα ἐπορεύοντο τῇ Χερσονήσῳ, ποσέπλευον δ' Ἐλαιῶντοι, βουλόμενοι ἐκπλεῖσαι ἐν τῇ εὐρυχωρίᾳ τῶν τῶν πολέμων ναυῶν. Καὶ τὰς μὲν ἐν Ἀβύδῳ ἐκκαίτεκα ναῦς ἔλαθον, προειρημένης φελακῆς τῷ φίλῳ ἐπίπλῳ, ὅπως αὐτῶν ἀναγκῇ ἐξουσίῃ, ἢ ἐκπλεῖσαι τὰς δὲ μετὰ τοῦ Μινδάρου ἄμα τῷ καταδόντες, τὴν ἐλπίδιν εὐθὺς ποιοῦμενοι, οὐ φθάνουσι ταῦτα, &c.

In reference to the explanation which I have given in my note of these words here underlined, Mr. Scott observes—"This passage is far from satisfactory: but surely Mr. Grote, in construing it to watch for the approach of their friends, has been misled by the English idiom. I should expect a genitive in Greek."

Mr. Munro also dissents, as well as Mr. Scott, from my interpretation, and thinks that the old one is right, as to the general meaning of the sentence. But he finds the whole context so unsatisfactory—especially the words ἐκπλεῖσαι ἐν τῇ εὐρυχωρίᾳ τῶν τῶν πολέμων ναυῶν, which immediately precede the sentence; and the manner then in which the sentence itself begins, Καὶ τὰς μὲν ἐν Ἀβύδῳ ἐκκαίτεκα ναῦς ἔλαθον, when these are the same ships just mentioned before—that he is inclined to think the whole text corrupt, and to regard both τὰς τῶν πολέμων ναῦς, and τῷ φίλῳ ἐπίπλῳ, as being possibly marginal notes or glosses. In reference to my reasoning upon the word although, he remarks, that "though this may be the best way to render the participle in English, there is no particular emphasis laid upon the conjunction. The passage might well be written—They escaped the sixteen ships at Abydos, after (when) these had been ordered to keep watch upon them."

Mr. Scott here doubts the propriety of my construction of the dative case τῷ φίλῳ ἐπίπλῳ. But even if it be doubtful whether those words can with propriety be called a dative "governed by φελακῆς," I think it certain that they may be regarded as a dative of reference; signifying that the squadron at Abydos were ordered to act with exclusive reference to Mindarus and his approach, so as to assist him with all their efforts. For this idea, the dative seems to be the case which we should expect. In Thucydides, vii. 53, we have οὕτως γὰρ ἐφύλασσον τοῖς Ἀθηναίοις ταῦτα. The word ἐφύλασσον is here exactly equivalent to φυλάττειν εἶχον: and the dative case τοῖς Ἀθηναίοις expresses the reference of the action to the Athenians and their purposes. Examples illustrating this dative of reference might easily be multiplied, if it were necessary.

Next, in regard to Mr. Munro's remark upon τὰς τῶν πολέμων ναῦς,—I cannot assent to his opinion, that these words denote merely the same ships as are immediately afterwards mentioned under the words τὰς μὲν ἐκ Ἀβύδος ἐκκεῖθεν ναῦς. The words τὰς τῶν πολέμων ναῦς are (in my judgement) of larger signification: denoting the whole Peloponnesian force, and comprising, not merely the sixteen ships at Abydos, but the main fleet of seventy-three ships approaching under Mindarus. And it appears to me very natural, immediately after Thucydides has told us that the Athenians "wished to get out into the wide waters out of the reach of the enemy's ships," that he should proceed to tell us,—first, how, and by what reason, they escaped that portion of the enemy's fleet which was at Abydos—next, how they did not escape the other portion approaching under Mindarus: this latter portion being in fact far the more formidable of the two. Differing with Mr. Munro, therefore, I think that the words τὰς τῶν πολέμων ναῦς fit in perfectly well with the whole meaning of the sentence. I admit indeed that these words do not construe very smoothly with ἐκκεῖθεν, though neither Liddell and Scott, nor Professor Dunbar, make any difficulty of rendering that verb here—"to out sail." At any rate, whatever the difficulty may be about ἐκκεῖθεν, it is in no way increased by my proposed interpretation of the words which follow. The like is true about certain other words in the sentence immediately following—τῇ δὲ δυνάμει κοινώμενοι,—which are undoubtedly perplexing, but not more perplexing on my construction than on any other. If my explanation be fairly admissible to lighten the recognised difficulty of φυλάττειν τῷ φιλίῳ ἐπίπλω, it is no sufficient objection to say that there are certain other difficulties which it leaves untouched, in the sentence preceding and in the sentence following.

PRINTED BY RICHARD TAYLOR, NEW LONDON, FIRST STREET.

Cat

CATALOGUED

"A book that is shut is but a block"

CENTRAL ARCHAEOLOGICAL LIBRARY
GOVT. OF INDIA
Department of Archaeology
NEW DELHI

Please help us to keep the book clean and moving.
