

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA

DEPARTMENT OF ARCHAEOLOGY

CENTRAL ARCHAEOLOGICAL LIBRARY

CALL No. 122.40954 Bes

D.G A. 79.

AVATĀRAS

AVATĀRAS

Being the four Convention Lectures delivered at Adyar, at the Twenty-fourth Anniversary of the Theosophical Society, December, 1899

ANNIE BESANT

17890

(Third Edition)

129.40954

Bes

THEOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE

ADYAR, MADRAS, INDIA

1925

CENTRAL ARCHAEOLOGICAL
LIBRARY, NEW DELHI.

Acc. No. 17370
Date..... 24.2.59
Call No. 129. 40956 / Bas.

COPYRIGHT

(Translation and other rights reserved by the Publishers)

CONTENTS

LECTURE	PAGE
I. What Is an Avatāra	1
II. The Source of and Need for Avatāras	30
III. Some Special Avatāras	70
IV. Shri Kṛṣṇa	106

Received from New Order Book Co. New York N.Y. 187-155
C. R. 2.00

AVATARAS

FIRST LECTURE

BROTHERS,

Every time that we come here together to study the fundamental truths of all religions, I cannot but feel how vast is the subject, how small the expounder, how mighty the horizon that opens before our thoughts, how narrow the words which strive to sketch it for your eyes. Year after year we meet, time after time we strive to fathom some of those great mysteries of life, of the Self, which form the only subject really worthy of the profoundest thought of man. All else is passing ; all else is transient ; all else is but the toy of a moment. Fame and power, wealth and science—all that is in this world below—is as nothing beside the grandeur of the Eternal Self in the universe and in man, one in all His manifold manifestations, marvellous and beautiful in every form that He puts forth. And this year, of all the manifestations of the Supreme, we are going to dare to study the holiest of the holiest, those manifestations of God in the world in which He shows Himself as divine, coming to help the world that He has made, shining forth in His essential nature, the form but a thin film which scarce veils the Divinity from our eyes. How then shall we venture to approach it, how shall we dare to study it, save with deepest reverence, with profoundest humility; for if there needs for the study of His works patience, reverence and humbleness of heart, what when we study Him whose works but partially reveal Him, when we try to understand what is meant by an Avatāra, what is the meaning, what the purpose of such a revelation?

Our President has truly said in all the faiths of the world there is belief in such manifestations, and that ancient maxim as to truth—that which is as the hall-mark on the silver showing that the metal is pure—that ancient maxim is here valid, that whatever has been believed everywhere, whatever has been believed at every time, and by every one, that is true, that is reality. Religions quarrel over many details; men dispute over many propositions ; but where human heart and human voice speak a single word, there you have the mark of truth, there you have the sign of spiritual reality. But in dealing with the subject one difficulty faces us, faces you as hearers, faces myself as speaker. In every religion in modern times truth is shorn of her full proportions ; the intellect alone cannot grasp the many aspects of the one truth. So we have school after school, philosophy after philosophy, each one showing an aspect of truth, and ignoring, or even denying, the other aspects which are equally true. Nor is this all ; as the age in which we are passes on from century to century, from millennium to millennium, knowledge becomes dimmer, spiritual insight becomes rarer, those who repeat far outnumber those who know ; and those who speak with clear vision of the spiritual verity are lost amidst the crowds, who only hold traditions whose origin they fail to understand. The priest and the prophet, to use two well-known words, have ever in later times come into conflict one with the other. The priest carries on the traditions of antiquity ; too often he has lost the knowledge that made them real. The prophet—coming forth from time to time with the divine word hot as fire on his lips—speaks out the ancient truth and illuminates tradition. But they who cling to the words of tradition are apt to be blinded by the light of the fire and to call out “heretic” against the one who speaks the truth that they have lost. Therefore, in religion after religion, when some great teacher has arisen, there have been opposition, clamour, rejection, because the truth he spoke was too mighty to be narrowed within the limits of half-blinded men. And in such a subject as we are to study to-day, certain grooves have been made, certain ruts as it were, in which the human mind is running, and I know that in laying before you the occult truth, I must needs, at some points, come into clash with details of a tradition that is rather repeated by memory than either understood or the truths beneath it grasped. Pardon me then, my brothers, if in a speech on this great topic I should sometimes come athwart some of the dividing lines of different schools of Hindū thought; I may not, I dare not, narrow the truth I have learnt, to suit the limitations that have grown up by the ignorance of ages, nor make that which is the spiritual verity conform to the empty traditions that are left in the faiths of the world. By the duty laid upon me by the Master that I serve, by the truth that He has bidden me speak in the ears of men of all the faiths that are in this modern world ; by these I must tell you what is true, no matter whether or not you agree with it for the moment ; for the truth that is spoken wins submission afterwards, if not at the moment ; and anyone who speaks of the R̥shis of antiquity must speak the truths that they taught in their days, and not repeat the mere commonplaces of commentators of modern times and the petty orthodoxies that ring us in on every side and divide man from man.

I propose, in order to simplify this great subject, to divide it under certain heads. I propose first to remind you of the two great divisions recognised by all who have thought on the subject ; then to take up especially, for this morning, the question, " What is an Avaṭāra ? " To-morrow we shall put and strive to answer, partly at least, the question, " Who is the source of Avaṭāras ? " Then later we shall take up special Avaṭāras both of the kosmos and of human races. Thus I hope to place before you a clear, definite succession of ideas on this great subject, not asking you to believe them because I speak them, not asking you to accept them because I utter them. Your reason is the bar to which every truth must come which is true for you ; and you err deeply, almost fatally, if you let the voice of authority impose itself where you do not answer to the speaking. Every truth is only true to you as you see it, and as it illuminates the mind ; and truth, however true, is not yet truth for you, unless your heart opens out to receive it, as the flower opens out its heart to receive the rays of the morning sun.

First then let us take a statement that men of every religion will accept. Divine manifestations of a special kind take place from time to time as the need arises for their appearance ; and these special manifestations are marked out from the universal manifestation of God in His kosmos ; for never forget that in the lowest creature that crawls the earth Ishvara is present as in the highest Deva. But there are certain special manifestations, marked out from this general Self-revelation in the kosmos, and it is these special manifestations which are called forth by special needs. Two words especially have been used in Hīṇyūism, marking a certain distinction in the nature of the manifestation: one the word "Avatāra," the other the word "Āvesha". Only for a moment need we stop on the meaning of the words, important to us because the literal meaning of the words points to the fundamental difference between the two. The word "Avatāra," as you know, has as its root "ṭri," passing over, and with the prefix which is added, the "ava," you get the idea of descent, one who descends. That is the literal meaning of the word. The other word has as its root "viṣh," permeating, penetrating, pervading, and you have there the thought of something which is permeated or penetrated. So that while in the one case, Avatāra, there is the thought of a descent from above, from Īshvara to man or animal; in the other, there is rather the idea of an entity already existing who is influenced, permeated, pervaded by the divine power, specially illuminated as it were. And thus we have a kind of intermediate step, if one may say so, between the divine manifestation in the Avatāra and in the kosmos—the partial divine manifestation in one who is permeated by the influence of the Supreme, or of some other being, who practically dominates the individual, the Ego who is thus permeated.

Now what are the occasions which lead to these great manifestations? None can speak with mightier authority on this point than He who came Himself as an Avatāra just before the beginning of our own age, the Divine Lord Shri Kṛṣṇa Himself. Turn to that marvellous poem, the Bhagavad-Gītā, to the fourth Adhyāya, Shlokas 7 and 8; there He tells us what draws Him forth to birth into His world in the manifested form of the Supreme :

यदा यदा हि धर्मस्य ग्लानिर्भवति भारत ।
 अभ्युत्थानमधर्मस्य तदात्मानं सृजाम्यहम् ॥
 परित्राणाय साधूनां विनाशाय च दुष्कृताम् ।
 धर्मसंस्थापनार्थाय सम्भवामि युगे युगे ॥

“ When Dharma—righteousness, law—decays, when Adharma—unrighteousness, lawlessness—is exalted, then I Myself come forth : for the protection of the good, for the destruction of the evil, for the establishing firmly of Dharma, I am born from age to age.” That is what He tells us of the coming forth of the Avatāra. That is, the needs of His world call upon Him to manifest Himself in His divine power ; and we know from other of His sayings that in addition to those which deal with the human needs, there are certain kosmic necessities which in the earlier ages of the world's story called forth special manifestations. When in the great wheel of evolution another turn round has to be given, when some new form, new type of life is coming forth, then also the Supreme reveals Himself, embodying the type which thus He initiates in His kosmos, and in this way turning that everlasting wheel which He comes forth as Īshvara to turn. Such then, speaking quite generally, the meaning of the word, and the object of the coming.

From that we may fitly turn to the more special question, "What is an Avatāra?" And it is here that I must ask your close attention, nay, your patient consideration, where points that to some extent may be unfamiliar are laid before you ; for as I said, it is the occult view of the truth which I am going to partially unveil, and those who have not thus studied truth need to think carefully ere they reject, need to consider long ere they refuse. We shall see as we try to answer the question how far the great authorities help us to understand, and how far the lack of knowledge in reading those authorities has led to misconception. You may remember that the late learned T. Subba Row in the lectures that he gave on the Bhagavad-Gītā put to you a certain view of the Avaṭāra, that it was a descent of Īshvara—or as he said, using the Theosophical term, the Logos, which is only the Greek name for Īshvara—a descent of Īshvara, uniting Himself with a human soul. With all respect for the profound learning of the lamented paṇḍit, I cannot but think that that is only a partial definition. Probably he did not at that time desire, had not very possibly the time, to deal with case after case, having so wide a field to cover in the small number of lectures that he gave, and he therefore chose out one form, as we may say, of Self-revelation, leaving untouched the others, which now in dealing with the subject by itself we have full time to study. Let me then begin as it were at the beginning, and then give you certain authorities which may make the view easier to accept; let me state without any kind of attempt to veil or evade, what is really an Avaṭāra. Fundamentally He is the result of evolution. In far past kalpas, in worlds other than this, nay, in universes earlier than our own, those who were to be Avatāras climbed slowly, step by step, the vast ladder of evolution, climbing from mineral to plant, from plant to animal, from animal to man, from man to Jīvanmukṭa, from Jīvanmukṭa higher and higher yet, up the mighty hierarchy that stretches beyond Those who have liberated Themselves from the bonds of humanity; until at last, thus climbing, They cast off not only all the limits of the separated Ego, not only burst asunder the limitations of the separated Self, but entered Īshvara Himself and expanded into the all-consciousness of the Lord, becoming one in knowledge as They had ever been one in essence with that eternal Life from which originally They came forth, living in that life, centres without circumferences, living centres, one with the Supreme. There stretches behind such a One the endless chain of birth after birth, of manifestation after manifestation. During the stage in which He was human, during the long climbing up of the ladder of humanity, there were two special characteristics that marked out the future Avatāra from the ranks of men. One his absolute Bhakti, his devotion to the Supreme; for only those who are Bhakṭas and who to their Bhakṭi have wed Jñāna, or knowledge, can reach this goal; for by devotion, says Śhrī Kṛṣṇa, can a man "enter into My being". And the need of the devotion for the future Avatāra is this: he must keep the centre that he has built even in the life of Īshvara, so that he may be able to draw the circumference once again round that centre, in order that he may come forth as a manifestation of Īshvara, one with Him in knowledge, one with Him in power, the very Supreme Himself in earthly life; he must hence have the power of limiting himself to form, for no form can exist in the universe save as there is a centre within it round which that form is drawn. He must be so devoted as to be willing to remain for the service of the universe while Īshvara Himself abides in it, to share the continual sacrifice made by Him, the sacrifice whereby the universe lives. But not devotion alone marks this great One who is climbing his divine path. He must also be, as Īshvara is, a lover of humanity. Unless within him there burns the flame of love for men—nay, men, do I say? it is too narrow—unless within him, burns the flame of love for everything that exists, moving and unmoving, in this universe of God, he will not be able to come forth as the Supreme whose life and love are in everything that He has brought forth out of His eternal and inexhaustible life. "There is nothing," says the Beloved, "moving or unmoving, that may exist bereft of Me";¹ and unless the man can work that into his nature, unless he can love everything that is, not only the beautiful but the ugly, not only the good but the evil, not only the attractive but the repellent, unless in every form he sees the Self, he cannot climb the steep path the Avatāra must tread.

These then are the two great characteristics of the man who is to become the special manifestation of God—bhakti, love to the One in whom he is to merge, and love to those whose very life is the life of God. Only as these come forth in the man is he on the path that leads him to be—in future universes, in far far future kalpas—an Avatāra coming as God to man.

Now on this view of the nature of an Avatāra difficulties, I know, arise; but they are difficulties that arise from a partial view, and then from that view having been merely accepted, as a rule, on the authority of some great name, instead of on the thinking out and thorough understanding of it by the man who repeats the shibboleth of his own sect or school. The view once taken, every text in Shruti or Smṛiti that goes against that view is twisted out of its natural meaning in order to be made to agree with the idea which already dominates the mind. That is the difficulty with every religion; a man acquires his view by tradition, by habit, by birth, by public opinion, by the surroundings of his own time and of his own day. He finds in the Scriptures—which belong to no time, to no day, to no one age, and to no one people, but are the eternal Veda—he finds in them many texts that do not fit into the narrow framework that he has made; and because he too often cares for the framework more than for the truth, he manipulates the text until he can make it fit in, in some dislocated fashion; and the ingenuity of the commentator too often appears in the skill with which he can make words appear to mean what they do not mean in their grammatical and obvious sense. Thus, men of every school, under the mighty names of men who knew the truth—but who could only give such portion of truth as they deemed man at the time was able to receive—use their names to buttress up mistaken interpretations, and thus walls are continually built up to block the advancing life of man.

¹ Bhagavad-Gītā, x, 39.

Now let me take one example from one of the greatest names, one who knew the truth he spoke, but also, like every teacher, had to remember that while he was man, those to whom he spoke were children that could not grasp truth with virile understanding. That great teacher, founder of one of the three schools of the Vedānta, Shri Rāmānujāchārya, in his Commentary on the Bhagavad-Gītā—a priceless work which men of every school might read and profit by—dealing with the phrase in which Shri Kṛṣṇa declares that He has had बहुनि जन्मानि¹ “many births,” points out how vast the variety of those births had been. Then, confining himself to His manifestations as Īshvara—that is after He had attained to the Supreme—he says quite truly that He was born by His own will ; not by karma that compelled Him, not by any force outside Him that coerced Him, but by His own will He came forth as Īshvara and incarnated in one form or another. But there is nothing said there of the innumerable steps traversed by the mighty One ere yet He merged Himself in the Supreme. Those are left on one side, unmentioned, unnoticed, because what the writer had in his view was to present to the hearts of men a great Object for adoration, who might gradually lift them upwards and upwards until the Self should blossom in them in turn. No word is said of the previous kalpas, of the universes stretching backward into the illimitable past. He speaks of His birth as Deva, as Nāga, as Gandharva, as those many shapes that He has taken by His own will. As you know, or as you may learn if you turn to Śhrīmad-Bhāgavata, there is a much longer list of manifestations than the ten usually called Avatāras. There are given one after another the forms which seem strange to the superficial reader when connected in modern thought with the Supreme. But we find light thrown on the question by some other words of the great Lord ; and we also find in one famous book, full of occult hints—though not with much explanation of the hints given—the Yoga-Vāsishtha, a clear definite statement that the

¹ Bhagavad-Gītā, iv, 5.

Deities, as Mahādeva, Viṣṇu and Brahmā, have all climbed upward to the mighty posts They hold.¹ And that may well be so, if you think of it ; there is nothing derogatory to Them in the thought ; for there is but one Existence, the eternal fount of all that comes forth as separated, whether separated in the universe as Īshvara, or separated in the copy of the universe in man ; there is but One without a second ; there is no

¹ पौरुषेणैव यत्नेन सहसाम्भोरुहास्पदम् ।

कश्चिदेव चिदुल्लासो ब्रह्मतामधितिष्ठति ॥ १४ ॥

सारेण पुरुषार्थेन स्वेनैव गरुडध्वजः ।

कश्चिदेव पुमानेव पुरुषोत्तमतां गतः ॥ १५ ॥

पौरुषेणैव यत्नेन ललनावलिताकृतिः ।

शरीरी कश्चिदेवेह गतश्चन्द्रार्धचूडताम् ॥ १६ ॥

Yoga-Vāsishtha, Part II, Mumukshu Prakarana, Chap. iv, Shlokas 14, 15, 16.

Also see the Devi-Bhāgavata, Part III, Chap. vi, Shloka 21, and Nilkantha's Commentary thereon :

अनेन च ब्रह्मादीनां जीवत्वं स्पष्टमेवोक्तम् ॥

Also the same Part IV, Chap. ii, Shlokas 8, 12, 13, and Commentary.

सुरत्वं च मुनत्वं च राजेन्द्रत्वं लभेन्नरः ।

कर्मणा च शिवत्वं च गणेशत्वं तथैव च ॥ २० ॥

कर्मणा च मुनीन्द्रत्वं तपस्वित्वं स्वकर्मणा ।

स्वकर्मणा क्षत्रियत्वं वैश्यत्वं च स्वकर्मणा ॥ २१ ॥

Devi-Bhāgavata, Part IX, Chap. xxvii, Shlokas 20, 21.

life but His, no independence but His, no self-existence but His, and from Him Gods and men and all take their root and exist for ever in and by His one eternal life. Different stages of manifestation, but the One Self in all the different stages, the One living in all; and if it be true, as true it is, that the Self in man is

अजो नित्यः शाश्वतोऽयं पुराणो¹

“unborn, constant, eternal, ancient,” it is because the Self in man is one with the One Self-existent, and Īshvara Himself is only the mightiest manifestation of the One who knows no second near Himself. Says an English poet :

Closer is He than breathing, nearer than hands and feet.

The Self is in you and in me, as much as the Self is in Īshvara, that One, eternal, unchanging, undecaying, whereof every manifested existence is but one ray of glory. Thus it is true, that which is taught in the Yoga-Vāsishtha; true it is that even the greatest, before whom we bow in worship, has climbed in ages past all human reckoning to be one with the Supreme, and, ever there, to manifest Himself as God to the world.

¹ Bhagavad-Gītā, ii, 20.

But now we come to a distinction that we find made, and it is a real one. We read of a Pūrṇāvatāra, a full, complete Avatāra. What is the meaning of that word "full" as applied to the Avatāra? The name is given, as we know, to Śhrī Kṛṣṇa; He is marked out specially by that name. Truly the word "pūrṇa" cannot apply to the Illimitable, the Infinite; He may not be shown forth in any form; the eye may never behold Him; only the Spirit that is Himself can know the One. What is meant by it is that, so far as is possible within the limits of form, the manifestation of the formless appears, so far as is possible it came forth in that great One who came for the helping of the world. This may assist you to grasp the distinction. Where the manifestation is that of a Pūrṇāvatāra, then at any moment of time, at His own will, by Yoga or otherwise, He can transcend every limit of the form in which He binds Himself by His own will, and shine forth as the Lord of the Universe, within whom all the Universe is contained. Think for a moment once more of Śhrī Kṛṣṇa, who teaches us so much on this. Turn to that great storehouse of spiritual wisdom, the Mahābhārata, to the Ashvamedha Parva, which contains the "Anugītā," and you will find that Arjuna after the great battle, forgetting the teaching that was given him on Kurukṣhetra, asked his Teacher to repeat that teaching once again. And Shri Kṛṣṇa, rebuking him for the fickleness of his mind and stating that he was much displeased that such knowledge should by fickleness have been forgotten, uttered these remarkable words : "It is not possible for me to state it in full in that way. I discoursed to thee on the Supreme Brahman, having concentrated myself in Yoga." And then He goes on to give out the essence of that teaching, but not in the same sublime form as we have it in the Bhagavad-Gītā. That is one thing that shows you what is meant by a Pūrṇāvatāra ; in a condition of Yoga, into which He throws Himself at will, He knows Himself as Lord of everything, as the Supreme on whom the Universe is built. Nay more ; thrice at least—I am not sure if there may have been more cases, but if so I cannot at the moment remember them—thrice at least during His life as Shri Kṛṣṇa He shows himself forth as Īshvara, the Supreme. Once in the Court of Dhṛitarāshtra, when the madly foolish

Duryodhana talked about imprisoning within cell walls the universal Lord whom the universe cannot confine; and to show the wild folly of the arrogant prince, out in the Court before every eye He shone forth as Lord of all, filling earth and sky with His glory, and all forms human and divine, superhuman and subhuman, were seen gathered round Him in the life from which they spring. Then on Kurukṣhetra to Arjuna, His beloved disciple, to whom He gave the divine vision that he might see Him in His Vaishṇava form, the form of Viṣṇu, the Supreme Upholder of the Universe. And later, on his way back to Dvārakā, meeting with Utanka, He and the sage came to a misunderstanding, and the sage was preparing to curse the Lord; to save him from the folly of uttering a curse against the Supreme, as a child might throw a tiny pebble against a rock of immemorial age, He shone out before the eyes of him who was really His bhakṭa, and showed him the great Vaishṇava form, that of the Supreme. What do those manifestations show? That at will He can show Himself forth as Lord of all, casting aside the limits of human form in which men live; casting aside the appearance so familiar to those around Him, He could reveal Himself as the Mighty One, Īshvara who is the life of all. There is the mark of a Pūrṇāvatāra ; always within His grasp, at will, is the power to show Himself forth as Īshvara.

But why—the thought may arise in your minds—are not all Avatāras of this kind, since all are verily of the Supreme Lord ? The answer is that by His own will, by His own Māyā, He veils Himself within the limits which serve the creatures whom He has come to help. Ah, how different He is, the Mighty One, from you and me ! When we are talking to someone who knows a little less than ourselves, we talk out all we know to show our knowledge, expanding ourselves as much as we can so as to astonish and make marvel the one to whom we speak ; that is because we are so small that we fear our greatness will not be recognised unless we make ourselves as large as we can to astonish, if possible to terrify ; but when He comes who is really great, who is mightier than anything which He produces, He makes Himself small in order to help those whom He loves. And do you know, my brothers, that only in proportion as His spirit enters into us, can we in little measure be helpers in the universe of which He is the one life ; until we in all our doings and speakings, place ourselves within the one we want to help and not outside him, feeling as he feels, thinking as he thinks, knowing for the time as he knows, with all his limitations, although there may be further knowledge beyond, we cannot truly help ; that is the condition of all true help given by man to man, as it is the only condition of the help which is given to man by God Himself.

And so in other Avaṭāras, He limits Himself for men's sake. Take the great king, Shri Rāma. What did He come to show ? The ideal Kṣhaṭṭriya, in every relation of the Kṣhaṭṭriya life ; as son—perfect as son alike to loving father and to jealous and for the time unkind step-mother. For you may remember that when the father's wife who was not His own mother bade Him go forth to the forest on the very eve of His coronation as heir, His gentle answer was : "Mother, I go." Perfect as son, perfect as husband ; if He had not limited Himself by His own will to show out what husband should be to wife, how could He in the forest, when Sītā had been reft away by Rāvaṇa, have shewn the grief, have uttered the piteous lamentations, which have drawn tears from thousands of eyes, as He calls on plants and on trees, on animals and birds, on Gods and men, to tell Him where His wife, His other Self, the life of His life, had gone? How could He have taught men what wife should be to husband's heart unless He had limited Himself? The consciously omnipresent Deity could not seek and search for His beloved who had disappeared. And then as king; as perfect king as He was perfect son and husband. When the welfare of His subjects was concerned, when the safety of the realm was to be thought of, when He remembered that He as king stood for God and must be perfect in the eyes of His subjects, so that they might give the obedience and the loyalty, which men can only give to one whom they know as greater than themselves, then even His wife was put aside; then the test of the fire for Sītā, the unsullied and the suffering; then She must pass through it to show that no sin of pollution had come upon Her by the foul touch of Rāvaṇa, the Rākshasa; then the demand that ere the husband's heart that had been riven might again clasp the wife, She must come forth pure as woman; and all this, because He was king as well as husband, and on the throne the people honoured as divine there must only be purity, spotless as driven snow. Those limitations were needed in order that a perfect example might be given to man, and man might learn to climb by reproducing virtues made small, in order that his small grasp might hold them.

We come to the second great class of manifestations, that which I alluded to in the beginning as covered by the wide term Āvesha. In that case it is not that a man in past universes has climbed upward and has become one with Ishvara ; but it is that a man has climbed so far as to become so great, so perfect in his manhood, and so full of love and devotion to God and man, that God is able to permeate him with a portion of His own influence, His own power, His own knowledge, and send him forth into the world as a super-human manifestation of Himself. The individual Ego remains ; that is the great distinction. The man is there, though the power that is acting is the manifested God. Therefore the manifestation will be coloured by the special characteristics of the one over whom this overshadowing is made ; and you will be able to trace, in the thoughts of this inspired teacher, the characteristics of the race, of the individual, of the form of knowledge, which belong to that man in the incarnation in which the great overshadowing takes place. That is the fundamental difference.

But here we find that we come at once to endless grades, endless varieties, and down the ladder of lesser and lesser evolution we may tread, step by step, until we come to the lower grades that we call inspiration. In a case of Āvesha it generally continues through a great portion of the life, the latter portion, as a rule, and it is comparatively seldom withdrawn. Inspiration, as generally understood, is a more partial thing, more temporary. Divine power comes down, illuminates and irradiates the man for the moment, and he speaks for the time with authority, with knowledge, which in his normal state he will be unable probably to compass. Such are the prophets who have illuminated the world age after age; such were in ancient days the Brāhmaṇas who were the mouth of God. Then truly the distinction was not that I spoke of between priest and prophet; both were joined in the one illumination, and the teaching of the priest and the preaching of the prophet ran on the same lines and gave forth the same great truths. But in later times the distinction arose by the failure of the priesthood, when the priest turned aside for money, for fame, for power, for all the things with which only younger souls ought to concern themselves—human toys with which human babies play, and do wisely in so playing, for they grow by them. Then the priests became formal, the prophets became more and more rare, until the great fact of inspiration was thrown back wholly into the past, as though God or man had altered, man no longer divine in his nature, God no longer willing to speak words in the ears of men. But inspiration is a fact in all its stages; and it goes far farther than some of you may think. The inspiration of the prophets, spiritually mighty and convincing, is needed, and they come to the world to give a new impulse to spiritual truth. But there is a general inspiration that anyone may share, who strives to show out the divine life from which no son of man is excluded, for every son of man is son of God. Have you ever been drawn away for a moment into higher, more peaceful realm, where you have come across something of beauty, of art, of the wonders of science, of the grandeur of philosophy? Have you for a time lost sight of the pettinesses of earth, of trivial troubles, of small worries and annoyances, and felt yourself lifted into a calmer region, into a light that is not the light of common earth? Have you ever stood before some wondrous picture wherein the palette of the painter has been taxed to light the canvas with all the hues of beauteous colour that art can give to human sight? Or have you seen in some wondrous sculpture, the gracious living curves that the chisel has freed from the roughness of the marble? Or have you listened while the diviner spell of music has lifted you, step by step, till you seem to hear the Gandharvas singing and almost the divine flute is being played and echoing in the lower world? Or have you stood on the mountain peak with the snows around you, and felt the grandeur of the unmoving nature that shows out God as well as the human spirit? Ah, if you have known any of these peaceful spots in life's desert, then you know how all-pervading is inspiration; how wondrous the beauty and the power of God shown forth in man and in the world; then you know, if you never knew it before, the truth of the great proclamation of Shri Kṛṣṇa the Beloved: "Whatever is royal, good, beautiful and mighty, understand thou that to go forth from My splendour";¹ all is the reflection of that tejas which is His and His alone. For as there is nought in the universe without His love and life, so there is no beauty that is not His beauty, that is not a ray of the illimitable splendour, one little beam from the unfailing source of life.

¹ Bhagavad-Gītā, x, 41.

SECOND LECTURE

BROTHERS,

You will remember that yesterday, in dividing the subject under different heads, I put down certain questions which we would take in order. We dealt yesterday with the question, "What is an Avatāra?" The second question that we are to try to answer, "What is the source of Avatāras?" is a question that leads us deep into the mysteries of the kosmos, and needs at least an outline of kosmic growth and evolution in order to give an intelligible answer. I hope to-day to be able also to deal with the succeeding question, "How does the need for Avatāras arise?" This will leave us for to-morrow the subject of the special Avatāras, and I shall endeavour, if possible, during to-morrow's discourse, to touch on nine of the Avatāras out of the ten recognised as standing out from all other manifestations of the Supreme. Then, if I am able to accomplish that task, we shall still have one morning left, and that I propose to give entirely to the study of the greatest of the Avatāras, the Lord Shri Kṛṣṇa Himself, endeavouring, if possible, to mark out the great characteristics of His life and His work, and, it may be, to meet and answer some of the objections of the ignorant which, especially in these later days, have been levelled against Him by those who understand nothing of His nature, nothing of the mighty work He came to accomplish in the world.

Now we are to begin to-day by seeking an answer to the question, "What is the source of Avatāras?" and it is likely that I am going to take a line of thought somewhat unfamiliar, carrying us, as it does, outside the ordinary lines of our study, which deals more with the evolution of man, of the spiritual nature within him. It carries us to those far-off times, almost incomprehensible to us, when our universe was coming into manifestation, when its very foundations, as it were, were being laid. In answering the question, however, the mere answer is simple. It is recognised in all religions admitting Divine incarnations—and they include the great religions of the world—it is admitted that the source of Avaṭāras, the source of the Divine incarnations, is the second or middle manifestation of the sacred Triad. It matters not whether with Hindūs we speak of the Trimūrṭi, or whether with Christians we speak of the Trinity, the fundamental idea is one and the same. Taking first for a moment the Christian symbology, you will find that every Christian tells you that the one Divine incarnation acknowledged in Christianity—for in Christianity they believe in one special incarnation only—you will find in the Christian nomenclature the Divine incarnation or Avaṭāra is that of the second Person of the Trinity. No Christian will tell you that there has ever been an incarnation of God the Father, the primeval Source of life. They will never tell you that there has been an incarnation of the third Person of the Trinity, the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of Wisdom, of creative Intelligence, who built up the world-materials. But they will always say that it was the second Person, the Son, who took human form, who appeared under the likeness of humanity, who was manifested as man for helping in the salvation of the world. And if you analyse what is meant by that phrase, what, to the mind of the Christian, is conveyed by the thought of the second Person of the Trinity—for remember in dealing with a religion that is not yours you should seek for the thought not the form, you should look at the idea not at the label, for the thoughts are universal while the forms divide, the ideas are identical while the labels are marks of separation—if you seek for the underlying thought you will find it is this: the sign of the second Person of the Trinity is duality; also, He is the underlying life of the world; by His power the worlds were made, and are sustained, supported and protected. You will find that while the Spirit of Wisdom is spoken of as bringing order out of disorder, kosmos out of chaos, that it is by the manifested Word of God, or the second Person of the Trinity, it is by Him that all forms are builded up in this world, and it is specially in His image that man is made. So also when we turn to what will be more familiar to the vast majority of you, the symbology of Hindūism, you will find that all Avatāras have their source in Vishṇu, in Him who pervades the universe, as the very name Vishṇu implies, who is the Supporter, the Protector, the pervading, all-permeating life, by which the universe is held together, and by which it is sustained. Taking the names of the Trimūrṭi so familiar to us all—not the philosophical names Saṭ, Chiṭ, Ānanda, those names which in philosophy show the attributes of the Saguna Brahman—taking the concrete idea, we have Mahāḍeva or Shiva, Viṣṇu and Brahmā—three names, just as in the other religion we have three names ; but the same fact comes out, that it is the middle or central one of the Three who is the source of Avatāras. There has never been a direct Avatāra of Mahāḍeva, of Shiva Himself. Appearances ? Yes. Manifestations ? Yes. Coming in form for a special purpose served by that form ? Oh yes. Take the Mahābhārata, and you find Him appearing in the form of the hunter, the Kirāta, and testing the intuition of Arjuna, and struggling with him to test his strength, his courage, and finally his devotion to Himself. But that is a mere form, taken for a purpose and cast aside the moment the purpose is served ; almost, we may say, a mere illusion, produced to serve a special purpose and then thrown away as having completed that which it was intended to perform. Over and over again you find such appearances of Mahādeva. You may remember one most beautiful story, in which He appears in the form of a Chāṇḍāla at the gateway of His own city of Kāshī, when one of the successors of the great pre-Christian Teacher, Shri Shaṅkarāchārya, was coming with his disciples to the sacred city; veiling Himself in the form of an outcaste—for to Him all forms are the same, the human differences are but as the grains of sand which vanish before the majesty of His greatness—He rolled Himself in the dust before the gateway, so that the great teacher could not walk across without touching Him, and he called to the Chāṇḍāla to make way in order that the Brāhmaṇa might go on unpolluted by the touch of the outcaste; then the Lord, speaking through the form He had chosen rebuked the learned and pious but over-proud teacher, asking him questions which he could not answer, thus abasing his pride and teaching him humility. Such forms truly He has taken, but these are not what we can call Avatāras; mere passing forms, not manifestations upon earth where a life is lived and a great drama is played out. So with Brahmā; He also has appeared from time to time, has manifested Himself for some special purpose; but there is no Avatāra of Brahmā, which we can speak of by that very definite and well understood term.

Now for this fact there must be some reason. Why is it that we do not find the source of Avatāras alike in all these great divine manifestations? Why do they come from only one aspect and that the aspect of Vishṇu? I need not remind you that there is but one Self, and that these names we use are the names of the aspects that are manifested by the Supreme; we must not separate them so much as to lose sight of the underlying unity. For remember how, when a worshipper of Vishṇu had a feeling in his heart against a worshipper of Mahādeva, as he bowed before the image of Hari, the face of the image divided itself in half, and Shiva or Hara appeared on one side and Vishṇu or Hari appeared on the other, and the two, smiling as one face on the bigoted worshipper, told him that Mahādeva and Vishṇu were but one. But in Their functions a division arises; They manifest along different lines, as it were, in the kosmos and for the helping of man; not for Him but for us, do these lines of apparent separateness arise.

Looking thus at it, we shall be able to find the answer to our question, not only who is the source of Avatāras, but why Viṣṇu is the source. And it is here that I come to the unfamiliar part where I shall have to ask for your special attention as regards the building of the universe. Now I am using the word "universe," in the sense of our solar system. There are many other systems, each of them complete in itself, and, therefore, rightly spoken of as a kosmos, a universe. But each of these systems in its turn is part of a mightier system ; and our sun, the centre of our own system, though it be in very truth the manifested physical body of Īshvara Himself, is not the only sun. If you look through the vast fields of space, myriads of suns are there, each one the centre of its own system, of its own universe ; and our sun, supreme to us, is but, as it were, a planet in a vaster system, its orbit curved round a sun greater than itself. So in turn that sun, round which our sun is circling, is planet to a yet mightier sun, and each set of systems in its turn circles round a more central sun, and so on—we know not how far may stretch the chain that to us is illimitable ; for who is able to plumb the depths and heights of space, or to find a manifested circumference which takes in all universes ?

Nay, we say that they are infinite in number, and that there is no end to the manifestations of the one Life.

Now that is true physically. Look at the physical universe with the eye of spirit, and you see in it a picture of the spiritual universe. A great word was spoken by one of the Masters or R̥shis, whom in this Society we honour and whose teachings we follow. Speaking to one of His disciples, or pupils, He rebuked him, because He said in words never to be forgotten by those who have read them: "You always look at the things of the Spirit with the eyes of the flesh. What you ought to do is to look at the things of the flesh with the eyes of the Spirit." Now, what does that mean? It means that instead of trying to degrade the spiritual and to limit it within the narrow bounds of the physical, and to say of the spiritual that it cannot be, because the human brain is unable clearly to grasp it, we ought to look at the physical universe with a deeper insight, and see in it the image, the shadow, the reflection of the spiritual world, and learn the spiritual verities by studying the images that exist of them in the physical world around us. The physical world is easier to grasp.

Do not think the spiritual is modelled on the physical ; the physical is fundamentally modelled on the spiritual, and if you look at the physical with the eye of spirit, then you find that it is the image of the higher, and then you are able to grasp the higher truth, by studying the faint reflections that you see in the world around you. That is what I ask you to do now. Just as you have your sun and suns, many universes, each one part of a system mightier than itself, so in the spiritual universe there is hierarchy beyond hierarchy of spiritual intelligences, who are as the suns of the spiritual world. Our physical system has at its centre the great spiritual Intelligence manifested as a Trinity, the Īshvara of that system. Then beyond Him there is a mightier Īshvara, round whom Those who are on the level of the Īshvara of our system circle, looking to Him as Their central life.¹ And beyond Him yet another, and beyond Him others and others yet, until as the physical universes are beyond our thinking, the spiritual hierarchy stretches also beyond our thought, and, dazzled and blinded by the splendour, we sink back to earth, as Arjuna was blinded when the Vaishṇava form shone forth on him, and we cry: "Oh! show us again Thy more limited form that we may know it and live by it. We are not yet ready for the mightier manifestations. We are blinded, not helped, by such blaze of divine splendour."

¹ Devī-Bhāgavata, Part IV, Chap. iii, Shlokas 7, 8.

And so we find that if we would learn we must limit ourselves—nay, we must try to expand ourselves—to the limits of our own system. Why? I have met people who have not really any grasp of this little world, this grain of dust in which they live, who cannot be content unless you answer questions about the One Existence, the Para-Brahma, whom sages revere in silence, not daring to speak even with illuminated mind that knows nirvāṇic life and has expanded to nirvāṇic consciousness. The more ignorant the man, the more he thinks he can grasp. The less he understands, the more he resents being told that there are some things beyond the grasp of his intellect, existences so mighty that he cannot even dream of the lowest of the attributes that mark them out. And for myself, who know myself ignorant, who know that many an age must pass ere I shall be able to think of dealing with these profounder problems, I sometimes gauge the ignorance of the questioner by the questions that he asks as to the ultimate existences, and when he wants to know what he calls the primary origin, I know that he has not even grasped the one-thousandth part of the immediate origin out of which he himself has sprung. Therefore, I say to you frankly, that these mighty Ones whom we worship are the Gods of our system ; beyond them there stretch mightier Ones yet, whom perhaps, myriads of kalpas hence, we may begin to understand and worship.

Let us then confine ourselves to our own system and be glad if we can catch some ray of the glory that illumines it. Vishṇu has His own functions, as also have Brahmā and Mahādeva. The first work in this system is done by the third of the sacred great Ones of the Trīmūrṭi, Brahmā, as you all know ; for you have read that there came forth the creative Intelligence as the third of the divine manifestations. I care not what is the symbology you take ; perchance that of the Vishṇu-Purāṇa will be most familiar, wherein the unmanifested Vishṇu is beneath the waters, standing as the first of the Trīmūrṭi, then the Lotus, standing as the second, and the opened Lotus showing Brahmā the third, the creative Mind. You may remember that the work of creation began with His activity. When we study from the occult standpoint in what that activity consisted, we find it consisted in impregnating with His own life the matter of the solar system ; that He gave His own life to build up form after form of atom, to make the great divisions in the kosmos ; that he formed, one after another, the various kinds of matter. Working by His mind—He is sometimes spoken of as Mahat, the great One, Intelligence—He formed Tattvas one after another. Tattvas, you may remember from last year, are the foundations of the atoms, and there are five of them manifested at the present time. That is His special work. Then He meditates, and forms—as thoughts—come forth. There His manifest work may be said to end, though He maintains ever the life of the atom. As far as the active work of the kosmos is concerned, He gives way to the next of the great forces that is to work, the force of Vishṇu. His work is to gather together that matter that has been built, shaped, prepared, vivified, and build it into definite forms after the creative ideas brought forth by the meditation of Brahmā. He gives to matter a binding force ; He gives to it those energies that hold form together. No form exists without Him, whether it be moving or unmoving. How often does Shri Kṛṣṇa, speaking as the supreme Viṣṇu, lay stress on this fact. He is the life in every form ; without it the form could not exist, without it it would go back to its primeval elements and no longer live as form. He is the all-pervading life ; the "Supporter of the Universe" is one of His names. Mahādeva has a different function in the universe ; especially is He the great Yogī ; especially is He the great Teacher, the Mahāguru ; He is sometimes called Jagatguru, the Teacher of the world. Over and over again—to take a comparatively modern example, as the Gurugītā—we find Him as Teacher, to whom Pārvaṭī goes asking for instruction as to the nature of the Guru. He it is who defines the Guru's work, He it is who inspires the Guru's teaching. Every Guru on earth is a reflection of Mahādeva, and it is His life which he is commissioned to give out to the world. Yogī, immersed in contemplation, taking the ascetic form always—that marks out His functions. For the symbols by which the Mighty Ones are shown in the teachings are not meaningless, but are replete with the deepest meaning. And when you see Him represented as the eternal Yogī, with the cord in His hand, sitting as an ascetic in contemplation, it means that He is the supreme ideal of the ascetic life, and that men who come especially under His influence must pass out of home, out of family, out of the normal ties of evolution, and give themselves to a life of asceticism, to a life of renunciation, to share, however feebly, in that mighty Yoga by which the universe is kept alive.

He then manifests not as Avatāra, but such manifestations come from Him who is the God, the Spirit, of evolution, who evolves all forms. That is why from Vishṇu all these Avatāras come. For it is He who by His infinite love dwells in every form that He has made ; with patience that nothing can exhaust, with love that nothing can tire, with quiet, calm endurance which no folly of man can shake from its eternal peace, He lives in every form moulding it as it will bear the moulding, shaping it as it yields itself to His impulse, binding Himself, limiting Himself in order that His universe may grow, Lord of eternal life and love, dwelling in every form. If you grasp this, it is not difficult to say why from Him alone the Avatāras come. Who else should take form save the One who gives form? Who else should work with this unending love save He, who, while the universe exists, binds Himself that the universe may live and ultimately share His freedom? He is bound that the universe may be free. Who else then should come forth when special need arises?

And He gives the great types. Let me remind you of the Shrīmat-Bhāgavata, where in an early chapter of the first Book, the third chapter, a very long list is given of the forms that Viṣṇu took, not only the great Avatāras, but also a large number of others. It is said He appeared as Nara and Nārāyaṇa; it is said He appeared as Kapila; He took female forms, and so on, a whole long list being given of the shapes that He assumed. And, turning from that to a very illuminative passage in the Mahābhārata, we find Him in the form of Śrī Kṛṣṇa explaining a profound truth to Arjuna.

There He gives the law of these appearances: "When, O son of Prithā, I live in the order of the deities, then I act in every respect as a deity. When I live in the order of the Gandharvas, then I act in every respect as a Gandharva. When I live in the order of the Nāgas, I act as a Nāga. When I live in the order of the Yakshas, or that of the Rākshasas, I act after the manner of that order. Born now in the order of humanity, I must act as a human being.”¹ A profound truth, a truth that few in modern times recognise. Every type in the universe, in its own place, is good; every type in the universe, in its own place, is necessary. There is no life save His life; how then could any type come into existence apart from the universal life, bereft whereof nothing can exist?

We speak of good forms and evil, and rightly, as regards our own evolution. But from the wider standpoint of the kosmos, good and evil are relative terms, and everything is very good in the sight of the Supreme who lives in every one. How can a type come into existence in which He cannot live? How can anything live and move, save as it has its being in Him? Each type has its work; each type has its place; the type of the Rākshasa as much as the type of the Deva, of the Asura as much as of the Sura. Let me give you one curious little simple example, which yet has a certain graphic force. You have a pole you want to move, and that pole is on a pivot, like the mountain which churned the ocean, a pole with its two ends, positive and negative we will call them. The positive end, we will say, is pushed in the direction of the river (the river flowing beyond one end of the hall at Adyar). The negative pole is pushed—in what direction? In the opposite. And those who are pushing it have their faces turned in the opposite direction. One man looks at the river, the other man has his back to it, looking in the opposite direction. But the pole turns in the one direction although they push in opposite directions. They are working round the same circle, and the pole goes faster because it is pushed from its two ends. There is the picture of our universe. The positive force you call the Deva or Sura; his face is turned, it seems, to God. The negative force you call the Rākshasa or Asura; his face, it seems, is turned away from God. Ah no! God is everywhere, in every point of the circle round which they tread; and they tread His circle and do His will and no otherwise ; and all at length find rest and peace in Him.

¹ Mahābhārata, Ashvamedha Parva, “The Anugītā,” § liv.

Therefore Shrī Kṛṣṇa Himself can incarnate in the form of the Rākshasa, and when in that form He will act as Rākshasa and not as Deva, doing that part of the divine work with the same perfection as He does the other, which men in their limited vision call the good. A great truth, hard to grasp. I shall have to return to it presently in speaking of Rāvaṇa, one of the mightiest types of, perhaps the greatest of, all the Rākshasas. And we shall see, if we can follow, how the profound truth works out. But remember, if in the minds of some of you there is some hesitation in accepting this, that the words that I read are not mine, but those of the Lord who spoke of His own embodying ; He has left on record for your teaching, that He has embodied Himself in the form of Rākshasa, and has acted after the manner of that order.

Leaving that for a moment, there is one other point I must take, ere speaking of the need for Avatāras, and it is this : when the great central Deities have manifested, then there come forth from Them seven Deities of what we may call the second order. In Theosophy, they are spoken of as the Planetary Logoi, to distinguish them from the great Solar Logoi, the central Life. Each of These has to do with one of the seven sacred planets, and with the chain of worlds connected with that planet. Our world is one of the links in this chain, and you and I pass round this chain in successive incarnations in the great stages of life. The world—our present world—is the midway globe of one such chain. One Logos of the secondary order presides over the evolution of this chain of worlds. He shows out three aspects, reflections of the great Logoi who are at the centre of the system. You have read perhaps of the seven-leaved lotus, the Saptaparnapadma; looked at with the higher sight, gazed at with the open vision of the seer, that mighty group of creative and directing Beings looks like the lotus with its seven leaves and the great Ones are at the heart of the lotus. It is as though you could see a vast lotus-flower spread out in space, the tips of the seven leaves being the mighty Intelligences presiding over the evolution of the chains of worlds. That lotus symbol is no mere symbol but a high reality, as seen in that wondrous world wherefrom the symbol has been taken by the sages. And because the great

R̥shis of old saw with the open eye of knowledge, saw the lotus-flower spread in space, they took it as the symbol of kosmos, the lotus with its seven leaves, each one a mighty Deva presiding over a separate line of evolution. We are primarily concerned with our own planetary Deva, and through Him with the greater Devas of the solar system.

Now my reason for mentioning this is to explain one word that has puzzled many students. Mahāvishṇu, the great Vishṇu, why that particular epithet? What does it mean when that phrase is used? It means the great Solar Logos, Vishṇu in His essential nature; but there is a reflection of His glory, a reflection of His power, of His love, in more immediate connection with ourselves and our own world. He is His representative, as a Viceroy may represent the King. Some of the Avatāras we shall find came forth from Mahāvishṇu through the Planetary Logos, who is concerned with our evolution and the evolution of the world. But the Purnāvatāra that I spoke of yesterday comes forth directly from Mahāvishṇu, with no intermediary between Himself and the world that He comes to help. Here is another distinction between the Purnāvatāra and those more limited ones, that I could not mention yesterday, because the words used would, at that stage, have been unintelligible. We shall find to-morrow, when we come to deal with the Avatāras Maṭsya, Kūrma, and so on, that these special Avatāras, connected with the evolution of certain types in the world, while indirectly from Mahāvishṇu, come through the mediation of His mighty representative for our own chain, the wondrous Intelligence that conveys His love and ministers His will, and is the channel of His all-pervading and supporting power. When we come to study Śrī Kṛṣṇa we shall find that there is no intermediary. He stands as the Supreme Himself. And while in the other cases there is the Presence that may be recognised as an intermediary, it is absent in the case of the great Lord of Life.

Leaving that for further elaboration then to-morrow, let us try to answer the next question, "How arises this need for Avatāras?" because in the minds of some, quite naturally, a difficulty does arise. The difficulty that many thoughtful people feel may be formulated thus: "Surely the whole plan of the world is in the mind of the Logos from the beginning, and surely we cannot suppose that He is working like a human workman, not thoroughly understanding that at which He aims. He must be the architect as well as the builder ; He must make the plan as well as carry it out. He is not like the mason who puts a stone in the wall where he is told, and knows nothing of the architecture of the building to which he is contributing. He is the master-builder, the great architect of the universe, and everything in the plan of that universe must be in His mind ere ever the universe began. But if that be so—and we cannot think otherwise—how is it that the need for special intervention arises ? Does not the fact of special intervention imply some unforeseen difficulty that has arisen ? If there must be a kind of interference with the working out of the plan, does that not look as if in the original plan some force was left out of account, some difficulty had not been seen, something had arisen for which preparation had not been made ? If it be not so, why the need for interference, which looks as though it were brought about to meet an unforeseen event ?” A natural, reasonable and perfectly fair question. Let us try to answer it. I do not believe in shirking difficulties ; it is better to look them in the face, and see if an answer be possible.

Now the answer comes along three different lines. There are three great classes of facts, each of which contributes to the necessity ; and each, foreseen by the Logos, is definitely prepared for as needing a particular manifestation.

The first of these lines arises from what I may perhaps call the nature of things. I remarked at the beginning of this lecture on the fact that our universe, our system, is part of a greater whole, not separate, not independent, not primary, in comparatively a low scale in the universe, our sun a planet in a vaster system. Now what does that imply ? As regards matter, Prakṛti, it implies that our system is builded out of matter already existing, out of matter already gifted with certain properties, out of matter that spreads through all space, and from which every Logos takes His materials, modifying it according to His own plan and according to His own will. When we speak of Mūlaprakṛti, the root of matter, we do not mean that it exists as the matter we know. No philosopher, no thinker would dream of saying that that which spreads throughout space is identical with the matter of our very elementary solar system. It is the root of matter, that of which all forms of matter are merely modifications. What does that imply? It implies that our great Lord, who brought our solar system into existence, is taking matter which already has certain properties given to it by One yet mightier than Himself. In that matter three guṇas exist in equilibrium, and it is the breath of the Logos that throws them out of equilibrium, and causes the motion by which our system is brought into existence. There must be a throwing out of equilibrium, for equilibrium means Pralaya, where there is not motion, nor any manifestation of life and form. When life and form come forth equilibrium must have been disturbed, and motion must be liberated by which the world shall be built. But the moment you grasp that truth you see that there must be certain limitations by virtue of the very material in which the Deity is working for the making of the system. It is true that when out of His system, when not conditioned and confined and limited by it, as He is by His most gracious will, it is true that He would be the Lord of that matter by virtue of His union with the mightier Life beyond ;

but when for the building of the world He limits Himself within His Māyā, then He must work within the conditions of those materials that limit His activity, as we are told over and over again.

Now when in the ceaseless interplay of Sattva, Rajas and Tamas, Tamas has the ascendancy, aided and, as it were, worked by Rajas, so that they predominate over Sattva in the foreseen evolution, when the two combining overpower the third, when the force of Rajas and the inertia and stubbornness of Tamas, binding themselves together, check the action, the harmony, the pleasure-giving qualities of Sattva, then comes one of the conditions in which the Lord comes forth to restore that which had been disturbed of the balanced interworking of the three guṇas, and to make again such balance between them as shall enable evolution to go forward smoothly and not be checked in its progress. He re-establishes the balance of power which gives orderly motion, the order having been disturbed by the co-operation of the two in contradistinction to the third. In these fundamental attributes of matter, the three guṇas, lies the first reason for the need of Avatāras.

The second need has to do with man himself ; and now we come back in both the second and the third to that question of good and evil, of which I have already spoken. Ishvara, when He came to deal with the evolution of man—with all reverence I say it—had a harder task to perform than in the evolution of the lower forms of life. On them the law is imposed and they must obey its impulse. On the mineral the law is compulsory ; every mineral moves according to the law, without interposing any impulse from itself to work against the will of the One. In the vegetable world the law is imposed, and every plant grows in orderly method according to the law within it, developing steadily and in the fashion of its order, interposing no impulse of its own. Nay, in the animal world—save perhaps when we come to its highest members—the law is still a force overpowering everything else, sweeping everything before it, carrying along all living things. A wheel turning on the road might carry with it on its axle the fly that happened to have settled there ; it does not interpose any obstacle to the turning of the wheel. If the fly comes on to the circumference of the wheel and opposes itself to its motion, it is crushed without the slightest jarring of the wheel that rolls on, and the form goes out of existence and the life takes other shapes.

So is the wheel of law in the three lower kingdoms. But with man it is not so. In man Īshvara sets Himself to produce an image of Himself, which is not the case in the lower kingdoms. As life has evolved, one force after another has come out, and in man there begins to come out the central life, for the time has arrived for the evolution of the sovereign power of will, the self-initiated motion which is part of the life of the Supreme. Do not misunderstand me—for the subject is a subtle one; there is only one will in the universe, the will of Īshvara, and all must conform itself to that will, all is conditioned by that will, all must move according to that will, and that will marks out the straight line of evolution. There may be swerving neither to the right hand nor to the left. There is one will only which in its aspect to us is free, but inasmuch as our life is the life of Īshvara Himself, inasmuch as there is but one Self and that Self is yours and mine as much as His—for He has given us His very Self to be our Self and our life—there must evolve at one stage of this wondrous evolution that royal power of will which is seen in Him. And from the Ātmā within us, which is Himself in us, there flows forth the sovereign will into the sheaths in which that Ātmā is, as it were, held. Now what happens is this: force goes out through the sheaths and gives them some of its own nature, and each sheath begins to set up a reflection of the will on its own account, and you get the “I” of the body which wants to go this way, and the “I” of passion or emotion which wants to go that way, and the “I” of the mind which wants to go a third way, and none of these ways is the way of the Ātmā, the Supreme. These are the illusory wills of man, and there is one way in which you may distinguish them from the true will. Each of them is determined in its direction by external attraction; the man’s body wants to move in a particular way because something attracts it, or something else repels it: it moves to what it likes, to what is congenial to it, it moves away from that which it dislikes, from that from which it feels itself repelled. But that motion of the body is but motion determined by the Not-Self outside as it were, rather than by the Self within, by the kosmos around and not by the Self within, which has not yet achieved its mastery of the kosmos. So with the emotions or passions : they are drawn this way or that by the objects of the senses, and the "senses move after their appropriate objects"; it is not the "I," the Self, which moves. And so also with the mind. "The mind is fickle and restless, O Kṛṣṇa, it seems as hard to curb as the wind," and the mind lets the senses run after objects as a horse that has broken its reins flies away with the unskilled driver. All these forces are set up ; and there is one more thing to remember. These forces reinforce the rājasīc guṇa and help to bring about that predominance of which I spoke ; all these reckless desires that are not according to the one will are yet necessary, in order that the will may evolve and in order to train and develop the man.

Do you say why ? How would you learn right if you knew not wrong ? How would you choose good if you knew not evil ? How would you recognise the light if there were no darkness ? How would you move if there were no resistance ? The forces that are called dark, the forces of the Rakshasas, of the Asuras, of all that seem to be working against Īshvara—these are the forces that call out the inner strength of the Self in man, by struggling with which the forces of Ātma within the man are developed, and without which he would remain in Pralaya for evermore. It is a perfectly stagnant pool where there is no motion, and there you get corruption and not life. The evolution of force can only be made by struggle, by combat, by effort, by exercise, and inasmuch as Īshvara is building men and not babies, He must draw out men's forces by pulling against their strength, making them struggle in order to attain, and so vivifying into outer manifestation the life that otherwise would remain enfolded in itself. In the seed the life is hidden, but it will not grow if you leave the seed alone. Place it on this table here, and come back a century hence, and, if you find it, it will be a seed still and nothing more. So also is the Ātma in man ere evolution and struggle have begun. Plant your seed in the ground, so that the forces in the ground press on it, and the rays of the sun from outside make vibrations that work on it, and the water from the rain comes through the soil into it and forces it to swell—then the seed begins to grow ; but as it begins to grow it finds the earth around. How shall it grow but by pushing at it and so bringing out the energies of life that are within it? And against the opposition of the ground the roots strike down, and against the opposition of the ground the growing point mounts upward, and by the opposition of the ground the forces are evolved that make the seed grow, and the little plant appears above the soil. Then the wind comes and blows and tries to drag it away, and, in order that it may live and not perish, it strikes its roots deeper and gives itself a better hold against the battering force of the wind, and so the tree grows against the forces which try to tear it out. And if these forces were not, there would have been no growth of the root. And so with the root of Īshvara, the life within us ; were everything around us smooth and easy, we should remain supine, lethargic, indifferent. It is the whip of pain, of suffering, of disappointment, that drives us onward and brings out the forces of our internal life which otherwise would remain undeveloped. Would you have a man grow, then don't throw him on a couch with pillows on every side, and bring his meals and put them into his mouth, so that he moves not limb nor exercises mind. Throw him on a desert, where there is no food nor water to be found ; let the sun beat down on his head, the wind blow against him ; let his mind be made to think how to meet the necessities of the body, and the man grows into a man and not a log. That is why there are forces which you call evil. In this universe there is no evil ; all is good that comes to us from Īshvara, but it sometimes comes in the guise of evil that, by opposing it, we may draw out our strength. Then we begin to understand that these forces are necessary, and that they are within the plan of Īshvara. They test evolution, they strengthen evolution, so that it does not take the next step onward till it has strength enough to hold its own, one step made firm by opposition before the next is taken. But when, by the conflicting wills of men, the forces that work for retardation, to keep a man back till he is able to overcome them and go on, when they are so reinforced by men's unruly wishes that they are beginning, as it were, to threaten progress, then ere that check takes place, there is reinforcement from the other side. The presence of the Avatāra of the forces that threaten evolution calls forth the presence of the Avaṭāra that leads to the progress of humanity.

• •

We come to the third cause. The Avaṭāra does not come forth without a call. The earth, it is said, is very heavy with its load of evil. "Save us O Supreme Lord," the Devas come and cry. In answer to that cry the Lord comes forth. But what is this that I spoke of purposely by a strange phrase to catch your attention, that I spoke of as an "Avaṭāra of evil"? By the will of the one Supreme, there is one incarnated in form who gathers up together the forces that make for retardation, in order that, thus gathered together, they may be destroyed by the opposing force of good, and thus the balance may be re-established and evolution go on along its appointed road. Devas work for joy, the reward of Heaven. Svarga is their home, and they serve the Supreme for the joys that there they have. Rākshasas also serve Him, for rule on earth, and power to grasp and hold and enjoy as they will in this lower world. Both sides serve for reward and are moved by the things that please.

And in order, as our time is drawing to a close, that I may take one great example to show how these work, let me take the mighty one, Rāvaṇa of Laṅkā, that we may give a concrete form to a rather difficult and abstruse thought. Rāvaṇa, as you all know, was the mighty intelligence, the Rakshasa, who called forth the coming of Shri Rāma. But look back into the past, and what was he? Keeper of Viṣṇu's Heaven, door-keeper of the mighty Lord, devotee, bhakṭa, absolutely devoted to the Lord. Look at his past, and where do you find a bhakṭa of Mahādeva more absolute in devotion than the one who came forth later as Rāvaṇa? It was he who cast his head into the fire in order that Mahādeva might be served. It is he in whose name have been written some of the most exquisite śloṭras, breathing the spirit of completest devotion; in one of them, you may remember—and you could scarcely carry devotion to a further point—it is into the mouth of Rāvaṇa words are put appealing to Mahādeva, and describing Him as surrounded by forms the most repellant and undesirable, surrounded on every side by piśāchas and bhūṭas, which to us seem but the embodiment of the dark shadows of the burning ghat, forms whence all beauty is withdrawn. He cries out in a passion of love :

Better wear pisācha-form, so we Evermore are near and wait on Thee.

How did he then come to be the ravisher of Sītā and the enemy of God ?

You know how through lack of intuition, through lack of power to recognise the meaning of an order, following the word not the spirit, following the outer not the inner, he refused to open the door of Heaven when Sanaṭ Kumāra came and demanded entrance. In order that that which was lacking might be filled, in order that that which was wanting might be earned, that which was called a curse was pronounced, a curse which was the natural reaction from the mistake. He was asked : " Will you have seven incarnations friendly to Viṣṇu, or three in which you will be His enemy and oppose Him ? " and because he was a true bhakṭa, and because every moment of absence from his Lord meant to him hell of torture, he chose three of enmity, which would let him go back sooner to the Feet of the Beloved, rather than the seven of happiness, of friendliness. Better a short time of utter enmity than a longer remaining away with apparent happiness. It was love, not hatred, that made him choose the form of a Rākshasa rather than the form of a Ṛṣhi. There is the first note of explanation.

Then, coming into the form of Rākshasa, he must do his duty as Rākshasa. This was no weak man to be swayed by momentary thought, by transient objects. He had all the learning of the Vedas. With him, it was said, passed away Vaidik learning, with him it disappeared from earth. He knew his duty. What was his duty? To put forward every force which was in his mighty nature in order to check evolution, and so call out every force in man which could be called out by opposing energy which had to be overcome; to gather round him all the forces which were opposing evolution; to make himself king of the whole, centre and lawgiver to every force that was setting itself against the will of the Lord; to gather them as it were into one head, to call them together into one arm; so that when their apparent triumph made the cry of the earth go up to Vishṇu, the answer might come in Rāma's Avatāra and they be destroyed, that the life-wave might go on.

Nobly he did the work, thoroughly he discharged his duty. It is said that even sages are confused about Dharma, and truly it is subtle and hard to grasp in its entirety, though the fragment the plain man sees be simple enough. His Dharma was the Dharma of a Rākshasa, to lead the whole forces of evil against One whom, in his inner soul, then clouded, he loved. When Shrī Rāma came, when He was wandering in the forest, how could he sting Him into leaving the life of His life, His beloved Sītā, and into coming out into the world to do His work? By taking away from Him the one thing to which He clung, by taking away from Him the wife whom He loved as His very Self, by placing her in the spot where all the forces of evil were gathered together, so making one head for destruction, which the arrow of Shrī Rāma might destroy. Then the mighty battle, then the struggle with all the forces of his great nature, that the law might be obeyed to the uttermost, duly fulfilled to the last grain, the debt paid that was owed; and then—ah then! the shaft of the Beloved, then the arrow of Shrī Rāma that struck off the head from the seeming enemy, from the real devotee. And from the corpse of the Rākshasa that fell upon the field near Laṅkā, the devotee went up to Goloka to sit at the feet of the Beloved, and rest for a while till the third incarnation had to be lived out.

Such then are some of the reasons by, the ways in, which the coming of the Avatāra is brought about. And my last word to you, my brothers, to-day is but a sentence, in order to avoid the possibility of a mistake to which our diving into these depths of thought may possibly give rise. Remember that though all powers are His, all forces His, Rākshasa as much as Deva, Asura as much as Sura ; remember that for your evolution you must be on the side of good, and struggle to the utmost against evil. Do not let the thoughts I have put lead you into a bog, into a pit of hell, in which you may for the time perish, that because evil is relative, because it exists by the one will, because Rākshasa is His as much as Deva, therefore you shall go on their side and walk along their path. It is not so. If you yield to ambition, if you yield to pride, if you set yourselves against the will of Ishvara, if you struggle for the separated self, if in yourselves now you identify yourself with the past in which you have dwelt instead of with the future towards which you should be directing your steps, then, if your karma be at a certain stage, you pass into the ranks of those who work as enemies, because you have chosen that fate for yourself, at the promptings of the lower nature. Then with bitter inner pain—even if with complete submission—accepting the karma, but with profound sorrow, you shall have to work out your own will against the will of the Beloved, and feel the anguish of the rending that separates the inner from the outer life. The will of Īshvara for you is evolution; these forces are made to help your evolution—but only if you strive against them. If you yield to them then they carry you away. You do not then call out your own strength, but only strengthen them. Therefore, O Arjuna, stand up and fight. Do not be supine; do not yield yourself to the forces; they are there to call out your energies by opposition and you must not sink down on the floor of the chariot. And my last word is the word of Shrī Kṛṣṇa to Arjuna: “Take up your bow, stand up and fight.”

THIRD LECTURE

THE subject this morning, my brothers, is in some ways an easy and in other ways a difficult one ; easy, inasmuch as the stories of the Avaṭāras can be readily told and readily grasped ; difficult, inasmuch as the meaning that underlies these manifestations may possibly be in some ways unfamiliar, may not have been thoroughly thought out by individual hearers. And I must begin with a general word as to these special Avaṭāras. You may remember that I said that the whole universe may be regarded as the Avaṭāra of the Supreme, the Self-revelation of Īshvara. But we are not dealing with that general Self-revelation ; nor are we even considering the very many revelations that have taken place from time to time, marked out by special characteristics ; for we have seen by referring to one or two of the old writings that many lists are given of the comings of the Lord, and we are to-day concerned with only some of those, those that are accepted specially as Avaṭāras.

Now on one point I confess myself puzzled at the outset and I do not know whether in your exoteric literature light is thrown upon the point as to how these ten were singled out, who was the person who chose them out of a longer list, on what authority that list was proclaimed. On that point I must simply state the question, leaving it unanswered. It may be a matter familiar to those who have made researches into the exoteric literature. It is not a point of quite sufficient importance for the moment to spend on it time and trouble, in what we may call the occult way of research. I leave that then aside, for there is one reason why some of these stand out in a way which is clear and definite. They mark new departures in the growth of the developing life, and whether it was that fact which underlay the exoteric choice I am unable to say; but certainly that fact by itself is sufficient to justify the special distinction which is made.

There is one other general point to consider. Accounts of these Avaṭāras are found in the Purāṇas; allusions to them, to one or other of them, are found in other of the ancient writings, but the moment you come to very much detail you must turn to the Paurāṇic accounts ; as you are aware, sages, in giving those Purāṇas, very often described things as they are seen on the higher planes, giving the description of the underlying truth of facts and events ; you have appearances described which sound very strange in the lower world ; you have facts asserted which raise very much of challenge in modern days. When you read in the Purāṇas of strange forms and marvellous appearances, when you read accounts of creatures that seem unlike anything that you have ever heard of or dreamed of elsewhere, the modern mind, with its somewhat narrow limitations, is apt to revolt against the accounts that are given ; the modern mind, trained within the limits of the science of observation, is necessarily circumscribed within those limits, and those limits are of an exceedingly narrow description ; they are limits which belong only to modern time, modern to men, in the true sense of the word, though geological researches stretch of course far back into what we call in this nineteenth century the night of time. But you must remember that the moment geology goes beyond the historic period, which is a mere moment in the history of the world, it has more of guesses than of facts, more of theories than of proofs. If you take half a dozen modern geologists and ask each of them in turn for the date of the period of which records remain in the small number of fossils collected, you will find that almost every man gives a different date, and that they deal with differences of millions of years as though they were only seconds or minutes of ours. So that you will have to remember in what science can tell you of the world, however accurate it may be within its limits, that these limits are exceedingly narrow, narrow I mean when measured by the sight that goes back kalpa after kalpa, and that knows that the mind of the Supreme is not limited to the manifestations of a few hundred thousands of years, but goes back million after million, hundreds of millions after hundreds of millions, and that the varieties of form, the enormous differences of types, the marvellous kinds of creatures which have come out of that creative imagination transcend in actuality all that man's mind can dream of, and that the very wildest images that man can make fall far short of the realities that actually existed in the past kalpas through which the universe has gone. That word of warning is necessary, and also the warning that on the higher planes things look very different from what they look down here. You have here a reflection only of part of those higher forms of existence. Space there has more dimensions than it has on the physical plane, and each dimension of space adds a new fundamental variety to form ; if to illustrate this I may use a simile I have often used, it may perhaps convey to you a little idea of what I mean. Two similes I will take, each throwing a little light on a very difficult subject. Suppose that a picture is presented to you of a solid form ; the picture, being made by pen or pencil on a sheet of paper, must show on the sheet, which is practically of two dimensions—a plane surface—a three dimensional form ; so that if you want to represent a solid object, a vase, you must draw it flat, and you can only represent the solidity of that vase by resorting to certain devices of light and shade, to the artificial device which is called perspective, in order to make an illusory semblance of the third dimension. There on the plane surface you get a solid appearance, and the eye is deceived into thinking it sees a solid when really it is looking at a flat surface. Now as a matter of fact if you show a picture to a savage, an undeveloped savage, or to a very young child, they will not see a solid but only a flat. They will not recognise the picture as being the picture of a solid object they have seen in the world round them ; they will not see that that artificial representation is meant to show a familiar solid, and it passes by them without making any impression on the mind ; only the education of the eye enables you to see on a flat surface the picture of a solid form. Now by an effort of the imagination, can you think of a solid as being the representation of a form in one dimension more, shown by a kind of perspective ? Then you may get a vague idea of what is meant when we speak of a further dimension in space. As the picture is to the vase, so is the vase to a higher object of which that vase itself is a reflection. So again if you think, say of the lotus flower I spoke of yesterday, as having just the tips of its leaves above water, each tip would appear as a separate object. If you know the whole, you know that they are all parts of one object ; but coming over the surface of the water you will see tips only, one for each leaf of the seven-leaved lotus. So is every globe in space an apparently separate object, while in reality it is not separated at all, but part of a whole that exists in a space of more dimensions ; and the separateness is mere illusion, due to the limitations of our faculties.

• •

• •

Now I have made this introduction in order to show you that when you read the Purāṇas you consistently get the fact on the higher plane described in terms of the lower, with the result that it seems unintelligible, seems incomprehensible ; then you have what is called an allegory, that is, a reality which looks like a fancy down here, but is a deeper truth than the illusion of physical matter and is nearer to the reality of things than the things which you call objective and real. If you follow that line of thought at all you will read the Purāṇas with more intelligence and certainly with more reverence than some of the modern Hindūs are apt to show in the reading, and you will begin to understand that, when another vision is opened, one sees things differently from the way that one sees them on the physical plane, and that that which seems impossible on the physical is what is really seen when you pass beyond the physical limitations.

From the Purāṇas then the stories come.

Let me take the first three Avatāras apart from the remainder, for a reason that you will readily understand as we go through them. We take the Avatāra which is spoken of as that of Maṭṣya, or the fish; that which is spoken of as that of Kūrma, or the tortoise; that which is spoken of as that of Varāha, or the boar. Three animal forms; how strange! thinks the modern graduate. How strange that the Supreme should take the forms of these lower animals, a fish, a tortoise, a boar! What childish folly! "The babblings of a race in its infancy," it is said by the paṇḍits of the western world. Do not be so sure. Why this wonderful conceit as to the human form? Why should you and I be the only worthy vessels of the Deity, that have come out of the illimitable Mind in the course of ages? What is there in this particular shape of head, arms and trunk which shall make it the only worthy vessel to serve as a manifestation of the supreme Īshvara? I know of nothing so wonderful in the mere outer form that should make that shape alone worthy to represent some of the aspects of the Highest. And may it not be that from His standpoint those great differences that we see between ourselves and those which we call the lower forms of life may be almost imperceptible, since He transcends them all? A little child sees an immense difference between himself, of perhaps two and a half feet high, and a baby only a foot and a half high, and thinks himself a man compared with that tiny form rolling on the ground and unable to walk. But to the grown man there is not so much difference between the lengths of the two, and one seems very much like the other. While we are very small we see great differences between ourselves and others; but on the mountain top the hovel and the palace do not differ so very much in height. They all look like ant-hills, very much of the same size. And so from the standpoint of Īshvara, in the vast hierarchies from the mineral to the loftiest Deva, the distinctions are but as ant-hills in comparison with Himself, and one form or another is equally worthy, so that it suits His purpose, and manifests His will.

Now for the Māṭṣya Avatāra; the story you will all know: when the great Manu, Vaivasvaṭa Manu, the Root Manu, as we call Him—that is, a Manu not of one race only, but of a whole vast round of kosmic evolution, presiding over the seven globes that are linked for the evolution of the world—that mighty Manu, sitting one day immersed in contemplation, sees a tiny fish gasping for water ; and moved by compassion, as all Great Ones are, He takes up the little fish and puts it in a bowl, and the fish grows till it fills the bowl ; and He places it in a water vessel and it grows to the size of the vessel ; then He takes it out of that vessel and puts it into a bigger one ; afterwards into a tank, a pond, a river, the sea, and still the marvellous fish grows and grows and grows. The time came when a vast change was impending ; one of those changes called a minor pralaya ; and it was necessary that the seeds of life should be carried over that pralaya to the next manvanṭara. That would be a minor pralaya and a minor manvanṭara. What does that mean ? It means a passage of the seeds of life from one globe to another ; from what we call the globe preceding our own to our own earth. It is the function of the Root Manu with the help and the guidance of the Planetary Logos, to transfer the seeds of life from one globe to the next, so as to plant them in a new soil where further growth is possible. As waters rose, waters of matter submerging the globe which was passing into pralaya, an ark, a vessel, appeared; into this vessel stepped the great R̥shi with others, and the seeds of life were carried by Them, and as They go forth upon the waters a mighty fish appears and to the horn of that fish the vessel is fastened by a rope, and it conveys the whole safely to the solid ground where the Manu rebegins His work. A story! yes, but a story that tells a truth; for looking at it as it takes place in the history of the world, we see the vast surging ocean of matter, we see the Root Manu and the great Initiates with Him gathering up the seeds of life from the world whose work is over, carrying them under the guidance and with the help of the planetary Vishṇu to the new globe where new impulse is to be given to the life; and the reason why the fish form was chosen was simply because in the building up again of the world, it was at first covered with water, and only that form of life was originally possible, so far as denser physical life was concerned.

• •

You have in that first stage what the geologists call the Silurian Age, the age of fishes, when the great divine manifestation was of all these forms of life. The Purāṇa rightly starts in the previous kalpa, rightly starts the manifestations with the manifestation in the form of the fish. Not so very ridiculous after all, you see, when read by knowledge instead of by ignorance ; a truth, as the Purāṇas are full of truth, if they were only read with intelligence and not with prejudice.

But some of you may say that there is confusion about these first Avatāras ; in several accounts we find that the Boar stands the first ; that is true, but the key of it is this : the Boar Avatāra initiated that evolution which was followed unbrokenly by the human ; whereas the other two bring in great stages, each of which is regarded as a separate kalpa ; and if you look into the Vishnu Purāna you will find there the key ; for when that begins to relate the incarnation of the Boar, there is just a sentence thrown in, that the Maṭsya and Kūrma Avatāras belong to previous kalpas.

Now if we take the Theosophical nomenclature, we find each of these kalpas covers what we call a Root-Race, and you may remember that the first Root-Race of humanity had not human form at all, but was simply a floating mass, able to live in the waters which then covered the earth, and only showing the ordinary protoplasmic motions connected with such a type of life and possible at that stage of its evolution. It was a seed of form rather than a form itself ; it was the seed planted by the Manu in the waters of the earth, that out of that humanity might evolve. But the general course of physical evolution passed through the stage of the fish ; and geology there gives a true fact, though it does not understand, naturally, the hidden meaning ; while the Purāṇa gives you the reality of the manifestation, and the deeper truth that underlies the stages of the evolving world.

Then we find, tracing it onward, that this great age passes, and the world begins to rise out of the waters. How then shall types be brought forth in order that evolution may go on ? The next great type is to be fitted either for land or for water ; for the next stage of the earth shows the waters draining gradually away, and the land appearing, and the creatures that are the marked characteristic of the age must exist partially on land and partially in water. Here again there must be manifestation of the type of life, this time of what we call the reptile type ;

the tortoise is chosen as the typical creature, and while the tortoise typifies the type to be evolved, reptiles, amphibious creatures of every description, swarm over the earth, becoming more and more land-like in their character as the proportion of land to water increases. There is meanwhile going on, in the "imperishable sacred land," a preparation for further evolution. There is one part of the globe that changes not, that from the beginning has been, and will last while the globe is lasting; it is called the "imperishable land". And there the great Ṛṣhis gather, and hence They ever come forth for the helping of man; that is the imperishable sacred land, sometimes called the "sacred pole of the earth". Pole itself exists not on the physical plane but on the higher, and its reflection coming downwards makes, as it were, one spot which never changes, but is ever guarded from the profane tread of ordinary men. There took place a most instructive phenomenon. The type of the evolution then proceeding, the Tortoise, the Logos in that form, makes Himself the base of the revolving axis of evolution. That is typified by Mandāra, the mountain which, placed on the tortoise, is made to revolve by the hosts of Suras and Asuras, one pulling at the head of the serpent, and the other at the tail—the positive and negative forces. So the churning begins in matter, evolving types of life. The type is ever evolved before the lower manifestation, the type appears before the copies of it are born in the lower world. And how often have the students of the great Teachers themselves seen the very thing occur; the churning of the waters of matter giving forth all the types of the many sorts and species that are generated in the lower world; these are the archetypes, as we call them, of classes and creatures, always produced in preparation for the forward stretch of evolution. There came forth one by one the archetypes: the elephant, the horse, the woman, and so on, one after another, showing the track along which evolution was to go. And first of all, Amṛta, nectar of immortality, comes forth, symbol of the one life which passes through every form—and that life appears above the waters, the taking of which is necessary in order that every form may live.

We cannot delay on details; I can only trace hastily the outline, showing you how real is the truth that underlies the story, and as that gradually goes on and the types are ready, there comes the whelming of the world under the waters, and the great continents vanish for a time.

Then comes the third Avatāra, the Varāha. No earth is to be seen; the waters of the flood have overwhelmed it. The types that are to be produced on earth are waiting in the higher region for place on which to manifest. How shall the earth be brought up from the waters which have overwhelmed it? Now once again the great Helper is needed, the God, the Protector of Evolution. Then in the form of a mighty Boar, whose form filled the heaven, plunging down into the waters that He alone could separate, the Great One descends. He brings up the earth from the lower region where it was lying awaiting His coming; and the land rises up again from below the surface of the flood, and the vast Lemurian continent is the earth of that far-off age. Here science has a word to say, rightly enough, that on the Lemurian continent were developed many types of life, and there the mammals first made their appearance. Quite so; that was exactly what the sages taught thousands upon thousands of years ago; that when the Boar, the great type of the mammal, plunged into the waters to bring up the earth, then was started the mammalian evolution, and the continent thus rescued from the waters was crowded with the forms of the mammalian kingdom. Just as the Fish had typified the Silurian epoch, just as the Tortoise had started on its way the great amphibian evolution, so did the Boar, that typical mammal, start the mammalian evolution, and we come to the Lemurian continent with its wonderful variety of forms of mammalian life. Not so very ignorant after all, you see, the ancient writings! For men are only rediscovering to-day what has been in the hands of the followers of the R̥shis for thousands, tens of thousands of years.

Then we come to a strange incarnation on this Lemurian continent; frightful conflicts existed; we have reached what in the Theosophical nomenclature is the middle or third Race, and man as man will shortly appear with all the characteristics of his nature. He is not yet quite come to birth; strange forms are seen, half human and half animal, wholly monstrous; terrible struggles arise between these monstrous forms born from the slime as it is said—from the remains of former creations—and the newer and higher life in which the future evolution is enshrined. These forms are represented in the Purāṇas as those of the race of Daityas who ruled the earth, who struggled against the Deva manifestations, who conquered the Devas from time to time, who subjected them, who ruled over earth and heaven alike, bringing everything under their sway. You may read in the splendid stanzas of the Book of Dzyan, as given us by H. P. B., hints of that mighty struggle of which the Purāṇas are so full, a struggle which was as real as any struggle of later days, an absolute historical fact that many of us have seen. We are instructed over and over again of a frightful conflict of forms, the forms of the past, monstrous in their strength and in their outline, against whom the Sons of Light were battling, against whom the great Lords of the Flame came down. One of these conflicts, the greatest of all, is given in the story of the Avatāra known as that of Narasimha—the Man-Lion. You know the story; what Hindū does not know the story of Prahlāda? In him we have typified the dawning spirituality which is to show in the higher races of Daityas as they pass on into definite human evolution, and their form gives way that sexual man may be born. I need not dwell on that familiar story of the devotee of Viṣṇu ; how his Dāiṭya father strove to kill him, because the name of Hari was ever on his lips ; how he strove to slay him with a sword, and the sword fell broken from the neck of the child ; how then he tried to poison him, and Viṣṇu appeared and ate first of the poisoned rice, so that the boy might eat it with the name of Hari on his lips ; how his father strove to slay him by the furious elephant, by the fang of the serpent, by throwing him over a precipice, and by crushing him under a stone. But ever the cry of "Hari, Hari," brought deliverance, for in the elephant, in the fang of the serpent, in the precipice, and in the stone, Hari was ever present, and his devotee was safe in that presence ; how finally when the father, challenging the omnipresence of the Deity, pointed to the stone pillar and said in mocking language : "Is your Hari also in the pillar ?" "Hari, Hari," cried the boy, and the pillar burst asunder, and the mighty form came forth and slew the Dāiṭya that doubted, in order that he might learn the omnipresence of the Supreme. A story? facts, not fiction; truth, not imagination; and if you could look back to the time of those struggles, there would seem to you nothing strange or abnormal in the story; for you would see it repeated with less vividness in the smaller struggles where the Sons of the Fire were purging and redeeming the earth, in order that the later human evolution might take place.

• •

We pass from those four Avatāras, every one of which comes within what is called the Satya Yuga of the earth—not of the race remember, not the smaller cycle, but of the earth—the Satya Yuga of the earth as a whole, when periods of time were of immense length, and when progress was marvellously slow. Then we come to the next age, that which we call the Treta Yuga, that which is, in the Theosophical chronology—and I put the two together in order that students may be able to work their way out in detail—the middle of the third Root-Race, when humanity receives the light from above, and when man as man begins to evolve. How is that evolution marked? By the coming of the Supreme in human form, as Vāmana, the Dwarf. The Dwarf? Yes; for man was as yet but dwarf in the truly human stature, although vast in outer appearance; and He came as the inner man, small yet stronger than the outer form; against Him was Bali, the mighty, showing the outer form, while Vāmana, the Dwarf, showed the man that should be. And when Bali had offered a great sacrifice, the Dwarf as a Brāhmaṇa came to beg.

It is curious, this question of the caste of the Avatāras. When we once come to the human Avatāras, They are mostly Kṣhatṛiyas, as you know, but in two cases They are Brāhmaṇas, and this is one of them; for He was going to beg, and Kṣhatṛiya might not beg. Only he to whom the earth's wealth should be as nothing, who should have no store of wealth to hold, to whom gold and earth should be as one, only he may go to beg. He was an ancient Brāhmaṇa, not a modern Brāhmaṇa.

He came with begging bowl in hand, to beg of the king; for of what use is sacrifice unless something be given at the sacrifice? Now Bali was a pious ruler, on the side of the evolution that was passing away, and gladly gave a boon. "Brāhmaṇa, take thy boon," said he. "Three steps of earth alone I ask for," said the Dwarf. Of that little man surely three steps would not cover much, and the great king with his world-wide dominion might well give three steps of earth to the short and puny Dwarf. But one step covered earth, and the next step covered sky. Where could the third step be planted, where ? so that the gift might be made complete. Nothing was left for Bali to give save himself ; nothing to make his gift complete—and his word might not be broken—save his own body. So, recognising the Lord of all, he threw himself before Him, and the third step, planted on his body, fulfilled the promise of the king and made him the ruler of the lower regions, of Pātāla. Such the story. How full of significance. This inner man—so small at that stage but really so mighty, who was to rule alike the earth and heaven—could for his third step find no place to put his foot upon save his own lower nature ; he was to go forward and forward ever ; that is hinted in the third step that was taken. What a graphic picture of the evolution that lay in front, the wondrous evolution that now was to begin.

And I may just remind you in passing that there is one word in the Rg-Veda, which refers to this very Avatāra, that has been a source of endless controversy and dispute as to its meaning ;

there it is said :

Through all this world strode Viṣṇu ; thrice His foot

He planted, and the whole
Was gathered in His footstep's dust. (I, xxii, 17.)¹

That too is one of the "babblings of child humanity". I know not what figure the greatest man could use more poetical, more full of meaning, more sublime in its imagery, than that the whole world was gathered in the dust of the foot of the Supreme. For what is the world save the dust of His footsteps, and how would it have any life save as His foot has touched it ?

So we pass, still treading onwards in the Treta Yuga, and we come to another manifestation—that of Parashurāma ; a strange Avatāra, you may think, and a partial Avatāra, let me say, as we shall see when we come to look at His life and read the words that are spoken of Him. The Yuga had now gone far and the Kṣhātrīya caste had risen and was ruling, mighty in its power, great in its authority, the one warrior ruling caste, and alas ! abusing its power, as men will do when souls are still being trained, and are young for their surroundings. The Kshaṭṭriya caste abused its power, built up in order that it might rule ; the duty of the ruler, remember, is essentially protection ; but these used their power not to protect, but to plunder, not to help but to oppress. A terrible lesson must be taught the ruling caste, in order that it might learn, if possible, that the duty of ruling was to protect and support and help, and not to tyrannise and plunder. The first great lesson was given to the kings of the earth, the rulers of men, a lesson that had to be repeated over and over again, and is not yet completely learnt. A divine manifestation came in order that that lesson might be taught ; and the Teacher was not a Kshaṭṭriya save by mother. A strange story, that story of the birth. Food given to two Kshaṭṭriya women, each of whom was to bear a son, the husband of one of them a Brāhmaṇa ; and the two women exchanged the food, and that meant to bring forth a Kshaṭṭriya son was taken by the woman with the Brāhmaṇa husband. An accident, men would say ; there are no accidents in a universe of law. The food which was full of Kshaṭṭriya energy thus went into the Brāhmaṇa family, for it would not have been fitting that a Kṣhaṭṭriya should destroy Kṣhaṭṭriyas. The lesson would not thus have been so well taught to the world. So that we have the strange phenomena of the Brāhmaṇa coming with an axe to slay the Kṣhaṭṭriya, and three times seven times that axe was raised in slaughter, cutting the Kṣhaṭṭriya trunk off from the surface of the earth.

¹ See also I, cliv, which speaks of His three steps, within which all living creatures have their habitation ; the three steps are said to be "the earth, the heavens, and all living creatures". Here Bali is made the symbol of all living things.

But while Parashurāma was still in the body, a greater Avatāra came forth to show what a Kṣhaṭṭriya king should be. The Kṣhaṭṭriyas abusing their place and their power were swept away by Parashurāma, and, ere He had left the earth, where the bitter lesson had been taught, the ideal Kṣhaṭṭriya came down to teach, now by example, the lesson of what should be, after the lesson of what should not be had been enforced. The boy Rāma was born, on whose exquisite story we have not time long to dwell, the ideal ruler, the utterly perfect king. While a boy He went forth with the great teacher Visvāmītra, in order to protect the Yogi's sacrifice ; a boy, almost a child, but able to drive away, as you remember, the Rākshasa that interfered with the sacrifice ; and then He and His beloved brother

Lakshmaṇa and the Yogī went on to the court of king Janaka. And there, at the court, was a great bow, a bow which had belonged to Mahādeva Himself. To bend and string that bow was the task for the man who would wed Sītā, the child of marvellous birth, the maiden who had sprung from the furrow as the plough went through the earth, who had no physical father or physical mother. Who should wed the peerless maiden, the incarnation of Shri Lakshmi, the consort of Viṣṇu? Who should wed Her save the Avatāra of Viṣṇu Himself? So the mighty bow remained unstrung, for who might string it until the boy Rāma came? And He takes it up with boyish carelessness, and bends it so strongly that it breaks in half, the crash echoing through earth and sky. He weds Sītā, the beautiful, and goes forth with Her, and with His brother Lakshmaṇa and his bride, and with His father who had come to the bridal, and with a vast procession, wending their way back to their own town Ayodhya. This breaking of Mahādeva's bow has rung through earth, the crashing of the bow has shaken all the worlds, and all, both men and Devas, know that the bow has been broken. Among the devotees of Mahāḍeva, Parashurāma hears the clang of the broken bow, the bow of the One He worshipped ; and proud with the might of His strength, still with the energy of Viṣṇu in Him, He goes forth to meet this insolent boy, who had dared to break the bow that no other arm could bend. He challenges Him, and handing His own bow bids Him try what He can do with that. Can He shoot an arrow from its string ? Rāma takes this offered bow, strings it, and sets an arrow on the string. Then He stops, for in front of Him there is the body of a Brāhmaṇa ; shall He draw an arrow against that form ? As the two Rāmas stand face to face, the energy of the elder, it is written, passes into the younger ; the energy of Viṣṇu, the energy of the Supreme, leaves the form in which it had been dwelling and enters the higher manifestation of the same divine life. The bow was stretched and the arrow waiting, but Rāma would not shoot it forth lest harm should come, until He had pacified His antagonist ; then feeling that energy pass, Parashurāma bows before Rāma, diviner than Himself, hails Him as the Supreme Lord of the worlds, bends in reverence before Him, and then goes away. That Avatāra was over, although the form in which the energy had dwelt yet persisted. That is why I said it was a lesser Avatāra. Where you have the form persisting when the influence is withdrawn, you have the clear proof that there the incarnation cannot be said to be complete; the passing from the one to the other is the sign of the energy taken back by the Giver and put into a new vessel in which new work is to be done.

The story of Rāma you know; we need not follow it in detail; we spoke of it yesterday in its highest aspect as combating the forces of evil and starting the world, as it were, anew. We find the great reign of Rāma lasting ten thousand years in the Tṛeṭa Yuga, the Yuga before that in which Shṛī Kṛṣṇa came.

Then comes the Mighty One, Shṛī Kṛṣṇa Himself, of whom I speak not to-day; we will try to study that Avatāra to-morrow with such insight and reverence as we may possess. Pass over that then for the moment, leaving it for fuller study, and we come to the ninth Avatāra as it is called, that of the Lord Buddha. Now round this much controversy has raged, and a theory exists, current to some extent among the Hindūs, that the Lord Buddha, though an incarnation of Viṣṇu, came to lead astray those who did not believe the Vedas, came to spread confusion upon earth. Viṣṇu is the Lord of order, not of disorder; the Lord of love, not the Lord of hatred; the Lord of compassion, who only slays to help the life onward when the form has become an obstruction. And they blaspheme who speak of an incarnation of the Supreme, as coming to mislead the world that He has made. Rightly did your own learned paṇḍit, T. Subba Row, speak of that theory with the disdain born of knowledge; for no one who has a shadow of occult learning, no one who knows anything of the inner realities of life, could thus speak of that beautiful and gracious manifestation of the Supreme, or dream that He could take the mighty form of an Avatāra in order to mislead.

But there is another point to put about this Avatāra, on which, perhaps, I may come into conflict with people on another side. For this is the difficulty of keeping the middle path, the razor path which goes neither to the left nor to the right, along which the great Gurus lead us. On either side you find objection to the central teaching. The Lord Buddha, in the ordinary sense of the word, was not what we have defined as an Avaṭāra. He was the first of our own humanity who climbed upwards to that point, and there merged in the Logos and received full illumination. His was not a body taken by the Logos for the purpose of revealing Himself, but was the last of myriads of births through which he had climbed to merge in Īshvara at last. That is not what is normally spoken of as an Avaṭāra, though, you may say, the result truly is the same. But in the case of the Avaṭāra, the evolving births are in previous kalpas, and the Avaṭāra comes after the man has merged in the Logos, and the body is taken for the purpose of revelation. But He who is Gauṭama Buḍḍha had climbed through birth after birth in our own kalpa, as well as in the kalpas that went before ; and He was incarnated many a time when the great fourth Race dwelt in mighty Atlantis, and rose onward to take the office of the Buḍḍha ; for the Buḍḍha is the title of an office, not a particular man. Finally by his own struggles, the very first of our race, he was able to reach that great function in the world. What is the function ? That of the Teacher of Gods and men. The previous Buddhas had been Buddhas who came from another planet. Humanity had not lived long enough here to evolve its own son to that height. Gauṭama Buddha was human-born. He had evolved through the fourth Race into this first family of the Āryan Race, the Hindū. By birth after birth in India He had completed His course and took his final body in Āryāvarṇa, to make the proclamation of the law to men.

But that proclamation was not made primarily for India. It was given in India, because India is the place whence the great religious revelations go forth by the will of the Supreme. Therefore was He born in India, but His law was specially meant for nations beyond the bounds of Āryāvarṇa, that they might learn a pure morality, a noble ethic, disjoined—because of the darkness of the age—from all the complicated teachings which we find in connection with the subtle, metaphysical Hindū faith.

Hence you find in the teachings of the Lord Buddha two great divisions; one a philosophy meant for the learned, then an ethic disjoined from the philosophy, so far as the masses are concerned, noble and pure and great, yet easy to be grasped. For the Lord knew that we were going into an age of deeper and deeper materialism, that other nations were going to arise, that India for a time was going to sink down for other nations to rise above her in the scale of nations. Hence was it necessary to give a teaching of morality fitted for a more materialistic age, so that even if nations would not believe in the Gods they might still practise morality and obey the teachings of the Lord. In order also that this land might not suffer loss, in order that India itself might not lose its subtle metaphysical teachings and the widespread belief among all classes of people in the existence of the Gods and their part in the affairs of men, the work of the great Lord Buḍḍha was done. He left morality built upon a basis that could not be shaken by any change of faith, and, having done His work, passed away. Then was sent another Great One, overshadowed by the power of Mahāḍeva, Shri Shaṅkarāchārya, in order that by His teaching He might give, in the Advaita Vedānta, the philosophy which would do intellectually what morally the Buḍḍha had done, which intellectually would guard spirituality and allow a materialistic age to break its teeth on the hard nut of a flawless philosophy. Thus in India metaphysical religion triumphed, while the teaching of the Blessed One passed from the Indian soil, to do its noble work in lands other than the land of Āryāvarṇa, which must keep unshaken its belief in the Gods, and where highest and lowest alike must bow before their power. That is the real truth about this much disputed question as to the teaching of the ninth Avatāra; the fact was that His teaching was not meant for His birth-place, but was meant for other younger nations that were rising up around, who did not follow the Vedas, but who yet needed instruction in the path of righteousness; not to mislead them but to guide them, was His teaching given. But, as I say, and as I repeat, what in it might have done harm in India had it been left alone was prevented by the coming of the great Teacher of the Advaita. You must remember, that His name has been worn by man after man, through century after century; but the Shri Shaṅkarāchārya on whom was the power of Mahādeva was born but a few years after the passing away of the Buddha, as the records of the Dvārakā Math show plainly—giving date after date backward, until they bring His birth within sixty or seventy years of the passing away of the Buḍḍha.

We come to the tenth Avatāra, the future one, the Kalki. Of that but little may be said ; but one or two hints perchance may be given. With His coming will dawn a brighter age ; with His coming the Kali Yuga will pass away ; with His coming will also come a higher race of men. He will come when there is born upon earth the sixth Root-Race. There will then be a great change in the world, a great manifestation of truth, of occult truth, and when He comes then occultism will again be able to show itself to the world by proofs that none will be able to challenge or to deny ; and He in His coming will give the rule over the sixth Root-Race to the two Kings, of whom you read in the Kalki Purāna. As we look back down the past stream of time we find over and over again two great figures standing side by side—the ideal King and the ideal Priest. They work together ; the one rules, the other teaches ; the one governs the nation, the other instructs it. And such a pair of mighty ones comes down in every age for each and every Race. Each Race has its own Teacher, the ideal Brāhmaṇa, called in the Buḍḍhist language the Boḍhisattva, the learned, full of wisdom and truth. Each has also its own ruler, the Manu. Those two we can trace in the past, in Their actual incarnations; and we see Them in the third, the fourth and fifth Races; the Manu in each race is the ideal King, the Brāhmaṇa in each race is the ideal Teacher; and we learn that when the Kalki Avatāra shall come, He shall call from the sacred village of Shamballa—the village known to the occultist though not to the profane—two Kings who have remained throughout the age in order to help the world in its evolution. And the name of the Manu who will be the King of the next Race, is said in the Purāṇa to be Maru; and the name of the ideal Brāhmaṇa who will be the Teacher of the next Race is said to be Devāpi; and these two are King and Teacher for the sixth Race that is to be born.

Those of you who have read something of the wondrous story of the past will know that the choosing out of the new race, the evolving of it, the making of a new Root-Race, is a thing that takes centuries, millenniums, sometimes hundreds of thousands of years; and that the two who are to be its King and Priest, the Manu and the Brāhmaṇa, are at Their work throughout the centuries, choosing the men who may be the seeds of the new Race. In the womb of the fourth Race a choice was made out of which the fifth was born ; isolated in the Gobi desert for enormous periods of time, that chosen family was trained, educated, reared, till its Manu incarnated in it, and its Teacher also incarnated in it, and the first Āryan family was led forth to settle in Āryāvarta. Now in the womb of the fifth Race, the sixth Race is a choosing, and the King and the Teacher of the sixth Race are already at Their mighty and beneficent work. They are choosing one by one, trying and testing, those who shall form the nucleus of the sixth Race ; They are taking soul by soul, subjecting each to many a test, to many an ordeal, to see if there be the strength out of which a new Race can spring ; and in fulness of time when Their work is ready, then will come the Kalki Avatāra, to sweep away the darkness, to send the Kali Yuga into the past, to proclaim the birth of the new Satya Yuga, with a new and more spiritual Race, that is to live therein. Then will He call out the chosen, the King Maru and the Brāhmaṇa Devapi, and give into Their hands the Race that now They are building, the Race to inhabit a fairer world, to carry onwards the evolution of humanity.

FOURTH LECTURE

MY BROTHERS,

There are themes so lofty that tongue of Deva would not suffice to do full justice to that which they enclose, and when we think of the music of Śrī Kṛṣṇa's flute, all human music seems as discord amidst it strains. Nevertheless since bhakti grows by thought and word, it is not amiss that we should come near a subject so sacred ; only in dealing with it we must needs feel our incompetency, we must needs regret our limitations, we must needs wish for greater power of expression than we can have down here. For perhaps amid all the divine manifestations that have glorified the world, there is none which has aroused a wider tenderer feeling than the Āvaṭāra which we are to study this morning.

The austerer glories of Mahādeva, the Lord of the burning ground, attract more the hearts of those who are weary of the world and who

His winsome grace has fascinated the hearts of men !

We are to study Him then this morning. Now an AṠaṠāra—I say this to clear away some preliminary difficulties—an AṠaṠāra has two great aspects to the world. First, He is an historical fact. Do not let that be forgotten. When you are reading the story of the Great Ones, you are reading history and not fable. But it is more than history ; the AṠaṠāra acts out on the stage of the world a mighty drama. He is, as it were, a player on the world's stage, and He plays a definite drama, and that drama is an exposition of spiritual truth. And though the facts are facts of history, they are also an allegory under which great spiritual truths are conveyed to the minds and to the hearts of men. If you think of it only as an allegory, you miss an aspect of the truth ; if you think of it only as a history you miss an aspect of the truth. The history of an AṠaṠāra is an exposition of spiritual verities ; but though the drama be a real one, it is a drama with an object, a drama with distinct outlines laid down, as it were, by the author, and the AṠaṠāra plays His part on the stage at the same time as He is living out taken its stages which are clearly marked out, and in each of these we shall see one great type of the teaching, which the world is meant to learn from the playing of this drama before the eyes of men. To some extent the stages correspond with marked periods in the life, and to some extent they overlap each other ; but by having them clearly in our minds we shall be able, I think, to grasp better the whole object of the Āvaṭāra—we shall have as it were compartments in the mind in which the different types of teaching may be placed.

• •

• •

First then He comes to show forth to the world a great Object of bhakṭi, and the love of God to His bhakṭa, or devotee. That is the aim of the first act of the great drama—to stand forth as the Object of devotion, and to show forth the love with which God regards His devotees. We have there a marked stage in the life of Śrī Kṛṣṇa.

Then the second act of the drama may be said to be His character as the destroyer of the opposing forces that retard evolution, and that runs through the whole of His life.

The third act is that of the statesman, the wise, politic and intellectual actor on the world's stage provocative of devotion. But most of all, with regard to devotion, is the earliest stage of His life inspiring and full of benediction, those early years of the Lord as infant, as child, as young boy, when He is dwelling in Vraja, in the forest of Brindāban, when He is living with the cowherds and their wives and their children, the marvellous Child who stole the hearts of men. It is noticeable—and if it had been remembered many a blasphemy would not have been uttered—that Shri Kṛṣṇa chose to show Himself as the great Object of devotion, as the lover of the devotee, in the form of a child, not in that of a man.

Come then with me to the time of His birth, remembering that before that birth took place upon earth, the deities had been to Viṣṇu in the higher regions, and had asked Him to interfere in order that earth might be lightened of her load, that the oppression of the incarnate Daityas might be stayed; and then Viṣṇu said to the Gods: Go ye and incarnate yourselves in portions among men, go ye and take birth amid humanity. Great Ṛṣhis also took birth in the place where Viṣṇu Himself was to be born, so that ere He came, the surroundings of incidents that surrounded His birth, the prophecy that the destroyer of Kamsa was to be born, the futile shutting up in the dungeon, the chaining with irons, and all the other follies with which the earthly tyrant strove to make impossible of accomplishment the decree of the Supreme. You all know how his plans came to nothing, as the mounds of sand raised by the hands of children are swept into a level plain when one wave of the sea ripples over the playground of the child. He was born, born in His four-armed form, shining out for the moment in the dungeon, which before His birth had been irradiated by Him through His mother's body, who was said to be like an alabaster vase—so pure was she—with a flame within it. For the Lord Śhrī Kṛṣṇa was within her womb, herself the alabaster vase which was as a lamp containing Him, the world's Light, so that the glory illuminated the darkness of the dungeon where she lay. At His birth He came as Viṣṇu, for the moment showing Himself with all the signs of the Deity on Him, with the discus, with the śhrīvatsa on His breast, with all the recognised emblems of the Lord. But that form quickly vanished, and only the human child lay before His parents' eyes. And the father, you remember, taking Him up, passed through the great locked doors and all the rest of it, and carried Him in safety into Nanda's house, where He was to dwell in the place prepared for His coming.

As a Babe He showed forth the power that was in Him, as we shall see, when we come to the second stage, the destroyer of the forces of evil. But for the moment only watch Him as He plays in his foster mother's house, as He gambols with children of His own age. And as He is growing into a boy, able to go alone, He begins wandering through the fields and through the forest, and the notes of His wondrous flute are heard in all the groves and over all the plains. The Child, a child of five—only five years of age when He wandered with His magic flute in His hands, charming the hearts of all that heard; so that the boys left tending the cattle and followed the music of the flute; the women left their household tasks and followed where the flute was playing; the men ceased their labours that they might feast their ears on the pathos of the flute. Nay, not only the men, the women and the children, but the cows, it is said, stopped their grazing to listen as the notes fell on their ears, and the calves ceased suckling as the music came to them on the wind, and the river rippled up that it might hear the better, and the trees bowed down their branches that they might not lose a note, and the birds no longer sang lest their music should make discord in the melody, as the wondrous Child wandered over the country, and the music of heaven flowed from His magic flute.

And thus He lived and played and sported, and the hearts of all the cowherds and of their wives and daughters went out to that marvellous Child. And He played with them and loved them, and they would take Him up and place His baby feet on their bosoms, and would sing to Him as the Lord of all, the Supreme, the Mighty One. They recognised the Deity in the Child that played round their homes, and many lessons He taught them, this Child, amid His gambols and His pranks—lessons that still teach the world, and that those who know most understand best.

Let me take one instance which ignorant lips have used most in order to insult, to try to defame the majesty that they do not understand. But let me say this ; that I believe that in most cases the garments that should have been worn, and must therefore expiate their sin by coming and taking from His hands that which they had cast aside. They came and worshipped, and He gave them back their robes. An immoral story, with a Child of six as the central figure ! It is spoken of as though he were a full grown man, insulting the modesty of women. The Gopīs were R̥shis and the Lord, the Supreme, as a Babe, is teaching them a lesson. But there is more than that ; there is a profound occult lesson below the story—a story repeated over and over again in different forms—and it is this : that when the soul is approaching the Supreme Lord at one great stage of Initiation, it has to pass through a great ordeal ; stripped of everything on which it has hitherto relied, stripped of everything that is not of its inner Self, deprived of all external aid, of all external protection, of all external covering, the soul itself, in its own inherent life, must stand naked and alone with nothing to rely on, save the life of the Self within it. If it flinches before the ordeal, if it clings to anything to which hitherto it has looked for help, if in that supreme hour it cries out for friend or helper, nay, even for the Guru Himself, the soul fails in that ordeal. Naked and alone it must go forth, with absolutely none to aid it save the divinity within itself. And it is that nakedness of the soul as it approaches the supreme goal, that is told of in that story of Shri Kṛṣṇa, the Child, and the Gopis, the nakedness of life before the One who gave it. You find many another similar allegory. When the Lord comes as Kalki, the tenth Avatāra, He fights on the battlefield and is overcome. He uses all His weapons; every weapon fails Him; and it is not till He casts every weapon aside and fights with His naked hands, that He conquers. Exactly the same idea. Intellect, everything, fails the naked soul before God.¹

If I have taken up this story specially, out of hundreds of stories, to dwell upon, it is because it is one of the points of attack, and because you who are Hindūs by birth ought to know enough of the inner truths of your own religion not to stand silent and ashamed when attacks are made, but should speak with knowledge, and thus prevent such blasphemies.

¹ So in the Imitation of Christ, the work of an occultist, it is written that we must "naked follow the naked Jesus".

Then we learn more details of His play with the Gopīs as a child of seven : how He wandered into the forest and disappeared and all went after Him seeking Him ; how they tried to imitate His own play, in order to fill up the void that was left by His absence. The Child of seven, that He was at this time, disappeared for a while, but came back to those who loved Him, as God ever does with His bhaktas. And then takes place that wondrous dance, the Rāsa of Shri Kṛṣṇa, part of His Līlā, when He multiplied Himself so that every pair of Gopīs found Him standing between them ; amid the ring of women the Child was there between each pair of them, giving a hand to each ; and so the mystic dance was danced. This is another of these points of attack which are made by ignorant minds. What but an unclean mind can see aught that is impure in the child dancing there as lover and beloved ? It is as though He looked forward down the ages, and saw what later would be said, and it is as though He kept the child form in the Līlā, in order that He might breathe harmlessly into men's blind unclean hearts the lesson that He would fain give. And what was the lesson ? One other incident I remind you of, before I draw the lesson from that "they came under the spell of Cupid". It matters not for the words, let us look at the facts. There is not a religion in the world that has not taught that when the Supreme calls, all else must be cast aside. I have seen Shri Kṛṣṇa contrasted with Jesus of Nazareth to the detriment of Shri Kṛṣṇa, and a contrast is drawn between the purity of the one and the impurity of the other; the proof given was that the husbands were left while the wives went to play with and wait on the Lord. But I have read words that came from the lips of Jesus of Nazareth: "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me." "And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundred-fold, and shall inherit everlasting life. (Matt., x, 37, and xix, 29.) And again, yet more strongly: "If any man come to me and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." (Luke, xiv, 26.) That is exactly the same idea. When may be levelled against the other. So also in the songs of the Sūfis, the mystics of the faith of Islām, woman's love is ever used as the best symbol of love between the soul and God. In all ages the love between husband and wife has been the symbol of union between the Supreme and His devotees ; the closest of all earthly ties, the most intimate of all earthly unions, the merging of heart and body of twain into one—where will you find a better image of the merging of the soul in its God? Ever has the Object of devotion been symbolised as the lover or husband, ever the devotee as wife or mistress. This symbology is universal, because it is fundamentally true. The absolute surrender of the wife to the husband is the type upon earth of the absolute surrender of the soul to God. That is the justification of the Rāsa of Shri Kṛṣṇa ; that is the explanation of the story of His life in Vraja.

I have dwelt specially on this, my brothers, you all know why. Let us pass from it, remembering that till the nineteenth century this story provoked only devotion not ribaldry, and it is only with the coming in of the grosser type of western thought that you have these ideas put youths. After the whole of the Līlā was over They were still children, when They went forth to fight. From that time onwards He met, one after another, the great incarnations of evil and crushed them with His resistless strength : we need not dwell on these stories, for they fill His life.

We come to the third stage of Statesman, a marvellously interesting feature in His life, the tact, the delicacy, the foresight, the skill in always putting the man opposed to Him in the wrong, and so winning His way and carrying others with Him. As you know, this part of His life is played out especially in connection with the Pāṇḍavas. He is the one who in every difficulty steps forward as ambassador ; it is He who goes with Arjuna and Bhīma to slay the giant king Jarāsaṅgha, who was going to make a human sacrifice to Mahādeva, a sacrifice that was put a stop to as blasphemous ; it was He who went with them in order that the conflict might take place without transgressing the strictest rules of Kṣhātrīya morality. Follow Him as He and Arjuna and his brother enter into the city of the king. They will not come by the open gate, that is the pathway of the friend. They failing in the perfect courtesy of ambassador, fulfilling every duty of politeness, He will not touch the food that would make a bond between Himself and the one against whom He had come to struggle. See how the only food that He will take is the food of the king's brother, for that alone, He says, "is clean and worthy to be eaten by me." See how in the assembly of hostile kings He tries to pacify and tries to please. See how He apologises with the gentlest humility; how to the great king, the blind king, He speaks in the name of the Pāṇdavas as suppliant, not as outraged and indignant foe. See how with soft words He tries to turn away words of wrath, and uses every device of oratory to win their hearts and convince their judgments. See how later again, when the battle of Kurukṣhetra is over when all the sons of the blind king are slain, see how He goes once more as ambassador to meet the childless father and, still bitterer, the childless mother, that the first anger may break itself on Him, and His words may charm away the wrath and soothe the grief of the bereft. See how later on He still guides and advises till all the work is done, till His task is accomplished and His end is drawing near. A statesman of where His presence would have frustrated the object of His coming, He goes away. He is not present at the great game of dice, for that was necessary for the working out of the divine purpose ; He was away. Had He been there, he must needs have interfered ; had He been there, He could not have left His friends unaided. He remained away, until Draupadī cried in her agony for help when her modesty was threatened ; then he came with Dharma and clothed her with garments as they were dragged from her ; but then the game was over, the dice were cast, and destiny had gone on its appointed road.

How strange to watch that working ! One object followed without change, without hesitation : but every means used that might give people an opportunity of escaping, if only they would. He came to bring about that battle on Kurukshetra. He came, as we shall see in a moment, in order to carry out that one object in preparation for the centuries that stretched in front ; but in the carrying of it out, He would give every chance to men who were entangled in that evil by their own past, so that if one of them would answer to His pleading he might come over to the side of light against the forces the mind of every one who is ready to be instructed. Never does the spiritual teacher withhold knowledge because he grudges the giving. He is hampered in the giving by the want of receptivity in those to whom his message is addressed. Ill do men judge the divine heart of the great Teachers, or the faint reflection of that love in the mouth of Their messengers, when they think that knowledge is withheld because it is a precious possession to be grudgingly dealt out, that has to be given in as small a share as possible. It is not the withholding of the teacher but the closing of the heart of the hearer ; not the hesitation of the teacher but the want of the ear that hears ; not the dearth of teachers but the dearth of pupils who are willing and ready to be taught. I hear men say : " Why not an Avatāra now, or if not an Avatāra, why do not the great R̥shis come forward to speak Their golden wisdom in the ears of men ? Why do They desert us ? Why do They leave us ? Why should this world in this age not have the wisdom as They gave it of old ? " The answer is that They are waiting, waiting, waiting, with tireless patience in order to find someone willing to be taught, and when one human heart opens itself out and says: "O Lord, teach me," then the teaching comes down in a stream of divine energy and floods the heart. And if you have not the teaching, it is because your hearts are locked with the key of gold, with the key of fame, with the key of power and with the key of desire for the enjoyments of this world. While those keys lock your hearts, the Teachers of wisdom cannot enter in; but unlock the heart and throw away the key, and you will find yourselves flooded with a wisdom which is ever waiting to come in.

As Searcher of hearts—ah! here again He is so difficult to understand, this Lord of Māya, this Master of illusion. He tests the hearts of His beloved, not so much the world at large. To the world is the teaching that shall guide it aright. For Arjuna, for Bhīma, for Yudhishthira, for them the keener touch, the sharper trial, in order to see if within the heart one grain of evil still remains, that will prevent their union with Himself. For what does He seek? That they shall be His very own, that they shall enter into His being. But they cannot enter therein while one seed of evil remains in their hearts. They cannot enter therein while one sin is left in their nature. And so in tenderness and not in anger, in wisest love and not with a desire to mislead, the Lord of Love tries the hearts of His beloved, so that any evil that is in them may be wrung out by the grip that He places on them. Two or three occasions of it I remember. I may mention perhaps a couple of them, to show you the method of the trial. The battle of Kurukshetra had been raging many a day; thousands and tens of thousands of the dead lay scattered on that terrible field, and every day when the sun rose Bhishma came forth, generalissimo of the army of the Kurus, carrying before him everything, save where Arjuna barred his way; but Arjuna could not be everywhere; he was called away, with the horses guided by the Charioteer Shri Kṛṣṇa sweeping across the field like a whirlwind, carrying victory in their course; and where the Charioteer and Arjuna were not, there Bhishma had his way. The hearts of the Pāṇdavas sank low within them, and at last one night under their tents, resting ere the next day's struggle, the bitter despondency of King Yudhishtira broke out in words, and he declared that until Bhishma was

"that promise may not be broken." He passed the trial; he stood the test. But still one weakness was left in that noble heart; one underlying weakness that threatened to keep him away from his Lord. The lack of power to stand absolutely alone in the moment of trial, the ever clinging to someone stronger than himself, in order that his own decision might be upheld. That last weakness had to be burnt out as by fire. In a critical moment of the battle the word came that the success of Droṇa was carrying everything before him; that Droṇa was resistless and that the only way to slay him was to spread the report that his son was dead, and then he would no longer fight. Bhīma slew an elephant of the same name as Droṇa's son, and he said in the hearing of Droṇa: "Ashvaṭṭhāmā is dead." But Droṇa would not believe unless King Yudhisṭhira said so. Then the test came. Will he tell a practical lie but a nominal truth, in order to win the battle? He refused; not for his brother's pleadings would he do it. Would he stand firm by truth quite alone, when all he revered seemed to be on the other side? The Great One said: "Say that Ashvaṭṭhāmā is slain." Ought he to have done it because He, truth. "I," He said, "am the gambling of the cheat," as well as the chants of the Veda. Strange lesson, and hard to learn, and yet true. For at every stage of evolution there is a lesson to be learnt. He teaches all the lessons; at each point of growth the next step is to be taken, and very often that step is the experiencing of evil, in order that suffering may burn the desire for evil out of the very heart. And just as the knife of the surgeon is different from the knife of the murderer, although both may pierce the human flesh, the one cutting to cure, the other to slay; so is the sharp knife of the Supreme, when by experience of evil and consequent pain He purifies the man, different, because the motive is other than the doing of evil to gratify passion, the stepping aside from righteousness in order to please the lower nature.

Last of all He shows himself as the Supreme; there is the Vaishṇava form, the universal form, the form that contains the universe. But still more is the Supreme seen in the profound wisdom of the teaching, in the steadfastness of His walk through life. Does it sound strange to say that God is seen more in the latter than the former, that the outer form that contains the universe is less divine than the perfect steadfast nature, swerving neither to the right hand nor the left? Read that life again with this thought in your mind, of one purpose followed to its end, no matter what forces might play on the other side, and its greatness may appear.

What did He come to do? He came to give the last lesson to the Kshat̥triya caste of India, and to open India to the world. Many lessons had been given to that great caste. We know that twenty-one times they had been cut off, and yet re-established. We know that Shri Rāma had shown the perfect life of the Kshat̥triya, as an example that they might follow. They would not learn the lesson, either by destruction or by love. They would not follow the example either from fear or from admiration. Then their hour struck on the bell of Heaven, the knell of the Kshat̥triya caste. He came to sweep away that caste and to leave only scattered remnants of it, dotted over the Indian soil. It had been the sword of India, the iron wall that ringed her round. He came to shiver that wall into pieces, and to break the sword that it might not strike again. It had been used to oppress instead of to protect. It had been used for tyranny instead of for justice. Therefore He who gave it brake it, till men should learn by suffering what they would not learn by precept. And on the field of Kuru, the Kshatṛiya caste fought its last great battle; none were left of all that mighty host save a handful, when the fighting was over. Never has the caste recovered from Kurukshetra. It has not utterly disappeared. In Rājaputana, e.g., we find clans belonging to it; but you know well enough that as a caste in most parts of modern India, you are hard put to find it. Why in the great counsels of the world's welfare was this done? Not only to teach a lesson for all time to kings and rulers, that if they would not govern aright they should not govern at all; but also to lay India open to the world.

How strange that sounds! To lay her open to invasion? He who loved her to lay her open to conquest? He who had consecrated her, He who had hallowed her plains and forests by His treading, and whose voice had rung through her land? Aye, for He judges not as man judges, and He sees the end from the beginning. India, as she was of old, kept isolated from all the world, was so kept that she might have the treasure of spiritual knowledge poured into her and make a vessel for the containing. But when you fill the vessel, you do not then put that vessel high away on a shelf, and leave men thirsting for the liquid that it contains. The Mighty One filled His Indian vessel with the water of spiritual knowledge, and at last the time came when that water should be poured out for the quenching of the thirst of the world, and should not be left only for the quenching of the thirst of a single nation, for the use of a single people. Therefore the Lover of men came, in order that the water of life might be poured out; He broke down the wall, so that the foreigner might overstep her borders. The Greeks swept in, the Musalmāns swept in, invasion after invasion, invasion after invasion, until the conquerors who now rule India were the latest in time. Do you see in that only decay, only misery, only that India is under a curse? Ah no, my brothers! That which seems a curse for the time is for the world's healing and the world's blessing; and India may well suffer for a time in order that the world may be redeemed.

What does it mean? I am not speaking politically, but from the standpoint of a spiritual student, who is trying to understand how the evolution of the race goes on. The people who last conquered India, who now rule her as governors, are the people whose language is the most widely spread of all the languages of the world, and it is likely to become the world's language. It belongs not only to that little island of Britain, it belongs also to the great continent of America, to the great continent of Australia. It has spread from land to land, until that one tongue is the tongue most widely understood amongst all the peoples of the world. Other nations are beginning to learn it, because business and trade and even diplomacy are beginning to be carried on in that English speech. What wonder then that the Supreme should send to India this nation whose language is becoming the world-language, and lay her open to be held as part of that world-wide empire, in order that her Scriptures, translated into the most widely spoken language, may help the whole human family and purify and spiritualise the hearts of all His sons.

There is the deepest object of His coming, to prepare the spiritualisation of the world. It is not enough that one nation shall be spiritual; it Shall the wisdom of the Ṛṣhis go out to Mlechchhas in every part of the world, and they learn and profit by it, while you, the physical descendants of the Ṛṣhis, know not your own literature and love it even less than you know? That is the great lesson with which I would fain close. So true is this, that, in order to gain teachers of the Brahmagyā which belongs to this land by right of birth, the great Ṛṣhis have had to send some of their children to other lands, in order that they may come back to teach your own religion amidst your people. Shall it not be that this shame shall come to an end? Shall it not be that there are some among you that shall lead again the old spiritual life, and follow and love the Lord? Shall it not be, not only here and there, but at last that the whole nation shall show the power of Śrī Kṛṣṇa in His life incarnated amongst you, which would really be greater than any special Avatāra? May we not hope and pray that His Avatāra shall be a nation that incarnates His knowledge, His love, His universal brotherliness to every man that treads the soil of earth? Away with the walls of separation, with the disdain and contempt and hatred that divide Indian from Indian, and India

Books on Hinduism by Annie Besant

	Rs. A.
The Bhagavad-Gita.	0 4
Text in Samskrt and translation in English. The famous Adyar Pocket Edition. Wrappers. (Can be had in leather and cloth.)
Dharma.	0 8
Three splendid lectures on Differences, Evolution, and Right and Wrong.
Four Great Religions.	0 12
Hinduism, Zoroastrianism, Baddhism, Christianity, in the light of occult knowledge.
Hindu Ideals.	1 0
Lectures on: Eastern and Western Ideals; the Hindu Student; the Hindu Householder; the Hindu Marriage; the Hindu State; the Hindu Religion.
Hinduism.	0 6
Deals with the Samskaras; Shraddha; Saucham; the Five Daily Sacrifices; the Four Ashramas.
In Defence of Hinduism.	0 6
Fourteen articles written to help Hindu boys to answer the attacks levelled against their religion.

Rs. L.

An Introduction to Yoga. 1 8

Intended for the student of Patanjali's works, but also suitable for the lay reader. Contents: The Nature of Yoga; Schools of Thought; Yoga as Science; Yoga as Practice.

Questions on Hinduism with Answers. 0 8

A useful collection of questions classified in 28 sections and covering a wide range of ethical, social, and ritualistic problems of Hindu thought.

Shri Ramachandra. 1 0

Some lessons from the Ramayana, for the use of Hindu students in the schools of India.

The Story of the Great War. 1 0

Some lessons from the Mahabharata, for the use of students in the schools of India.

The Wisdom of the Upanishats. 1 0

"An attempt to draw a few drops from the ancient wells of Aryan wisdom, and to offer them to quench the thirst of weary souls, travelling through the desert, seeking for Truth."

THEOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE

Adyar, Madras, India

Printed by J. R. Aria, at the Vasanta Press, Adyar, Madras.

Central Archaeological Library,
NEW DELHI.

1739b

Call No. 129,40954 | Bes.

Author—Besant, Annie.

Title—Avataaras,

Borrower No.

Date of Issue

Date of Return

"A book that is shut is but a block"

CENTRAL ARCHAEOLOGICAL LIBRARY
GOVT. OF INDIA
Department of Archaeology
NEW DELHI.

Please help us to keep the book clean and moving.

S. N. 148. N. DELHI.