CHIEF COMMISSIONER OF BRITISH BURMAH,

THE ABLE AND SUCCESSFUL ADMINISTRATOR, AND Distinguished Orientalist.

THIS WORK IS INSCRIBED IN TOKEN OF GREAT REGARD AND SINCERE FRIENDSHIP,

BY THE AUTHOR.
NOTE.

The first Edition of the Life of Gaudama being out of print for the last five or six years, we have, at the request of several highly esteemed persons, come to the determination of publishing a second and much enlarged edition of the same Work. To carry on the plan of improvement which we had in contemplation, we have been favored by a happy circumstance. We have, with much labor, found and procured, in the Burmese Capitol, a very rare palm-leaf manuscript, the contents of which have supplied us with copious, abundant, and interesting details respecting the sayings and doings of Gaudama.

The book is known under the Pali name of Tatha-gatha-oudana, the meaning of which is, Joyful Utterance, or Praises of the Tatha-gatha. The latter expression is one of the many titles given to Gaudama: it means, he who has come like all his predecessors. In the opinion of Buddhists, all the Buddhas who appear during the duration of a world, or the various series of succeeding worlds, have all the same mission to accomplish; they are gifted with the same perfect science, and are filled with similar feelings of compassion for, and benevolence towards, all beings. Hence the denomination which is fitly given to Gaudama, the last of them.

In the course of the Work, will be found some particulars concerning the author of that manuscript and the place where it has been composed. We have only to state here that we have gathered therefrom much information on the condition of Gaudama, previous to his last existence — on the origin of the Kapilawot country, where he was born, and on the kings he has descended from. We have also met many new details on the great intellectual working of Gaudama’s mind, during the forty-nine days he spent in meditation around the Bodi-tree, particularly the important theory of the twelve Nidanas, or causes and effects, which, with the four sublime truths, constitutes the very essence of the system. We have also found many important particulars concerning the whereabouts of Gaudama during the first twenty years of his public life, and the conversions he operated whilst engaged in the work of an itinerant preacher. There too we have gleaned and selected a few of the instructions he delivered to the people that crowded about him. The story of Dewadat is narrated at great length. We have carefully written down what is said of the three Assemblies or Councils held at Radvagio, Wethalie and Pataliputra, and what is mentioned of the kings who reigned in Magatha from Adzatatath to Dammathoka. We have mentioned the great fact of the spread of Budhism beyond the boundaries of Magatha, after the holding of the third Council, taking care to relate what we have found stated concerning its diffusion in Pegu and Burmah.

Numerous notes have been added to those of the first Edition, for the purpose of elucidating and explaining, as far as we are able, the principles of Budhism and whatever is connected with that religious system.

RANGOON, MAY, 1866.
PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION.

Whether Buddhism be viewed in its extent and diffusion, or in the compound nature of its doctrines, it claims the serious attention of every inquiring mind.

In our own days it is, under different forms, the creed prevailing in Nepal, Thibet, Mongolia, Corea, China, the Japanese Archipelago, Anam, Cambodia, Siam, the Shan States, Burmah, Arracan and Ceylon. Its sway extends over nearly one fourth of the human race.

Though based upon capital and revolting errors, Buddhism teaches a surprising number of the finest precepts and purest moral truths. From the abyss of its almost unfathomable darkness it sends forth rays of the brightest hue.

To the reflecting mind, the study of this religious system becomes the study of the history of one of the greatest religious labors that has ever been undertaken for elevating our nature above its low level, by uprooting the passions of the heart and dispelling the errors of the mind. A serious observer sees, at a glance, the dark and humiliating picture of the sad and barren results of the greatest and mightiest efforts of human wisdom, in its endeavors to find out the real cause of all human miseries, and to provide the remedies to cure the moral distempers our nature is subject to. The fact of man's wretched and fallen condition was clearly perceived by the Budhist Philosopher, but he failed in his attempts to help man out of the difficulties which encompass him in all directions and bring him back to the path of truth and salvation. The efforts begun on the banks of the Ganges at an early period, and carried on with the greatest arder and perseverance, have proved abortive as those made at a later period throughout Greece and Italy by the greatest and brightest geniuses of antiquity. What a grand and irresistible demonstration both of the absolute inability of man to rescue and save himself, and of the indispensable necessity of divine interference to help him in obtaining that twofold object.

It may be said in favor of Buddhism, that no philosophico-religious system has ever upheld, to an equal degree, the notions of a saviour and deliverer, and the necessity of his mission for procuring the salvation, in a Buddhist sense, of man. The role of Buddha, from beginning to end, is that of a deliverer, who preaches a law designed to secure to man the deliverance from all the miseries he is laboring under. But by an inexplicable and deplorable eccentricity, the pretended saviour, after having taught man the way to deliver himself from the tyranny of his passions, leads him, after all, into the bottomless gulf of a total annihilation.

Buddhism, such as we find it in Burmah, appears to have retained, to a great extent, its original character and primitive genuineness, exhibiting the most correct forms and features of that Protean creed. At the epoch the Burmans left the northern valleys and settled in the country they now inhabit, they were a half-civilized, Mongolian tribe, with no kind of worship, except a sort of Geniolatry, much similar to that we see now existing among the various tribes bordering on Burmah. They were in the same condition, when the first Buddhist missionaries arrived among them. Deposited in this almost virginial soil, the seed of Buddhism grew up freely, without meeting any obstacle to check its growth.

Philosophy, which, during its too often erratic rambles in search of truth, changes, corrects, improves, destroys, and, in numberless ways, modifies all that it meets, never flourished in these parts; and, therefore, did not work in the religious institutions, which have remained up to this day nearly the same as they were when first imported into Burmah. The free discussion of religious and moral subjects, which constituted the very life of the Indian schools, and begat so many various, incoherent, and contradictory opinions on the most essential points of religion and philosophy, is the sign of an advanced state of civilization, which does not appear to have ever existed on the banks of the Irrawaddy.

Owing to its geographical position, and perhaps, also, to political causes, Burmah has ever remained out of the reach of Hindu influence, which in Nepal has colored Buddhism with Hindoo myths, and habituated it in gross idolatric forms. In China, where already subsisted heroes' and ancestors' worship, at the time of the arrival of the preachers of the new doctrine, Buddhism, like an immense parasitic plant, extended itself all over the institutions which it covered rather than destroyed, allowing the ancient forms to subsist under the disguise it afforded them. But such was not the state of Burma, when visited by the first heralds of Buddhism.

The epoch of the introduction of Buddhism in Burma, has hitherto been a matter of conjecture. According to Burmese annals, Boudha-gautha, at the end of the fourth century of our era, brought from Ceylon a copy of the scriptures, and did for Burma, what Fa-Hian, the Chinese pilgrim, accomplished a few years afterwards in India and Ceylon, for the benefit of his country. But Burmans maintain that they were followers of Buddha long before that epoch. If an inference may be drawn from analogy, it is probable that they are right in their assertion. China is fully as far from the ancient seat of Buddhism as Burma. Yet it appears from the Chinese annals, that the doctrines of the Indian Philosopher were already propagated in some parts of that empire, in the middle of the first century of our era and probably at an earlier date. There can be no improbability in concluding, that at least at the same time, Buddhist missionaries had penetrated in this country for propagating their tenets. According to Buddhistic annals, it is after the holding of the 3rd Council, 236 after Gaudama's death, 207 B.C., that two missionaries carried religion to Thaton, the ruins of which are still to be seen between the mouths of the Tsitang, and Salween rivers, and established Buddhism in Pegu. Be that as it may, we know, from the magnificent Buddhist monuments of Pagan, that religion had reached, in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, a degree of splendor that has never since been equalled.

The Buddhist scriptures are divided into three great parts, the Thoots or instructions, the Wimi, or discipline, and the Abidama, or methaphysics. Agreeably to this division, the matter of the following pages is arranged under three heads. The life of Budha, with some portions of his preaching, will convey notions of his principal teachings and doctrines. It is accompanied with copious annotations intended to explain the text, and to convey detailed notions of the system of Buddhism in general, and particularly as it is found existing in Burmah. We have added a few small dzats, or accounts of some of the former existences of Gandama, and the summary of two large ones.

In the Notice on the Phongyies, will be found the chief points of discipline fully explained and developed. We have endeavored to render as complete as possible the account of the Buddhist Religious, or Phongyies. It is an exposition of the practical illustration of the highest results that can be obtained under the influence of the doctrines of the Indian Philosopher.

In the Ways to Neibban, an attempt has been made to expose and unfold the chief points of metaphysics, upon which hinges the whole religious system. We confess that the summary of metaphysics is rather concise. We were reluctant to engage too far in this subject, which, to the generality of readers, is an uninviting one.

A suggestion from Captain H. Hopkinson, Commissioner of the Martaban and Tenasserim Provinces, has induced us to add a few remarks on the names and situations of the principal towns and countries, mentioned in the Legend, with the view of identifying them with modern sites and places.

It is hardly necessary to state here that the writer, when he undertook this Work, never had any other object in view, but that of merely exposing the religious system of Buddhism, as it is, explaining its doctrines and practices, as correctly as it has been in his power, regardless of their merits and demerits. His information has been derived from the perusal of the religious books of the Burmans, and from frequent conversations on religion, during several years, with the best informed among the laity and the Religious whom he has had the chance of meeting.

The surest way, perhaps, of coming at least to an exact and accurate knowledge respecting the history and doctrines of Buddhism would be to give a translation of the Legends of Budha, such as they are to be met with, in all countries where Buddhism has established its sway, and accompany these translations with an exposition of the various doctrinal points, such as they are held, understood, and believed by those various nations. This has already been done by eminent Orientalists, on Thibetan, Sanscrit, Cingalese, and Chinese originals. A similar work, executed by competent persons among the Shans, Siamese, Cambodians, and Cochin Chinese, would considerably help the savans in Europe, who have assumed the difficult task of exposing the Buddhist system in its complex and multiform forms, to give a full, general, and comprehensive view of that great religious creed with all its variations.

The best way of undermining the foundations of a false creed and successfully attacking it, is to lay it open to the eyes of all, and exhibit it as it really is. Error never retains its hold over the mind, but because of the appearance of truth it contrives to assume; when deprived of the mask that has hitherto covered its emptiness and unreality, it vanishes away as a phantom and an illusion.

We are happy to have an opportunity of returning publicly our thanks, to the worthy Commissioner of Pegu, Major A. P. Phayre, for his kind exertions in furthering the publication of this Work. Not only is he an eminent Oriental scholar and profoundly versed in all that has reference to Buddhism, but his great delight is, to encourage every effort that tends to unfold and explain a creed, which, despite all that has been written about it in several countries where it flourishes, has still many mysteries in the parts relating to its history and doctrines that have remained hitherto uncleared.

Out of our limited stock of information concerning the Buddhist system, as it exists in these parts, we have with a deeply-felt distrust of our poor abilities, taken the best portion, and, with a willing heart, presented it to the public. We hope that our example may induce others, whose stores of knowledge on this subject are richer and better supplied than ours, to act in a similar liberal spirit, for aiding the prosecution of a great object, viz.: the acquisition of a correct knowledge of the religion of nearly 300,000,000 of fellowmen.

LEGEND OF THE BURMESE BUDHA CALLED GAUDAMA.

CHAPTER I.

Invocation of the Burmese translator—Slow but steady progress of Phralaong towards the Budhaship—Promise made to him by the Budha Deipinkara—Origin and beginning of the Kappilawat country and of its Rulers—Birth of Thoodaunam—His marriage with the Princess Maiia—Rumor of the coming birth of a Budha—Phralaong in the race of Nats—Dream of Maiia—Conception of Phralaong—Wonders attending that event.

I adore Budha who has gloriously emerged from the bottomless whirlpool of endless existences; who has extinguished the burning fire of anger and other passions;

1.—All Buddhistic compositions are invariably prefaced with one of the following formulas of worship always used by writers on religious subjects. The one relates to Budha alone, and the other to the three most excellent things, ever deserving the highest veneration. The first, always written in Pali, beginning with the words Namas tassas, may be translated as follows: I adore thee, or rather adoration to, the blessed, perfect and most intelligent. Here are proposed to the faith, admiration and veneration of a true Buddhist, the three great characteristics of the founder of his religion, his goodness and benevolence, his supreme perfection and his boundless knowledge. They form the essential qualifications of a being who has assumed upon himself the task of bringing men out of the abyss of darkness and ignorance, and leading them to deliverance. Benevolence prompts him to undertake that great work; perfection fits him for such a high calling; and supreme science enables him to follow it up with a complete success. They are always held out to Buddhists as the three bright attributes and transcendent qualities inherent to that exalted personage, which are ever to attract and centre upon him the respect, love and admiration of all his sincere followers.

The second formula may be considered as a short act of faith often repeated by Buddhists. It consists in saying—I take refuge in Budha, the Law and the Assembly. This short profession of faith is often much enlarged by the religious zeal of writers, and the fervent piety of devotees. From the instance of this legend, we may remark how the compiler with a soul warmed by fervor, is passing high encomiums upon each of the three sacred objects of veneration, or the sacred asylums wherein a Buddhist delights to dwell. There is no doubt but this formula is a very ancient one, probably coeval with the first age of Buddhism. The text of this legend bears out the correctness of this assertion. It appears that the repetition of this short sentence was the mark that distinguished converts. Ordinary hearers of the preachings of Budha, and his disciples evinced their adhesion to all that was delivered to them by repeating the sacred formula. It was then, and even now opened and illuminated the fathomless abyss of dark ignorance, and who is the greatest and most excellent of all beings.

it is to Buddhists, what the celebrated Mahomedan declaration of faith—there is but one God and Mahomed is his prophet—is to the followers of the Arabian Prophet. It is extremely important to have an accurate idea of the three sacred abodes in which the believer expects to find a sure shelter against all errors, doubts and fears, and a resting place where his soul may securely enjoy the undisturbed possession of truth. They constitute what is emphatically called the three precious things.

Phra and Budha are two expressions which, though not having the same meaning, are used indiscriminately for designating the almost divine being, who after having gone, during myriads of successive existences, through the practice of all sorts of virtues, particularly self-denial and complete abnegation of all things, at last reaches to such a height of intellectual attainments, that his mind becomes gifted with a perfect and universal intelligence or knowledge of all things. He is thus enabled to see and fathom the misery and wants of all mortal beings; and to devise means for relieving and filling them up. The law that he preaches, is the wholesome balm designed to cure all moral distempera. He preaches it with unceasing zeal during a certain number of years, and commissions his chosen disciples to carry on the same benevolent and useful undertaking. Having laid on a firm basis his religious institution, he arrives at the state of Neibban. Budha means wise, intelligent. Phra is an expression conveying the highest sense of respect, which was applied originally only to the author of Buddhism, but now through a servile adulation it is applied to the king, his ministers, all great personages, and often by inferiors, to the lowest menials of Government. The word Phra, coupled with that of Thaking, which means Lord, is used by Christians in Burmah, to express the idea of God, the supreme being.

From the foregoing lines the reader may easily infer that the author of Buddhism is a mere man, superior to all other beings, not in nature, but in science and perfection. He lays no claim whatever to any kind of superiority in nature; he exhibits himself to the eyes of his disciples, as one of the children of men, who has been born and is doomed to die. He carries no farher his pretensions. The idea of a supreme being is nowhere mentioned by him. In the course of his religious disputations with the Brahmins, he combats the notions of a God, coolly establishing the most crude atheism. No one, it is true, can deny that in certain Buddhist countries the notions of an Adibudha, or supreme being, is to be found in the writings and the opinions of its inhabitants, but we know that these writings are of a comparatively recent date, and contain many doctrines foreign to genuine Buddhism. This subject will, however, receive hereafter further developments.

The Law, the second object of veneration, is the body of doctrines delivered by Budha to his disciples, during the forty-five years of his public career. He came to the perfect knowledge of that law, when he attained the lumbasthip under the shade of the Bhodi tree. At that time, his mind became indefinitely expanded; his science embraced all that exists; his penetrating and searching eye reached the farthest limits of the past; saw at a glance the present, and fathomed the secrets of the future. In that position, unclouded truth shone with radiant effulgence before him, and he knew
I adore the law which the most excellent Budha has published, which is infinitely high and incomparably profound, exceedingly acceptable, and most earnestly wished for the nature of all beings individually, their condition and situation, as well as all the relations subsisting between them. He understood at once the miseries and errors attending all rational beings, the hidden causes that generated them, and the spring they issued from. At the same time he perceived distinctly the means to be employed for putting an end to so many misfortunes, and the remedies to be used for the cure of those numberless and sad moral distempers. His omniscience pointed out to him the course those beings were to follow in order to retrace back their steps from the way of error, and enter the road that would lead to the coming out from the whirlpool of moral miseries, in which they had hitherto wretchedly moved during countless existences. All that Gaudama said to the foregoing purposes, constitute the law upon which so many high praises are lavished with a warm and fervent earnestness. A full and complete knowledge of that law, in the opinion of Buddhists, dispels at once the clouds of ignorance, which, like a thick mist, encompasses all beings, and sheds bright rays of pure light which enlighten the understanding. Man is thus enabled to perceive distinctly the wretchedness of his position, and to discover the means whereby he may extricate himself from the trammels of passions and finally arrive to the state of Nirvana, which is, as it shall be hereafter fully explained, the exemption from all the miseries attending existence. The whole law is divided into three parts; the Abidamsa or metaphysics, Thouts or moral instructions, and the Wini, or discipline. According to the opinion of the best informed among Buddhists, the law is eternal, without a beginning or an author that might have framed its precepts. No Budha ever considered himself, or has ever been looked upon by others, as the inventor and originator of the law. He who becomes a Budha, is gifted with a boundless science that enables him to come to a perfect knowledge of all that constitutes the law: he is the fortunate discoverer of things already existing, but placed far beyond the reach of human mind. In fact the law is eternal, but has become since the days of a former Budha, oblitered from the minds of men, until a new one, by his omniscience, is enabled to find it back and preach it to all beings.

The third object of veneration is the Thanga, or Assembly. The meaning of the Pali word Thanga is nearly equivalent to that of church or congregation. In the time Gaudama lived, the assembly was composed of all individuals who, becoming converts, embraced the mode of living of their preacher, remained with him; or if they occasionally parted with him for awhile, always kept a close intercourse with him, and spent a portion of their time in his company. Having left the world, they subjected themselves to certain disciplinary regulations, afterwards embodied in the great compilation called Wini. The members of the Assembly were divided into two classes; the Arihas, or venerables, who by their age, great proficiency in the knowledge of the law and remarkable fervor in the assiduous practice of all its ordinances, occupied deservedly the first rank amongst the disciples of Budha; and ranked foremost in the Assembly. The second class was composed of the Bickus, or simple mendicant Religious. It is difficult to assert with any degree of probability whether the Upasakas, or ordinary hearers, have ever been regarded as members of the Thanga, and forming a portion thereof. The Upasakas were believers, but continued to for by Nats and men, capable to wipe off the stains of concupiscence and is immutable.

I adore the assembly of the perfect, of the pure and illustrious Arihas in their eight sublime states, who have overcome all the passions that torment other mortals, by eradicating the very root of concupiscence, and who are famous above all other beings.

I undertake to translate from the Pali text, the history of our most excellent Phra, from the period he left Tocita, the fourth abode of Nats, to the time he entered into the state of Neibban.

Previous, however, to commencing the work, I will relate succinctly what is found in our books respecting the live in the world and formed, as it were, the laity of the Buddhist church. According to the opinion of Buddhists in these parts, the laity is not considered as forming or constituting a part of the Thanga; those only who abandon a secular life, put on the yellow cannonical dress, and endeavor to tread in the footsteps of their great teacher, are alone entitled to the dignity of members of the Assembly, to which a veneration is paid similar to that offered to Budha and the law. The Arihas or venerables are divided into four classes, according to their greater or lesser proficiency in knowledge and moral worth. They are called Thotapan, Thakadagan, Anagam and Arahat. In the class of Thotapan, are included the individuals who have entered into the current or stream, leading to deliverance, or in other terms, who have stepped into the way of perfection. The Thotapan is, as yet to be born four times ere he can obtain the deliverance. Those who belong to the second class, glide rapidly down the stream, following steadily the way leading to perfection, and are to be born once more in the condition of Nat, and once in that of man. Those of the third class are to be born once in the condition of Nats. Finally those of the fourth class have gone over the fourth and last way to perfection, reached the summit of science and spiritual attainments, and are ripe for the state of Neibban they infallibly obtain after their death. The Arihas are again subdivided into eight classes, four of which include those who are following the four ways of perfection; the four others comprehend those who enjoy the reward of the duties practised in following the ways of perfection.

3.—The Burmese translator of the Pali text gives us to understand, that his intention is not to give the history of our Budha during the countless existences that have preceded the last one, when he obtained the supreme intelligence. Buddhists keep five hundred and ten histories or legends of Budha, purporting to give an account of as many of his former existences; and to enhance the value of such records, the contents are supposed to have been narrated by Budha himself to his disciples and hearers. I have read most of them. Two hundred of these fabulous narrations are very short and give few particulars regarding our Phra, when he was as yet in the state of animal, man and Nat. They are, except the heading and the conclusion, but the same fables and stories to be met with amongst all Asiatic nations, which have supplied with inexhaustible stores, all ancient and modern fabulists. The last ten narratives are really very complete and interesting great Being who, by a slow but sure process, was qualifying himself for his great and high destiny. It is stated that all the following particulars were narrated by Gaudama himself, to the great disciple Thariputra.

During seven Thingies of worlds, he who was to become a Budha, felt within himself, during that immense number of revolutions of nature, a thought for the Budhship, awakening in his soul. This thought was succeeded by a wish, a desire and a longing for that extraordinary calling. He began to understand that the practice of virtues of the highest order, was requisite to enable him to obtain the glorious object of his ardent wishes, and no less stories of ten existences of Budha preceding the one we are about describing, during which he is supposed to have practised the ten great virtues, the acquisition of which is an indispensable qualification for obtaining the exalted dignity of Phra. Some of these legends are really beautiful, interesting, and well composed pieces of literature.

4.—Toocita, or the joyful abode, is one of the seats of the Nats. But in order to render more intelligible several passages of this work, it is almost indispensable to have an idea of the system adopted by Buddhists in assigning to rational beings their respective seats or abodes. There are 31 seats assigned to all beings which we may suppose to be disposed on an immense scale, extending from the bottom of the earth to an incommensurable height above it. At the foot, we find the four states of punishment, viz. hell, the states of Athourikes, Preithas, and animals. Next comes the abode of man. Above it are the six seats of Nats. These eleven seats are called the seats of passion, or concupiscence, because the beings residing therein, are still subject to the influence of that passion, though not to an equal degree. Above the abodes of Nats, we meet with the 16 seats, called Rupa, disposed preponderantly one above the other, to an incalculable height. The inhabitants of those fanciful regions, are called Brahmas or perfect. They have freed themselves from concupiscence and almost all other passions, but still retain some affection for matter and material things. Hence the denomination of Rupa, or matter, given to the seats. The remaining portion of the scale is occupied by the four seats called Arupa or immaterials, for the beings inhabiting them are entirely delivered from all passions. They have as it were broken asunder even the smallest ties that would attach them to this material world. They have reached the summit of perfection; one step farther, and they enter into the state Neibban, the consummation, according to Buddhists, of all perfection. To sum up all the above in a few words: there are four states of punishment. The seat of man is a place of probation and trial. The six abodes of Nats are places of sensual pleasures and enjoyments. In the 16 seats of Rupa, are to be met those beings whose delights are of a more refined and almost purely spiritual nature, though retaining as yet some slight affections for matter. In the four seats of Arupa are located those beings who are wholly disentangled from material affections, who delight but in the sublime contemplation, soaring, as it were, in the boundless regions of pure spiritualism.
than 125,000 Budhas appeared during that space of time.

When the above period had at last come to an end, the inward workings of his soul prompted him to ask openly for the Budhaship. The period of asking lasted nine Thingies of worlds. It was brightened and illustrated by the successive manifestation of 987,000 Budhas.
In the beginning of this latter period, the future Gau-dama was a Prince by the name of Laukatara, ruler of the Nanda country. At that time, there appeared in the country of Kappilawot, a Budha, called Thakiamuni Paurana Gaudama. Whilst he happened to travel through the Nanda country, with the two fold object of preaching the law and begging for his food, the ruler Laukatara made great offerings to him. Meanwhile, with a marked earnestness, he solicited at the feet of Thakiamuni, the favor of becoming, at some future time, a Budha as himself was one. He expressed the wish to be born in the same country, from the same father and mother, to have for his wife the very same Queen, to ride the same horse, to be attended by the same companions, and the same two great disciples of the right and of the left.
To this request, Thakiamuni replied in the affirmative, but he added that an immense length of time had as yet to elapse, ere the objects of his petition be fully granted.
A similar application was repeatedly made to all other succeeding Budhas, and a like promise was held out to him.

The third period of four Thingies of worlds, was remarkable by the complete absence of all that could enlighten or illustrate the various states of existence. A complete moral and intellectual darkness was spread over all beings and kept them wrapped up in utter darkness. No Budhas, no Pitzekabudhas appeared to illuminate, by their doctrine and science, the mind of men. No Tsekiawade, or king of the world, made his appearance to infuse life and energy in the midst of the universal slumbering.
But the following hundred thousand revolutions of nature were more fortunate. There flourished no less than twenty seven Budhas, from Tahingara, the first in the series, to Kathaba the last one immediately preceeding Gaudama.

During the period that the Budha named Deipinkara was the teacher of all Beings, our future Gaudama was born in the country of Amarawatti, from illustrious and rich parents, belonging to the caste of Pounhas.

When as yet a youth, he lost both his parents, and inherited their property.

In the midst of pleasure and plenty, he made, one day, this reflection. The riches that I now possess, were my parents' property, but they have not been able to save them from the miseries attending death. They will not, alas! afford to me a better and more secure fate. When I go into the grave, they will not come along with me. This bodily frame I am clad in, is not worth to be pitied. Why should I bestow signs of compassion upon it. Filled with impurities, burchened by rottenness, it has all the elements of destruction, in the compounded parts of its existence. Towards Neibban I will turn my regards; upon it, my eyes shall be rivetted. There, is the tank in which all the impurities of passions, may be washed away. Now, I will forsake every thing, and go forthwith in search of a teacher that will point out to me, the way leading to the state Neibban.

Full of these thoughts, the young man gave away to the needy all that he possessed, reserving nothing to himself. Freed from the trammels of riches, he withdrew into a lonely place, where the Nats had prepared beforehand all that was necessary to minister unto his wants. He embraced the profession, or mode of life of a Rahan, or perfect. Attired in the dress of his new profession, he lived for some time on this spot, under the name of Thoomeda. Displeased however, with the too easy mode of life he was leading, he left that spot, and was satisfied with dwelling under the shade of trees. He however, went out, from time to time, in quest of his food.

A few years previous to the retirement of Thoomeda into the solitude, he who was to be the Budha Deipinkara, migrated from one of the Nats' seats and incarnated in the womb of the Princess Thoomeda, wife of Thoodewa, king of the Ramawatti country. Subsequently he was married to the Princess Padouma who bore unto him a son named Oothabakanda. On the same year the child was born, the king left his palace on elephant back, withdrew into some lonely place, practised during ten months all sorts of self inflicted penances, and under the shade of the tree Gniaong Kiat, became a Budha. On that occasion, the earth quivered with great violence, but the hermit Thoomeda being in ecstasy at that moment, knew nothing of the extraordinary occurrence.

On a certain day, Deipinkara was travelling through the country, for the two fold purpose of preaching the law and collecting his food. Arrived near a place where the road was very bad, he stopped for a while, until the road be made passable. The people hastened from all parts to come and prepare the road for Deipenkara and his followers. Thoomeda gifted with the privilege of travelling through the air, happened to pass over the spot where crowds of people were busily engaged in preparing and leveling a road. The Hermit alighted on that spot, and inquired from the people what was the cause of their busy exertions. They told him that the most excellent Deipinkara was expected with a large retinue of disciples, and that they strained every nerve to have the road ready for them. Thoomeda begged to be permitted to have a share in the good work, and asked that a certain extent of the road be assigned to him as his task. His request was granted and he forthwith set at work with the greatest diligence. It was all but finished when Budha Deipinkara followed by forty thousand disciples made his appearance. Thoomeda actuated by an ardent desire of testifying his respect to the holy personage, without showing the least hesitation, he flung himself into the hollow that was as yet not filled, and lying on his belly, his back upwards, bridged the place and entreated the Budha and his followers to cross the hollow by trampling over his body. Great and abundant shall be the merits that I, said he within himself, shall gain by this good work. No doubt I will receive from the mouth of Deipinkara the assurance, that I shall, hereafter, obtain the Budhaship. The Budha standing over him, admired the humble and fervent devotedness of Thoomeda. With one glance he perceived all that was going on in the hermit's mind, and with a loud voice that could be heard by all his disciples, he assured him that four Thingies and one hundred thousand Worlds hence, he would become a Budha, the fourth that would appear during the world called Badda. He wenton, describing minutely the principal events that were to illustrate his future career. No sooner was this revelation made to him, that Thoomeda hastened back to his forest. Sitting at the foot of a tree, he exhorted himself by fine comparisons to the practice of those virtues, the best suited to weaken in him, the influence of passions.

In the different existences that followed, Thoomeda at all the periods of the appearance of some Budhas, received a confirmation of the promise he had had from the lips of Deipinkara.

This present world we live in, has been favored above all others. Already three Budhas have appeared, viz: Kaukkasan, Gaunagong and Kathaba. They invariably belonged to the cast of Punhas, and he who was to be hereafter our Gaudama, during the many existences he passed through, at the time of the manifestations of those three Budhas, was always born from the same cast. Kathaba is said to have lived and preached during the ninth andrakap. It was he who, for the last time, assured the future Gaudama that he would obtain the Budhaship during the tenth andrakap.

We will only mention his last existence in the seat of man, previous to the one he was to obtain the great prize he had labored for, with so much earnestness during innumerable existences. He became Prince, under the name of Wethandra, and practised to an eminent, nay heroic degree, the virtues of liberality and charity. To such an extent did he obey the dictates of his liberal heart, that after having given away all the royal treasures, his white Elephant, &c., he did not shrink from parting with his own wife, the Princess Madi, and his two children Dzali and Gahna. He then died and migrated to the Toocita seat, and enjoyed the blissfulness and felicity of Nats, under the name of Saytakaytoo, during fifty seven koudes of years.

The origin and beginning of the Kapilawot country as well as of its Rulers, are to be alluded to, as briefly as possible. In the country of the middle, Mitzimadesa, the kings that ruled from the time of Mahathamadat to that of Ookakaritz, king of Benares, were 252,556 in number. The last named monarch was married to five wives and had children by them all. The first queen happening to die, the king became passionately enamoured of a young woman, whom he married. She soon presented him with a son, whom the king, pressed by his young wife's solicitations, declared heir apparent, to the prejudice of his elder sons. As might have been expected, the four elder sons loudly complained of the preference given to their younger brother. To put an end to the domestic disputes, the king called his four sons and their five sisters, gave them a large retinue, and bade them to go in a northerly direction, in search of a favorable spot, for building a new city. They followed their father's advice. After a long wandering through the forests, they came to a place where lived the Rathee Kapila, who becoming acquainted with the object of their errand, desired them to stay with him and found a city. He also wished that, on the very spot where stood his hut, the king's palace should be erected. He predicted that this city would become great, powerful and illustrious; that it would be a city of peace, since the animals in the forests lived peaceably, without ever attempting to inflict harm on each other. The proposal was cheerfully accepted. All the people sat at work with great earnestness. When the work was completed, they offered the new city to Kapila, who was made their teacher. Hence the name of Kappilawottoo, or Kapilawot.

The four Princes finding that among their followers, then were no daughters of the royal race, whom they could marry, resolved, in order to keep pure the royal blood, to marry their four younger sisters. The eldest one was raised to the dignity of queen mother. Ookamukka the eldest of them, was the first king of Kapilawot. Whilst these things were coming to pass, the king of Benares, having been attacked with leprosy, had left his throne, and retired in a forest north of his capital. There he found his cure under the shade of the Kalau tree. At the same time the eldest sister, named Peiya, who had become queen mother, was seized with the same distemper, and went into the same forest. She met with the king whom she knew not. By his advice, she sat under the Kalau tree, and the beneficent smell of the leaves, soon worked a perfect cure. They were subsequently married and had a numerous progeny. They settled on this spot, and built the city of Kaulya. The small river Rohani, flowed between Kaulya and Kapilawot.*

Gaudama was a Hindoo, brought up by Hindoo masters, and initiated to all the knowledge possessed by the society he lived in. He accepted the fabulous genealogies of kings such as they were found in the writings of his days. The same may be said of the erroneous notions respecting our Globe, the size and motions of the sun and the moon, and other heavenly bodies, the explanations of many natural phenomena, the description of hell, of the seats of reward, &c. Teacher as he was of moral precepts based upon metaphysical principles, Gaudama concerned himself very little about these things, which in his eyes were not worth the consideration of a sage. But he, or more probably his disciples, availed themselves of these notions for resting upon them some portions of their system, and giving them such developments as best suited their views. These notions, though wedded to the religious system originated by Gaudama, do not, strictly speaking, belong to it. They existed before his appearance in the schools of philosophy; they formed a part of the stock of knowledge possessed by the society in which he was reared. To account properly for these particulars and many others belonging to the disciplinary regulations, recourse must be had to the study of the ancient religion of the Hindoos, Brahminism.

To account properly for these particulars and many others belonging to the disciplinary regulations, recourse must be had to the study of the ancient religion of the Hindoos, Brahmism.

In the account of the foundation of the Kapilawot city, we find that the
From Ookamukka, the first king of Kapilawot, to Prince Wethandra, there are but seven successive kings. From Dzali, the son of Wethandra, to Dzyathamia, the great grand father of Gaudama, there were 82,002 kings. Let it be borne in mind, that during that period of time, our Phralaonga, or future of Gaudama was in one of the Nats' seats. The Princes of Kapilawot were wont to go and sport on the water of a lake somewhat distant from the city. They at first erected a temporary place of residence, in the vicinity of that sheet of water, and finally built a city which received the name of Dewaha. It had likewise its kings of the same Thagiwi race. Dzyathamia, the king of Kapilawot, had a son named Thiahanoo and a daughter named Yathaudara. His cotemporary king of Dewaha, Aukaka, had also a son and a daughter, Eetzana and Kitzana. Thiahanoo was married to Kitzana who bore into him five sons, Toudaudana, Kanwaudana, Thourkkaudana, Thékkaudana and Amitaudana; and two daughters, Amita and Pilila. Eetzana the son of the king of Dewa, married Yathaudara, daughter of Dzyathamia, king of Kapilawot. From this marriage, were born two sons Thoopabudha and Dantapani; and two daughters, Maia and Patzapati.

When Eetzana became king of Dewaha, a considerable error had crept into the calendar. A correction was deemed necessary. There lived a celebrated hermit, or Rathee, named Deweela, well versed in the science of calculation. After several consultations held on this important subject, in the presence of the king, it was agreed that the Kandza era of 8,640 years, should be done away with, on a Saturday the first of the moon of Tabaong, and that the new era should be made to begin on a Sunday, on the first day of the waxing moon of the month Tagoo. This was called the Eetzana era.

practice of leaving the eldest sister unmarried, and the Princes marrying their own sisters, is, up to this day, observed by the royal family of Burma. The eldest daughter of the reigning monarch is to remain unmarried during her parents' life, and the first queen is often, if not always, the sister or half sister of the king. The same unnatural practice prevailed in the royal family of the ancient Persians.
On the 10th of the new era, Thoodaudana was born in the city of Kapilawot; and on the 12th year, Maia was born at Dewaha. In the days of the Budha Wipathi, the future Maia was then the daughter of a Pounha. Her father who tenderly loved her, gave her, one day, a fine nosegay with a great quantity of the choicest perfumes and essences. The young girl delighted with these articles, hastened to the place where lived Wipathi, and with a pious and fervent earnestness, laid at his feet all that she had received from her father. Wipathi admiring the fervent liberality of the damsel, assured her that she would, hereafter, become the mother of a Budha, who was to be called Gaudama.

When Thoodaudana was 18 years of age, his father king Thiahanoon called eight Pounhas skilled in the science of astrology, and directed them to go with a large retinue and splendid presents in search of a royal princess, to be married to his son. The eight Pounhas departed. They visited several countries, but all in vain; they could not find one princess worthy of their master's son. At last they came to the city of Dewaha. They had no sooner arrived in sight of it, than they saw many signs, which prognosticated that, in the city, would be found an accomplished princess, in every respect, qualified to become the wife of the heir to the throne of Kapilawot. At that time the young Maia had gone to enjoy herself in a garden outside the city. It was situated on a gently sloping ground covered with all sorts of the finest and rarest trees. A small brook winding its course in various directions, spread on every spot, with its gently murmuring waters, a delicious freshness. Thither the royal messengers resorted. They found the princess in the midst of her companions, outshining them all in beauty, like the moon among the stars. Admitted into her presence, the head of the deputation attempted to speak and explain the object of his visit; but he was so much overwhelmed by the beauty, the graceful and dignified appearance of the princess, that his voice failed him, and he fainted successively three times. On each fit that came on him, several damsels ran to his assistance with pitchers of fresh water, and brought him back to his senses. Having recovered his spirits, the chief Pounha felt encouraged by some graceful and kind words from the lips of the Princess. He explained to her, with the choicest expressions, the object of his mission; and with a faltering and timid tone of voice, stated to her that he had come to entreat her to accept presents from, and the hand of, Prince Thoodaudana. Meanwhile he poured at her feet, the brightest jewels, and rarest articles. The Princess with a sweet voice, modestly replied that she was under the protection and care of her beloved parents, whose will she never resisted: that it was to them that this affair was to be referred. As to her own part, she had but one thing to do, to abide by her parents good wishes.

Satisfied with the answer, the Pounhas retired, and hastened to the palace of king Eetzana, to whom they related all that had just happened. The king graciously agreed to the proposal, and, in proof of his perfect satisfaction, sent in return, a deputation, with many presents to Prince Thoodaudana and to his father. As might be expected, the royal messengers were well received at Kapilawot. Thiahanoow and his son set out, with a countless retinue, for the city of Dewaha. In a mango trees grove, an immense building was erected, out of the city for their reception and accomodation; and in the middle of that building, a spacious hall was arranged with infinite art, for the marriage ceremony. When all the preparations were completed, the bridegroom attended by his father, king Thiahanoow and the chief of Brahmas, went out to meet the Bride, who was coming from the garden, accompanied by her mother and the wife of the great Thagia. Both advanced towards the centre of the hall, near a stand raised for the occasion. Thoodaudana stretched at first his hand and laid it over that place. Maia gracefully acted in a similar manner. Both then took each other's hand, in token of the mutual consent they gave. At that auspicious moment, all the musical instruments resounded, and with gladdening tunes proclaimed the happy event. The Pounhas holding the sacred shell in their hands, poured the blessed water over their heads, uttering all sorts of blessings. The parents and relatives joined in calling forth, upon the young couple, the choicest benedictions. The King, Princes, Pounhas and Nobles vied with each other, in making presents, and wishing them all sorts of happiness.

When the festival was over, Thiahanoo desired to go back to his country, with his son and daughter-in-law. This was done with the utmost pomp and solemnity. On his return, he continued to govern his people with great prudence and wisdom, and at last died and migrated to one of the Nats' seats. He was succeeded by his son Thoodaudana, who with his amiable wife, religiously observed the five precepts, and the ten rules of kings. By his beneficence and liberality to all, he won the sincere affection of his people. It was on the 28th year of the new era, that he was married. Soon after, he took for his second wife, Patzapat, the younger sister of Maia. Thoodaudana's sister Amitau, was married to Thouppabudha, the son of king Eetzana.

About four Thingies an hundred thousand worlds ago, the most excellent Budha, who is infinitely wise

5.—Thingie is a number represented by a unit, followed with 64 cyphers others say, one hundred and forty.

6.—Buddhists have different ways of classifying the series of worlds which they suppose to succeed to each other, after the completion of a revolution of nature. As regards Budhas, who appear at unequal intervals for illuminating and opening the way to deliverance, to the then existing beings, worlds are divided into those which are favored with the presence of one or several Budhas, and those to which so eminent a benefit is denied. The present revolution of nature, which includes the period in which we live, has been privileged above all others. No less than five Budhas, like five shining suns, are to shoot forth rays of incomparable brilliancy, and dispel the mist of thick darkness that encompasses all beings, according to their respective laws of demerits. Of these five, four, namely, Kaukassan, Gaumagong, Kathaba, Gaudama, have already performed their great task. The fifth, named Aremideia, is as yet to come. The religion of Gaudama is to last 5,000 years, of which 2,408 are elapsed. The names of the 28 last Budhas are religiously preserved by Buddhists, together with their age, their stature, the names of the trees under which they have obtained the universal intelligence, their country, with the names of their father and mother, and those of their two chief disciples. Deinpakara occupies the fourth place in the series. He is supposed to have been eighty cubits high, and to have lived 100,000 years.

It is not without interest to examine whether there have existed Budhas, and far superior to the three orders of beings, the Brahmas, the Nats, and men, received at the feet of the Phra previous to the time of Gaudama, and whether the twenty-eight Budhas above alluded to, are to be considered as mithological beings who have never existed. It cannot be denied that mention of former Budhas is made in the earliest sacred records, but it seems difficult to infer therefrom that they are real beings. 1st. The circumstances respecting their extraordinary longevity, their immense stature, and the myriads of centuries that are supposed to have elapsed from the times of the first, to those of Gaudama, are apparently conclusive proofs against the reality of their existence. 2nd. The names of those personages are found mentioned in the preachings of Gaudama, together with those individuals with whom he is supposed to have lived and conversed during former existences. Who has ever thought of giving any credence to those fables? They were used by Gaudama, as so many means to give extension and solidity to the basis whereupon he intended to found his system. 3rd. There are no historical records or monuments that can give countenance to the opposite opinion. The historical times begin with Gaudama; whilst there exist historical proofs of the existence of the rival creed of Brahminism, anterior to the days of the acknowledged author of Buddhism.

It cannot be doubted that there existed in the days of Budha, in the valley of the Ganges and in the Punjab, a great number of philosophers who led a retired life, devoting their time to study, and the practice of virtue. Some of them occasionally salied out of their retreats to go and deliver moral instructions to the people. The fame that attended those philosophers, attracted round their lonely abodes, crowds of hearers, eager to listen to their lectures and anxious to place themselves under their direction, for learning the practice of virtue. In the pages of this Legend shall be found passages corroborating this assertion. Thence arose those multiform schools, where were elaborated those many systems, opinions, &c. for which India has been celebrated from the remotest antiquity. The writer has had the patience to read two works full of disputations, between Brahmins and Buddhist, as well as some books of the ethics of the latter: he has been astonished at finding that in those days, the art of arguing, disputing, defining, &c. had been carried to such a point of nicety, as almost to leave far behind the disciples of Aristotle. It has been said that the Gymnosophists whom Alexander the Great met in India, where Buddhist philosophers. But the particulars mentioned by Greek writers respecting their manners and doctrines, contradict such a supposition. They are described as living in a state of complete nakedness and as refusing to deliver instructions to the messenger of Alexander, unless he consented to strip himself of his clothes. On another hand, we know that Budha enjoined a strict modesty to his Religious, and in the book of ordinances, the candidate is at first asked whether he comes provided with his canonical dress. The Gymnosophists are represented as practising extraordinary austerities, and holding self destruction in great esteem. These and other practices are quite at variance with all the prescriptions of the Wini, or book of discipline. It is further mentioned that the Macedonian hero met with other philosophers living in community; but whether these were Buddhist or not, it is impossible to decide. It can be, scarcely, believed that Buddhism, in the days of Alexander, would have already invaded the countries which the Grecian army conquered.

7.—Nat in Pali means Lord. Its signification is exactly equivalent to that of Dewa, Dewata. The Nats are an order of beings in the Budistic Deipinkara the assurance that he would afterwards become himself a Budha. At this time he was a Rathee, under the name of Thoomeda. During that immense system, occupying six seats or abodes of happiness—placed in rising succession above the abode of man. They are spirits endowed with a body of so subtle and somewhat ethereal nature, as to be able to carry themselves, with the utmost rapidity, from their seats, to that of man, and vice versa. They play a conspicuous part in the affairs of this world, and are supposed to exercise a considerable degree of influence over man and other creatures. Fear, superstition and ignorance have peopled all places with Nats. Every tree, forest, fountain, village, and town has its protecting Nat. Some among the Nats having lost their high station, through misconduct, have been banished from their seats and doomed to drag a wretched existence, in some gloomy recesses. Their power for doing evil, is supposed to be very great. Hence the excessive dread for those evil genii, entertained by all Buddhists. A good deal of their commonest superstitious rites, have been devised for propitiating those enemies to all happiness, and averting the calamitous disasters which they seem to keep hanging over our heads.

Though the Nats worship is universal among the Buddhists of all nations, it is but fair to state that it is contrary to the principles of genuine Buddhism and repugnant to its tenets. It is probable that it was already existing among all the nations of Eastern Asia at the time they were converted to Buddhism.

The tribes that have not as yet been converted to Buddhism, have no other worship but that of the Nats. To mention but the principal ones, such as the Karens, the Khins and the Singphos, they may differ in the mode of performing their religious rites and superstitious ceremonies, but the object is the same, honoring and propitiating the Nats. This worship is so deeply rooted in the minds of the wild and half civilized tribes of Eastern Asia, that it has been, to a great extent, retained by the nations that have adopted Buddhism as their religious creed. The Burmans, for instance, from the king down to the lowest subject, privately and publicly indulge into the Nats worship. As to the tribes that have remained without the pale of Buddhism, they may be styled Nats worshippers. Hence, it may be inferred that, previous to the introduction, or the preaching of the tenets of the comparatively new religion in these parts, the worship of Nats was universal and predominating.

8.—Baci or Rathee means an hermit, a personage living by himself in some lonely and solitary recess, far from the contagious atmosphere of impure society, devoting his time to meditation and contemplation. His diet is of the coarsest kind, supplied to him by the forests he lives in; the skins of some wild animals afford him a sufficient dress. Most of those Rathees having reached an uncommon degree of extraordinary attainments, their bodies become spiritualised to an extent, which enables them to travel from place to place, by following anseri course. In all Buddhistic legends, comedies, &c., they are often found interfering in the narrated stories and episodes.

There is no doubt but these devotees who, in the days of Budha, spent their time in retreat, devoted to study, and meditation, were Brahmins. In support of this assertion, we have the highest possible native authority, the Institutes of Menoo, compiled probably during the eighth or ninth century before Christ. We find in that work minutely described, the mode of life space of time, he practised, in the highest degree, the ten great virtues, the five renouncings, and the three mighty works of perfections. Having become a great prince under the name of Wethandra, he reached the acme of self-abnegation and renunciation to all the things of this world. After his death, he migrated to Toocita the fourth abode of Nats. During his sojourn in that happy place, enjoying the fulness of pleasure allotted to the fortunate inhabitants of those blissful regions, a sudden and uncommon rumour, accompanied with an extraordinary commotion, proclaimed the gladdening tidings that a Phra was soon to make his appearance in this world.*

On hearing that a Phra was soon to make his appearance amongst men, all the Nats, peaceful inhabitants of the fortunate abode of Toocita, assembled in all haste and crowded around Phralaong, eagerly inquiring from him, becoming a true Brahmin. During the third part of his life, a Brahmin must live as an anchorite in the wood. Clad in the bark of trees or the skins of animals, with his hair and nails uncut, having no shelter whatever but that which is afforded him by the trees of the forest, keeping sometimes a strict silence, living on herbs and roots, he must train himself up to bearing with entire unconcern, the cold of winter, and the heat of summer.

Such is the course of life, according to the Vedas, which the true Brahmin is bound to follow during the third portion of his existence. Some Budhistic zealots have sometimes endeavored to emulate the ancient Rathees in their singular mode of life. It is not quite unfrequent in our days to hear of some fervent Phongies who, during the three months of lent, withdraw in solitude, to be more at liberty to devote their time to study and meditation. This observance, however, is practised by but very few individuals, and that too, with a degree of laxity that indicates a marked decline of the pristine fervor that glowed in the soul of primitive Buddhists.

9.—The three great works are:—the assistance afforded to his parents and relatives; the great offerings he had made, coupled with a strict observance of the most difficult points of the law, and benevolent dispositions towards all beings indiscriminately.

10.—This extraordinary monarch, called Tsakiwade, never makes his appearance during the period of time allotted to the publication and duration of the religious institutions of a Budha.

* Remark of the Burmese translator.—There are three solemn occasions, in which this great rumour is asked abroad. The first, when the Nats, guardians of this world, knowing that 100,000
hence, the end of this world is to come, show themselves amongst men, with their heads hanging down, a sorrowful countenance and tears streaming down their faces. They are clad in a red dress, and proclaim aloud to all mortals, the destruction of this planet, 100,000 years hence. They currently call upon men to devote themselves to the observance of the law, to the practice of virtue, the support of parents, and the respect due to virtuous personages. The second, when the same Nats proclaim to men that a 1,000 years hence, a Buddha or Phra will appear amongst them; and the third solemn occasion, is when they come and announce to men that within 100 years, there will be in this world a mighty Prince, whose unlimited sway shall extend over the four great islands.
Who was the fortunate Nat, to whom was reserved the signal honor of obtaining the incomparable dignity of Budha. The reason which directed their steps towards our Phralaong, and suggested their enquiry, was, that in him were already to be observed unmistakeable indices, foreshadowing his future greatness.

No sooner had it become known that this incomparable destination was to be his happy lot, than Nats from all parts of the world, resorted to the abode of Toocita to meet Phralaong and to congratulate him upon this happy occasion. Most glorious Nat, did they say to him, you have practised most perfectly the ten great virtues; the time is now come for you to obtain the sublime nature of Budha; during former existences, you have most rigidly attended to the observance of the greatest precepts and walked steadily in the path of the highest virtues; you sighed then after, and longed for, the happiness of Nats and Brahmas; but now you have most gloriously achieved the mightiest work, and reached the acme of perfection;

12.—Here I make use of the expression Phralaong, or more correctly Phralaong, to designate Budha before he obtained the supreme knowledge, when he was, as it were, slowly and gradually gravitating towards the centre of matchless perfection. In that state it is said of him that he is not yet ripe.

This word implies a meaning which ought to be well understood. No single expression in our language, can convey a correct idea of its import, and for this reason it has been retained through these pages. Maong is a derivative from the verb Laoing, which means to be in an incipient way, in a way of progression towards something more perfect. A Budha is at first a being in a very imperfect state; but passing through countless existences, he frees himself by a slow progress, from some of his imperfections; he acquires merits which enable him to rise in the scale of progress, science and perfection. In perusing the narrative of the five hundred and ten former existences of Gandalma, which have come down to us, we find that, when he was as yet in the state of animal, he styled himself Phralaong. The Burmese have another expression of similar import, to express the same meaning: they say of a being as yet in an imperfect condition, that he is soft, tender as an unripe thing; and when he passes to the state of perfection, they say that he is ripe, that he has blossomed and expanded. They give to understand that he who is progressing towards the Budhahship, has in himself all the elements constitutive of a Budha, laying as yet concealed in himself; but when he reaches that state, then all that had hitherto remained in a state of unripeness, bursts suddenly out of the bud and comes to full maturity. Similar expressions are often better calculated to give a clear insight into the true and real opinions of Buddhists, than a lengthened and elaborate dissertation could do.
it remains with you, but to aspire at the full possession of the supreme intelligence, which will enable you to open to all Brahmans, Nats and men, the way to the deliverance from those endless series of countless existences they are doomed to go through. Now the light of the law is extinguished, an universal darkness has overspread all minds. Men are, more than ever, slaves to their passions;
there is a total lack of love among them; they hate each other, keep up quarrels, strife and contentions, and mercilessly destroy each other. You alone can free them from the vicissitudes and miseries essentially connected with the present state of all beings. The time is at last come, when you are to become a Budha.

Unwilling to return instantly a positive answer, Phralaong modestly replied that he wanted some time, to enquire particularly into the great circumstances always attending the coming of a Budha in this world, viz: the epoch or time a Budha appears; the place he chooses for his apparition or manifestation; the race or caste he is to be born from; and the age and quality of her who is to be his mother. As regards the first circumstance, Phralaong observed that the apparition of a Budha could never take place during the previous period of 100,000 years and 13.—The 10 great virtu-os or duties are: liberality, observance of the precepts of the law, withdrawal in lonely places, wisdom, diligence, benevolence, patience, veracity, fortitude and indifference. The five renoueements are:

renouncing children, wife, goods, life and one's self.

14.—Metempsychosis is one of the fundamental dogmas of Buddhism.
That continual transition from one existence to another, from a state of hap-iness to one of unhappiness, and vice versa, forms a circle encompassing the Budhist in every direction. He is doomed to fluctuate incessantly on the never settled waters of existences. Hence his ardent wishes to be delivered from that most pitiable position, and his earnest longings for the ever tranquil state of Nirban, the way to which, Budha alone can teach him by his precepts, and his examples.

This dogma is common both to Brahmins and Budhists. The originator and propagator of the creed of the latter, found it already established; he had but to embody it with his own conceptions, and make it agree with his new ideas. His first teachers were Brahmins, and under their tuition, he learned that dogma, which may be considered as the basis on which hinge both systems. In fact the two rival creeds have a common object in view, the elevating of the soul from those imperfections, forced upon her by her connection with matter, and the setting her free from the sway of passions, above, that had just elapsed, because during that period the life or men was on the increase. The instructions on birth and death as well as on the miseries of life, which form the true characteristics of Budha's law, would not then be received with sufficient interest and attention. Should any attempt be made, at that time, to preach on these three great topics, men of those days to whom those great events would have appeared so distant, could not have been induced to look upon them with sufficient attention; the four great truths would have made no impression on their minds: vain and fruitless would have been the efforts to disentangle them from the ties of passions, then encompassing all beings, and make them sigh after the deliverance from the miseries, entailed upon mankind by birth, life and death. The period when human life is under a hundred years duration, cannot be at all the proper period which keep her always linked to this world. According to the votaries of both creeds, transmigration has for its object the effecting of those several purposes. There is a curious opinion among Buddhists respecting the mode of transmigrations, and there is no doubt it is a very ancient one, belonging to the genuine productions of the earliest Buddhism. Transmigration, they say, is caused and entirely controlled by the influence of merits and demerits, but in such a way that a being who has come to his end, transmits nothing of his entity to the being to be immediately reproduced. The latter is a being apart, independent of the former, created it is true by the influence of the late being's good or bad deeds, but having nothing in common with him. They explain this startling doctrine by the comparison of a tree successively producing and bearing fruits, of which some are good and some bad. The fruits though coming from the same tree, have nothing in common, neither with each other, nor with those that were previously grown, or may afterwards grow out of the same plant: they are distinct and separate. So, they say, kama, or the influence of merits and demerits, produces successively beings totally distinct one from the other. This atheistic or materialist doctrine is not generally known by the common people, who practically hold that transmigration is effectuated in the manner professed and taught by Pythagoras and his school.

If between the adherents to the two creeds, there is a perfect agreement respecting the means to be resorted to, for reaching the point when man becomes free from miseries, ignorance and imperfections, they fall at variance as to the end to be arrived at. The Brahmin leads the perfected being to the supreme essence, in which he is merged as a drop of water in the ocean, losing its personality, to form a whole with the Divine substance. This is Pantheism. The Buddhist, ignoring a supreme being, conquers the individual that has become emancipated from the thralldom of passions, to a state of complete isolation, called Nibban. This is, strictly speaking, Annihilation.
for such an important event, as the passions of men are then so many and so deeply rooted, that in vain Budha would attempt to preach his law. As the characters a man traces over the smooth superflcies of unruffled waters, instantly disappear, without leaving any mark behind, so the law and instructions that one would attempt to spread on the hardened hearts of men, would make no lasting impression upon them. Hence, he concluded that the present period, when the life of men was of about 100 years duration, was the proper one for the apparition of a Budha. This first point having been disposed of, Phralaong examined in what part of the globe, a Budha was to appear.

His regards glanced over the four great islands, and the 2,000 small ones. He saw that the island of Dzapou-

15.—The duration of a revolution of nature, or the time required for the formation of a world, its existence and destruction—is divided into four periods. The fourth period, or that which begins with the apparition of man on the earth, until its destruction, is divided into 64 parts called Andrakaps. During one Andrakap, the life of man increases gradually from 10 years, to an almost innumerable number of years; having reached its maximum of duration, it decreases slowly to its former short duration of 10 years. We live at present in that second part of an Andrakap when the life of man is on the decline and decrease. If my memory serve me right, we have reached at present the 9th or 10th Andraka of the fourth period. Should the calculation of Buddhists ever prove correct, the deluded visionaries, who look forward for an approaching Millenium, have still to wait long, ere their darling wishes be realized.

Though it be somewhat tiresome and unpleasant to have to write down the absurd and ridiculous notions Burmans entertain respecting the organization of matter, the origin, production, existence, duration and end of the world, it appears quite necessary to give a brief account, and sketch, an outline of their ideas on these subjects. The reader will then have the means of tracing up to their Hindu origin, several of the many threads that link Buddhism to Brahminism, and better understand the various details hereafter to be given, and intended for establishing a great fact, viz: the Brahmalical origin of the greatest part of the Budhisic institutions. He will, moreover, have the satisfaction of clearly discovering, buried in the rubbish of fabulous recitals, several important facts recorded in the holy Scriptures.

Matter is eternal; but its organization, and all the changes attending it, are caused and regulated by certain laws co-eternal with it. Both matter and the laws that act upon it, are self-existing, independent from the action and control of any being, &c. As soon as a system of worlds is constituted, Buddhists boldly assert and perseveringly maintain, that the laws of merits and demerits are the sole agents that regulate and control both the physical and moral world.
diba (the southern one) had always been the favorite place selected by all former Budhas: he fixed upon it, too, for

But how is a world brought into existence? Water or rather rain is the chief agent, operating in the reproduction of a system of nature. During an immense period of time, rain pours down, with an unabating violence, in the space left by the last world that has been destroyed. Meanwhile strong winds blowing from opposite directions, accumulate the water within definite and certain limits, until it has filled the whole space. At last appears on the supericies of water, floating like a greasy substance, the sediment deposited by water. In proportion as the water is being dried up, by the unremitting action of the wind, that crust increases in size, until, by a slow, gradual, but sure process it invariably assumes the shape and proportion of our planet, in the manner we are to describe. The centre of the earth, indeed of a world, or system of nature, is occupied by a mountain of enormous size and elevation, called Mienmo. This is surrounded by seven ranges of mountains, separated from each other by streams equaling in breadth and depth, the height of the mountain forming its boundaries in the direction of the central elevation. The range nearest to the Mienmo rises to half its height. Each successive range, is half the height of the range preceding it. Beyond the last stream, are disposed four great islands, in the direction of the four points of the compass. Each of these four islands is surrounded by five hundred smaller ones. Beyond those, there is water, reaching to the farthest limits of the world. The great island we inhabit, is the southern one, called Dzampoudipa, from the Jambu, or Eugenia tree, growing upon it.

Our planet rests on a basis of water double the thickness of the earth; the water itself is lying on a mass of ar, that has a thickness double that of water. Below this aerial stratum is laba, or vacuum.

Let us see now in what manner is our planet peopled, and whence came its first inhabitants. From the seats of Brahmas which were without the range of destruction when the former world perished, three celestial beings, or according to another version, six came on the earth, remaining on it in a state of perfect happiness, occasionally revisiting, when it pleased them, their former seats of glory. This state of things, lasts during a long period. At that time, the two great luminaries of the day and of the night, the stars have not as yet made their appearance, but rays of incomparable brightness emanating from the pure bodies of these new inhabitants, illuminate the globe. They feed at long intervals, upon a certain gelatinous substance, of such a nutritious power that the smallest quantity is sufficient to support them for a long period. This delicious food, is of the most perfect flavor. But it happens that at last, it disappears, and is successively replaced by two other substances, one of which, resembles the tender sprout of a tree. They are so nutritious and purified, that in our present condition, we can have no adequate idea of their properties. They too disappear, and are succeeded by a sort of rice called Tha-te. The inhabitants of the earth eat also of that rice. But alas! the consequences prove as fatal to them as the eating of the forbidden fruit proved to the happy denizens of Eden. The brightness that had hitherto encircled their bodies, and illuminated the world, vanishes away, and to their utmost dismay, they find themselves, for the first time, sunk into an abyss of unknown darkness. The eating of that coarse food creates faces and evacuations which, forcing their way out of the body, cause the appearance of what marks the distinction of the sexes.
himself. That island, however, is a most extensive one, measuring in length 300 youdzanas, in breadth 252, and in circumference 900. He knew that on that island, all

Passions, for the first time, burn and rage in the bosom of those hitherto passionless beings. They are deprived of the power to return to their celestial seats. Very soon jealousy, contentions, &c., follow in the train of the egotistical distinction of mine and thine. Finding themselves in the gloom of darkness, the unhappy beings sigh for, and long after, light; when, on a sudden, the sun, breaking down the barrier of darkness, burst out, rolling, as it were, in a flood of light, which illuminates the whole world; but soon disappearing in the west, below the horizon, darkness seemed to resume its hold. New lamentations and bewailings on the part of men, when in a short time, there arose majestically the moon, spreading its silvery and trembling rays of light. At the same time the planets and stars take their respective stations in the sky, and begin their regular revolutions. The want of settling arising disputes, is soon felt by the new inhabitants; they agree to elect a chief, whom they invest with a sufficient authority for framing regulations which are to be obligatory on every member of society, and power for enforcing obedience to those regulations. Hence the origin of society.

Men at first practising virtue enjoyed a long life, the duration of which reached to the almost incredible length of a Thingie. But having much relaxed in the practice of virtue, it lessened proportionately to their want of fervor in the observance of the law, until, by their extreme wickedness, it dwindled to the short period of ten years. The same ascending and descending scale of human life, successively brought in by the law of merit and demerit, takes place sixty-four times, and constitutes an Andrakap, or the duration of a world.

There remains to mention rapidly some particulars regarding the end of a revolution of nature. The cause of such an event, is the influence of the demerits prevailing to such an extent as to be all powerful in working out destruction. Two solemn warnings of the approaching dissolution of our planet are given by Nats, near 10^1,000, and the other 100 years before that event. The bearers of such sad news make their appearance on earth, with the marks of deep mourning, the best suited to afford additional weight to their exhortations. They earnestly call on men to repent of their sins and amend their lives. These last summons are generally heeded by all mankind, so that men, when the world is destroyed, generally migrate together with the victims of hell who have atoned for their past iniquities, to those seats of Brahmas that escape destruction. There are three great principles of demerit, concupiscence, anger and ignorance. The world also is destroyed by the action of three different agents, fire, water and wind. Concupiscence is the most common, though the less heinous of the three. Next come anger, less prevailing, though it is more heinous; but ignorance is by far the most fatal of all moral distempers. The moral disorder that is then prevailing, causes destruction by the agency that it sets in action. Concupiscence has for its agency fire, anger, water; ignorance, wind; but in the following proportion. Of sixty-four destructions of this world, fifty-six are caused by conflagration, seven by water, and one by wind. Their respective limits of duration stand as follows: conflagration reaches to the five lowest seats of Brahmas; water extends to the eighth seat, and the destructive violence of the wind is felt as far as the ninth seat.
former Budhas and semi Budhas, the two great Rahandas or disciples of the right and left, the prince whose sway is universal, &c., all of them had invariably fixed upon, and selected that island, and amidst the various countries on the island, that of Mitzima, the central one;
where is to be found the district of Kapilawot. Thither; said he, shall I resort, and become a Budha. Having de-determined the place he was to select for his terrestrial seat, Phralaong examined the race or caste from which he was to be born. The caste of the people and that of merchants appeared too low and much wanting in respectability, and moreover no Budha had ever come out therefrom. That of the Ponthas was in former times, the most illustrious and respected, but that of Princes; in those days, was far surpassing it in power and consideration. He therefore fixed his choice upon the caste of Princes, as the most becoming his future high calling. I choose, said he, prince Thoodeaudana for my father. As to the princess who is to become my mother, she must be distinguished by a modest deportment and chaste man-

16.—Our planet or globe is composed, according to Budhists, of the mountain Mien-mo, being in height 83,000 yootdzaas, (1 yootdzaa is according to some authorities equal to little less than 12 English miles,) above the surface of the earth, its depth is equal to its height. Around this huge and tall elevation, are disposed the four great islands, according to the four points of the compass; and each of these again is surround by 500 small islands. The countries south of the great chain of the Himalaya, are supposed to form the great island lying at the south.

It would be easy to give, at full length, the ridiculous notions entertained by Budhists of these parts, on geography and cosmography, &c., &c., but the knowledge of such heresies is scarcely worth the attention of a serious reader, who is anxious to acquire accurate information respecting a religious system, which was designed by its inventor, to be the vehicle of moral doctines, with but very few dogmas. Those speculations in this material world, have gradually found their place in the collection of sacred writings, but they are not part of the religious creed. They are of a Hindu origin, and convey Indian notions upon those various topics. These notions even do not belong to the system as expounded in the Vedas, but have been set forth at a comparatively modern epoch.

17.—A Rahanda is a being very far advanced in perfection, and gifted with high spiritual attainments which confer to his mortal frame certain distinguished prerogatives, becoming almost but spirits. Concupiscence is totally extinguished in a Rahanda; he may be said to be fit for the state Neihan. Several classes are assigned to Rahandas according to the various degrees of advancement in the way of perfection.
ners, without having ever tasted any intoxicating drink. During the duration of 100,000 worlds, she must have lived in the practice of virtue, performing with a scrupulous exactitude all the practices and observances prescribed by the law. The great and glorious princess Maia is the only person in whom all these conditions are to be found. Moreover, the period of her life shall be at an end ten months and seven days hence—she shall be my mother.

Having thus maturely pondered over these four circumstances, Phralaong turning to the Nats that surrounded him, anxiously expecting his answer, plainly and unreservedly told them that the time for his becoming Buddha had arrived, and bade them to communicate forthwith this great news to all the Brahmas and Nats. He rose up and accompanied by all the Nats of Toocita, withdrew into the delightful garden of Nandawon. After a short sojourn in that place, he left the abode of Nats, descended into the seat of men, and incarnated in the womb of the glorious Maia, who at once understood, she was pregnant with a boy who would obtain the Budhaship. On the same moment also, the princess Yathandara, who was to be the wife of the son of Maia, descended from the seats of Nats, and was conceived in the womb of Amitau, the wife of prince Thouppabudha.

At that time, the inhabitants of Kapilawot were busily engaged in celebrating, in the midst of extraordinary rejoicings, the festival of the constellation of Outarathan (July—August.) But the virtuous Maia, without mixing 18.—It is an unimpeachable decree that she on whom has been conferred the singular honor of giving birth to a mortal, who during the course of his existence is to become a Buddha, dies invariably seven days after her delivery, migrating to one of the delightful seats of Nats. The Burmese translator observes that a womb that has been, as it were, consecrated and sanctified by the presence of a child of so exalted a dignity, can never become afterwards the abode of less dignified beings. It must be confessed that the conception of Phralaong in his mother's womb, is wrapped up in a mysterious obscurity, which appears to exclude the idea of conjugal intercourse. The Cochin-Chinese in their religious legends pretend that Buddha was conceived and born from Maia in a wonderful manner, not resembling at all what takes place according to the order of nature.

amidst the crowds of those devoted to amusements, during the seven days that preceded the full moon of July, spent her time among her attendants, in making offerings of flowers and perfumes. The day before the full moon, she rose up at an early hour, bathed in perfumed water and distributed to the needy four hundred thousand pieces of silver; attired with her richest dress, she took her meal, and religiously performed all the pious observances usual on such occasions. This being done, she entered into her private apartment, and lying on her couch, fell asleep and had the following dream:

 Four princes of Nats of the abode of Tsadoomarit, took the princess with her couch, carried it to the mount Himawonta,17 and deposited it on an immense and magnificent rock, sixty youdzanas long, adorned with various colors, at the spot where a splendid tree, seven youdzanas high, extends its green and rich foliage. The four queens, wives of the four princes of Tsadoomarit, approaching the couch where Maia was reclining, took her to the banks of the lake Anawadat, washed her with the water of the lake and spread over the couch flowers brought from the abode of Nats. Near the lake is a beautiful mountain of a silvery appearance; the summit whereof is crowned with a magnificent and lofty palace. On the east of the palace, in the side of the mount, is a splendid cave. Within the cave a bed similar to that of the Nats, was prepared. The princess was led to that place, and sat on the bed, enjoying a delicious and refreshing rest. Opposite this mount, and facing the cave where Maia sat surrounded by her attendants, rose another mount, where Phralaong, under the shape of a young white elephant, was roaming over its sides, in various directions. He was soon seen coming down that hill and, ascending the one where the princess lay on her bed, directed his course towards the cave. On the extremity of his trunk, lifted up like a beautiful string of flowers, he carried a white lily. His voice occasionally resounding through the air, could be heard distinctly by the inmates of the grotto, and indicated his approach. He soon entered the cave, turned three times round the couch whereupon sat the princess, then standing for a while, he came nearer, opened her right side and appeared to conceal himself in her womb.

In the morning, having awoke from her sleep, the queen related her dream to her husband. King Thou-dodana sent without delay for sixty-four Pounhas. 20 On a ground lined with cow-dung, parched rice, flowers and other offerings were carefully deposited and profusely spread, an appropriate place was reserved for the Pounhas. Butter, milk and honey were served out to them in vases of gold and silver; moreover several suits of dress and five cows were offered to each of them as presents, as well as many other articles. These preliminaries being arranged, the prince narrated to them the dream, with a request for its explanation, 20.—Pounhas are the Brahmins who, even in those days of remote antiquity, were considered as the wisest in their generation. They had already monopolized the lucrative trade of fortune-tellers, astrologers, &c., and it appears that they have contrived to retain it up to our own days. During my first stay in Burmah, I became acquainted with a young Pounha, wearing the white dress, and getting his livelihood by telling the horoscopes of newly born infants, and even grown up people. I learned from him the mode of finding out by calculation the state of the heavens at any given hour. This mode of calculation is entirely based on the Hindu system, and has evidently been borrowed from that people.

Though Brahmins in those days, as in our own, worked on popular ignorance and credulity in the manner above mentioned, we ought not to lose sight of the great fact borne out by this legend in a most distinct and explicit way, that many among them devoted all their time, energies and abilities to the acquirement of wisdom, and the observance of the most arduous practices. Their austere mode of life, was to a great extent copied and imitated by the first Religious of the Buddhist persuasion. Many ordinances and prescriptions of the Wimi agree, to a remarkable degree, with those enforced by the Vedas. In the beginning, the resemblance must have been so great as to render the discrepancies scarcely perceptible, since we read in this very work, of an injunction made to the early converts, to bestow alms on the Pounhas, as well as on the Bickus or mendicant Religious, placing them both on a footing of perfect equality.
Prince, answered the Pounhas, banish from your mind all anxious thoughts, and be of a cheerful heart; the child whom the princess bears in her womb, is not a girl but a boy. He will, after growing up, either live amongst men and then become a mighty ruler whose sway all the human race will acknowledge; or, withdrawing from the tumult of society, he will resort to some solitary place, and there embrace the profession of Rahan. In that condition he will disentangle himself from the miseries attending existence, and at last obtain the high dignity of Budha. Such was the explanation of the dream. At the moment Phralaong entered into Maia's womb, a great commotion was felt throughout the four elements, and thirty-two wonders simultaneously appeared. A light of an incomparable brightness illuminated suddenly ten thousand worlds; the blind, desirous, as it were, to contemplate the glorious dignity of Phralaong, recovered their sight; the deaf heard distinctly every sound; the dumb spoke with fluency; those, whose bodies were bent, stood up in an erect position; the lame walked with ease and swiftness; prisoners saw their fetters unloosed, and found themselves restored to liberty, the fires of hell were extinguished; the ravenous cravings of the Preithas were satiated; animals were exempt from all infirmities; all rational beings uttered but words of peace, and mutual benevolence; horses exhibited signs of an excessive joy; elephants with a solemn and deep voice, expressed their contentment; musical instruments resounded of themselves with the most melodious harmony; gold and silver ornaments worn at the arms and feet, without coming in contact, emitted pleasing sounds; all places became suddenly filled with a resplendent light; refreshing breezes blew gently all over the earth; abundant rain poured from the skies during the hot season, and springs of cool water burst out in every place, carrying through prepared beds, their gently murmuring streams; birds of the air stood still, forgetting their usual flight; rivers suspended their course, seized with a mighty astonishment; sea water became fresh; the five sorts of lilies were to be seen in every direction; every description of flowers burst open, displaying the richness of their brilliant colors; from the branches of all trees, and the bosom of the hardest rocks, flowers shot forth exhibiting all around the most glowing, dazzling and varied hues; lilies seemingly rooted in the canopy of the skies, hung down scattering their embalmed fragrance; showers of flowers poured from the firmament on the surface of the earth; the musical tunes of the Nats, were heard by the rejoiced inhabitants of our globe; hundred thousands of worlds suddenly approached each other, sometimes in the shape of an elegant nosegay, sometimes in that of a ball of flowers, or of a spheroid; the choicest essences embalmed the whole atmosphere that encompasses this world. Such are the wonders that took place at the time Phralaong entered his mother's womb.

When this great event happened, four chiefs of Nats from the seat of Tsadoomarat, armed with swords, kept an uninterrupted watch round the palace, to avert any accident that might prove hurtful to the mother or her blessed fruit. From 10,000 worlds, four Nats from the same seat, were actively engaged in driving away all Bilous and other monsters and forcing them to flee and 22.—In the Budhistic system of cosmogony, 100,000 worlds form one system, subject to the same immutable changes and revolutions which affect this one which we inhabit. They admit indeed that the number of worlds is unlimited, but they assert that those forming one system are simultaneously destroyed, reproduced and perfected by virtue of certain eternal laws inherent in matter itself.

21.—Tsadoomarat is the first of the six abodes of Nats. The description of the pleasures enjoyed by the inhabitants of that seat, is replete with accounts of the grossest licentiousness.

24.—A Palou, or rather Bilou, is a monster with a human face, supposed to feed on human flesh. His eyes are of a deep red hue, and his body of so subtle a nature as never to project any shadow. Wonderful tales are told hide themselves at the extremity of the earth. Maia free from every disordered propensity, spent her time with her handmaids in the interior of her apartments. Her soul enjoyed in a perfect calm, the sweetest happiness; fatigue and weariness never affected her unimpaired health. In his mother's womb, Phralaong appeared like the white thread passed through the purest and finest pearls; the womb itself resembled an elegant Dzedi. 25

With the solicitous care and vigilant attention one carries about a thabei 26 full of oil, the great Maia watched of this monster, which plays a considerable part in most of the Buddhist writings.

25.—A Dzedi is a religious edifice of a conical form, supported on a square basis, and having its top covered with what the Burmese call an umbrella, resembling in its shape the musical instrument vulgarly called Chapeaux chinois, by the French. On each side of the quadrangular basis, are opened four niches, in the direction of the four cardinal points, destined to receive statues of Buddha. This monument is of very different size, from the smallest, a foot high, to the tallest, of one or two hundred feet high. It is to be seen in every direction, and in the neighbourhood of towns every elevation is crowned with one or several Dzedis.

The word Dzedi means a sacred depository, that is to say, a place where relics of Buddha were enshrined. The word has been extended since to places which had become receptacles of the scriptures, or of the relics of distinguished religious, who had acquired eminence by their scientific and moral attainments. In the beginning, these Dzedis were a kind of tomsul, or mounds of earth or bricks, erected upon the shrine wherein relics were enclosed. In proportion as the followers of the Buddhist faith increased in number, wealth and influence, they erected Dzedis on a greater scale, bearing always a great resemblance in shape and form to the primitive ones. The Stupas or Topes discovered in the Punjab, and in other parts of the Indian Peninsula, were real Buddhist tumuh or Dzedis.

During succeeding ages, when relics could not be procured, the faithful continued to erect Dzedis, intended, by their sight, to remind them of the sacred relics, and they paid to those relics and monuments the same veneration as they would have offered to those enriched with these precious objects. In Burmah, in particular, the zeal or rather the rage for building Dzedis, has been carried to a degree scarcely to be credited, by those who have not visited that country. In the following pages, there will be found an attempt at describing the various forms given to these monuments.

26.—The Thabei is an open mouthed pot, of a truncated spheroidal form, made of earth, iron or brass, without ornaments, used by the Buddhist

* Remark of the Burmese Translator — It is to be borne in mind that the mothers of Buddhas, having and the singular privilege of giving birth to a child of so exalted a dignity, it would not be convenient or becoming, that other mothers should receive life in the same womb, they therefore always die seven days after their delivery and migrate to the abode of Nats, called Tocotia. It is usual with other mothers to be delivered lying in an horizontal position, and sometimes before or after the tenth month. But with the mother of a Buddha, the case is not the same; the time of her confinement invariably happens at the beginning of the tenth month, and she is always delivered in an erect and vertical position.
all her movements, and during ten months, unremittingly laboured for the safe preservation of the precious fruit of her womb.

Chapter II.

Birth of Budha in a forest—Rejoicings on that occasion—Kaladewila—Prediction of the Pounhas—Vain efforts of Thoudodana, to thwart the effect of the Prediction.

The time of her approaching confinement being close at hand, the princess solicited from her husband, king Thoudodana, leave to go to the country of Dewah, amongst her friends and relatives. As soon as her request was made known, the king ordered that the whole extent of the road between Kapilavot and Dewah should be perfectly levelled and lined, on both sides, with plantain trees, and adorned with the finest ornaments. Jars full of the purest water, were to be deposited all along the road at short intervals. A chair of gold was made monks when going abroad, in their morning excursions, to receive the alms bestowed on them by the admirers of their holy mode of life.

This country of Dewah is one of the 16 countries so celebrated in the Budhistic annals, where the greatest religious events have taken place. They are placed in the centre, north and northwest portions of Hindostan. In this place was born the celebrated Dewadat, who became brother-in-law to Budha himself. But notwithstanding the close ties of relationship that united him to so saintly a personage, Dewadat is represented as the incarnation of evil, ever opposed to Budha in his benevolent designs in favor of human kind. At last, in an attempt against his brother-in-law's life, he met with a condign punishment. The earth burst open under his feet; and surrounded by devouring flames, he rolled down to the bottom of the lowest hell, acknowledging however, with the accents of a true but tardy repentance, his errors and the unconquerable power of Budha. Three red hot iron bars transfixed him perpendicularly, hanging him in an erect position, whilst three other bars pierce him through the shoulders and the side. For his repentance, he is to be delivered hereafter from those torments and restored to earth for acquiring merits that may entitle him to a better place in future existences. Some accounts mention that he is to become a Pietzsaga Budha. This story respecting Dewadat, has given rise in Burmah, to a very strange misconception. The Burmese with their usual thoughtlessness, on hearing of the particulars respecting the sufferings and mode of death of our Saviour, concluded that he must have been no other personage but Dewadat himself, and that, for holding opinions opposite to those of Budha, he suffered such a punishment. The writer was not a little surprised to find in the writings of the old Barnabite Missionaries, a lengthened refutation of this erroneous supposition.
ready for conveying the queen: and a thousand noblemen, attended by an innumerable retinue, were directed to accompany her during the journey. Between the two countries an immense forest of lofty Engyin trees extends at a great distance. As soon as the cortege reached it, the five water lilies shot forth spontaneously from the stem and the main branches of each tree; innumerable birds of all kinds by their melodious tunes, filled the air with the most ravishing music. Trees similar in beauty to those growing in the seats of Nats, apparently sensible of the presence of the incarnated Budha, seemed to share in the universal joy.

On beholding this wonderful appearance of all the lofty trees of the forest, the queen felt a desire to approach nearer and enjoy the marvellous sight offered to her astonished regards. Her noble attendants led her forth with at a short distance into the forest. Maia seated on her couch, along with her sister Patzpati, desired her attendants to have it moved closer to an Engyin tree, (shorea robusta,) which she pointed out. Her wishes were immediately complied with. She then rose gently on her couch; her left hand clasped round the neck of her sister, supported her in a standing position. With the right hand she tried to reach and break a small branch, which she wanted to carry away. On that very instant, as the slender rattan, heated by fire, bends down its tender head, all the branches lowered their extremities, offering themselves, as it were, to the hand of the queen, who unhesitatingly seized and broke the extremity of one of the young boughs. By virtue of a certain power inherent in her dignity, on a sudden all the winds blew gently throughout the forest. The attendants having desired all the people to withdraw to a distance, disposed curtains all round the place the queen was standing on. Whilst she was in that position, admiring the slender bough she held in her hands, the moment of her confinement happened, and she was delivered of a son. *

* On that same day, a son was born to Amisandana, called Ananda. The wife of Thongpech.
Four chief Brahmases received the new born infant on a golden net-work, and placed him in the presence of the happy mother, saying: "give yourself up, O Queen, to joy and rejoicing, here is the precious and wonderful fruit of your womb."

From the hands of the four chiefs of Brahmases, four... chiefs of Nats received the blessed child, whom they handed over to men, who placed him on a beautiful white cloth. But to the astonishment of all, he freed himself from the hands of those attending upon him, and stood in a firm and erect position on the ground; casting then a glance towards the east, more than one thousand worlds appeared like a perfectly levelled plain. All the Nats inhabiting those worlds, made offerings of flowers and perfumes, exclaiming with exultation: "an exalted personage has made his appearance,—who can ever be compared to him; who has ever equalled him? He is indeed the most excellent of all beings." Phralaong looked again towards the three other directions. Lifting up his eyes above and then lowering them down, he saw that there was no being equal to him. Conscious of his superiority, he jumped over a distance of seven lengths of a foot, in a northern direction, exclaiming:—"this is my last birth—there shall be to me no other state of existence: I am the greatest of all beings." He then began to walk

29.—The Chinese, Cochin-Chinese, Singhalese and Nepaulose Legends all agree in attributing to Phralaong to use of reason from the moment he was born, as well as the power of uttering with a proud accent, the following words: "I am the greatest of all beings; this is my last existence." To his own eyes he must have appeared in this world without any competitor, since he knew already that he was destined to release countless beings from the trammels of existence, and lead them to a state of perfect rest, screened for ever from the incessant action of merits and demerits. He alone, whose mind is deeply imbued with Buddhist notions, can boast exclamingly that at last he has arrived at his last existence, and that, within a few years, he will escape out of the whirlpool of endless existences, wherein he has been turning and fluctuating from a state of happiness to one of wretchedness. This perpetual vicissitude is to him the greatest evil, the opposite of which is, therefore, the greatest good. No wonder, then, to hear our Phralaong, who was better acquainted with the miseries attending existence than any one else, exclaiming with the accents of a complete joy:—this is my last existence.

The Burmese translator seems delighted to remark that on two former occasions, Phralaong, then an infant, had spoken distinct words which he addressed to his mother. This happened in the beginning of the two existences during which he practised two of the ten great virtues. It took place first, on the day he was born to that existence, when under the name of Mahanthata, he displayed consummate skill and wisdom. The legend of Mahanthata is a very amusing performance, written in a very pure language, and relating stories about as credible as those we read in the Arabian Tales of A Thousand and One Nights. What surprised the writer, not a little, was steadily in the same direction. A chief of Brahmas held over his head the white umbrella. A Nat carried the golden fan. Other Nats held in their hands the golden sword, the golden slippers, the cope set with the rarest precious stones and other royal insignia.*

Thirty-two mighty wonders had proclaimed the incarnation of Phralaong in his mother's womb, and the same number of wonders announced his birth to the earth. Moreover, in that same moment, were born the beautiful Yathaudra, the son of Amitaudana, Ananda, the noblemen Tsanda, Kaludari, and the horse Kantika. The great tree Bodhi also sprung from the ground, in the forest of Oorouwela, about two youdzanas distant from the city of Radzagio, and in a north-east direction from that place, and the four golden vases suddenly re-appeared.

The inhabitants of Dewah joining those of Kapilawot, to find, in persuading that composition, a decision given by our Mahauthata, in a case perfectly similar to that which showed out, in the presence of all Israel, the incomparable wisdom of Solomon. When Phralaong practised the last and most perfect of virtues, liberality, carried to its farthest limits ending in perfect abnegation of self, and renouncing all that he possessed, he entered too into this world with the faculty of speech, and became a prince under the name of Wetandra. The legend of Wetandra is by far the best of all. Taking it as a mere romance, it is replete with circumstantial details well calculated to excite the finest emotions of the heart. The latter part, in particular, can scarcely be read without sharing in the heart-moving feelings of pity and commiseration on beholding our Phralaong parting willingly with all his property, with his wife and his lovely children, and finally offering his own person, to satisfy the ever renewed calls on his unbounded generosity.

30.—In Burma, the use of the white umbrella is limited to the king and idols. The former can never move without having some one to hold over his head this distinguishing mark of royalty. Any one who has been introduced in the palace of Anerapoora, will not have forgotten how great was his satisfaction on beholding the white umbrella towering above the sides of passages and moving in the direction he was sitting in. He knew that the time of his expectation was at an end, and that in a moment, he would behold the golden face.

* Remarks of the Burmese Translator—On the former existence, our Phralaong is said to have spoken a few words immediately after his birth, viz: when he was Mahauthata and Wetandra. On the first, he came into this world holding in his hands a small plan, which a Nat had brought and placed in his tender hands, at that very moment. He showed it to his mother who asked him what it was. This is a medicinal plant, replied he, to his astonished mother. The plant was cast into a large jar full of water and the virtualised liquid even retained the power of curing every kind of bodily discontent. When he was born or rather began the existence in which he was called Wetandra, he stretched out his hands asking something from his mother which he might between the, needs. The mother got at his disposal one thousand pieces of s.ges.
set out for the latter country with the newly born infant, to whom they rendered the greatest honors. The Nats of the seat of Tawadeinth, on hearing that a son was born to King Thoodaudana, and that under the shade of the tree Bodi, 31 he would become a true Budha with a perfect knowledge of the four great truths, gave full vent to their boundless joy, hoisting unfurled flags and banners in every direction, in token of their indescribable rejoicings.

There was a celebrated Rathee, named Kaladewewila, who had passed through the eight degrees of contemplation, and who was in the habit of resorting daily to the Prince's palace, for his food. On that very day, having as usual taken his meal, he ascended to the seat of Tawadeinth 32 and found the fortunate inhabitants of that seat, giving themselves up to uncommon rejoicings. He ask-

31.—In glancing over the genealogy of the twenty-eight last Budhas, the writer has observed that every Budha has always obtained the supreme intelligence under the shadow of some tree. Our Phralaong, as will be seen hereafter, attained to the exalted dignity of Budha, under the tree Baudhi, (sacred religion,) which grew up spontaneously at the same moment he was born. The writer has never been able to discover any well-grounded reason to account for this remarkable circumstance, so carefully noted down, relating the particulars attending the elevation of a being to this high station. For want of a better one, he will be permitted to hazard the following conjecture. Our Phralaong previous to his becoming a Budha, withdrew into solitude for the purpose of fitting himself for his future calling, in imitation of all his predecessors, leading an ascetic life, and devoting all his undivided attention and mental energies to meditation and contemplation, coupled with works of the most rigorous mortification. The senses, he knew well, were to be submitted to the uncontrolled sway of reason, by allowing to himself but what was barely requisite for supporting nature. Regardless of every comfort, his mind was bent upon acquiring the sublime knowledge of the principle and origin of all things, in fathoming the histories of all beings, and in endeavoring to discover the most efficacious means of affording them a thorough relief, by pointing out to them the road they had to follow in order to disentangle themselves from the trammels of existence, and arriving at a state of perfect rest. In common with all other ascetics, our Phralaong had no other shelter against the inclemency of the seasons, but the protecting shadow of trees. It was under the cooling and refreshing foliage of the trees of the forests, that he spent his time in the placid and undisturbed work of meditation, acquiring gradually that matchless knowledge and consummate wisdom he needed for carrying on, to perfection, the benevolent undertaking he had in contemplation.

32.—It is a maxim generally received amongst Buddhists, that he who has far advanced in the way of perfection, acquires extraordinary privileges both ed them the reason of such an unusual display of enrapturing transports of exultation. It is, replied they to the enquiring Rathee, because a son is born to King Thoodaudana, who will soon become a true Budha. Like all former Budhas, he will preach the law and exhibit in his person and throughout his life, the greatest wonders and a most accomplished pattern of the highest virtues. We will hear the law from his very mouth.

On hearing the answer of the Nats, Kaladewila immediately left the seat of Tawadeinthu, and directed his aerial course towards the palace of Thoodaudana. Having entered into the palace and occupied the place prepared for him, he conveyed to the King the good tidings of a son having been born unto him.

A few days after this message, the royal child was brought into the presence of his rejoicing father. Kaladewila was present on the occasion. Thoodaudana ordered that the child should be attired with the finest dress, and placed in the presence of the Rathee, in order to pay him his respects. But the child rose up and set his two feet on the curled hairs of the venerable personage. The persons present on the occasion, not knowing that a Budha in his last existence, never bows down to any being, thought that the head of the imprudent child, would be split into seven parts, as a punishment for his unbecoming behaviour. But Kaladewila rising up from his seat, and lifting up his hands to the forehead, bowed respectfully to the infant Phralaong. The King, astonished at such an unusual condescension from so eminent a persoin his soul and in his body. The latter obtains a sort of spiritualized nature, or rather matter becomes so refined and purified, that he is enabled to travel over distances, with almost the rapidity of the thought of the mind. The former, by the help of continual meditation on the causes and nature of all things, aggrandizes incessantly its sphere of knowledge. The remembrance of the past revives in the mind. From the lofty position such a being is placed in, he calmly considers and watches the movement of events that will take place in future times. The more his mind expands, and the sphere of his knowledge extends, the greater are the perfections and refinements attending the coarser part of his being.

By virtue of his great spiritual attainments, Kaladewila could recollect at once all that had taken place during the forty preceding worlds, and foresee all that would happen during the same number of future revolutions of nature. On seeing the high perfections shining forth in our Phralaong, he considered attentively whether he would become a Buddha, or not. Having ascertained that such a dignity was reserved for him, he wished to know if the remaining period of his own existence, would permit him to witness the happy moment when he would be a Buddha. To his deep regret, he foresaw that the end of his life would come before the occurrence of that great event, and that he would have then migrated to one of the seats of Arupa, and be, therefore, deprived of the favor of hearing the law from his mouth. This foresight caused a profound sadness in his heart, and abundant tears flowed from his eyes. But when he reflected on the future destiny of the blessed child, he could not contain within himself the pure joy that overflowed his soul. The people present on the occasion, soon remarked the opposite emotions which alternately affected the soul of Kaladewila. They asked him the reason of such an unusual occurrence. I rejoice, said he, at the glorious destiny of that child; but I feel sad and disconsolate, on thinking that it will not be given to me, to see and contemplate him, clothed with the dignity of Buddha; I bewail with tears my great misfortune.

With a view of assuaging his sorrow, Kaladewila, casting another glance towards future events, eagerly sought to discover, if, among his relatives, there would not be at least one, who would be so fortunate as to see Phralaong in the nature of Buddha. He saw with inexpressible delight that his nephew, Nalaka, would enjoy the blessing denied to himself. Thereupon, he went in all haste to his sister's house, enquiring about her son. At his request, the lad was brought into his presence. Beloved nephew, said the venerable Rathee, thirty-five years hence, the son of King Thoodaudana will become a Budha; you will contemplate him in that sublime and exalted nature. From this day, therefore, you shall embrace the profession of Rahan. The young man who descended from a long succession of wealthy noblemen, said within himself: my uncle, indeed, never says anything but under the impulse of irresistible and cogent motives. I will follow his advice and will become a Recluse. He immediately ordered the purchase of the insignia of his new profession, a patta, a thingan, and other articles. His head

33.—According to the prophecy of Kaladewila, Phrulaong is to become Budha when thirty-five years old. The total duration of his life being eighty years, it follows that he has lived as Budha forty-five years. The advice of the old Rathee to his nephew Nalaka, to become a Rahan for better disposing himself to welcome the coming of Budha, and listening with greater benefit to his preachings, leads me to make a remark and write down an observation that has been already alluded to. From this passage and many others which the reader will easily notice hereafter, as well as from the example of Budha himself, one must suppose that at the time Phrulaong was born, some institutions, the most important one at least, viz.: that of the Rahans, Recluses, or Monks, already existed in a more or less perfect state. Relying solely on the authority of this Legend, no attempt at denying this supposition can ever be made. Kaladewila speaks of the order of Rahans as of a thing well known. Nalaka sends to the bazaar for the purchase of the dress and other articles he wanted for his new mode of life. Phrulaong on his way to his garden, sees a Rahan, whose habits and manners are described to him by his coachman. Having become Budha, he meets withAscetics and Recluses living in community, leading a life much resembling that which he is supposed to have hereafter instituted, holding but few opinions, which, according to his own standard, were heretical. From these facts, flows the natural conclusion that Gaudama is not the inventor or originator of all the Budhistic disciplinary institutions. He found among the multifarious sects of Brahminism, many practices and ordinances which he approved of, and incorporated or embodied in his new system. This is another proof, amounting to a demonstration, that Budhism is an offshoot of the great Hindu system. On this respect, Gaudama borrowed largely from what he found existing in his own days, in the schools he resorted to, and re-echoed many tenets upheld by the masters under whom he studied sciences and the training up to morals and virtue. He enlarged and developed certain favourite theories and principles, which had found favor with him; at the same time, for the purpose of leading his disciples to perfection, he enforced many disciplinary regulations, almost similar to those he had been subjected to, during the years of his probation. He was certainly an ardent promoter of the perfected and improved system he endeavors to introduce.

34.—The Thingan or Taewarum is composed of three parts,—the thinning, resembling an ample petticot, bound up to the waist, with a leathern girdle, was shaved and he put on the yellow garb. Attired in his new dress, he looked all round and saw that amongst all beings, the Rahans are by far the most excellent. Then turning toward the place Phralaong occupied, he prostrated himself five successive times in that direction, rose up, placed the patta in its bag, threw it over his shoulder, and directed his steps towards the solitude of Himawonta, where he devoted himself to all the exercises of his profession. At the time Phralaong became a Buddha, our hermit went to that great master, learnt from him the works that lead to the state of perfect stability of mind, returned back to his solitude, and attained to the perfection of Rahanda by the practice of the eminent works. Seven months after his return, the end of his existence arrived, when, disentangled from all the ties that had hitherto kept him in the world of passions, he reached the happy state of Neibban.

CHAPTER III:

A name is given to the child,—Prediction of the Pekhias respecting the child,—Death of Maia,—Miraculous occurrence at the child’s cradle,—adolescence of the Phralaong,—He sees the four Signs,—Return from the garden to the royal city.

Five days after the birth of Phralaong, took place the ceremony of washing the head and giving him a name. In the apartment of the palace, several kinds of perfumed wood and essences, such as sandal wood, lignum, aloes, camphor, &c., were strewed profusely, as well as the most exquisitely scented flowers and parched rice. The noga-na (a sort of beverage made of milk, sugar and honey) was prepared in great abundance. One hundred and eighty Pouhas the most versed in the science of astrology, were invited to partake of a splendid entertainment in the palace. The king made to every one of them costly presents, and desired them to examine carefully all the signs, prognosticating the future destiny of his son. Amidst that crowd of soothsayers, eight Pouhas had been present and explained the dream that Maia had in the beginning of her pregnancy. Seven of them lifting up the index of each hand of the child, were amazed at the won-

The hairs of the head and the beard being too often objects which vanity turns to its own purposes; are, to say the least, mere superfluities. A stern contemner of worldly things, must of course, do away with things which may prove temptations to him, or at least afford him unnecessary trouble. Hence no layman can ever aspire to become a Bahan, unless he has previously submitted to the operation of a complete shaving of the head, including even the eyebrows.

32.—Which of the two systems, Buddhism or Brahminism, is the most ancient? This is a question which learned Orientalists have in former days variously answered. If, however, some credit is to be given to this Legend, and the hero thereof is to be regarded as the author of Buddhism, the solution of that much controverted question is comparatively easy and seems to admit of no doubt. Priority of antiquity is decidedly in favor of Brahminism. At the time Buddha was born, and in his own country, we find already subsisting the great politico-religious fabric of Hinduism. The distinction of caste is already mentioned in several passages. We find the Pouhas or Brahmans already monopolizing the lucrative trade of soothsaying, and regarded as the best informed among their countrymen. They are treated with great respect and consideration even by proud monarchs, who testify their regard for them by costly presents, and every possible mark of distinction. It is true that their caste is not always spoken of with great regard by Buddhist authors; but this is to be attributed to the deadly enmity that has at a later period, prevailed between those two great rival sects, which have so long struggled for supremacy over the Indian Peninsula. The Brahminical creed is spoken of in very disparaging terms by Buddhists; and as a matter of course, they have been reciprocally handled severely by their opponents. To those who feel inclined to regard Buddha as but a great reformer of a religious system already existing, the question will not appear cleared of all difficulty. But upon them rests the task of establishing on uncontroverted grounds, their hypothesis, ere any serious attention can be paid to the conclusion they would fain infer in favor of the superior antiquity of Buddhism. As for us, we believe Buddha to be the real author of the great religious system under examination. But at the same time, we readily concede that many elements found existing in those days, were seized upon by Buddha, and skillfully arranged so as to harmonize well with his plans.

36.—Superstition and ignorance seem to have been in all ages and under derful signs their eyes met. If this child, said they, remain in the society of men, he will become a mighty ruler that will bring all nations under his sway; but if he embrace the profession of Rechse, he will certainly become a Budha. They began to foretell the incomparable glory and high honors that would attend his universal reign. The eighth Pounha, named Kauntagnia, the descendant of the celebrated son of Thoodata, and the youngest of all, raised up the index of one hand of the child. Struck with the wonderful and unmistakable signs that forced themselves on his view, he exclaimed: no! this child will not remain long in the society of men; he will free himself from the vicissitudes and miseries attending the existence of all beings, and will finally become a Budha. As the child was to be the instrument for promot-

Every climate, the prolific source of human follies and mental delusions. Man has always been and will ever be the same ridiculously superstitious being, as long as his mind is left to itself, unenlightened by revelation. With few exceptions, the greatest men of Italy and Greece were as superstitious, as the Vulgars, to whom, in every other respect, they were so superior. The resemblance error bears to truth, when human passions have some interest at stake, deceives many; under deceitful appearances, it finds its way to the mind, and then clings to the heart. There is in man an innate desire of tearing asunder the thick veil that hides from him the knowledge of future events. Unable to comprehend the perfect economy of an all-wise Providence, in the disposition and management of the affairs of this world, he has recourse to the most absurd means for satiating the cravings of his inordinate curiosity. Hence the prevailing superstition of those days, which induced men to believe that Brahmins, on inspecting the inner part of the hand, could discover certain signs, foreboding the good or bad destiny of every individual.

37.—Metempsychosis or the transmigration of the soul from one state of existence into another, in the same world, is one of the leading dogmas of Budhism. Many passages of the present work, or rather the whole of the Budhistic system, can never be understood, unless this tenet be always borne in mind. It is by passing through countless existences, that a being is slowly purified of his imperfections and gradually advances in the way of merits and perfection. The sacred writings of Budhists mention that our Phralaong had to range during innumerable existences, the whole series of the animal kingdom, from the dove to the elephant, ere he could be born in the state of man, when, in this condition, he, as stated by himself, went often into hell, to atone for certain trespassings. Pythagoras had, likely, borrowed and received directly or indirectly from the East, this doctrine, which his school re-echoed throughout Greece and Italy. The end of metempsychosis is, according to Budhists, the state of Nibbhan. On this point the author of Buddhism has been at variance with other religious ing the welfare and merits of all mortals, they gave him the name of Theiddat.

Seven days after her confinement, Maia died, and by the virtue of her merits migrated to the seat of Toocita, and became the daughter of a Nat.* Her death was not the result of her delivery, but she departed this world, because the term of her life had come. On their return to their home, the Pounhas assembled their children and said to them: —we are already advanced in years. We dare not promise to ourselves, that we will ever see the son of King Thoodaudana, become a Budha. But to you such a favor is reserved; listen respectfully to all his instructions and endeavour to enter the profession of Rahan without delay, and withdraw into solitude. Let us also all join you in that holy vocation. Three Pounhas, refused the invitation, and would not enter the profession.
The five others cheerfully gave up every thing and became distinguished members of the ascetic body.

King Thoodaudana hearing of the explanation given by the Pounhas, enquired whether his son was really to become a Rahan. Having been assured that all the signs predicted the future destiny of his son to such a calling, he desired to know what those signs were. He was told that the four following things were the very signs fore-showing the future career of his son, viz: —an old man, a sick man, a dead man, and a Recluse. 38 As soon as his schools, which in his own days held and professed the dogma of transmigra-tion.

38.—The three first allegorical omen or signs which, according to the foretelling of the Pounhas, were to be seen and observed hereafter by Phrahaong, are designed to mean and express the compound of all miseries attending human existence, from the moment man crosses the threshold of life, to that of death. The view of these objects was intended to make him disgusted with a state necessarily accompanied with such an amount of wretchedness. He was soon induced by reflection to hold in contempt the

* Maia was confined in the beginning of the third age. This expression is rather a very loose and general one, and is far from precise in its meaning, although the age of Maia's brand, when she was delivered of her son—the age of man—is divided into three parts. The first extends from the birth, to the 5th or 6th year; the second goes to the 35th year or about, and the third, from the 45th year to the end of life. Phrahaong was born on the 6th year of the Eiauana era, on the 6th after the full moon of the month Kaeoong. Maia was therefore 56 years old. The author of this work, strives hard to prove this the age, apparently advanced of Maia, was the best fitted for securing the safety and perfection of the fruit of her womb.
son would have successively remarked those four signs, he would immediately come to the conclusion that the state of Rahan, is alone worthy of the warm admiration and eager wishes of a wise man.

King Thoodaudana who ardently wished to see his son become a great monarch, whose sway would extend over the four great islands, and the two thousand smaller ones, gave the strictest orders that none of the four omens should ever meet his eyes. Guards were placed in every direction, at distances of a mile, charged with but one care, that of keeping out of his son’s sight, the appearance of those fatal omens.

things of this world, and consequently to seek with ardor some means of estranging himself from all visible and material objects. The fourth sign, that is to say, the view of a Rahan, or a contemner of this world, aspiring to the perfect disengagement from the trammel of passions, and shaping his course towards Nibban, was the very pattern he had to imitate and follow for arriving to that state of perfection, he felt a strong, though somewhat as yet confused, desire of possessing.

The Nats or Dewatas are the ever ready ministers for affording to Phralaong the assistance he requires for reaching in safety the Budhaship. They rejoice at the news of his approaching conception in the womb of Maia :
they watch over the mother who is to give birth to so blessed a child: they receive the newly born infant and hand over to men: they baffle by their almost supernatural power, the obstacles which the worldly minded Thoo-daudana tries to throw in the way of his son’s vocation; in a word, their angelical ministrations are always at hand for helping and protecting our Phralaong, and enabling him to reach that state wherein he shall be fully qualified for announcing to men the law of deliverance. The belief in the agency of angels between heaven and earth, and their being the messengers of God for conveying, on solemn occasions, his mandates to men, is coeval, according to sacred records, with the appearance of man in this world. In-umerable are the instances of angelical ministrations, mentioned in the holy writ. We look upon angels as mere spiritual substances, assuming a human form, when by the command of God they have to bring down to men some divine message. In the system of Buddhists, Nats are described as having bodies indeed, but of such a pure nature, particularly those inhabitng the superior seats, that they are, not only, not subjected to the mis-series inherent to our nature, but are moreover gifted of so superior attainments as to almost enjoy the perfections and qualifications inherent to the nature of Spirits. On this occasion the Nats are endeavoring to make virtue triumph over vice; but in the course of this Legend, we will have several opportunities of remarking a counteraction worked up by evil or wicked Nats for upholding the reign of passions or of sin. In this system the two contending elements of good and evil have each its own advocates and supporters. An Hindu Milton might have found two thousand years ago, a ready theme, for writing in Sanscrit or Pali, a poem similar to that more recently composed by the immortal English bard,
On that day, eighty thousand noblemen, who were present at the great rejoicings, pledged themselves, each one to give one of his male children to attend on the royal infant. If he become, said they, a mighty monarch, let our sons be ever with him, as a guard of honor to confer additional lustre on his wonderful reign; if he be ever elevated to the sublime dignity of Budha, let our children enter the holy profession of Recluse, and follow him whithersoever he may direct his steps.

Thoodaudana, with the tender solicitude of a vigilant father, procured for his beloved offspring, nurses exempt from all corporal defects, and remarkable for their beautiful and graceful appearance.

The child grew up, surrounded with a brilliant retinue of numerous attendants.

On a certain day, happened the joyful feast of the ploughing season. The whole country, by the magnificence of the ornaments that decorated it, resembled one of the seats of Nats. The country people, without exception, wearing new dresses, went to the palace. One thousand ploughs and the same number of pairs of bullocks, were prepared for the occasion. Eight hundred ploughs, less one, were to be handled and guided by noblemen. The ploughs, as well as the yokes and the horns of the bullocks, were covered with silver leaves. But the one reserved for the monarch, was covered with leaves of gold. Accompanied by a countless crowd of his people, King Thoodaudana left the royal city and went into the middle of extensive fields. The royal infant was brought out by his nurses, on this joyful occasion. A splendid jambu tree (Eugenia,) loaded with thick and luxuriant green foliage, offered on that spot, a refreshing place, under the shade of its far spreading branches. Here the bed of the child was deposited. A gilt canopy was immediately raised above it, and curtains, embroidered with gold, were disposed round it. Guardians having been appointed to watch over the infant, the King, attended by all his courtiers, directed his steps towards the place where all the ploughs were held in readiness. He instantly put his hands to his own plough; eight hundred noblemen, less one, and the country people followed his example. Pressing forward his bullocks, the King ploughed to and fro through the extent of the fields. All the ploughmen, emulating their royal lord, drove their ploughs in an uniform direction. The scene presented a most animated and stirring spectacle, on an immense scale. The applauding multitude filled the air with cries of joy and exultation. The nurses, who kept watch by the side of the infant’s cradle, excited by the animated scene, forgot the prince’s orders and ran near to the spot, to enjoy the soul stirring sight, displayed before their admiring eyes. Phralaong, casting a glance all round and seeing no one close by him, rose up instantly and sitting in a cross legged position, remained absorbed, as it were, in a profound meditation. The other nurses, busy in preparing the prince’s meal, had spent more time than it was at first contemplated. The shadow of the trees, by the movement of the sun, had turned in an opposite direction. The nurses, reminded by this sight that the infant had been left alone, and that his couch was exposed to the rays of the sun, hastened back to the spot they had so imprudently left. But great was their surprise, when they saw that the shadow of the jambu tree, had not changed its position, and that the child was quietly sitting on his bed. The news of that wonder were immediately conveyed to King Thoodaudana, who came in all haste to witness it. He forthwith prostrated before his son, saying: this is, beloved child, the second time that I bow to you.

Phralaong having reached his sixteenth year, his father ordered three palaces to be built, for each season of

39.—From what has been hitherto mentioned of the life of our Phralaong, we may see that many particulars regarding his birth and his childhood have been described with sufficient accuracy, but little or nothing is said of his adolescence, at least until the age of sixteen, when he gets united to the famous and youthful Yathandra. In common with many other great men, this celebrated and extraordinary personage, has almost all the years of his
the year. Each palace had nine stories; and forty thousand maidens, skilful in playing all sorts of musical instruments were in continual attendance upon him, and charmed, by uninterrupted dances and music, all his moments. Phralaong appeared among them with the beauty and dignity of a Nat, surrounded with an immense retinue of daughters of Nats. According to the change of seasons he passed from one palace into another, moving as it were in a circle of ever renewed pleasures and amusements. It was then that Phralaong was married to the beautiful Yathaudara, his first cousin, and the daughter of Thouppabudha and of Amitau. It was in the 86th year of his grandfather's era, that he was married and also, was consecrated Prince royal, by the pouring of the blessed water over his head.

Whilst Phralaong was spending his time in the midst of pleasures, his relatives complained to the King of the conduct of his son. They strongly remonstrated against his mode of living, which precluded him from applying himself to the acquisition of those attainments befitting his exalted station. Sensible of those reproaches, Thooodaudana sent for his son, to whom he made known the complaints directed against him by his relatives. Without showing any emotion, the young prince replied: let it be announced at the sound of the drum, throughout the country, that this day a week, I will show to my relatives in the presence of the best masters, that I am fully conversant with the eighteen sorts of arts and sciences. On the appointed day, he displayed before them the extent private life wrapped up in a complete obscurity. We may conclude from his great proficiency in the knowledge of those sciences and attainments befitting his high situation, he was not remiss, since he was enabled to set at defiance the greatest masters of those days. In the midst of pleasures, he knew how to devote the best part of his time to study, unless we suppose that science was infused into his mind, by no exertion of his own. The Burmese have a regular mania for dividing with a mathematical precision, what at first appears to admit of no such division. Virtues, vices, sciences, arts, &c., all, in a word, is subjected to a rigorous division, which, if arbitrary in itself, has the great advantage of conferring a substantial help to memory.

of his knowledge; they were satisfied, and their doubts and anxieties on his account, were entirely removed.

On a certain day Phralaong, desiring to go and enjoy some sports in his garden, ordered his coachman to have his conveyance ready for that purpose. Four horses, richly caparisoned, were put to a beautiful carriage that resembled the dwelling place of a Nat. Phralaong having occupied his seat, the coachman drove rapidly towards the garden. The Nats who knew that the time was near at hand when Phralaong would become a Buddha, resolved to place successively before his eyes, the four signs foreshowing his future high dignity. One of them assumed the form of an old man, the body bending forward, with grey hairs, a shrivelled skin, and leaning languidly on a heavy staff. In that attire, he advanced slowly with trembling steps, towards the prince's conveyance. He was seen and remarked only by Phralaong and his coachman. Who is that man, said the prince to his driver? the hairs of his head, indeed, do not resemble those of other men. Prince, answered the coachman, he is an old man. Every born being is doomed to become like him; his appearance must undergo the greatest changes, the skin by the action of time will shrivel, the hairs turn grey, the veins and arteries, losing their suppleness and elasticity, will become stiff and hardened; the flesh will gradually sink and almost disappear, leaving the bare bones covered with dry skin. What, said to himself the terrified prince, birth is indeed a great evil, ushering all beings into a wretched condition, which must be inevitably attended with the disgusting infirmities of old age. His mind being taken up entirely with such considerations, he ordered his coachman to drive back to the palace. Thoodaudana having enquired from his courtiers, what motive had induced his son to return so soon from the place of amusement, was told that he had seen an old man, and that he entertained the thought of becoming a Rahan.* Alas! said he, they will succeed in

* In the course of this work, the word Rahan is often used. It is of the thwarting the high destiny of my son. But let us try now every means to afford him some distraction, so that he may forget the evil idea that has just started up in his mind. He gave orders to bring to his son's palace, the prettiest and most accomplished dancing girls, that in the midst of ever renewed pleasure, he might lose sight of the thought of ever entering the profession of Rahan. The guard surrounding his palace, was doubled, so as to preclude the possibility of his ever seeing the other signs.

On another day, Phraulaong, on his way to his garden, met with the same Nat, under the form of a sick man, who appeared quite sinking under the weight of the most loathsome disease. Frightened at such a sight, Phra-

That class, it appears, comprised all the individuals who lived, either in community under the superintendence and guidance of a spiritual superior, or privately in forests under the protecting shade of trees, and in lonely and solitary places. These Religious were, however, generally designated under the appellation of Acastes and Rathees. They were the forerunners of those fanatics, who, up to our days, have appeared through the breadth and length of the Indian Peninsula, practicing penitential deeds of the most cruel and revolting description. They are described by Buddhists, as wearing curled and twisted hair, clad in the skins of wild beasts, and not unfrequently quite destitute of any sort of clothing, in a state of complete nakedness.

The former who lived in community were not leading the same course of life. We find some communities, the three for instance under the guidance of the three Kathabas, in the Ouroowela forest, not far from Ratnagiri, whose inmates are called either Rahans or Rathees. This indicates that their mode of life partook both of the common and hermitical life, resembling, to a certain extent, that which was observed by the christian communities of conoebites established in the desert of the upper Egypt, during the first ages of our era.

These communities appear to have been the centres in which principles were established, opinions discussed, and theories elaborated. The chiefs enjoyed high reputation for learning. Persons desirous to acquire proficiency in science resorted to their abodes and, under their tuition, strove to acquire wisdom. The following pages of this work, will afford several striking illustrations of the views just sketched out.
laong, hearing from the mouth of his faithful driver, what this disgusting object was, returned in all haste to his palace. His father more and more disturbed at the news conveyed to him, multiplied the pleasures and enjoyments destined for his son, and doubted the number of guards that had to watch over him. On a third occasion whilst the prince was taking a walk, the same Nat, assuming the shape of a dead man, offered to the astonished regards of the prince, the shocking sight of a corpse. Trembling with fear, the young prince came back forthwith to his residence. Thodaudana being soon informed of what had taken place, resorted to fresh precautions and extended to the distance of one youdzana, the immense line of countless guards set all round the palace.

On a forth occasion, the prince driving rapidly towards his garden, was met on his way by the same Nat, under the meek form of a Rahan. The curiosity of the prince was awakened by the extraordinary sight of that new personage; he asked his coachman what he was. Prince, answered the coachman, he is a Rahan. At the same time, though little acquainted with the high dignity and sublime qualifications of a Recluse, he was enabled, by the power of the Nats, to praise and extol in dignified language, the profession and merits of Rahans. The prince felt instantaneously an almost irresistible inclination to embrace that attractive mode of life. He quietly went as far as his garden.

The whole day was spent in all sorts of rural diversions. Having bathed in a magnificent tank, he went a little before sun-set, to rest awhile on a large well polished stone table, overshaded by the far-spread branches of beautiful trees, hanging above it, waiting for the time to put on his richest dress. All his attendants were busily engaged in preparing the finest clothes and most elegant ornaments. When all was ready, they stood silent round him, waiting for his orders. Perfumes of every description were disposed in a circular row, with the various ornaments, on the table, whereon the Prince was sitting.
At that very moment, a chief Thagia was quietly enjoying a delicious and refreshing rest on the famous stone table, called Pantoo Kambala. On a sudden, he felt his seat, as it were, getting hot. Lo! what does this mean, said the astonished Thagia, am I doomed to lose my happy state? Having recollected himself and reflected a while on the cause of such a wonderful occurrence, he soon knew that Phralaong was preparing to put on for the last time, his princely dress. He called to him a son of a Nat, named Withakioon, and said to him: on this day, at midnight, Prince Theiddat is to leave his palace and withdraw into solitude; now he is in his garden preparing to put on his richest attire for the last time: go, therefore, without a moment's delay, to the place where he is sitting, surrounded by his attendants, and perform to him all the required services. Bowing respectfully to the chief of Thagias, Withakioon obeyed, and by the power inherent in the nature of Nats, he was, in an instant, carried to the presence of Phralaong. He assumed the figure of his barber and immediately set at work, arranging the turban, with as much taste as art, round his head. Phralaong soon found out that the skilful hand, which disposed the folds of his head-dress, was not that of a man but of a Nat. One fold of the turban appeared like one thousand, and ten folds, like ten thousand folds, offering the magical coup-d'ail of as many different pieces of cloth, arranged with the most consummate skill. The extremity of the turban, which crossed vertically the whole breadth of the countless folds, appeared covered with a profusion of shining rubies. The head of Phralaong was small, but the folds of the turban seemed numberless. How could that be so? It is a wonder surpassing our understanding; it would be rashness and temerity to allow our mind to dwell too much upon it.

viceing with each other in their endeavours to increase the rejoicing. The Pounhas sung aloud his praise. May he conquer and triumph! may his wishes and desires be ever fulfilled! The multitude repeated incessantly in his honor, stanzas of praises and blessings. In the midst of universal rejoicings Phralaong ascended his carriage. He had scarcely seated himself on it, when a message sent by his father, conveyed to him the gladening tidings, that Yathaudra had been delivered of a son. That child, replied he with great coolness, is a new and strong tie I will have to break. The answer having been brought to his father, Thoodaudana could not understand its meaning. He, however, caused his grand-son to be named Raoula. Phralaong sitting on his carriage, surrounded by crowds of people who rent the air with cries of joy and jubilation, entered into the city of Kapilawot. At that moment a Princess named Keissa Gautami, was contemplating from her apartments the triumphant entrance of Phralaong into the city. She admired the noble and graceful deportment of Prince Theiddat and exclaimed with feelings of inexpressible delight: happy the father and mother who have such an incomparable son; happy the wife who is blest with such an accomplished husband. On hearing those words, Phralaong desired to understand least in Burmah, on the day a young boy is preparing to enter into a monastery of Recluses, for the purpose of putting on the yellow robe, and preparing himself to become afterwards a member of the order, if he feel an inclination to enlist in its ranks. Phralaong was biding a last farewell to the world, its pomps and vanities. So is doing the youthful candidate, who is led processionally through the streets, riding a richly caparisoned horse, or sitting on an elegant palankeen, carried on the shoulders of men. A description of this ceremony will be found in the notice on the Buddhist monks or Talapoins.

I am obliged to confess that I have found it somewhat difficult to discover any connexion between the expressions made use of by Keissa Gautami, and the inference drawn therefrom by Phralaong. The explanation of the difficulty may be, however, stated as follows: Gautami bestows the epithet of happy or blessed upon the father and mother as well as on the wife of prince Theiddat, because she remarked and observed in him those qualities and accomplishments, befitting a worthy son and a good husband. The words blessed and happy struck the mind of the future Budha, attracted his attention, and elicited his exertions for finding out their true import. He asks to himself: in what consists true and real happiness? Where is their meaning and know their bearing. By what means, said he to himself, can a heart find peace and happiness? As his heart was already disentangled from the thrall of passions, he readily perceived that real happiness could be found but in the extinction of concupiscence, pride, ignorance, and other passions. He resolved henceforth to search ardently for the happy state of Neibban, by quitting, on this very night, the world, leaving the society of men, and withdrawing into solitude. Detaching from his neck a collar of pearls of an immense value, he sent it to Keissa Gautami, as a token of gratitude for the excellent lesson she had given him, by the words she had uttered in his praise. The young princess received it as a mark of favor she imagined Prince Theiddat intended to pay her. Without further notice of her, he retired into his own apartment to enjoy some rest.

Chapter IV.

Phralaong leaves his palace, the royal city and retires into solitude, in the middle of the plaudits of the Nats.—He cuts his fine hair with a stroke of his sword, and puts on the habit of Rahan.—He begs his food at Raddagio.—His interview with the ruler of that place.—His studies under two Rathees.—His fasts and penances in the solitude of Oorouwela during six years.

Phralaong had scarcely begun to recline on his couch, when a crowd of young damsels, whose beauty equalled that of the daughters of Nats, executed all sorts of dances, to the sound of the most ravishing symphony, and displayed in all their movements, the graceful forms of their elegant and well-shaped persons, in order to make some impression upon his heart. But all was in vain: they were foiled in their repeated attempts. Phralaong fell into a deep sleep. The damsels perceiving their disappointment, ceased their dances, laid aside their musical instruments, and soon following the example of Phra-laong, quietly yielded to the soporific influence caused by their useless and harassing exertions. The lamps lighted with fragrant oil, continued to pour a flood of bright light throughout the apartments. Phra-laong awoke a little before midnight, and sat in a cross-legged position, on his couch. Looking all around him, he saw the varied attitudes and uninviting appearance of the sleeping damsels. Some were snoring, others gnashing their teeth, others with open wide mouths; some tossed heavily from the right to the left side, others stretched one arm upwards and the other downwards, some seized, as it were, with a frantic pang, suddenly coiled up their legs for a while, and with the same violent motion, again pushed them down. This unexpected exhibition made a strong impression on Phra-laong; his heart was set, if possible, freer from the ties of concupiscence, or rather was confirmed in his contempt for all worldly pleasures. It appeared to him that his magnificent apartments were filled with the most loathsome and putrid carcasses. The seats of passions, those of Rupa, and those of Arupa, that is to say the whole world, seemed to his eyes, like a house that is a prey to the devouring flames. All that, said he to himself, is most disgusting and despicable. At the same time, his ardent desires for the profession of Rahan, were increasing with an uncontrollable energy. On this day at this very moment, said he with an unshaken firmness, I will retire into a solitary place. He rose instantaneously, sitting calmly on the ruins of her deadly opponents, enjoying in the undisturbed contemplation of truth, an indescribable happiness. In this we clearly perceive the unmistakable bearing of Buddhistic morals. It is, as it were, the embryo of the whole system.

King Thoodlandana, influenced by worldly considerations, eagerly wished his son to become a great monarch, instead of a poor and humble Rechme, even a Buddha. This alone suggests the idea that in those days the role of a Buddha was not held in so great an esteem and veneration, as it has been afterwards. Had it been otherwise, the most ambitious father might have remained well satisfied with the certainty of seeing his own son becoming a personage, before whom the proudest monarchs would not, hereafter, hesitate to lower to the dust, their crowned heads.
ly and went to the arched door of his apartment. Who is here watching, said he to the first person he met. Your servant, replied instantly the vigilant nobleman Tsanda. Rise up quickly, replied the prince; now I am ready to retire from the world and resort to some lonely place. Go to the stable and prepare the fastest of my horses. Tsanda bowed respectfully to his master and executed his orders with the utmost celerity. The horse Kantika, knowing the intentions of the prince, felt an inexpressible joy at being selected for such a good errand; he testified his joy by loud neighs; but, by the power of the Nats, the sound of his voice was silenced; so that none heard it.

While Tsanda, in compliance with the orders he had received, was making the necessary preparations, Phralaong desired to see his newly born son Raoula. He

At that time a Budha, or the personage honored with that title, was looked upon as a mere sage, distinguished among his fellow men by his great wisdom and eminent proficiency in the study of philosophy. It is highly probable that this name had been bestowed upon a great many illustrious individuals who lived before the days of Gaudama. Hence the fabricated genealogy of twenty-eight former Budhas, supposed to have lived myriads of years and worlds previous, including the three that have preceded him during the continuance of this system of nature. Here a superstitious and ill judged enthusiasm, has raised up heaps of extravagancies, for setting up a ridiculous theory, designed to connect the role of the present Budha with those of a fabulous antiquity, and give additional lustre to it. There is no doubt that the glowing halo of sacredness and glory, encircling now the name of Budha, has never adorned that of any former one. It has been created by the extraordinary progress his doctrines made at first in the Indian Peninsula, and next throughout eastern Asia, and kept up by the fervent admiration of his enthusiastic followers.

The means resorted to by Thenlandana, for retaining his son in the world of passions, and thereby thwarting his vocation, could not, we hardly need to mention, be approved of, by any moralist of even the greatest elasticity of conscience and principles; but they were eminently fitted to try the soundness of Phralaong's calling, and the strong and tenacious dispositions of his energetic mind. They set out in vivid colors, the firmness of purpose, and irresistible determination of his soul in following up his vocation to a holier mode of life; and what is yet more wonderful, the very objects that were designed to enslave him, became the instruments which helped him in gaining and ascertaining his liberty. Magnificent is, indeed, the spectacle, offered by a young Prince, remaining unmoved, in the midst of the most captivating, soul-stirring and heart-melting attractions; sitting coolly on his couch and looking with indifference, nay with disgust, on the crowd of sleeping beauties.
opened gently the door of the room where the princess was sleeping, having one of her hands placed over the head of the infant. Phralaong stopping at the threshold, said to himself:—if I go farther to contemplate the child, I will have to remove the hand of the mother; she may be awakened by this movement, and then she will prove a great obstacle to my departure. I will see the child after having become a Buddha. He then instantly shut the door and left the palace. His charger was waiting for him. To your swiftness, said Phralaong to Kantika, do I trust for executing my great design. I must become a Buddha, and labor for the deliverance of men and Nats, from the miseries of existence, and lead them safely to the peaceful shores of Neibban. In a moment he was on the back of his favorite horse. Kantika was a magnificent animal; his body measured eighteen cubits in length; its height and circumference were in perfect proportion with its length. The hair was of a beautiful white, resembling a newly cleaned shell; his swiftness was unrivalled and his neighings could be heard at a very great distance; but on this occasion the Nats interfered; no sound of his voice was heard, and the noise of his steps was completely silenced. Having reached the gate of the city, Phralaong stopped for a while, uncertain as regarded the course he was to follow. To open the gate which a thousand men could but with difficulty make to turn upon its hinges, was deemed an impossibility. Whilst he was deliberating with his faithful attendant Tsanda, the huge gate was silently opened by the Nats, and a free passage given to him through it. It was in the year 97, that he left Kapilawot.

Phralaong had scarcely crossed the threshold of the gate, when the tempter endeavoured to thwart his pious design. Manh Nat resolved to prevent him from retiring into solitude and becoming a Buddha. Standing in the air, he cried aloud:—Prince Theiddat, do not attempt to lead the life of a Recluse; seven days hence, you will become a Tsekiaawaday: your sway shall extend over the four great islands; return forthwith to your palace. Who are you, replied Phralaong. I am Manh Nat, cried the voice. I know, said Phralaong, that I can become a Tsekiaawaday, but I feel not the least inclination for earthly dignities; my aim is to arrive at the nature of Budha. The tempter, urged onward by his three wicked propensities, concupiscence, ignorance and anger, did not part for a moment from Phralaong; but as the shadow always accompanies the body, he too, from that day, followed always Phralaong, striving to throw every obstacle in his way towards the dignity of Budha. Trampling down every human and worldly consideration, and despising a power full of vanity and illusion, Phralaong left the city of Kapilawot, at the full moon of July under the constellation Oottarathan. A little while after, he felt a strong desire of turning back his head and casting a last glance over the magnificent city he was leaving behind him; but he soon overcome that inordinate desire and denied to himself this gratification. It is said, that on the very instant he was combating the rising sense of curiosity, the mighty earth turned with a great velocity, like a

His name, according to its orthography, is Mau or Marc, but the Burmese call him Manh, which means pride. Manh is, therefore, the evil spirit of pride, or rather personified pride, and the enemy of mankind, ever ready to oppose the benevolent designs and generous efforts of Budha, in carrying on his great undertaking calculated to benefit humanity, by teaching men the way that leads to the deliverance from all miseries. The first plan concocted by Manh, for stopping, at the very onset, the progress of Paralaong, is to flatter his ambition by promising him all the kingdoms of this world and their glory. From that day, the tempter never lost sight of the benevolent Budha but followed him everywhere, endeavoring to prevent the immense success that was to attain his future mission. The evil propensities which constitute, as at were, the very essence of Manh's nature, are concupiscence, envy, and an irresistible propensity to do harm. The devil indeed, could hardly be made up of worse materials.

It is really interesting through the course of this legend to read of the uninterrupted efforts, made by the personification of evil to thwart Budha in all his benevolent designs. The antagonism begins now, but it will be maintained with an obstinate and prolonged activity, during the whole life of Budha.
potter's wheel, so that the very object he denied himself the satisfaction of contemplating, came of itself under his eyes. Phralaong hesitated awhile as to the direction he was to follow, but he resolved instantly to push on strait before him.

His progress through the country resembled a splendid triumphal ovation. Sixty thousand Nats marched in front of him, an equal number followed him, and as many surrounded him on his right and on his left. All of them carried lighted torches, pouring a flood of light in every direction; others again spread perfumes and flowers brought from their own seats. All joined in chorus, singing the praises of Phralaong. The sound of their united voices resembled the loud peals of continued thunder, and the resounding of the mighty waves, at the foot of the mount Oogando. Flowers shedding the most fragrant odour, where seen gracefully undulating in the air, like an immense canopy, extending to the farthest limits of the horizon. During that night, Phralaong attended with that brilliant retinue, travelled a distance of thirty youdzanas, and arrived on the banks of the river Anauma. Turning his face towards Tsanda, he asked what was the river's name. Anauma is its name, replied his faithful attendant. I will not, said Phralaong to himself, show myself unworthy of the high dignity I aspire to. Spurring his horse, the fierce animal leaped at once to the opposite bank. Phralaong alighted on the ground which was covered with a fine sand resembling pearls when the rays of the sun fell upon it, in the morning. On that spot he divested himself of his dress, and calling Tsanda to him, he directed him to take charge of his ornaments and carry them back, with the horse Kantika, to his palace. For himself, he had made up his mind to become a Rahan. Your servant too, replied Tsanda, will become also a Recluse in your company. No, said the prince, the profession of Rahan does not at present befit you. He reiterated this prohibition three times. When he was handing over to Tsanda his costly ornaments, he said to himself:—these long hairs that cover my head, and my beard too, are superfluities unbecoming the profession of Rahan. Whereupon, with one hand unsheathing his sword, and with the other seizing his comely hairs, he cut them with a single stroke. What remained of his hairs on the head, measured about one inch and a half in length. In like manner he disposed of his beard. From that time he never needed shaving—the hairs of his beard and those of the head never grew longer during the remainder of his life. 43 Holding his hairs and turban together he cried aloud:—if I am destined to become a Budha, let these hairs and turban remain suspended in the air; if not, let them drop down on the ground. Throwing up both at the height of one youdzana, they remained suspended in the air until a Nat came with a rich basket, put them therein, and carried them to the seat of Tawadeinthha. He there erected the Dzedi Dzoulamani, wherein they were religiously deposited. Casting his regards on his own person, Phralaong saw that his rich and shining robe did not answer his purpose, nor appear befitting the poor and humble profession, he was about to embrace. Whilst his attention was taken up with this consideration, a great Brahma named Gati gara, who in the days of the Budha Kathaba had been an intimate friend of our Phralaong, and who during the period that elapsed between the manifestation of that Budha to the present time, had not grown old, discovered at once the perplexity of his friend's mind. Prince Theiddat, said he, is preparing to become a Rahan, but he is not supplied with the dress and other implements essentially required for his future calling. I will provide him now with the Thinbaing, the Kowot, the Dugout, the Patta, the leathern girdle, the hatchet, the needle and filter.\textsuperscript{43} He took with him all these articles, and in an instant, arrived in the presence of Phralaong to whom he presented them. Though unacquainted with the details of that dress, and untrained to the use of those new implements, the prince, like a man who had been a Recluse during several existences, put on, with a graceful gravity, his new dress. He adjusted the Thinbaing round his waist, covered his body with the Kowot, threw the dugout over his shoulders, and suspended to his neck the bag containing the earthen patta. Assuming the grave, meek and dignified countenance of a Rahan, he called Tsanda and bade him to go back to his father and relate to him all that he had seen. Tsanda complying with his master's request, prostrated himself three times before him; then rising up, he wheeled to the right and departed. The spirited horse hearing the last words of Phralaong, could no more control his grief.\textsuperscript{44} Alas! said he, I will see no more my master in this world. His sorrow grew so great that his heart split into two parts, and he died on the spot.

42—This circumstance explains one peculiarity observable in all the statues representing Budha. The head is invariably covered with sharp points, resembling those thorns with which the thick envelope of the durian fruit is armed. Often I had inquired as to the motive that induced native sculptors to leave on the head of all statues, these sorts of inverted nails, without ever being able to obtain any satisfactory answer. It was only after having read this passage of the life of Budha, that I was enabled to account for this apparently singular custom, which is designed to remind all Buddhists of the ever-continued wonder whereby the hairs which remained on Budha's head, never grew longer, from the day he cut them with his sword.

\textsuperscript{43}—Every Talapoin or Recluse must be provided with one needle, where-with he is to sew his dress, one hatchet to cut the wood he may be in need of, either for erecting a shelter for himself, or for other purposes, and one filter to strain the water he intends to drink, that it should be cleared from all impurities, but chiefly of insects or any living body; that might be in it, which would expose the drinker thereof, to the enormous sin of causing the death of some animal.

\textsuperscript{44}—The various accounts that are given of the horse Kantika, and the grief he feels at parting with his master, grief which reaches so far as to cause his death, may appear somewhat extraordinary, puerile and ridiculous to every one, except to Buddhists. One great principle of that religious system, is that man does not differ from animals in nature, but only in relative perfection. In animals there are souls as well as in men, but those souls on account of the paucity of their merits, and the multiplicity of their demerits, are yet in a very imperfect state. When the law of demerits grows weak, and that of merits gathers strength, the soul, though continuing to inhabit the body of animals, has the knowledge of good and evil, and can attain to a certain degree of perfection. Buddhistic writings supply many instances of this belief. Whilst Budha was in the desert, an elephant ministered to all his wants. As a reward for such a series of services, Budha preached to him the law, and led him at once to the deliverance, that is to say to the state of Nirboum. When one animal has progressed so far in the
After his death, he became a Nat in the seat of Tawadeintha. The affliction of Tsanda, at parting with his good master, was increased by the death of Kantika. The tears that streamed down his cheeks, resembled drops of liquid silver.

Phralaong having thus begun the life of a Recluse, spent seven days alone in a forest of mango trees, enjoying in that retirement the peace and happiness of soul which solitude alone can confer. The place, in the neighborhood of which he began his religious life, is called Anupya, in the country belonging to the Malla Princes. He then started for the country of Radzagio, travelling on foot a distance of thirty youdzananas. Arrived near the gate of the royal city, Phralaong stopped for a while, saying within himself:—Peimpathara, the king of this country will, no doubt, hear of my arrival to this place. Knowing that the son of king Thooodaudana is actually in his own royal city, he will insist upon my accepting all sorts of presents. But now in my capacity of Rahan, I must decline accepting them, and by the rules of my profession I am bound to go and beg along the streets, from house to house, the food necessary for my support. He instantly resumed his journey, entered the city through the eastern gate, the patta hanging on his side, and followed the first row of houses, receiving the alms which pious hands offered him. At the moment of his arrival the whole city was shaken by a mighty commotion, like that which is felt in the seat of Thoora when the Nat Athoorecin makes his apparition into it. The inhabitants, terrified at such an ominous sign, ran in all way of merits, to be able to discern between good and bad, it is said that he is ripe, or fit to become man. The horse Kantika seems to have reached that state of full ripeness, since after his death, he passed to the state of Nat. This peculiar tenet of Budhist faith accounts for the first of the five great commandments, which extends to animals the formal injunction of not killing. When a candidate is admitted, according to the prescriptions contained in the sacred Kambawa, into the order of Rahans, he is expressly and solemnly commanded to refrain from committing four sins which would deprive him de facto of the dignity he has been elevated to. The taking away willingly of the life of any thing animated is one of these four trespassings.

haste to the palace. Admitted into the presence of the monarch, they told him that they knew not what sort of being had just arrived in the city, walking through the streets and begging alms. They could not ascertain whether he was a Nat, a man or a Galong. The king, looking from his apartments over the city, saw Phralaong, whose meek deportment removed all anxiety from his mind. He, however, directed a few of his noblemen to go and watch attentively all the movements of the stranger. If he be, said he, a Bilou, he will soon leave the city and vanish away; if a Nat, he will raise himself in the air; if a Naga, he will plunge to the bottom of the earth. Phralaong having obtained the quantity of rice, vegetables, &c., he thought sufficient for his meal, left the city through the same gate by which he had entered it, sat down at the foot of a small hill, his face turned towards the east, and tried to make his meal with the things he had received. He could not swallow the first mouthful, which he threw out of his mouth in utter disgust. Accustomed to live sumptuously and feed on the most delicate things, his eyes could not bear even the sight of that loathsome mixture of the coarsest articles of food, collected at the bottom of his patta. He soon, however, recovered from that shock; and gathered fresh strength to subdue the opposition of nature, overcome its repugnance, and conquer its resistance. Reproaching himself for such an unbecoming weakness:—was I not aware, said he, with a feeling of indignation against himself, that when I took up the dress of a mendicant, such would be my food. The moment is come to trample upon nature's appetites. Whereupon he took up his patta, ate cheerfully his meal, and never afterwards, did he ever feel any repugnance for what things soever he had to eat.

The king's messengers having closely watched and attentively observed all that had happened, returned to their master to whom they related all the particulars they had witnessed. Let my carriage be ready, said the king, and you, follow me to the place where this stranger is resting. He soon perceived Phralaong at a distance, sitting quietly after his reflection. Peimpathara alighted from his conveyance, respectfully drew near to Phralaong and having occupied a seat in a becoming place, he was overwhelmed with contentment and inexpressible joy, to such an extent, indeed, that he could scarcely find words to give utterance to his feelings. Having at last recovered from the first impression, he addressed Phralaong in the following manner: Venerable Rahan, you seem to be young still, and in the prime of your life; in your person you are gifted with the most attractive and noble qualities, indicating surely your illustrious and royal extraction. I have under my control and in my possession a countless crowd of officers, elephants, horses, and chariots, affording every desirable convenience for pleasure and amusement of every description. Please to accept of a numerous retinue of attendants with whom you may enjoy yourself, whilst remaining within my dominions. May I be allowed to ask what country you belong to, who you are, and from what illustrious lineage and descent you are come? Phralaong said to himself:—it is evident that the king is unacquainted with both my name and origin; I will, however, satisfy him on the subject of his enquiry. Pointing out with his hand in the direction of the place he had come from, he said:—I arrive from the country which has been governed by a long succession of the descendants of Prince Kothala. I have indeed been born from royal progenitors, but I have abandoned all the prerogatives attached to my position, and embraced the profession of Rahan. From my heart I have rooted up concupiscence, covetousness and all affections to the things of this world. To this the king replied:—I have heard that Prince Theiddat, son of king Thoodaudana, had seen four great signs, portending his future destiny for the profession of Rahan, which would be but a step to lead him to the exalted dignity of a Budha. The first part of the prediction has been already fulfilled. When the second shall have received its accomplishment, I beg you will show your benevolence to me and my people. I hope my kingdom will be the first country you will direct your steps to, after having acquired the supreme science. To this Phra-laong graciously assented.

Phra-laong having left the king, resumed his journey and fell in with a Rathee, 45 or hermit, named Alara, and inquired about the several Dzans. Alara, satisfied him

45.—The fact of Budha placing himself under the tuition of two masters or teachers leading an ascetic life, to learn from them notions of the most abstruse nature, establishes, beyond all doubt, the high antiquity of the existence in India of a large number of individuals, who living in some retired spot, far from the tumult of society, endeavoured by constant application, to dive into the deepest recesses of morals and metaphysics. The fame of the learning of many among them attracted to their solitude, crowds of disciples anxious to study under such eminent masters. Hence we see some of those Rathees at the head of four or five hundred disciples. There is no doubt but the most distinguished Rathee became the founders of many of those philosophico-religious schools for which India was renowned, from the remotest antiquity. Like many others who thirsted for knowledge, Phra-laong resorted to the schools of the Rathees, as to the then most celebrated seats of learning.

From this fact we may be allowed to draw another inference, which may be considered as a consequence of what has been stated in a foregoing note, regarding the superior antiquity of Brahminism over Buddhism. Phra-laong was brought up in the bosom of a society regulated and governed by Brahminical institutions. He must have been imbued, from the earliest days of his elementary education, with the notions generally taught, viz: the Brahminical ones. When he grew up and began to think for himself, he was displeased with certain doctrines which did not tally with his own ideas. Following the example of many that had preceded him in the way of innovation, he boldly shaped his course in a new direction, and soon arrived at a final issue on many points, both with his teachers, and some of the doctrines generally received in the society in which he had been brought up. We may therefore safely conclude that the doctrines supposed to have been preached by the latest Budha, are but an offshoot of Brahminism. This may serve to account for the great resemblance subsisting between many doctrines of both creeds. The cardinal points on which these two systems essentially differ are the beginning and the end of living beings. Between these two extremes, there is a multitude of points on which both systems so perfectly agree, that they appear blended together.

The Rathees seem, according to the institutes of Menoo, to have been first in observing two practices, much enforced by the Wini in subsequent times. They were supported by the alms bestowed on them by their disciples and the admirers of their singular mode of life. They were courted and esteemed by the world, in proportion to the contempt they appeared to hold it in. Denying to themselves the pleasures which were opposed to their austere life, they observed, as long as they remained Rathees, the rules of the strictest celibacy.

Phra-laong, preparing himself for his future high calling, began to study the science of Dzam under distinguished masters. What is meant by Dzam?
on four kinds of Dzans, but as regards the fifth, he was obliged to refer him to another Rathee named Oudaka, who gave him the necessary explanations. Having nothing more to learn from those masters, Phralaong said to himself:—"the knowledge I have thus acquired, is not sufficient to enable me to obtain the dignity of Budha." Whereupon he resolved to devote himself to the Kaman 46 or meditation on the instability and nothingness of all that exists. To effectuate thoroughly his purpose, he

This Pali word means thought, reflection, meditation. It is often designed by the Burmese to mean a peculiar state of the soul that has already made great progress in the way of perfection. Phralaong intended, by placing himself under the direction of those eminent teachers, to learn the great art of training his mind for the obtaining, by constant and well directed meditations, of high mental attainments. In the book of Buddhist metaphysics, I have found the science of Dzan divided into five parts, or rather five steps, which the mind has to ascend successively, ere it can enjoy a state of perfect quiescence, the highest point a perfected being can arrive to, before reaching the state of Neiblan. The first step, when the soul searches after what is good and perfect, and having discovered it, turns its attention and the energy of its faculties towards it. The 2nd, when the soul begins to contemplate steadily what it has first discovered, and rivets upon it, its attention. In the 3rd stage, the soul fondly relishes, and is, as it were, entirely taken with it. In the 4th the soul calmly enjoys and quietly feasts on the pure truths it has loved in the former state. In the 5th. the soul, perfectly saturated with the knowledge of truth, remains in a state of complete quietude, perfect fixity, unmoved stability, which nothing can any longer alter or disturb. The Burmese and all Buddhists, always fond of what is wonderful, attribute supernatural perfections to those who have so far advanced in mental attainments. Their bodies become, as it were, half spiritualised, so that they can, according to their wishes, carry themselves through the air, from one place to another, without the least hindrance or difficulty.

46.—Kamanan means the fixing of the attention on one object so as to investigate thoroughly all its constituent parts, its principle and origin, its existence and its final destruction. It is that part of metaphysics which treats of the beginning, nature and end of beings. To become proficient in that science, a man must be gifted with a most extensive knowledge and an analysing mind of no common cast. The process of Kamanan works are as follows: let it be supposed that a man intends to contemplate one of the four elements, fire for instance; he abstracts himself from every object which is not fire, and devotes all his attention to the contemplation of that object alone; he examines the nature of fire, and finding it a compound of several distinct parts, he investigates the cause or causes that keep those parts together, and soon discovers that they are but accidental ones, the action whereof may be impeded or destroyed by the occurrence of any sudden accident. He concludes that fire has but a fictitious ephemeral existence. The same method is followed in examining the other elements, and gradually all other things he may come in contact with, and his final conclusion is, repaired to the solitude of Oorouwela, where he devoted all his time to the deepest meditation. On a certain day, it happened that five Rahans, on their way to a certain place to get their food, arrived at the spot where Phralaonga lived and had already entered on the course of his penitential deeds. They soon became impressed with the idea that our hermit was to become a Buddha. They resolved to stay with him and render him all the needful services, such as sweeping the place, cooking rice, &c.

The time for the six years of meditation was nearly over, when Phralaonga undertook a great fast, 47 which was carried to such a degree of abstemiousness that he

that all things placed without him have no real existence, being mere illusions divested of all reality. He infers, again, that all things are subjected to the law of incessant change, without fixity or stability. The wise man therefore can feel no attachment for objects which in his own opinion, are but illusions and deception; his mind can no where find rest in the midst of illusions always succeeding to each other. Having surveyed all that is distinct of self, he applies himself to the work of investigating the origin and nature of his body. After a lengthened examination, he arrives, as a matter of course, at the same conclusion:—his body is a mere illusion without reality, subjected to changes and destruction. He feels that it is as yet distinct from self. He despises his body as he does everything else, and has no concern for it. He longs for the state of Neibban as the only one worthy of the wise man's earnest desires. By such a preliminary step, the student, having estranged himself from this world of illusions, advances towards the study of the excellent works which will pave the way to Neibban. The Burmese reckon forty Kamatama. They are often repeated over by devotees, whose weak intellect is utterly incapable of understanding the meaning they are designed to convey to the mind.

Notwithstanding his singular aptitude in acquiring knowledge, Phralaonga devoted six whole years, in the solitude of Oorouwela, busily engaged in mastering the profound science he aimed at acquiring. It was during that time that he received the visits of five Rahans, whose chief was named Koondanha. They were very probably, like so many of their profession, travelling about in search of knowledge. They placed themselves under the direction of Phralaonga, and in exchange for the lessons they received from him, they served him as humble and grateful disciples are wont to attend on a highly esteemed teacher. In this as well as many other circumstances, we see that previous to Gaudama's preachings, there already existed in India, an order of devotees or enthusiasts, who lived secluded from the world, devoted to the study of religious doctrines and the practice of virtues of the highest order. The order of Budhistic miks or Taiaoins, which has been subsequently established by the author of Budhism, is but a modification of what actually subsisted in full vigour, in his own country and in his own time.

47.—In a Budhistic point of view the only reason that may be assigned for the extraordinary fast of Phralaonga is the satisfaction of showing to the scarcely allowed to himself the use of a grain of rice or sesameum a-day, and finally denied himself even that feeble pittance. But the Nats who observed his excessive mortification, inserted Nat food through the pores of his skin. Whilst Phralaong was thus undergoing such a severe fasting, his face, that was of a beautiful gold color, became black; the thirty-two marks indicative of his future dignity, disappeared. On a certain day, when he was walking in a much enfeebled state, on a sudden he felt an extreme weakness, similar to that caused by a dire starvation. Unable to stand up any longer, he fainted and fell on the ground. Among the Nats that were present, some said: the Rahan Gaudama is dead indeed; some others replied: he is not dead, but has fainted from want of food. Those who believed he was dead, hastened to his father's palace to convey to him the sad message of his son's death. Thoodaudana enquired if his son died previous to his becoming a Budha. Having been answered to the affirmative, he refused to give credit to the words of the Nats. The reason of his doubting the accuracy of the report was, that he had witnessed the great wonders prognosticating his son's future dignity that had taken place, first when Phralaong, then an infant, was placed in the presence of a famous Rathee, and secondly, when he slept under the shade of the tree Tsampoo-thabia. The fainting being over, and Phralaong having reworld the display of wonderful action. Fastings and other works of mortification have always been much practised by the Indian philosophers of past ages, who thereby attracted the notice, respect, admiration and veneration of the world. Such rigorous exercises, too, were deemed of great help for enabling the soul to have a more perfect control over the senses, and subjecting them to the empire of reason. They are also conducive towards the calm and undisturbed state where the soul is better fitted for the arduous task of constant meditation. The fast of Gaudama, preparatory to his obtaining the Budhship, recalls to the mind that which our Lord underwent, ere he began his divine mission. If the writer, through this work, has made once or twice a remark of similar import, he has done so, not with the intention of stating facts. He has communicated to the reader the feelings of surprise and astonishment he experienced when he thought to have met with many circumstances, respecting the founder of Budhism, which apparently bear great similarity to some connected with the mission of our Saviour.

covered his senses, the same Nats went in all haste to Thoodaudana, to inform him of his son's happy recovery. "I knew well," said the king, "that my son could not die ere he had become a Budha." The fame of Phralaong having spent six years in a solitude, addicted to meditation and mortification, spread abroad like the sound of a great bell 43 hung in the canopy of the skies.

43.—Bells are common in Burmah, and the people of that country are well acquainted with the art of casting them. Most of the bells to be seen in the Pagodas, are of small dimensions, and in shape, differing somewhat from those used in Europe. The inferior part is less widened, and there is a large hole in the centre of the upper part. No tongue is hung in the interior, but the sound is produced by striking, with a horn of deer or elk, the outward surface of the lower part. No belfry is erected for the bells; they are fixed on a piece of timber laid horizontally, and supported at its two extremities, by two posts, at such a height that the inferior part of the bell is raised about five feet above the ground.

The largest specimens of Burmese are in casting bells of great weight, are the two bells to be seen, the one at the large Pagoda of Rangoon, called Shway Dagon, and the other at Mingon, about 12 or 15 miles north of Amersoura, on the western bank of the Irrawaddy. The first in the town of Rangoon, was cast in 1842, when King Tharawaddy visited the place, with the intention of founding a new city, more distant from the river, and nearer to the mount upon which rises the splendid Shway Dagon. In its shape and form, it exactly resembles the kind of bells above described.
Here are some particulars respecting that large piece of metal, collected from the inscription to be seen upon it. It was cast on the 5th day of the full moon of (February) Tabodwai, 1203 of the Burmese era. The weight of metal is 94,682 lbs; its height 9½ cubits; its diameter 5 cubits; its thickness 20 fingers or 15 inches. But during the process of melting, the well disposed came forward and threw in, copper, silver and gold in great quantities. It is supposed (says the writer of the inscription) that in this way, the weight was increased one fourth.

The bell of Mingon was cast in the beginning of this century. In shape and form, it resembles our bells of Europe. It is probable that some foreigner residing at Ava, suggested the idea of giving such an unusual form to that monumental bell. Its height is 18 feet, besides 7 feet for hanging apparatus. It has 17 feet in diameter, and from 10 to 12 inches in thickness Its weight is supposed to exceed two hundred thousand English pounds.

In the interior, large yellowish and greyish streaks indicate that considerable quantities of gold and silver have been thrown in during the process of melting. No idea can at present be had of the power of the sound of that bell, as its enormous weight has caused the pillars that support it, partially to give way. To prevent a final disaster, the orifice of the bell has been made to rest on large short posts, sunk in the ground and rising about three feet above it. On no respect, can these bells bear any comparison with those of Europe. They are mightily rough and rude attempts at doing works on a scale far surpassing the abilities of native workmen, who, otherwise, succeed tolerably well in casting the comparatively small bells, commonly met with, in the the court yards of Pagodas.
Phralaong soon remarked that fasting and mortification were not works of sufficient value for obtaining the dignity of Budha; he took up his patta and went to the neighbouring village to get his food. Having eaten it, he grew stronger; his beautiful face shone again like gold, and the thirty-two signs reappeared. The five Rahans that had lived with him, said to each other: "it is in vain that the Rahan Gaudama has, during six years of mortification and sufferings, sought the dignity of Budha; he is now compelled to go out in search of food; assuredly if he be obliged to live on such food, when shall he ever become a Budha? He goes out in quest of food; verily he aims at enriching himself. As the man, that wants drops of dew or water to refresh and wash his forehead, has to look for them, so we have to go somewhere else, to learn the way to, and the merit of Dzan, which we have not been able to obtain from him." Whereupon they left Phralaong, took up their pattas and tsiwarans, went to a distance of eighteen youdzanas, and withdrew into the forest of Migadawon, near Baranathee.

At that time, in the solitude of Oorouwela there lived in a village a rich man named Thena. He had a daughter name Thoozata. Having attained the years of puberty, she repaired to a place where there was a Gniaong tree and made the following prayer to the Nat guardian of the place: "If I marry a husband that will prove a suitable match, and the first fruit of our union be a male child, I will spend annually in alms deeds 100,000 pieces of silver, and make an offering at this spot. Her prayer was heard, and its twofold object granted. When Phralaong had ended the six years of his fasting and mortification, on the day of the full moon of the month

49.—The Nats or Dewatas play a conspicuous part in the affairs of this world. Their seats are in the six lower heavens, forming with the abode of man and the four states of punishment, the eleven seats of passions. But they often quit their respective places, and interfere with the chief events that take place among men. Hence we see them ever attentive in ministering to all the wants of the future Budha. Besides, they are made to watch over trees, forests, villages, towns, cities, fountains, rivers, &c. These are the good and benevolent Nats. This world is also supposed to be peopled with wicked Nats, whose nature is ever prone to the evil. A good deal of the worship of Buddhists, consists in superstitious ceremonies and offerings made for propitiating the wicked Nats, and obtaining favors and temporal advantages from the good ones. Such a worship is universal, and fully countenanced by the Talapoins, though in opposition with the real doctrines of genuine Buddhism. All kinds of misfortunes are attributed to the malignant interference of the evil Nats. In case of severe illness that has resisted the skill of native medical art, the physician gravely tells the patient and his relatives, that it is useless to have recourse any longer to medicines, but a conjurer must be sent for, to drive out the malignant spirit who is the author of the complaint. Meanwhile directions are given for the erection of a shed, where offerings intended for the inimical Nat, are depo-
Katson, Thoodzata was preparing to make her grateful offering to the Nat of the place. She had been keeping one thousand cows in a place abounding with sweet vines; the milk of those 1,000 cows was given to five hundred cows; these again fed with their own milk 250 other cows, and so on in a diminutive proportion, until it happened that sixteen cows fed eight others with their milk. So these eight cows gave a milk, rich, sweet and flavored beyond all description.

sited. A female relative of the patient, begins dancing to the sound of musical instruments. The dance goes on, at first, in rather a quiet manner; but it gradually grows more animated, until it reaches the acme of animal phrenzy. At that moment, the bodily strength of the dancing lady becomes exhausted; she drops on the ground in a state of apparent faintness. She is, then, approached by the conjurer, who asks her if the invisible foe has relinquished his hold over the diseased. Having been answered in the affirmative, he bids the physician to give medicines to the patient, assuring him that his remedies will now act beneficially for restoring the health of the sick, since their action will meet no further opposition from the wicked Nat.

Ignorance brings everywhere superstition in its train. When man is unacquainted with the natural cause that has produced a result or an effect, which attracts powerfully his mind's attention, and affects him to a great degree, he is induced by his own weakness, to believe in the agency of some unknown being, to account for the effect that he perceives. He devises the most ridiculous means for expressing his gratitude to his invisible benefactor, if the result be a favorable one; and has recourse to the most extravagant measures, to counteract the evil influence of his supposed enemy, if the result be fatal to him. Having once entered into the dark way of superstition, man is hurried on in countless false directions, by fear, hope and other passions, in the midst of the daily occurrence of multifarious and unforeseen events and circumstances. Hence the expression or manifestation of his superstition assumes a variety of forms and undergoes changes to an extent, that baffles every attempt at either counting their numberless kinds or following them up through their ever changing course. In addition to the stores of superstitions bequeathed by the generation that has preceded him, man has those of his own creation, and the latter, if the thought of his mind and the desires of his heart could be analysed, would be found far exceeding the former ones, in number. Having spent many years in a country where Buddhism has prevailed from time immemorial, and observed the effects of superstition over the people in their daily doings, the writer has come to the conclusion, that there is scarcely an action done without the influence of some superstitious motive or consideration. But the most prolific source of superstition, is the belief in the existence of countless good and evil Nats, with whom the imagination of Buddhists has peopled this world.

It can scarcely be understood how the followers of an atheistical creed, can make, consistently with their opinions, an attempt at prayer. Such an act of devotion implies the belief in a being superior to man, who has a con-
On the day of the full moon of Katson, Thoodzata rose at an early hour, to make ready her offering, and disposed every thing that the cows should be simultaneously milked. When they were to be milked, the young calves of their own accord, kept at a distance; and as soon as the vessels were brought near, the milk began to flow in streams, from the udders, into those vessels. She took the milk and poured it into a large caldron, set on the fire which she had herself kindled. The milk began to boil; bubbles formed on the surface of the liquid, turned on the right and sunk in, not a single drop being spilt out; no smoke arose from the fire place. Four kings travelling power over them, and into whose hands their destinies are placed. With a believer in God, prayer is a sacred, nay, a natural duty. But such cannot be the case with atheists. Despite of the withering and despairing influence of atheism, nothing can possibly obliterate from the conscience and heart of man, that inward faith in a Supreme Being. The pious Thoodzata has in view the attainment of two objects: she prays, without knowing to whom, that by the agency of some one, she might obtain the objects of her petition. She is anxious to show her gratitude, when she sees that her prayer has been heard. Her faith to the almost omnipotence of the genii, makes her address thanks to them. The Nat is not the person to whom her prayer appears directed, but he is rather a witness of her petition. The Burmese in general, under difficult circumstances, unforeseen difficulties, and sudden calamities, use always the cry Phra seiha. God assist me—to obtain from above, assistance and protection Yet that Phra cannot be their Budha, though he be in their opinion the Phra per excellence, since they openly declare that he in no way interferes in the management of this world's affairs. Whence that involuntary cry for assistance, but from the innate consciousness that above man, there is some one ruling over his destinies? An atheistical system may be elaborated in a school of metaphysics, and forced upon ignorant and unreflecting masses; but practice will ever belie theory. Man, in spite of his errors and follies, is naturally a believing being: his own weakness and multiplied wants, shall ever compel him to have recourse to some great Being that can help, and assist him, and supply to a certain extent, the deficiency which in spite of himself, he is compelled to acknowledge existing in him, as a stern and humiliating reality.

50.—The Burmese, like all trans-gangetic nations, divide the year into twelve lunar months of 29 and 30 days alternately. Every third year they add one month, or as they say, double the month of Watso (July). The year begins on or about the 12th of April. The days of worship, are the days of the four quarters of the moon; but the days of the new and full moon seem to have preference over those of the two other quarters, which latter are scarcely noticed or distinguished from common days. It was on the day of the full moon of April, that Thoodzata made her grand offering.
of Nats watched about, while the caldron was boiling; the great Brahma kept open an umbrella over it; a Thagia brought fuel and fed the fire. Other Nats by their supernatural power, infused honey into the milk, and communicated thereto a flavor such as the like is not to be found in the abode of men. On this occasion alone, and on the day Phraelaong entered the state of Neibban, the Nats infused honey into his food. Wondering at so many extraordinary signs she saw, Thoodzata called her female slave named Soumama, related to her all that she had observed, and directed her to go to the Guiaong tree, and clear away the place where she intended to make her offering. The servant complying with her mistress' direction, soon arrived at the foot of the tree.

On that very night, Phraelaong had had five dreams. 1st.—It appeared to him that the earth was his sleeping place, with the Himawonta for his pillow. His hand rested on the western ocean, his left hand on the eastern ocean, and his feet on the southern ocean. 2nd.—A kind of grass, named Tyria, appeared to grow out of his navel and reached to the skies. 3rd.—Ants of a white appearance ascended from his feet to the knee and covered his 51.—The Burmese translator not having given in his remarks, the explanation or interpretation of Phraelaong's five dreams, it seems rather presumptuous to attempt doing a thing, the omission of which, on the part of the author, may be attributed either to voluntary omission or to incapacity and inability. Let us try to make up, in part, for the deficiency. The first dream prognosticated the future greatness of Phraelaong, whose sway, by the diffusion of his doctrines throughout the world, was to be universal, extending from one sea to the other sea. The grass growing out of his navel and reaching to the sky, was indicative of the spreading of his law, not only amongst the beings inhabiting the seat of men, but also amongst those dwelling in the abodes of Nats and Brahmas. The ants covering his legs, offer an enigma, the explanation of which is reserved to some future Edipus. As to the birds of various colors, gathering round him, from the four points of the compass, and on a sudden becoming all white, by their contact with him, they represent the innumerable beings, that will come to hear the preaching of the future Buddha with divers dispositions, and different progress in the way of merits, and will all be perfected by their following the true way to merit, that he will point out to them. The fifth dream in which Phraelaong thought he was walking on a mountain of filth, without being in the least contaminated by it, foreshowed the incomparable perfection and purity of Buddha, who though remaining in the world of passions, was no more to be affected by their influence.

Birds of varied colour and size appeared to come from all directions and fell at his feet, when on a sudden they all appeared white. 5th.—It seemed to him that he was walking on a mountain of filth, and passed over it without being in the least contaminated.

Phralaong awaking from his sleep, said to himself, after having reflected for a while on those five dreams: "To-day I shall certainly become a Budha." Thereupon he rose instantly, washed his hands and face, put on his dress and quietly waited the break of day, to go out in quest of his food. The moment being arrived to go out, he took up his putta and walked in the direction of the Gnianong tree. The whole tree was made shining by the rays which issued from his person: he rested there for a while. At that very moment, arrived Sounama to clear, according to her mistress' orders, the place for her offering. As she approached, she saw Phralaong at the foot of the tree; the rays of light which beamed out of his person, were reflected on the tree, which exhibited a most splendid and dazzling appearance. On observing this wonder, Sounama said to herself: of course the Nat has come down from the tree to receive the offering with his own hands. Overcome with an unutterable joy, she immediately ran to her mistress and related her adventure. Thoodzata was delighted at this occurrence, and wishing to give a substantial proof of her gratitude for such good news, she said to Sounama: "From this moment you are no more my servant; I adopt you for my elder daughter." She gave her instantly all the ornaments suitable to her new position. It is customary with all the Phralaongs to be provided, on the day they are to become Budha, with a gold cup of an immense value. Thoodzata ordered a golden vessel to be brought, and poured therein the Nogana, or boiled milk. As the water glides from the leaf of the water lily, without leaving thereon any trace, so the Nogana slided from the pot, into the golden cup and filled it up. She covered this cup with another of the same precious metal, and wrapped up the whole, with a white cloth. She forthwith put on her finest dress, and becomingly attired, she carried the golden cup over her head; and, with a decent gravity, walked towards the Gnialong tree. Overwhelmed with joy at seeing Phralaong, she reverentially advanced towards him, whom she mistook for a Nat. When near him, she placed gently the golden vessel on the ground, and in a gold basin, offered him scented water to wash his hands. At that moment, the earthen patta offered to Phralaong by the Brahma Gati-kara, disappeared. Perceiving that his patta had disappeared, he stretched forth his right hand, and washed it in the scented water; at the same time Thoodzata presented to him the golden cup containing the Nogana.

Having observed that she had caught the eyes of Phralaong, she said to him: my Lord Nat, I beg to offer you this food, together with the vessel that contains it. Having respectfully bowed down to him, she continued: may your joy and happiness be as great as mine; may you always delight in the happiest rest, ever surrounded by a great and brilliant retinue. Making, then, the offering of the gold cup, worth 100,000 pieces of silver, with the same disinterestedness as if she had given over but the dry leaf of a tree, she withdrew and returned to her home with a heart overflowing with joy.

Phralaong rising up, took with himself the golden cup, and having turned on the left of the Gnialong tree, went to the bank of the river Neritzara, to a place where more than 100,000 Budhas had bathed, ere they obtained the supreme intelligence. On the banks of that river, is a bathing place. Having left on that spot his golden cup, he undressed himself, and descended into the river. When he had bathed, he came out and put on his yellow robe, which in shape and form resembled that of his predecessors. He sat down, his face turned towards the east; his face resembled in appearance a well ripe palm fruit. He divided his exquisite food, into forty nine mouthfuls, which he ate all without mixing any water with it. During forty nine days he spent round the Bodh tree, Budha, never bathed, nor took any food, nor experienced the least want. His appearance and countenance remained unchanged; he spent the whole time absorbed, as it were, in an uninterrupted meditation. Holding up in his hands the empty golden vessel, Phralaong made the following prayer: If, on this day, I am to become a Budha, let this cup float on the water and ascend the stream. Whereupon he flung it in the stream, when by the power and influence of Phralaong's former good works, the vessel gently gliding towards the middle of the river, and then beating up the stream, ascended it with the swiftness of a horse, to the distance of eighty cubits, when it stopped, sunk into a whirlpool, went down to the country of Naga, and made a noise, on coming in contact with, and striking against, the three vessels of the three last Budhas, viz: Kaukathan, Gaunagong and Kathaba. On hearing this unusual noise, the chief of Nagas awoke from his sleep and said: "How is this? yesterday, a Budha appeared in the world, to-day again there is another." And in more than one hundred stanzas he sung praises to Budha.

On the banks of the river Neritzara, there is a grove of Sala trees, whither Phralaong repaired to spend the day under their cooling shade: in the evening he rose up and walked with the dignified and noble bearing of a lion, in a road eight oothabas wide, made by the Nats, and strewed with flowers, towards the Gnialong tree. The Nats, Nagas and Galongs joined in singing praises to him, playing instruments, and making offerings of the finest flowers and most exquisite perfumes, brought from their own seats. The same rejoicings took place in ten thousand other worlds. Whilst on his way towards the tree, he met with a young man just returning with a grass load he had cut in the fields. Foreseeing that Phralaong might require some portion of it for his use, he presented him an offering of eight handfuls of grass, which were willingly accepted, Arrived close to the Gniaong tree, Phrahaong stopped at the south of the tree, the face turned towards the 32.—We have now reached the most interesting episode of Phrahaong's life. He is to become a perfect Budha under the shade of the Gniaong or banyan tree (Ficus indica, Ficus religiosa.) There are two circumstances attending that great event, deserving peculiar notice. The first, is the preference given to the east over the three other points of the compass, and the second, the mighty combat that takes place between Phrahaong and the wicked Nat Mani, or Mar. I notice the first circumstance, because it agrees with the tradition prevailing amongst most nations previous to, or about, the coming of our Lord, that from the east there was to come an extraordinary personage, who would confer on the human race, the greatest benefits, and cause the return of happy times, like the golden age, so much celebrated by poets. The Roman historian Suetonius bears testimony to the existence of that tradition, as being universally known in his own days. It is not impossible that the same notion, not unknown in the far east, might have induced Phrahaong to look towards the east, at the supreme moment, when perfect intelligence was to become his happy lot. It may be said in opposition to this supposition, that the splendor and magnificence of the sun, emerging from the bosom of night, and dispelling darkness by pouring a flood of light on the face of the earth, restoring nature to life and action, were a sufficient inducement to Phrahaong for giving preference to the east. But to an ascetic like him, who has been convinced that this world is a mere illusion, such a consideration would weigh very little on his mind, and would not be a sufficient motive to induce him to give so marked a preference to the east.

The second circumstance remarkable for the time it occurred, is the great combat between Phrahaong and Mani. The first is the personification of goodness and benevolence towards all beings; the second is the personification of consummate wickedness. The contest is to take place between the good principle, on the one hand, and the evil one, on the other. Phrahaong, on his becoming Budha, will preach a law designed to dispel mental darkness, to check vicious passions, to show the right way to perfection, to unloose the ties that keep beings in the wretched state of existence, and enable them to reach safely the peaceful shores of Nirvana. Mani the devil itself, the father of darkness, of lies and deceit, delights in seeing all beings plunged into the abyss of vices, carried out of the right way, by the impetuous and irresistible torrent of their passions, and doomed to turn, for ever, in the whirlpool of endless existences. He looks upon himself as the king of this world, and proudly exults in contemplating all beings bending their neck under his tyrannical yoke, and acknowledging his undisputed power. Now the moment approaches when a mighty antagonist will contend with him, for the empire of the world. His mission will be to labor incessantly for the delivery of all beings, from the grasp of their mortal enemy, and set them free from the tyranny of passions. Mani is enraged at the audacious pretensions of Phrahaong: hence the gigantic efforts he makes to maintain his rights, and retain possession of his empire. At the time Phrahaong left the world to become a Rahan, Mani endeavored to dissuade him from attempting such a design. But on this occasion, the tempter summons all his forces to avert, by an irresistible attack, the deadly blow soon to be levelled at him. It is needless to add, that the reader in perusing the detailed account of the attack of Mani against Phrahaong, ought to bear in mind that it exhibits throughout, but an allegory of the opposition of north, when on a sudden the southern point of the globe seemed to lower down to the hell Awidzi, the lowest of all, whilst the northern one appeared to reach the sky. Then he said: verily this is not the place where I shall become a Budha. Thence Phralaong went on his right side towards the east of the tree, and standing up, the face turned towards the west, he said: this is indeed the evil to good. The victory of Phralaong over Manh exemplifies the final triumph of truth over error.

When the contest was nearly over, Phralaong objected to the claims of Manh to the possession of his throne, on the ground that he never had practised the 10 great virtues, nor performed works of kindness, charity and benevolence, which alone can entitle a being to obtain the Budhaship. It is to be borne in mind, that these qualifications form the real characteristics of a Budha, together with the possession of the supreme intelligence. In this system, they admit that there exist certain beings, called Pitsega-Budhas, who possess all the knowledge and science of a genuine Budha, but as they are divested of those benevolent feelings, which induce the former to labor earnestly for the benefit and salvation of all beings, they cannot be assimilated to the real Budhas. The cross-legged position which our Budha is always taking in preference to any other, whilst he spent 49 days at the foot of, and in various places round, the Budha tree, is, as every one knows, peculiar to, and favorite with, all Asiatics. But with him, it is the fittest position for meditation and contemplation. Hence most of the statues or images of Gaudama, exhibit or represent him in the cross-legged position, which he occupied, when he attained the Budhaship. As this event is by far the most important of his life, it is but natural that this great occurrence should ever be forced upon the attention and memory of his followers, by objects representing him on that most important stage of his last existence. It is not unusual to meet with statues of Gaudama, sometimes of colossal dimensions, representing him in a reclining position. This is the peculiar situation he occupied when he died. Hence those two most common images of Gaudama, are designed to remind his followers of the two greatest circumstances of his life, viz.: his becoming Budha, and his entering the state of Neibban.

Here again one is forcibly compelled to reflect on the singular role attributed to those Pitsega Budhas. They possess, all the science of a Budha, but are deficient in that kindness, benevolence and zeal which prompt the real Budhas to labor so strenuously for the deliverance of all beings. They appear but in those ages of darkness and ignorance, which are not to be brightened and enlightened by the presence of a Budha. They are like smaller luminaries, shedding a pale light among men, to prevent their sinking into an unfathomable abyss of ignorance; they maintain on earth, some sparks of the knowledge of fundamental truths, which otherwise would be completely obliterated from the memory of men. Not unlike the Prophets of old, they prepare men, in an indirect manner, for the coming of the future deliverer. Their mission being at an end, when a Budha is to come among men, they disappear and none of them is to be seen neither in the days of Budha, nor during all the time his religion is to last.
place, where all the preceding Budhas have obtained the supreme intelligence. Here, too, is the very spot, whereupon I shall become a Budha, and set up my throne. He took, by one of their extremities, the eight handfuls of grass and scattered them on the ground, when, on a sudden, there appeared emerging, as it were, from the bottom of the earth, a throne fourteen cubits high, adorned with the choicest sculptures and paintings, superior in perfection to all that art could produce. Phralaong, then, facing the east, uttered the following imprecation; "if I am not destined to become a Budha, may my bones, veins and skin remain on this throne, and my blood and flesh be dried up." He then ascended the throne, with his back turned against the tree, and his face, towards the east. He sat down, in a cross-legged position, firmly resolved never to vacate the throne, ere he had become a Budha. Such firmness of purpose, which the combined elements could not shake for a moment, no one ought to think of ever becoming possessed with.

Whilst Phralaong was sitting on the throne in that cross-legged position, Manh Nat said to himself: I will not suffer Prince Theiddat to overstep the boundaries of my empire. He summoned all his warriors and shouted to them. On hearing their chief's voice, the warriors gathered thick round his person. His countless followers in front, on his right and on his left, reached to the distance of eighteen youdzanas and above him to that of nine only. Behind him, they extended to the very limits of the world. The cries of that immense multitude, were re-echoed at a distance of 10,000 youdzanas, and resembled the roaring of the mighty sea. Manh Nat rode the elephant Girimegala, measuring in length 5 youdzanas. Supplied with one thousand right arms, he wielded all sorts of the most deadly weapons. His countless warriors, to avoid confusion, were all disposed in ranks, bearing their respective armour. They appeared like immense clouds, slowly rolling on and converging towards Phralaong.
At that time, Nats surrounded Phralaong, singing praises to him; the chief Thagia was playing on his conque, whereof a single blowing resounds for four entire months; the chief Naga was uttering stanzas in his honor; a chief Brahma held over him the white umbrella. On the approach of Manh Nat's army, they were all seized with an uncontrollable fear, and fled to their respective places. The Naga dived into the bottom of the earth, at a depth of 500 youdzanas, and covering his face with his two wings, fell into a deep sleep. The Thagia, swinging his conque upon his shoulders, ran to the extremity of the world. The Brahma, holding still the umbrella by the extremity of the handle, went up to his own country. Phralaong was, therefore, left alone. Manh Nat, turning to his followers, cried to them: there is, indeed, no one equal to the Prince Theiddat, let us not attack him in front, but let us assail him from the north side.

On that moment, Phralaong lifting his eyes, looked on his right, left and and front, for the crowd of Nats, Brahmas and Thagias, that were paying him their respects. But they had all disappeared. He saw the army of Manh Nat coming thick upon him, from the north, like a mighty storm. What! said he, is it against me alone that such a countless crowd of warriors has been assembled? I have no one to help me, no father, no brothers, no sisters, no friends and no relatives. But I have with me the ten great virtues which I have practised; the merits I have acquired in the practise of these virtues, will be my safeguard and protection; these are my offensive and defensive weapons, and with them I will crush down the great army of Manh. Whereupon he quietly remained meditating upon the merits of the ten great virtues.

Whilst Phralaong was thus absorbed in meditation, Manh Nat began his attack upon him. He caused a wind to blow with such an extraordinary violence, that it brought down the tops of mountains, though they were one or two youdzanas thick. The trees of the forests were shattered to atoms. But the virtue of Phralaong's merits preserved him from the destructive storm. His tsiwaran itself was not agitated. Perceiving that his first effort was useless, Manh caused a heavy rain to fall with such violence, that it tore the earth, and opened it to its very bottom. But not even a single drop touched Phralaong's person. To this succeeded a shower of rocks, accompanied with smoke and fire; but they were changed into immense masses of flowers, which dropped at Budha's feet. There came afterwards another shower of swords, knives and all kinds of cutting weapons emitting smoke and fire. They all fell powerless at the feet of Phralaong. A storm of burning ashes and sand soon darkened the atmosphere, but they fell in front of him, like fragrant dust. Clouds of mud succeeded, which fell like perfumes all round and over Phralaong. Manh caused a thick darkness to fill the atmosphere, but to Phralaong it emitted rays of the purest light. The enraged Manh cried to his followers: why do you stand looking on? Rush at once upon him and compel him to flee before me. Sitting on his huge elephant and brandishing his formidable weapons, Manh approached close to Phralaong and said to him: Theiddat, this throne is not made for you; vacate it forthwith—it is my property. Phralaong calmly answered: you have not as yet practised the ten great virtues, nor gone through the five acts of self-denial, you have never devoted your life to help others to acquire merits; in a word you have not yet done all the needful to enable you to obtain the supreme dignity of Phra. This throne, therefore, cannot be yours. Unable to control any longer his passion, Manh threw his formidable weapons at Phralaong; but they were converted into garlands of beautiful flowers that adapted themselves gracefully round his body. His sword and other weapons, that could cut at once through the hardest rocks, were employed with no better success. The soldiers of Manh hoping that their united efforts would have a better result, and that they could thrust Phralaong from his throne, made a sudden and simultaneous rush at him, rolling against him, with an irresistible force, huge rocks as large as mountains; but by the virtues of their opponent's merits, they were converted into fine nosegays that gently dropped at his feet.

At that time, the Nats, from their seats, looked down on the scene of the combat, suspended between hope and fear. Phralaong, at that moment, said to Manh: how do you dare to pretend to the possession of this throne? Could you ever prove, by indubitable evidence, that you have ever made offerings enough to be deserving of this throne? Manh, turning to his followers, answered: here are my witnesses; they all will bear evidence in my favor. At the same moment they all shouted aloud to testify their approval of Manh's words. "As to you, Prince Theiddat, where are the witnesses that will bear evidence in your favor and prove the justness of your claim to the possession of this throne?" Phralaong replied: my witnesses are not like yours, men, or any living beings. 53 The earth itself will give testimony to me. For,

53.—The witness whom Phralaong summoned in support of his claim to the undisturbed possession of the throne, was the earth itself. It may be from the example that was set on this occasion, that Buddhists have borrowed the habit of calling the earth as a witness of the good works they have done or are about doing. I will briefly relate what is done and said on such occasions. During my former residence in Burma, I observed on a certain occasion, when taking my evening walk, about ten or twelve persons of both sexes assembled on a rather retired spot, in the vicinity of a Pagoda. As they appeared all quite attentive, I came near to them to see what was the cause that had brought them thither, and what occurrence seemed to rivet their attention. As I was known to some of them, they were not frightened by my sudden apparition. On my asking them the motive of their assembling here at a late hour, they said, that having buried yesterday a child two years old, they came to make some offerings of boiled rice, plantains, and other fruits, to propitiate the Nat of the place. Having asked them to repeat the formula they had uttered on the occasion, they kindly complied with my request. Here is the substance of that formula. "Believing in the three precious things—Buddha, the Law and the Assembly of the perfect, I make this offering that I may be delivered from all present and future miseries. May all beings existing in the four states of punishment, reach the fortunate seats of Nats! I wish all my relatives and all men inhabiting this and other worlds, to have a share in this meritorious work. O earth and you Nats, guardians of this place, be witness to the offering I am making." On uttering these last words, the offerer of the present or a Tulapoin sent for this purpose, pours down some water on the ground.
without alluding even to those offerings I have made during several previous existences, I will but mention the forty seven great ones I made, whilst I lived as Prince Wethandra. Stretching out his right hand, which he had, hitherto, kept under the folds of his garment, and pointing to the earth, he said with a firm voice: Earth, is it not true that at the time I was Prince Wethandra, I made forty great offerings? The earth replied with a deep and loud roaring, resounding in the midst of Manh's legions, like the sound of countless voices threatening to spread death and destruction in their ranks. The famous charger of Manh bent his knees and paid homage to Phralaong. Manh himself disheartened and discomfited fled to the country of Watha-watti. His followers were so overpowered by fear, that they flung away all that could impede their retreat, and ran away in every direction. Such was the confusion and disorder that prevailed, that two warriors could not be seen following the same course, in their flight.

Looking from their seats on the defeat of Manh and the glorious victory of Phralaong, the Nats rent the air with shouts of exultation. The Brahmases, Nagas and Galongs joined the Nats in celebrating his triumph over his enemies. They all hastened from more than ten thousand worlds, to pay their respects and offer their felicitation, presenting him with flowers and perfumes saying: victory and glory to Phralaong! Shame and defeat to the infamous Manh!

It was a little while before sun-set, that Phralaong had 54.—As the Nats and all other beings are to be benefitted by the preachings of Buddha, it is but natural that they all join in singing his praises and exalting his glorious achievements. The Nagas and Galongs are fabulous animals, which are often mentioned in the course of this legend. It has been observed in a former note, that according to the Buddhistic notions, animals are beings in a state of punishment, differing from man, not in nature, but in merits. Some of them having nearly exhausted the sum of their demerits, begin to feel the influence of former merits. They are supposed to have to a certain extent, the use of reason. No wonder, if they rejoice at seeing the triumph of him, who is to help them in advancing towards a condition better than their present one.

achieved his splendid victory over his proud foe. At that time, he was wrapped up, as it were, in the profoundest meditation. The extremities of the branches of the Bodhi tree,\(^5\) fell gently over him, and, by their undulations, seemed caressing, as it were, his tsiwaran: they resembled so many beautiful nosegays of red flowers that were offered to him. At the first watch of the night, Phralaong applied all the energies of his powerful mind to ascertain the laws of the causes and effects, in order to account for all that is in existence. He argued in the following manner: pain and all sorts of miseries do exist in this world. Why do they exist? Because there is birth: Why is there birth? Because there is conception. Now conception does take place, because there is existence, or that moral state produced by the action or influence of merits and demerits. Existence is brought in, by \textit{Upadana} or the combining of affections calculated to cause the coming into existence. The latter has for its cause the desire. The desire is produced by sensation. The latter is caused by the contact. The contact takes place, because there are the six senses. The six senses do exist, because there is name and form, that is to say, the exterior sign of the ideal being, and the type of the real being. Name and form owe their existence to erroneous knowledge; the latter in its turn is produced by the imagination, which has, for its cause, ignorance.*

\(^5\) The Banyan tree at the foot of which Phralaong obtains perfect intelligence, is occasionally called throughout this narrative, Bodhi tree. The word Bodhi means wisdom, science or knowledge. The Burmese in their sacred writings always mention the tree by that name, because, under its shade, perfect science was communicated to Phralaong. It is supposed to occupy the very centre of the Island of Dzampudiba. During all the while, Phra or Budha (let us call him now by that name) remained under that tree, his mind was engaged in the most profound meditation which the gigantic efforts of his enemy could scarcely interrupt. It is not to be inferred from the narrative in the text, that supreme intelligence was communicated suddenly or by miraculous process to our Budha. He was already prepared, by former mental labors, to that grand result: he had previously capacitated himself by studies and reflection for the reception of that more than human science; he required but a last and mighty effort of his intelligence to arrive finally at the acme of knowledge and thereby to become a perfect Budha. That last effort was made on this occasion, and crowned with the most complete success. He gained the science of the past, present and future. It would be somewhat curious to investigate the motives that have determined Buddhists to give to that sacred tree, the name of Bodhi. At first sight one will infer that such name was given to the tree, because, under its refreshing and cooling shade, the Bodhi or Supreme intelligence, was communicated to Phralaong. The occurrence, however extraordinary it be, is scarcely sufficient to account for such an appellation. Bearing in mind the numerous and striking instances of certain revealed facts and truths, offered to the attention of the reader of this legend, in a deformed but yet recognisable shape, it would not be quite out of the limits of probability, to suppose that this is also a remnant of the tradition of the tree of knowledge, that occupied the centre of the garden of Eden.

* The theory of the twelve causes and effects is in itself, very abstruse and almost above the comprehension of those uninitiated to the metaphysics of Buddhists. I will attempt to analyse it in a way, as simple and clear as possible. This theory is very ancient, probably coeval with the first ages of Buddhism. It forms the basis of its ontology and metaphysics, in the same manner as the four great and transcendent truths are the foundation whereon rests the system of morals. It is probable that Gautama, in his preachings, which were very simple and within the reach of ordinary minds, never formulated his doctrine, on this essential point, in such a dry and concise manner. But the seed was sown and the germ deposited here and there, in his instructions. His immediate disciples, in endeavoring to give a distinct shape to their master’s doctrines, gradually framed the formula, or theory just exposed. It, in fact, presents the very characteristics of a system elaborated in a philosophical school.

In taking our departure from the first cause which is Avidya, or ignorance, or the wanting in science, or no knowledge, we have to follow the different stages and conditions of a being, until it reaches decrepitude, old age, and death. When we speak of ignorance, or no science, we must not suppose the material existence of a being that ignores. But we must take ignorance in an abstract sense, deprived of forms, and subsisting in a manner very different from what we are wont to consider ordinary beings. A European has a great difficulty in finding its way through a process of reasoning so extraordinary and so different from that positivism, he is used to. But with the Buddhist, the case is widely different. He can pass from the abstract to the concrete, from the ideal to the real, with the greatest ease. But let us follow the scale of the causes and effects, upon which there are twelve steps.

From ignorance comes Sangkara, that is to say, conception or imagination which mistakes for reality, what is unreal, which looks on this world as something substantial, whilst, it is, indeed, nothing but shadow and emptiness, assuming forms which pass away, as quick as the representations of theatrical exhibitions. Sangkara, in its turn, begets Wignian, or knowledge, attended with a notion of sentiment, implying that of soul and life, in an abstract sense. From Wignian proceeds Namrup, the name and form, because knowledge can have for its object but name and form. No, or, to speak the language of Buddhists, things that are external and internal. But let it be borne in mind that what is herein meant, is but the individuality of an ideal being.

The name and form give birth to the Chanatana, six senses, or seats of the sensible qualities. To our division of the five ordinary senses, Buddhists add the sixth sense of Mano or the heart, the internal sense. Through the Having followed in his mind, the succession of the twelve causes and effects, and reached the last link of senses, we are put in communication or contact with all objects, hence the six senses give rise to the sixth cause Pasa, which means properly speaking, contact. From this cause flows the seventh one, called Vedana or sensation, or in more general manner, sensibility. In fact, there can be no contact from which there will not result some sensation either pleasant or unpleasant. Vedana gives infallibly rise to Tahans or passion, or desire, or inclination. From this point, the series of causes and effects is comparatively easy, because it presents conditions essentially connected with a material object. By Tahana we ought not to understand only, the mere inclination that the sexes have one for the other, but the general propensity created in a being by any contact sooner, or perhaps, as usual with Buddhists, the desire taken in an abstract sense.

The immediate result from Tahana, is Upadana, the attachment, or the conception. It is that state in which the desire adheres to something, assumes a shape. It is, in fact, the being conceived. From the state of conception, the being passes into that of Bhava or existence, or that condition which is created and made by the influence of former good or bad deeds, preceding birth, which is but the apparition of the being into this world. Bhavani or birth is the eleventh cause. It is the ushering of a being into the world. There are six ways by which a being comes into this world, viz: those of Nat, Man, Asura, Pretita, Animal and the inhabitant of hell. Birth is accomplished in four different manners; by humidity, an egg, a matrice and metamorphosis.

The twelfth and last step in the ladder of the causes and effects, is decrepitude and death. In fact every being that is born, must grow old, decay and finally die.

Such is the process followed by Buddhists, in attempting to account for all that exists. What effect could such a reasoning have over the mind of the generality of hearers, it is difficult to say. But we may rest assured, that, though these principles existed, as an embryo, into the discourse of the author of Buddhism, they were never laid before the generality of hearers in that crude scholastic form. Such abstruse ideas, when analyzed and commented upon by Buddhist doctors, gave rise to the most opposite conclusions. The materialist school based its revolting doctrines, upon that theory; we may add that the opinions of that school, are gen-rally held in Burmah, and by the great mass of Buddhists. Some other doctors reasoned in the following manner: Ignorance supposes two things, a being ignoring, and a thing ignored, that is to say, man and the world. They admitted the eternity of a soul which had to pass through the series above enumerated. With them, metempsychosis was a process exactly similar to that imagined by the Brahmins. As to the world, it was, to them an, unreality. Knowledge enabled them to come to the position of understanding and believing that, there is no such thing as what we, by mistake, call world. The latter opinion which seems to admit of a principle existing distinct from matter, is opposed to the former and general one, which supposes that spirit is but a modification of matter.

We deliberately make use of the doubt implying expression, at the head of the preceding sentence, respecting the real opinions of the latter school, because, in their way of arguing, it is impossible not to come to the painful conclusion, that they ignore or do not admit a distinction between spirit and matter.
that chain, Phralaong said to himself: ignorance or no science, is the first cause which gives rise to all the phenomena I have successively reviewed. From it, springs the world and all the beings it contains. It is the cause of that universal illusion in which man and all beings are miserably lulled. By what means can this ignorance be done away with? Doubtless by knowledge and true science. By means of the light that science spreads, I clearly see the unreality of all that exists, and I am freed from that illusion which makes other beings to believe that such thing exists, when, in reality, it does not exist. The imagination or the faculty to imagine the existence of things which do not exist, is done away with. The same fate is reserved to the false knowledge resulting therefrom, to the name and form, to the six senses, to contact, to sensation, to desire, to conception, to existence, to birth and to pain, or miseries.

Then Phralaong says to himself; the knowledge of the four great truths is the true light that can dispel ignorance and procure the real science whereby the coming out from the whirlpool of existences, or from the state of illusion, can be perfectly effected. These four truths are: 1, the miseries of the existence, 2, the cause productive of misery, which is the desire ever renewed of satisfying one's self, without being able ever to secure that end. 3, The destruction of that desire, or the estranging one's self from is the important affair deserving the most serious attention. 4, The means of obtaining the individual annihilation of that desire, is supplied solely by the four Meggas or highways leading to perfection. But these Meggas can be followed but by those who have a right intention, a right will, and who, throughout life, exert themselves to regulate their action, conduct, language, thought and meditations. It was, then, that the heart of Phralaong acquired an unshakable firmness, a perfect purity or exemption from all passions, an unalterable meekness, and a strong feeling of tender compassion towards all beings.
When these fundamental truths had been known, felt and relished, Phra Laong's mind casting a glance over the past, was able to discover at once all that had taken place during the countless states of his former existences. He recollected the name he had borne, those of his parents, of the places he had seen and visited, of the caste he had belonged to, and all the chief events that had marked the

* In a work different from that which has been translated, is found a more developed exposition of the four great and sublime truths. We think that the reader will like to see, in what manner Buddhists themselves understand this important subject, which is, with them, the foundation of their doctrine on morals.

There are four great truths: pain, the production of pain, the destruction of pain, and the way leading to that destruction. What is pain, which is the first of the great truths! It is birth, old age, sickness, death, the coming in contact with what we dislike, the separation from what we feel an attachment for, the illusion which begets false knowledge. All that is pain. What is the production of pain, the second sublime truth! It is the desire which incessantly longs for an illusory satisfaction, which can never be obtained. That desire is a perpetually renewed craving, coveting objects here and there, and never being satiated. Such is the cause productive of pain; such is the prolific source of all miseries. That is the second great truth. What is the destruction of pain, which is the third great truth? It is the doing away with that desire, which always shows itself, searches after this or that object, is always attended with feelings of pleasure or some other sensations. It is the perfect and entire stifling of that craving which always covets and is never satiated. The estranging oneself from that desire and that craving, the complete destruction of both constitute the third great truth. What is the way leading to the destruction of that desire, which is the fourth great truth? The way which one has to follow, in order to obtain that most desirable result is that which the wise man invariably follows, when he is with an intention, will, diligence, action, life, language, thought and meditation always pure and correct.

The four truths are exceedingly praised by Buddhists: they constitute what is emphatically called the law of the wheel, incessantly revolving upon itself and always presenting successively these four points, to the attentive consideration and affectionate piety of the faithful. They are the offensive weapons where with passions are attacked and destroyed; they are the sword that cuts asunder the link that retains a being into the circle of existences. The revelation or manifestation of those truths, is the great work that a Buddha has to perform. When it is made, all beings in their respective seats, rejoice in an extraordinary manner. Inanimate nature, even, partakes in the universal joy. The earth shakes with a great violence, and the greatest prodigies proclaim aloud the fortunate manifestation of a law which opens to all beings the way leading to the deliverance. The preaching of that doctrine took place, for the first time, in the forest of Migadawon, not far from Barmahtho, in the presence, and for the benefit of the five Rahans, who had attended on Buddha, during the six years of mortification, which he spent, to prepare and qualify himself for the Buddha'ship.
course of his progress through the continual migrations. He likewise, saw reflected, as in a mirror, the former conditions of existence of all other beings. The immense development and expansion of his mind, which enabled him to fathom the depth of the past, happened during the first watch of the night.

He applied, now, all the expanded powers of his incomparable mind, to take a correct survey of all the beings now in existence. He glanced over all those that were in hell, and the other three states of punishment, those living on earth, and those dwelling in the twenty-six superior seats. He, at once, understood distinctly their state, condition, merits, demerits and all that appertained to their phisical and moral constitutive parts. This labor occupied his mind up to midnight.

Urged by the merciful and compassionate dispositions of his soul, Phralaang often revolved within himself, the following: all is misery and affliction in this world: all beings are miserably detained in the vortex of existences: they float over the whirlpool of desire and concupiscence; they are carried to and fro, by the fallacious cravings of a never obtained satisfaction. They must be taught to put an end to concupiscence, by freeing themselves from its influence. Their mind must be imbued with the knowledge of the four great truths. The four ways that I have discovered, shall inevitably lead men and Nats, to that most desirable end. Those ways ought to be pointed out to them: that, by following them, men and Nats may obtain the deliverance.

Whilst these thoughts thronged over his mind, a little before break of day, in the 103th year of the Eatzana era, on the day of the full moon of Katson, the perfect science broke, at once, over him: he became the Budha.

When this great wonder took place, ten thousand worlds were shaken twelve times, with such a violence as to make hairs stand on one end. These words "most excellent being," were heard throughout the same series of worlds. Magnificent ornaments decorated all places. Flagstaffs appeared in every direction, adorned with splendid streamers. Of such dimensions were they, that the extremities of those in the east, reached the opposite side of the west; and those in the north, the southern boundary. Some flags, hanging from the seats of Brahmans, reached the surface of the earth. All the trees of ten thousand worlds, shot out branches loaded with fruits and flowers. The five sorts of lilies bloomed spontaneously. From the cliffs of rocks, beautiful flowers sprang out. The whole universe appeared, like an immense garden, covered with flowers; a vivid light illuminated those places, the darkness of which could not be dispersed by the united rays of seven suns. The water which fills the immensity of the deep, at a depth of eighty-four thousand youdzanas, became fresh and offered a most ageable drink. Rivers suspended their course; the blind recovered their sight; the deaf could hear, and the lame were able to walk freely. The captives were freed from their chains and restored to their liberty. Innumerable other wonders took place at the moment Phraalaong received the supreme intelligence. He said then to himself: Previous to my obtaining the supreme knowledge, I have, during countless generations, moved in the circle of ever renewed existences and borne up misery. Now I see this distinctly. Again I perceive how I can emancipate myself from the trammels of existence, and extricate myself from all miseries and wretchedness attending generation; my will is fixed on the most amiable state of Neibban. I have now arrived to that state of perfection that excludes all passions.

It was at the full moon of the month Katson, that those memorable occurrences took place, and it was day-light, when Phraalaong had at last obtained the fullness of the Budhaship. After this glorious and triumphant achievement, Phraalaong, whom, from this moment, we must call Phra or Budha, continued to remain on the throne, in a cross-legged position, with a mind absorbed into contemplation, during seven days. Mental exertion and labor were at an end. Truth, in its effulgent beauty, encompassed his mind and shed over it, the purest rays. Placed in that luminous centre, Phra saw all beings entangled in the web of passions, tossed over the raging billows of the sea of renewed existences, whirling into the vortex of endless miseries, tormented incessantly and wounded to the quick by the sting of concupiscence; sunk into the dark abyss of ignorance, the wretched victims of an illusory, unsubstantial and unreal world. He said, then, to himself: in all the worlds, there is no one but I, who know how to break through the web of passions, to still the waves that waft beings from one state into another, to save them from the whirlpool of miseries, to put on end to concupiscence and break its sting, to dispel the mist of ignorance by the light of truth, to teach all intelligent beings, the unreality and non existence of this world, and thereby lead them to the true state of Neibban. Having, thus, given vent to the feelings of compassion, that pressed on his benevolent heart, Phra, glancing over future events, delighted in contemplating the great number of beings who would avail themselves of his preachings, and labor to free themselves, from the slavery of passions. He counted the multitudes who would enter the ways that lead to the deliverance, and would obtain the rewards to be enjoyed by those who will follow one of those ways. The Baranathee country would be favored first of all, with the preaching of the law of the wheel. He reviewed the countries where his religion would be firmly established. He saw that Maheinda, the son of king Asoka, would carry his law to Ceylon, 236 years after his Neibban.

When these and other subjects were fully exhausted, the most excellent Phra came down from his throne and went, to a distance of ten fathoms from the Bodi tree, in a north-east direction. There he stood, the eyes fixedly riveted on the throne, without a single wink, during seven consecutive days, given up to the most intense and undisturbed meditation. The Nats, observing this extraordinary posture, imagined that he regretted the throne he had just vacated and that he wanted to repossess himself of it. They concluded that such being the case, Prince Theiddat had not as yet obtained the Budhaship. When the period of seven days was over, Budha who knew the innermost thoughts of the Nats, resolved to put an end to their incredulous thinking, respecting his person. For that purpose, he had recourse to the display of miraculous powers. He raised himself high up in the air, and, to their astonished regards, he wrought, at once, more than a thousand wonders, which had the immediate effect of silencing all their doubts, and convincing them that he was, indeed, the Budha.

Having come down, on the place he had started from, for the display of prodigies, Budha, went to the north of the tree Bodi, at a distance of but two fathoms from it. He spent this time in walking to and fro, from east to west, during seven days, over a road prepared for that purpose by the Nats. He was engaged, all the while, in the work of the sublimest contemplation.

He then shaped his course in a north west direction, at a distance of thirteen fathoms from the sacred tree. There stood a beautiful house shining like gold, resplendent with precious stones. It was a temporary residence purposely prepared for him by the Nats. Thither he repaired and sat down in a cross-legged position, during seven days. He devoted all his time to meditating on the Abidamma or the most excellent science. This science is divided into seven books. Phra had already gone over the six first and fully mastered their contents, but the six glories had not, as yet, shot forth from his person.

56—Buddhists allow to their Budha, the power of working wonders and miracles. How is this power conferred upon him? This is a difficulty they cannot explain satisfactorily. The science of Budha makes him acquainted with all the laws regulating nature, that is to say, the ensemble of the animate and inanimate beings constituting a world; but one is at a loss to find the origin of that power which enables him, as often as he likes, to suspend the course of those laws. Be that as it may, certain it is, that Budha resorted always, during the course of his preachings, to miracles in order to convince those who seemed to listen with rather an incredulous ear to his doctrines. Miracles were used successfully, as powerful and irresistible weapons, against certain heretics, the Brahmins in particular, who taught doctrines opposed to his own. They often accompanied his preachings, for increasing faith in the heart of his hearers.

It was but after having mastered the contents of the last division, named Pathan, divided into twenty-four parts, that the six glories appeared. Like the great fishes that delight to sport but in the great ocean, the mind of Budha expanded itself with undescribable eagerness, and delighted to run, unrestrained, through the unbounded field opened before him, by the contents of that volume. Brown rays issued from his hairs, beard, and eyelids. Gold-like rays shot forth from his eyes and skin; from his flesh and blood dashed out purple beams, and from his teeth and bones escaped rays white like the leaves of the lily; from his hands and feet emanated rays of a deep red color, which, falling on the surrounding objects, made them appear like so many rubies of the purest water. His forehead sent forth undulating rays, resembling those reflected by cut crystal. The objects which received those rays, appeared as mirrors, reflecting the rays of the sun. Those six rays of various hues, caused the earth to resemble a globe of the finest gold. Those beams at first penetrated through our globe which is 82,000 youdzanas thick, and thence illuminated the mass of water which supports our planet. It resembled a sea of gold. That body of water, though 480,000 youdzanas thick, could not stop the elastic projection of those rays, which went forth through a stratum of air 960,000 youdzanas thick, and were lost in the vacuum. Some beams, following a vertical direction, rushed through the six seats of Nats, the 16 of Brahmas, and the four superior ones, and thence were lost in vacuum. Other rays following an horizontal direction, penetrated through an infinite series of worlds. The sun, the moon, the stars, appeared like opaque bodies, deprived of light. The famous garden of Nats, their splendid palace, the ornaments hanging from the tree Pad etha, were all cast into the shade and appeared obscure, as if wrapped up in complete darkness. The body of the chief Brahma, which sends forth light through one million of systems, emitted, then, but the feeble and uncertain light of the glow-worm at sun-rise. This marvellous light emanating from the person of Buddha, was not the result of vowing or praying: but all the constituent parts of his body became purified, to such an extent, by the sublime meditation of the most excellent law, that they shone with a matchless brightness.

Having thus spent seven days in that place, close to the Bodi tree, he repaired to the foot of another Gnlaong tree, called Atzapala, or the shepherds tree, so called, because, under its cooling shade, shepherds and their flocks of goats rested during the heat of the day. It was situated at the east of the Bodi, at a distance of thirty fathoms. There he sat in a cross-legged position, during seven days, enjoying the sweetness of self-recollection. It was near to that place, that the vile Manh, who since his great attack on Budha, had never lost sight of him, but had always secretly followed him with a wicked spirit, was compelled to confess that he had not been able to discover in that Rahan, any thing blameable, and expressed the fear of seeing him at once pass over the boundaries of his empire. The tempter stooped in the middle of the highway, and across it, drew successively sixteen lines, as he went on reflecting on sixteen different subjects. When he had thought over each of the ten great virtues, he drew, first, ten lines, saying: the great Rahan has indeed practised, to a high degree, those ten virtues. I cannot presume to compare myself to him. In drawing the 11th, he confessed that he had not, like that Rahan, the science that enabled to know the inclinations and dispositions of all beings.—In drawing the 14th, he said that he had not as yet acquired the knowledge of all that concerns the nature of the various beings. Drawing the four remaining lines, he confessed successively that he did not feel, like that Rahan, a tender compassion for the beings yet entangled in the miseries of existence, nor could he perform miracles, nor perceive every thing, nor attain to the perfect and supreme knowledge of the law. On all these subjects, he avowed his decided inferiority to the great Rahan.

Whilst Manh was thus engaged, with a sad heart, in meditating over those rather humiliating points, he was at last found out by his three daughters Tahna, Aratee and Raga, who had been, for sometime, looking after him. When they saw their father with a cast down countenance, they came to him, and enquired about the motive of his deep affliction. Beloved daughters, replied Manh, I see this Rahan escaping from my dominion, and notwithstanding my searching examination, I have not been able to detect in him anything reprehensible. This is the only cause of my inexpressible affliction. Dear father, replied they, banish all sorrows from your mind, and be of a good heart—we will, very soon, have found out the weak side of the great Rahan, and triumphantly bring him back within the hitherto unpassed limits of your empire. Beware of the man you will have to deal with, replied Manh. I believe that no effort, however great, directed against him, shall ever be rewarded with success. He is of a firm mind and unshaken purpose. I fear you shall never succeed in bringing him back within my dominions. Dear father, said they, we women know how to manage such affairs; we will catch him like a bird, in the net of concupiscence,—let fear and anxiety be for ever dispelled from your heart. Having given this assurance, forthwith they went to Budha and said to him: illustrious Rahan, we approach you respectfully and express the wish of staying with you, that we might minister to all your wants. Without heeding in the least their words, nor even casting a glance at them, the most excellent Budha remained unmoved, enjoying the happiness of meditation. Knowing that the same appearance, face and bodily accomplishments may not be equally pleasing, they assumed, the one, the appearance of a heart winning young girl, the other, that of a blooming virgin, and the third, that of a fine middle aged beauty. Having, thus, made their arrangements, they approached Budha, and several times expressed to him the desire of staying with him and ministering to all his wants. Unmoved by all their allurements, Budha said to them: for what purpose do you come to me? You might have some chance of success with those that have not as yet extinguished in, and rooted from, their heart the various passions; but I, like all the Budhas, my predecessors, have destroyed in me, concupiscence, passion and ignorance. No effort on your part, will ever be able to bring me back, into the world of passions. I am free from all passions, and have obtained supreme wisdom. By what possible means could you ever succeed in bringing me back into the whirlpool of passions? The three daughters of Manh, covered with confusion, yet overawed with admiration and astonishment, said to each other: Our father, forsooth, had given us a good and wise warning. This great Rahan deserves the praises of men and Nats. Every thing in him is perfect: to him it belongs to instruct men in all things they want to know. Saying this, they, with a cast down countenance, returned to their father.

57.—The great tempter had been foiled in all his attempts to conquer Budha: in the sadness of his heart, he was compelled to acknowledge the superiority of his opponent and confess his defeat. His three daughters came to console him, promising that they would, by their united efforts, overcome the firmness of the great Rahan, by awakening in his heart, the fire of concupiscence. The names of those three daughters of Manh, mean concupiscence. Those new enemies of Budha are mere personifications of the passion of lust. Pride, personified in Manh, had proved powerless against the virtue of Budha; he is now assailed from a different quarter; the attack is to be directed against the weakest side of human nature. But it is as unsuccessful as the former one; it affords to Budha another occasion for a fresh triumph.

It was in that very same place, at the foot of the Adzapala Gniahong that a heretic Pounha, named Mingalika, proud of his caste, came with hasty steps, speaking loud; and, with little respect, approached the spot where Budha was sitting. Having entered into conversation with him,

58.—In Burmah the originator of the great Buddhistic system is called Gaudama, and this appellation according to many, appears to be his family name. When he is called Rahan Gaudama, it means the ascetic belonging to the family of Gaudama. In Nepal, the same personage is known under the Pounha heard from his mouth, instructions worthy of being ever remembered. He said to Budha: Lord Gaudama, I have two questions to put to you: whence comes the name Pounha? What are the duties to be performed in order to become a real Pounha? Budha penetrating with the keen eye of wisdom, into the innermost soul of the name of Thakiamuni, that is to say, the ascetic of the Thakin family. Those who refused to believe in Budha and his doctrines, those who held tenets disagreeing with his own, and professed what, in the opinion of their adversaries, was termed a heretical creed, invariably called Budha by his family name, placing him on the same level, with so many of his contemporaries, who led the same mode of life. The Siamese give the appellation of Sanman Khodom, to their Budha, that is to say, Thramana Gaudama, or Gautama. The Sanskrit word Thramana means an ascetic, who has conquered his passions and lives on alms. Gaudama belonged to the Khatria caste. The kings and all royal families in these days, came out of the same caste. Hence his father Thoosdavana was king of the country of Kapilawot, anciently a small state, north of Gornakapore.

The young Pounha, not unlike the young man mentioned in the Gospel, had, by the preachings of Gaudama, become acquainted with all the laws and practices relating to the general duties and obligations incumbent on all men in general. He might have perhaps added, that he had observed all those precepts from his youth, or at least, that he was sure now, with the additional light he had received from his eminent teacher, to observe faithfully all the injunctions mentioned in the course of the lecture; but he was not satisfied with an ordinary proficiency in virtue and observances; he aimed at superior attainments; he wished to obtain the greatest perfection, that is to say, that of Brahmas. In what does consist such a perfection? The book of metaphysics informs us that the five states of Dzan, or contemplations, are enjoyed by the beings located in the sixteen seats of Brahmas, in the following order. The first state, or that of consideration, is shared by all the beings inhabiting the three first seats of Brahmas. Their occupation is to consider the various subjects the mind has to dwell on. The second Dzan, or reflection, is reserved for the beings occupying the next three seats. Those beings have no more to look out for subjects of meditation. Their sole occupation is to dive into truth and fathom its depth and various bearings. The third state of Dzan procures the pleasure which is derived from the contemplation of truth, and belongs to the beings of the three seats, superior to those just alluded to; in the fourth Dzan is enjoyed a placid happiness which is the result of the possession of truth; it is reserved for the beings of the three next seats. The fifth Dzan, or perfect stability, is the happy lot of the beings living in the five last seats. Those fortunate inmates are so entirely rooted in truth, and so perfectly exempt from all that causes mutability, that they arrive to a state of complete fixity; the whole of their soul being riveted on truth.

Apology is certainly due to the reader who is but slightly initiated to such abstruse subjects, for laying before him, such particulars he is so unfamiliar with; but this trouble must be borne up by him who desires to obtain access into the gloomy sanctuary of Budhism.
his interlocutor, answered: the real and genuine Pounha is he, who has renounced all passions, put an end to concupiscence, and has entered the ways leading to perfection. But there are others, who are proud of their origin, who walk hastily, speak with a loud voice, and who have not done the needful to destroy the influence of passions. These are called Pounhas, because of their caste and birth. But the true Sage avoids every thing that is rash, impetuous or noisy: he has conquered all his passions, and put an end to the principle of demerits. His heart loves the repetition of formulas of prayers, and delights in the exercise of meditation. He has reached the last way to perfection. In him there is no longer waverings, nor doubt, nor pride. This man really deserves the name of Pounha or pure: he is, indeed the true Pounha according to the law. The instruction being finished, the Pounha rose respectfully from his place, wheeled on the right and departed.

Budha continued the sublime work of contemplating pure truth through the means of intense reflection. Having remained seven days in that position, and arising from ecstasy, Budha went to the south eastern direction of the Bodi tree, at a distance of an oothaba, (1 oothaba = to 20 tas, 1 ta = to 7 cubits,) on the 6th day after the full moon of Nayon. On that spot, there was a tank, called Hidza-lee-dana. On the bank of that tank, he sat under the shade of the Kiin tree, in a cross-legged position, during seven days, enjoying the delight of meditation. During those seven days, rain fell in abundance, and it was very cold. A Naga, chief of that tank, could have made a building to protect Buddha against the inclemency of the weather, but he preferred, for gaining greater merits, to coil himself up, to seven folds, round his person, and above him, to place his head with his large hood extended. When the seven days were over, and the rain had ceased, the Naga quitted his position; then assuming the appearance of a young man, he prostrated before Budha and worshipped him. Budha said: he who aims at obtaining the state of Neibban, ought to possess the knowledge of the four roads leading thereto, as well as that of the four great truths, and of all laws. He ought to bear no anger towards other men, nor harm them in any way soever. Happy he who receives such instructions.

Budha moved from that place, and went to the south of the Bodi tree, at a distance of forty fathoms. At the foot of the Linloon tree, he sat in a cross-legged position, having his mind deeply engaged into the exercise of the sublimest contemplation. In that position, he spent seven entire days, which completed the forty nine days, which were to be devoted to reflection and meditation, around the Bodi tree. When this period of days was over, at day break, on the fifth day after the full moon of Watso, he felt the want of food. This was quickly perceived by a Thagia, who hastened from his seat, to the spot where Budha was staying, and offered him some Thit khia fruits, others say, Kia-dzoo fruits, to prepare his system to receive a more substantial food. After he had eaten them, the same celestial attendant brought him some water to rinse his mouth, and to wash his face and hands. Budha continued to remain in the same position, under the cooling and protecting shade of the Linloon tree.

To consecrate, as it were, and perpetuate the remembrance of the seven spots, occupied by Budha, during the forty nine days that he spent round the tree Bodi, one Dzedy was erected on each of those seven places. King Pathanad Kosala surrounded them with a double wall. Subsequently, King Dammathoka added two others. There were only three openings, or gates to penetrate into the enclosed ground, one at the north, the second, at the east, and the third, at the south. The river Neritza-ra rolls its deep blue waters, in a south eastern direction, from the Bodi tree, at a distance of eight oothabas from it. On the eastern bank of that stream, another Dzedy has been erected on the spot, where previous to his becoming a Budha, he had eaten the forty nine mouthfuls of the delicious Nogana, offered to him by the pious Thoodzata.

Whilst Budha was sitting in a cross-legged position, under the Linloon tree, two brothers named Tapooasa and Palekat, merchants by profession, arrived, with five hundred carts, into the Oorouwela forest, to the very place where Budha was staying. They had sailed from their native town, called* Ouukkalaba, which lays, from the Mitzima country, in a south eastern direction, bound to the port of Adzeitta. After landing, they hired five hundred carts, to carry their goods to a place, called Soowama. They were on their way, to their destination, when they arrived into the Oorouwela forest. Not small was

* The episode of these two merchants is well known to the inhabitants of the Irawady valley. In three different manuscripts, that the writer has had in his hands, he has found it related with almost the same particulars. Ouukalaba, the place the two young men started from, was situated probably on the same spot now occupied by the village of Twaintay, or not far from it. How far was that place from the sea in those remote times, it is not possible to ascertain the point with precision. Certain it is, that it was a port from which vessels sailed across the bay of Bengal. The port of Eedzeitha has not, as yet, been identified with any known locality. It was situated in all probability between the mouth of the Krichna and that of the Hoogly. One of the manuscripts mentions that when Gandama handed over, to the two merchants, eight hairs of his head, he bade them, on their arrival into their country, to deposit the hairs, on a small hill called Seingouttara, where the relics of the three former Budhas of our period, had been enshrined. They were 27 days to reach Maulin or Cape Negrais, rather a long voyage. Having come to their own place, they related to the Governor all the particulars of their interesting journey. The latter, without loss of time, assembled the people and set out in search of the Seingouttara mount. All the eminences were cleared from their brushes, but the mountain could not be discovered. Not knowing what to do, they consulted the Nats on that affair. At last, through their assistance, the mount was found out. But when they inquired about the place of the relics of the three former Budhas, the Nats of Yesapan, Inanda and Gauveinda, confessed that they knew nothing on the subject, but referred the inquirers, to other Nats older than they, viz: those of Beckina, Yauhaini, Maubee, Ameisa and Tsoolav, who at once pointed out the spot, they were so eagerly searching after. This spot is no other but the one over which stands and towers the lofty and massive Shoay Dagon. They erected a Dyedzal, in which they enshrined the relics they had brought with them, the eight hairs of Budha. This story is, doubtless the foundation on which rests the popular belief, that those very hairs, are, up to this day, in the interior of that monument, and the true source from which has originated the profound veneration, which, in our own days, Buddhists, from all parts of Burmah, Siam and the Shan states, pay, by their pilgrimages and offerings, to the Dagon Pagoda.
their surprise, when they saw, on a sudden, all their carts unable to move, and arrested by some invisible power.

A Nat who had been formerly their relative, stopped, by his power, the wheels of the carriages. Surprised at such a wonder, the merchants prayed to the Nat, guardian of that place. The Nat assuming a visible shape, appeared before them and said to them: The illustrious Budha who, by the knowledge of the four great truths, has arrived to the nature of Phra, is now sitting at the foot of the Linloon tree; go now to that place, and offer him some sweet bread and honey; you shall derive therefrom great merits, for many days and nights to come. The two brothers, joyfully complying with the Nat's request, prepared the sweet bread and honey, and hastened in the direction that had been indicated to them. Having placed themselves in a suitable position and prostrated before Budha, they said: most glorious Phra, please to accept these offerings; great merits, doubtless, will be our reward for many days to come. Budha had no patta to put those offerings in, for the one he had received from the Brahma Gatigara had disappeared, when Thoodzata made him her great offerings. Whilst he was thinking on what he had to do, four Nats came and presented him, each with one patta, made of nila or sapphire stone. Phra accepted the four pattas, not from motives of covetousness, but to let each Nat have an equal share in such meritorious work. He put the four pattas, one in the other, and by the power of his will, they, on a sudden, became but one patta, so that each Nat lost nothing of the merit of his offerings. Budha received the offerings of the two merchants in that patta, and satisfied his appetite. The two brothers said to Budha: we have on this day approached you, worshipped you, and respectfully listened to your instructions—please to consider us as your devoted followers for the remainder of our life.59

59.—Upasaka is a Pali word which is designed to mean those persons who having heard the instructions of Budha, and professed a faith or belief in him and his doctrines, did not enter the profession of Rahana. Hence they are quite distinct from the Bikus or mendicants, who formed the first class of the hearers of Budha, and renounced the world in imitation of their great master. The Upasakas were therefore people adhering to the doctrines of Budha, but as yet remaining engaged in the ordinary pursuits of life. The two brothers became disciples of Budha, but not of the first class, since they did not embrace the more perfect mode of life of the ascetics.
They obtained the position of Upathaka. They continued addressing Budha and said: what shall we henceforth worship? Budha, rubbing his hand over his head, gave them a few of the hairs that had adhered to his fingers, bidding them to keep carefully those relics. The two brothers, overjoyed at such a valuable present, most respectfully received it, prostrated before Budha, and departed.

This is the first instance in this legend, of an allusion being made to relics, that is to say, to some objects supposed to be surrounded with a certain amount of sacredness, and esteemed, on that account, to be worthy of receiving from devotees, respect and veneration. The two young converts, not as yet confirmed in the new faith they had embraced, thought they wanted some exterior object to which they might hereafter direct their homage, and offer their respects. They were, as yet, far from being acquainted with the sublime science of their eminent teacher who disregarding matter and all its modifications, could not but feel quite indifferent, respecting the pretended value of relics, of even the most sacred character. How is it that the stern moralist, the contemnor of this illusory world, could think of giving a few hairs of his head, to two new young converts, that they might use them as objects of worship! Budha, doubtless, knew exactly and appreciated admirably the wants and necessities of human nature as it is, and will, very likely, ever be, to the end of ages. Men are led, actuated, impressed and influenced by the senses, in fact, it is through their senses, that the knowledge of things is conveyed to their mind. He gave to his imperfectly instructed disciples, a thing that would serve to vivify and reanimate in their memory, the remembrance of Budha and of the instructions, they had heard from him. Those grossly minded hearers asked for an object they might carry about with them and worship. Budha out of deference for their weak intellect, gave them a few hairs of his head, the sight of which was designed to entertain in their souls, a tender affection for the person of him, these things had belonged to. This subject will receive, hereafter, the developments it deserves, when we come to examine the nature of the worship paid by Buddhists, to the images of Gaudama, and to the relics and Dzedis.
Chapter VI.

Buddha hesitates to undertake the task of preaching the law—The great Brahma entreats him to preach the law to all beings—His assent to the entreaties—Journey towards Migadawon—He meets Ouppaka—His first preachings—Conversion of a young nobleman, named Ratha, followed by that of his father and other relatives—Conversion of several other noblemen—Instructions to the Rahans—Conversion of the three Kathabas.

Having come to the end of his great meditations, Buddha left this spot and returned to the place called Adzapa, where he revolved the following subject in his mind. The knowledge, said he, of the law and of the four great truths, which I alone possess, is very hard to be had. The law is deep; it is difficult to know and understand it, it is very sublime, and can be comprehended but by the means of earnest meditation. It is sweet, filling the soul with joy, and accessible but to the wise. Now all beings are sunk very low, by the influence of the five great passions; they cannot free themselves from their baneful operation, which is the source of all mutability. But the 60.—I have, except on one occasion, always made use of the terms meditation, and contemplation, to express the inward working of Buddha's mind, during the forty-nine days he spent at the foot of the banyan tree. But the Burmese translator, most commonly, employs a much stronger expression, conveying the idea of trance and ecstasy. Hence after having remained seven days on the same spot, deeply engaged in considering some parts of the law, he was soon to preach, it is said of him, that he comes out from a state of perfect ecstasy. This expression implies a state of complete mental abstraction, when the soul, disentangled from the trammels of senses, raises itself above this material world, contemplates pure truth and delights in it. All her faculties are taken up with the beauty and perfection of truth; she clings to it with all her might, regardless of all the illusions this world is filled with. This situation of the soul is much esteemed by all fervent Buddhists. It is the lot of but a few privileged Rahans, who have made great progress in perfection, and obtained an almost entire mastery over their passions and senses. This great gift is, as one may well imagine, ardently coveted by many, who though not possessing it, lay claim to it on false pretence. This being a sin, devotees who relish a contemplative life, are very liable to, the framer of the regulations of the Buddhist monks, has pronounced excluded de facto from the society, all those who would falsely, claim the possession of uncommon spiritual attainments, which they have not. In the book of ordination, used for the admission of candidates to the order of Rahans or Talapoins, this sin is the last of the four offences, which deprive of his dignity, a member of the order, and causes his expulsion from the society.

law of mutability, is the opposite of the law of Nirbuban or rest. This law is hard to be understood. If I ever preach that law, beings will not be able to understand me, and from my preaching there will result but a useless fatigue and unprofitable weariness. Budha thus remained almost disinclined to undertake the great duty of preaching the law. The great Brahma observing what was taking place in Budha's soul, cried out: alas! all mankind are doomed to be lost. He who deserves to be worshipped by all beings, now feels no disposition to announce the law to them. He instantly left his seat, and having repaired to the presence of Phra, his cloak over his shoulders with one extremity hanging backward, he bent his knee, lifted up his joined hands to the forehead, before the sage, and said to him: most illustrious Budha, who is adorned with the six glories, do condescend to preach the most excellent law; the number of those buried under the weight and filth of passions, is comparatively small; if they do not listen to the law, there will be no great loss. But there is an immense number of beings, who will understand the law. In this world there are beings who are moderately given up to the gratification of sensual appetites; and there are also a great many who are following heretical opinions, to whom the knowledge of truth is necessary, and who will easily come to it. Lay now open the way that leads to the perfection of Ariana; those perfections are the gates to Nirbuban. Thus he entreated Budha. This Brahma had been in the time of Budha Kathaba, a Rahan, under the name of Thabaka, and was transferred to the first seat of Brahma for the duration of a world.

On hearing the supplications of that Brahma, Budha began to feel a tender compassion for all beings. With the keen eyes of a Budha, he glanced over the whole world. He discovered distinctly those beings who were as yet completely sunk into the filth of passions; those who were but partly under the control of passions, and those whose dispositions seemed to be more promising. He then made to the chief of Brahmans the solemn promise that he would preach his law to all beings. Satisfied with the answer he had received, the chief rose up, withdrew respectfully at a proper distance, and turning on the right, left the presence of Budha and returned to his own seat.

Another thought preoccupied the mind of Budha. To whom said he, shall I annouce the law? Having pondered awhile over this subject, he added: the Rathee Ala-ra of the Kalama race, is gifted with wisdom and an uncommonly penetrating mind; passions have scarcely any influence over him. I will first preach to him the most excellent law. A Nat said then to Phra that Alara had died seven days ago. Budha, to whom the past is known, had already seen that Alara was dead. He said: great, indeed is the loss Alara has met with; he would have doubtless been able to understand rightly well, the law I intended to preach to him. To whom shall I go now? Having paused awhile, he added: the Rathee Oodaka, son of Prince Rama, has a quick perception, he will easily understand my doctrine; to him I will announce the law. But the same Nat told him that Oodaka had died the night before last, at midnight. O! great is the loss that has come upon Oodaka; he would have easily acquired the knowledge of the perfect law. Budha considered a third time, and said to himself, to whom shall I go to preach the law? After a moment's delay, he added: many are the services I received in the wilderness from the five Rahans who lived with me. 61 I will repay

61.—The five Rahans alluded to, are the very same individuals who met Phralaong in the solitude at the time he was undergoing a great fast, and performing all sorts of works of self-denial, and corporal austerities in the most rigorous manner. During all the time he spent in those hard exercises of strict mortification, to conquer his passions and secure the complete triumph of the mind over senses, he was assisted in all his wants by those five Rahans, who rendered to him the usual services, disciples are wont to perform to their teacher. When they saw Phralaong, at the end of his mighty efforts in that great struggle, resuming the habits of a mendicant, they left him at once, unwilling to believe that he would ever become a Budha. Our Phra not unmindful of the good services he had received from them, resolved to impart first to them the blessings of his preachings. Alara and Oodaka, his two first teachers in the science of Dyan, were des-their good offices to me, by preaching to them the law, but where are they now? His penetrating regards soon tined to be the first who would have heard the good news, had they not been dead. Gratitude seems to have been the first and main motive that induced him to select as the first objects of his mission, the very same persons who had been instrumental in furthering his efforts to acquire the Buddhist

The unpleasant epithet of heretic, is given to those five Rahans, as well as to another, named Upaka, as designed to mean that they were holding tenets at variance with those of Budha, and refused to acknowledge him as possessed with the perfect intelligence. Buddhists in their writings, invariably call their opponents by the name of holders of false doctrines. The Brahmins or Poumas, who refused to seek refuge in Budha, his law, and the assembly of his disciples, are styled as professors of heterodoxical doctrines.

From the narrative of this legend, we may conclude with a probability, amounting almost to certitude, that Budha in his preachings addressed himself first to the Brahmins as being by their caste the most influential portion of the Hin in community. Those that are called by the name of Poumas, are the Brahmins living in the world and following the ordinary pursuits of life. Those that are mentioned by the name of Rahans and Rathoes, are probably Brahmins, or at least belong to some other distinguished caste like that of the Khatriases, but are members of some religious order, or ascetics. They were in these days, men, whom, in imitation of the ancient Greeks we may call philosophers, and belonged to some fractions or branches into which the great Indian school was divided. We may conjecture that at that time, India exhibited a scene much resembling that which Greece subsequently offered to the eyes of the observer, in the days of Socrates and Plato, when schools of philosophy were to be met with in every direction. The Hindu philosophers, favored by climate and their ardent imagination, carried much farther than the Greek wise men, both in theory and practice, the discussion of dogmas and the fervor of religious practices. If credit, in an historical point of view, is to be given to our Legend, we may safely conclude that such was the state of India, when Budha began his preachings. His first hearers were Rahans, Rathoes and Poumas, that is to say, the most learned and wisest men in those days. The latter in particular seemed at first disinclined to offer opposition to Budha; they listened to him as to a distinguished philosopher; his arguments were examined, discussed and answered by them in the best way they could. In that polemical warfare, arguments were, at first, the only offensive and defensive weapons used and handled by the combatants on both sides. Budha’s two favorite doctrines of atheism and Neibban, which established the two broad lines of separation, between the two systems, begat much discussion and created some animosity between him and his adversaries. But, what widened the gap between the two parties and placed them in an hostile array against each other, was the broad principle of equality amongst men, latent in the bosom of Budha’s doctrines, and levelled at the distinction of castes. Budha preached to men of all conditions without exception; he opened before all, the ways that lead to Neibban; made no distinction between men and men, except that which is drawn by virtue and vice, merits and demerits. He allowed every one to approach him and take rank among his disciples; faith in his doctrine entitled any man to become numberal discovered them in the solitude of Migadawon. Having enjoyed himself in the place Adzapala, Budha went on towards the country of Baranathce. He wished to walk all the way though the former Budhas had gone over that distance through the air. All the former Budhas travelled through the air, but our Budha who had merciful designs over Upaka, went on foot. On his way to the village of Gaya, at a distance of three gawots from the Bodhi tree at mid day, Budha went to rest for a while under the cooling shade of a tree. There he was seen by the heretic Rahan Upaka, who approaching near him, said: O Rahan, all your exterior bespeaks the most amiable qualities; your countenance is at once modest and beautiful. Under what teacher have you become a Rahan? To what law or doctrine have you given preference in your arduous studies? Budha answered: Upaka, I have triumphed over all the laws of mutability; I am acquainted with all the laws that rule this universe, and the beings existing therein; from concupiscence and other passions, I am wholly disengaged. I have come to preach the most excellent law to all beings, and teach them the four great truths I alone am acquainted with. I will beat the great drum of the law. I have no teacher, and among Nats and men, there is none equal to me. Because of my victory on the laws of demerits, I have been named Zeena. Now I am proceeding to the country of Baranathce, for the sake of preaching the law. Upaka replied: You are certainly the illustrious Gaudama. He shook then his head, turned away from the road, and went to the village of Wingaha. The instructions, however, as a good seed germinated in the soul of Upaka, and were the foundation of his subsequent conversion, which happened as follows:—After his interview with Gaudama, Upaka dwelt as a hermit in the village of Wingaha, where a shed was erected for his dwelling. A hunter was his supporter. It happened that the hunter being engaged in a hunting excursion his daughter went to the hermit’s cell, to carry him his food. Upaka was smitten by the beauty of the damsel. He stretched himself on his belly and said to himself: I will take no food, nor change this position, unless I obtain the object of my wishes. He stayed for several days, in that position, without uttering a word or making a single movement, or taking any food. At last, the hunter returned and went forthwith to the hermit’s cell, to inquire about the cause of his strange behavior. He pulled him by the feet, calling him aloud by the name of hermit, after a while a sepulchral groan was heard, indicating this he was still alive. The good hunter affectionately entreated him to mention to him what he wanted, that he was ready to give him anything that he would ask. The hermit, a second time made a prolonged groan, as a man that is endeavoring to gather strength; he, then, mentioned to the hunter the passion he had for his daughter, and swore that he would die on this spot, if his demand were rejected. The father having given his consent, Upaka rose up, and soon was married to Tsawama, who after due time presented him with a son. It happened that Tsawama soon began to dislike her husband, and poured upon him, on every occasion all sorts of abuses. Unable to bear any longer, the unpleasant behavior of his wife, Upaka said to himself: I have here, neither friend nor supporter: I will go to my friend Dzina: he will receive me with kindness. Hereupon, he departed, inquiring every where, about his friend Dzina. At last, he arrived to the place where Budha was staying, with his disciples. Some of them hearing Upaka inquiring with a loud voice, about his friend Dzina, took him to the presence of Budha, who understanding, at once, the sad and painful state of the old man, kindly asked what he wanted. Upaka replied, that he desired to become a Samanay under his direction. Budha to try his dispositions, said to him: you are too old, Upaka to enter upon the course of the severe life of a Samanay, and conform to the enjoined practices. But the latter renewing his entreaties, he was admitted among the members of the assembly. He became an Anagam, died and migrated to one of the seats of Brahmas. After a short stay up there, he obtained the deliverance. His son was Thoobadda, who became afterwards an illustrious convert. Budha continued his way towards Baranathee, and soon reached the solitude of Migadawon, little distant from Baranathee, and went to the place where lived the five unbelieving Rahans. When they saw him coming at a distance, they said to each other: The Rahan Gaudama is in search after disciples; he has just performed penitential deeds and he is looking out for getting alms and clothes. Let us pay no respect to him, in the way of going out to meet him, of receiving the Tsiwaran from his hands, of presenting him water to wash his feet and preparing a place to sit on: let him sit wherever he pleases. Such was the plan they were concerting among themselves. But when Budha drew near, they could adhere no longer to their resolution. They rose up, went out to welcome his arrival. One took the Tsiwaran from his hands, another the Patta, a third one brought water for the washing of the feet, and a fourth one prepared a becoming place to rest. Budha sat in the place that had been prepared for him. They called him by the name of Gaudama, and other appellations, usually bestowed on ordinary Rahans. Budha meekly replied to them: do not call me any longer by the name of Gaudama, or any other title bestowed on an ascetic. I have become a Rahanda, I alone am acquainted with the four fundamental truths. Now I am come to preach to you the true law. Listen, O Rahans to my words, I will lead you to the true state of Neibban. My law will make you acquainted not only with the truths to be known but at the same time point out to you the duties you have to perform in order to obtain the state of Arahat. There are four ways leading to perfection. He who steadily follows them, will enjoy the rewards and merits gained by his exertions. In that position, he will see distinctly his ownself, the light of Neibban will break forth upon him. But in order to obtain the great results I set forth before you, he must forsake his house, the world and become a Rahan.

The unbelieving Rahans persisted in not acknowledging him as a Budha, and reproached him with going about in search of disciples, and in quest of alms. The same preaching was repeated by Budha, and the same answer was returned by the incredulous hearers. At last Budha assuming a lofty andcommanding tone said to them: I declare unto you that I am a Budha, knowing the four great truths, and showing the way to Neibban. The hitherto unbelieving Ascetics humbled themselves, declared their belief in him and in all that he had taught. From that moment they entered on the four ways of perfection. The day was that of the full moon of Watso. The preaching began at the moment when half the discus of the sun was visible on the western horizon, and half that of the moon was above the eastern horizon. When completed, the sun had just disappeared, and the moon's entire globe was visible on the horizon. The five first converts were named Kautagnya, Baddiha, Wappa, Mahanand and Asadzi.

62.—The mission of Budha is not, as previously observed, confined to men living on earth, but it extends its beneficial action over all the beings inhabiting the six seats of Nats, and sixteen of Brahmans. Those beings, the latter in particular, are much advanced in perfection, but they are not yet ripe for the sublime state of Neibban. Though freed, at least the Brahmans, from the influence of passions, they retain as yet some inclination for matter; they want the help of a Budha to break at once the few slender ties that retain them in the state of existence.

The first preaching of Budha was rewarded with the conversion of five Rahans and of a countless number of Nats and Brahmans. Such a plentiful and Migadawon hearing the sublime instructions delivered by Budha on this occasion, cried aloud: The law which the most excellent Budha preaches is such as no man, Pounha or Brahma, can teach. Their united voices were heard in the lowest seat of Nats: the inhabitants of that seat catching their words, repeated them and they were heard by those of the next seat, and so on, until they reached the seats of Brahmas, and were re-echoed through 10,000 worlds. A mighty commotion was felt all over those worlds.

The five, at first unbelieving, but now believing Rahans, obtained the perfection of Thautapati. Budha often repeated to those that approached him: come to me—I preach a doctrine which leads to the deliverance from all the miseries attending existence. On that day, being the full moon of Watso, eighteen Koodes (18,000, 000,000) of Nats and Brahmas who had heard his preachings, obtained the deliverance. The conversion of those five Rahans, exhibited to the world the splendid and wonderful sight of six Rahandas assembled in the same place.

At that time whilst Budha was in the Migadawon grove, the memorable conversion of a young layman took place. There was in the country of Baranthee, the son of a rich man, named Ratha. He was of very gentle and amiable disposition. His father had built for him three palaces harvest he could scarcely anticipate to reap; and the beginning of his career, attended with such wonderful success, simply repaid him for the extraordinary exertions he made in order to qualify himself for the Budhship. The author of the Legend remarks with an unfeigned pleasure, that owing to the conversion of the five Rahans, the world’s witnessed the beautiful sight of six Rahandas, congregated on the same spot. The Rahandas has attained the summit of perfection; he has arrived at the last existence; his death will relieve him from the burden of existence and open to him the way leading to perfect rest, complete abstraction, in a word, to Nirbhan. The Rahandas rank first among the disciples and hearers of Budha; they constitute the ¿® of his followers, and form the most distinguished portion of the assembly or congregation of the perfect. We have already stated that the members composing the assembly of the hearers were divided into distinct factions, and formed different degrees, according to the difference of their respective progress in the way of perfection.

for each season of the year: A crowd of young damsels, skilful in the art of playing on all sorts of musical instruments, attended him in each of those palaces. Ratha spent his time in the midst of pleasure and amusements. On a certain day, while surrounded with female dancers and singers, he fell into a deep sleep. The musicians following his example, laid aside their instruments and fell asleep too. The lamps, filled with oil, continued to pour a flood of light throughout the apartments. Awakening sooner than usual, Ratha saw the musicians all asleep round him, in various and unseemly situations: Some slept with a wide opened mouth; some had disheveled hair; some were snoring aloud; some had their instruments laying on themselves, and others, by their side. The whole exhibited a vast scene of the greatest confusion and disorder. Sitting on his couch in a cross-legged position, the young man silently gazed with amazement and disgust, over the unseemly spectacle displayed before him; then he said to himself: the nature and condition of the body constitute indeed a truly heavy burden; that coarser part of our being affords a great deal of trouble and affliction. Whereupon he instantly arose from his couch, put on his gilt slippers and came down to the door of his apartment. The Nats, who kept a vigilant watch, lest any one should oppose him in the execution of his holy purpose, kept open the door of the house, as well as the gate of the city. Ratha free from all impediments, directed his steps towards the solitude of Migadawon. At that time Budha, who had left at a very early hour his sleeping place, was walking in front of the house. He saw at a distance a young man coming in the direction he was in. He stopped instantly his pacing, and going into his own apartment, sat as usual on his seat, awaiting the arrival of the young stranger, who soon made his appearance and stated modestly the object of his visit. Budha said to him, O Ratha! the law of Nirvana is the only true one; alone it is never attended with misery and affliction. O Ratha! come nearer to me; remain in this place; to you I will make known the most perfect and valuable law. On hearing these kind and inviting expressions, Ratha felt his heart overflow with the purest joy. He instantly put off his slippers, drew nearer to Buddha, bowed down three times before him, withdrew then to a becoming distance, and remained in a respectful attitude. Buddha began to preach the law, unfolding successively the various merits obtained by almsgiving, a strict performance of all duties and practices of the law, and above all by renouncing the pleasures of this world. During all the while, the heart of the young visitor, expanded in a wonderful manner: he felt the ties that hitherto had bound him, as it were, to the world, gradually relaxing and giving way before the unresisting influence of Buddha's words. The good dispositions of the young hearer were soon remarked by Buddha, who went on explaining all that related to the miseries attending existence, the passions tyrannizing the soul, the means wherewith to become exempt from those passions, and the great ways leading to perfection. After having listened to that series of instructions, Ratha, like a white cloth that easily retains the impressions of various colors printed upon it, felt himself freed from all passions, and reached at once the state of Thautapati.

Ratha's mother, not meeting with her son early, as usual, went up to his apartment, and to her great surprise found him not; moreover she observed unmistakable marks of his sudden and unexpected departure. She ran forthwith to her husband, and announced to him the sad tidings. On hearing of such an unlooked for event, the father sent messengers in the direction of the four points of the compass, with positive orders to search incessantly after his son, and leave no means of inquiry untried. As to himself he resolved to go to the solitude of Migadawon, in the hope of finding out some track of his son's escape. He had scarce travelled over a certain distance, when he observed on the ground the marks of his son's footsteps. He followed them up and soon came in sight of Budha's resting place. Ratha was at the time listening with deepest attention to all the words of his great teacher. By the power of Budha, he remained hidden from the eyes of his father, who came up and having paid his respects to Gaudama, eagerly asked him if he had not seen his son. Gaudama bade him to sit down and rest from the fatigue of his journey. Meanwhile he assured him that soon he would see his son. Rejoiced at such an assurance, Ratha's father complied with the invitation he had received. Budha announced his law to this distinguished hearer, and soon led him to the perfection of Thautapati. Filled with joy and gratitude, the new convert exclaimed: O illustrious Phra, your doctrine is a most excellent one; when you preach it, you do like him who replaces on its basis an upset cup; like him, too, who brings to light precious things, which had hitherto remained in darkness; like him who points out the right way to those that had lost it; who kindles a brilliant light in the middle of darkness; who opens the mind's eyes that they might see the pure truth. Henceforth I adhere to you and to your holy law; please to reckon me as one of your disciples and supporters. This was the first layman that became a disciple of Gaudama, in the capacity of Upasaka.

62 (bis)—It is not without interest to give an abridgment of an instruction or sermon delivered by Gaudama to a Nat. It will be as a fair specimen of other similar performances. The Nat made his appearance at night fall, and respectfully entreated Budha to deliver certain instructions which would enable men to come to the understanding of many points of the law, on which they had hitherto fruitlessly meditated. Budha was then in the monastery of Dastawon, in the country of Thawattie. This sermon is supposed to have been repeated by Ananda, who had heard it from the mouth of Budha himself. It is, according to Burmese, the most excellent sermon; it contains thirty-eight points. Young Nat, said to Budha, here are the most excellent things men and Nats ought to attend to, in order to capacitate themselves for the state of Neilhan: to shun the company of the foolish; to be always with the wise; to proffer homage to those that are deserving of it; to remain in a place becoming one's condition; to have always with one's self the influence of former good works; steadily to maintain a perfect behavior; to be delighted to hear and see much, in order to increase knowledge; to study all that is not sinful; to apply one's self to acquire the knowledge of Wind. Let every one's conversation be regulated by righteous principles; let every one minister Whilst Budha was busily engaged in imparting instruction to Ratha's father, the young man had entered into a deep and solemn meditation, over some of the highest maxims he had heard from his great teacher. He was calmly surveying, as it were, all the things of this world; the more he progressed in that great work, the more he felt there was in himself no affection whatever for anything. He had not yet become a Rahan, nor put on the Rahan's dress. Phra who attentively watched over all the movements of his pupil's mind, concluded, from his present dispositions, that there could be no fear of his ever returning into the world of passions.

to the wants of his father and mother; provide all the necessaries for his wife and children; perform no action under the evil influence of temptation; bestow alms; observe the precepts of the law, assist one's relatives and friends; perform no actions but such as are exempt from sin; be ever diligent in such avoiding, and abstain from intoxicating drink. Let no one be remiss in the practice of the law of merits. Let every one bear respect to all men; be ever humble; be easily satisfied and content; gratefully acknowledge favors; listen to the preaching of the law in its proper time; be patient; delight in good conversation; visit the religious from time to time; converse on religious subjects; cultivate the virtue of mortification; practice works of virtue; pay attention always to the four great truths; keep the eyes fixed on Neibhan. Finally, let one be in the middle of the eight afflictions of this world, like the Rakantha, firm, without disquietude, fearless, with a perfect composure. O young Nat, whoever observes these perfect laws, shall never be overcome by the enemies of the good: he shall enjoy the peace of Ariana.

Within a narrow compass, Budha has condensed an abridgement of almost all moral virtues. The first portion of these precepts contains injunctions to shun all that may prove an impediment to the practice of good works. The second part inculcates the necessity of regulating one's mind and intention for a regular discharge of the duties incumbent to any man in his respective station. Then follows a recommendation to bestow assistance upon parents, relatives and all men in general. Next to that, we find recommended the virtues of humility, resignation, gratitude and patience. After this, the preacher insists on the necessity of studying the law, visiting Religious, conversing on religious subjects. When this is done, the hearer is commanded to study with great attention the four great truths, and keep his mind's eyes ever fixed on the happy state of Neibhan, which though as yet distant, ought never to be lost sight of. Thus prepared, the hearer must be bent upon acquiring the qualifications befitting the true sage. Like the one mentioned by the Latin Poet, that would remain firm, fearless and unmoved even in the middle of the ruins of the crumbling universe, the Buddhist sage must ever remain calm, composed and unshaken among all the vicissitudes of life. Here is again clearly pointed out the final end to be arrived at, viz.: that of perfect mental stability. This state is the foreboding of that of Neibhan.
He suddenly caused by his mighty power, the son to become visible to his father's eyes. The father perceiving on a sudden his son sitting close by him, said: beloved son your mother is now bathed in tears, and almost sinking under the weight of affliction caused by your sudden departure; come now to her, and by your presence restore her to life, and infuse, into her desolated soul, some consolation. Ratha, calm and unmoved made no reply, but cast a look at his master. Budha, addressing Ratha's father said to him: What will you have to state in reply to what I am about to tell you? Your son knows what you know, he sees what you see; his heart is entirely disentangled from all attachment to worldly objects; passions are dead in him. Who will now ever presume to say that he ought to subject himself again to them and bend his neck under their baneful influence? I have spoken rashly, replied the father: let my son continue to enjoy the favor of your society; let him remain with you for ever and become your disciple. The only favor I request for myself, is to have the satisfaction of receiving you in my house with my son attending you, and there to enjoy the happiness of supplying you with your food. Budha by his silence assented to his request. No sooner had his father departed, but Ratha applied for the dignity of Rahan, which was forthwith conferred upon him. At that time, there were in the world seven Rahandas.

On the following morning, Gaudama putting on his yellow tsiwaran and carrying the patta under his arm, attended by the Rahan Ratha sallied from his house, and went according to his promise, to the place of Ratha's father, to received his food. He had scarce entered the house and occupied the seat prepared for him, when the mother of the new Rahan, and she who was formerly his wife, came both to pay him their respects. Budha preached to them the law, explaining in particular the three

63.—From the perusal of this Legend, it can be remarked that Budha, in the course of his preachings, withheld from no one the knowledge of his doctrine, but on the contrary, aimed at popularizing it in every possible principal observances becoming their sex and condition. The effect of the preaching was at once immediate and

way. In this respect he widely differed from the Brahmins who enveloped in a mysterious obscurity their tenets, and even in that state of semi-incomprehensibility, condescended to offer them to the consideration of but a few selected adepts. But Budha followed quite an opposite course. He preached to all without exception. On this occasion we see him engaged in explaining to the mother and wife of Ratha, duties truly becoming their sex and position. He warned them against the danger of speaking too much, or speaking hastily and with a tone of dissatisfaction. He desired them to be always cool and moderate in their conversation, and to take a pleasure in conversing on religious topics, such as the practice of the ten great duties, the merits of almsgiving and on the other precepts of the law. He showed to them the undecency of inconsistency in speaking, and finally concluded by exhorting them to allow wisdom to guide them in the right use of the faculty of speech. Every one will agree in this, that the lecture was a very appropriate one, and would suit as well women of our days, as those of Budha's times.

It is not easy to determine whether these two female converts became Rahanesses by forsaking the world and devoting all their time to religious observances, or simply believed in Budha's doctrines and continued to live in the world. The Burmese translator makes use of expressions liable to both interpretations. I feel inclined to adopt the second supposition. They became female Upasakas, and continued to live in the world. We shall see, hereafter, that Gautama's aunt, Patapati, was the first after much entreaty, who was allowed to become a Rahaness.

The great former of the Budhistic disciplinary regulations has also laid down rules for the institution and management of an order of female devotees, to match, as it were, with that of Talapoinas. Hence in almost all countries where Budhism is flourishing, there are to be met houses and monasteries which are the abodes of those pious women, who emulate Rahanas in the strict observance of practices of the highest order. Their dress, except the color, which is white, is quite similar to that of Talapoinas; their head is shaved; they live in strict continence as long as they continue to wear the dress of their profession. They have certain formulas of prayers to repeat every day several times. Their diet is the same as that of Talapoinas; they are forbidden to take any food after midday. I am not aware that they render any service to society in the way of keeping schools for the benefit of female children. They live on alms freely bestowed on them by their co-religious. The Burmese honor them with the title of Mathu-la-shing, which mean ladies of the religious duties. The order of those female devotees is now much on the decline; the inmates of houses are but few, enjoying a very small share of public esteem and respect. They are generally looked upon with feelings akin to those entertained towards beggars.

In the Wini or book of discipline the relations that are allowed to subsist between the two orders of male and female devotees, are minutely described and clearly laid down, so as to prevent the evils that might result from a familiar and unnecessary intercourse. Thoroughly acquainted with the weak side of human nature, the author of the Wini has legislated on that subject with the utmost circumspection. He allowed rather aged Rahanas to be the spiritual advisers of the Rahanesses, but he denies them the irresistible: they became exempt from all sins, and attained the state of the perfect, of Thauthapan and became, among the persons of their sex, the first Upasaka. They desired to be ranked among his disciples, and devoted themselves to his service. They were the first persons of their sex, who took refuge in the three precious things, Budha, his law, and the assembly of the perfect. Gaudama and his faithful attendant having eaten the excellent and savoury food prepared for them, departed from the house and returned to the monastery.

Four young men belonging to the most illustrious families of Baranathees, and formerly connected with Rathasa

leave of ever going to their houses under what pretext soever. When the latter want to hear preaching or receive some advice from the Rathasa, they resort in broad daylight to the monastery, are permitted to stay in a large hall, open to the public, at a considerable distance from him whom they desire to consult. Having briefly and with becoming reverence made known the object of their visit, and received some spiritual instructions, they immediately return to their own place.

The same reflection may be applied to the conversion of Rathasa's father. It is said that he was the first convert out of the body of laymen. He does not appear to have forsaken the world and become a first class convert. He became a Thauthapan, and at once entered one of the four ways leading to perfection, but remained in the world.

64.—The conversion of Rathasa and of his young friends shows to us distinctly the tendency of Budha's preachings and their effect over those who believed in him. Rathasa is represented as a young worldly minded man, who in the midst of riches, has denied to himself no kind of pleasure. He feels that the enjoyment he was so fond of, can in no manner satisfy the cravings of his heart: he is disgusted at them, and resolves to withdraw into solitude with the intention of placing himself under the direction of some eminent teacher, and learn from him, the way to happiness. He hopes that the study of philosophy will lead him to true wisdom, and the acquirement of the means that may render him happy. He luckily falls in with Budha, who explains to him that the senses are the instruments through which passions act upon, and tyrannize over, the soul, by keeping it in a servile submission to matter. He points out to him the necessity of freeing himself from their control. This principle of Buddhism, which aims at disengaging the soul from matter, isolating it from all that proves a burden to it, and delivering it from the tyrannical yoke of conceit, is in itself perfectly correct, but, carried beyond its legitimate consequences, it becomes false and absurd. According to Buddhists, the soul disentangled from all that exists, finds itself alone without any object it can adhere to; folding itself up into its own being, it remains in a state of internal contemplation, destitute alike of all active feelings of pleasure and pain. This doctrine was known in the time of Budha, as far as the principle is concerned. The Rathasaes and other sages in those days, upheld it both in theory and practice; but on the consequences, the originator of Buddhism came at issue by the ties of intimate friendship, having heard that their friend had shaved his head and beard, put on a yellow dress and become a Rahan, said among themselves: Our friend has withdrawn from the society of men, given up all pleasures, and has entered into the society of Rahans. There can be no doubt but the law of Wini is most excellent and sublime, and the profession of Rahan most perfect. Whereupon they came to the place their friend with his contemporaries, and struck a new path in the boundless field of speculative philosophy.

62.—The Wini is one of the great divisions of Budhistic sacred writings. The Pitagat or collection of all the Scriptures, is divided into three parts,—the Thouts, containing the preachings of Buddha, the Wini of book of the discipline, and the Abidana or the book of Metaphysics. That compilation is supposed to embody the doctrines of Buddha in a complete manner. These books have not been written by Buddha himself, since it is said of him that he never wrote down anything. The first Budhistic compositions were certainly written by the disciple of Thra, or their immediate successors. But there arose some disputes among the followers of Buddha, as to the genuineness of the doctrines contained in the various writings published by the chief disciples. To settle the controversy, an assembly or council of the most influential members of the Budhistic creed, under the presidency of Kathalar, was held about three months after Gauilama's demise. The writings regarded as spurious were set aside, and those purporting to contain the pure doctrines of Thra, were collected into one body and formed, as it were, the canon of sacred books. The matter as far was settled for the time being, but human mind, when unrestrained by authority, acted in those days with the same result as it does in our own times. Various and different were the constructions put on the same text, by the expounders of the Budhistic law. All parties admitted the same books, but they dissented from each other in the interpretation. Some of the books hitherto regarded as sacred, were altered or rejected altogether, to make room for the works of new doctors. A great confusion prevailed to such an extent, that an hundred years later, a second council was assembled for determining the authenticity of the real and genuine writings. A new compilation was made and approved of by the assembly. The evil was remedied; but the same causes that had exercised so base an influence previously to the time of the second council, soon worked again and produced a similar result. Two hundred and thirty-five years after Gauilama's death, a third council was assembled. The books compiled by the second council were revised and apparently much abridged and with the sanction of the assembled fathers, a new canon of scriptures was issued. The Pitagat in its present shape is regarded as the work of this last assembly. All the books are written in the Pali or Magatha language. In the beginning of the fifth century of our era according to our author's computation, a learned man named Budagaphanta, went to Ceylon and brought back to Burmah a copy of the collection of the Pitagat. Then he introduced into this country the alphabet now in use, and translated in the vernacular a portion of the scriptures. This important subject shall receive, hereafter, fuller developments.
resided in, prostrated before him, as usual in such circumstances, and sat down at a respectful and becoming distance. Ratha took them before Budha, praying him to deliver to those, who had been his friends in the world, the same instructions he had received from him. Gaudama willingly assented to his request and forthwith began to explain to them the nature and abundance of merits, derived from almsgiving. He initiated them into the knowledge of the chief precepts and observances of the law. These young hearers received with a cheerful heart, his instructions and felt within themselves an unknown power, dissolving gradually all the ties that had hitherto retained them in the world of passions. Delighted at remarking so good dispositions in those young men, Gaudama explained to them the higher doctrine of the four great and fundamental truths which lead to perfection. When the preaching was over, they applied for and obtained the dignity of Rahans. There were at that time eleven Rahandas in the whole world.

45 (bis.) The four principles or truths so often alluded to, in the course of this work, ought to be well understood, in order to get a clear insight into the system under consideration. These four truths are as follows:—1. There are afflictions and miseries attending the existence of all beings. 2. There are passions and, in particular, concupiscence, which are the causes of all miseries. 3. There is Neibhan which is the exemption of all passions, and consequently the deliverance from all miseries. 4. There are the four ways or high roads leading to Neibhan. Here is the summary of the sublime knowledge and transcendent science possessed by a Budha: these four fundamental truths, form the four features or characteristics of his law; they safely guide man in the way to deliverance. The Buddhist sage, who longs to become perfect, must study with attention the position of all beings in this world, survey with a patient attention their diversified condition, and fathom the depth of the abyss of miseries in which they are miserably sunk. A vague, general and superficial knowledge of these miseries, is insufficient to create that perfect acquaintance with human wretchedness. He ought to examine one after the other, those series of afflictions, until he feels, as it were, their unbearable weight pressing over his soul. This first step having been made by the means of reflection, meditation and experience, the sage standing by the side of all miseries that press down all the beings, as a physician, by the bed of a patient, enquires into the cause of such an awful moral disorder. He soon discovers the generating causes of that universal distemper: they are the passions in general, or rather to speak more in accordance with Buddhistic expressions, concupiscence, anger and ignorance being the springs all demerits flow from, are the impure sources wherefrom originate all the miseries and afflictions this world is filled with.
Fifty other young men of good descent, who had been the companions of Ratha, while in the world, having heard that their friend had left the world, put on the yellow garb and become Rahan, said to each other: The law which our friend listened to, may not be a bad one; the profession he has entered into may not be as despicable as many people are wont to assert. They resolved to judge for themselves and to be eye witness to all that had been said on the subject. They set out for the monastery Ratha was living in, came into his presence, paid their respects to him, and stopped at a proper distance in a respectful posture. Ratha led them to his great teacher, humbly craving for his former friends, the same favor he had done to him. Budha graciously assented to the request, and imparted instruction to his young hearers, with such a happy result, that they instantly applied for admittance to the dignity of Rahans. This favor was granted to them. The total number of Rahandas was thereby raised to sixty one.

On a certain day Gaudama called his disciples into his presence and said to them: Beloved Rahans, I am

The destruction of those passions is the main and great object he has in view. He therefore leaves the world and renounces all pleasures and worldly possessions, in order to extinguish concupiscence: he practices patience under the most trying circumstances, that anger may no longer have any power over him; he studies the law and meditates on all its points, in order to dispel the dark atmosphere of ignorance by the bright light of knowledge.

Having advanced so far, the sage has not yet reached the final object of his desires, he has not yet attained to the end he anxiously wishes to come to. He is just prepared and qualified for going in search of it. Nibbana, or the absolute exemption and permanent deliverance from the four causes productive of existence, or of a state of being, is the only thing he deems worthy to be desired and earnestly longed for. The sage perceiving such a desirable state, sighs after it with all the powers of his soul. Nibbana is to him what the harbor is to the storm beaten mariner, or deliverance to the worn out inmate of a dark dungeon. But such a happy state is, as yet, at a great distance: where is the road leading thereto? This is the last truth the sage has to investigate. The four roads to perfection are opened before him. These he must follow with perseverance; they will conduct him to Nibbana. They are a perfect belief, a perfect reflection, a perfect use of speech, and a perfect conduct.

66.—Budha having trained up his disciples to the knowledge of his doctrines as well as to the practice of his ordinances, elevates them to the dig-exempt from the five great passions which like an immense net, encompass men and Nats. You, too, owing to the instructions you have received from me, enjoy the same glorious privilege. There is now incumbent on us, a great duty, that of labouring effectually in behalf of men and Nats, and procuring to them, the invaluable blessing of the deliverance. To the end of securing more effectually the success of such an undertaking, let us part with each other and proceed in various and opposite directions, so that not two of us should follow up the same way. Go ye now, and preach the most excellent law, expounding every point thereof and unfolding it with care and attention, in all its bearings and particulars. Explain the beginning, the middle and the end of the law, to all men, without exception; let every thing respecting it, be made publicly known and brought to the broad daylight. Show, now, to men and Nats the way leading to the practice of the pure and meritorious works. You will meet, doubtless, with a great number of mortals, not as yet hopelessly given up to their passions, and who will avail themselves of your preaching for reconquering their hitherto, forfeited liberty, and freeing themselves from the thraldom of passions. For my own part, I will direct my course towards the village of Thena, situated in the vicinity of the solitude of Ooroowela.

At that time the wicked Nat Manh came into the presence of Budha and tempted him in the following manner. Men and Nats, said he, have the five senses; through those five senses, passions act upon them, encompass their whole being, and finally keep them bound up with the chains of an irresistible slavery. As to you, Rahan, you are not an exception to that universal condition, and you have not yet outstepped the boundaries of my empire. Phra replied: O vile and wretched Nat! I am well acquainted with the passions men and Nats are subjected to. But I have freed myself from them all, and have thereby placed myself without the pale of your empire: you are at last vanquished and conquered. Manh yet undismayed replied: O Rahan, you may be possessed with the power of flying through the air; but even in that condition, those passions which are inherent in the nature of mortal beings will accompany you, so that you cannot flatter yourself of living without the boundaries of my empire. Phra retorted: O wicked Nat, concupiscence and all other passions I have stifled to death in me, so that you are at last conquered. Manh, the most wretched among the wretched, was compelled to confess with a broken heart, that Phra had conquered him and he instantly vanished away.

Full of fervour in preaching the law, the Rahans saw themselves surrounded with crowds of converts, who asked for the dignity of Rahan. They poured in daily from all parts, into the presence of Budha, to receive at his hands, the much longed for high dignity. Budha said to them: Beloved Rahans, it is painful and troublesome

67.—In these new instructions delivered to the Rahans, Budha gives them the power of receiving into the ranks of the assembly, those of their converts who would prove foremost in understanding the law and observing its highest practices. He empowers them to confer on others, the dignity of Rahan, and admit them to the various steps that lead to that uppermost one. To observe uniformity in the reception of candidates to the various orders, Budha laid down a number of regulations embodied in the Kambawa, or book used as a sort of ritual on the days of admission of candidates, to the dignity of Patzins and Rahans. The contents of this small but interesting work may be seen in the notice on the order of Talapoinis or Buddhist Monks, inserted at the end of this volume. That the reader may have now an idea of the general purpose and object of these regulations, I will draw a slight outline of them. The candidate, who seeks for admission among the members of the order, has to appear before an assembly of Rahans, presided over by a dignitary. He must be provided with the dress of the Order, and a patta or the pot of a mendicant. He is presented to the assembly by a Rahan, upon whom devolves the important duty of instructing him on all that regards the profession he is about to embrace, and lead him throughout the ordeal of the ceremony. He is solemnly interrogated, before the assembly, on the several defects and impediments incapacitating an individual for admission into the order. On his declaring that he is free from such impediments, he is, with the consent of the assembled fathers, promoted to the rank of Patzin. But, ere he be allowed to take his place among his brethren, he is instructed on the four principal duties he will have to observe, and warned against the four capital sins, the commission of which would deprive him de facto of his high and holy character, and cause his expulsion from the society.

It is supposed that the candidate, previous to his making application for obtaining the dignity of Rahan, has qualified himself by study and a good life, for admittance among the perfect. By surrounding, with a display of ceremonies, the admission of candidates, into the ranks of the order, the shrewd framers of those regulations intended to encircle the whole body, with a halo of dignity and sacredness, and at the same time to provide, as far as human wisdom allows, against the reception of unworthy postulants.

Hitherto Budha had reserved to himself alone the power of elevating both to you and to those who desire to be admitted into our holy brotherhood, to come from such a great distance to me. I now give to you the power of conferring the dignity of Patzin and Rahan, to those whom you may deem worthy to receive it. This is the summary way you will have to follow on such occasions. Every candidate shall have his hair and beard shaved, and shall be provided with the Tsiwaran of yellow color. These preliminaries being arranged, the candidate with the extremities of the Kowot thrown over his shoulders, shall place himself in a squatting position, his joined hands raised to the forehead, repeating three times: I adhere to Budha, to the law, and to the assembly of the perfect.

Gandama assembling again round him the Rahans, said to them: Beloved Rahans, it is owing to my wisdom, aided by constant reflection and meditation, that I have at last reached the incomparable state of Arahatapho; endeavour ye all, to follow my example and arrive at last, to the same state of excellence and perfection.

The vile and wretched Nat Manh appeared again before Budha, striving to tempt him in the same manner as before. Budha discovering the snares laid down by the tempter, returned the same reply. Finding himself discovered, Manh vanished from his presence.

Hearers or converts to the dignity of Rahans; now he hands down to his disciples that power and bids them to use it, as they had seen him do, in behalf of those whom they deem worthy applicants. He has established a Society and striven to infuse into it all the elements necessary, for keeping it up hereafter, and securing its existence and permanency. He sets up a kind of ecclesiastical hierarchy, which is to be perpetuated, during the ages to come, by the same means and power that brought it into existence.

Having put such a power into the hands of his disciples, Budha very properly exhorts them to emulate him, in his efforts for becoming perfect. He sets himself as a pattern of perfection, and bids them all to imitate the examples he places before them. He shows briefly to them by what means he has attained the state of Arahatapho, and stimulates them to the adopting of similar means. The word Arahatapho is composed of two words—Arahat, which means perfect, and pho or phola, as the orthography indicates, which means reward, merit. The state of Arahatapho is that in which a man enjoys the merits or reward of perfection, which he has reached by the practice of virtue, and particularly the acquisition of wisdom or knowledge of the highest points of the law. It is used often in opposition to the word Arhatamegata, which signifies the ways or roads leading to perfection.
Having spent his first lent in the solitude of Migadawon, Pirra shaped his course in the direction of the forest.

68.—I have translated by lent the Burmese expression Watso, which is but the Pali term Wasa, Burmanised. The word lent which has been adopted, is designed to express not the real meaning of Wasa, but to convey to the reader's mind, the idea of a time devoted to religious observances. Wasa means a season, but it is intended to designate the rainy season, which in those parts of the Peninsula, where Buddh was residing, begins in the month of July and ends in that of November. During that period, the communications between villages and towns are difficult, if not impossible. The religious mendicants were allowed in former times, very likely from the very days of Buddha, to retire into the houses of friends and supporters, from which they went out occasionally for begging their food. In the beginning, those who were admitted in the society, did not live in community as it has hereafter been done in those countries where Buddhism has been of a long time, in a flourishing condition. They were allowed to withdraw into solitude and lead an ascetic life, or to travel from one place to another, for preaching the law and making converts. This work could not be well done during the rainy season. Hence the disciples, when as yet in small number, gathered round their master during that period to hear instructions from him, and practice virtue under his immediate superintendence. They lived with him during all the time the rainy season lasted. This was called, to spend the season. In the course of this legend, the same expression is often met with. It is said to Buddha that he spent a season in such a place, another, in another place, to indicate that he staid in one place during the rainy season, which precluded the possibility of doing the duties of an itinerant preacher.

When the religious order became regularly constituted, and the basis it was to stand on, was fairly laid down, the ever increasing number of members made them feel the want of secluded places, where they could live in community, and, at the same time, quite retired from the world. Houses or monasteries were erected for receiving the pious Rahans. The inmates of those dwellings lived under the direction of a superior, devoting their time to study, meditation and the observances of the law. They were allowed to go out in the morning very early, to beg and collect the food they wanted for the day. Such is the state the Religious are living in up to our own time, in Burmah, Ceylon, Thibet, Siam, and in the other countries where Buddhism has been firmly established.

The religious season or lent, lasts three months. It begins in the full moon of Watso (July) and ends at the full moon of Thadinkiout (October). The keeping of the season in Burmah is as follows: On the days of the new and full moon, crowds of people resort to the pagodas, carrying offerings of flowers, small candles, oil, &c. A great many are found to spend the night in the bungalows erected chiefly for that purpose in their immediate vicinity. Women occupy bungalows separated from those of men. It must be admitted that there, as in churches, they far outnumber men. On such occasions, religion appears to be rather the pretext, than the real object of such assemblies. With the exception of old men and women who are heard to converse on religious topics, and repeat some parts of the law, or recite some praises in honor of Buddha, the others seem to care very little for religion. The younger portion of the weaker sex freely indulge in the pleasure of conversation. It is quite a treat to them, to have such a fine opportuni-of Ooroowela. On his way to that place, he stopped for a while in a jungle, and sat under a tree, to enjoy some rest under its cool shade. At that time thirty young noblemen had come to the jungle to indulge in sports and diversions. Each of them had brought his wife, with the exception of one, who, having no wife, was accompanied by a harlot. During the night, the harlot rose up unperceived, picked up the best articles belonging to the parties, and carrying them with her, took to her heels through the dense forest. In the morning, the thirty young noblemen rising up, soon perceived the havoc made in the richest articles of their dress, and set out in search of her whom they suspected to have done the mischief. They came by chance to the spot where Gaudama was sitting in a cross-legged position, and inquired from him whether he had seen a woman passing by. Budha said to them: What is the best and most advantageous thing, in your opinion, either to go in search of yourselves or in search of a woman? They replied, of course it is preferable to look after ourselves. If so, replied Budha, stay with me for a while; I will preach my law to you, and with its help, you will arrive at the

- ty of giving a full scope to their talkative powers. During that season the pious faithful are charitably inclined to bestow alms on the Bhikshus. All the necessities of life pour with abundance and profusion into the monasteries. Besides alms giving and resorting to the Pagodas, some fervent laymen practice abstinence and fastings to a certain extent; these, however, are but few. During that period, the Buddhist recluses are often invited to go to certain places, prepared for the purpose, to preach the law to and receive alms from, crowds of hearers who are gathered thither on such occasions. Talapoons are generally seated on an elevated platform, facing the congregation; they keep their large fans before the face, through modesty, to save themselves from the danger of looking on some tempting object. They repeat in chorus certain passages of the life of Budha, enumerate the five great precepts and other observances of the law. The whole preaching is generally going on in Pali, that is to say, in a language unknown to the congregation. When they have done their duty, they withdraw, followed by a great number of their disciples, carrying back to the monasteries, all the offerings made by the faithful. It happens also, although but seldom in our days, that some fervent Recluses withdraw during the whole or a part of the lent season, into solitary places, living by themselves, and devoting all their time to reading the books of the law, and meditating on the most important points and maxims of religion.
knowledge of self, and thence to perfection. They cheerfully assented to his request, listened attentively to his instructions, and obtained the state of perfect believers, but in various degrees, according to their respective dispositions. They gave up the habit of drunkenness they had hitherto indulged in, and preserved in the observance of the five great precepts.

69.—The remarks of the Burmese translator afford me the opportunity of explaining one of the leading tenets of the Budhistic creed. All beings in this world are submitted to the double influence of their merits and demerits. The good influence predominates when the sum of merits surpasses that of demerits, and it is superseded by the latter, when the contrary takes place. This principle once admitted, Budhists explain the good or evil that befalls every individual, in any state of existence soever. Is a man dead, he is attended on his way to another state of being, both by his merits and demerits, who like two inseparable companions, follow him whithersoever he goes. Should the sum of demerits prove greater, he is forced into hell, or into some other state of punishment, to bear sufferings proportionately to his offences, until he has fully paid off his debt, or, to speak the language of Budhists, until the sum of his demerits be quite exhausted. If on the contrary, at the moment of his death, the influence of merits be the strongest, he is directed into a state of happiness, pleasure and enjoyment, say in one of the seats of Nats or Brahmas, and remains there as long as lasts the action of the good influence. When it is over, he comes again into the abode of man or in a state of probation, when he has to labor anew for amassing new and greater merits, that will hereafter entitle him to a higher reward, than the one he had previously enjoyed. From the foregoing observations it is evident that the idea of a Supreme being, rewarding the good and punishing the wicked, is carefully excluded, and all foreign interference on this subject, entirely done away with. Another conclusion flowing from the same source, is that there is no eternity of reward or punishment, but both last for a longer or shorter period, in proportion to the sum of merits and demerits, and consequently to the power of each respective influence.

It may be asked what becomes of the sum of demerits and its consequent evil influence whilst the superior good influence prevails? The sum of demerits remains all the while, entire and undiminished; the operation of the evil influence is suspended and has no power whatever, its own being checked by a greater one. But the sum of merits being exhausted and its inherent action at an end, the opposite one is set at liberty, and acts on the individual, proportionately to its own strength, and lasts until it is all exhausted. As man can never be without some merits or demerits, good or bad deeds, he must be either in a state of reward or punishment; this is, if I may say so, the mainspring that moves all beings into the whirlpool of countless existences, wherein they meet happiness or unhappiness according to their Gaudama having so happily completed the conversion of those young noblemen, rose up and continued his journey in the direction of the forest of Ooroowela. At that time, there were three distinguished and far famed teachers that presided over a vast number of Rathcees or disciples leading an ascetic life. They were named Ooroowela Kathaba, Nadi Kathaba and Gaya Kathaba. The first had under him five hundred disciples, the second, three hundred; and the third, two hundred. Budha went up to the monastery of Ooroowela Kathaba, and said to him: I carry but a few articles with me, and need but a small place to rest in; I beg of you to be allowed to spend the night only, in your kitchen. Kathaba answered: Since you have so few things with you, I willingly allow you to accommodate yourself in the best way you can, in the cook-room. But I must inform you that the Naga guardian of the place, is an animal of a very wicked temper, powerfully strong and having a most deadly venom. I fear not the Naga, replied Budha, I am well satisfied with your allowing me a place in the cook-room. Whereupon he entered into the kitchen, sat down in a cross-legged posi-deserts. The being that tends strongly and perseverantly, through his various existences, towards perfection, weakens gradually and finally destroys in himself the law of demerits; he ascends steadily the steps of the ladder of perfection, by the practice of the highest virtues. Having reached its summit, there is no more reason for his going through other existences; and he steps at once into the state of Nirbhan.

With the above principle, Buddhists account for all the various phases of human existence. Is a child born from rich, great and distinguished parents? Does he become a wealthy and powerful man? Does he become a king or a nobleman? &c.—he is indebted for all that, to merits acquired during former existences. Is another child born in a low, poor and wretched condition? Is he born with bodily or intellectual defects and imperfections, &c., &c.? His former demerits are the principle and cause of all his subsequent misfortunes.

The doctrine of merits and demerits, and of their concomitant influences has been fully illustrated in the person of Budha himself during his former existences. He said of himself to his disciples that he had passed, with various fortune, through the range of the animal kingdom, from the dove to the elephant; that, being man, he had been often into hell, and in various positions of riches and poverty, greatness and meanness, until by his mighty efforts, he at last freed himself from all evil influence and reached his present state of perfection. He is supposed to have related to his disciples, on different occasions, five hundred and ten of his former existences.
tion, and keeping his body in an erect posture, remained absorbed, as it were, in the deepest contemplation. The Naga soon appeared, and irritated at seeing that a stranger presumed to remain in a place committed to his care, resolved to drive out the intruder. He began to vomit a cloud of smoke which he directed to the face of the stranger. Budha said to himself: I will do no harm to that Naga; I will leave intact his skin, flesh and bones; but I will conquer him with the very same weapons he uses against me. Whereupon he emitted by his own power, such a volume of thick smoke as soon to silence his adversary and oblige him to have recourse to more effectual means of attack. He vomitted out burning flames. Phra opposed flames far more active and destructive than those of the Naga. They shone forth with such an uncommon brightness as to attract a number of Rathees, who stood motionless, admiring the beautiful countenance of Budha and wondering at his matchless power. The Naga vanquished, gave up the contest, and left to Budha, undisputed, the possession of the cook-room during the whole night. In the morning, opening his patta, Phra thrust in the terrified Naga and brought it to Ooroowela Kathaba, who surprised at the power of the stranger, said: This Rahanda cannot as yet be compared to me. He desired him to stay in his monastery, promising to supply him with food as long as he would be with him. Phra accepted the proffered invitation, and fixed his residence in the midst of a grove little distant from the cell of Kathaba. Whilst he was there, four chiefs of Nats of the seat of Tsadoumaritz, came at midnight to the spot where rested Phra. They were very handsome, and a bright hue encompassing their bodies, filled the grove with a resplendent light. Kathaba surprised, came to Budha and said to him: Great Rahana, the hour of taking your food is at hand; your rice is ready, come and eat it. How is it that at midnight, there was such an uncommon splendour? One would have thought that the whole forest in the neighbourhood, was lined with immense fires spread.
ing a blaze of light. Phra answering said: This wonder was caused by the presence of four chiefs of Nats that came to visit me and hear my preachings. Kathaba said to himself: Great, indeed, must be the virtue of this Rahan, since Nats come to see him and acknowledge him for their teacher. He is not yet, however, my equal. Budha ate his rice and went back to the same place.

On another occasion, in the middle of the night, the chief of Thagias came to the grove of Budha, and by his power, caused a flood of light, similar to that produced by a thousand lighted fires, to pour its effulgent rays in every direction. On the morning, Kathaba went to the great Rahan inviting him to come and eat his rice. Meanwhile he asked him the reason of the wonderful light that had been kept up about from midnight until morning, which surpassed in brilliancy that which had been seen on a former occasion. Phra told him that he had been visited by the chief of Thagias, who came for the purpose of hearing his instructions. Kathaba thought within himself: great indeed is the glory and dignity of this Rahan, but he is not as yet a Rahanda. Phra ate his food and continued to stay in the same grove.

On another occasion, at the same late hour, Phra received the visit of the chief of Brahmans. The flood of light that was sent forth by his body, surpassed in effulgent splendor, all that had been seen. Kathaba came as usual in the morning, to invite the great Rahan to come and take his food, requesting him, at the same time, to inform him of the cause of the great wonder that had just taken place. Phra told him that the chief of Brahmans had waited upon him, to listen to his preachings. Kathaba wondered the more at the dignity of this great Rahan, who attracted round him so eminent a visitor. But he said within himself: This Rahan is not yet a Rahanda that can be compared to me. Phra partook of his food and continued his stay in the same grove.

On a certain day, the people of the country had prepared offerings on a large scale to the presented to Ka-thaba. On hearing this welcome news, the Rathee thought within himself as follows: The people are disposing everything for making large offerings to me. It is as well this Rahan should not be present on the occasion. He might make a display of his power in the presence of the multitude, who, taken up with admiration for his person, would make great offerings to him, whilst I would see my own decrease in a comparative proportion. To-morrow, I will do in such a way, as to prevent the great Rahan from being present. Budha discovered at a glance, all that was going on in Kathaba's mind. Unwilling to offer any annoyance to his host, he carried himself to the island of Ootoogara, where he collected his meal which he came to eat on the banks of the lake Anawadat. He spent there the whole day, and by his miraculous power, he was back to his grove, at an early hour, on the following day. The Rathee came, as usual, to invite him to partake of his meal that was ready, and inquired from him why he had not made his appearance on the day previous. Budha without the least emotion that could betray an angry feeling, related to Kathaba all that had passed in his mind, and informed him of the place, he had been to. Kathaba astonished at what he heard, said to himself: The knowledge of this Rahan, is transcendant indeed, since he is even acquainted with the thoughts of my mind—his power, too, is wonderfully great; but withal, he is not as yet a Rahanda comparable to me. Budha having eaten his meal, withdrew to his grove.

On a certain day, Budha wished to wash his dress. A Thagia knowing the thought that occupied his mind, dug a small square tank, and approaching him, respectfully invited him to wash therein his tsiwaran. Budha then thought: where shall I find a stone to rub it upon? The Thagia having brought a stone, said to him: illustrious Phra, here is a stone to rub your tsiwaran on. He thought again: where is a proper place to dry it upon? The Nat that watched the tree Yekada, caused it to bend its branches, and said: My lord, here is a fit place to hang up your tsiwaran. He thought again: where is a fit spot to extend my clothes upon? The chief of Thagias brought a large and well polished stone and said: O illustrious Phra, here is a fit place to lay your tsiwaran upon. On the morning Kathaba repaired as usual to his guest's place to invite him to take his meal. Surprised at what he perceived, he said to Budha: O Rahan, formerly there were here neither tank, nor stone; how is it that they are here now? How is it, again that the tree Yekadat is now bending down its branches? Phra related then to the Rathee all that had happened, informing him, that the chief of Thagias and one Nat had done all those works for him, and ministered to all his wants. Kathaba, more than before, wondered at the great virtue and surpassing excellency of the great Rahan; but he persisted in his former opinion that the great Rahan was not a Rahanma that could equal him. Budha having taken his meal, returned to his grove.

On another occasion, the Rathee went to Budha's place, to invite him to come and partake of his meal. Very well, said Budha, I have a small business to do now, go before hand, and I will follow you a few moments hence. Whereupon Kathaba went back to his cell. As to Phra he went to pluck a fruit from the jambu tree, and arrived at the eating place, before Kathaba could reach it. The Rathee on arriving thither, was quite surprised to find Phra already waiting for him. How is this, said he with an unfeigned feeling of surprise, and by what way did you come and contrive to arrive here before me? Phra said to him: After your departure, I plucked one fruit from a jambu tree, and yet I have reached this spot sooner than you. Here is the fruit I have brought. It is as full of flavor as it is beautiful; allow me to present you with it, that you may eat it. O! no, great Rahan, replied the Rathee, it is not becoming that I should eat it, but rather keep it for yourself. He thought within himself: wonderful is indeed the power and eminent excellency of that great Rahan; but he is not as yet a Rahan that can be assimilated to me. Phra ate his rice and returned to his grove.

On another day, Phra gave a fresh proof of his miraculous power, by bringing to Kathaba one mango fruit, plucked from a mango tree growing near the jambu tree, and so went on for several days, bringing fruits that grew at the extremity of the southern island. On another day, Phra ascended to the seat of Tawadeintha, and brought therefrom a beautiful water lily, and yet arrived to the place where his meal was ready, before Kathaba himself. The latter, quite amazed at seeing a flower from the Nat country, thought within himself: wonderful, indeed, is the power of that great Rahan who has brought here, from the seats of Nats, a beautiful lily, in such a short space of time; but he is not as yet equal to me.

On a certain day, the Rathees were busy in splitting fire-wood. They got a large log of wood upon which their united efforts could make no impression. Kathaba thought within himself: the great Rahan is gifted with mighty power; let us try him on this occasion. He desired Gaudama to split the hard log. Gaudama split it in a moment, in five hundred pieces. The Rathees then tried to light up the fuel, but they could not succeed. Kathaba requested his guest to come to their assistance. In an instant, the five hundred pieces were set in a blaze, and presented the terrifying sight of five hundred large fires. The Rathees begged the great Rahan to extinguish those fires which threatened a general conflagration. Their request was instantaneously granted; the five hundred fires were extinguished.

During the cold season in the month of January, and February, when there falls a heavy cold dew, the Rathees amused themselves in plunging and swimming in the river Neritzara. Phra caused five hundred fires to blaze out; on the banks of the river. The Rathees coming out of the stream, warmed themselves by the side of those fires. They all wondered at the astonishing power of the great Rahan. But Kathaba persisted in saying that he was not a Rahanda like him.

On a certain day, a great rain poured in a torrent, so that the water overflowed all the country, but it did not reach the spot Gaudama stood upon. He thought within himself: It is good that I should create a beautiful dry road in the midst of the water. He did so, and walked on the dry road, and clouds of dust rose in the air. Kathaba, much concerned regarding the fate of his guest, took a boat and with the assistance of his disciples, pulled in the direction of Budha's grove; but what was their surprise, when reaching the spot, they found instead of water, a firm dry road, and Budha calmly walking to and fro. Is it you, great Rahan, cried Kathaba, whom we see here? Yes, replied Gaudama, it is I, indeed. He had scarcely returned this answer, when he rose in the air and stood for a while above the boat. Kathaba thought again within himself: great indeed must be the perfections and attainments of the great Rahan, since water even cannot harm him, but he is not yet a Rahanda like me. Phra who knew what was taking place in Kathaba's mind, said to himself: There is a long time that this Rathee is thinking within himself: This Rahan is great, but I am still greater than he; it is time now that I should inspire him with fear and surprise. Addressing Kathaba, he said: Rathee, you are not a Rahanda, that has arrived to the perfection of Arahat; you have never performed the meritorious actions of the four ways to perfection; you are not, therefore, a Rahanda. But I have, during former existences, carefully attended to those practices which have enabled me to reach perfection, and finally obtain the Budhaship. Astonished at such an unexpected declaration, Kathaba humbled himself, fell on his knees and prostrated at the foot of Budha, saying: Illustrious Phra, I wish to become Rahan under your direction. Phra replied: Kathaba, you have under you five hundred Rathees, go and inform them of all that has happened. Whereupon Kathaba went to the place where the Rathees had assembled, and said to them: I wish to place myself under the direction of the great Rah.
han. The five hundred Rathees told him that they were willing to follow his example, since he had been bither to them such an excellent teacher. They rose up and collecting their utensils, such as the twisted hairs, the forked staff, the hairy girdle, the honey filter, &c., they flung them into the river, came, and prostrating at the feet of Budha, they craved admittance to the dignity of Rahans.

Nadi Kathaba, seeing the utensils floating on the water, and carried down by the stream, called his followers and said to them: Some misfortune may have befallen my elder brother; let us go and see what has happened. They were no sooner arrived, than Kathaba related to them, all that had just taken place. Nadi Kathaba went forthwith to Budha's cell, attended by all his disciples. Falling all at the feet of Phra, they declared their readiness to become his disciples, and applied for the dignity of Rahans. Gaya Kathaba, who lived a little below the place of Nadi Kathaba, seeing on the surface of the water, the utensils of both his brothers' followers, floating in the direction of the stream, hastened, with his two hundred disciples, to the place of Ooroowela Kathaba. On his being informed of all that had occurred, he and his followers threw themselves at Gaudama's feet, praying for admittance into the order of Rahans. They were all admitted. The conversion of Ooroowela Kathaba was brought about by the display, on the part of Budha, of no less than three thousand five hundred and sixty won-

70—It has been asserted in a former note, that the preachings of Budha were accompanied with miracles, for conferring an additional strength and an irresistible evidence to his doctrines. This assertion is fully corroborated by all the particulars attending the conversion of the three Kathabas and their disciples. On this occasion Budha met with the greatest amount of stubborn resistance from the part of Ooroowela Kathaba. There is no doubt but our great preacher resorted to every means of persuasion, to carry conviction to the mind of his distinguished hearer. He had, however, to deal with a man full of his own merits and excellence, who thought him-

Buddha's sermon on the mountain—Interview of Buddha and king Pinpathara in the vicinity of the city of Radzajo—Answer of Kathaba to Buddha's interrogation—Instructions delivered to the king and his attendants—Solemn entry of Buddha in Radzajo—Donation of the Weluwan Monastery to Buddha—Conversion of Thariputra and Moukalan—The Rahans are keenly taunted by the people of Radzajo.

Accompanied by his thousand followers, Phra went to the village of Gayathitha. This village stands on the self far superior to every one else: his best arguments proved powerless before a self-conceited individual, who was used to give and not to receive instruction, and was enjoying a far famed celebrity. Buddha was compelled to resort to his unbounded power of working miracles, and with it, overcame, at last, the obstinate and blind resistance of the proud Rathoe. No conquest had ever been so dearly bought; but it proved well worth the extraordinary efforts made to obtain it. Kathaba became one of the most staunch adherents of Buddha, and one of the most fervent disciples who labored hard for the propagation of Buddhism. He is the most celebrated in all Buddhist works, and to his name is ever prefixed the distinguished epithet of Maha, which means great. After Gaudama's demise, he became the patriarch of the Buddhists. By his care and exertions, a council of five hundred Rahans was assembled at Radzajo, under the reign of King Adzatatha, to condemn the unbecoming language used by some false, or imperfectly taught converts, who wished to shake off, on many points, the authority of Buddha.

In the episode of the three Kathabas' conversion, the attentive reader cannot fail to have observed one particular that throws some light on the position several heads of the schools of philosophy, occurred in the days that saw the origin of Buddhism. Those sages, lived in retired places, far from the bustle and tumult of the world. It is probable that, at first, they were alone, or with but a few other individuals, who delighted in the same mode of life. Their time was entirely taken up with study and meditation. The object of their studies and reflections was the boundless field of metaphysics and morals. Their diet was plain and their abstinences—carried to a degree Hindu devotees and fanatics are alone capable of reaching. The fame of the proficiency of some of those individuals, in science and virtue, soon attracted in their solitude, numbers of pupils, eager to place themselves under the tuition and discipline of masters so eminent in every respect. The three Kathabas must have been celebrated throughout the country, since we find them at the head of so many disciples. Humility has never been the forte of the heathenish sages, either in, or out of, India. Conceit and self-esteem were fostered in their souls by the consciousness of their own superiority and excellence, by the praises lavished on them by their disciples, and not a little by the exclusion from society to which they voluntarily resigned themselves. Spiritual pride, like a cunning foe, occupied the heart, the place vacated by passions of a coarser nature and less delicate tinge. The conduct of the elder Kathaba fully bears out the truth and correctness of the above assertion. bank of the river Gaia. Close to it, there is a mountain resembling in appearance an elephant's head. On the top of the mountain, stands a large rock, wide enough to accommodate Budha and all his attendants. He ascended the mountain with his disciples, and having reached its summit, he sat down. Summoning all his disciples, he said to them: Beloved Bickus, all that is to be met with, in the three abodes of men, Nats and Brahmans, is like a burning flame. But why is it so? Because the eyes are a burning flame; the objects perceived by the eyes, the view of those objects, the feeling created by that view, are all like a burning flame. The sensations produced by the eyes, cause a succession of pleasure and pain, but that pleasure and pain are, likewise, a burning flame. What are the causes productive of such a burning? It is the fire of concupiscence, of anger, of ignorance, of birth, of death, of old age and of anxiety. Again, the ear is a burning flame; the sounds, the perception of the sounds, the sensations caused by the sounds, are all a burning flame; the pleasure or pain produced by the sounds, are too, a burning flame; which is fed by the fire of concupiscence, anger, ignorance, birth, old age, death, anxiety, tears, affliction and trouble. Again, the sense of smelling is a burning flame; the odours, the perception of odours, the sensations produced by odours, are all a burning flame; the pleasure and pain resulting therefrom are but a burning flame, fed by concupiscence, anger, ignorance, birth, old age, death, disquietude, tears, affliction and sorrow. Again, the taste is a burning flame; the objects tasted, the perception of those objects, the sensations produced by them, are all a burning flame, kept up by the fire of concupiscence, anger, ignorance, birth, old age, death, anxiety, tears, affliction and sorrow. Again, the sense of feeling, the objects felt, the perception of those objects, sensation produced by them, are a burning flame; the pleasure and pain resulting therefrom, are but a burning flame, fostered by concupiscence, anger, ignorance, birth, old age, death, anxiety, tears, affliction and sorrow. Again, the heart is a burning flame, as well as all the objects perceived by it, and the sensations produced in it: the pleasure and pain caused by the heart are, too, a burning flame, kept up by the fire of concupiscence, anger, ignorance, birth, old age, death, disquietude, tears, affliction and sorrow. Beloved Bickus, they who understand the doctrine I have preached, and see through it, are full of wisdom and deserve to be called my disciples. They are displeased with the senses, the objects of senses, matter, pleasure and pain, as well as with all the affections of the heart. They become free from concupiscence and therefore exempt from passions. They have acquired the true wisdom that leads to perfection; they are delivered at once from the miseries of another birth. Having practised the most excellent works, nothing more remains to be performed by them. They want no more the guidance of the sixteen laws, for they have reached far beyond them.\(^{70}\) (bis)

\(^{70}\) (bis.)—The philosophical discourse of Budha on the mountain may be considered as the summary of his theory of morals. It is confessedly very obscure and much above the ordinary level of human understanding. The hearers whom he addressed, were persons already trained to his teaching, and therefore prepared for understanding such doctrines. Had he spoken in that abstruse style, to common people, it is certain he would have missed his aim and exposed himself to the chance of not being understood. But he addressed a select audience whose minds were fully capable of comprehending his most elevated doctrines. He calls his disciples Bickus, or mendicants, to remind them of the state of voluntary poverty they had embraced when they became his followers, and to impress their minds with contempt for the riches and pleasures of this world.

He lays down as a great and general principle that all that exists resembles a flame that dazzles the eyes by its brilliancy, and torments by its burning effects. Here appers the favorite notion of Buddhism, that there is nothing substantial and real in this world, and that the continual changes and vicissitudes we are exposed to, are the cause of painful sensations. Budha reviews the six senses (the heart according to his theory, is the seat of a sixth sense) in succession, and as they are the channels through which affections are produced on the soul, he compares to a burning flame, the organs of senses, the various objects of the action of senses, the results painful or agreeable produced by them. Hence he culminates a general and sweeping condemnation against all that exists, without man. The senses being the means through which matter influences the soul, share in the universal doom. Budha sets forth the causes productive of that burning flame. They are, first, the three great and general principles of destr-
Having thus spoken, Buddha remained silent. His hearers felt themselves wholly disentangled from the trammels of passions, and disengaged from all affections to material objects, and they who had been but Rahans, become Rahandas.

Whilst the most excellent Phra was enjoying himself in the place of Gayathitha, he recollected that at the time he was but a Phralaong, being near the mountain Pantawa, he had received from king Pimpathara an invitation to come to his own country and preach the law. Accompanied with his thousand Rahandas, he set out for the country of Radzagio. Having arrived at a small distance from the royal city, he went to the Latti grove.
about three gawots from Radzagio, a place planted with palm trees. The king having heard of his arrival, said to his people: The descendant of a long succession of illustrious princes, the great Rahan Gaudama, has entered into our country, and is now in the grove of palm trees, in the garden of Tandiwana. The happy news was soon reechoed throughout the country. The people said among themselves: The great Gaudama is come indeed. He is perfectly acquainted with all that relates to the three states of men, Nats and Brahmas; he preaches a sublime and lovely law; the morals that he announces, are pure like a shell newly cleansed. Pimpathara placing himself at the head of 120,000 warriors, surrounded by crowds of nobles and Pounhas, went to the garden of Tandiwana, where Phra was seated in the middle of his disciples. He paid his respects by prostrating before him, and then withdrew to a becoming distance. The countless crowd followed the example of their monarch, and seated at a becoming distance. Some of them remained conversing with Budha, and heard from him words worthy to be ever remembered; some others having their hands joined to the forehead, remained in a respectful attitude; some were praising his illustrious ancestors; some others remained modestly silent. All of them perceiving the three Kathabas close to the person of Phra, doubted whether Gaudama was their disciple, or they, his disciples. Budha seeing at once what thought occupied the mind of the warriors, noblemen and Pounhas, addressed the elder Kathaba, called Ooroowela Kathaba, and said to him: Kathaba, you who lived formerly in the solitude of Ooroowela, answer the question, I am now putting to you. You were formerly a teacher of Rathees, who practised works of great mortification to such an extent, that their bodies were emaciated by self inflicted penances; what has induced you to give up the sacrifices you were wont to make? Blessed Budha, answered Kathaba, I have observed that exterior objects, the sounds, the taste, the gratification of senses, are but miserable filth: and, therefore, I take no more delight in the offering of small and great sacrifices. Budha replied: Kathaba, if you be no longer pleased with what is beautiful to the eyes, pleasant to the ear, palatable to the taste, and agreeable to the gratification of the senses, in what do you presently find pleasure and delight? Kathaba answered: Blessed Budha, the state of Nibban is a state of rest, but that rest cannot be found as long as we live under the empire of senses and passions. That rest excludes existence, birth, old age and death; the great mental attainments alone lead thereto. I know and see that happy state. I long for it. I am, therefore, displeased with the making of great and small sacrifices. Having thus spoken, Kathaba rose up, worshipped Budha, by prostrating before him and touching with his forehead the extremities of his feet, and said: O most excellent Budha, you are my teacher, and I am your disciple. All the people seeing what Kathaba had done, knew that he was practising virtue under the direction of Gaudama. 71 Phra, who was acquainted with their innermost

71.—From the purport of Kathaba's reply to Budha's question, it may be inferred with certainty that the Rathees were in the habit of making sacrifices or burnt offerings. These sacrifices, again, were distinguished into two classes; the one including the small or daily ones, and the other, the great burnt offerings, made on solemn occasions. That these sacrifices were not performed by the killing and immolating of animals, there can be no doubt, as such an act would have been contrary to the tender regard they always had for the life of animals. The institutes of Menu come to our help to elucidate this point. The Brahmin is enjoined, according to that compilation of laws, to make burnt offerings of clarified butter and other articles, to the manes of his ancestors. Agreeably to this regulation, Kathaba performed those rites, which, in the opinion of Budha, were perfectly useless, since they could not be the means of elevating the performer to the knowledge and perfection requisite for obtaining what he always calls per excellence, the deliverance.

Kathaba is rather obscure in his answer. It seems that he intended to acknowledge that notwithstanding the sacrifices and burnt offerings he had made, and upon the value of which he had laid much stress, concupiscence and other vicious propensities were still deeply rooted in him; that, through the channel of his senses, exterior objects continued to make impression on his soul. He had, therefore, become disgusted with practices which could not free him from the action and influence of passions and matter.

In the opinion of Budha, the observance of exterior religious rites, can thoughts, knew that they were longing to hear the preaching of the law. As he had always done, he began to preach to them the virtue of liberality in alms-giving, and then unfolded before them, with matchless eloquence, the advantages of leaving the world, &c. The hearers felt an inward delight at all that was said to them. Observing the favorable impression made upon them, Gaudama continued to instruct them on the four laws, regarding the miseries of this world, the passions, the practice of excellent works, and the ways to perfection. At the conclusion of these instructions, the king and 100,000 of the assembly, like a piece of white cloth, which, when plunged into die, retains the color it receives, obtained instantly the state of Thautapan. 72 As to the ten thousand remaining hearers, they believed in the three precious things, in the capacity of Upathakas.

never elevate man to the sublime knowledge of pure truth, which alone does confer the real perfection to him who has become a true sage, and is deemed worthy of obtaining the deliverance. A serious application of the mind to the meditation of the law, of the nature of beings, is the only way leading to the acquirement of true wisdom. As long as Kathaba was contented with material acts of worship, and his mind's attention was engrossed with those vain ceremonials, he had not as yet entered in the way of perfection. He had hitherto missed the true path; he had wandered in the broad road of error, encompassed by mental darkness, and deceived by perpetual illusions. His extensive knowledge had served but to mislead him in the wrong direction. He wanted the guidance of Budha to enable him to retrace back his steps and find the right way. He had to become sensible of the truth of the great fundamental maxims of all real wisdom, viz.: that in this world, all is subjected to change, and to pain; and that all beings are mere illusions, destitute of all reality.

72.—To complete what has already been stated respecting the Arihas or venerables, in a foregoing note, the following is added. The reader must bear in mind that the Arihas are divided into four classes, named—Thautapan, Thakadagam, Anagam and Arihata, and, according to the particular position occupied by the beings of these states, each class is subdivided into two. Thus for instance, Thautapatti Megata means, he who has entered, and is walking, as it were, in the way of the perfection of Thautapan, and Thautapatti-pho indicates those who enjoy the merits and blessings of the state of Thautapan, and so with the three superior stages of perfection. To obtain the state of Thautapan, a man must have left the direction followed up by all creatures and entered into the direction, or way, that leads to deliverance. He will have yet to go through 80,000 kappas or durations of worlds, and must be born seven times more in the state of man and Nat, before he be a perfected being, ripe for the state of Neibban. Those who have reached the state of Thakadagam shall have to pass through 60,000
The ruler of the country of Magatariz, king Pimpathara, having obtained the state of Thauhtapan, said to Gandama: Illustrious Budha, some years ago, when I was but a crown prince of this country, I entertained five desires, which are all happily accomplished. Here are the five desires—I wished to become king; I desired that the Phra, worthy of receiving the homage of all men, should come into my kingdom; that I might have the privilege of approaching him; that he might preach his doctrine to me; and finally that I might thoroughly understand all his preaching. These five wishes have been fully realized. Your law, O most excellent Budha, is a most perfect law. What shall I assimilate it to, as regards the happy results it produces? It is like replacing on its proper basis, a vase that was bottom upwards; or setting to light, objects hitherto buried in deep darkness; it is an excellent guide that shows out the right way; it is like a brilliant light shining forth and dispelling darkness. Now I take refuge in you, your law and the Assembly of the perfect. Henceforth I will be your supporter, and tomorrow will supply you and your disciples with all that kaps, and be born but once in the state of Nat and once in the state of man, before they be perfected. Those who have obtained the third step of Aanagam, have to travel through 40,000 kaps, and are no more to undergo the process of birth; at the end of that period, they are perfected. The fourth stage of perfection, that of Arahat, is the highest a being can ever obtain. The fortunate Arahat is gifted with supernatural powers. At the end of 20,000 kaps, he is perfected, and reaches the state of deliverance. These four states are often called the four great roads leading to deliverance or to Nibban. It may be asked whether the state of Thauhtapan be the first step reached by every one that adheres to Budha's doctrines, or whether it is the one that requires a certain progress in the way of believing and practicing. It seems, from the narrative of king Pimpathara and his followers' conversion, that the state of Thauhtapan is the reward of those who have showed a more than common proficiency and fervour, in adhering to Budha and his doctrines, but not the first step to enter into the assembly of the faithful and become a member thereof. One may be a simple hearer, or Upathaka, believing in the three precious things, without attaining that of Thauhtapan. On this occasion, the king and 100,000 of his warriors and noblemen became Thauhtapan, whereas the remaining 10,000 became believers and members of the assembly without reaching any further. The first entered into the stream or current leading to perfection. The latter were firm believers, observed the five precepts, but in no way inspired to the attainment of the doctrines of a higher order.

is necessary for the support of nature. Budha, by his silence, testified his acceptance of the offered favor. Whereupon the king rose up, prostrated before him, and turning on the right, left the place and returned to his palace.

Early in the morning, Pimpathara ordered all sorts of eatables to be prepared; meanwhile he sent messengers to Budha to inform him that his meal was ready. Budha rising up, put on his dress and carrying his Patta, set out for Radzagio, followed by his 1,000 disciples. At that time, a prince of Thagias assuming the appearance of a handsome young man, walked a little distance in front of Budha, singing to his praise several stanzas. "Behold the most excellent is advancing towards Radzagio, with his 1,000 disciples. In his soul, he is full of meekness and amiability: he is exempt from all passions: his face is beautiful and shines forth like the star Thigi: he has escaped out of the whirlpool of existences, and delivered himself from the miseries of transmigration. He is on his way to the city of Radzagio, attended by a thousand Rahandas. (The same stanza is thrice repeated.) He who has obtained the perfection of Ariahs, who has practised the ten great virtues, who has a universal knowledge, who knows and preaches the law of merits; who discovers at once the sublime attainments, the most perfect being, the most excellent, is entering into the city of Radzagio attended with a thousand Rahandas.

The inhabitants of the city seeing the beautiful appearance of that young man and hearing all that he was singing aloud, said to each other: who is that young man whose countenance is so lovely, and whose mouth proclaims so wonderful things? The Thagia hearing what was said of him, replied: O children of men! the most excellent Phra whom ye see, is gifted with an incomparable wisdom; all perfections are in him; he is free of all passions; no being can ever be compared to him; he is deserving of receiving the homage and respect of men and Nats: his unwavering mind is ever fixed in truth;
he announces a law extending to all things. As to me, I am but his humble servant.

The narrative of the donation of the grove or garden of Weloowon by king Pimpathara, to Budha, discloses the manner in which Buddhist monks have become holders, not as individuals, but as members of society, of landed properties. Budha and his disciples at first had no place to live in, as a body or a society; he hitherto had taken up his quarters in any place where people were willing to receive him. He must have often been put to great inconvenience, particularly after the accession of new disciples, daily crowding about him. The pious king felt the disadvantage the society was labouring under; he resolved to give them a place where the assembly might live and remain. The donation was as solemn as possible. It transferred to Budha the property of the garden, without any condition, for ever. The donation on the other hand, was fully accepted. This is, I believe, the first instance of an act of this description. The grove and monastery of Weloowon is much celebrated in Budha's life.

In Burmese towns, a particular spot is allowed for the building of houses or monasteries for Buddhist recluse monks. It is somewhat isolated from all other buildings, forms, as it were, the quarter of the yellow dressed personages. Here is a general description of one of those buildings. They are of an oblong square shape, raised about eight or ten feet above the ground and supported on wooden posts and sometimes, though seldom, on brick pillars. 'The frame of the edifice is of wood, and planks form the wall. Above the first roof rises a second one of smaller dimensions, and a third one yet smaller than the second. This style of roofing a building is allowed but for pagodas, Talapins' houses, and royal palaces. The place between the soil and the floor is left open and never converted to any use. A flight of steps, made of wood or bricks, leads to the entrance of the edifice, the interior of which is generally divided as follows:—one vast hall designed for the reception of visitors, and used also as a school room for the boys who go to learn the rudiments of reading, writing and sometimes ciphering. Except on grand occasions, the Talapins generally stay in that hall, doing away with their time in the best way they can, by reading occasionally books, counting their beads, chewing betel, and very often sleeping. At the extremity of the hall, there is a place raised one or two steps above the level. A portion of that place is left vacant or empty, and reserved for the sitting of the Talapins, when they receive visitors: the other portion, which extends to the wall, is occupied by idols or representations of Budha, raised on pedestals, and sometimes placed on shelves, with the few implements required for exterior worship. There, too, are to be seen a few trunks ornamented with sculptures and gildings and containing books belonging to the monastery. The hall and the place as far as the walls occupy just one half of the oblong square. The other half, parallel to the first, is occupied by rooms intended for the storing of alms, and as dormitories for the inmates of the house. In some monasteries, the ceiling is painted and partly gilt. The cook room, when there is one, is connected with the extremity of the square, opposite to the one occupied by the idols. It is generally on the same level with the floor of the building. Government has nothing to do with the erection, repairs and maintenance of these edifices. They are erected and kept up by private indivi...
Having reached the king's palace, Budha was received with every demonstration of respect, and led to the place prepared for him. Pimpathara thought within himself of the thing which could prove acceptable to Phra, in order to offer it to him. He said within himself: my garden, which is situated near the city would, doubtless, be a very fit place for Budha and his followers to live in. As it lies not far from the city, it would be a place of easy resort to all those who would feel inclined to visit Budha and pay him their respects; it is, moreover, far enough that the noise and cries of the people could not be heard.

duals, who deem it very meritorious to build such places. Those, whose pesty actuates and prompts them to undertake such an expensive work, assume the title of Khong Taga, which means supporter of a pagoda or Talapoins' residence. They are proud of such distinction, cause themselves to be called by that title, and always make it to follow their names in signing any paper or document.

The above descriptive sketch of monastery is rather incomplete if applied to those found in large places of Burmah proper, and particularly in the capital. Some of them are truly laid out on a scale of vastness and magnificence, scarcely to be thought of, by those who have not examined them. A large open gallery runs all round the building; a second, one of a rectangular shape, but protected by the roof, form as it were, on the four sides the vestibule to the central portion of the edifice. It is the place where the Phongies spend the greater part of their time, either in talking with the numerous idlers that visit them, or in teaching children. Large shutters separate this form the opened verandah; they may be thrown open all open by pushing forward the lower part, the upper one remaining fixed by hinges, and so may be opened to the height required to protect the inmates from the rain and the sun. The central hall, by far the finest and loftiest of the building, is reserved for the idols, and all the implements of worship and the boxes containing the books of the monastery, commonly put together in a very disorderly way. The ceiling is gilt and adorned, often with taste and elegance. A partition divides the hall into two equal parts. The one towards the east is for some huge statue of Gaudama, and smaller ones with many articles of worship. The other facing the south, is used for several purposes; sometimes as dormitories for the Talapoins. The posts supporting the interior part, are six or eight in number, and offer the finest specimen of teak timber I have ever seen, some being fully sixty and seventy feet high. In some of these monasteries, the best parts of the interior is gilt, and sometimes the exterior sides; the ornaments of the extremities of the roof and the space between the roofs are covered with gold leaves. In these two places too, are displayed carvings which reflect great credit on the skill of native workmen, and elicit the admiration of foreigners. One of these monasteries called the king's daung-gye, near the place where is the Arracan idol, and another close to the place where the supreme head of Talapoins is living, are the finest and largest specimens of monasteries, the writer has ever seen in Burmah.
therein: the place is peculiarly fitted for retreat and contemplation; it will assuredly prove agreeable to Budha. Whereupon he rose up, and holding in his hand a golden shell, like a cup, he made to Phra a solemn offering of that garden which was called Weloowon. 73(bis) Gaudama

73(bis.)—On the occasion of the presentation to Budha of the Weloowon monastery and of the lands attached to it, by king Pimpathara, there was observed a curious ceremony often alluded to, in Buddhist writings. He held in his hands a golden pitcher full of water, which he kept pouring down on the ground, whilst he pronounced the formula of donation. This is a ceremony of an Indian origin, which, with many others, has been imported in these parts, along with the religious doctrines. It is intended to be an exterior sign of, or testimony to, the offering that is made on the occasion. When it is performed, the parties pronounce a certain formula, calling to witness of the act of donation, the Nats, guardians of the place, and in particular the Nat that is supposed to rule over the earth; and at the same time, the offering, not satisfied with receiving for his own benefit, the merits of his pious liberality, expresses the earnest desire, that all men, or rather all beings should share with him, in the blessings he expects to reap from his good deed. The generous and liberal dispositions of the donor, it may be observed, exhibit the truly pleasing display of an amount of charity and brotherly love, scarcely to be expected from the followers of an erroroneous creed. The ceremony therefore, has a two fold object, conferring unreserved and absolute efficiency to the act of donation, and dividing or apportioning the merits of the good work among all beings.

In perusing attentively the contents of this legend, the reader will easily follow the gradual development of the Buddhist religious system, and in particular, the establishment of most of the disciplinary regulations, in full force in our own days, in most of the countries where that form of religion has obtained a long standing and a predominating footing. At first, the Religious that constituted the body of the followers of Budha, were few, and could easily, in the company of their eminent teacher, procure, in accordance with the vow of strict poverty they had made, shelter, food and raiment. There was no need for them to accept, in the shape of donation, anything beyond what was absolutely necessary for the wants of the day. We may conjecture that their leader, with a jealous care, watched over his Religious on this point, to establish them in the spirit of poverty and of a thorough contempt of the things of this world. But the society or fraternity growing numerous, the dependence on the daily offerings appeared not to meet in sufficient manner, the real necessities it felt, particularly as regards shelter. This want was quickly perceived and keenly felt by the pious King Pimpathara, who came to the resolution of presenting Budha, and his followers, with a proper place to withdraw to, at all times, but particularly during the wet season, when the pouring of the annual rains puts a momentary check of four months, to the religious peregrinations of the preachers. The same motives that induced Budha to accept the proffered royal gift, influenced him likewise to grant to his Religious, the dangerous, it is true, but the absolutely necessary permission of receiving offerings of houses and lands. From that time, the religious communities have made use of the privilege granted to them, in all the places where they have been established. In Burmah, this favor has not been abused, and the religious remained silent in token of his acceptance of the gift. He preached the law, and left the palace. At that time he called his disciples and said to them:—Beloved Rahans, I give you permission to receive offerings.

In the country of Radzagio, there was a heterodox Rahan named Thindzi, who had under him five hundred and fifty disciples. Thariputra and Maukalan were at that time practising virtue under the guidance of that master. Here is the way they became Rahans. When they were but laymen under the name of Oopathi and Kaulita, on a certain day, surrounded by two hundred and twenty companions, they went on the top of a lofty mountain to enjoy the sight of countless multitudes of people sporting and playing in the surrounding flat country. While they were gazing over the crowds of human beings, they said to each other: in a hundred years hence, all these living beings shall have fallen a prey to death. Whereupon they rose up and left the place, but their mind was deeply preoccupied with the idea of death. While the two friends were walking silently together, they began at last to communicate to each other, the result of their reflections. If there be, said they, a principle of death, a universal tendency towards destruction; there must be, too, its opposite principle, that of not dying and escaping destruction. On that very instant, they resolved to search ardently for the excellent law that teaches the way of not dying, and obtained the state of perfect fixity and immutability. In those parts, there lived six heterodox teachers, who were named: Mekkali, Gau, Sala, Thindzi, Jani and Ganti; among them, Thindzi was the only one who with his disciples, wore white cloths. They went to the place where lived the Rahan Thindzi, placed themselves under his direction and put on the dress of Rahan. Within three days, they acquired the science, wisdom and knowledge of their teacher, without having as yet reached the object of their eager pursuit. They said to Thindzi: Teacher, is this all that you know? And have you no other science to teach us? I have indeed, replied the teacher, taught you all the knowledge I possess. Finding nothing satisfactory in the answer, the two friends said: Let us continue seeking for the law that has reality in itself; the first that shall have discovered it, shall, without delay, communicate it to the other.

On a certain morning, one of Gaudama's disciples, named Athadzi, having put on his religious habit and carrying his patta on his left arm, went out to receive his rice. All in his person was noble and graceful; his countenance and behaviour were at once gentle and dignified, whether he walked or stopped, or looked forward, or on the right or the left, or sat in a cross legged position. The false Rahan Oopathi, who became afterwards Thariputra, perceiving the Rahan Athadzi with such a meek and dignified deportment, said to himself: such a Rahan is assuredly worthy of receiving offerings; he has doubtless attained perfection. I will go to him and ask him, in case of his having a teacher, who is that distinguished instructor, under whom he practises virtue; and in case of his being himself a teacher, what is the doctrine that he teaches. But it is not becoming to put to him any question whilst he is on his way to beg alms. I will follow at a distance. Athadzi having collected alms, left the city and went to a small dzeat, where he sat down and ate his meal. Oopathi followed him thither. Having entered into the dzeat, he rendered to him the usual services that a disciple pays to his teacher. When the meal of Athadzi was over, he poured water over his hands, and with a heart overflowing with joy, he conversed with him for a while. He withdrew then to a becoming distance, and addressed him as follows: great Rahan, your exterior is full of meekness and benevolence; your countenance bespeaks the purity and innocence of your soul; if you be a disciple, pray, under what teacher have you become Rahan? who is your guide in the way to perfection, and what is the doctrine he is preaching to you? Young Rahan, replied Athadzi, have you not heard of the illustrious Budha, the descendant of a long succession of great monarchs, who has entered the profession of Rahan. I have become Rahan under him: He is my teacher; to his doctrine I cling with all the energy of my soul. What is the doctrine of that great master, asked Oopathi? I am but a novice in the profession, replied modestly Athadzi, and am as yet imperfectly acquainted with the doctrine of my teacher. The little, however, I know, I will freely communicate to you. Oopathi entreated him to do so. Athadzi replied: the law which I have learned at the feet of Budha, explains all that relates to matter, to the principles that act upon it, to passions and to the mind; it makes man despise all that is material, conquer his passions and regulate his mind. On hearing this doctrine, Oopathi felt the ties of passions gradually relaxing and giving way; his soul became, as it were, disentangled from the influence of the senses. He became enamoured with such a pure and perfect law and obtained the condition of Thautapan. Convinced that he had, at last, found what he had hitherto searched after in vain, the law of Neibban, he went without delay to his friend, to make him share in the beneficial result of his fortunate discovery. Kaulita perceiving his friend coming up to him with a rejoiced countenance, indicative of the happiness his soul was inwardly enjoying, asked him if he had found what he had hitherto vainly looked for. Oopathi related to him all the particulars of his conversation, with the Rahan Athadzi. Whereupon Kaulita became instantly a Thautapan. Both resolved to leave their teacher Thindzi, and go immediately to place themselves under the guidance of Budha. Three times they applied for permission to execute their design, and three times it was denied them. At last they departed, each with his two hundred and twenty companions. Thindzi enraged at being left alone, died, vomiting blood from his mouth.
When the two friends and their followers were drawing near to the place of Weloowon, Phra assembled all his disciples and said to them: behold those two friends coming up to me; they will become my two beloved disciples—their minds are acute and penetrating—they actually take delight in the law of Neibban; their thoughts are converging towards that great centre of truth; they come to me and they will become my two most excellent disciples. Whilst he was speaking, the two friends crossed the threshold of the monastery, prostrated themselves at the feet of Budha, humbly craving the favor of being admitted among his disciples and to practise virtue under his immediate direction. On this occasion, Phra uttered the following words: O Bickus, come to me; I preach the most excellent law; apply yourselves to the practise of the most perfect works which will put an end to all miseries. A suit of dress and a patta were handed over to each of the two friends that were henceforth to be called Thariputra and Maukalan, and they became members of the assembly. Having put on the new dress, they appeared to the eyes of all, with the decent and dignified deportment of Rahans that had sixty years of profession. Their followers became Bickus of the second order. Seven days after, Maukalan became a Rahanda; but it took fifteen days for Thariputra, to obtain the same favor. The two new converts were elevated to the dignity of disciples of the right and of the left, that is to say, they obtained precedence over all others.

The distinction thus granted to Thariputra and Maukalan, excited a feeling of jealously among the disciples of Budha. In their conversations, they complained to each other, of the preference given to those who had just been admitted among the members of assembly. They went so far as to say that Budha had acted in this case, under the influence of human considerations. These remarks were brought to the notice of Budha, who assembled his disciples and said to them: Beloved Bickus, my conduct in this instance, has not been guided by unworthy motives; I have acted as I ought to have done. In the days of the Phra Anaumadathith, the two friends were leading the life of ascetics. They paid the greatest respect and veneration to the then existing Budha, and entreated him, by repeated supplications, to hold out to them the solemn promise that they would become the disciples of the right and of the left of some future Budhas. Anaumadathithi replied to them that the object of their wishes should be granted unto them when the Budha Gaudama would appear in the world. This is, beloved Bickus, the reason that has influenced me in elevating to the first rank, the two new converts. The answer completely satisfied the disciples and effectually silenced all murmurs. Further particulars regarding the promise that these two illustrious friends received in the time of the Budha Anaumadathithi, may be read with circumstantial details, in the book called Apudan-term.

The inhabitants of the Magatha country, seeing that so many persons chiefly belonging to the first families, were embracing the profession of Rahan's, said amongst themselves: behold how the Rahan Gaudama, by his preachings, causes the depopulation of the country, and forces countless wives to the unwished for state of widowhood. A thousand Rathee's have embraced the profession of Rahans; all the disciples of Thindzi have followed their example; many others will soon tread on their footsteps? What will become of our country? With these and other expressions, they gave vent to their hatred of the Rahans, and endeavoured to pour over them, all kinds of ridicule and abuse. They concluded by saying: the great Rahan has come to the city of Radzagio, which is like a cowpen, surrounded by five hills*; he has now with him the disciples of Thindzi; who will be the next to go to him? The Rahans hearing all that was said against them, went to Budha and related to him all that they had heard. To console them Budha said; beloved Bickus, the abuses, sarcasms and ridicule, levelled at you, shall not last long: seven days hence, all shall be over. Here is the reply you will make to the revilers: like all his predecessors, Budha is striving to preach a most perfect law: by the means of the truths which he proclaims for the benefit of all, he brings men over to himself. What shall avail any man to feel envious at the success he obtains by so legitimate a means. The same torrent of ridicule having been poured on the Rahans, when they went out, they followed the advice of their great teacher, replied in the manner they had been taught to do, and the storm was soon over. The people understood that the great Rahan was preaching a perfect law, and that he never resorted but to fair means, to attract disciples round his person. Here ends the narrative of the conversion and vocation of Thariputra and Maukalan.

* In his Archaeological Survey Report, General Cunningham has supplied us with an accurate description of the position and ruins of the celebrated city of Radzagio. His own measurements of the old ramparts that are still visible, agree to a surprising degree with those of the two Chinese pilgrims, Fa-Hian and Hwen-Tsan, who visited the same spot, in the fourth and sixth century of our era. The city was situated in a valley, surrounded by five hills, which are named Gigakute, Isigli, Wilhara, Wipala and Pandawa.

It had five miles in circumference. This is meant for the circuit of the inner wall. The exterior one had nearly nine miles. It is on the southern face of the Wirbaha mountain, that is the famous cave, at the entrance of which was held the first Buddhist council, not long after the cremation of Budha's remains. There is no doubt, but the heights were, in the palmy days of Buddhism, covered with Buddhist monuments. As the place has been subsequently occupied by Brahmins and Musulmen, the Dzeda and monasteries have been mercilessly pulled down to furnish materials for mosques, tombs and temples. The eminences are now covered with Musulmen tombs, which occupy the places formerly adorned with Pagodas. Springs of hot water were numerous in the vicinity of the city. The writer has, on one occasion only, met in Buddhist compositions, an allusion to that natural phenomenon, so beneficial to people living in hot climates. The modern Rajghir, both by name and situation, brings to our recollection, the celebrated capital of Magatha, so famous in Buddhist annals. As the extent of Rajzagio has been so accurately determined by ancient and modern visitors, one can well afford to laugh, at the immensely exaggerated number of houses, supposed by certain Burmese writers to have composed the city.
Chapter VIII.

Thoodaudana desirous to see his son, sends messengers to him—They become converts—Kaludari, a last messenger, prevails on Budha to go to Kapilawot—His reception—Conversion of the King and of Yathaudara—Nanda and Raunala put on the religious habit—Conversion of Ananda and of several of his relatives—Temptation of Ananda—Conversion of Egedatta—Story of Tsampuuka.

Whilst the most excellent Phra was remaining in the Welooowon monastery, enjoying himself in the midst of his disciples and the crowds of hearers that daily resorted thither to listen to his preachings, his father Thoodaudana who had ever been anxiously and sedulously gathering—

74.—In glancing over the episode of Thoodanna's deputation to his son, to invite him to come and visit his native country, the reader is almost compelled to confess that the motive that influenced the King was but inspired by the natural feeling of beholding once more before he died, him whose fame spread far and wide, rendered him an object of universal admiration. Was the monarch ever induced by considerations of a higher order to send for Budha? There is no distinct proof in support of this supposition. He was father, and he but obeyed and followed the impulse of his paternal heart. He entertained a high sense of his son's distinguished qualifications. He had faith in the wondrous signs foretelling his future matchless greatness. He desired, therefore, to honor him in an extraordinary way, on the very spot where he had been born. But he appeared to concern himself very little about the doctrines he was preaching with a never equalled success. The King exhibited a great amount of worldly mindedness, until his mind had been enlightened by the oral instructions of the great reformer.

It is difficult, if not impossible, to form an accurate idea of the effect caused on the mass of the people, by Budha's preachings. We see that eminent and zealous reformer surrounded with thousands of distinguished disciples, in the country of Sadagio. These converts belonged chiefly to the class of anchoresses and philosophers already alluded to in some foregoing notes, as existing at the time Budha began to enter the career of preaching. But the great bulk of the populations of the various places he visited, seemed to have received for a long time, little or no impressions from his discourses. The opponents of Budha, the Brahmins in particular, exercised a powerful influence over the public mind. They used it most effectually for retaining their ancient hold over the masses. It required the extraordinary display of the greatest wonders to break through the almost impenetrable barriers raised by his enemies. From that period we see the people following Budha, crowding round him, and showing unmistakable signs of belief in him.

The only ground to account for this undeniable result, is the philosophical method adopted by Budha, in expounding the principles of his system. His mode of proceeding in the gradual development of his ideas, retained the abstruseness peculiar to subjects discussed in schools of philosophy. The technical terms so familiar to scholars, prove enigmatical to the uninitiated. It takes a long time, before maxims elaborated by scholars, be ing every possible information respecting his son, from the time he withdrew into solitude, and performed during six years, the hardest works of bodily mortification, was then informed that his son had already begun to preach the most perfect law, and was actually staying in the city of Radzagio. He felt then an irresistible desire to see him once more before his death. He therefore ordered a nobleman of his court to his presence and said to him: "nobleman, take with you a retinue of thousand followers and go forthwith to the city of Radzagio: tell my son that I am now much advanced in years, that I long to see him once more, before I die; desire him, therefore, so far popularized, as to be understood by the unlearned, which in every age and country have always constituted the great mass of the people. If the mind of the generality of man is unable to comprehend at first a system of doctrines, based on metaphysics, we cannot wonder at the slow progress made by the preachings of the great philosopher; but the working of wonders is a tangible fact, operating upon the senses of the multitude, eliciting their applause and disposing them to yield an implicit faith, to all the instructions imparted by the wonderful being that is gifted with supernatural powers. Feelings and not reason, become the foundation of a belief which grows stronger in proportion to the mysterious obscurity that encompasses the proposed dogmas, when supported by wonderful deeds.

At the time Thosodandana sent messengers to his son, the great work of conversion was carried on with a most complete and, hitherto, unheard of success. The hall of the Welooven monastery was too small for the thousands that flocked thither to hear Gaudama. Without its precincts, crowds stood motionless, listening with unabated attention to the discourses that fell from his lips. So crowded was the audience, that the messengers had no chance to make their way to the presence of the preacher. Struck at the intense attention paid to what was said by their master's son, they too wished to make themselves acquainted with the subjects of the instruction. What was listened to, from motives of mere curiosity, soon made a deep impression upon their mind. The magic power of the irresistible eloquence of Buddha, worked almost instantaneously a thorough change in their dispositions, and they became converts. So perfect was their conversion, that they forgot for the sake of truth, the very object of their mission. They became at once members of the Assembly, and took rank among the Rahans. They attained the state of Arihas, and were foremost among the perfect. The great attainments arrived at, by the Arihas, communicates to the material portion of their being, such an extraordinary amount of amazing virtues or properties, that it becomes so refined as to partake, to a certain degree, of the nature of spirits. Hence we see the Bahandas going over immense distances, through the air, and performing deeds of a supernatural order. The power of working miracles is, therefore, inherent to perfection; and it is greater or smaller in proportion to the degree of perfection possessed by individuals. We find that power expanded in Buddha to an unlimited extent, because his mental attainments were boundless.
to come over with you to the country of Kapilawot. The nobleman having received the royal message, took his leave from the King, and attended with a thousand followers, set out for Radzagio. When he drew near to the Weloowon monastery, he found it crowded with an innumerable multitude of people, listening with a respectful attention to Budha's instructions. Unwilling to disturb the audience, the nobleman delayed for a while the delivering of his royal master's message. Remaining at the extremity of the crowd, he, with his followers, eagerly lent the utmost attention to all that Budha was saying. They at once obtained the state of Arahat, and applied for admission into the orders of Rahans. The favor was granted. As to the pattas and tsiwarans required for such a great number of applicants, Budha stretched his right arm, when there appeared at once the pattas and dresses required. The new converts put on the dress of their order, when they all appeared with the dignified countenance and meek deportment of Rahans, who had sixty years of profession. Having arrived at the exalted state of Ariahts, they became indifferent and unconcerned about all the things of this material world, and the King's mandate was entirely lost sight of.

The sovereign of Kapilawot, seeing that his nobleman did not return from the country of Magatha, and that

73.—Magatha is a country in the north of India. It occupied nearly the same extent of territory now called North Behar, in Bengal. The Pali or sacred language of the southern Buddhists, is often called the language of Magatha. Hence we may infer that it was the common language of that country. It is probable that the Pali language was extensively spoken in the days of Gandama, and it was the channel through which he and his disciples, long after him, conveyed their religious instructions to the multitude of converts. The Pitagot, or the last amended collection of sacred writings, is written in Pali, which is looked upon in Ceylon, Nepal, Rumah, and Siam as the language of sacred literature. Except in some old manuscripts, where the old square Pali letters are used, the Burmese employ their common alphabetic characters for writing Pali words. The words having to pass, first through a Burmese ear, and next, being expressed by Burmese letters, undergo great changes. To such an extent does the metamorphosis reach, that very often they are scarcely recognizable. The Burmans, however, deserve great credit for having, in very many instances, retained in their orthography of Pali words, letters which, though not at all no news were heard of him, dispatched a second messenger with an equal number of followers, on the same errand. They all were taken up, with Budha's preachings and became Rahandas. The same thing happened to seven messengers, successively sent to Radzagio, for the same purpose. They, with their respective retinues, became converts of the first class.

Disappointed at seeing that none of the messengers had returned to bring him some news, regarding his son, king Thoodaudana exclaimed: is there no one in my palace, that bears any affection unto me? Shall I not be able to get a person who could procure for me, some information respecting my son? He looked among his courtiers and selected one, named Kaludari, as the fittest person for such a difficult errand. Kaludari had been born on the same day as Budha; with him he had spent the age of his infancy, and lived on terms of the most sincere sounded, indicate to the eye, the nature of the word, its origin and its primitive form.

In the southern parts of Burmah, the Pali language is learned, but not studied, used but not understood by the inmates of monasteries. They are all obliged to learn certain formulas of prayers to be daily recited in private; and on great and solemn occasions, to be chanted aloud in the presence of a crowd of pious hearers. The writer, anxious to acquire some knowledge of the sacred language, visited often those monks, who among their brethren enjoyed a certain fame for learning, with the express intention of becoming an humble student, under the direction of one of the best informed of the society. He was thoroughly disappointed at finding those who professed their services in great earnest, quite ignorant and utterly incapable of giving him the least assistance.

The Burmese have translated in their vernacular tongue, most of the sacred writings. In many instances the translation is not exactly what we call interlinear, but it approaches to it as near as possible. Two, three or four Pali words are written down, and the translation in Burmese follows with a profusion of words which often confuses and perplexes the reader; then come again a few other Pali words, accompanied also with the translation, and so on throughout the whole work. The art of translating well and correctly from one language into another, is not so common as many persons may imagine. In a good translator are required many qualifications which are not to be easily met with, particularly in a Burman, to whom we may give credit for knowing well his own tongue, but who, without taking away from his literary attainments, is certainly an indifferent Pali scholar. These translations may convey perhaps the general meaning of the original, but as regards the correct meaning of each term, it is a luxury ever denied to the reader of such crude and imperfect compositions.
friendship. The King said to him: noble Kaludari, you know how earnestly I long to see my son. Nine messengers have already been sent to the city of Radzagio to invite my son to come over to me, and none of them has, as yet, come back to me, to bring information respecting the object of my tenderest affections. I am old now, and the end of my existence is quite uncertain; could you not undertake to bring my son over to me? Whether you become Rahan or not, let me have the happiness of contemplating once more my beloved son, ere I leave this world. The nobleman promised to the King to comply with his royal order. Attended with a retinue of a thousand followers, he set out for the city of Radzagio. Having reached the Welooowan monastery, he listened to Buddha's preachings and, like the former messengers, he became at once Rahanda with all his followers.

Gaudama having obtained the Budhaship, spent the first season (lent.) in the solitude of Migadawon. Thence he proceeded to the solitude of Ooroowela, where he remained three months, until he had completed the work of converting the three Kathabas. It was on the full moon of Piatho (January) that he entered into the city of Radzagio, accompanied with his thousand disciples. He had just stayed two months in that place, so that there were five months since he had left the country of Baranathee.

Seven days after Kaludari's arrival, the cold season being nearly over, the new convert addressed Budha as follows: illustrious Phra, the cold season is over, and the warm season has just began; this is now the proper time to travel throughout the country; nature wears a green aspect; the trees of the forests are in full blossom; the roads are lined, on the right and left, with trees loaded fragrant blossoms and delicious fruits; the peacock proudly expands its magnificent tail; birds of every description fill the air with their ravishing and melodious singing. At this season, heat and cold are equally temperate, and nature is scattering profusely its choicest gifts. With such and like expressions, Kaludari endeavoured to dispose Budha to undertake a journey to Kapilawot. Gaudama hearing all these words, said: what means this? To what purpose are uttered so many fine expressions? Kaludari replied: your father, O blessed Budha, is advanced in years; he has sent me to invite you to come over to Kapilawot, that he might see you before his death. He and your royal parents will be rejoiced at hearing your most excellent law. Well, said Budha, go and tell the Rahans to hold themselves ready for the journey. It was arranged that 10,000 Rahandas from Magatha, and 10,000 from Kapilawot would accompany the illustrious traveller. The distance between the two countries is sixty youdzanas*. Sixty days were to be employed in going over that distance, so they were to travel at the rate of but one youdzana a day.

Kaludari was anxious to go and inform the King of the happy issue of his negociation. He flew through the air, and, in a short time, reached the palace of the lord of Kapilawot. The King seeing him was exceedingly glad; he desired the illustrious Rahan to sit in a becoming place, and gave orders that his patta should be filled with the choicest dishes from the royal table. Meanwhile Kalundari related to the King all the circumstances attending his journey. When he had spoken, Thooudaudana desired him to take his meal. Kaludari begged to be excused, saying that he would go and take his meal in the presence of Budha. Where is he now, replied the King? Mighty lord, answered Kaludari, Budha, accompanied with twenty thousand Rahandas, is on his way to this country, to pay a visit to his royal father; on this very day, he has left the city of Radzagio. Thoodanda-na was exceedingly pleased; he said again to Kaludari: eat your meal here, and please to take another meal to my son; I wish to supply him daily with food during his journey. Kaludari acceded to the King's request. When his meal was over, they cleansed his patta with the most exquisite perfumes, and afterwards filled it with the best and choicest eatables. The patta was then respectfully handed to the aerial messenger, who in the presence of a large crowd of people, rose in the air with the patta under his arm, and in an instant arrived in presence of Gaudama, to whom he offered the vessel containing the delicious food, from his father's table. Budha received the food with pleasure and ate it. The same thing was daily performed during all the time the journey lasted. Kaludari went every day to the palace, through the air, ate his meal there, and brought that of his distinguished instructor, who during all the way partook of no other food but that which was brought over to him from his father's palace. Every day Kaludari carried news of the progress of Budha's journey. By this means, he increased in the heart of all, an ardent desire of seeing him, and disposed every one to wait on the great Gaudama with favorable and good dispositions. The services rendered on this occasion by Kaludari were much valued by Budha himself, who said: Kaludari is disposing the people to welcome our arrival; he is therefore one of the most excellent among my disciples.

* It is difficult to say exactly the length of the measure called Youdzana, formerly used to indicate land distances. It varies from five to twelve English miles. In measuring the distance from Radzagio to the Brahmin village of Nalanda, the birth place of Thariputra, which is one youdzana, General Cunningham has found it to be 7 miles. This would induce us to hold as certain, that at the epoch when Fa-Hian visited the place, the youdzana was equal to 7 miles or 40 Chinese li. But this would not prove that the more ancient youdzana has not been shorter than the one used in the time of the Chinese pilgrim. Several authors maintain that such is the case. It appears, likewise, that the length of that measure of distance has varied with localities and places, to such an extent that it has been found in some countries, to be equal to more than twelve miles. We believe that when that measure of distance is mentioned in this work, one would not be far from the truth in estimating its length to 6 or 7 English miles, at the utmost.

The princes and all members of the royal family having heard of Gaudama's arrival, consulted among themselves as to the best means of paying due respect to the noble and illustrious visitor. They selected the grove of Nigrandatha, 76 as the fittest place to receive him with his disciples. The place was properly cleared and made ready for the long expected company. The inhabitants of the country, attended with their richest dress, carrying flowers and perfumes, went out to meet Budha. Children of both sexes opened the procession; they were fol-tendencies of Buddhism to isolation, retirement, and solitude. In a retired position, man's mind is less distracted or dissipated by exterior objects; it possesses a greater share of self control, and is more fit for the arduous work of attentive reflection and deep meditation. Whenever Budha, attended by his followers, reaches a place, where he is to stay for a while, a grove without the city is invariably selected. Thither the great preacher retires, as in a beloved solitude. He enjoys it beyond all that can be said; alone with his spiritual family, unconcerned about the affairs of this world, he breathes at ease the pure atmosphere of a complete calm; his undisturbed soul soars freely in the boundless regions of spirituality. What he has seen and discovered during his contemplative errands, with a placid countenance and a mild voice, he imparts to it his disciples, endeavouring thereby to make them progress in the way of knowledge and perfection.

In those solitary abodes of peace, Budha was willing to receive all those who wished for instruction. They were all, without distinction of rank or caste, admitted in the presence of him who came professedly to point to men the way to happiness, helping them to disentangle themselves from the trammels of passions. He preached to all, the most excellent law. The tendency to retreat and withdrawal from worldly tumult is, in our own days, conspicuous in the case taken by Budhistic monks, to have their houses built in some lonely quarters of a town, assigned exclusively for that special purpose, or, as is oftener the case, in fine places at a small distance from the walls. Some of those groves, in the centre whereof rise the peaceful abodes of Rahanas, the writer has often seen and much admired. In towns or large villages, where the ground is uneven, the small heights are generally crowned with the dwellings of Religious.

77—The narrative of Budha's reception in his father's royal city suggests two reflections. The first is that the saying: nemo Prophetus in sed patriæ, was as true in the days of Gaudama, as it has been in subsequent ages. The mountains of Kapilawot had often echoed the praises of Budha and the recital of his wonderful doings. The splendid retinue of twenty thousand distinguished converts that attended his person—the hitherto unvisited display of miraculous powers, &c., all these peculiarly remarkable circumstances seemed more than sufficient to secure for him, a distinguished reception among his kinsmen, who ought to have been proud of being connected with him, by the ties of relationship. Such, however, was not the case. Actuated by the lowest feelings of base jealousy, his relatives refused to pay him the respect he was so well entitled to. Their wretched obduracy was to be conquered by the awe and fear his miraculous power inspired.

The second reflection suggested by the recital of the ceremonies observed on the occasion of Budha's reception in his native country, is the truly pleasing fact of seeing the weaker sex appearing in public, divested of the shackles put upon it, by oriental jealousy. In Burmah and Siam, the doctrines of Buddhism have produced a striking, and to the lover of true civilization, a most interesting result, viz.: the almost complete equality of the condition of women, with that of men. In those countries, women are not miserably lowed by the children of the noblest families; next came all the persons belonging to the royal family. All went to the grove of Nigandatha, where Budha had just arrived with the twenty thousand Rahans that accompanied him.

The princes, secretly influenced by pride, thus thought within themselves: this prince Theiddat is younger than we all; he is but our nephew, let the young people prostrate before him; as to ourselves, let us remain sitting down behind them. This was quickly perceived by Budha, who said to himself: my relatives refuse to prostrate before me, I will now even compel them to do so. Whereupon he entered into ecstacy, rose in the air, and standing over the heads of his relatives, as a person shaking dust over them, he exhibited to their astonished regards, on a white mango tree, wonders of fire and water. Thoodaudana, surprised at such a wonderful display of supernatural power, exclaimed: Illustrious Budha, on the day you were born, they brought you to the presence of the Rathee Kaladewela, to do homage to him; on that occasion, having seen you placing your two feet on the Rathee's forehead, I prostrated before you for the first time. On the day of the ploughing solemn rejoicings, you

were placed under the shade of the tree Tsampoothapye. The sun by its daily motion had caused the shadow of all surrounding trees to change its direction; that of the tree under which you were placed alone remained unmoved; I prostrated a second time before you, and now at the sight of this new wonder, I again bow down to you. The example of the king was instantly imitated by all the princes, who humbly bowed down to Budha. Satisfied with having humbled his proud relatives, Budha came down and sat in the place prepared for him. He then caused a shower of red rain to pour down over the assembled multitudes. It had the virtue to wet those who liked it, and not to wet those who disliked it. This is not, said Budha, the only time when such a wonder has happened; the same thing took place once, during one of my former existences, when I was prince Wetandha. He went on, relating the most interesting circumstances of that former state of existence. The whole assembly now delighted at hearing his preachings, and witnessing the display of his power. They all withdrew when the preaching was over, and retired to their respective places, without, however, inviting Budha to come and take his meals in their houses.

On the following morning, Budha set out with his twenty thousand followers to get his meal. When he had arrived at the gate of the city, he stood for a while, deliberating within himself whether he would go to the palace to receive his meal, or go, from street to street, to beg for it. He paused for a while, reflecting on the course of conduct that had been followed by all the former Budhas. Having known that they all, without exception, had been in the habit of going out from house to house, in quest of their food, he resolved at once to follow their example. Whereupon he entered the city and began to perambulate the streets in search of his food. The citizens, from the various stories of their houses, were looking out with amazement at such an unusual sight. How is this, said they, we see prince Raoula and his mother Yathaudara going out attired with the richest dresses, sitting on the most elegant conveyance, and now Prince Theiddat is appearing in the streets with his hairs and beard shaved, and his body covered with a yellow dress befitting a mendicant. Such a thing is unbecoming indeed. Whilst they were holding this language, on a sudden, rays of the purest light shot forth from the body of Budha, and illuminated all the objects around his person. At this unexpected sight, they all joined in praising and extolling the virtue and glory of Budha.

King Thoodaudana was soon informed that his son was perambulating the streets of the city, in the dress of a mendicant. Startled at such a news, he rose and seizing the extremity of his outer garment, he ran to the encounter of his son. As soon as he saw him, he exclaimed: illustrious Budha, why do you expose us to such a shame? Is it necessary to go from door to door, to beg your food? Could not a better and more decent mode be resorted to, for supplying your wants? My noble father, said Budha, it is meet and convenient that all Rahans should go out and beg their food. But, replied the monarch, are we not the descendants of the illustrious Prince Thamadat? There is not a single person in our illustrious race, that has ever acted in such an indecorous manner. Budha

78.—Buddhist monks, out of humility and contempt for all worldly things, do not allow hairs or beard to grow. They walk barefooted, wearing a yellow dress of the simplest make. They are bound to live on the alms that are freely bestowed upon them. The regulations of the Wim are, in this respect, most explicit and leave no room for false interpretation. A Rahan having renounced the world and divested himself of all worldly property, is bound by his professional vows, to rely for his daily food, on what he may obtain by begging. Hence the appellation of Bickus or mendicants, always bestowed on them by Gaudama, whenever he addresses them in particular, on certain points regarding their profession. In Burmah, as soon as the day begins to dawn, a swarm of yellow dressed monks sally forth from their abode with the patta under the left arm, and perambulate the streets in quest of food. They never ask for anything; they accept what is voluntarily tendered to them, without uttering a single word of thanks or even looking at their generous benefactors. This action of bestowing alms to the Rahans, is deemed a most meritorious one. The offerer, therefore, becomes liberal not on account of the person he is assisting, but because of the abundant merits he hopes to derive from it. This notion agrees very well with the leading tenets of Buddhism.
retorted: my noble father, the descent from the glorious princes Thamadat, is something that belongs both to you and your royal family: the lineage of a Buddha is quite different from that of kings and princes; it bears no resemblance to it. Their ways and manners must essentially differ from those of princes. All former Buddhas have always been in the habit of thus going out in search of their food. Then stopping his course and standing in the street, he uttered the following stanzas: my noble father, it is not proper that I should ever neglect the duty of receiving alms; it is an action good in itself, tallying with truth, deserving of great merits, and 79.—The answer of Buddha to his royal father, is a most remarkable one and deserves the attention of the observer. The great moralist does away with all the prerogatives man may derive from birth, rank and riches. Law alone can confer titles of true greatness and genuine nobility. The fervent and zealous observers of the law, are alone entitled to the respect of their fellow men. The begging of alms may be in the eyes of worshippers, a low and mean action, but it becomes a most dignified one, because it is enforced by the law. This lofty principle boldly establishes the superiority of virtuous upon the strongest basis, and sanctions the moral code he was destined to publish to men and saddle on their conscience. The criterion of all that is good, excellent, praiseworthy and meritorious, is no more to depend on the arbitrary and very often erroneous views of men, but must rest upon the immutable tenets of the eternal law, discovered, revived and published by the omniscient Buddha. This truth, like a flash of light, illuminated the king's mind, and, at this first preaching of his son, he attained the first of the four states of perfection.

The princes Thamadat, and Thoudamhama, to descend from, are, according to Buddhist sacred books, the princes who were elected to hold supreme power at the very moment the words mine and thine began to be heard amongst men, after they had eaten the rice called Tsale, and become subject to passions, that is to say, at the origin of society, in the beginning of the world. The Kings of Burma, down to the present occupant of the throne, who are descending, in their opinion, from the Kapilawot line of Kings, lay claim to the same distinction. The writer has heard the present King of Burma, very coolly stating as a matter of fact, which no one could think of contradicting, that he descended from the Thamadat's royal line.

The princess Yathaurva, mentioned in this narrative, had been the wife of Buddha, ere he had withdrawn into solitude and renounced the world. A son had just been born to him, when he left his father's palace. His name was Râoulâ. The doctrine of the influence of merits gathered during former existences, is forcibly illustrated in the case of Yathaurva, who, unmindful of the position she occupied in former years, did not hesitate to fling herself at Buddha's feet, acknowledging him to be worthy of all honor and veneration. Her former merits disposed her to view in him, who had been her husband, the extraordinary personage who was to lead men through the path of virtue to the deliverance.
productive of happiness in this and future existences. When he had spoken, his father obtained the state of Thautapan. He went to the palace with his father, saying: those who go to beg food according to injunction and prescription of the law, are doing well, and prepare themselves for a state of happiness both for the present and future: those who do go begging, but without any regard to the ordinances of the law, ought to refrain from doing so. He was speaking in that way, when he entered the palace. His aunt Gaudamee became a Thautapan. His father, after this second preaching, reached the state Thagadagadan.

Thoodaudana invited Phra and his followers to ascend to the upper part of the palace and partake of the meal prepared for them. When the meal was over, all the ladies of the palace came to pay their respects to Budha. Some of them urged the Princess Yathaudara to do the same. But she refused complying with their request, in the hope that a greater deference would be shown to her, when Budha would come and visit her in her apartments. Perceiving her studied inattention, Phra said to his father: my noble father, I will go and visit the princess, and will, without saying a single word, make her pay obedience to, and prostrate before, me. King Thoodaudana took up the patta and accompanied his son to the princess's apartments, together with his two disciples Thariputra and Maukalan. Budha had scarcely been seated on the place destined to him, but Yathaudara threw herself at Budha's feet, and placing her two hands on both ankles, touched repeatedly the upper part with her forehead. Meanwhile Thoodaudana mentioned to his son, the respectful and affectionate regard she had ever entertained for his person. Since she heard, added the king, that you had put on the yellow robe, she would wear but clothes of that color; when she knew that you took but one meal a day, that you slept on a small and low couch, and gave up, without regret, the use of perfumes, she instantly followed your example, ate but one meal a day, slept on a low couch and gave up without grief the use of essences. Illustrious monarch, replied Budha, I do not wonder at the practices of late observed by the princess Yathâudara; in former times, when her merits were but as yet few and imperfect, she was living at the foot of a certain mountain, and knew, even then, how to behave with becomingsness; and attend with a strict regard to all religious duties.

On this very day that is to say, on the 2nd day, after the full moon of Katson, was fixed the time for the taking place of five grand ceremonies. Nanda, the younger 60.—Nanda was Budha's younger brother, or rather half brother. His mother was Patanzati, the younger sister of Maia. Since Budha had renounced the world, Nanda had become the presumptive heir to the crown of Kapila-wot. His conversion grieved much the king, who, to prevent the recurrence of such an event, exacted from the great reformer, that in after times no one could be admitted into the society of the perfect, without having previously obtained the consent of his parents; failing such a condition, the act of admission should be considered as null and void. Hence, we read in the book of ordination or admittance to the dignity of Rahan, that the person directed by the President of the Assembly to examine the candidate, never omits to enquire from him, whether he has obtained the consent of his parents.

The conversion of Raouda followed that of Nanda. Of this new and distinguished convert, no mention is made afterwards in the course of this work. He must, in all likelihood, have become a celebrated member of the Assembly, as he was trained up to the functions and duties of his profession by the greatest and most renowned disciples, such as Maukan, Thariputra and Kathaba.

In the history of Budhaim, the Dsetawon monastery is not inferior in celebrity to that of Weloowo. Therein Gaudham announced during a certain night, the 36 beatitudes of the law to a Nat, that had come and requested him to make him acquainted with the most perfect points of his law. In the division of the scriptures called Thodd, or sermons, we see that the most important have been delivered in the hall of that monastery.

Here is another instance of a donation of landed property to a religious corporation. In the first case, the gift had been made to him and to his actual followers. But in this circumstance, Phira desires the rich and pious benefactor to make the donation, not only in behalf of self and the present assembly, but also in that of all future members, who might resort to this place. In a Budhistic point of view, we may conclude that the advice given to the donor, was intended as a means of multiplying the sum of the merits of his liberality, which must be commensurate with the number of the individuals to whom it is designed to be extended.

According to the principle respecting property, which from immemorial time, has prevailed under all despotic governments in Asia, which recognises the head of the state as the sole, real and absolute owner of the soil, it is evident that the act of donation was, legally speaking, a declara brother of Budha, was to have his head washed, to put on the Thingkiiit, or royal head ornament, to be raised to the dignity of crown prince, to be put in possession of his own palace, and to be married. When Phra was leaving the palace, he bade the young prince to take his patta and follow him. Nanda instantly complied with the request, and departed. He was just leaving the palace, when the young lady he was to marry, heard the sound of the steps and of the voice of her lover. She was then busily engaged in combing her beautiful and shining black hairs. With the left hand, drawing aside her hairs, and with the right, leaning on the window's frame, she with a sweet, yet tremulous voice, eagerly recommended him, soon to return. She then, continued to follow him with anxious eyes, until he could be seen no longer. Meanwhile resting against the window's side, she had her heart full of ominous forebodings. Nanda would have gladly given back the patta to his owner; but as he felt backward to hand it over to him, he followed Budha as far as the monastery. Though he or a statement of the disposal an individual made of the rights such as he had them, viz.: those of use, in favor of a religious body. The landed property thus conferred, acquired a kind of sacredness which preserved it from the grasp of even the most rapacious ruler. On another hand, the religious body had no right or power whatsoever to sell or dispose of that property. In a corporation constituted as the assembly of the disciples of Budha was, and is in our own days, the society alone could have the possession and management of immovable properties given to monasteries. Donations of this kind must have stood good as long as there were members of the Budhistic religious family, willing and ready to maintain their rights. Nothing short of a complete revolution in the political state of the country, or the prolonged absence of the individuals vested with the right of occupation, could put an end to the effect of those deeds of donation. In Burmah, the Budhist monks possess nothing, beyond the ground whereupon stands the monastery. From certain inscriptions found in the midst of the ruins of the temples at Pagan, it is evident, that in the palmy days of that city, donations of landed properties, such as paddy fields, fruit trees, bullocks and peasants, were made to monasteries and temples. But from the last three or four hundred years, no vestiges of such deeds have ever been found. So far as I have been able to make enquiries, I am not aware that the Order has ever become possessor of lands. In Ceylon such is not, at least, was not, the case, when the English occupied the island. Extensive tracts of valuable lands were in the hands of the Talapoins, who thereby obtained over the people the two fold influence conferred by wealth and religion.

had no intention of becoming Rahan, on his way to that place, yet despite of his former dispositions, he entered into the society of the perfect. So that on the second day after Phra's arrival at Kapilawot, Nanda became a Rahan. Some other writings mention that this happened but on the third day.

On the seventh day after Phra had entered into the city of Kapilawot, the mother of Raoula, princess Yathandara, put on her son the choicest ornaments, and sent him to Phra, saying previously to him: "Dearest son, he, whom you see surrounded by twenty thousand Rahanadas, whose face resembles gold, and whose body is similar to that of the chief of Brahmas, is indeed your father. He was formerly the owner of the four gold vases, which have disappeared on the very day he withdrew into solitude; go to him now, and say respectfully, that being, at present, crown prince of this kingdom, destined to succeed your grandfather on the throne, you wish to become possessed of the property that will befall you, in right of inheritance. The young prince departed. Having come into the presence of Budha, he endeavored, with the simplicity and amiability becoming a young lad, to ingratiate himself in his father's favor, and said how happy he was to be with him, adding many other particulars befitting his age and position. Budha having eaten his meal and performed his usual devotions, rose up and departed. Raoula followed behind, saying: Father, give me my inheritance. Budha appearing neither displeased nor vexed at such a demand, none of his followers durst tell the young prince to desist from his apparently rude behaviour, and go back to the palace. They all soon reached the monastery. Phra thus thought within himself: Raoula is asking from me perishable things, but I will give him something more excellent and lasting. I will make him partaker of those goods I have gathered at the foot of the Bodi tree, and thereby will provide for him a better inheritance for the future. Whereupon he called Thariputra and said to him: Beloved disciple, the young prince Raoula is asking from me a worldly inheritance, which would avail him nothing, but I wish to present him with something more excellent, an imperishable inheritance; let him become a Rahan. Maukalan shaved the head of Raoula and attired him with the Tsiwaran. Thariputra gave him the first instructions. When, hereafter, he became Patzing, Kathaba trained him up to the duties of his new profession.

King Thoodaudana had seen his first son prince Theidat leaving the palace, and all the attracting allurements of a brilliant court; despite of all his precautions, subsequently, he witnessed his going into a solitude and becoming a Rahan. Next to him, his younger son Nanda, though assured by the promises of soothsayers, to become a great and mighty ruler, had joined the society of Rahans. These two events had deeply afflicted him. But on hearing that his grandson had also become a Rahan, he could no longer keep his affliction within himself. I had, said he, hoped that my grandson would succeed me on the throne; this thought consoled me for the loss of my two sons. What will become of my throne? Now the royal succession is at an end, and the line of direct descendants, is for ever cut and irrevocably broken as under.

Thoodaudana obtained the state of Anagam. He said to himself: it is enough that I should have had so much to suffer and endure on the occasion of my two sons and my grandson becoming Rahans; I will spare to other parents a similar affliction. He went to Budha's place, and having paid him his respects in a becoming manner, he asked him to establish a regulation forbidding any son to become Rahan, unless he had the consent of his parents. Budha assented to his father's wish and preached to him the law. When the instruction was finished, the king bowed to him, rose up, turned on the right and departed. Budha, calling immediately the Rahans, said to them: beloved Bickus, no one is to be admitted to the profession of Rahan, ere he has obtained the consent of his parents: any one that shall trespass this regulation, shall be guilty of a sin.

On a certain day, Phra having eaten his meal at his father's palace, the king related to him the circumstance of a Nat who, whilst he was undergoing great austerities in the solitude, had come and conveyed the report of his son having succumbed under the hardships of mortification; but he would never give credit to such a rumour as he was certain that his son could not die before he had become a Budha. My illustrious father, replied Budha, you are much advanced in merits; there is no wonder at your not believing a false report; but even in former ages, when your merits were as yet very imperfect, you refused to believe your son was dead, though in proof of this assertion, bones were exhibited before you in confirmation of the report. And he went on relating many particulars that are to be found in the history of Maha Damma Pala. It was at the conclusion of this discourse that the king became Anagam. Having thus firmly established his father in the three degrees of perfection, Budha returned to the country of Radzagio.

During this voyage, the most excellent Phra, arrived at the village of Anupya, in the country of the Malla Princes. In the neighborhood of the village, there is a grove of mango trees. To that place, he withdrew with his twenty thousand disciples, and enjoyed himself in that secluded and delightful retreat.

Whilst he dwelt on that spot, the seed of the law that he had planted in his native city, was silently casting deep root, in the hearts of many. His uncle Thekkaudana had two sons, named Mahanan and Anooroudha. On a certain day, Mahanan said to his younger brother: From among the several families of the royal race, many persons have left the world and embraced the religious profession under the guidance of Budha. Our family is the only one that has not as yet given any member to the assembly. I will make you a proposal: either you will become an ascetic, and leave me your inheritance; or I will myself take that step and make over to you all that I possess. Anooroudha at once accepted the proposal.

When the two brothers' intentions became known, five young princes, their playmates and relatives, named Bagoo, Kimila, Baddya, Ananda* and Dewadat desired to join them in their pious design. Having put on their finest dress, they went into the country, having no other attendant but Oopali, their barber. They shaped their course in the direction of Anupya. Being at a small distance of the mango trees grove, the young princes stripped themselves of their rich dresses, and gave them in all property, to the barber, as an acknowledgement of his services. The latter, at first accepted them, and was preparing to return, when the following thought occurred to his mind: If I go back to Kappilawot with these fine and rich apparels, the king and the people will believe that, by foul means, I have come in possession of so many valuables, and I shall certainly be put to death. I will follow my masters, and never leave them. Hereupon he returned in all haste and joined them at the very moment they were disposing themselves to enter into the Anupya mango trees grove. Oopali was admitted in their com-

*Ananda whose conversion is here mentioned, was the son of Amitandana, a brother of king Thoodandana, and therefore first cousin to Gaudama. He is one of the best known disciples of the celebrated philosopher of Kappilawot. He has gained his well earned fame, less by the shining attainments of his intellect than by the amiable qualities of a loving heart. He bore to Budha the most affectionate regard, and the warmest attachment, from the very beginning of his conversion. The master repaid the love of the disciple, by tokens of a sincere esteem and tender affection. Though it was but a long period afterwards, that Ananda was officially appointed to minister unto the personal wants of Budha, yet the good dispositions of his excellent heart, prompted him to serve Budha on all occasions, and in every way that was agreeable to him. He became the medium of intercourse between his beloved master and all those that approached him. When he had to communicate orders or give directions to the Religious, or when some visitors desired to wait on him, Ananda was the person who transmitted all orders, and ushered visitors in the presence of the great preacher.

Dewadat was both first cousin to Budha, and his brother-in-law. His father was Thouppabuddha, Maia's brother. He was brother of the princess Yathandara, who had married our Gaudama, when he was crown prince of Kappilawot. Hereafter, we will have the opportunity to see that his moral dispositions were very different from those of the amiable Ananda.
pany and ushered, along with them, into Budha’s presence. Having paid their respects in the usual manner, they applied for the dignity of members of the assembly. Their request was granted. But previous to passing through the prescribed ceremonies, the princes said one to another: great indeed, and deeply rooted is the pride of princes: it is extremely difficult to shake it off, and free oneself of its tyrannical exigencies. Let Oopali be first ordained; we will have an opportunity of humbling ourselves, by prostrating before him. Their request was granted. After having paid their respects to the newly ordained convert, they were likewise admitted among the members of the assembly. Their proficiency in the spiritual progress was not the same. During the 2nd lent, which they spent in the Weloowon monastery, Baddya, Bagoo and Kimila reached the culminating point of perfection, by becoming Rahandas. Ananda became Thautapatti. Anooroudha greatly advanced in the higher path of metaphysics. As to Dewadat, he never attained but the Lauki thamabat.

A little while after the conversion of the royal princes, Budha left Anupya, continued his voyage to Radzagio, and forthwith retired into the Weloowon monastery to spend his second lent. The time was chiefly employed in training up the new converts in the acquirement of the knowledge of the great truths, and in the practice of virtue. His son Raoula, about 8 years old, evinced the greatest dispositions. His attainments were far above his age, and often elicited the admiration of the Rahans. On a certain occasion, Budha overheard them expressing their astonishment at the surprising progress, Raoula was making in his studies. Coming among them, as if perchance, Phra asked them what was the subject of their conversation. They answered that they were praising and extolling the wonderful abilities of Raoula, and his matchless good dispositions. Thereupon, Budha remarked, that this was not to be wondered at. Then, he related to them the dzat Miga, by which he showed to them that during former existences Raoula had distinguished himself, in a conspicuous manner, by his excellent and admirable dispositions. As a reward for his good behavior and high mental qualifications, he was made Patzin. His mind continuing to expand in almost miraculous a manner, he became a Rahanda with myriads of Nats.

During the same season, Budha often went to Radzagio, to beg his food. There was in that city a flowers seller, who, every day, was wont to bring eight bouquets to the king, and receive, in return, from the royal hands, eight pieces of silver. On a certain day, as he was coming from the country into the town, with his usual supply of flowers for the king, he happened to see Budha in the streets, at a moment, when, by a miraculous display of his power, the six glories beamed out of his body. He then said to himself: I wish to go and offer these flowers to Budha. But the king will doubtless be much angry with me. He may have me arrested, thrown into prison, and put to death for having failed in offering him the usual present. Despite the great danger that hangs over me, I will go to Budha and offer him my flowers. Great indeed, and lasting shall be the merits I will gain; they will follow me during countless existences.

With a heart full of joy, Thoomana, for such is his name, went to the resting place where Budha was seated, surrounded by crowds of people, and laid the flowers at his feet. With a marked satisfaction, Gaudama accepted the offer. Thoomana went home and related to his wife what had just happened. The latter, irritated partly by the fear of the king’s wrath, and partly by the loss of the money, she daily received, began to abuse her husband with the coarsest language. She was so much maddened by passion, that she in all haste went to the king, denounced her husband, and instantly sued for a divorce. Pimpathara revolted at such an act of unparalleled audacity, ordered her to withdraw from his presence and go back to her house. Meanwhile he commanded one of his courtiers to order the flowers seller, to come to the palace on the following day. As a matter of course, the royal request was punctually complied with. In the presence of the assembled courtiers, the king highly praised the conduct of Thoomana and instantly rewarded him with great liberality. As Thoomana had offered to Buddha eight bunches of flowers, the king, to acknowledge in a distinct manner such an offering, gave him 8 elephants, 8 horses, 8 slaves, 8 bullocks, 8,000 pieces of silver and the revenue of 8 villages. Buddha, likewise, exceedingly extolled the meritorious behavior of Thoomana in the presence of the people, and said that, during a whole world, he would be exempt from the four states of punishment, enjoy happiness in the seat of man and in those of Nats, and finally become a Pitzea-budha. The value of the offering, though little in itself, became great by the imminent risks he voluntarily exposed himself to. He made his offering, though he was certain of incurring on that account the Ruler's displeasure.

When the season of retirement was over, Gaudama travelled through different places. He went to Patzana-wonta, in the Dzetia country; thence he passed into the Bisakila forest, and returned to Radzagio, in the grove of Yin-dalik trees, near the burial place.

Whilst Buddha was in the splendid Dzetawon monastery, just presented to him, a strong temptation came upon Ananda, to renounce his calling and return into the world. He went so far as to tell some of his Brethren, that he recollected the promise of a prompt return, he made to his young bride Dzanapada-kaliani, and that, now, he wished to fulfill it, by immediately going back into his palace, and resuming his former mode of life. This was soon reported to Gaudama, who resorted to the following expedient, to crush in its bud, the rising temptation. He took Ananda by the arm, rose with him in the air, and led him in the direction of the Nats' seat of Tawadeinthia. On their way, Buddha by a miraculous process, exhibited to the eyes of his companion the sight of an immense forest in conflagration. On the burnt stump of a tree, he showed him a female monkey horribly mutilated, having her tail, ears and nose cut off. At such a sight, the horrified Ananda turned away his eyes in disgust. A little while after this, Budha exhibited before him the dazzling and heart-captivating sight of a long array of five hundred matchless beauties. They were daughters of Nats going to pay their respects to the great Thagia. Ananda was gazing at them with silent but enraptured feelings. Budha said to him: do you believe those beauties that are before you, to be equal to Dzamapada? She is no more to these perfect forms, answered he, than the bleeding female monkey we have left behind us, is to her. All these celestial damsels, said Budha, I shall give to you, provided you agree to remain in the monastery, for some years longer. Willingly do I accept the proposal, replied Ananda, I will stay cheerfully in the monastery on such favorable terms. Whereupon, both returned to the monastery.

The members of the assembly soon became acquainted with what had passed between the master and the disciple, and keenly taunted Ananda with their sarcastic remarks upon the daughters of Nats. Ashamed of himself, Ananda withdrew into solitude. There he devoted himself to reflexion and penitential deeds, and finally annihilated the evil desires of his unsubdued passion. When the inward struggle was over, and peace had been restored in him, Ananda went to Budha's presence, and stated his willingness to dwell for ever in a monastery and lead a religious life. Meantime he released him from the promise he had made to him, respecting the celestial beauties. Budha was much pleased at such a happy change. He said to the assembled Religious: Previous to this occurrence, Ananda resembled a badly roofed house, which lets in the rain of passions; but now it is similar to a well roofed building, which is so well protected, that it is a proof against the oo-

A merchant named Kappaka, had a donkey which he used to carry goods from place to place. Having, on one day, come near a place covered with trees, Kappaka unloaded his animal, to allow him some time to rest and to graze. Meanwhile a female donkey was likewise grazing in the neighborhood. Its presence was quickly detected by Kappaka's animal. When the moment of departure had come, the latter, attracted by the female, kicked furiously at his master, and would not allow the load to be replaced on its back. The merchant enraged at this unusual freak began to threaten the rebellious beast, and then to hit it with the whip, as hard as he could. At last the poor animal, unable to bear any longer the blows, mentioned to his master the cause of his unusual behavior. Kappaka told him that if he would but continue his voyage, he would give him, at the end of the journey, several fine females, much superior to the one he was now coveting. The proposal was accepted. At the end of the journey, Kappaka said to the beast: I will keep my promise with you; but I must inform you that your daily provender shall not be increased; you will have to share it with your companion. Subsequently you will have little ones to provide for and maintain, but your daily ration shall not be increased in the least, you shall have to work for me as much as you do at present, and also to provide for the maintenance and support of your family. The donkey, after a few moments of reflection, thought it was better to remain as he was; and from that moment, he was entirely cured of his inordinate inclination. At the conclusion of the narration, Budha said: the male donkey, was he, who has now become Ananda; the female donkey, Dzanapa-kaliani; and Kappaka is now the most excellent Phra, who is the teacher of men, Nats and Brahmas.

Budha, whilst at Wethalie, went out through the country, and, in all the places that he visited, preached to the crowds of hearers. It was during one of his benevolent errands, that he met with a celebrated Pounha, named Eggidatta, who with great many disciples led an ascetic life, after having been formerly the chief Pounha of king Kothala, first, and next, of his son. Budha earnestly desired the conversion of so distinguished a personage. Maukalan was at first dispatched to that famous hermit, for attempting to bring him over to his master; but he utterly failed. The reception, he at first met with, was anything but pleasant. The work was to be done, and perfected only by the irresistible eloquence of the great Preacher. Budha soon came up to the entrance of Eggidatta's cell. He began to upbraid the Rathee for teaching his disciples to worship mountains, trees, rivers, and all that exist in nature. He then initiated him to the knowledge of the four great truths. Eggidatta, seeing the truth, at once became a convert, with all his disciples. When this great spiritual conquest was achieved, Budha returned to Radzagio, and spent the third season in the Weloowon or bamboo grove monastery. It was during the three months of the rainy season, that Budha imparted in a more complete manner, to his disciples, the knowledge and science which during his peregrinations, he had but superficially conveyed unto them. At the same time, he carefully trained them up to the practice and observance of those disciplinary regulations, which were intended as means to subdue passions, to estrange them from the world and all its attractions, and lead a spiritual life.

During his stay in the monastery, among the many instructions that he gave to his disciples, I will relate the particulars that he mentioned respecting the former doings, and the final conversion of the Rahanda Tsampoonka.

* The story of Eggidatta gives us an insight into one of the tenets which was held by that ascetic. His interlocutor reproached him with worshipping mountains, trees, forests, rivers and the heavenly bodies. From the expressions made use of, by the Burmese translator, the writer is inclined to believe that a direct allusion is made to Panteheistic opinions. We know
In the days of the Budha Kathaba, Thampooka, or rather the being who in the present existence is called by that name, put on the religious dress in the Thawatie country. He lived in a fine monastery, and had for his supporters the best and richest people of the place. On one day, a Rahan belonging to another country, came to his monastery and begged the favor to be allowed to live therein for some time. The heartless Tsampilka denied him admittance, in the interior of the building, but tolerated his staying in the verandah, during the cold season. The people, however, acted by better feelings than those of their teacher, brought regularly food for the head of the house, as well as for the stranger, for whom they felt great affection. The spiteful Tsampilka could not bear to see the people showing marks of kindness and benevolence towards his hated guest. On one occa-

that most of the Indian schools of philosophy have based their various systems of metaphysics, upon that most erroneous foundation. According to Pantheists, this world is not distinct from the essence of God; all that exists, is but a manifestation or a development of the substance of God. This world is not the work of God, existing as distinct from its maker, but it is God manifesting himself substantially in all things. Who could then wonder at the conduct of Tsampilka? He worshiped God, or rather that portion of the supreme Being, whom he saw in the great and mighty subjects that surrounded him and attracted his notice.

Old Spinosa of the 17th century, and his unfortunately too numerous followers of this century, have recast into hundred different moulds, the pantheistic ideas of the Hindu Philosophers, and offer to the intelligence of their readers an readers, through an almost unintelligible language, the same deadly food, which has finally produced on the Hindous' mind, the sad results which we witness. If we were better acquainted with the variety of doctrines which the Hindu Philosophers have exhibited in the field of metaphysics, we would be soon convinced that the modern metaphysicians, who have placed themselves out of the pale of revelation, have not advanced one step in that science, and that the divergence in their opinions, is but a faithful representation of the confusion which, more than two thousand years, prevailed on the banks of the Ganges, among their predecessors in the same speculative studies.

It appears that Thampooka was in his days, what the Jogies or Hindu penitents are up to our time. He remained on his rock, in the most difficult position, for the space of fifty-five years, exhibiting himself to the crown, and aiming at winning their admiration, by the incredible sufferings that he voluntarily submitted to. His apparent sanctity was made up of very doubtful materials. He passed off himself, for a man, who could remain without eating, and who was gifted with supernatural powers. Plain humility, which is nothing but the result of the true knowledge of self, was not the favorite virtue of our spiritual quack.
sion, he forget himself so far as to abuse him by repeating the following coarse expressions: eat dirt, go naked, and sleep on the bare ground. Such an inhuman behavior met soon with acondign punishment. The wretched Tsampooka had, at first, to endure horrible torments in hell.

On his return to the seat of man on earth, he was born from respectable parents, but he was always prone from his infancy, to indulge into the lowest habits. He would secretly steal away, and actually satiate the cravings of hunger by eating the most disgusting things: he would not bear clothing, but run about in a state of nakedness: he would but sleep on the ground. His parents, after many fruitless attempts to correct him, resolved to make him over to the heterodox ascetics. Those received him. But he would not eat in company of his brethren, nor go to beg with them. He profited of the moment they were absent, and went to devour the excrements he could find. His eccentric and disgusting habits were soon found out, and his new friends said one to the other: let this man be no longer allowed to live with us. Should the disciples of the Rahan Gaudama hear that one of our company is behaving in such a manner, our brotherhood would become a laughing stock to them. He was, therefore, expelled from this place. Tsampooka went to take his abode on a rock, near the place that served as receptacle to the sewers of Radzagio. On that rock, he remained in the most fatiguing posture: he leaned on the right hand which rested on the rock, and also on his right knee; the left leg was stretched, and the left arm raised up. He kept his mouth opened. When the people asked him why he remained with his mouth wide opened, as a man who incessantly draws air in his lungs, he answered that refraining from the use of coarse food, he was feeding on air only: when questioned about the singular position of his two legs, he answered, that, were he to stand on both legs, the earth would instantly shake. He had been during fifty-five years in that sad position, when Gaudama, moved with compassions at his pitiable condition, went in person to convert him. He began to relate to him all what he had done during former existences, mentioning in particular the sin he had been guilty of, towards a brother hermit. At this unexpected declaration, Tsampooka humbled himself. Budha then preached to him his law. The repenting Tsampooka firmly believed in all that was said to him. He, then, rose up and with a heart overflowing with joy, he instantly left his place, followed his new master, and soon became a Rahanda. His proficiency in science and virtue was such that he, soon, occupied a distinguished rank among the members of the assembly.

A rich man of Thawattie, named Anatapein, becomes a convert—Story of Dzewacka—He cures Budha of a painful distemper—The people of Welhatie send a deputation to Budha—Digression on the manner; Budha spent daily his time—Settling of a quarrel between the inhabitants of Kaulia and those of Kapilawot—New converts are strengthened in their faith—Thooodaudana’s death in the arms of his son—Queen Patzopati and many noble Ladies are elevated to the rank of Rahanes—Conversion of Kema, the first queen of king Pimpathara—Heretics near Thawattie are confounded by the display of miraculous powers—Budha goes to the seat of Thawadeintha, to preach the law to his mother.

When Budha was in the country of Radzagio, a certain rich merchant, named Anatapein, came to Radzagio, with five hundred carts loaded with the most precious goods, and took his lodging in the house of an intimate friend. Whilst living with his friend, he heard that Gaudama had become a Budha. He suddenly was seized with an earnest desire of seeing him and hearing his doctrine. On a certain day, he rose at an early hour, and perceived, reflected through the lattices of the window, some rays of an uncommon brightness. He went in the direction of the light to the place where Budha was preaching the law. He listened to it with great attention, and, at the end of the discourse, he obtained the state of Thautapana. Two days after, he made a great offering to Budha and to the Assembly, and requested him to come to the country of Thawattie. The request was granted. The distance to Thawattie is forty-five youdzanas. Anatapein spent enormous sums, that one monastery should be erected, at each youdzana distance. When Budha was approaching, the pious merchant arranged as follows for the reception of the distinguished visitor and presenting to him a splendid monastery called Dzetawon, which he had made ready for him. He sent, first, his son richly attired with five hundred followers, belonging to the richest families; then followed his two daughters with five hundred girls, all decked with the most costly ornaments. Every one carried flags of five different colours. These were followed by five hundred dames, having the rich man's wife at their head, each carrying a pitcher of water. Last of all, came Anatapein, with five hundred followers, all wearing new dresses. Gaudama let the crowd walk in front, and he followed, attended by all the Rahans. When he entered the grove, he appeared as beautiful as the peacock's tail when completely expanded. Anatapein asked Gaudama how he wished the donation should be made and effected? Let the monastery be offered, said Budha, to all the Rahans that may come in future to this place, from what quarter soever. Thereupon the rich man, holding a gold vessel of water, poured its contents on the hands of Budha, saying: I present this monastery to Budha and to all the Rahans that may come hereafter to reside therein. Budha said prayers and thanks in token of his accepting the offering. Seven days were devoted to making this great offering, and during four months, uninterrupted rejoicings went on, in commemoration of this great and solemn donation. For the purchase of the place, and the expense for the ceremony, enormous sums were lavished. During the era of former Budhas, this very place had always been purchased and offered to them and their disciples.

[N.B.—Here is found narrated in full the history of a celebrated physician named Dzewaka. As such story has no reference whatever to Budha's career, I will give but a very succinct account of it.]

At a certain time, 81 when Budha lived in the city of Radzagio, the country of Wethalie was made rich, gay

81.—It is impossible to assign the motive that may have induced the compiler of Budha's life, to insert in his work a long episode on the celebrated physician Dzezwaka. The story is in itself uninteresting, and throws no light whatever on the history of the supposed originator or reformer of Buddhism. For this reason it has been thought quite unnecessary to give a complete translation of the whole passage. The name of Dzezwaka is quite familiar with the adepts of the medical art in Burmah. Many times the writer has made inquiries respecting the works of the Hippocrates of India, but he has never been able to meet with mention of, or allusion to, such compositions. Hence he has been led to suppose that the father of medicine in these countries, has left after him, no writings to embody the results of his theoretical and practical favorite pursuits. Surgery appears to have been no novelty to our great Doctor, since we see him, on an occasion, extracting from the body of a prince, by means of an incision, a snake that put his life in peril.

The numerous quacks who in Burmah assume the name of physicians and are ever ready to give medicines in all cases, even the most difficult and complicated, are ignorant of the very elements of the surgical art. They possess a certain number of remedies made up with plants, which, when applied under proper circumstances and in certain cases, work out wonderful cures. But the native physicians, unable in most instances to discern the true symptoms of diseases, give remedies at random, and obtain, in too many cases, results most fatal to the unfortunate patient. In medicine as well as in religion, ignorance begets superstition, and recourse to magical practices. We may positively assert that the black art is, with native practitioners, an essential concomitant to the practice of medicine. When a physician has exhausted the limited stock of remedies that he possesses, and he finds, in spite of his exertions, that the disease defies his skill, he gravely tells the relatives of the patient that some evil spirit is interfering with his remedies, and that he must be expelled, ere there could be any chance of relieving the sufferer and obtaining his recovery. Whereupon a shed is erected with the utmost speed, on a spot close to the house of the patient. Offerings of rice, fruits and other articles are made to the pretended evil spirit, who is supposed to have got hold of the sufferer's body. Dances of the most frantic character are carried on by his relatives. Males will only officiate in default of females; preference is always given to the latter. Young girls, says the Burmesse, are the fittest persons for the occasion, as it is supposed that the evil Nat is more effectually and easily propitiated by the power of their charms. This exorcise lasts until strength at last failing them, they drop down in a state of complete exhaustion and prostration. They appear to have lost entirely their senses. In that state, they are supposed to be inspired by the evil spirit. Interrogated by the physician on the nature of this disease, and the proper remedies to be applied for eradicating it, they give answers, or rather they become channels through which the spirit, satisfied with the offerings made in his honor, condescends to declare that he has now left the patient, and that by placing him under a certain treatment, that he fails not to indicate, he will
nobleman of Radzagio, who had just returned from that country, narrated to the King all that he had seen at Wethalie, and induced the monarch to set up, in his own kingdom, some famous courtesan, who would be skilful in music and dancing, as well as attractive by the forms and accomplishments of her person. Such a person having been procured, she was, by the munificence of the King, placed on a most splendid footing, and one hundred pieces of silver were to be paid, for each evening’s visit.
The King’s son being rather assiduous in his visits to her place, she became pregnant. Aware of her state, the courtesan affected to be sick until her confinement. She directed her servant to throw out the newly born infant, on a heap of rubbish, in some lonely and distant place.
The next morning, the King’s son going out with some attendants, chanced to pass close to the spot where the infant had been deposited. His attention having been attracted by the noise of crows hovering close by, he went to see what it was. To his great surprise, he saw an infant yet breathing, half buried in rubbish. Taken up by the beauty of this little creature, the prince ordered the child to be carried to the palace, where he was brought up with the greatest care and attention. He was named Dzewaka, which means life, because the prince, when he found him out, inquired if he was alive.
The young lad having reached the years of discretion, was unwilling to remain in the palace, not attending to any business. In order to afford relief and comfort to his fellow creatures, he resolved to study medicine. He repaired to Benares, placed himself under the direction of a famous physician, and soon became eminent by his extreme proficiency in the profession. Having left his master, and begun practice in his own name and for his own account, Dzewaka worked the most wonderful cures, which soon procured to him unbounded wealth and an extraordinary reputation.

Dzewaka was at the height of his fame, when on a certain day, Budha happened to be troubled with belly ache. He called Ananda and said that he wanted some medicine to relieve him from pain. Ananda went to the place where lived the celebrated Dzewaka, and informed him of Budha's complaint. The doctor ordered first a rubbing of oil, which was to be repeated three days after. This remedy not having a full effect, Dzewaka took three lily flowers, whereupon he spread several powders, and came to Budha, saying: Most glorious Phra, here is one lily flower, please to smell it; this will be followed by ten motions. Here is a second one; the smelling thereof will produce a similar effect; and this one will cause the same result. Having handed over the three flowers, the doctor paid his respects to Budha, turned on the right and left the monastery.

When he was crossing the gate, he thought within himself: I have given a medicine calculated to cause thirty motions, but as the complaint is rather of a serious and obstinate character, twenty-nine motions only will take place; a warm bath would be required to produce the thirtieth; with his reflection he departed. Budha who saw all that passed in the doctor's mind, called Ananda and directed him to prepare a warm bath. A little while after, Dzewaka came back to Budha, and explained to him his prescription. Budha was soon restored to his former health, and Dzewaka told him that the people were preparing to make him offerings. Maukalan went to the son of Thauna, a rich man, to get some rice from a field that had been watered with milk. The owner gave rice to Maukalan and urged him to partake of it, assuring him that there was some other in reserve for Budha; Maukalan assented. After the meal, his patta was cleaned with perfumed water, and filled with the choicest food. Maukalan took it to Budha who ate it. Afterwards he preached the law to the king and to an immense crowd; amongst them was Thauna's son. They all obtained the first degree of perfection, but Thauna reached at once the state of Arahat.

Dzewaka came again to Budha's presence, and requested the favor of presenting him two splendid pieces of cloth, he had received in present from a king, whom he had cured of a most distressing distemper. Moreover, he wished that the Rahans should be allowed to receive clothes of a better sort, than those they were wont to wear. Budha received the two pieces and preached the law to the donor, who attained the state of Thautapan. Dzewaka rising from his place, wheeled on the right and departed.

A little while after, Gaudama called the Rahans and said to them: beloved Bickus, now I give permission to the faithful to make offerings of cloth for your dress. Whoever is pleased with his present dress, let him wear it; whoever is disposed to receive some ether from the people, let him do so. But I must praise you for having hitherto been satisfied with the ancient dress. The people of the city having heard of the permission given to the Rahans, offered at once more than one hundred thousand pieces of cloth. Their example was followed by the people of the country, who made offerings to the same amount.

81 (bis.)—The first followers of Budha, observing a mode of life much resembling that of the Rathees, had hitherto made use of the dress they had purchased, previous to their leaving the world. But when they became professed members of the new society, they were submitted to the observance of the vow of strict poverty, and had to depend entirely on public charity for the obtaining of the required food and raiment. The old clothes brought at the time of their entering the society, were worn out and unfit to be put on. Others were to be provided for by some means, that would not wound the delicate feeling of absolute poverty. The only one that occurred, was the willing and liberal dispositions of the lay members of the Budhist community. This new source of abundant alms, was opened by our Budha himself, on the occasion of the offering made by Dzewaka. Desiring likewise to do away, with the scruples many Religious might entertain respecting the licity or illicity of receiving articles of dress, Gaudama laid it down as a regulation, that all the Religious could lawfully accept all that might be willingly offered them by the faithful. In the foregoing pages, we have seen the founder of Buddhism granting to his followers, permission to receive houses and landed properties, presented to communities. Now the same legislator, adhering to the same principle, gives a fuller development thereto, and extends to articles necessary for dress, the leave to receive offerings of this description, proffered by the faithful to the Religious. In the book of Buddhist ordinations, or promotion to the degree of Patain, mention is made of these two sorts of permissions given to the Rahans.

A little while after this, Budha received a deputation from the Wethalie people inviting him to visit their country. Here is the reason of the invitation. The country was very rich and flourishing. The Malla princes governed it each by turn, for a certain space of time. On a sudden, a terrific pestilence desolated the land, which was in a short time, strewn with dead bodies in every direction. In the midst of so great a calamity, some advised to propitiate the Nats, by making offerings to them; others said that recourse was to be had to the great teachers; a third party insisted upon calling, in their aid, the great Gaudama, who had appeared in this world for the purpose of saving mankind. The last opinion prevailed. Having ascertained that he lived at Radzagio, a great number of Princes, Pounhas and Nobles went to Radzagio, with great presents for king Pimpathara, to induce him to allow the great teacher, to come to their country. The object of their mission having become known, Budha agreed to go. He sallied forth from the Welooowon monastery, attended by the king as far as the southern bank of the Ganges. Having reached the northern one, he was received with every possible mark of the highest respect and veneration. As soon as he set his feet in the country, a heavy rain fell which almost deluged the land. The water carried away the dead bodies. The atmosphere was purified, the pestilence ceased, and all the sick recovered. On the fifth day after the full moon of Nayon, (June), Budha having conferred such a favor to the people of Wethalie, left that country and returned to Radzagio, which he reached on the full moon of Watso, (July), just in time to spend the fourth season in the Welooowon monastery.

Here is inserted a short sketch of the manner Budha spent his days during the rainy season, which the translator has found in one of the manuscripts he has had before him. Each day was divided into five parts, and a certain occupation was reserved to each part. 1. Budha generally rose at an early hour, a little after day break, washed his face, rinsed his mouth, and dressed. He then retired into a private apartment. With his all-seeing eyes, he glanced over all creatures, carefully examined the amount of their merits and demerits, and the real nature of their dispositions. The reason for his taking a survey of the state and condition of all beings, was to ascertain the dispositions of the various beings and discern those who were prepared to hear the preaching of truth, from those who, an account of their demerits, were, as yet, unprepared for receiving beneficially for themselves such a great favor. When this was done, he put on his full canonical dress, and, with the mendicant's pot, under his arm, he sallied forth in quest of his food. He invariably directed his steps towards those places where he knew that his preachings would be heard with beneficial results. At a time, he went alone; at other times, he was attended with a certain number of his disciples. His countenance bespoke an unaffected modesty and an inimitable mildness. Occasionally, he allowed a display of wonders to take place. Musical instruments emitted of themselves, sweet tunes, which, revealing to the people the coming of Budha, rejoiced their heart and disposed them to bestow abundant alms, and to hear the preaching of the law. Some of the hearers became Upasakas, others Thautapans, &c., &c., agreeably to every one's disposition. Then he returned to his monastery.

2. As soon as he had arrived, he washed his feet, and during the ablution, he had his disciples assembled round him, and said to them: beloved Bickus, be ever watchful, and attentive, with a mind ever prone to reflection. It is exceedingly difficult to obtain the nature of man,* to hear the law, to become perfect,

* It was at that moment that Gaudama delighted to reveal to his disciples, the most startling points of his doctrine, and made them familiar to obtain the state of Rahanda, and to arrive to the condition of a Budha. He then pointed out to them some subjects of meditation. Many of the disciples devoted themselves to mental labor; some combined together manual and mental exertions; others withdrew in lonely places, at the foot of some trees, and in the caves of neighboring hills. Budha, then, took his meal, and retired for a while, alone, in his own private apartment. When he arose a little after midday, he, anew, contemplated all the beings and fixed his attention on those that were to come and receive his instructions. He soon came out and at once began to impart instruction to all those that had arrived from what place so ever. When the instruction was completed, the people withdrew. 3. After the people's departure, Budha bathed, and took a walk, in the open verandah of the monastery. His mat, cushion, &c., were spread in a becoming and opened place. The Rahans hastened, at that hour, to come and communicate freely the result of their mental exertions. When they wanted some explanations, they were encouraged to put him questions, which were instantly answered; and with certain tenets upon which he laid much stress. He wished that what he looked upon, as subjects of the greatest importance, should become familiar to them. No doubt he intended that those favorite topics should become the spiritual food upon which his disciples minds should feed during the hours devoted to meditation. Those who are uninitiated in the doctrines of Buddhism, will not understand the meaning of such an expression: it is difficult to obtain the nature of man. Such a language is, however, in perfect accordance with the principles of that system. A being, who is in one of the four states of punishment, that of an animal, for instance, shall have, in many instances, to pass through an immense number of various existences, ere he can escape from the circle of animals' existences, and at last emerge into that of man. To give us an idea of the excessive difficulties a being has to encounter, they make use of the following comparison. Let us suppose that a needle be dropped from one of the seats of Brahmam, and at the same time, a man on earth be keeping another needle the point of upwards. It will be more easy for the two needles' extremities to come in contact one with the other, than it will be to a being in the condition of animal to reach the state of man. On the same principle, one can easily imagine what mighty efforts must be made during countless existences, ere a simple man may obtain all the qualifications necessary for enabling him to become a Budha. The theory of Gaudama, on this point, resembles much that of some modern thinkers on the perfectibility of man, to an almost infinite degree.

they received submissively the answers which he condescended to give to them. This exercise lasted until it was dark. The disciples retired from their master's presence.

4. After their departure, the Nats and other celestial beings were admitted. Budha conversed with, and instructed, them until nearly midnight.

5. Budha then, walked a while to relieve his limbs from extreme lassitude, and went into his apartment to take some rest. He rose very early, and began to review the beings who, during the days of former Budhas, had distinguished themselves by their exertions in the path of virtue, and in the high mental attainments.

During one of his usual benevolent errands through the country, Gaudama converted Ouggasena, his wife and companions. Here is an abridged narrative of that event. Ouggasena was the son of a rich man. In the time of his youth, a company of comedians came to Radzagio and exhibited during seven days in the presence of king Pimpathara, and his court. Our young man, with many of his companions attended the exhibition. On a sudden, he became passionately fond of a rope dancing girl, who performed many feats with an accomplished grace, and an uncommon address. Despite his parents' remonstrances and entreaties, he sacrificed, to his ungoverned passion, all considerations and he married the damsel. In his new situation, he had no alternative, but to learn the art of rope dancing, tumbling feats, and standing in various attitudes on the extremity of posts or masts sometimes sixty cubits high. During his noviciate, he had to bear the laugh and taunts of his wife and of his new friends. By dint of exertions he became proficient in the art of performing tumblers feats with a surprising agility. On one day, it was announced at the sound of the drum, that Ouggasena was to perform on the top of a post sixty cubits high. An immense crowd of citizens went out with great eagerness, to see the performance. When the amusements had just begun, Budha happened to pass by with a number of disciples. He desired Maukalan to go ahead, and begin to preach to Ouggasena. Soon he came up himself in person, and converted the Juggler, who forthwith descended from his mast, prostrated before Budha and asked to be admitted a member of the Assembly. After further instructions he obtained the science of Rahanda. His wife, and all the company became likewise converts.*

Budha had now fulfilled the promise he had, before, made to the Ruler of Radzagio, to spend three consecutive seasons, in his royal city. He went over to the Wethalic country, and fixed his residence in a fine place, in the midst of a forest of Sala trees, called Mahawon. Whilst he enjoyed himself in that place, a quarrel happened between that portion of the people of Kappila and that of Kaulia, who lived on both banks of the little river Rauhanini. The cause of the dispute was the irrigation of paddy fields. The small river had been duly barred, but

* The conversion of Ouggasena and of his companions, procured by the direct intervention of Budha himself, is another instance of the truly liberal spirit which animated the great Preacher. His law was intended for all, without exception. The profession of these individuals whom he so peculiarly selected, was far from being a respectable one. The proud Brahmin would not have condescended to take notice of people who, in his opinion, had lowered themselves so low. But the new teacher, though born from parents belonging to a high caste, entirely free from the prejudices inculcated by the narrow spirit of caste, rose himself to such a high position, as to look upon man, whatever his condition or position might be, as a fellow being fully entitled to the benefits of his instructions. This is one of the most striking features of his preachings, its universality as regards persons and places. It enables us to account for the rapid and astonishing diffusion of his doctrines, through so many countries. It constitutes the essential and capital difference between the two great systems which, in days long passed by, have contested for the religious supremacy over the Indian Peninsula.

In the subsequent story of Threlandana's illness, we see Budha first, then Ananda, Thariputra and Mankalan relieving the illustrious patient from his bodily distress, by invoking, not the interference of a supreme being whom they ignored, but a certain power or influence connected with former good deeds. A great, may a miraculous effect is produced by the agency of a cause which no one but a Buddhist can understand. He has recourse to karm or the influence resulting from meritorious actions as to a mighty agent who has the power to work any desired result so ever. But how can a man by his own will, control the influence of his good actions, so as to produce a grand effect in no way short of a miracle, it is a thing which can, in no rational way, be explained or accounted for. on account of an unusual drought, there was not water enough for supplying the quantity required for the fields on both banks. One party wanted to have all the water, the other demurred. Hence a dispute, arose which, wild-fire-like, spread from the banks of the stream, all over both countries. A general appeal to arms ensued, and in a short time, both armies stood, facing each other, in battle array.

At an early hour, Budha having risen from his couch, cast as usual, a glance over all beings. He soon saw the feud that existed between the country of his birth, and that of Kaulia. Moved with compassion over the miseries that people, blinded by a furious passion, were to bring over themselves, he went through the air, and stood over and above the stream, which separated the two armies. Rays of glory beaming out of his person, soon attracted general attention. Both parties laid down their arms and prostrated, worshiping him. He said to them: Princes and warriors, hearken to my words. Which is the most valuable, a small quantity of water, or the lives of countless beings and in particular the lives of Princes? They answered: of course the lives of Princes and warriors is most valuable. If so, retorted Budha, lay aside your passion, conquer your anger, throw away your weapons of destruction; love each other, and live in peace. Both parties, by a low and prolonged tone of voice, expressed their deep regret at what they had done, and their sincere desire to follow his instructions. He preached to them the law, with such an impressive and convincing manner, that, on the spot, two hundred and fifty Noblemen of Kappila, and the same number of Kaulia asked for admittance among the members of the Assembly.

The instruction they had heard and which had determined their vocation, had not had time to cast deep roots in their hearts. They soon regretted their home, their families and their former gay life. Budha who saw what was going on in their souls, said to them: will you come with me, and enjoy yourself on the green banks of the beautiful lake Kontala. They joyfully accepted the proposal. By the power inherent in his nature, Budha took them through the air, and soon reached the lake. They alighted on its banks. Delighted with the beautiful scenery that surrounded them, and ignorant of the new objects which they saw, they interrogated Budha about the names of the new plants and fruits they perceived. Gaudama condescended to answer all their questions. Whilst this engaged, they saw the king of the birds of the lake, resting on the branch of a tree. On a sudden, five hundred birds of the same kind came crowding round their chief, and by their cries and various attitudes, testified of the happiness they felt at being in his company.

The new converts wondered at the admirable instinct of those birds, and communicated to each other, their mutual surprise. As an accomplished teacher, Budha availed himself of the opportune moment and said to them in a mild manner: beloved disciples, what you see now and admire, is the lively and true image of my family. So effectually was the instruction conveyed, that they all, at once, became Thautapan, and no longer thought of returning into the world. By the virtue inherent in their new position, they were enabled to fly through the air, and they returned with Budha into the Mahawon residence.

On their arrival, Budha began his fifth season, in that same place. It was in the middle of that season, in the month of Wakhaong, (August), that he heard that his father had been seized with a violent distemper, which left him no rest, neither day nor night. Sensible of his approaching end, Thoodaudana ardently wished to see his son for the last time. In the morning at the hour, when Budha was reviewing all beings and examining with a compassionate heart, their respective condition, he saw the sad and painful position of his royal father. He instantly summoned, by the means of Anau, a select band of disciples, and flying through the air, he alighted with his company in front of the palace. Without a moment's delay, he ascended to the superior apartments and set on a place prepared for him, near the head of the couch upon which lay the royal patient.

Budha recollecting himself a while, and then laying one of his hands on his father's head, said: by the virtue of the merits I have acquired during countless existences; by the power of the fruits gathered during forty-nine days, round the tree Bodi, let this head be forthwith relieved from all pain. It happened so, in the twinkling of the eye. Nan or Nanda, the younger brother of Budha, the son of his aunt Patzapat, holding the right hand of his father, said with a fervent earnestness: by the merits that I have obtained at the feet of Budha, let this right hand be freed from all pain. And perfect cure instantly followed. Ananda, Phra's first cousin, held the left arm. Thariputra laid his hand on the back, Maukalan, grasped the feet. All of them, with a similar faith, uttered such like prayers, and the same happy result invariably followed. Thoodaudana was delivered from all pain. But he continued to remain very weak.

Budha profited of that favorable opportunity, preached to his father the law of mutability, and gave him many and truly seasonable instructions, on that most important subject. With such a persuasive language did he expound this favorite doctrine, that his father, became at once, a Rahanda. At the same time, he distinctly informed him, that seven days hence, the end of his life would inevitably happen. Thoodaudana perfectly prepared to the new change, that is to say, to death, by his son's instructions, and thoroughly resigned, saw before him the true state of Neibban, and said: now I clearly perceive the instability of all things, I am free from all passions. I am completely disentangled from the trammels of existence. Rocking himself in the bosom of these comforting truths, he spent happily the few days, he had as yet to live. On the last day, and for the last time, he paid his respects to Budha by worshipping him. Sitting, then, on his couch the royal patient humbly asked pardon in the presence of all his attendants, for all offences he had committed by thoughts, words and deeds. Having performed this act of sincere humility, he consoled his wife Patzati who was bathed in her tears, as well as the other members of the royal family, and several times repeated before them the great truth: that all beings when coming into existence, have, within themselves inherent in their nature, a principle of death that hurried them to their end and dissolution: that the same principle that has brought near and united beings together, is always opposed, and, at last overpowered by the opposite one, that tends to separate them. He, then, placidly laid on his couch and gently breathed his last, in the day of the full moon of Wakhaong, on a Saturday, at the rising of the sun, in the year of the Eetzana era 107, at the advanced age of 97 years.

Gaudama, after his father's demise, when all the Rahans were assembled round the death bed, said to them: beloved Bickus, behold my father's remains. He is no longer what he was a little while ago. He has undergone the change. No one can offer an effectual and lasting resistance to the principle of death, inherent in all beings. Be diligent in the practice of good works: follow steadily the four roads leading to perfection. After this lecture, he consoled his aunt Patzapati and the other ladies of the court, who, with disheveled hairs, were wailing aloud and striking their breasts. He minutely explained to them the consequences resulting from the great principle of mutability, which pervades all beings, and infallibly leads them to destruction, by the separation of their constitutive parts.

When the instruction was finished, Budhha directed Kathaba to go and prepare the spot on which the funeral and the cremation of the corpse were to take place. Aided by Thariputra, he washed the corpse which was subsequently placed in great state, on a magnificent and lofty catafalco raised for the purpose. The Princes of Thekkara, Thoopawa and Weritzara came to attend the royal funeral and offer presents. The corpse was carried processionally through the principal streets of the city, at the sound of all musical instruments. Budha in person, received the corpse and laid it on the funeral pile. To no one else, would he leave the honorable and pious task of setting fire to it. On that occasion, there took place an undescrivable outburst of wailings and lamentings. The impassible Budha preached the law, on that occasion. He left aside all praises in behalf of the deceased. He was satisfied with announcing the law; and countless beings, both among men and Nats obtained the deliverance.

After the loss of her royal husband, Queen Patzapat, profoundly impressed with all that she had seen and heard, desired to renounce the world and embrace a religious mode of life. For that purpose, she came to the presence of Budha, and asked three times the permission to follow her inclination and become Rahaness. Three times the solicited favor was denied her. Budha, then, left his own native country, and returned to Wethalie, fixing his abode in the Gutagaia thala monastery, in the Mahawon forest.

Budha had not been long in this place, when he had to grant the request he had at first refused to his aunt Patzapat. The wives of the Princes of the Kappila and Kaulia countries, who, to the number of 500, had recently renounced the world, desired also to follow the example set before them by their husbands. They went to the Queen’s apartments, and communicated to her, their design, entreatings her to help them in obtaining the object of their wishes. Patzapat, not only promised them her support, but expressed the determination to join their company. As a token of the sincerity and earnestness of their resolution, all the Ladies without the least hesitation, cut their beautiful black hairs, put on a dress in accordance with their pious intentions, and resolutely set out, on foot, in the direction of the Wethalie country. Unused to such bodily exertions, the pious pilgrims sufferred much during their long journey. At last, worn out with fatigue, covered with dust, they arrived near the Mahawon monastery. They respectfully stopped at the gate, and requested an interview with Ananda. The latter having ascertained from their own mouth, the object of their pious and fatiguing errand, hastened into the presence of Budha, and entreated him to grant the earnest and praise-worthy demand of his aunt and of the other ladies, her companions. On hearing the request, Budha, for a while, remained silent, as if deliberating on the answer he had to give. Then he said: Ananda, it is not expedient to allow women to embrace the religious state; otherwise, my institutions shall not last long. Ananda undismayed by that reply, respectfully reminded Budha of all the favors he had received from Patzapatì, who had nursed and brought him up, with the utmost care and tenderness, from the day his mother died, when he was but seven days old, and represented with a fervent earnestness, the good dispositions of the pious postulants. Budha's scruples were overcome by the persuasive language of the faithful Ananda. He asked whether women could observe the eight precepts: and added that in case they would consent to bind themselves to a correct observance of them, they might be admitted as members of the Assembly.

Fully satisfied with the answer he had obtained, the venerable Ananda saluted Budha, and hastened to the gate of the monastery, where his return was impatiently awaited. On hearing the good news, Patzapatì in the name of her companions, spoke to Ananda; venerable Ananda, we all rejoice that the favor so often asked for, has been at last granted into us. As a young maid, who has bathed, and washed her hairs, is anxiously desirous to put on her fine ornaments; as she receives with delight, the beautiful and fragrant nose gaws that are offered to her, so we are longing for the eight precepts, and wish for admittance into the Assembly. They all promised to observe the rules of their new profession, to the end of their lives. Yathaudara and Dzananapada-kaliani were among those converts. They all, owing to their former meritorious works, became subsequently Rahandas.

One of the new female converts, seemed to have retained as yet a certain admiration of, and fondness for, her handsome features, and secretly prided herself on her beauty. Budha, who quickly perceived the latent enemy lurking in the folds of her heart, resorted to the following expedient to correct her. On a certain day, when the proud and vain woman was in his presence, he created, in an instant, a consummate beauty, who as much exceeded her in perfection of form, as the snow white-swan surpasses the black crow. Whilst she looked on this suddenly appearing rival, with somewhat jealous eyes, Budha caused the beauty of his creation to appear on a sudden, very old with a wrinkled face and an emaciated frame, and to exhibit on her person, all the various and disgusting inroads which the most loathsome deesses make on the human body. The change acted as an electric shock on the young religious woman. When Gaudama perceived the change, and that she was so horrified at such a sight, that she was nearly fainting, he said to her: behold, my daughter, the faithful foreshowing of what shall inevitably happen to that form you are so proud of. He had scarcely spoken those words, than she was instantly and forever cured of her vanity.

Budha left Wethalie and went on the Makula mountain, where he spent his sixth season. During his stay in that place, thousands of people were converted and obtained the deliverance. At the end of that season, Budha went to Radzagio and staid in the Weloowon monastery.

It was at that time, that Kema the first queen of king Pimpathara, proud of her rank, youth and beauty, was at last converted. Up to that time, she had obstinately refused to see Budha and hear his doctrine. On a certain day, the Queen went to visit a garden, which was in the neighborhood of the Weloowon grove. By a contrivance of the King, her husband, she was brought, almost against her will, in the presence of Budha, who worked out the spiritual cure of her foolish vanity by a process similar to the one above mentioned. He caused a beautiful female of his creation, to pass successively in the queen's presence, through the various stages of old age, disease and death. Her mind having thus, been well prepared to hear his instructions, Budha gave her a lengthened explanation of the miseries attending the body. It had the desirable effect to convert her in so perfect a manner that she entered into the current of perfection, and became Thautapan. After having obtained the consent of her lord, she was upon her pressing solicitations, admitted in the religious order. She became a Rahanda, and among the female members of the Assembly, she ranked as the disciple of the right. Such a glorious change was owing to her former merits.

On a certain day, a rich man of the country of Radzgio, went to enjoy himself on the banks of the river Ganges. That man was not a disciple of Budha, nor was he holding the doctrines of the opposite party. He steered a middle course between both doctrines, with a mind disposed, however, to embrace such opinions as would appear to him based on the best and strongest evidence. Chance offered to him a favorable opportunity to acknowledge the superiority of Budha over his opponents. He saw a log of sandal wood floating on the stream, took it up and had a beautiful patta made of it. When finished, he wrote upon it these words: He who can fly in the air, let him take it. The patta was raised on the top of a succession of hampers tied together, sixty cubits high. Some heretics living in the neighborhood asked, on several occasions, from the rich man to get down the patta for them; but he answered them that he would give it only to him who, by flight, could reach it. The head man of those heretics feigned to prepare himself to fly; but when he was extending his arms, and raising one of his feet, his disciples, according to a preconcerted plan, seized him, saying: It is not becoming that you should exert yourself, for such a trifle. But the wily rich man would not be thus deceived; he persisted in his former resolution, and, during six days, resisted all their entreaties. On the seventh day, Maukalan happened to go to that place in search of his food. He was informed of all that had just happened. He was moreover, told that the rich man and all his family would become disciples to him, who could, by flight, make himself possessed of the sandal wood patta. Maukalan was ready, for the glory of Budha, to raise himself in the air, but his companion refused to allow him to do it, saying that such an easy work could easily be accomplished by one less advanced in merits. Maukalan agreed to his proposal. Whereupon entering into the fourth state of Dzan, his companion rose in the air, carrying with the toes of one of his feet, an enormous rock, three quarters of a youdzana wide. The whole space, between him and the bystanders, appeared darkened. Every one was half dead with fear, lest perhaps it should fall over his head. Maukalan's companion had the rock split into two parts, and his person then appeared to the view of the assembled crowd. After having, during a whole day, exhibited such a mighty power, he caused the rock to fall on the place he had taken it from. The rich man bade him to come down, fully satisfied with the display of such power. The sandal wood patta was taken down, filled with the best rice, and presented to him. The Rahan received it and went back to his monastery. Many persons, living at a distance from the place, where the wonder had been exhibited, followed him to the monastery, begging him to show some other signs.

As they approached the monastery, Budha hearing the noise, enquired what it was. He was informed of all the particulars of the event that had just taken place. He called the Rahan into his presence, took the patta, had it broken into pieces and reduced to dust. He then forbade the Rahan ever to make such a display of his power.

89.—The rebuke given by Budha to the disciple who had made, without The heretics soon heard of the prohibition issued by Gaudama to his disciples. They thought that no one a permission, such a display of miraculous power, though intended for the promotion of his glory, was designed to operate as a salutary check to the pride that might find its way into the heart of even the most privileged beings. Such a lesson was deemed of the greatest importance, since we find in the book of Buddhistic ordinations, the sin of boasting of, or pretending to, the power of working wonders, &c., ranked among the four capital sins, excluding a Rahan forever from the society of the perfect, and depriving him of his rank and dignity. Budha, it seems, wished to reserve to himself alone, the honor of working miracles, or to give the permission, when circumstances should require it, to some of his disciples, to do the same in his name and for the exaltation of his religion.

The following story of Purana and his five associates, holds a prominent rank among the events that have rendered Budha so celebrated. Gaudama, as it has been already mentioned in some foregoing notes, was an ascetic who had studied philosophy under eminent masters, who belonged to the Brahminical school. In many of his opinions, as well as in his mode of life, there was no perceptible difference between him and the followers of the Brahmins. The writings of the latter, as well as those of the earliest Buddhists, exhibit to us the sight of a great number of schools, where opinions on ontology, morals and dogmas, &c., at once various, multifarious and opposite, were publicly taught. Then, human mind, left to its own resources, launching forth into the boundless field of speculative philosophy, ran in every direction, searching after truth. The mania for arguing, defining, drawing conclusions, &c., in those days, prevailed to an extent scarcely to be credited. Many centuries before Aristotle wrote the rules of dialectics, the Indian philosophers had carried the art of reasoning, to a great degree of nicety and shrewdness. Witness the disputes and discussions between the Brahmins, and the immediate disciples of Budha. When our Phra began to attract about his person crowds of hearers and disciples; when his opinions on the end of man, were understood and appreciated; when the system of castes received the first shocks from the new, but rapidly progressing doctrine; when the eyes and hearts of the people were slowly at first, and rapidly afterwards, centered on the new preacher and his disciples; when at last, alms, that had hitherto flowed in the abodes of the Brahmins, began to enter into new channels and carry their substantial produce to the door of the followers of the new sect; then jealousy and other passions began to agitate the hearts of those who had hitherto retained an undisputed sway over the credulity of the people. They tried, if credit be given to the works of Buddhists, every effort, devised every means, in order to oppose the progress of the new doctrine.

In this instance, Purana and his friends, assisted, as the Buddhists pretend, by the agency of the evil one, wished to enter into discussion with Budha and to surpass him in the display of miraculous power. The contest was to take place in the country of Thawatte, in the presence of the King and of a countless multitude, assembled for the purpose. Purana, as usual with Buddhists in regard to those who held opinions different from their own, is styled an heretic. Of the opinions of the enemies of Budha, nothing is said in the present work, but the writer has had the opportunity of perusing another work where a slight allusion is made to those six holders of heterodox doctrines. Their opinions were at variance upon the beginning would dare to match them in the display of wonders, and that they could easily ascertain their superiority over him.
The ruler of Radzagio hearing of this news, went to Budha and enquired as to the motive of such a prohibition.
Budha told him that the prohibition regarded his disciples only, but not himself. The heretics, informed of this, said: What will become of us? Gaudama himself will show signs. They held a council among themselves as to what was to be done. Gaudama told the king that in four months, he would make a grand display of his miraculous power in the country of Thawattie, as it was in that place, that all former Budhas had, in former ages, showed signs. The heretics, from that day, never lost sight of Budha for a moment; they followed him day and night. They gave orders that a large and extensive covered place should be prepared for them, where they

of this world, the eternity of matter, the existence of the soul, a first principle, creator of all that exists. We may infer therefore, that they were heads or chiefs of various schools, who, though not agreeing among themselves upon purely speculative doctrines, united and combined against the common enemy. A detailed account of the doctrines held by these six heeretics would prove highly interesting, as it would throw some light on the very obscure and imperfectly known history of Indian philosophy, in the days when Buddhism assumed the shape of a religious system. To those who are unacquainted with Indian literature, the great progress made by Hindoos in philosophical sciences at such an early period, may appear somewhat doubtful: but, modern discoveries made all over the Indian Peninsula, leave not the least doubt respecting this startling assertion. At a period when Greece and the other regions of Europe were sunk into a state of complete ignorance, most of the branches of literature were successfully cultivated on the banks of the Ganges. The study of philosophy always supposes a great intellectual advancement. There would, therefore, be no rashness whatever, in asserting that the present state and condition of India, as regards literary progress, are much below the mark that was attained at such a remote period. The epoch of literary decadence, began with the devastating expeditions of the fanatical Moslems, in the tenth century. It is probable, too, that the religious and sanguinary conflicts between the Buddhists and Brahminists, has had its share in bringing about a similar result. The latter having obtained the ascendancy over their adversaries, became more bigoted. They would no longer tolerate, to the same extent as before, the liberty of elaborating new systems, lest some successful philosopher, might hereafter propagate opinions at variance with their own, undermine the mighty fabric of their creed, and endanger the holding of that absolute sway and paramount influence, they had recovered, after centuries of a deadly contest with the disciples of the philosopher of
might show their power and outshine that of the Rahan Gaudama. Budha having said that he would select the spot where stood a white mango tree, for the scene of his miracles, the heretics caused the total destruction of all mango trees in that direction.

On the full moon of Tabaong, (February), Gaudama left Radzagio, attended with a large retinue of disciples. He went to preach in different parts. On the seventh of the waxing moon of Watso, he entered in the country of Thawattie. A gardener gave him, in present, a large mango fruit. Ananda prepared the fruit and Budha ate it. When this was done, the stone was handed to Ananda with an injunction to plant it, in a place prepared to receive it. When planted, Buddha washed his hands over it, and on a sudden, there sprung up a beautiful white mango tree, fifty cubits high, with large branches loaded with blossoms and fruits. To prevent its being destroyed, a guard was set near it, by the King’s order. Dismayed at such a wonderful sign, the heretics fled in every direction, to conceal their shame and confusion. Their headman, named Pourana, took, from a husbandman, a large jar, with a rope, tied up the vessel with one extremity of the rope, passed the other round his neck, and flinging first the jar, and next himself, into the river, where the water was very deep, he was drowned, and went to the lowest hell, called Awidzi.

Budha created in the air, an immense road, reaching east and west to the extremities of the world. When the sun began to verge towards the west, he thought the time had come to ascend into that road, in the presence of an immense crowd, that covered an area of thirty-six youdzanas, and there, to make a display of his wonderful powers. He was on the point of crossing the threshold of the building that had been erected for him, by the care of Nats, when a female convert, named Garamie, who had become an Anagam, came into his presence, and after the usual prostrations said to him: Glorious Budha, it is not necessary that you should take the trouble of working wonders; I, your servant, will do it. What wonder shall you work, my daughter, Garamie, replied Budha. I will, said Garamie, fill up the space with water, and plunging in the water, in an eastern direction, I will come back and reappear in the west, like a water fowl. On my appearance before the crowd, they will ask, what is this water fowl? And I will answer to them, that this water fowl is Garamie, the daughter of the most excellent Budha. This is the wonder I will accomplish. The heretics on seeing it, will say to themselves: if such be the power of Garamie, how much greater and more wonderful must be that of Budha himself? I know, said Budha, that you have such a power, but, it was not for your sake, that these crowds have been gathered together; and he refused the solicited permission. Garamie said to herself: Budha would not allow me to work this great wonder, but there is some one else that can do greater things than I; perhaps Budha will not be with them, so inflexible as he is with me. She, then, withdrew to a becoming place.

Budha thought within himself: there are many among my disciples, who can make a display of great wonders: it is meet that the crowds should be aware of it, and see how, with hearts stout like that of the lion, they are ready to perform the most wonderful feats. He said aloud: Who are they, those who can do wonders?—let them come forward. Many came in his presence, with a lion like boldness and a thundering voice, craving for the honor of displaying supernatural powers. Among them, was a rich man named Anataperin, a female child, called Tsera, a grown up woman and Maukalan. They volunteered their services to perform the most extraordinary wonders, in order to frighten at once the heretics, and make them to understand that if such a power belongs to the disciples, what must be that of Budha himself. But Budha would not accept their proffered services, and said to them, that the people had not been assembled there for their sake, but for his; and that to him alone was reserved the task of enrapturing the crowds, by the great wonders he was preparing to show. Addressing Maukalan, he said to him, that being a Budha, he could not leave to others the trouble of performing his own duty. In a former existence, when he was a bullock, he drew from a muddy place, a heavily laden cart, to save a Brahmin's property, and rejoice his heart.

Budha ascended into the immense road he had created in the air, in the presence of the crowd that filled a place of eighteen youdzanas in breadth, and twenty-four in length. These wonders which he was about to display, were the result of his own wisdom, and could not be imitated by any one. He caused a stream of water to issue from the upper part of his body, and flames of fire from the lower part; and on a sudden, the contrary took place; again, fire issued from his right eye, and streams of water from his left eye, and so on from his nostrils, ears, right and left, in front and behind; the same wonder, too, happened in such a way, that the streams of fire succeeded the streams of water, but without mingling with each other. Each stream, in an upward direction, reached the seats of Brahmas; each stream, in a downward direction, penetrated as far as hell. In a horizontal direction, they went to the extremities of the world. From each of his hairs, the same wonderful display feasted the astonished eyes of the assembled people. The six glories gushed, as it were, from every part of his body, and made it appear resplendent beyond description. Having no one to converse with, he created a personage, who appeared to walk with him. Sometimes he sat down, while his companion was pacing along; and at other times, he himself walked, whilst his interlocutor was either standing, or sitting. During all the while, Budha put to him questions which he readily answered, and in his turn replied to the interrogations that were made to him. At intervals, Phra preached to the crowd, who were exceedingly rejoiced and sung praises to him. According to their good dispositions, he expounded the various points of the law. The people who heard him, and saw the wonderful works he performed, obtained the understanding of the four great principles.

Budha having completed the two-fold work of preaching to the crowds, and exciting their respect and admiration by the most astonishing display of the most extraordinary miracles, began to think within himself as follows: to what place have all former Budhas resorted, after the display of signs, and spent the season. He saw by a stretch of his incomparable foresight, that all of them had gone to the seat of Tawadeinta, in the Nats' country, to announce the perfect law to their mothers. He resolved to go thither too. With one step he reached the summit of the mountain Ugando, at a distance of 160,000 youdzanas, and another step carried him to the top of the Mienmo mountain. This was done without any effort on the part of Budha. Those mountains lowered their summits to the very spot where he was standing, and rose up again to resume their lofty position. Budha found himself brought almost instantaneously to the seat of Tawadeinta. He took his position

83.—The preachings of Budha were not to be confined to the narrow limits of man's abode; they were designed to reach much further. All beings living in the six seats of Nats, were to share with men, the blessings of the publication of the perfect law. It has been already stated at length, in a foregoing note, that the condition of Nat is merely a state of pleasures and enjoyments, allotted to those who, in former existences, had done some meritorious work. The fortunate inhabitants of these celestial regions remain in those seats until the sum of their respective merits being, as it were, exhausted, they return to the abode of man, the true place of probation for all beings living therein. The condition of Nat, therefore, is not a permanent one; the Nat after his time of reward is over, has to migrate to our terrestrial abode, begin a new existence and endeavour to advance himself in the way of perfection, by the practice of virtue. He is, as yet, very far from the state of Nibbana. Like man, he has to learn the sublime law, and to become acquainted with the roads leading to the four high perfections. Budha, who came to announce the law of salvation to all beings, could not but go to the seats of Nats and teach them the way to free themselves from the turmoil of never ending existences. The preachings of Budha, during three consecutive months, were attended with a success that must have exceeded his most sanguine expectations. Millions of Nats were converted and forthwith obtained the deliverance. Others, less advanced in merits, obtained the first, or second, or third state of perfection.
on the immense rock Pantukambala. When he had extended there upon his Tsiwaran, the huge mass on a sud-

During his stay in the other seats of Nats, Budha gave a decision on the merits of alms-giving, which is certainly to the advantage of the yellow dressed Ricks, but appears somewhat opposed to all principles of justice and reason. In his opinion, the inward dispositions of him who gives alms, has nothing to do with the merits, resulting from such a good work. Those merits are strictly proportionate to the degree of sanctity or perfection of him who receives alms. Such doctrine—destructive of the purest and noblest motives that can actuate man to do good, is openly upheld now, both in theory and practice, by the Buddhist monks. When they receive alms from the admirers of their saintly mode of life, they never think of returning thanks to those who so liberally administer to all their material wants—they content themselves with saying: Thado, thado; that is to say—well, well; and the pious offerer withdraws perfectly satisfied and happy, relying on the merits he has gained on this occasion, and longing for another opportunity of doing the like. The liberality of the laity, towards the Religious, is carried to an excess scarcely to be credited. Government do not interfere in the maintenance of the perfect; and yet they are abundantly supplied with all the necessaries, nay, the luxuries of life. They live on the fat of the land.

That the crowds of people might be better prepared for, hearing the sacred law and obtaining a correct understanding of it, Budha charges Manka-fan to enjoy a regular fast, or at least abstinence, carried to a considerable degree. A free and copious use of nourishing substances, unfit man for mental exertions, occasions heaviness and supineness in him, enervates and weakens the vigor of the intellect, and gives to matter a preponderating influence over the soul. The advice will hold good everywhere, but it becomes particularly pressing and stringent, when addressed to an audience of Buddhists, who require the full force of their mind, to be able to understand the various bearings of a doctrine, resting on the most abstruse principles, the end of which too, is to disentangle the soul from the influence of materiality. Up to this day in Burmah, there are some remnants of the observance of fast, during the three months of Lent, when the law is oftener expounded to, and better observed by, religious people. The obligation of fast, during the days of the quarters of the moon, is generally admitted, and some few observe it, if not always, at least from time to time. The generality of the Burmese people entirely disregard fasting.

Curious but interesting is the reply Budha gave to Thariputra, who rejoiced exceedingly, because men and Nats vied with each other in paying great honors to him. He unhesitatingly states: blessed are all those who rejoice on his account. By this joy, we ought not to understand the transient and momentary affection of the heart, elicited by some pleasing and agreeable occurrence; but the kind of joy alluded to, is a rational, philosophical, and religious one, having its origin, 1st, in a full and perfect knowledge of Budha's transcendent excellence, rendering his person an object of the highest admiration; and 2nd, in a lively confidence in his benevolence and goodness, towards all beings, which urge him to labor for their deliverance from all miseries and their guidance to a state of peace and rest. Such a joy diffused over the heart, creates an ardent love for Budha and his doctrine; that affection rests, not on Budha, as a mere individual, but on him who is the personification of a saviour of all beings. It implies faith in den contracted itself to the very narrow dimensions of his dress.

The people who had seen Budha, and who could now not descry him, found themselves in a state of bereavement, as if the sun and the moon had disappeared from the sky. They gave full vent to their cries and lamentations, saying: we are now deprived of the blessed presence of him, who is the most excellent among the three sorts of beings, Men, Nats and Brahmas. Some said he went to this place; some replied, no, he has gone to that place. Many of the people who had just arrived from different parts of the country, were exceedingly grieved, because they could not see him. They all repaired before Maukalan, to ascertain from him what place Budha had gone to. Maukalan knew it, but he wished to leave to Anourouda, the honor of satisfying their curiosity. The latter said to them that Budha had gone to the seat of Tawadeintha, to preach the law to his mother, and spend there one season, on the rock of Pantukambala. He added that he would be back in three months hence, on the day of the full moon of Thadin-kioot, (October). They came to the spontaneous resolution, to remain on that very spot, and not to return to their homes, until they had seen Budha a second time. They erected temporary sheds; and though the place was small for such a countless multitude, they managed to accommodate themselves in the best way they could. Previous to his departure, Budha had enjoined to Maukalan, to remain with the people and preach to them the law. Maukalan faithfully complied with the request, and during three consecutive months, instructed the people and answered all their questions. The rich man Anatapein fed abundantly the Rahans and the Assembly, during the whole time.

him and his preachings, as well as a strong confidence in his power and willingness to confer the greatest possible benefits. Hence there is no wonder to hear Budha declaring blessed, all those, who, on that solemn occasion, rejoiced in him.
Chapter X.

Budha's proceedings in the seat of Tawadeintha—His triumphant return to the seat of men, in the city of Thin-ka-tha—He is calumniated by the heretics of Thawattie—Eighth season spent in the forest of Tesakala—Subsequent preachings—He meets with a bad reception in the Kothamby country—Dissent among the disciples—Reconciliation—Travels of Budha—Preaching to a Pounha who tilled a field.

Whilst Budha was in the seat of Tawadeintha, all the Nats came from more that 10,000 worlds to his presence; but the glory that always encompasses their bodies, dispersed or was completely outshone by that of Budha's person. His mother, a daughter of Nats, came from the seat of Toothita, to see her son and hear his instructions. She sat on his right. Two sons of Nats stood by the right and left of his mother. The crowd was so great that it covered a superficies of eighteen youdzanas. In that immense assembly, two Nats were conspicuous by their particular demeanor and position. One of them stood so close to Budha as to touch almost one of his knees, the other was standing in a respectful position greatly afar off. Budha asked the latter one, what he had done to deserve the place he occupied. He answered that during former existences, he had, indeed, made abundant alms, but his merits had been comparatively small, because he had not done those good works to persons eminent for their sanctity. The same question was put to the other Nat, who said that he was, in former existences, living in very narrow circumstances, but that he had had the good fortune of giving alms, according to his limited means, to persons who were much advanced in merits. With a voice that was heard by the crowds on the seat of men, Budha proclaimed the immense advantage of giving alms to, and supporting, the Rahans and those advanced in perfection. They were, said he, like good seed sown on a good field, that yields an abundance of good fruits. But alms given to those who are as yet under the tyrannical yoke of passions, are like a seed deposited in a bad soil; the passions of the receiver of alms choke, as it were, the growth of merits. At the conclusion, the two Nats obtained the reward of Thautapan. The crowds on earth had also the benefit of hearing his instructions.

Whilst Budha was in the middle of the Nats, he announced the law of Abidama to his mother. Having to go about to get his food, Budha created a likeness of another Budha, whom he commissioned to continue the preaching of the Abidama. As to himself, he went to the mountain of Himawonta, ate the tender branches of a certain tree, washed his face in the lake Anawadat, and partook of the food he received from the Northern Island. Thariputra went thither to render him all necessary services. When he had eaten his meal, he called Thariputra and desired him to go and preach the law of Abidama to five hundred Rahans, who were present when the display of wonders took place, and were much pleased with it. In the time of the Budha Kathaba, those five hundred Rahans were bats, living in a cave much resorted to, by Rahans, who were wont to repeat the Abidama. Those bats contrived to retain a certain number of words, the meaning whereof they could not understand. When they died, they were transferred into one of the seats of Nats; and when they became men anew, they had the good fortune to be born from illustrious parents, in the country of Thawattie, and when Phra showed his powers, they were much pleased. They became Rahans under Thariputra, and were the first to understand perfectly the sublime law of Abidama.

As to Budha, he returned to the seat of Tawadeintha and continued the instructions, where the Budha of his creation had left them. At the end of three months preaching, an innumerable number of Nats knew and understood the four great principles. As to his mother, she obtained the perfection of Thautapan.
The time Budha was to return to the seat of men was near at hand. The crowds eager to know the precise time when Budha was to come back among them, went to Maukalan to ascertain from him, the precise day they would be blessed with his presence. Well, said Maukalan to the people, in a very short time I will give you an answer on the subject of your enquiry. On that very instant, he plunged into the bottom of the earth and reappeared, but when he was at the foot of the Mienmo mountain, he ascended, in the view of the crowd whom he had left, and soon arrived in the presence of Budha, to whom he explained the object of his errand. My son, answered Budha, in what country does your brother Thariputra spend his season? In the city of Thin-ka-tha, replied Maukalan. Well, said Budha, seven days hence, at the full moon of Thadin-kioot, (October), I will descend near the gate of Thin-ka-tha city; go and tell the people that those who desire to see me, ought to go to that country, distant 30 yourdanas, from Thawattie. Let no one take any provision; but by a rigorous abstinence, let them dispose themselves to hear the law that I will preach. Maukalan having paid his respects to Budha, returned to the place where the assembled multitude anxiously waited for him. He related to them all the particulars regarding his interview with Budha, and conveyed to them the much wished for intelligence of his speedy return on earth.

On the day of the full moon of Thadin-kioot, (October), Budha disposed himself to go down to the seat of men. He called a Prince of Thagias and directed him to prepare every thing for his descent. Complying with his request, the Thagia prepared three ladders or stairs, one made of precious stones, occupying the middle; one on the right, made of gold, and a third one made of silver, on the left. The foot of each ladder rested on earth, near to the gate of Thin-ka-tha city, and their summits leaned on the top of the Mienmo mountain. The middle ladder was for Budha, the golden one for the Nats, and that of silver for the Brahmases. Having reached the summit of the steps, Budha stopped awhile, and resolved to make a fresh display of his power. He looked upwards, and all the superior seats of Brahmases were distinctly descried; on his looking downwards, the eyes could see and plunge into the bottom of the earth, to the lowest hell. The Nats of more than a thousand systems could see each other. Men could perceive Nats in their fortunate seats, and Nats saw men in their terrestrial abode. The six glories shot forth with an incomparable splendor from Budha’s person, which became visible to all the crowds. There was not one who did not praise Budha. Having the Nats on his right, and the Brahmases on his left, the most glorious Phra began his triumphant coming down. He was preceded by a Nat, holding a harp in his hands, and playing the most melodious tunes; another Nat fanned him; a chief of Brahmases held over him a golden umbrella. Surrounded with that brilliant cortege, Budha descended near the gate of Thin-ka-tha city and stopped there for a while. Thariputra came forthwith into the presence of Budha, paid him his respects at a becoming distance, and said, with a heart overflowing with joy: On this day, O most glorious Budha, all the Nats and men are showing their love to you. Budha replied: blessed is Thariputra, and blessed are all those who rejoice on my account. Men and Nats love him who is acquainted with the sublime law, who has put an end to his passions, and who has attained to the highest state of contemplation. At the end of his discourse, innumerable beings understood the four great principles, and the five hundred Rahans whom Thariputra was commissioned to instruct, reached the state of Arahats. On the spot where all Budhas set their feet, when coming from the seat of Tawadeintha, a Dzedi has always been erected.

83 (bds.)—The religious edifices that are to be met with in all parts of Burma, deserve a particular notice. They are called Dzedis in all the Buddhist writings of the Burmese, but the people generally mention them by the appellation of Payas or Phras, which, in this instance, is merely an honorific title of a religious character.

Dzedis, in the earliest days of Buddhism, were sacred tumuli raised upon a shrine, wherein relics of Budha had been deposited. These structures were as so many lofty witnesses, bearing evidence to the presence of sacred and precious objects, intended to revive in the memory of the faithful, the remembrance of budha, and foster in their hearts, tender feelings of devotion and a glowing fervor for his religion.

From the perusal, of this Legend, it seems that Dzedis were likewise erected on the tombs of individuals, who during their life time, had obtained great distinction by their virtues and spiritual attainments, among the members of the assembly. Budha himself ordered that a monument should be built over the shrine containing the relics of the two great disciples Thariputra and Maukalan. In Burmah, no Dzedis of great dimensions and proportions, have ever been erected on the ashes of distinguished Phongies. In some parts, however, particularly in the upper country, there may be seen here and there, some small Dzedis a few feet high, erected on the spot where have been deposited the remains of some saintly personages. These monuments are little noticed by the people, though, on certain occasions, a few offerings of flowers, tapers, &c. are made around, and in front of them.

The same kind of religious edifices have been built some times also, to become a receptacle of the Pitagat, or collection of the holy scriptures. One of the finest temples of Ceylon was devoted to that purpose. There was also one in the ancient city of Ava, but I am not aware that there is any of this kind at Amarapora.

Finally, Dzedis have been erected for the sole purpose of harbouring statues of Gaudama; but there is every reason to believe that this practice has gained ground in subsequent ages. When a fervent Buddhist, impelled by the desire of satisfying the cravings of his piety and devotion, wished to build a religious monument, and could not procure relics, he then remained contented with supplying the deficiency, with images of Budha representing that eminent personage, in some attitudes of body, that were to remind Buddhists of some of the most striking actions of his life. In many instances, Dzedis have been built up, not even for the sake of sheltering statues, but for the pious purpose of reminding the people of the holy relics of Budha, and as they use to say, for kindling into the soul, a tender feeling of affectionate reverence for the person of Budha and his religion. If, what is put forward as a plea for building pagodas, be founded on conviction and truth, we must conclude that the inhabitants of the valley of the Irrawady are most devotedly religious, as the mania for building Dzedis, has been, and even now, is carried to such a pitch as to render almost fabulously exaggerated the number of religious buildings, to be seen on an extent of above 700 miles, as far as Bhamo.

As Buddhism was imported from India into Eastern Asia, there is no doubt but the style of architecture followed in the erection of religious edifices, came from the same quarter. To the native genius of the Burmese, we may allow the merit of ornamental architecture, for the great monasteries, and a few details of the exterior decorations of the religious monuments; but no one will take offence at refusing to the tribes that occupy the basin of the Irrawaddy, the merit of originating the plan of such monuments as monastery. The fame of the wonders he had performed, increased his reputation, and elicited from the people fresh

those to be seen in some parts of the country. It is much to their credit, that they have been able to raise such mighty fabrics, with the imperfect knowledge they possess and the very limited means at their disposal. The resemblance that exists between the much defaced Buddhist monuments, yet to be met with in some parts of India, and at Java, and those now studding the banks of the Irrawaddy, leaves no doubt respecting the origin of the shape and form of such monuments.

At first sight, the traveller in Burmah, believes that there is a great variety in the shape and architecture of pagodas. He is easily led astray by many fantastical ornaments, added by unexperienced natives, to religious monuments. After, however, a close examination of these edifices, it seems that they can be arranged into three distinct classes, to which, those presenting minor differences, may be referred. The first class comprises those which have a cone-like appearance, though much enlarged in the direction of the base. These are without niches, or rather ought to be without niches, as the small ones to be seen added to those monuments, indicate that they are no essential appendage of the building, but rather the fanciful and tasteless work of some devotees. The pagodas of Rangoon, Pegu and Prima, offer the finest specimen of this order of edifices. The second class includes those of a dome-like shape. They are not common in Burmah. The finest and grandest specimen is that of the Kaong-hmoo-dau, or great meritorious work, situated west of the ancient city of Teagain. In the third class, we may place all the pagodas that approximate to the form of temple; that is to say, all those that offer the shape of a more or less considerable rectangle, with a large hall in the centre, and several galleries running throughout. Upon this rectangle, a conical structure is raised, ending as usual with the tee, or umbrella. The most remarkable and perfect specimen of this kind, are to be seen at Pagan, which may be aptly styled the City of Pagodas.

The cone-shaped pagoda invariably rests on a quadrangular basis a few feet high. The body of the cone in its lower part is an hexagon or octagon, broad at first, then gradually and regularly decreasing to the two thirds of its height. Upon it, rises the regular cone, which ends in a point covered with the gilt umbrella.

The architectural ornaments of such structures, are circular, bold and round lines or mouldings; above this, to the place where the cone begins, are sculptures, representing leaves shooting from the middle part, one half upwards, and the other half downwards. That part is often divested of such ornaments, as is the case with the Shosyldagon. On the sides of the cone, are horizontal lines grouped together; each group is separated by a considerable distance; then comes a sculptured foliage, different from the one already mentioned, but disposed in a like manner. In the middle of the four sides of the base, particularly in the one facing the East, the Burmese have introduced the practice of making small niches for receiving the statues representing Buddha in a cross legged position. A portico leads to them. On the four angles of the base they likewise place griffins or sometime fantastic figures of monsters. Small Deeris are often disposed on the lower parts of the hexagon or octagon. This kind of pagoda being naturally destitute of all ornaments, and standing over a tomb or a shrine, as a pillar that has gradually assumed the shape above described, is a very tokens of respect and veneration. Alms poured from all quarters into the monastery; the liberality of the people ancient one, and probably coeval with the earliest Buddhist religious monuments.

The second class of religious edifices, is that of those that exhibit a domelike appearance. They are rather uncommon in Būrnāh. They rest on a square basis. The lower part is adorned with a few mouldings, but the greatest part offers a perfectly even superficial. The umbrella that is placed on them, partake somewhat of the appearance of the monument, it is destined to crown. It considerably expands in the horizontal direction and has a very ungraceful appearance. The Kaong-hmoo-dan, in the neighbourhood of Tsagain, rests on a basis about 18 or 20 feet high; the dome according to an inscription is 153 feet high, the diameter, at the lowest part, is nearly 200 feet. The whole was formerly gilt. The four sides of the square, are lined with small niches, each tenanted by a small statue of Gaudama. Separated from the square, by an open and well paved gallery that runs all round the edifice, are disposed in a row, 802 small pillars of sandstone, about six feet high, with their upper part perforated, so as to afford a room sufficient to receive a lamp on festival days. Splendid must be the effect produced during a dark night, by so many lamps, pouring a flood of light that illuminates on all sides the massive edifice. Whether the monument was built about 300 hundred years ago, as stated to the writer by one of the guardians, or, as it is most probable, only repaired and adorned at that time, certain it is that this kind of religious edifices is very ancient, and very likely not inferior in antiquity to those above referred to. Another of a similar form, but of much smaller dimensions, is to be seen at Ihamo, not far from the eastern gate.

The third class of Pagodas comprises all those that are generally of a square form, not made of a solid masonry, but with openings or doors, a room, galleries, &c., for receiving statues of Gaudama. They are all surmounted with the usual conical structure, which is, it seems, the essential appendage to all Dzellas. These edifices, in my opinion, are not to be considered as tumuli or topes, but rather as places of worship, and sanctuaries for the reception of the statues of Gaudama. The monuments, are, I suspect, of a comparative modern origin; they have not the plainness and simplicity of the tumuli which agree so well with the simplicity of the religious form of worship of primitive Hinduism. They are not made to answer the purpose for which Dzellas were primitively raised. They must have been erected at times, when Buddhist worship, emerging from its primeval sternness of forms, assumed proportions and developments, congenial to the taste and wants of large religious communities. This class of temples offers a great variety of forms as to the size, dimensions and details of architecture. But they may be all brought to this general outline. From the square body of the temple, diverge in the direction of the four points of the compass, porticoes; the one facing the east, is always the largest and best adorned; sometimes there is but one portico, that of the east, and there are only doors in the middle of the three other sides. From these porticoes, the galleries converge towards the centre of the temple, where are statues. In the large and magnificent Pagodas of Pagan, galleries with vaults in the pointed style, run all round the building. Some of those stupendous structures have two stories, and it is but on the second, that rests the conical part which is the essential complement of every religious building.
towards his person and that of his disciples expanded in a wonderful manner. The heretics, who swarmed in Wethalie and its neighborhood, became exceedingly jealous of Budha's successes. The loss which they sustained in the donations of the people, added fuel to the inward discontent. They resolved to devise some means to lower the character of Budha, in the opinion of the people. After a long deliberation, they fixed on the following plan. A certain woman of great beauty, but of a rather doubtful character, was induced to join them in accusing Gaudama of having violated her. She contrived to assume the appearance of a person in a state of pregnancy, and covering herself with a piece of red cloth, she went about the town, spreading evil reports respecting Budha's character. She had the impudence, even to go into the Dzetawon monastery, and ask Budha to provide a place for her approaching confinement, and likewise maintenance for herself and the child she was by him pregnant with. Such an infamous calumny did not, however, move him in the least. Conscious of his innocence, he lost nothing of his usual composure and serenity. But by the interference of the Thagia, the slander was made manifest. Two mice bit the strings that kept tied up on the abdomen, the apparatus designed to propagate the deceit, and on a sudden, the whole fell on the ground, proclaiming both the innocence of the sage, and the confusion of his enemies.

Every one, present on the occasion, gave vent to his just indignation, at such a base attempt from the part of the heretics. But Budha meekly replied; that what had just happened, was but a just retribution for one misbehavior of his own, during a former existence. At that time, he was, on a certain day, under the influence of liquor, when he chanced to meet on his way, a Pitzegabudha. Without any reason, or provocation, he abused the holy man with the lowest and coarsest expressions, and went so far as to tell him that his whole life was but a series of hypocritical actions. Turning, then, towards his disciples, he added with a grave countenance, that what they had just now witnessed, was the just punishment inflicted on him, by the influence of the demerit created and generated by his former evil doing.

On one of the middle size Pagodas, rises, instead of a cone, an obelisk, with ornaments that appear to resemble hieroglyphic figures. Some of those obelisks are considerably swelling towards the middle of their height. Great also has been the surprise and astonishment of the writer, when he observed in the same place, among the prodigious number of Pagodas, in a more or less advanced state of decay, one, not considerable by its dimensions, nor in a much ruined condition, that exhibited the solitary instance of a regular pyramid.

The eighth season was spent in the grove or forest of Tesakala, and when the rains were over, the most excellent Phra travelled throughout the country, preaching and teaching the right way to many. Countless converts entered one of the four ways, and many obtained at once the deliverance.

In the town of Santoo-maragiri, he was preaching to the benefactors who had fed him and his disciples. Among the hearers, were two persons Nakoulapita and Nakoulamata, husband and wife, belonging to the Pounha race. During a great many successive former existences, they had had the good fortune to be father, mother, uncle, aunt, &c. to Budha. During the present existence, the feeling of affection towards him, with whom they had been so long and so intimately connected, was powerfully awakened, and glowed in their hearts. Under the influence of that natural, kindly and tender feeling, they came forward and prostrating before Gaudama, said to him: dear son, how is it that you have been away from us, for so long awhile? We are so happy to see you after so long an absence. Budha remaining indifferent to such a scene and language, knew at once what were the real wants of that good couple, and in what manner he could acknowledge the great favors, he had, during former existences, received at their hands. He preached to them the most excellent law. They were thoroughly converted. The next morning, they had the happiness to supply their great teacher and his company with the choicest food.
Meanwhile they addressed him the following request: during many existences, we both have always been happily united: not a word of complaint or quarrel has ever passed between us. We pray that in our coming existences, the same love and affection may ever unite us together. Their request was affectionately granted; and Budha, in the presence of a large assembly, pronounced them blessed and happy amongst all men and women.

The son of the Ruler of the country, where these things happened, was, to his great affliction, childless. He invited Budha to come and partake of his hospitality in his house. The offer was accepted. Great preparations were made for the reception of the illustrious visitor. The Prince had some of his own clothes laid on the way that Budha was to follow, in the hope that by treading over them, he might communicate a certain virtue, whereby he would have the object of his earnest desire realized. On his arrival near the entrance of the house, Budha stopped and refused to proceed farther. Meanwhile, he beckoned Ananda to remove the clothes. This was done accordingly, to the Prince's deep disappointment. After the meal, Gaudama explained to him that he and his wife, during a former existence, had lived on eggs and had killed many birds. Their present barreness was the just punishment of their former trespassing. But their actual good dispositions having atoned for the past transgressions, they would be blessed with children. Both were overjoyed at this news. They believed in Budha obtained the state of Thautapan, and, thereby, entered into the current of perfection. Their faith in Budha's word, procured to them so happy a result.

During all the time that elapsed after the rain, Budha travelled through the country, engaged on his usual benevolent errand, and converting many, among men and Nats. In the country of Garurit, in a village of Pounhas, called Magoulia, the head man, one of the richest in the place, had a daughter, whose beauty equalled that of a daughter of Nats. She had been in vain asked in marriage by Princes, Nobles and Pounhas. The proud damsels had rejected every offer. On the day that her father saw Gaudama, he was struck with his manly beauty and meek deportment. He said within himself: This man shall be a proper match for my daughter. On his return home, he communicated his views to his wife. On the following day, the daughter having put on her choicest dress, and richest apparels, they all three went, with a large retinue, to the Dzetawon monastery. Admitted in the presence of Budha, the father asked for his daughter the favor of being allowed to attend on him. Without returning a word of reply, or giving the least sign of acceptance or refusal, Budha rose up and withdrew at a small distance, leaving behind him, on the floor, the print of one of his feet. The Pounha's wife well skilled in the science of interpreting wonderful signs, saw at a glance, that the marks on the print, indicated a man no larger under the control of passions, but a sage, emancipated from the thraldom of concupiscence. She communicated her views to her husband, who had the impudence to go to Budha's presence and renew the same offer. Budha meekly replied: Pounha, I neither accept nor decline your offer; in your turn, listen to what I have to say. He, then, went on relating how he had left the world, resisted Manh's temptation, lived in solitude for six years and freed himself from the net of passions. He concluded by stating that having become a Budha, he had forever conquered all passions. At the conclusion of the instruction, both father and mother became established in the state of Thautapyan. The damsels was highly offended at the refusal she experienced, and retained a strong feeling of hatred towards him who had declined her proffered favors. Her father took her into the Kothambi country, where she was offered to the Ruler, who smitten with her charms, elevated her to the rank of first Queen.

In the country of Kothambi, there lived three rich men. Those three men fed during the rainy season, every year, five hundred hermits who came from the Himalaya range, for the purpose of obtaining their maintenance. Those charitable laymen went over to Wethalie for the purpose of trade. There, they met Budha, and earnestly pressed him to come to their country and preach the law. The invitation was accepted. They returned home and built for the accommodation of the illustrious visitor, each of them, one monastery. When all was ready, Budha went to Kothambi, attended with five hundred disciples. He spent thither the ninth season. During his stay, he dwelt by turn, in each of the three monasteries, and was abundantly supported by the rich man in whose monastery he took his abode.

In the country of Kothambi, there were, as yet, few disciples or believers in Budha; but the number of holders of false doctrines was exceedingly great. Secretly supported by the first Queen, and actuated by jealousy against the new comers, they reviled him and his disciples in every possible way, and did their utmost, to destroy in public opinion, his rising fame. Whenever they met Budha’s disciples, they abused them with the coarsest language. Unable to bear any longer so many insults, Ananda, in the name of his Brethren, went to Budha, and asked him to remove to some other place, where they would receive a becoming treatment. But, said Budha, if we be illtreated in the new place we go to, what is to be done? We shall proceed to some other place, replied Ananda. But, retorted Budha, if in that new place, we be likewise reviled, what then? We shall, replied Ananda, remove to some other place. Budha remained silent for awhile, and casting a gentle glance on Ananda, he said to him: a little patience will save us the trouble of so many travels, and certainly procure here unto us, what we may perhaps vainly look for, any where else. By patience and endurance, the wise man conquers all his enemies. Behold the war Elephant! he plunges into the thickest of the raging conflict, regardless of the darts and arrows flying in every direction, and carries all before him. I too, the most excellent Budha, shall certainly stay here, diligently preach the most excellent law, and perseveringly labor for disentangling men from the net of passions. In no way, shall I care for the abuses, they may pour on me, and my disciples.

Not long after this, a trifling accident kindled the fire of dissention among the members of Assembly. The subject, was as usual, one of a trifling nature. It was concerning a point of discipline of scarcely any importance, infringed unintentionally by a Rahan. He was accused by one of his brethren of having committed a sin. But he replied that having done an act, in which his will had not participated, he did not consider himself guilty. Each disputant attracted to his party some Religious who supported his view of the case. The Kothambi Rahans seem to have been the cause of the disunion which prevailed in the community and soon, like a devouring flame, extended to the female portion of the Assembly. In vain, Gaudama interfered, and exhorted the two parties to patience, union and charity. In his presence, the parties were silent. But in his absence, the quarrel grew worse. At last his entreaties were unheeded and discord continued to rend asunder the bond of unity. Disgusted with such a state of things, Budha preached to the most distinguished members of the Assembly, the blessings of peace and concord. Such men as Baddia, Kimila and Anouroudhha treasured up in their heart, the instructions of their great master. But others continued the dispute. Meanwhile he resolved to separate himself for a time, from all company, and to go in a lonely spot, to enjoy the happiness of peace and meditation. He shaped his course towards the village of Palelayaka, where he received his food, and went into a grove of Sala trees, to fix his residence, at the foot of one of those trees. The villagers hearing of his intention, hastened to the spot, and built a hermit's hut for his use, and promised to supply him daily with his food.

It was in this place, that alone, delighting in the contemplation of unclouded truth, Gaudama spent the tenth season. The Rich men of the Kothambi country, hearing that Budha had departed because of the dissension that took place among the Rahans, became indignant. They openly declared their fixed intent of refusing to give anything for the maintenance of the Rahans, until they had agreed among themselves, and reconciled with their teacher. The timely threat had the desired effect. The disputants felt the unpleasant seriousness of their uneasy position. They could hold on no longer. The Rahans came to an agreement among themselves, and promised that after the season, they would go to Budha and solicit his pardon. In the forest of Palelaka, there lived a certain Elephant, much advanced in merits, which went to Budha, and during three months, ministered to all his wants, as a most affectionate and devoted disciple would do towards a beloved master.

The three months of lent being completed, the rich men Anatapein made earnest enquiries with Ananda, respecting the place Budha had withdrawn to, and charged him to invite the great preacher to come back to Thawattie, and live as usual in the Dzetawon monastery. Complying with the pious wishes of the rich man, Ananda took with himself 500 Rahans, and went to the solitude of Paleliaka. He was likewise followed by the 500 refractory Rahans of Kothambi, who had come to We-thalie. The Ruler of the country and Anatapein had refused at first to receive them. But the prohibition had been removed, on account of their repentance. He approached alone the place, Budha was living. After the usual prostrations, Gaudama inquired whether he had come alone. He replied that there were with him many of his faithful disciples, and the Kothambi Rahans. The latter came with the express purpose of asking his pardon, and a firm resolution to yield, hereafter, a perfect obedience to all his commands. Budha desired them to appear in his presence. They came; were they well received, and their misbehavior was forgiven. Gaudama explained to them the great advantage of shunning bad company, and of living in retirement. The hearers were fully converted and established in the state of Thatapun. Budha on his return to Wethalig, continued preaching in every direction, and led to the deliverance a great number of Men, Nats and Brahmas. The stay in the Dzeta- won monastery was not very long. Budha went into the Magatha country, to a Pounha village named Nala. Not far from that village, there is the Deckinagiri, or southern mountain, with a monastery. Into that place Budha spent the eleventh season.* His supporters were the Pounhas of the village. The chief occupation of those men, was the tillage of the fields. Gaudama took

* The few particulars that have been gathered respecting the mode that Budha followed in disseminating his doctrines, exhibit him in the light of a zealous and indefatigable preacher. We see him passing from one place into another with the sole purpose of instructing the ignorant and pointing out to them, the way leading to the deliverance. Behar and Oude appear to have been the seat of his labors, and the scene on which he acted in behalf of all, without any distinction of condition, caste, or sex. Individuals in the humblest walks of life, men engaged in wicked practices, women of abandoned character, are all, to an equal degree, the object of his tender solicitude. They are all summoned to come at his feet, and partake in the blessings that he has in store for them. Gaudama was, to an eminent degree, an earnest and fervent propagandist. This is a striking feature in his character, which distinguishes him, not only from all his cotemporaries, but also from all the philosophers that have appeared throughout the Indian Peninsula. All those sages aimed at becoming the heads of schools, but none of them thought of promulgating a code of morals, intended for the whole human race. Gaudama has the honor of being the first who, with enlarged views, looked upon his fellow men as equally entitled to the benefit of his instructions. His love of all men prompted him to undergo all sorts of fatigue for procuring to them, what he imagined to be, a great boon. In making this statement, we have no intention to pass an opinion on the doctrines of the founder of Budhism, we merely bring forward to the notice of the reader, a peculiar characteristic of that sage, which, in our humble opinion, enables to account for the extraordinary spread of Budhism from the banks of the Jum, to the Japanese Archipelago. The tenets of that Creed have become popular because they were intended for all. False though they be, particularly in what has a reference to dogmas, they were accepted by the masses, because there were no other proffered to them. The disciples of Gaudama must have been well received in the various places they went to; for they showed a disposition of mind quite unknown in those days, viz: a lively interest for the welfare of all. This zeal which appeared so conspicuously in Gaudama, and during the first ages of Budhism, has become all but totally extinct. There is no desire from the part of those who, in our days, follow that creed, to propagate its tenets among other nations or tribes.

On a certain day, Budha went into the fields, where he met a Pounha, with whom he began to converse, with the intention of ultimately preaching to him the holy law. He spoke, at first, on the subject of his daily labor, his bullocks, plough, the seed, and the harvest, which supplied the Pounha and his family with their daily food, during the year. He added: I, too, am a laborer, provided with the seed, and all the implements necessary for carrying on tillage. The Pounha surprised at what he heard, asked Budha in what place he had left his bullocks, the seed, the plough, &c. The latter coolly replied: all these things are with me at present. Hearken, O Pounha, to what I am about to state. The seed is that fervent desire, that benevolent disposition, which prompted me at the feet of the Budha Depinkara, to ask for the Budhaship: it is the science which I have gathered under the tree Bodi. The rain water, is that uninterrupted series of good works, performed by me, until I have become a Budha. They have been as the means of watering the good seed which was in me. The knowledge or science, and wisdom are as the yoke, as well as the plough's shaft. The heart or the knowing principle which is in me, represents the reins that serve to guide the bullocks. The teeth of the plough represent the diligence that must be used in attending to the eradicating of the principle of demerits and of bad works. The plough's handle, represents the guiding principle of the law, which enables me to remove all that is bad, and promote what is good. The food which you, O Pounha, derive from your exertions, represents the pure relish which is tasted by him who is bent on avoiding evil, and doing good. When you make use of the plough, you cut or uproot all bad weeds; so it is with him who is penetrated with the full meaning of the four great truths; he cuts and uproots from himself the wicked inclinations and low propensities that are in him. When the labor of the field is over, you unyoke your bullocks and leave them to go withersoever they please; so it is with the wise man. By application to invigorating the principle of good, that leads to perfection, he lets go the opposite principle which gives rise to all imperfections. The bullocks have to work hard, to complete the work of tillage. So the sage has to struggle hard, to till perfectly and cultivate thoroughly the soil of his own being, and reach the happy state of Neibban. The husbandman who labors so much for bringing his field in a position to receive the seed, and in every way to favor its growth, is imitated by the true sage who endeavors to free himself from the miseries attending existence, to advance in the way of merits, by the practice of good works, and who thirsts after the happy condition of the perfect. He who works in the field, is some times disappointed, and feels occasionally the pangs of hunger. He who works in the field of wisdom, is exempt from all miseries and afflictions. He eats the fruit of his labor. He is fully satiated when he beholds Neibban. It is in this manner, O Pounha, that I am a true husbandman, and am always provided with all the implements necessary for the tillage of man's soul. The Pounha delighted with such doctrine, became a convert, and professed his belief unto Budha, the law and the assembly. Subsequently he applied for admittance into the assembly, and by energetic efforts in the arduous work of meditation, he became, at last, a Rahanda.

When the rains were over, Budha travelled through the country, preaching the most excellent law, with the happiest results. He went to the town of Satiabia, in the Kosala country. There he received from a Pounha of Waritzaba, an invitation to go to that place. The invitation was graciously accepted. In that town, he spent the twelfth season. Great many Pounhas were enlightened and converted by professing their firm adherence to the three precious things. The vile Manh Nat did his utmost to thwart the beneficial results from Budha's preachings. A great dearth prevailing in the country, he did all that he could to starve the most excellent Budha and all his followers. But he was frustrated in his iniquitous design, by the charity of 500 horse merchants who had come from Outharapata, and were, then, staying in Waritzaba.

Budha leaving this country, shaped his course through the great Mantala country; he travelled by the shortest route, a distance of 500 yondzanas. He started on the day after the full moon of Tabodway, and spent nearly five months in this voyage. He reached the banks of the Ganges at Gayagati, where he crossed the mighty stream and went to Benares. He had not been long in that city, when he recrossed the Ganges and went to Wetthalie, dwelling in the Gootagarathala monastery. Thence he went into Thawattie, preaching through all the places he visited. When he was in the Dzetawon monastery, he delivered the Maha Rahula instruction, for the benefit of his son Rahula, who then was 18 years old.

After a rather short stay in Thawattie, Budha went to the town of Tsalia. The inhabitants built for him a monastery, on a hill, not far from the town, and liberally supplied him, with all that he wanted. Pleased with the good reception the people gave him, Gaudama spent, on that spot, the thirteenth season. He went to receive his food in the village of Dzantoo. Thence travelling through the country, he reached the banks of the river Kimikila, and enjoyed himself in a beautiful grove of Mango trees. The disciple Meggia being too much taken up with the beauty of the place, eagerly wished to remain hither for some time. As a punishment for such an inordinate attachment to a particular spot, he who had renounced the world and the gratification of passions, felt, on a sudden, a strange change to take place in him. A flood of concupiscence inundated his soul. Budha, who saw what was taking place in Meggia, gave him an instruction on the contempt of the things of this world, and entirely cured him from his great spiritual distemper.

Thence he proceeded to Thawattie, into the Dzetawon monastery, where he spent the fourteenth season. The great disciple Thariputra, with five hundred Religious, was spending the season in a neighboring village. The people were so much pleased with him and his company, that they offered to each of them, a piece of yellow silk. Some Religious jealous of the great disciple, came to Budha, and accused him of covetousness. Budha fully justified his great companion and commended the liberality of the donors, who had thus an opportunity of satisfying their liberality and gaining merits.

The Thamane Rahula was then 20 years old. Having reached the canonical age, he was elevated to the dignity of Patzin. The young Religious could scarcely defend himself from a certain feeling of vanity, on account of his father's dignity, and of his own personal mien and bearing which he was very fond of admiring. Budha was intimately acquainted with what was going on in Rahula's soul. He preached to him the contempt of self and of all varieties of form. The instruction was so impressive, that it lead the young hearer to the state of Rahanda. On a certain night, that Raouda was sleeping near the door of Gaudama's private appartment, Manh Nat wishing to frighten the young Rahanda, created the likeness of an Elephant which keeping his trunk over his head, suddenly made a frightful noise. Budha who was inside, saw clearly that this was but a temptation of the vile Manh. He said to him: O wretched one, are you not aware that fear is no longer to be found in him who has become a Rahanda. Manh discovered, vanished away, covered with shame and confusion, at the abortiveness of his malicious attempt.

In the same year, Budha went to Kapilawot, which is in the Thekka country, and took his residence in the Niganda monastery, situated close to the banks of the river Rohani. At that place he spent the fifteenth season. On a certain day, his cousin Mahanan, the son of Thoukaudana, came to the monastery and having paid his respect to his illustrious relative, took the liberty to propose to him the four following questions: 1—In what consists the fulfilment of the religious duties? 2—what is meant by the religious disposition? 3—what is the real renouncing? 4—and what is the true knowledge?

Budha replied in the following manner: the fulfilment of the religious duties consists in observing carefully, the five precepts obligatory to all men. The religious disposition, is but a lovely inclination and affection for all that refers to Budha and the law that he has published. He who possesses it, experiences a continual longing for the acquisition of merits. The renouncing is that disposition a man is habitually in, when he finds his pleasure, in parting with his riches for the purpose of relieving the needy, and bestowing alms on the members of the assembly. Finally, wisdom consists in making oneself perfectly acquainted with what can procure merits for the present and the future; under its influence, man acts up to that knowledge, and also attends with the utmost diligence, to what may put an end to the law of miseries.

Even among his nearest relatives, Budha was doomed to meet with the bitterest enemies. Thouppabuda who was at once his uncle and his father-in-law, bore unto him a deadly hatred, and secretly harbored in his heart, a sentiment of revenge for two principal reasons, because his daughter Yathandara had been abandoned by Ganda-ma, when he left his palace and began the life of an aspetic; and also for having admitted his own son Dewadat, among the members of the Assembly. Having been informed that on the following day, Budha would direct his steps towards a certain quarter of the town, to beg his food, Thouppabuda partook largely of intoxicating liquor, to nerve himself to the execution of the design he had in his mind, and went out in the direction Gaudama was expected to come. As soon as he saw him drawing near, he planted himself in the middle of the road, barring the passage, and loading his great relative with abuses. Budha stopped awhile, without showing the least sign of emotion. Then turning to Ananda, he said: great is the crime of my uncle; seven days hence, he shall be swallowed up alive by the earth, at the foot of the great stair case of his palace. On this fearful prediction being reported to Thouppabuda, he laughed and stated that he would stay during eight days, in the upper story of his palace, and belie his nephew's prediction. Despite the precautions that he took, the fatal prediction was literally fulfilled. The unfortunate unrepenting Prince saw the earth bursting open under his feet, and he was precipitated to the very bottom of the Awindzi hell. Budha profited of the awful punishment that had befallen a Prince of his family, to exhort Mahanan to take a firm asylum into the three precious things, to bear a sincere love, and an affectionate fondness to all that related to the law, and its practices,

Up to the present period of his life, Budha had reserved to himself the right of preaching the law to, and extolling the merits of, those who had brought him his food, after having partaken of their liberal donation. This instruction may be properly called the sermon of thanksgiving. It is called Anou-mau-dana. Now he allowed his disciples to do the like, and repay the generosity of their benefactors, be distributing unto them the knowledge of truth.

At that time, Budha preached the four laws of A-sawyau, or the four bands that retain a being in the vor-
ex of existences. From Kapilawot, Budha returned to Thawattie in the Dzetawon monastery. At that time, a Nat had proposed four questions to his companions, which they had not been able to answer. They were subsequently communicated to all the denizens of the six seats of Nats, but no one had been able to solve the difficulty. Not knowing what to do, they agreed to refer the particulars to the most excellent Budha, then in the Dzetawon monastery. A deputation was forthwith sent to him with the view of proposing to him the puzzle, and entreated him to descend to give the much desired solution. The members of the deputation having duly paid their respects, said to him: O most excellent Phra: which is the best thing to be bestowed in alms? Which is the most savory and relishing of all things? Which is the most pleasurable? Which is the best and the fittest thing to put an end to passions? To these four questions, Budha answered by one word: the law. Addressing himself both to the Nats, and to his assembled disciples he added: the giving of alms, though good in itself, cannot introduce a being in the path that leads to the deliverance. The law alone can afford such a benefit. The preaching of the law, and the exertions in communicating its knowledge to others, is, therefore, the most excellent alms. All that in this world confers pleasure to the senses. It is but a means to plunge man in the vortex of existences, and thereby in all miseries. On the contrary the hearing of the law rejoices the heart, to such an extent, as, often, to open a spring of joyful tears: it destroys concupiscence, and leads gradually out of the whirlpool of existences. It establishes man into the state of Arahat, which is the end of all passions. The law, therefore, is the most savoury, the most pleasing thing, leading beings to the cessation of all miseries. You, my beloved disciples, exert yourselves in making known by your preaching, the said law to all beings. This is the most excellent alms that you can bestow on the beings that inhabit the three different states of Men, Nats and Brahmas.
Budha soon left Thawattie and went to Alawee. A Biloo was in the habit of eating every day some children of that place. Owing to the ravenous and horrible appetite of the monster, all the children had been eaten up: there remained but that of the King, who was, on the following day, to be given over to him. Budha reviewed as usual, on a certain morning, the condition of all beings. He saw the sad position of the King of Alawee and of his son. He resolved to profer assistance to both, and also to convert the Biloo. He arrived in the country of Alawee, where he was received with every mark of respect. He, forthwith, went into the forest, where lived the monster. At first, he met with a most determined and violent opposition. But opposing to his enraged antagonist, meekness, patience and kindness, Budha gradually softened that terrible nature. Concealing affectedly the change which was taking place in him, almost against his perverse inclination, the Biloo said to Budha: I have put certain questions to many famous ascetics, but they have not been able to answer them. On seeing their utter incapacity, I have seized them, torn their bodies into pieces, and flung their quivering limbs, into the Ganges. Such shall be your fate, O Gaudama, if your science fails you on this occasion. By what means can a man get out of the stream or current of passions? How can he cross over the sea of existences? How can he free himself from the evil influence? How shall he be able to purify himself from the smallest stain of concupiscence? Budha replied: listen, O Biloo, to my words: my answer shall fully satisfy you. By faith in, and affection for, the three precious things, man escapes from the current of passions. He who applies himself with a diligent earnestness, to the study of the law of merits, passes over the sea of existences. He who strives to practice the works that procure merits, frees himself from evil influence, and from the attending miseries. Finally the knowledge of the four meggas or ways to perfection, procures perfect exemption from the least remnant of concupiscence. The Biloo, delighted with what he had heard, believed in Budha, and soon was firmly established in the state of Thautapan. On that spot, where so glorious and unexpected a conversion had taken place, a monastery was erected. Budha spent herein the sixteenth season. As usual, myriads of Nats and men who had heard his preachings, obtained the deliverance.

From Alawee, Budha went to Radzagio and spent the seventeenth season in the Weloowon monastery. During that season, a famous courtezn, named Thirima, sister of the celebrated physician Dzewaka, renowned all over the country for her wit and the incomparable charms of her person, wished to show her liberality to the disciples of Budha. Every day a certain number of them went to her dwelling, to receive with their food, abundant alms. One of the pious mendicants, in an unguarded moment, moved by an unholy curiosity, looked at her, and was instantly smitten by her charms. The moral wound was widened and deepened by a fortuitous occurrence. On a certain day, Thirima fell sick. But she did not relax in her daily work of charity. Though weak and in her negligé, she insisted on the mendicants being introduced in her room, that she might pay her respects to them. The unfortunate lover was among the company. Her incomparable charms were heightened by her plain dress and drooping attitude. The poor lover went back with his brethren to the monastery. The arrow had penetrated to the core of the heart. He refused to take any food, and, during some days, completely estranged himself from the society of his Brethren. Whilst the intestine war raged in his bosom, Thirima died. Budha desirous to cure the moral distemper of the poor Religious, invited King Pimpasara to be present, when he would go with his disciples, to see the remains of Thirima. On the fourth day after Thirima's death, he went to her house with his disciples. There was laid before them her body, with a livid appearance, all swollen. Countless worms already issuing out through the apertures, rendered loathsome its sight, whilst a horrible stench almost forbade a standing close to it. Budha coolly asked the King: what is that object which is stretched before us? Thirima's body, replied the King. When she was alive, retorted Budha, people paid a thousand pieces of silver to enjoy her for a day. Would any one take her now for half that sum? No, replied the King; in all my kingdom there is not one man who would offer the smallest sum to have her remains; nay, nobody would be found who would be willing to carry her to any distance, unless compelled to do so. Budha, addressing the Assembly, said: behold all that remains of Thirima, who was so famous for her personal attractions. What has become of that form which deceived and enslaved so many. All is subjected to mutability: there is nothing real in this world. On hearing the instruction, 82,000 persons, obtained the knowledge of the four truths. The Rahan who, because of his passion, would not eat his food, was entirely cured of his moral distemper, and firmly established in the state of Thautapan. All this happened whilst Budha spent his seventeenth season, in the bamboo grove monastery.

When the season was over, he went, as usual, to preach in every direction, and returned to Thawattie, in the Dzetawon monastery. His stay in that place was not long. He undertook another voyage to Alawee. He was received with the greatest demonstration of joy by the people, who gladly ministered to all his wants. On a certain day, that he was to receive large offerings from the people, and preach to them on that occasion, it happened that a poor Pounha, who was very desirous to hear his instructions, was informed, at an early hour of that very day, that one of his cows had gone astray from the herd and could not be found. Hereupon he felt greatly aggrieved. He was afraid to let go the golden opportunity to hear the instruction. However, he trusted that by making the utmost diligence, he would be back in time. He ran in all haste, until he found the strayed animal, and brought it back. It was nearly midday, when he returned to the town. Though pressed with the pangs of hunger, and overwhelmed with fatigue, he went straight forward to the place where the congregation was assembled. The offerings had been brought a long while ago; the people motionless, stood respectfully, with their joined hands, in the presence of Budha, who, contrary to the general expectation, remained perfectly silent. With his supernatural vision, he had seen the perfect dispositions of the poor Pounda. He would have him to share in the blessing of his instruction. As soon as the Pounda had taken his place among the hearers, Budha casting a benevolent glance over him, beckoned him to come near his person. Meantime, he ordered some of his disciples, to bring the poor man some food, because he was very hungry; and he would not condescend to begin the instruction, till the man had been relieved from the pangs of hunger, by a good meal. When the preaching was over, several Rahans ridiculed the attention paid by their master, to a common man. Budha knowing their innermost thoughts, spoke to them by way of an instructive rebuke: Beloved sons, you seem to be surprised at my behavior towards that poor Pounda. But I have perceived, at once, the superexcellent dispositions of that man, his craving for the holy law and his lively and strong faith in me, which prompted him to lay no stress on hunger, nor on fatigue, and to make no account of his personal discomforts, for satisfying his earnest longings for the law. On that occasion an immense number of hearers were converted.

Budha went to a monastery built on a hill, near the town of Tsalia, where he spent the eighteenth season. In that town, there was a weaver who had one daughter, who followed the same profession as her father. The damsel was very desirous to hear Budha's preachings; but on the day that Budha was to come in the town, to deliver instructions to the people, it happened she had to finish the weaving of a piece of cloth that was urgently required by the owner. She then said to herself: I will exert myself with so much diligence, that I will be enabled both to finish my work, and listen to my teacher's preaching. She set instantly at work, winded up the thread on the quill, and took it with her, to carry it to the shed where was her father's loom. On her way to the shed; she had to pass near the place, where a motionless congregation stood before Budha, eagerly waiting for the words that were to fall from his mouth. She placed aside her quill loaded with thread, and squatted timidly behind the last rank of the congregation. Budha had seen at a glance the perfect dispositions of the young girl. It was chiefly for her benefit that he had undertaken a long journey and come over to that place. As soon as he saw her, he bade her to draw nearer to him. The injunction was joyfully complied with. With an encouraging tone of voice, Budha asked her whence she came, and whither she was going. The damsel modestly answered that she knew whence she came, and also whither she was going: at the same time she added, that she was ignorant of the place she came from, and of the place she was going to. On hearing the apparently contradictory answer, many of the hearers could scarcely refrain from giving vent to indignant feelings. But Budha who had fathomed the girl's wisdom, desired them to be silent. Then turning towards his young interlocutor, he desired her to explain the meaning of her answer. She said: I know that I come from my father's house, and that I go to our loom's shed: but, what existence I have come from, to this present one, this I ignore entirely. I am, likewise, uncertain about the existence that shall follow this one. About these two points, I am completely ignorant; my mind can discover neither one nor the other. Budha extolled the wisdom of the damsel, and forthwith began his instruction. At the conclusion, she was firmly grounded in the state of Thautapan. She withdrew immediately, took up her quill, and went to the shed. It happened that her father was asleep having his hand on the loom's handle. She approached the loom, and began to arrange the thread. Her father awaking suddenly, pushed inadvertently the part of the loom his hand was laid upon, and struck his daughter in the chest. She fell down and instantly expired. Overwhelmed with grief, the unfortunate father poured a flood of tears over the lifeless corpse of his daughter. Unable to console himself, he rose up and went to Budha, in the hope of receiving some comfort at his feet. Budha affectionately received him, and, by his good instructions, relieved him from the load that pressed on his heart; and gradually enlightening his mind by the preaching of the four great truths, he gently infused in his heart and his soul, that sweet joy which wisdom alone can impart. The Weaver resolved to abandon the world, asked for admittance into the Assembly, and, not long after, he became a Rahanda. This conversion was followed by that of great many others.

Budha returned to Radzagio, and spent the nineteenth season in the Weloowon monastery. The season being over, Budha went into the districts of Magatha, preaching in all places. Previous to that time, there lived at Radzagio, a rich man who had an only daughter, who was brought up with the greatest care, and the utmost fondness. She lived in the upper apartments of a splendid dwelling. On a certain day, at an early hour, in the morning, she was looking on the people that flocked from the country into the town. She saw, among many, a young hunter, driving a cart loaded with venison. She much admired his fine energetic appearance. She was instantly enamored of him, and made all the necessary arrangements to elope with him. She succeeded, married the hunter and had by him a large family. Passing, on one day, through a forest, the most excellent Budha chanced to meet with a deer which was caught in the net of a hunter. Moved with feelings of commiseration, he helped the poor beast to get out of the meshes. After this benevolent action, he went to rest under a tree. The hunter soon made his appearance, and to his great dismay, at once discovered that some one had deprived him of his prey. Whilst he was looking about, he saw Budha with his yellow dress, calmly resting under the shade of a large tree. This is, said the hunter to himself, the man who has done the mischief: I will make him pay dear for his undue interference. Hereupon he hastily took up a arrow and placed it on the bow, with the intention of shooting dead the evil doer. But, despite his exertions, heightened by the thirst for revenge, he could not succeed: both his hands were seized with a sudden quivering: and his feet appeared as nailed to the ground. He stood motionless in that attitude. Absorbed in meditation, Budha was not aware what was going on, so close to him.

The sons of the hunter, as well as their wives, grew very much troubled at seeing that their father was not returning at the usual hour, from visiting his nets. They feared that some untoward accident had been met by him. They armed themselves and went in search of him. They soon came to the spot were they saw the sad position of their father. At the same moment, perceiving a yellow dressed individual, they hastily concluded that by the power of some charms, he had brought their father into this miserable condition. They made up their mind to kill him. But whilst they were preparing to put their cruel design into execution, their hands, suddenly benumbed, could not grasp the weapons, and they all stood motionless and speechless. Awaking, at last, from contemplation, Budha saw the hunter and all his family standing before him. Taking compassion on them, he restored them to their ordinary condition, and preached to them. They all fell at his knees, craved his pardon, believed in him and became fervent Upasakas.

Budha returned to Thawattie to spend the 20th season in the Dzetawon monastery. It was at that period that there happened a remarkable change in the management of the domestic affairs of Gaudama. Up to the present time, no one among the Religious had been specially appointed to attend on Budha and minister to his wants.
But some of them, as circumstances occurred, undertook the agreeable and honorable duty of serving him. However, human nature will occasionally let appear, even among the best of men, some marks of its innate imperfections. On two occasions, the Rahans who followed Budha, and carried his mendicant's pot and a portion of his dress, wished to go in one direction, whilst Budha desired them to follow another. They had the impudence to part company with him. Both paid dearly for their disobedience. They fell into the hands of robbers who took away all that they had, and beat them severely on the head. This two fold act of insubordination, painfully affected Budha. He summoned all the Religious into his presence, and declared that being old, he wished to appoint one of them, to the permanent office of personal attendant on himself. Thariputra and Maukalan immediately tendered their services with a pious and loving earnestness. But Budha declined to accept their offer, as well as that of the 80 principal disciples. The reason was that their services were required for preaching to the people, and laboring with him, for the dissemination of the true science, among men. Some of the disciples urged Ananda to volunteer his services; but, out of modesty, he remained silent. Then, he added that, should Budha be willing to accept his humble services, he knew his heart's dispositions and his willingness to attend on him on all occasions; he had but to signify his good pleasure. As to him, he would be too happy to accept the office. Budha expressed his readiness to confer on him the honorable employment. He was formally appointed and nominated Phra's attendant, and during the 25 remaining seasons, he acted as the beloved and devoted attendant on Budha's person. Through him alone, visitors were ushered into Budha's presence, and orders were communicated to the members of the Assembly. Gaudama was then 55 years old.

On a certain day, he went to the village of Dzantoo, for the purpose of collecting alms. Manh Nat, his inveterate foe, entered into the heart of all the villagers to prevent them from giving alms to the mendicant. He succeeded so well in his wicked design, that no one noticed Gauḍama's passage through the street, nor gave him alms. When he drew near to the gate, Manh stood by the side of the street and asked him with a sarcastic tone, how he felt under the pangs of hunger? Budha replied to him that he could, by entering into the state of perfect trance, remain, like the great Brahma, without using material food, feeding only as it were, on the inward happiness, created by the immediate sight of unclouded truth. Five hundred young virgins, who happened to return from the country into the place, prostrated before Budha, listened to his instructions, and reached the state of Thautapan.

On leaving the place, Budha happened to travel through a forest, which had become an object of terror to all the people of Kothaṅ, as being the favorite haunt of Ougalimala a famous robber and murderer. The Ruler of the country, Pasenadi had heard, from the windows of his palace, the cries of his alarmed subjects. Despite the many remonstrances that were made, concerning the dangers of such an attempt, Budha went straight forward to the den of the formidable man, who enraged of such a presumptuous boldness, was preparing to make him pay dear for his intrusion. But he had to deal with an opponent that could not easily be frightened. To his threats and attempts, to inflict harm, Gaudama opposed the meekest composure, the mildest expressions, and an unalterable patience. Softened by the kindness of his opponent, Ougalimala altered the tone of his voice and showed signs of respect to Budha. The latter quickly perceiving the change that had taken place in the robber's soul, preached to him the law and made of him a sincere convert. Coming out from the forest which had been the seat of so many crimes, he followed Budha with the behavior of an humble disciple. The people of Kosala could scarcely give credit to the change that had taken place in Ougalimala. In a short time, he became a Rahanda and died not long after he had become perfect. The members of the assembly were, on a certain day, talking among themselves about the place he had probably migrated to. Budha, who had overheard their conversation on this subject, said to them: Beloved Bickus, the Rahana Ougalimala, who has died a little while after his conversion, has reached the deliverance. His conversion has been, at once, prompt and perfect. He was very wicked previous to his conversion, because he never met but with wicked and perverse associates, the company of whom led him into all sorts of disorders. But he has no sooner had the good fortune to meet me, hear my instructions, and converse with you, that he has, at once, believed in my doctrine, adhered to me with all his might, and entered into the way leading to perfection. He has strenuously labored to destroy in him the law of demerits, and has, thus rapidly, reached the summit of perfection.

Chapter XII.

Budha is slandered in Thawattie—Questions put to him by a Pounha—Story of Anatapein's daughter—Conversion of a Pounha whose navel emitted rays of light—Blanc in a great part of Budha's life—Story of Dewadat—His jealousy towards Budha—His friendship with Prince Adzatathat—His ambition—His attempt to kill Budha—His miserable end.

Whilst the most excellent Budha was in the Dzetawon monastery, the heretics of Thawattie made another attempt to lower, nay, to destroy his reputation. They prevailed upon Thondaric, a woman entirely devoted to their interests, to spread the rumour that she had spent a night, in the appartments of Budha. When the calumny had been noised abroad, they suborned a gang of drunkards to whom they promised a large sum of money, if they would do away with the instrument of the slander. They accordingly selected a favorable opportunity, killed Thondarie and threw her body into a cluster of bushes, close to the monastery. When the crime had been perpetrated, the heretics raised a cry all over the country, inquiring about Thondarie. She could no where be found. Search was made in every direction, until at last, by the secret directions of their emissaries, the body was found on the spot where it had been apparently concealed. The party hostile to Budha, laid the crime at his door. The King of the country urged on by them, ordered a strict inquiry to be made. The infamous trick was at last discovered in the following manner. The perpetrators of the deed happened to go into a drinking place. Heated by the liquor they had taken, they began to accuse each other of having killed Thondarie. Their conversation was overhead by one of the King's servants, who had them arrested and led to the palace. The King asked them: wicked men, is it true that you have killed the woman Thondarie? They answered: it is true, we have killed her. Who advised you to commit the murder? The Deity teachers, who have paid us one thousand pieces of silver. Indignant at such a horrible deed, the King ordered the murderers and their advisers to be put to death. Their punishment consisted in their being buried in the earth up to their waist. They were subsequently covered with a heap of straw, which being set fire to, they were burnt to death. Budha told his disciples that what had happened on this melancholy occasion, was but a just retribution for his having, in a former existence, been drunk, and, in that state, abused and slandered a holy personage.

In one of his preaching excursions, Gaudama converted a distinguished Pounha who asked him: illustrious Budha, what has the great Brahma done, to merit the extraordinary glory that encompasses his person, and the unsurpassed felicity that he enjoys? To whom he answered: the great Brahma, during several existences, has bestowed abundant alms on the needy, delivered many people from great perils, and delighted in giving instruction to the ignorant. Such meritorious deeds have procured for him the transcendent rank that he occupies, and secured to him, for an immense period of time, the matchless happiness that he possesses.

Two rich men, one of Thawattie, and the other a denizen of the Ougga city, had, in their youth, when engaged in their studies, promised each other, that he who should have a daughter would give her in marriage to the son of the other. When they had grown up, the rich man of Thawattie became a disciple of Budha, but his friend followed the teachings of the heretics. In due time, Anatapein, for such was the name of the former, had a beautiful daughter. His friend Ougga had also a fine grown up son. It came to pass that Ougga, on a certain day, arrived from his place with five hundred carts of goods, to Thawattie for the purpose of trading. He lodged, as a matter of course, in his friend's house. During the conversation, Ougga reminded his host of their former promise, and declared that he would be too happy to have it fulfilled without delay. Anatapein having consulted his wife and daughter, and secured their consent, agreed to the proposal, that was made to him. The pious rich man, however, was somewhat concerned respecting the dangers of his daughter's position, in the midst of upholders of false doctrines. He gave her a retinue of female attendants, who could, by their advice and conversation, maintain intact, in her, the faith in Budha. When the bride arrived, after a long journey to Ougga's city, she was desired by her father-in-law, to go in company of his wife, to pay her respects to his teachers, who were sitting quite naked, with disheveled hairs, in the midst of a most disgusting uncleanness, under a shed prepared for them. Unused to such an unsightly and revolting display, the modest girl recoiled back with a becoming horror, refusing even to cast a look at them. Enraged at the contempt shown to his teachers, the unnatural father-in-law threatened to send her away from his house, as being an unsuitable match for his son, Firm in her faith, she withstood all the efforts that were made, to induce her to alter her resolution, and pay attention to such individuals. She went back into her apartments. Having somewhat recovered her spirits, and regained her usual calm and serene composure, the pious young lady began to praise, in the presence of her mother-in-law and other ladies of the town, and extol the glory, modesty, meekness and all the other qualifications which adorned her great teacher and his disciples. The hearers were delighted at all that they heard, and expressed an eager desire to see them and hear their instructions.

On that very day, the compassionate Budha, as usual, was at an early hour, reviewing the beings dwelling on the island of Dzampoudipa, endeavoring to discover those that were well disposed to hear the truth. His searching glance soon discovered what was going on in the house of the richman Ougga, and the good dispositions of many of its inmates. Thither, said he, I shall hasten to preach the law, for many shall be converted. Hereupon, he summoned 500 disciples to attend him. They all took their pattas and other articles. With his company, he flew into the air and soon alighted in the court yard of the rich man's house. All were rejoiced to see Budha and his disciples. They lent a most attentive ear to his instructions. The rich man, his household, and a great number of the people of the town were converted. Anouroudha was left at Ougga, to complete, perfect and extend the good work so happily begun. Budha, in all haste, returned to Thawatte.

At that time a great noise was made throughout the country, on account of a certain Pounha, whose navel emitted a sort of light in the shape of a moon. He belonged to the party of unbelievers. He was led by them in every village and town, as a living proof of the power they possessed. At last, his friends introduced him into the Dzetawon monastery. He was no sooner introduced in Budha's presence, that the prodigy suddenly ceased. He went away, somewhat annoyed at his misfortune; but he had scarcely crossed the threshold of the monastery, that the light reappeared. Three times he came before the great Preacher, and three times, the light was completely eclipsed. No doubt could be entertained, but there was in Budha, some secret power superior to the one he possessed. The Pounha was at once disconcerted and bewildered. In his ignorance, he attributed the accident to some superior magical formula possessed by Budha, and asked him to teach him the said formula. Budha said to him: O Pounha, I possess no charm: I ignore all magical formulas. There is in me but one virtue: it is that which I have gathered at the foot of the Bodhi tree, during the forty-nine days that I have spent there, in the deepest meditation. As to what attracts now the attention of the people, on your person, you are indebted for it, to the offering of a gold coronet, in the shape of a moon, you made to a Budha, during a former existence. The reward bestowed on you for such a good work, is but a transient one. It can afford you no real, substantial and lasting happiness. Hearken to my doctrine; it will confer on you a never ending recompense. He went on explaining to him, many points of the law. The Pounha believed in Budha; nay, he applied for the dignity of Rahan, and finally became a Rahanda.

N. B.—The history of Budha offers an almost complete blank as to what regards his doings and preachings during a period of nearly 23 years, beginning with the 21st

84.—This short summary of Budha's life, indicating but little more than the names of the places where he had spent 23 seasons, and leaving us in the dark as to all the particulars regarding the 23 other seasons, is another illustration of the assertion made in some foregoing passages, that the present compilation is very concise and imperfect, supplying us with but an outline of Budha's proceedings, during the course of his preachings. He reached the age of eighty. According to the authority of this legend, Budha lived fortyfive years, after he had obtained the Budhship. He was therefore aged thirtyfive years, when he began his public life, and entered the career of preaching the law. It is not in my power to say anything positive, respecting the antiquity of this work, but the statement of the main facts is borne out by the united testimony of the Budhistic works existing in various parts, and in different languages of season, when he was 56 years old, and ending with the 44th season, having reached the patriarchal age of 79 years. So entirely are we kept in ignorance of the important transactions, that have taken place during so long a portion of Budha's life, that the writer, after having vainly consulted several manuscripts, is reluctantly obliged to come to the same conclusion as that the Burmese authors have arrived to, viz: that there is a complete disagreement as to even the names of the places where Budha spent the twenty-three remaining seasons. Out of regard for the rich man Anatapein, who for so many years had been one of his most liberal supporters, Budha spent the greatest part of the remaining seasons, in the Dzetawon monastery. During the few others, he seems to have stayed at or near Radzagio, chiefly in the Weloowon monastery. The amount of seasons spent by our Phra, from the time he obtained the Budhaship, till his death, is forty-five.

I find related, as a fact worthy of notice, the donation by a rich Widow of Wethalie, named Wisaka, of the celebrated Pouppayon monastery. It was situated not far from the Dzetawon, in an eastern direction from that famous place. It is mentioned that when Phra sailed from the Dzetawon monastery, by the eastern gate, the people of the country knew that he was going to dwell for a while into the Pouppayon monastery; when, on the other hand, he was observed to leave it, by the northern gate, all the people understood that he was undertaking a journey through the country, for the purpose of preaching. The Eastern Asia. If it be true that our Budha lived so long, we must believe that his time, during the last twenty-five years, was employed in the same benevolent undertaking, viz: to preach the sacred law and point out to beings the way, that shall lead them to the deliverance. Many volumes are full of the disputes on religious subjects, between Budha and the heretics, that is to say, his opponents. We may conclude that those controversies took place during the latter part of Budha's life, as it cannot be doubted, that they increased in proportion to the progress the new doctrines made among the people. If, however, we are in great part kept in the dark respecting the doings of the great reformer, during a long period of his public life, we are amply compensated by the account of many interesting circumstances that occurred chiefly during the last year of his earthly career.

epoch of this donation is not certain. It appears from some particulars indirectly alluded to, that it must have taken place when Budha was 60 years old.

In following our manuscript, we find inserted in this place, the detailed accounts respecting Dewadat, related by Budha himself in the Dzetawon monastery, in the presence of a large party of his disciples. The fact of Budha mentioning the name of Adzatathat, as King of Radzagio, leaves no doubt respecting the time when the awful punishment is supposed to have been meted out to Dewadat, on account of the many heinous sins laid to his charge. Adzatathat, having murdered his father Pimpathara, by starving him to death, in a prison, became King of Radzagio and succeeded him, when Budha was nearly 72 years old. He was already King, as the sequel will show, when Dewadat was, as yet, his spiritual adviser. It is probable that the following narrative was made not more than two years after the above date.

When the most excellent Budha was in the Dzetawon monastery, alluding to the sad fate that had fallen Dewadat, he related the causes that had brought on this dreadful occurrence.

At a certain time when Budha was spending a season in the Kosamby country, the people came in great numbers, every day, to the monastery, to bring abundant alms, and pay their respects to him and the Assembly. On certain occasions, they made inquiries about the most distinguished members of the Assembly, such as Thariputra, Maukalan, Anouroudda, Ananda, Bagoo, Kimila and others, giving utterance to the feelings of admiration and love, they entertained towards them. But they never took the least notice of Dewadat. The latter keenly resented the studied slight; the more so, because he thought that in his capacity of member of the assembly, and, of his royal descent, he was entitled to as much consideration as many others, who, on this twofold respect, were greatly his inferiors. He resolved to leave the company of Budha and go to some other place. He went to Radzagio, and in-gratiated himself in the favors of the young Prince Adzatathat, son of King Pimpathara. The young Prince taken up with the grave manners of the new comer, acknowledged him as his teacher, and built for him a monastery on the Yauthitha hill, close to the city.

Some years afterwards, Budha came to Radzagio to spend a season in the Weloowon monastery. Dewadat went to his monastery. Having paid his respects, in the usual maner, and occupied a becoming place, he, three times requested the permission of having an Assembly or Thingu of his own, quite distinct from the other, which was under the immediate management of Budha. On this point, he three times received a direct refusal to his demand. From that day, the jealousy he entertained towards Budha, waxed to a base envy, which soon generated in his soul, a deadly hatred against him. He made up his mind to break with Budha; all ties of spiritual relationship, and to become the chief of a new religious body.
To succeed in his impious design, he required the support of the secular arm. The King of Magatha, was in favor of Budha, but his son had warmly espoused the cause of Dewadat. In such a position, the evil disposed Dewa-dat advised Prince Adzatathat to compass the destruction of his father, in order to become King. The ambitions son followed the detestable advice, and put an end to his father's life, by starving him to death, in a prison, in spite of his own mother's exertions to save her royal husband's life.

It was in the 37th season of Budha's public mission, that Adzatathat ascended the throne of Magatha. Under the new King's anspices, Dewadat carried every thing before him, with a high hand. Assured of the new King's support, he hired 30 Bowmen and promised them an ample reward, if they killed Budha. The ruffians gladly agreed to the proposal. But when they were on the point of committing the crime, they felt themselves overawed by the presence of Budha. Instead of executing the order they had received, they fell at his feet, craved his pardon, listened to his preaching and were converted, one after the other. Disappointed on this point, Dewadat designed another plan to rid himself of the great Preacher. He watched the moment when Budha was walking at the foot of a hill, named Weitsa-gout. From the summit, he rolled a large stone that was to crush his enemy. Fortunately, on its way down the hill's side, it met with a small obstacle, on which it split into several parts. One splinter alone hurt the toe of one of Budha's feet, and severely bruised it. On hearing of such a nefarious and cowardly attempt, the disciples hastened to the spot and conveyed their beloved master to his monastery. They offered to keep guard round his person, to prevent the reoccurrence of other attempts on his life. But Budha said to them that no mortal had the power to hurt him, so far as to cause his death. He thanked them for this new token of their affectionate regard towards him, and bade them to return to their respective places. The celebrated physician Dzewaka having been sent for, applied a bandage, which being removed on the following morning, it was found, to the surprise and joy of all present, that the injured toe was perfectly cured. On another occasion, Dewadat made a last attempt on Budha's life, in the suburbs of Radzagio, by the means of an Elephant infuriated and maddened by the use of strong liquor forced into his throat. The animal was let loose in one of the streets which Gaudama was perambulating for gathering alms, in his mendicant's pot. But far from doing any injury to Budha, the Elephant having come into his presence, stood for a while, and then knelt before him, in token of respect. In this manner, Dewadat signalilly failed in this last wicked attempt.

Dewadat differed from his cousin on some points of discipline; and this difference occasioned the schism that he meditated to establish.* He had proposed to Budha to make it obligatory to all Rahans to live in forests at the foot of some trees; not to receive food from the people, in their own places, but to use only as articles of food such things as they could procure by their exertions; to use robes made up with rags collected in the dust of public thorough fares, and not such as might be offered by pious laymen; to abstain from fish and meat; and to dwell in unroofed places. Gaudama positively refused to accede to his demands. Meanwhile he meekly warned him against the sin of schism, telling him, that the commission of such an offence would throw the perpetrator, into the hell Avi-dzi, for a whole revolution of nature. Deaf to such a salutary warning, Dewadat precipitated himself in schism. He gained over to his party, five-hundred unexperienced Rahans of the Witi country, and with them dwelt in the monastery of Gayathitha. He signally failed in his attempt to draw Ananda to his side. Thariputra, by the advice of Budha went to Dewadat's place. Profiting of the time he was asleep at a distance, he prevailed upon the 500 Rahans to abandon schism, and return to Budha, the cen-dicants of the opposite party. He aimed at rivaling them in the practice of austere observances. It does not appear that he innovated in the dogmas that he had learned at the school of his great Teacher. As his royal pupil Adzatthathad, hitherto, supported the party of the Pouhbas, it is not improbable that Dewadat wished to lessen the differences between the practices and observances of the two parties, to render them less perceptible, and by doing so, to prepare the way, by gradual approximation, to a complete fusion. He exhibited himself in the character of a rigid reformer, who was displeased with the too lenient tenor of the disciplinary regulations, instituted by Budha. Be that as it may, it is certain that jealousy in the beginning, inspired him with the idea of separating from the Assembly. This first step led him farther than he, at first, contemplated. He wished to set up an Assembly, or Thinga of his own, and thereby, to place himself on a footing of equality and rivalry with his cousin. Meeting with a greater resistance than he expected, and, being convinced that he could not succeed so long as Budha would be alive, he did not shrink from making several attempts on his life. It is a fact worthy of notice, that the disturbances which took place subsequently in the Buddhist society, had their origin, in most instances, in points of discipline, of a trivial importance, which were altered or rejected by a fraction of the Assembly, whilst they were upheld, with the utmost tenacity, by the greater portion of the Rahans, as having been established by Gaudama. This reflection shall be fully corroborated by the particulars that we shall relate, on the subject of the councils or meetings held after Gaudama's death.

tre of unity, who was then in the Dzetawon monastery in Wethalle. Rising from his sleep, Dewadat fell in a paroxism of rage, at the trick played on him. He instantly resolved to start for the Dzetawon monastery, to have his revenge on Budha, for the injury done unto him. He was carried in a litter. Messengers after messengers informed Budha of the approach of his antagonist. But he calmly said to his disciples: beloved sons, do not trouble yourselves. Dewadat shall not see my face, nor enter the precincts of this place. Information was, in haste, conveyed, that Dewadat had actually reached the tank, close to the monastery, and was resting a while under the shade of a tree. Gaudama calmly gave the same assurance to his trembling disciples. But the moment of a terrible punishment was at hand. Dewadat quitting his couch, stood up for a while, to refresh his wearied limbs. But he was seen by his astonished and bewildered companions gradually sinking into the earth, first up to his knees, then up to his navel, and to his shoulders. At that moment, he humbled himself, confessed his fault, acknowledged and proclaimed the glory of Budha. He then disappeared, wrapt into a flame, and fell to the bottom of the hell Avidizi. His punishment consists in having his feet sunk ankle deep, in a burning ground: his head is covered with a red hot pan that caps his head down to the lobe of the ears: two huge red hot iron bars transfixed him horizontally from right to left: two, from back to front, and one impales him from top to bottom. He shall have to suffer in that frightful position, during a revolution of nature. But, for his tardy and sincere repentance, he shall be delivered, and, by his exertions in practising virtue, he shall become a Pitzegabudha, under the name of Atisara.

Adzatathat ruled over the two countries of Enga and Magatha. His mother was Waydahi, the sister of King Pathenadi, who ruled over the two countries of Kaci and Kosala. Adzatathat, of a bellicose temper, quarrelled with his uncle on account of some districts in Kaci, which he seized by force of arms. Unable to resist the army of his nephew, Pathenadi offered to the invader the hand of his daughter Watzera-komma. The offer was accepted, and a reconciliation followed. Three years afterwards, Pathenadi lost his throne which was seized by Meittadoubba, a son he had had by a concubine. Pathenadi went to Radzagio to ask assistance against the usurper, from his son-in-law. But he died on his way to that place.

It was under the rule of Meittadoubba, in the 44th season, that occurred the total destruction of the Thagiwi Princes of Kosala and Kapilawot, by the ambitious Adzatatthat.

Budha spent the 44th season in the Dzetawon monastery. When the season was over, he went to dwell in the Weitzagout monastery, near Radzagio. Whilst he was in that place, there was spread a rumour that Adzatatthat entertained hostile feelings towards Wethalie. Budha, then, foretold that as long as the Princes of Wethalie would be united and avoid internal strife and contention, they would be more than a match for their enemy; but should quarrel take place among them, they and their country would fall an easy prey to the invader. These words which fell from Budha’s mouth, were not forgotten by a Pounha, who was one of Adzatatthat’s ministers. He planned with his royal mother’s consent and secret encouragement, the destruction of the rulers of Wethalie, and the conquest of that country, by contriving to sow the seed of dissension among the Letziwi Princes. His plan met with a complete success some years later, about three years after Gaudama’s Neibban, as we shall have the opportunity of relating.
CHAPTER XIII.

Buddha being 79 years old, delivers instructions to the Rahans—Preachings in the village of Patalie—Miraculous crossing of the Ganges—Conversion of a courtesan—Sickness of Buddha—His instructions to Ananda—Last moments and death of Thaliputra—His eulogium by Buddha—Death of Maukalan—Reflections of Buddha on that event.

During all the time, Buddha was travelling about the country, preaching the law to those that were worthy to obtain the deliverance. He had reached his 79th year. 84(bis) At that time there were eighteen monasteries in the neighborhood of Radzagio, peopled by a great number of disciples.

84 (bis)—The first particular related at length by the compiler of this work, is one of peculiar interest. Buddha summons the Rahans to his presence, through the ever faithful and dutiful Ananda, and addresses to them instructions which form the basis of the duties and obligations of all true disciples. He styles them Bickus, that is to say, mendicants, to remind them of the spirit of poverty and of the contempt of worldly things which must ever be dear to them. The epithet beloved, is always prefixed to the word Bickus, as conveying an idea of the true and pure affection the master bore to his disciples, or rather, his spiritual children. Buddha charges them, at first, to be always diligent in holding assemblies where religious subjects should be discussed, controversies settled and unity of faith secured. This obligation has long been held as a binding one by the primitive Buddhists, as mention is always made in their books, of the three great assemblies held, during the three first centuries of the Buddhistic era, when the sacred writings were carefully revised, amended, and, as it were, purified of all spurious doctrines. It was during the last council that the canon of scriptures was adopted, and has ever since been maintained, by orthodox Buddhists. Nothing can be more wise than the desire he so strongly expresses, that no one should ever presume to alter the true and genuine nature of the precepts, by making, according to his whim, light what is heavy; or obligatory, what is but a matter of counsel. He expresses the strongest wish to see them always united among themselves, and forswear in the observance of the precepts of the law. He establishes as a fundamental principle, the obedience to superiors. There is no society of a religious character among heathens, where the various steps of the hierarchy are so well marked and defined, as in the Buddhistic institution. The whole body of religious has a general superior in each province, exercising a through control over all the houses within the limits of the province: he may be looked upon as a regular diocesan. In each house of the order, there is a superior, having power and jurisdiction over all the inmates of the place. Under him, we find the pro-number of Religious. On a certain day, Budha said to Ananda: invite all the Rahans to assemble in the Gny-Moora hall. When they had gathered together in that place, Budha repaired thither, and spoke to them as follows: Beloved Bickus, as long as you shall remain united, and continue to hold regular meetings, you shall certainly prosper and flourish: as long as you will agree together, and come unitedly to a decision on all principal affairs, so that you will impose no obligation where there is no precept, and that you will fervently observe all the commands, strictly adhering to all the rules of your profession, you will ever be in a prosperous condition. It is required that you should behave respectfully towards your superiors, yielding due obedience to their injunctions. Beware of passions and particularly of concupiscence, lest you should ever be brought under their tyrannical yoke. Love retreat and solitude; endeavour to observe your regulations, as well as all the ordinances and ceremonies of the law. Let it be a pleasure to you, to receive kindly good Religious, who may come to your monasteries, and converse with them. Avoid carefully to take pleasure in fessed members of the society, then those who may be called novices; and, last of all, the postulants and disciples allowed to wear the clerical dress, or yellow garb, without any power or authority, and being looked upon merely as students, in the way of probation. In his charge to his disciples, Budha lays much stress upon the necessity of destroying in themselves the principles of passions, and, in particular, concupiscence. The general tendency of all his preachings, is to teach men the means of freeing themselves from the tyrannical yoke of passions. No one, indeed, can obtain the state of perfect quiescence or Nibbun, unless he has annulled in himself, all passions, and thereby qualified himself for the practice of all virtues. The character of the great body of religious Buddhists, is clearly set forth in the exhortations their great master directs to them, to love retreat and solitude. The noise, tumult and bustle necessarily attending the position of a man living in the world, are entirely opposed to the acquirement of self knowledge, self possession and self control, so much required in a Religious. As long, concludes Budha, as you will remain faithful to your regulations, you will prosper, and secure to yourselves and your order, the respect and admiration of all. He winds up his speech, by exhorting them to act in a manner ever becoming their sacred calling. The greatest moralist, possessing the most consummate and perfect knowledge of human nature, could not lay down wiser regulations for setting on a firm and lasting foundation, a great and mighty institution, destined to spread itself far and wide, amidst nations and tribes, and subsist during an unlimited period:

what you do, or say, or pride yourselves in the number of your attendants. Shun bad company: apply yourselves diligently to acquire knowledge and wisdom: meditate on the great truths, mutability, pain and unreality. As long as you observe those important points and adhere to them, you shall prosper and be ever respected by all. Moreover, you will be thereby enabled to avoid all that which is base, and unbecoming in your sacred calling.

When the instruction was over, Budha called Ananda and bade him to inform the Rahans, to hold themselves ready for going to Ampalañaka.

Whilst staying in a dzeat or bungalow, Thariputra approached Budha, and having paid him his respects, said to him: O most illustrious Budha, there is no one that surpasses, or even that is equal to you, in the knowledge of the law. There has never been, nor will ever be, a being that can be compared to you. This is what elicits my admiration towards, and love for, your person. Budha replied: You are not mistaken, Thariputra,—blessed are they, who like you, know the value and the science of a Budha. Desiring to try the wisdom of his great disciple, he added: beloved son, how do you know that no one can be compared to me, and that my knowledge of the law is unrivalled? Thariputra answered: I have not the knowledge of the present, nor of the past and future, but I understand the law: through you, O most glorious Budha, I have come to that understanding: you have said that you have infinite wisdom, hence I conclude that you know the present, the past and the future—you are to be ever praised; you are most excellent, ever glorious, and free from all passions, and, therefore, to you, I attribute all the qualities inherent in him, who is invested with the Buddha-sip. From Ampalañaka, Budha went to the large village of Nalanda, where he was well received by the inhabitants. He preached to them and made a short stay with them.

Phra summoned again Ananda to his presence and directed him to tell the Rahans to be ready for a voyage, as he desired to go to the village of Patalie. When he arrived at that place, the people prepared for him the dzeat, or hall which had been erected by the order of 85—A dzeat is a building erected by the piety of Buddhists for the purpose of affording shelter and a place of rest to devotees, to travellers and strangers. These buildings are to be found at the entrance of towns, in villages, and often, in the neighbourhood of Pagodas. Those of Burmah are erected in the plainest manner. A verandah in front extends to the full length of the building; a spacious hall running parallel to the verandah, occupies the remaining space. There is no partition between the hall and the verandah. It happens sometimes that a space, at one of the hall's corners, screened by mats or dry leaves, offers an asylum to him who does not like to mix with the public. The carelessness of government in all that relates to the comfort of the people, is amply supplied by the zeal of pious laymen, who readily undertake the erection of these works of public utility, in the hope of securing to themselves the attainment of merits to be enjoyed, perhaps in this, but certainly in some future existences.

In Burmah proper, some dzeats, are for the country, beautiful buildings. The edge of the roof, and the front part are covered with a profusion of sculptures and carvings that vie with those that adorn the finest monasteries. This fact, among many, indicates the truly beneficent and philanthropic influence exercised by some tenets of Buddhism, over the followers of that creed. Pride and vain glory may have their share in the erection of these monuments of benevolence; but it is not the less certain that those, who build them, yield first and principally to a strong influence of religious feeling.

On this occasion Budha preached to the crowd. We see a line of distinction, well drawn between the Assembly of the disciples of Budha, and those we may merely style hearers. The latter are addressed by the name of darskas, meaning laymen that hear the preaching. A darska is not as yet a perfect convert, and therefore not a member of the assembly of the perfect. The darska differs from the Upasaka. The latter is not only a more hearder of the law; he is a firm believer, and fervently practices the precepts; he is among laymen, a pious Budhist; the former is not so forward; he begins to hear and believe the doctrines preached to him. He has already some faith in Budhis; he is under instruction, but he cannot be called a professed disciple. The rewards of faith are both of a natural and supernatural order. Riches, happiness, an honorable reputation, are promised to the faithful observer of the law. He is to be ever free from doubts, since faith makes him adhere firmly to all the instructions of Budhis; and after his death he shall migrate to some of the seats of Nats. The trespassing of the law is to be attended with poverty, shame and misery; doubts in an unsettled mind, and at last punishment in hell. That place of suffering is minutely described in Buddhist works. Such a description appears, in the opinion of the writer, of no importance to those who desire to understand not the superficial portion of Buddhism, but its fundamental and constitutive parts. Hell is a place of punishment and torment, as the Nats' seats are places of reward and happiness. There is no eternity of sufferings; the unfortunate inhabitant of those dark regions, is doomed to remain there, until the sum of his offences has been fully atoned for, by sufferings. When the evil influence, created by sin is exhausted, punishment ceases too, and the wretched sufferer is allowed to migrate to the seat of man, in order to acquire merits and prepare himself for happier future existences.
King Adzatathat, for receiving the Letziwy Princes of Wethalie, who had come to a conference for settling some affairs with him. Every thing being ready, they invited Phra, who by his silence testified the acceptance of their invitation. Water to drink, to rinse the mouth, to wash his hands and feet, was ready. Budha sat leaning against the central post of the hall, facing the East. His disciples remained behind in a humble posture, whereas the people sat opposite to him, having their faces turned towards the West. Phra began to explain to the numerous hearers, the demerits and punishments attending the trespassing of the precepts of the law, and the advantages reserved to those who religiously observe them. Darakas, said he, whoever trespasses the moral precepts, or is remiss in observing them, will see his happiness and fortune gradually decreasing, and his good character falling away. He will ever live in a sad state of doubt and uncertainty, and at last, when death shall have put an end to his present existence, he will fall into hell. But the lot of the faithful observer of the great precepts, shall be widely different. He will obtain riches and pleasures, and gain an honorable reputation. He will be welcome in the assemblies of Princes, Pounhas and Rahans; doubt shall never enter his mind, and his death will open before him, the way to the pleasant seats of Nats. The people were so much taken up with the preaching, that they remained in the dzeat until a very late hour. At last they paid their homage to Budha, rose up, turned on the right and departed.

It is in the following year, that the same King built the city of Patalibot or Pataliputra, on that same spot. In anticipation of that event. Budha foretold that the village would become a great city, which would obtain a

In recording the account of the conversion of a courtesan named Appaliqa, her liberality and gifts to Budha and his disciples, and the preference designedly given to her over princes and nobles, who, humanly speaking, seemed on every respect, better entitled to attentions, one is almost reminded of the conversion of a woman that was a sinner, mentioned in the Gospels.
renowned celebrity among all other cities. Thither countless merchants would resort from all parts of Dzampoodipa. At the same time he predicted the great calamities that would befall it. Internal discords, fire and inundation of the Ganges would gradually work out its total destruction.

On the morning, Budha went to the southern bank of the Ganges, and preached the law to some Pounhas, who, in return, made him offerings, and paid him much respect.
He stood on that place as if waiting for some boat to cross the mighty stream. Some of the people were looking out for boats, others were busily engaged in preparing rafts. Whilst they were making all the necessary arrangements, Budha stretched both arms and found himself, with all his Rahans, on the opposite bank.
Turning his face in the direction of those who were in search for boats and rafts, he said: he who has crossed the sea of passions, is an Ariah. The practice of the great duties are the boats and rafts whereupon he contrives to cross the sea of passions. He who desires to pass a river, wants the aid of rafts and boats which are made up of different pieces of wood joined together; but he who has become an Ariah, by the knowledge of the great roads that lead to perfection, weakens all passions and extricates himself from the whirlpool of concupis-cence; he can also, without the help of boats or rafts, cross rivers.

Phra informed Ananda that he intended to go to the village of Kantikama. Having reached that place, he explained to the Rahans the glorious and sublime prerogatives of Ariahs. Thence he passed over to the village of Nadika. It was in that place, that Ananda asked him what had become of a certain Rahan named Thamula, and of a certain Rahaness named Anaunda, who had both just died. The Rahan, answered Budha, has conquered all his passions and obtained the state of Neibban. As to the Rahaness, she has gone to one of the seats of Brah-mas: thence she will migrate to Neibban, without reappearing in the world of passions.

Budha went to the country of Wethalie, with his disciples and dwelt in a beautiful grove of Mango trees. There, he earnestly recommended to his disciples to have their minds always attentive and ready to engage in serious reflexions and meditations. In Wethalie, lived a famous courtesan named Apapalika. She had her dwelling in a beautiful place, near to an extensive and delightful grove, planted with Mango trees. She went along with others to hear the preaching of Gaudama, which had the good effect to dispose her to make a great offering to the distinguished preacher and his followers. Budha was submissively requested to come, on the following day, with all the Rahans, to receive his food. The invitation was graciously accepted. The courtesan hastened to prepare the meal for Budha and his followers. On the same day, he preached the law to a number of young Princes who had offered to supply him with his meal, on the following day. He refused to accept the invitation, because he had already promised to Apapalika, to go to her place for the same purpose. The Princes had come in their finest and richest dress: in their deportment, they vied in beauty with the Nats. But foreseeing the ruin and misery that was soon to come upon them all, Budha exhorted his disciples to entertain a thorough contempt for things that are dazzling to the eyes, but essentially perishable and unreal in their nature. The Princes were greatly disappointed at the preference given to the courtesan. On the following day, Gaudama went to the Mango trees grove, attended by all his Rahans. After the meal, Apapalika presented the grove to Gaudama, who readily accepted the pious gift.

Having remained awhile on this spot, Budha went to the village of Weluwa, where he spent the 45th and the last season. There he assembled the Rahans and said to them: I intend to spend the season on this place, but you have my permission to go and remain in the neighboring districts. The season that induced him to part, for a while, with his disciples, was the smallness of the place and the difficulty of procuring rice: whilst in the contiguous districts, there were many monasteries and an abundance of all the necessaries of life. He would not, however, allow them to withdraw to too great a distance, for two reasons: the first, because he knew that in ten moths hence, he would attain the state of Neibban, and the second, because he desired to see them assembled in his place, several times, every month, that he might have opportunity to preach the law, and deliver to them his final instructions.

Whilst he was living in that place, Budha was visited with a most painful distemper, which threw him into a state of prolonged agony. But owing to the absence of his disciples, and knowing besides that this was not the spot he was to select for his last moments, he overcame, with his incomparable power, the evil influence of the illness, and entering soon into a state of absolute trance, he remained therein for a while. Awakening from that situation, he appeared anew with his strength and usual vigor. When he came out from the monastery to take his wonted walk, Ananda went to his presence, and expressed to him, the profound grief felt by all those who had heard of his illness. When I saw you ill, O illustrious Budha, said the faithful Ananda, I was so deeply affected that I could scarcely hold up my head or draw my breath. I always cherished the hope that you would not go to Neibban, ere you had preached, once more, the law to us all. Ananda, replied Budha, why are the Rahans so much concerned about my person? What I have preached has no reference to what is within me or without me. Besides me, there is no one else to preach the law. Were they not looking upon me as such, it would be perfectly useless to attempt to preach to them. I am now very old, my years number eighty. I am like an old cart, the irons, wheels and wood of which are kept together by constant repairing; my earthly frame is kept entire and whole by the force and power of trance. O Ananda, I feel truly happy whenever I consider the state of Arahant, which is the deliverance from all the miseries of this world, whilst, at the same time, it sets a being free and disentangled from all visible and material objects. As to my disciples, as long as my religion shall last, they ought to rely on themselves, and take refuge in the law, for there is no other refuge. They will truly rely on themselves, when by a careful attention, a profound reflection and true wisdom, they will be bent upon the destruction of concupiscence and anger, and engaged on meditating upon the constituent elements of this body. Such were the instructions he gave to Ananda.

Having spent the season in the village of Welouwa, the most excellent Budha desired to return by the same way he had previously followed, to the country of Thawattie. Having arrived there, he took up his residence in the monastery of Dzetawon. 86 The great disciple Tha-

86.—The duties performed by Thariputra on this occasion, exhibit more fully than language can express, the profound veneration he entertained for Budha. He was with Maukalan the most distinguished member of the assembly; he occupied the first rank among the disciples; in point of intellectual and spiritual attainments and transcendent qualifications, he stood second to none but to Budha. Notwithstanding his exalted position, he did not hesitate to render to his superior, the lowest services. The high opinion, he had of Budha's supereminent excellencies, prompted him to overlook his own merit, and to admire, without reserve, that matchless pattern of wisdom and knowledge. Hence the inward satisfaction he sweetly enjoyed, in serving as an humble disciple, him whose unutterable perfections cast in the shade, his far famed and much praised acquirements. The unaffected humility of the disciple does the greatest credit to the sterling worth of his inward dispositions, and conveys the highest idea of the respect and veneration entertained for the master's person.

In the houses where Buddhist monks are living, it is a fixed rule that the superior and elders of the institution should be attended in the minutest services, by the youngest members wearing the canonical dress. The framer of the disciplinary regulations, intending, on the one hand, to confer dignity on the assembly, and on the other, to oppose a strong barrier to covetousness and to all inordinate worldly affections, wisely laid down a stringent order to all the members of the society, never to touch, or make use of, any article of food, dress, &c., unless it had previously been presented to them, by some attendant, layman or clerical. Hence when water is needed for washing the head, hands and feet, or for rinsing the mouth, when meals are served up, when offerings are made, a young postulant, holding a vessel of water, on the board whereupon are placed the dishes, or the articles intended riputra having just returned from begging his rice, hastened to render to Budha, the usual services. He swept to be offered, respectfully approaches the elder, kneels before him, squatting on his heels, lays before him the object to be presented, bows down with the joined hands raised to the forehead, resumes then the article with his two hands, presents it, the upper part of the body bent in token of respect, before accepting it, the elder asks: is it lawful? The answer, it is lawful, having been duly returned, the article is either taken form the hand of the offerer, or he is directed to place it within the reach of the elder. Any infraction of this ceremonial is considered as a sin. In the presence of the people, the monks never fail to submit to that somewhat annoying etiquette; their countenance, on such occasions, assumes a dignified and grave appearance, that has always much amused the writer, whenever he had the opportunity of witnessing this ceremony, which is called Akat. There is no doubt but this custom is a very ancient one. We find it blended, to a certain extent, with the manners of the nations inhabiting Eastern Asia. It is minutely described in the Wini, and carefully observed by the inmates of the Budhistic monasteries. It agrees remarkably well with the spirit that has originated, promulgated and sanctioned the disciplinary regulations. He who, in this instance, would look at the mere skeleton of the rule, without any reference to the object aimed at by the legislator, would show himself in the light of a very superficial observer. This, unfortunately, is too often the case, when we scorn and laugh at customs, the demerit of which consists simply in not being similar to ours; whereas the commonest sense tells us that we ought to judge them in connection with the institutions they have sprung from, and the end aimed at, by him who has established them.

The narrative of Thariputra's departure for his birth place and his last moments suggests to the mind several reflections. He is certain of the last day of his existence; he foresees with a prophetic glance, that his mother is well prepared for hearing profitably the preaching of the most perfect law: by the incomparable powers of his memory, he relates to Budha that a 168,000 revolutions of nature ago, he was possessed with the strong desire of seeing him and hearing his instructions, &c. How can these particulars be accounted for, according to Budhistic notions? The spring all evils or demerits flow from, is ignorance. A being is imperfect in proportion to his being sunk deeper in the bosom of ignorance. On the contrary, a being perfects himself in proportion to the efforts he makes for dispelling the thick cloud of ignorance that encompasses his mind. The more a man grows in the knowledge of truth, the farther he removes the horizon of darkness. He who has made the greatest and most persevering efforts in fervently prosecuting the work of searching truth, by studying the law that teaches the way of reaching it, contemplates and enjoys a portion of truth, commensurate to his efforts and success. A Budha, who has reached the last boundaries of knowledge, has therefore triumphed over ignorance and indefinitely enlarged the sphere of truth. He enjoys in fact, a cloudless sight of all that exists: his science is unlimited, extending over all the countless series of worlds, which in the opinion of the Budhists, are supposed to form a system of nature. Thariputra, though much advanced in perfection, had not, as yet, reached its acme. His knowledge, however, was wonderfully great and extensive—it enabled him to obtain a clear insight into the darkness of the past, and a distinct foresight of the future.
the place, spread the mat and washed his feet. These duties being performed, he sat in a cross-legged position, entered into a state of trance for a while, whence having awakened, he thought within himself as follows: has it been the custom, in former ages, that the Budhas should first arrive to the state of Neibban, or their great disciples precede them in that way? Having ascertained that the latter alternative always happened, Thariputra examined his own existence, and found that the period of his life was not to extend beyond seven days. He next considered what place was the fittest for him to depart from, and go to Neibban. The rememberance of his mother occurred to his mind, and he said to himself: my mother has given birth to seven Rahandas, and she has not as yet taken refuge in the three precious things, Budha, the Law, and the Assembly of the perfect. Is she capable of understanding and knowing the four ways to perfection? Yes, she is indeed. But who is destined to preach to her? I am the person who ought to perform such a good office to her. I will go, teach her, and by my instructions, make her renounce her false belief and embrace the true one; the very room I was born in, shall be the spot wherefrom I shall depart for the rest of Neibban. On this day, I will ask Budha's leave to go to my birth-place. Having come to this resolution, he called the faithful Tsanda, and said to him: go and summon my five hundred Rahans to attend at my place. Tsanda departed forthwith and said to the Rahans: the great Thariputra desires to go to the village of Nalanda; be ready to accompany him; arrange every thing in your own place, take up your pattas and tsiwarans. The five hundred Rahans immediately complied with the request, and were ready to follow their master. Thariputra having disposed every thing in his own cell, rose up and casting an attentive and serious look upon the place he was wont to sit on, during the day, he said: this is the last time I will ever see this place; never will I any more enter into this cell. Thereupon he left the spot, followed by the five hundred Rahans, went to the presence of Gaudama, and humbly requested permission to go and quietly enter into the state of Neibban, and thereby be delivered from the whirlpool of endless existences. Gaudama asked him, in what place he intended to obtain Neibban? Thariputra replied; in the country of Magatha, in the village of Nalanda, in the very room where I was born. You alone,

* The village of Nalanda, the site of which is at present occupied by that of Baragaon, was the birth place of the great disciple Thariputra. His illustrious companion in religion, Maukalan, was born in the village of Kau-Rita, about ½ mile south-west of that place. Nalanda, says Fa-Hian, the Chinese traveller, lies one yodrazana north of Rudzaglo, that is to say, 7 English miles according to Cunningham's measurement, and is seven yodrazanas or 40 miles distant from the true Bodi. It was the great seat of Buddhist learning, renowned all over India. Now the whole site is covered with ancient tanks and mounds of ruins on an immense extent, offering fine specimens of sculpture. The great monastery, and five smaller ones, were all within one enclosure. A row of lofty conical mounds, running north and south, 1,600 feet by 400, indicates the place and extent of those religious buildings. Outside of the enclosure, there were several temples. General Cunningham fixes the era of the construction of those edifices between A.D. 425 and 620. Among the several proofs adduced in support of his opinion, there is one that appears conclusive. Fa-Hian, who visited all the places famous in the history of Buddhism, and describes them with a minute attention, simply alludes to Nalanda, as the birth place of Thariputra, without saying a word about monasteries or temples, whilst Hwe-Thang, who visited the same spot, in the beginning of the seventh century, describes the splendid temples and monasteries which he saw, and from his statement, we infer that the principal edifices were not inferior to those of Budha Gaya, in size and height. Some of them reached to a height of 170, and 200 feet. The greatest was 300 feet high. The number and extent of the tanks is truly surprising. Two of them, in the north-east, had nearly a mile in length, while another in the south had half a mile.

The inference to be drawn from the above, is that during the 5th and the 6th century of our era, Buddhism was in a flourishing condition in the country of Magatha or South Behar, since the finest and loftiest structures in the shape of monasteries and temples, have been raised within that period, both at Nalanda and Budha Gaya. It appears that during the three first centuries of the Christian era, its fortune alternated, and met with varied results, agreeably to the favorable or unfavorable dispositions of the Rulers of the country, towards the followers of the philosopher of Kapilawot. This succession of successes and reverses reveals the important fact, that Buddhism had not struck deep root in the heart of the inhabitants of central India, since its fate depended from the will and opinions of the monarch, and was almost at the mercy of his caprices. Moreover in the country north of the Ganges, such as Wethalie, Thawattie, Kapilawot, places which had been favored with Budha's incessant preachings, religion was on its decline at the time of Fa-Hian's visit, that is to say, in the beginning of the 5th century; monasteries were deserted and emptied, edifices were crumbling down and fast decaying. In some instances, heretics, that is to say, Pounhas occu-
O Thariputra, said Budha, know the time of your entering the state of Neibban. As it is difficult, if not impossible, ever to find among all my disciples one like unto you, I desire you to preach once more to the assembly of Rahans. Thariputra knowing that Budha wished him, at the same time, to show a display of his power, prostrated before him, then rose up in the air, to the height of one palm tree, and came down to worship Budha. He rose successively seven times in the air, each time higher by the length of a palm tree, than the preceding one. On the last time, he stood in the air for a while and announced the law to the multitude of Rahans and people; then coming down he submissively requested Budha to withdraw into the interior of the monastery. Budha complying with his wishes, entered into a hall studded with diamonds. Thariputra having bowed towards the four points of the compass, said: O most glorious Budha, a hundred thousands of worlds ago, I was prostrated at the feet of Budha Anamadathi, and earnestly prayed that I might enjoy the happiness of seeing all successive Budhas that would appear during the period of my countless existences. My prayer has been heard, and now I contemplate you, O most glorious Budha, and it is for the last time, that I will ever enjoy your presence. Now, O Budha, worthy to be adored by all rational beings, I will soon be free from the tiraldom of existences, and this existence shall be the last; this my prostration before you shall be the last: the end of my life is near at hand: seven days hence, like a man who rids himself of a heavy load, I will be freed from the heavy burthen of my body. He raised his joined hands to his forehead, and, from the extremities of the ten fingers, rays of glory shot forth. In this position, he bowed to Budha and withdrawing... slowly, keeping his face towards Buddha, he continued bowing down as long as he could see him, because it was for the last time. When Buddha was out of sight, he took his departure. At the same time, the earth trembled with a tremendous shake. Buddha said to the Rahans that surrounded Thariputra: beloved children, your elder brother is departing; accompany him for a while. The people too, hearing that Thariputra was going away, came forward and gathering in large crowds, said to each other: the great Thariputra having obtained leave from Buddha, is going to prepare himself for the state of Nibbana; let us follow him that we may, as yet, enjoy his presence. Whereupon taking flowers and perfumes in their hands, they ran in the direction he had taken, with dishevelled hairs, crying aloud, with tears and lamentations, where is Thariputra? Having come up to him, they said: illustrious Rahan, you have left Buddha; whom do you now intend to join? Thariputra, full of the most affectionate feelings towards the people, mildly desired them not to accompany him farther, and he added a few last words, enjoining upon them, ever to remember Buddha and the Rahans. During seven days that his journey lasted, Thariputra never ceased to praise and exalt the affection and kindness the people bore unto him.

It was a little before dark, when the great Rahan arrived at the entrance of the Nalanda village. He went to rest at the foot of a Banyan tree, close to that spot. At that time, there came a young man, his nephew, named Ooparewata, who perceiving Thariputra, bowed down before him and stood in that place. The great Rahan said to him: is your grandmother at home? Having been answered in the affirmative, he continued, addressing him: go now to her, and tell her to prepare for me, the room wherein I was born, and a place for these five hundred Rahans that accompany me. I will stay for a while in the village, and will go to her house some what later. The lad went in all haste to his grandmother's house and said to her: my uncle is come, and is staying at the entrance of the village. Is he alone, inquired the grandmother, or has he with him a numerous retinue? For what purpose is he coming here? The young man related to her all the particulars of his interview with his uncle. Noopathari, the mother of Thariputra, thought within herself: perhaps my son who has been a Rahan from this youth, desires, in his old age, to leave his profession. She, however, gave orders to have the desired room cleaned, and a place prepared for all his attendants.

In the evening, the great disciple went to his mother's house with all his followers. He ascended to the room prepared for him, and rested therein. He bade all the Rahans to withdraw and leave him alone. They had scarcely departed, when a most violent disease seized Thariputra, which caused an abundant vomiting of blood, so great indeed, that the vessel wherein it flowed could not hold it. His mother, at the sight of such an awful distemper, did not dare to approach, but with a broken heart, retired into her own room, leaning against the door. At that time, four great Nats, a Thagia their chief, and four Brahmas came to see him and to minister unto him, during his painful illness; but he bade them to retire. His mother seeing the coming in, and going out, of so many distinguished visitors, and the respect they paid to her son, drew near to the door of his room and calling the faithful Tsanda, inquired from him wherefore so many distinguished individuals had come. Tsanda explained to her that, the great Nats, the chief of Thagias, had come to visit and assist her son and enjoy the presence of the great Rahan. Meanwhile he informed the patient that his mother wished to see him. Thariputra replied that the moment was not a proper one, and he asked from his mother the motive of her untimely visit. Beloved son, said she, I am come here to contemplate your ever dear countenance. But who are they, those that have just come to see you? Thariputra explained to her how he had been visited by Nats, Thagias and Brah-
mas. His mother inquiring from him if he were greater than any one of these, he unhesitatingly replied that he was more excellent than any of them. His mother thought within herself: if my son be so exalted, how much more must Budha be. Her heart was then overflowed with the purest joy.

Thariputra rightly understood that the moment had come to preach the law to his mother. He said to her: Woman, at the time my great teacher was born, when he obtained the supreme intelligence, and preached the most excellent law, a great earthquake was felt throughout ten thousand worlds. No one has ever equalled him in the practice of virtue, in understanding, wisdom and in the knowledge of, and the affection for, the transcendent excellencies of the state of Arahat. He then went on explaining to her the law and many particulars relating to the person of Budha. Beloved son, said his mother, delighted with all that she heard, why have you been so late in acquainting me with such a perfect law? At the conclusion of the instruction, she attained the state of Thautapan. Thariputra replied: Now, woman, I have repaid you for all the labors you have bestowed on me in bearing, nursing and educating me; depart from me and leave me alone.

87.—The conduct of Thariputra on this occasion wears an appearance of rudeness towards his aged mother, which at first hurts the feelings of human nature. But a close examination of all the circumstances connected with this last episode of the great disciple’s life, shows that he was far from being divested of filial piety. He leaves his beloved master, undertakes a long and fatiguing journey, for the sole purpose of preaching the law to his mother, and conferring upon her a boon of a greater value than that he had received from her. In return for all the favors bestowed upon him by his mother, he initiates her in the knowledge of truth, and enables her to enter into the great ways that lead to the deliverance, that is to say, to the state of Neibban. It cannot be denied that his language, on this occasion, took of an austere tone, sounding harsh to the ears of worldly men, but it must be borne in mind that Thariputra was an old ascetic, dead to all affections of nature, looking upon truth alone in an abstractively pure form, without any regard to material objects. He loved the law of truth which he had learned from Budha, and afterwards preached to others with an unparalleled zeal and fervor. The spirit of Budha lived in him: he desired to see all beings availing themselves of the means of salvation, he had in his power to impart unto them; he loved them all with an equal affection: the state Thariputra inquired from the devoted Tsanda whether the moment had come. Having been informed that it was near day-light, he requested to be set up. By his order, all the Rahans were called to his presence, and he said to them: during the last forty-four years, you have ever been with me; should I have offended any one of you, during all that time, I beg to be pardoned. The Rahans an-
of ignorance they were sunk in, deeply affected his compassionate soul, and he had but one desire, that of dispelling the thick mist of ignorance, by the pure light of truth.

When the instruction to his mother was over, Thariputra desired to be left alone with his disciples. His last words to them bespeak the humble sentiments of his mind. Though the first member of the assembly of the perfect, he begs pardon of his inferiors, for the causes of offence he may have unwillingly given them, during the period they have lived together; regardless of all the good he had done unto them, he feels that he could not well part with them, ere he had atoned to them, for any wrong, however involuntary, he might have done to some of them.

To those uninitiated in Buddhist metaphysics, it is not easy to understand and distinctly to appreciate the situation of Thariputra at his last moments. It is stated that he fell into ecstasy or trance, though his soul remained as yet connected with this world by slender and almost invisible ties. This was the last and mighty struggle of a being, to disengage himself from the trammels of existence and become free from all exterior influence. Soaring above all that exists, Thariputra’s soul passed successively through the four stages he had so often visited, whilst engaged in the arduous efforts of investigating truth, preparing to enter the fifth and last one, where she was to stay finally and perpetually, without any further change, in a state of quiescence. When the sage, during his meditations, has brought his mind to bear upon some object, he wishes to contemplate attentively, and thoroughly to comprehend, he at first gets hold of that object by his thought, he then examines it by means of reflection; the knowledge he thus acquires, never fails to create a pleasureable sensation; this pleasure or satisfaction conveys to the soul, enjoyment and happiness; he loves the truth he has discovered and he rests fixedly in it. This is the last stage he ever can or wish to reach. What has human mind, indeed, to do, after having found truth, but to cling to it, and remain ever attached to it. During the last trance, Thariputra with his almost immensely developed mental faculties, knew comprehensively truth, reflected on it, felt a pleasure in considering it, enjoyed it, or rather fed upon it, and at last adhered so perfectly to it, that he became, as it were, merged into it. He then had reached the state of Neibban, where he was forever exempt from the influences created and put in motion and activity, by matter and passions, in every state of existence. But, as it is in Burmah at least, owing to their very limited and imperfect education, are unable to give any satisfactory or even intelligible account of the state of Neibban or perfection. What is here but superficially stated, has been found in one of the last Buddhist compositions on this and other metaphysical subjects. Fuller particulars shall, hereafter, be given as to the state of Neibban, when the death of our greatest, Thariputra, shall be related.
answered him: great teacher, we have lived with you during the last forty-four years, and have been your inseparable attendants, following you everywhere, as the shadow follows the body. We have never experienced the least dissatisfaction, from your part, but we have to request your forbearance and pardon for ourselves.

It was on the evening of the full moon Tatsaongmon, (November), that Thariputra went to his mother's place, and laid in the room wherein he had been born. During the night he was attacked with the most distressing dis temper. In the morning at day-light, he was habited with his tsiwaran and made to lay on his right side. He entered into a sort of ecstasy, passed successively from the first state of Dzan to the second, third and fourth, and thence dived into the bottomless state of Neibban, which is the complete exemption from the influence of passions and matter.

Noopathari, bathed in her tears, gave full vent to her grief and desolation. Alas! exclaimed she, looking on the lifeless body, is this my beloved son? His mouth can no more utter a sound. Rising up, she flung herself at his feet, and with a voice ever interrupted by sobs and lamentations, she said: alas! beloved son, it is too late that I have known the treasure of perfections and excellencies that was in you. Had I been aware of it, I would have invited to my house more than ten thousand Rahans, fed them and made a present of three suits of dress to each of them. I would have built a hundred monasteries to receive them. The day* having dawned, she sent for 88.—In Burmah, when a person has just given up the ghost, the inmates of the house send for musicians, who soon make their appearance with their respective instruments. They forthwith set to work, and keep up an incessant noise during the 24 hours that elapse before the corpse be removed to the place where it is to be burnt. Relatives, friends and elders resort to the deceased's house, for the ostensible purpose of condoling with those who have lost their kinsman, but in reality for sharing in the mirth and amusements going on, in such occasions. Strange to say, the thought of death strikes no one's mind; the fate of the deceased is scarcely pitied, may remember. Were it not for the presence of the corpse, and the perhaps conventional cries and lamentations of some old women at certain intervals, the most skilful gold smiths, opened her chests and gave them a great quantity of gold. By her command, five

no one could imagine, and a fortiori, find out the real motive that has induced such a crowd to assemble on that spot.
If the departed belonged to a respectable family, in tolerably good circumstances, the funeral ceremony is arranged in the following manner.
PreseTs intended as offerings for the Buddhist monks, having been made ready, they are invited for the occasion, and their presence is expected in numbers proportionate to the amount of offerings. The procession starts from the deceased's house, and directs its course towards the place of burning or the cemetery. It is headed by the yellow dressed monks, carrying their broad palm-leaf-made fans on the shoulder, and attended by their disciples. Next follow the bearers of the offerings in two lines: They are partly men and partly women, but walking separately and apart from each other. The coffin appears next, laid on thick poles, and carried by six or eight men. In front of the coffin, and sometimes at the sides, are arranged the musicians who perform all the way, without an instant's interruption.
Behind the coffin, are grouped the male relatives, friends, &c, and lastly the procession is closed by crowds of women attired in their finest dress. The coffin is beautifully decorated, and carried on the shoulders of six or eight stout young men, by means of bamboos or poles. An unnatural merriment is allowed, and generally kept up all the way to the cemetery, and fantastic gestures and dances are performed by the bearers and their friends, to the imminent danger of upsetting the coffin. The burning place is generally without the precincts of the town and in the vicinity of some large pagodas.
The funeral pile is of a very simple structure; its shape is that of an oblong square of a moderate size. Two large pieces of wood are at first laid parallel, at a distance of eight feet; other logs of wood, disposed at about six or eight inches from each other, are laid across the two first mentioned, so that their extremities are supported on these two pieces. A second set of logs is laid at right angles with the first; a third one placed across the second, and so on until the pile is three, four or five feet high. The coffin is deposited upon it. Fire is set below the pile, by means of inflammable materials, which soon communicate fire to the logs the pile is made of.
The whole is soon in a blaze and rapidly consumed by the devouring flames.
The by-standers talk, laugh, or busy themselves in stirring the fire. As to the Talapoins, they sometimes take position under a neighbouring shed, repeat a few passages of Budha's law, and when they are tired, they give orders to their disciples to take up the offerings and then go back to their peaceable abodes. Very often they do not take the trouble of muttering prayers; they depart forthwith followed by the offerings intended for them.

The fire being extinguished, the ashes, charcoal, &c, are carefully searched, and the particles of bones discovered, are piously collected by the nearest relatives, and then buried in a hole dug for that purpose, near some pagoda.

Persons in good circumstances, keep up during seven days, in their houses, a sort of solemnization of the funerals. Every day, in the evening particularly, musicians are keeping up playing until a very late hour at ight. The house is, during all the while, crowded with people, who come for the purpose of enjoyment. Some play at various games; others drink tea; all chew betel leaves tobacco in profusion. Sometimes, stories relating hundred small pinnaths and as many dzedis were prepared: the outward sides were all covered with gold leaves. The great Thagia sent down on the spot, a number of Nats who made also the same number of religious ornaments. In the middle of the city, a high square tower was erected; from its centre a tall spire rose to an immense height. This principal one was surrounded by a great number of smaller ones. Men and Nats mingled together, uniting in their endeavours to do honor to the deceased. The whole place was lined with countless beings, vicing with each other in their efforts to show the utmost respect, joy and exultation on this extraordinary occasion.

The nurse of Thariputra, named Rewati, came and deposited, round the mortal remains, three golden flowers. At that very moment, the great Thagia made his appearance, surrounded with myriads of Nats. As soon as the multitudes perceived him, they withdrew hastily to make room for him. In the midst of the confusion, Rewati fell down, was trampled upon, and died. She migrated to the fortunate seat of Tawadeintha, became a daughter of Nats, and inhabited a place (niche) made with the most consummate skill, and adorned with the richest materials. Her body shone like a beautiful statue of gold, and was three gawoots tall. Her dress extended to Gandamā's former existences, are read, and listened to by the elders of the party. This mode, intended either to do honor to the deceased's memory or to afford relief to the grief of relatives is rather expensive, and might often prove a heavy drain on the limited means of most of the families. But the spirit of mutual assistance, on this occasion, removes the difficulty. Every visitor, according to his means, makes a present of some money to the master of the house. Though the present of the greatest number of visitors, is comparatively small, yet when added together, there is a considerable sum, which is generally more than sufficient to defray all expenses that may be incurred. This custom or system of voluntary contributions, burdens no one in particular, whilst it enables a family to make a show of liberality which, otherwise, would almost prove ruinous in many instances. The custom of burning the dead prevails amongst the Hindoos, the Singhalese, Nepalese, Burmese, Siamese and Cambodians. Though holding the tenets of Buddhism, the Chinese have never adopted this usage. The Mahomedans, living in Hindustan and the countries of eastern Asia, retain the custom of burying the dead. Buddhists have doubtless received that practice from the Hindoos.

On the following day, Rewati came from her glorious seat, to the spot where crowds of people surrounded the body of the deceased. She approached, with the dignified countenance and majestic bearing, of a Queen of Nats. No one recognised her, though the eyes of all were riveted on her person, encompassed with the splendor of Nats. Whilst all the spectators, overawed by the presence of that celestial being, remained motionless with a silent admiration, Rewati said to them: how is it that none of you recognise me? I am Rewati, the nurse of the great Thariputra. To the offering of the three golden flowers made by me and placed at the feet of the mortal remains of the great Rahan, I am indebted for the glory and splendor of my present position. She explained, at great length, the advantages procured by doing meritorious actions. Having stood for a while above the cenotaph, whereupon they had deposited the body of the deceased, she came down, turned three times round it, bowing down each time, and then returned to the blissful seat of Tawadeintha.

During seven consecutive days, rejoicings, dancings and amusements of every description, were uninterruptedly kept up, in honor of the illustrious deceased. The funeral pile was made of scented wood; upon it they scattered profusely perfumes the most rare and fragrant. The pile was ninety-nine cubits high. The corpse having been placed upon it, fire was set to it by means of strings made of flowers and combustibles. During the whole night that the ceremony lasted, there was a constant preaching of the law. Anoorouda extinguished the fire with perfumed water. Tsanda carefully and piously collected the remaining relics, which were placed in a filter. Now, said he, I will go to Budha with these relics, and lay them in his presence. With his companion Anoorouda, he took, together with the relics, the patta and tsiwaran of the deceased and returned to Budha, to

Tsanda was the younger brother of the great Thariputra. It was to him that belonged the honor of being the person selected to convey, to Budha, the precious relics. When, however, he had come to the monastery, he was unwilling to go alone into Budha's presence. He went first to Ananda, his intimate friend, and said to him: My brother Thariputra has obtained the state of Neibban. Here are the patta, tsiwaran and relics; exhibiting before him, one after the other, those precious articles. Both went together to Budha's place, and laid at his feet the patta, tsiwaran and relics of the great disciple. Budha, placing the relics on the palm of his right hand, called all the Rahans and said to them: beloved Rahans, this is all that remains of one, who, a few days ago, was performing wonders in your presence, and has now reached the state of Neibban, something resembling a pure white shell. During an athingie and hundred thousands of worlds, he has perfected himself by the practice of virtue. Beloved children, he could preach the law like another Budha. He knew how to gain friends: crowds of people followed him to hear his instructions. Excepting me, no one in 10,000 worlds was equal to him. His wisdom was at once great and cheerful; his mind, quick and penetrating. He knew how to restrain his desires, and to be easily satisfied with little. He loved retirement. He severely rebuked evil doers. Beloved children, Thariputra renounced all pleasures and gratifications to become a Rahan; he always shunned strifes and contentions, as well as long and idle conversations. His patient zeal for the diffusion of my religion, equalled the thickness of the globe. He was like a bull, the horns of which have been broken. My beloved Rahans, look once more at the relics of my wise son, Thariputra. Budha, in this manner, eulogized the virtues of the illustrious deceased, in five hundred stanzas. 89

89.—The custom of making funeral orations for the purpose of eulogising
On hearing all that Budha had said to honor the memory of Thariputra, Ananda was filled with sentiments of the tenderest emotion. He could not refrain from shedding abundant tears. Budha quickly remarked all distinguished individuals after their demise, is of the highest antiquity. The sacred records bear witness to its existence among the Jews. The present Legend offers repeated instances of Eulogia made to honor the memory of the dead. On this occasion, Budha would not leave to another the honor of extolling the extraordinary merits and transcendent excellencies of the illustrious Thariputra, but he had a higher object in view, when he exhibited to the eyes of the assembled Brahmans, the relics of the deceased, that were all that remained of so celebrated a disciple, who had lived with them for so many years and had just parted from them. It was impossible to give them a more forcible illustration of the truth he had so often announced to them, that there is nothing permanently subsisting in this world, but that all things are liable to a perpetual and never ending change. The stern Budha gently rebuked the amiable Ananda, for the marks of inordinate grief he gave on this occasion; because, said he, the law of utilitarianity acting upon all that surrounds us, we must ever be prepared to be separated from what is dearest to our affections; grief on such occasions, is useless and quite inconsistent with the principles of a wise man.

To honor the memory of Thariputra, and perpetuate the remembrance of his virtues, Budha directed that a dzedi should be erected, on the very spot where he had heard the news of his death. A dzedi is a religious monument very common in Burmah, and to be seen, on all rising grounds, in the neighbourhood of towns. Within the enclosure of all monasteries, a dzedi is invariably erected; it is the only purely religious building to be found in Burmah. The traveler in that country is always delighted and experiences the most pleasurable sensations, on approaching some town or village, when he sees several dzedins of various height, raising their white cones capped with the gilt crown, from the bosom of beautiful groves of tall cocoanut trees, graceful areca plants, and massive tamarind, mango and jack trees, all loaded with a green and luxuriant foliage. When the monument is on a grand scale, niches are made in the middle of each side of the square, facing the four points of the compass. In these niches are placed statues of Budha, exhibiting him in the usual cross legged position. The size of these religious monuments much varies in dimensions. They range from the height of a few feet, to the colossal proportions of the tall Dagon Pagoda at Rangoon.

The custom of raising monuments over the ashes of Religious distinguished by their virtues and extraordinary attainments, is a very scientific, coeval, in all probability with the first ages of Buddhism. They were real tumuli surmounted with some ornaments in the shape of a cone. Such ornaments are seen towering over nearly all the religious monuments in Burmah. Royalty in its head paraphernalia, and in its abode, has appropriated them to its own uses. We may, at once, infer that they are of a Hindoo origin. The great monarchs who are called TeekiaWade Kings, because they ruled over the whole of the Dampounduma island, were, according to Budha's opinion, entitled to the honor of a dzedi after their decease.
that was taking place in his faithful and loving attendant, and said to him: Ananda, on former occasions, I have, in my preachings, endeavoured to shelter your soul from the impressions caused by such and like emotions. Two things can alone keep us separated from father, mother, brothers, sisters, &c., in a word from all that we most cherish viz: death and distance. I, though a Buddha, have been exposed to all those changes, brought on by distance, when I practised the great virtues in the solitude, when I displayed wonders and spent a season in the seat of Tawadeintha. In those circumstance, distance kept me far from all those that were dearest to me. Would it not have been considered as useless, if not unbecoming, on my part, to shed tears, or on that of others, to do it on my account? Can there ever be a time, when any, how painful soever, occurrence may warrant wailing and lamenting? With these and other considerations, Buddha soothed the affliction of Ananda, and filled his soul with consolations.

Buddha, to complete, as it were, the work of praises in favor of his great disciple, caused a dzedzi to be erected in his honor, near the entrance of the Dzetawon monastery. Having satisfied the sacred duty of gratitude, towards the greatest of his disciples, Gaudama resolved to leave the monastery of Dzetawon, for the country of Radzagio. Ananda was, as usual, directed to inform the Rahans to hold themselves ready for immediate departure.

The most excellent Phra having reached Radzagio, which he was to visit for the last time, took his abode into the Weloowon monastery. He had not staid long in that place, when the other great disciple, Maukalan went to Neibban. Here are the particulars respecting the last moments of the illustrious companion of Thariputra. The heterodox Rahans, who lived in a state of complete nakedness, were extremely jealous of the popularity of Buddha, and coveted the abundant alms that were offered to him and his disciples. Maukalan, who was living on the Isigili mountain, in the cave of the dark rock, was supposed, on account of his great attainments and profound science, to be the cause of the great respect the people paid to his master. They resolved to kill him. For that purpose, they armed 500 robbers, and gave them 1000 pieces of silver for perpetrating the horrible crime. The assassins went twice to the cave; but their victim, twice escaped their fury. At last, owing to the influence of a former bad deed, Maukalan resigned himself into the hands of the ruffians, who, put him to death. They beat him so severely, that his lifeless remains were no more than a heap of mangled flesh, which they threw in the midst of bushes. The news of the appalling murder spread rapidly through the country. King Adzatatathan had the murderers arrested. Having known from their own confession, that the naked Rahans were the instigators of the murder, he had them likewise arrested. In front of his palace, he ordered one thousand holes to be dug; in each hole, a criminal was sunk up to his navel. All the ground was then overspread with straw which being set fire to, all the wretches soon perished.

On hearing such a news, the disciples were greatly grieved, and asked each other, what might have been the cause, which had brought the aged Maukalan to such a cruel end. Budha appearing suddenly among them said: beloved sons, what is the subject of your conversation? They replied that they were conversing on the tragical death of their great companion. I declare unto you, retorted Buddea, that Maukalan has met a well merited death. In one of his former existences, my beloved son, at the instigation of his wife, misled his aged and blind parents into a forest, where leaving them alone, he went away for a while. On his return, affecting the manners and voice of a highway man, he killed his parents, and threw their bodies into a thicket. For this crime, he has suffered the torments of hell, during 1000 years, and has had to undergo the cruel death that has put an end to his last existence. Having thus spoken, he ordered that a dzedi should be erected in the honor of Maukalan, near the gate of the Weloowon monastery.

Having left Radvagio, Budha intimated to Ananda that he wished to return to Wethalie. On his way to the right bank of the Ganges, he arrived to a place called Oukkatsela, where he preached on the death of his two greatest disciples. Thence he crossed the mighty stream and shaped his course towards Wethalie. On the day that he entered the city, he went in quest of his food. Having partaken of what he had received, he called Ananda, bade him to take his mat and cushion, and follow him to the Tsapala dzedi, where he intended to spend a part of the day. Complying with the command, Ananda followed Budha and with him went to the beautiful site of Tsapala, to the place prepared for his master. Ananda approached Phra, and, respectfully prostrated, said to him: this is, indeed, a very agreeable place. Whereupon Budha rejoicing, praised the different sites of that country which were in the neighborhood of the Wethalie city, as well as the dzedis that adorned them, and added: Ananda, every wise person ought to be earnest in perfecting himself in the four laws of Edeipat. Having advanced in the practice of these laws, he can, if he choose to do so, remain in a state of fixity, during a whole revolution of nature and even more. I, the Budha, have become perfect in those laws, and I may remain as I am now, during an innumerable number of years. Three times, the same words were repeated. But Ananda, entangled as yet in the meshes of the tempter Manh Nat, remained prostrated before Budha. It never came to his mind, to entreat him to remain longer on earth, for the benefit of mortals, who would derive the greatest advantages from his presence.

At that time Ananda rose up, with his mind troubled by the influence of the evil one, withdrew from Budha's presence and went to the foot of a tree at a small distance. He had scarcely left Budha alone, when the Nat Manh, perceiving that Budha remained alone for a while, approached near his person, and keeping at a respectful distance, said to him: Great, illustrious and glorious Phra, who preaches an excellent law, it is now time for you to enter into the state of Neibban. You said in former times, that as long as your disciples should not be much advanced in knowledge; as long as they would not have obtained a thorough command over their heart, mouth and senses, that they would be as yet wanting in firmness and diligence for hearing and understanding the law, or that they would be unequal to the task of preaching the law, you would not, as yet, go to Neibban. Now the Rahans, members of the assembly and your disciples, both males and females, are thoroughly instructed in all the parts of the law: they are firm in controlling their passions: they can preach the law to the other mortals: the Nats and Brahmas have heard your preachings and countless numbers among them have obtained the deliverance: the time, therefore, is come for you to enter into the state of Neibban. Budha knowing the wicked one, with his evil dispositions, replied: Ha! wretched Manh, do not concern yourself about me. Ere long, I will go to Neibban.

Whilst he was near the dzed of Tsapala, Budha in a moment of perfect calmness of mind, entered into a sort of extraordinary state of contemplation, in which, for the first time, he mastered completely the principles of life, and appeared as if he had abandoned life. But it ought not to be understood that he parted with life, as a man lets go a stone that he has in his hands; but he estranged himself from the material life, renounced it, and placed himself beyond the reach of the influence that produces reward in the material or immaterial seats, and above that other influence which, procuring merits, or demerits, keeps a being in the whirlpool of transmigration. As a mighty warrior on the battle field throws down every barrier or obstacle that he meets, so Buddha broke down all the ties that had hitherto linked him to the state of existence.* At that very instant, the earth trembled with such violence that it caused the hairs of one's head to

* It is very difficult to understand the extraordinary state in which Buddha placed himself on this occasion. It must have been a remarkable occurrence, since it caused a violent commotion which shook our planet. The only interpretation that can be put on the terms used to describe this particular action of Buddha, is this: he renounced to existence, that is to say, not only to the actual existence, that he enjoyed, but also to all other forms of existence. He severed connexion with this and other worlds; he broke the ties that had hitherto retained him linked to a form of existence. He had come now to the end of all transmigrations. By the power of his will, he placed himself into the state of complete isolation from all that exists, even from self, that is to say, into Nibbana, a state, which death was soon to realize and render visible to the eyes of his disciples. It is not death that causes a being to reach the state or condition of Nibbana, but it is the abstraction from all conceivable forms of existence that constitutes its very essence. The expression made use of by our author, to designate the particular condition in which Gautama brought himself, and which caused a terrific shake of the earth, is this: he parted with the life of change, of mutability, that is to say, he had nothing more to do with existences which in the opinion of Buddhists, are produced by the principle of mutability. Buddha called himself Zina, or conqueror after he had obtained the perfect mastery over his passions. We may give him the same title on the occasion when he has obtained the mastery over existence itself. This last achievement is in the greatest of all: the first was only preparatory to securing the second one. The writer is well aware that such a language is at variance with the notions, the reader is familiar with. To understand its true and correct meaning, one must be initiated in the doctrines of Buddhism.

The preaching of the law of the wheel, which is mentioned as one cause that produces the phenomena of earthquake, took place as above related, in the Migadawon forest, or the Deor's grove, near Benares, in the very beginning of Buddha's public life, after he had left the Bodhi tree. The preaching of the law of the wheel, is nothing else but the manifestation of the four sublime and transcendent truths, which, as mentioned in foregoing pages, constitute the essence of Buddha's doctrines.
stand on end. Then he said to all present: I am delivered from the influence of the world of matter, of the world of passions and of every influence that causes the migration from one existence to another. I enjoy now a perfect calm of mind,—like the mighty warrior who, on the field of battle, has conquered all his enemies, I have triumphed over all passions. I have mastered existence itself, by destroying the principle that causes it. These words were uttered by Phra, lest perhaps some people might infer that he entered into the extraordinary state on which he mastered the elements of life, from fear caused by the language of the tempter, inviting him to go forthwith to Neibban.

Ananda having felt the earthquake, respectfully approached Budha and prostrated before him; withdrawing then to a becoming distance, he asked him the causes that produce the extraordinary and terrifying phenomenon of earthquakes. My son, answered Budha, eight causes make the earth tremble. 1st—the earth lays on a mass of water, which rests on the air, and the air on space; when the air is set in motion, it shakes the water, which in its turn shakes the earth. 2nd—any being gifted with extraordinary powers; 3rd—the conception of Phralaong for his last existence; 4th—his birth; 5th—his becoming a Budha; 6th—his preaching the law of the wheel; 7th—his mastering and renouncing existence; 8th—his obtaining the state of Neibban. These are the eight causes of earthquakes. Ananda, a little while after having become a Budha, I was in the solitude of Ouroowela, on the banks of the river Neritzara, under the shade of a Banyan tree, planted by some shepherds. The wicked Nat came into my presence and requested me to go forthwith to Neibban. I refused, then, to comply with his demand and said to him: wretched Manh, my disciples, members of the assembly, either males or females; the believers, either men or women, have not yet acquired sufficient knowledge, prudence and penetration, courage and resoution. They have not been, as yet, properly instructed in the most essential and highest articles of the law; they are unable to teach others: my religion is not yet resting on a strong foundation. The time, therefore, is not yet come for me, to enter into the state of Neibban. Now near this very dzedi of Tsapala, he has come anew and told me the same thing. Do not trouble yourself, miserable wretch, have I said to him; three months hence, I will obtain the state of Neibban. On this occasion, I have fallen into the state in which I have mastered the principles of life, by the means of the four laws of Edeibat.

99.—The particulars of the apparition of the evil one, or the tempter, related by Buddha himself to the faithful and amiable Ananda, show the incessant efforts made by Mara for rendering abortive, to a certain extent, the benevolent mission undertaken by Buddha to procure deliverance to numberless beings, and supply others with adequate means for entering into, and steadily following, the way that leads to it. He had been defeated in his endeavors to prevent Mara from leaving the world and obtaining the Budhahship. He had been thwarted in his wicked designs to weaken the effects of Buddha's preachings. Heretics of all sorts had been summoned to his standards, to carry on a most active warfare against his opponents, but he had failed in all his attempts. Buddha had now almost completed the great and beneficial work he had undertaken; his religious institutions known over a vast extent of territory, and zealously propagated by fervent and devoted disciples, seemed to be now firmly established. The edifice, indeed, was raised but it required the action of a finishing hand; the key stone was yet wanting in the vault to render it complete and durable. Mara was aware of all that; hence his last and wilful effort for impeding the finishing and perfecting of a work, he had vainly opposed in its beginning and during its progress.

The line of distinction between the members of the assembly and the mass of those who merely believed in the doctrines of Buddha, without leaving the world, is plainly drawn; by Buddha himself; therefore, there can be no doubt that, from the origin of Buddhism, there existed a marked difference between the body of laymen and that of Bahanah. Again, the body of the perfect, or those who formed, what may emphatically be termed the assembly, was composed of men and women, living as a matter of course, separately, in a state of continence, and subjected to the disciplinary regulations which we had embodied in the Wini. In Burmah, vestiges of female devotees, living secluded from the world, are to be met with in many places, but, as already noticed in a foregoing remark, the order of religious females has much fallen off. Its professed members are few in number, and the exterior observances of the regulations is much neglected. The comprehensiveness of Buddhism, its tendency to bring all men, to the same level, and allow of no difference between man and man, but that which is established by superiority in virtue; its expansive properties, all those striking ob-
Ananda said to Phra: illustrious Budha, please to remain during a whole Kalpa in this world, for the benefit of men, Nats and Brahmas. Ananda, replied Phra, your present request is too late and cannot be granted. Three times the faithful disciple begged his great teacher, this favor, and three times he received the same refusal. Do you believe, O Ananda, that I know the four ways that lead to science and wisdom, and that I am perfect in the four laws of Edeipat? I do believe it, answered Ananda.

Do you recollect, O Ananda, that, a little while ago, I said to you three times, that he who was perfect in the laws of Edeipat, could remain, if he chose, during an entire Kalpa in this world? I added that I was thoroughly acquainted with these four laws: but you remained silent, and made no demand to me, to remain longer in this world. The time for making this request, is now irrevocably past. The term of my life is forever fixedly determined. Now Ananda let us go to Mahawon Kootagara in the forest of the Sala trees. Having reached the place and staid therein for a few days, he desired his faithful attendant to go to Wethalic and assemble all the Rahans in the Gnyipoora hall. When they had all assembled in that place, Ananda informed Budha that his order had been duly executed. Phra went to the hall, and sat in the place prepared for him. He, then, addressing the assembly, said: my beloved children, the law which my supreme wisdom has discovered, I have announced it for your benefit and advantage. You have attentively and perseveringly listened to it, firmly adhered to its tenets and zealously propagated them.
Now my religion shall last for a long period, and prove the source of great blessings to all Nats. But to the end that my religion may last long, shine forth with splendor and be productive of incalculable benefits, it is necessary that great attention should be paid to the thirty seven laws from which all good words proceed.* These laws you have been acquainted with by my preachings: it is to you to announce them to all beings. Meditate with unremitting attention on the principles of change and mutability. As to me, ere long I will go to Neibban; three months more, and this last drama shall be over.

In the morning Budha putting on his dress went out to beg his food, carrying the patta on his left arm. When he had eaten his meal, he looked with the steadiness of an elephant, over the whole country. The rea-

* The Buddhists of these parts, following the track of their ancestors, or rather copying their writings, are fond of arbitrary divisions in all that concern the different parts of their metaphysics. Budha, on this occasion, alludes to thirty seven articles, which may be considered as the foundation whereon rests philosophical and moral wisdom. They are called Be-ri-pez-kev meaning, I believe, points or articles of wisdom. They are subdivided into seven classes. In the first, are enumerated the four subjects most deserving of attention, viz: the body, the heart, the sensations, and the law. In the second, are described four objects extremely worthy of our efforts, viz: preventing the law of demerits to come into existence; preventing its developments, when it exists; causing the law of merits to come into existence, and furthering its progress, when it is already existing. In the third, are found likewise four points meriting control, viz: one's will, one's heart, one's efforts, and one's exertions. In the fourth class, we find enumerated five preeminently necessary dispositions, or inclinations, that is to say: disposition to benevolence, to diligence, to attention, to steady direction towards what is excellent, and to considerate wisdom.

The fifth class comprises the pefa, or rewards, or good effects resulting from the above inclination, viz: perfect benevolence, diligence, attention, steadiness in what is excellent, and considerate wisdom.

The sixth class comprehends the seven following virtues, which enable man to raise himself very high in the scale of perfection, attention, consideration of the law, diligence, equanimity of the soul, constancy in good, fixity and delight.

The seventh class comprises the ways that lead to good and perfection: they are eight in number: perfect doctrine, intention, language, actions, regular mode of life, diligence, attention, and fixity in good.

A volume might be written upon these thirty seven principles, or points of moral philosophy, by way of comment and explanation. But we think it better to leave the reader to make his own reflections, and run at liberty over this broad field of metaphysics.
son why he cast a look like an elephant over Wethalie is, as he explained it to Ananda, the following. The neck bone of all Budhas is not like the links of a chain: but consists of one single solid bone, hence when they wish to consider some object lying behind, they cannot turn their heads backwards, but the whole body, like that of the elephant, must follow the same motion. On this and other occasions of this kind, our Budha had not to make any effort, but the earth turning round like the wheel of the potter, brought the object to be looked at, before him. The great city of Wethalie, within three years, was to be destroyed, by King Adzatathat. As Budha had always received many marks of respect and attention from the inhabitants of that city, he felt the greatest commiseration on them. His last glance was a sorrowful farewell he bade to the devoted city. This is the motive that induced Budha to cast a last look over it.

Budha went to a place called Pautoogama. He passed successively through Hatti, Tsampon and Appara, and thence to Banga. In the latter place, he preached the four laws of Padesa. Summoning Ananda to his presence, he desired him to inform the Rahans to hold themselves ready to go to the Pawa country. Having reached that district, he went with all his Rahans to live in a monastery built in a grove of Mango trees, erected by Tsonda, the son of a wealthy goldsmith. Tsonda had previously seen Budha and obtained the state of Thautapan. His gratitude induced him to build a monastery, which, together with the grove, he had given over to Budha. His arrival to that place happened on the 14th of the waxing moon of Katson.

Informed that Phra had come to the monastery, Tsonda repaired hastily thither, prostrated before him and having taken a seat at a becoming distance, he requested Budha to accept the meal he would prepare for him and all the Rahans. Budha by his silence acquiesced in the request. Tsonda rose up, bowed down and turning on the right, left the monastery. During the whole night, all sorts of the choicest dishes were prepared. He had a young pig, neither fat nor lean, killed, and the flesh dressed with rice in the most exquisite manner. The Nats infused into it, the most delicious flavor. At daybreak, everything being ready, Tsonda went to the monastery and invited Budha and all the Rahans to come and partake of the meal that was ready for them. Budha rose up and carrying his patta, went to Tsonda's house, where he sat in the place prepared for his reception. He took for himself the pork and rice, but his attendants feasted upon the other dishes. When he had eaten, he desired Tsonda to bury in the earth, the remains of the pork and rice, because no one, in the Nats' or Brahmans' seats but himself, could digest such a food. A little while after, Budha was seized with a violent attack of dysentery, the pain whereof he bore with the greatest patience and composure. He suffered so much, not because of the food he had taken, as he would otherwise have been exposed to the same distemper. The pain was rather alleviated by the eating of the pork and rice, because the Nats had infused therein the choicest flavor.

Budha desired Ananda to be ready to go to the town of Kootheinaron. While on the way, he felt very weak and retired under the shade of a tree, commanding Ananda to fold his dugout to sit upon. When he had rested a little, he called Ananda and said to him: Ananda, I am very thirsty; bring me some water. Ananda replied: One of the Malla Princes, named Poukatha, has just passed through the Kakouda river with five hundred carts, and the water is quite muddy. The Malla Princes ruled by turn over the country. When the time for ruling had not yet come, or had passed, many of them devoted their time to the pursuit of trade. Notwithstanding this objection, Budha repeated three times the junction. Ananda at last took up Phra's patta and went to the stream to fetch water. How great was his surprise, when he found the water clear and limpid. He said to himself: great indeed is the power of Budha who has worked such a wonderful change in this stream. He filled the patta with water and brought it to his great teacher, who drank of it.

Prince Poukatha had been a disciple of the Rathee Alara. He came to Budha and said to him, whilst he was under the shade of the tree: great indeed is the peace and calm composure of mind of the Rahans. On a former occasion, added he, whilst the Rathee Alara was travelling, he went to rest under the shade of a tree, at a small distance by the way side. A merchant, with five hundred carts, happened to pass by. A man that followed at a distance came to the place where Alara was resting, and inquired from him if he had seen the five hundred carts that had just passed by. Alara replied that he was not aware that any cart had come in sight. The man, at first, suspected that Alara was unsound in his mind; but he was soon convinced that what he was at first inclined to attribute to mental derangement, was caused by the sublime abstraction of the Rathee, from all that was taking place.

Budha having heard this story rejoined: what is in your opinion, the more wonderful occurrence, either to see a man in his senses and awake, not to notice the passing of five hundred carts or even of one thousand, and another man, equally awake, and in the enjoyment of his mental faculties, who did not hear the violence of a storm, a heavy fall of rain, accompanied with loud peals of thunder and uninterrupted flashes of lightning? In former times, I, the Budha, was sitting under a small shed. A most violent storm came on; peals of thunder resounded more awfully than the roaring of the sea, and lightnings seemed to rend the atmosphere in every direction. At that time, two brothers were ploughing in a field with four bullocks. They were all killed, men and bullocks, by lightning. A man came to me, whilst I was walking in front of the shed, and told me that he came to see the accident that had just happened, and asked me some particulars concerning it. I answered him that I was not aware that any storm had raged near this place, nor any accident attended it. The stranger inquired from me whether I was asleep; or if not, whether I was in possession of my senses. I answered him that I was not asleep, and that I was in the perfect enjoyment of my mental and physical faculties. My answer made a powerful impression upon him; he thought within himself that great and wonderful is the power of Thamabat, which procures to the Rahans such an undisturbable calm of mind, which cannot be disturbed by the mightiest convulsions of nature. Now: Prince Poukatha, in whom do you think that the greatest calm of mind has prevailed? Most excellent Phra, replied the Prince, the great respect I bore formerly unto the Rathee Alara, has disappeared like the chaff before the wind, and run out like the water of a rapid stream. I am now like a man to whom the true road has been pointed out, who has discovered hidden things, and who has a shining light before him. You have announced to me the true law which has dispelled the cloud of ignorance, and brought happiness and calm to my hitherto disturbed soul. From this moment I believe in Budha, the Law and the Assembly, and to the end of my life I will ever remain a believer. The Prince called a young man, and directed him to go and bring two beautiful and rich pieces of cloth having the color of pure gold thread. When they had been brought over, the prince holding them in his hand said: O most glorious Budha, these pieces of cloth I have occasionally worn; they are in color like gold, and the tissue is of the finest description; please to accept them as an offering I make to you. Phra desired him to present one of the pieces to himself, and the other to Ananda, that his merits might be greater, since the offering would be made to Budha and to the Assembly in the person of Ananda. This attention in favor of Ananda was also intended to reward him for his unremitting exertions during the twenty five years he had served Budha with the utmost respect, care and affection, without having received any adequate return for his services. Buddha preached afterwards the law to the Prince. When the instruction was over, Poukatha believed in, and firmly adhered to, the three precious things, and became a sincere convert. He rose up, prostrated before Buddha, turned on the right and departed.

Ananda, after the Prince's departure, brought the two dresses to the great Phra, who put one, on his shoulders, whilst the other was girded round his waist. His body appeared shining like a flame. Ananda was exceedingly surprised. Nothing of this kind had, as yet, happened. Your exterior appearance, said he to Buddha, is at once white, shining and beautiful above all expression. What you say, O Ananda, is perfectly true. There are two occasions when my body becomes extraordinarily beautiful and shining: The first was on the night I obtained the supreme intelligence; and the second, now, when I am about to enter into the state of Neibban. Doubtless, O Ananda, on the morning after this very night, in a corner, near the Koutheinaron city, that belongs to the Princes Malla, in the forest of Sala trees, I will go to Neibban. The shining light, emanating from my body, is the certain forerunner of this great event.

Ananda, summoned by Buddha to his presence, received the order to move to the banks of the Kakouda stream.* Having reached the place, Buddha descended

* The Kakouda stream was one of the arms or channels of the little Gundak. It is at present dried up, but up to this day, are to be seen several marks indicating the ancient bed of that stream.

The river Hiranyawati is one of the channels of the little Gundak, which was flowing a little west of the city of Koutheinaron. The Gundak being very windy in its course, and the mass of water being sometimes very considerable, there are to be seen a great number of old channels, now dried up, or occasionally filled in the time that inundation is prevailing. For this reason, it becomes difficult in some instances, to follow the Chinese pilgrim Hwen Thsang, through his minute and accurate description of the places he has visited. The mounds of ruins which stud the ground, may not be always correctly identified, because they are not at present, relatively to the river, in the same position as that mentioned in his interesting itinerary. However, there are, here and there, some remnants of the old channels which are sufficient to guide into the stream, bathed and drank some water. Thence he directed his steps towards a grove of Mango trees. Ananda had remained to dry the bathing robes of his master. Phra called the Rahan Tsanda and directed him to fold in four his dugout, because he wished to rest. The order having been complied with, Budha sat down, lying on his right side, with the solemn and fearless appearance of a lion. During his short sleep, Tsanda safely the sure and patient Government Archeological Surveyor, who now does so much, with the assistance derived from the books of the two Chinese pilgrims, to find out and identify on the spot, most of the places and localities mentioned in the Buddhist writings. It is not a little surprising that we should have to acknowledge the fact, that the voyages of two Chinese travellers, undertaken in the 5th and 7th century of our era, have done more to elucidate the history and geography of Buddhism, in India, than all that has, hitherto, been found in the Sanscrit and Pali books of India, and the neighboring countries.

The young Religious who is called Tsanda, was the younger brother of Thariputra. He seems to have shared with Ananda, the honor of attending on Budha's person.

The forest which was close in the vicinity of Koutchinaran was planted with trees which the Burmans call Engien, the Ben-ales, Sal. The latter name is evidently the Sanscrit and Pali appellation of the tree, which the Burmese author has retained but once or twice throughout the course of his work, and wrote Sala. It is the Shorea robusta.

The four laws of Edelbat, which, in the opinion of Budha, can confer to him who knows and possesses them, the extraordinary privilege of an indefinitely prolonged existence, are: absolute power over the will, absolute power over the mind, absolute power of exertion, absolute power over the means to attain any object. How can a man, in the present state of existence, obtain the possession of such a power? The only way that a Buddhist has to account for it, is the following. A perfected being having estranged himself from all passions, from matter and its concomitant influences, solely by the power and energy of his will, acquires a freedom from all impediments, an unbounded liberty of motion, and a lightness and swiftness, which enable him to do all what he pleases. He is independent of the elements of this world, which can no more offer obstacle and resistance to his wishes. Several instances of something approaching to those wonderful attainments, have been mentioned in the course of this work. We have seen how those much advanced in perfection, could raise themselves very high, and travel through the air, with an almost incredible velocity. This was but the beginning of far superior and transcendent qualifications obtained only by those that had made greater progress in science, in virtue and in the renouncing to all things, in a word, by those who had mastered the four laws of Edelbat.

Mahawon Kootagaka means the hall of the upper story, in the great forest. Not far from Wethalie, there was a monastery of great celebrity, situated in a forest of Sala trees. It had, at least an upper story, in which was the hall where Gaudama often preached to his disciples and to the people.
watched by his side. Ananda soon came up. Budha called him and said: The meal which the goldsmith's son has prepared for me, which I have eaten, is my last meal. He is, forsooth, much grieved, because of the illness that has come upon me, after having eaten at his place. Go now to him and make him acquainted

90 (bis.)—The meal Budha partook of, in company with his disciples, at Tsonda's residence, is the last repast he ever made. The violent distemper which followed immediately is not, says the author of the legend, to be attributed to the food he took on this occasion. On the contrary, that very food, owing to the virtue infused therein by the agency of Nats and Brahmas, was rather an antidote against the illness that was to come inevitably upon Phra's person. Previous to the dissolution of his bodily frame, it was decreed that Budha should suffer. No occurrence could ever cause or avert this tragical circumstance. He had foreseen it, and with perfect resignation, submitted to what was absolutely to happen. In the early days of Budhism, when a deadly antagonism with Brahminism, began to fill the peninsula of Hindustan with endless disputes between the supporters of the rival systems, Brahmins, with a cutting sneer, insulted their opponents by reminding them that the founder of their creed, whom they so much revered and exalted, had died from the effects of his having indulged too much on pork. About twenty two years ago, when the writer was in Burmah, he chanced to meet with a shrewd old Christian, who, be it said expansant, was more fond of disputing on religion, than paying regard to the practice thereof. He boasted of having at his command, deadly weapons against Buddhists, and unanswerable arguments, to bear with an irresistible force on the vital parts of their creed. The chief one, which he always brought forward with a Brahminical scorn and laugh, was that Gaudama had died from his having eaten pork. He always did it with so much mirth and wit, that his poor ignorant adversaries were completely overawed and effectually silenced by his bold and positive assertion, leaving to him uncontested the field of battle, and allowing him to carry away, undisputed, the palm of victory. This way of arguing may prove a very amusing one, though it can never be approved of, as error is never to be combated by another error or a false supposition. The Burmese translator was doubtless aware of the weak side offered to the attacks of malignant opponents, by the unpleasant distemper that followed the last meal of Budha. He strenuously labors to defend the character of his hero, by proving in the best way he can, that such a bodily disorder was necessarily to take place, in order to set in relief, the patience, composure and other sterling virtues of the founder of Budhism. The text of the legend has been read over several times with the greatest attention, for the purpose of ascertaining the reasons put forward to account for such an occurrence, but the result has proved unsatisfactory. A thick veil wraps in complete obscurity this curious episode of Budha's life. All that can be said is this: it was preordained that Budha should be visited with a most painful distemper, ere he attained Nirbban; and so it happened.

To prove that the eating of pork had nothing to do with the distemper that followed, we have the authority of Gaudama himself, who commended the delicacy and flavor of that dish, and placed it on the same footing, with with the merits he has gained in making an offering to me. Two meals that I have taken during this existence, are equally deserving of the greatest rewards. The first was the Nogana served up to me, a little while before I obtained at first, the Neibban of Kiletha, or the destruction of passions, and subsequently the supreme intelligence; the second, is the one just offered to me by the goldsmith's son, when I ate the dish of rice and pork. That is the last food I will ever take until I attain the state of Neibban, that is to say, the Neibban of Khandas, or the destruction of all the supports of existence. Both these meals were excellent and are deserving of an equal reward, viz: beauty, a long life, happiness, a large crowd of attendants, the happiness of the Nats' seats, and all sorts of honors and distinction; such are the merits reserved to Tsonda, the son of the goldsmith; go and mention them to him, that his sorrow may be assuaged.

the delicious Nogana he ate on the morning of the day, previous to his obtaining the Buddha-ship. He desired his ever faithful attendant, Ananda, to repair to Tsonda's place, and explain to him the great rewards reserved to him, for having made the offering of such an excellent food.

The practical working of the Budhistic system, relatively to almsgiving, deserves some notice. A man bestows alms on the Rahans or spends money towards furthering some religious purpose; he does so with the belief that what he bestows now in the way of alms, shall secure to him, countless advantages in future existences. Those favors, which he anticipates to enjoy hereafter, are all of a temporal nature, relating only to health, pleasures, riches, honors and a long life, either in the seat of man or in the seats of Nats. Such is the opinion generally entertained by all Buddhists in our days. Talapoins make the preaching of the law, consist chiefly in enumerating the merits and rewards attending the bestowing of alms, on persons devoted to a religious mode of life. In this respect the practical result of their sermons, is certainly most beneficial to themselves. The spiritually minded Buddha seems to have levelled a blow at concupiscence and covetousness, by openly stating that alms have not the power to stem the current of demerits, to give rise and energy to the principle of merits, nor to lead to wisdom, which enables man to weaken gradually concupiscence, anger and ignorance, open and prepare the path to Neibban. True knowledge, attended with the practice of the virtues peculiar to those who have entered into the current of perfection, by following the four Mogras, can alone enable a man to reach Neibban. Many excellent practices enforced by Buddhism, have been, if the expression be correct, reduced to a more lifeless skeleton, by ignorance and passions, but they would appear in a very different light, were they animated with the spirit that has brought them into existence.
Gaudama uttered, on this occasion, the following stanzas:

91. Alms deeds can defend from, and protect against, the

91.—The observance of the five precepts, incumbent upon all Buddhists is the foundation whereupon is to be erected the spiritual edifice: it is the first step towards the great ways leading to perfection: it is preparatory for the great exercise of meditation, by which true wisdom may be acquired. The faithful who observe the five precepts and the three additional counsels, show that faith is living in their hearts and give unmistakable marks of their zeal in the practice of religion. They are real Upasakas, or laymen, fervently adhering to, and taking refuge in, Buddha, the Law and the Assembly; but they cannot take rank among the members of the assembly, or Thanga. Practice of, and progress in meditation, can alone usher an Upasaka into the sanctuary of the perfect.

The rewards destined to the faithful after their death, are exactly proportionate to their merits and the real worth of their deeds. The seats of Nats, placed immediately above the seat of men, but under the sixteen seats reserved to the perfect, are opened to the pious Upasaka who migrates from the seat of probation and trial. The nature of the pleasures enjoyed in the Nats' seats, are all referable to the senses. All that can be imagined the best fitted for the delectation of the five senses, is accumulated in those blissful regions, and proffered, with an ever renewed profusion, to their fortunate inhabitants. The vivid imagination of Asiatists has, one would say, exhausted its stores in picturing with an amazing variety, the riches to be possessed there. It would be of no utility to attempt to give a compendious narrative of what is met with, in Buddhistic compositions, respecting these regions. Suffice it for our purpose, to say, that the distinction of sexes remains in the Nats' countries. In the two lowest seats, connection takes place between the two sexes, but no procreation ever results from it. In the 3rd seats, the Nats of different sexes are fully delected by simple kiss. In the 4th, by the touch of the hand; in the 5th, by merely looking at each other; and in the 6th, by the mere fact of their being in the same place. Hence we may make two observations. The first is, that pleasures therein enjoyed, lose their coarseness, and become more refined and more perfect, in proportion as the seats are more elevated. The greater are the merits of the Upasaka in this life, the higher is the seat he is destined to occupy, and the more refined are the pleasures and enjoyments allotted to him. Hence our Gaudama, having, during the existence preceding this last one, practised moral virtues of the highest order, migrated to Toocita, the fourth seats of Nats. The second observation is, that the duration of the enjoyments in the Nats' seats increases in an arithmetical progression, that is to say, the pleasures of the second seat are lasting twice as much as those of the first or lowest seat. Those of the 3rd seat are lasting twice as much as those of the second, and so on to the last or highest seat.

In the sermons that the Talapions address to the people for stirring up their zeal chiefly in making alms to them, they are most fluent and abundant in the promises of rewards in the Nats' seats, as a powerful incentive held out to them, for keeping up their zeal to bestow alms. They admirably succeed in obtaining their object with most of their hearers. It cannot be denied that those poor deluded followers of Buddha, are fully convinced of all that is narrated to them by Talapions respecting the Nats' influence and the sources of demerits which are man's true enemies. He, alone, who is full of merit and wisdom, shuns evil doings, puts an end to concupiscence, anger and ignorance, and reaches Neibban. Budha calling Ananda said to him: let us now go to the bank of the river Hignarawati, in the forest of Sala trees, belonging to the Malla Princes. Attended by a crowd of Rahans, he went to the bank of the stream. The forest was on a tongue of land, encircled on three sides by the river. Ananda, said Budha, you see those two lofty trees on the skirt of the wood; go and prepare a resting place for me, between those two trees, in such a way that when reclining thereupon, my head should be turned towards the north. The couch must be arranged in such a manner, that one extremity would be near one tree, and the other extremity, close to the opposite tree. Ananda, I am much fatigued and desire to rest. Though Budha's strength was equal to that of a thousand koudes of black elephants, it forsook him almost entirely from the time he had eaten the dish of Tsonda's rice and pork. Though the distance from the place of Pawa to the forest of Sala trees, in the district of Koutheinaron, is but three gawots, he was compelled to rest, through that distance, twenty five times, and it was by dint of great exertions that he reached the place after sunset. Four places, along the road from Pawa to Koutheinaron, became subsequently celebrated by the resort of many pilgrims, who visited them.

[Remarks of the Burmese Translator.—It has been often asked why Phra allowed his body to experience fatigue. The reason of his conduct has been to convey instruction to all men, and to make them fully prepared to bear pain and sickness. Should any one ask why Budha exerted himself so much to go to Neibban in that parti-

seats. Such is the implicit faith of the mass of the Buddhists. One may occasionally meet with a few individuals who laugh at those fables, but they are looked upon, in no better light, than that of rationalists, or free thinkers, by the orthodox portion of the community.
cular place, he should be answered that Budha saw three reasons for acting in the manner he did. 1st—to preach the great Soodathana. (It is the story of a Prince called Maha Soudana, who ruled over the country of Kousawatti. At the conclusion Budha declares that in that great Prince, the law of mutability has acted throughout his life, with an irresistible force; but, as to himself, he now delights at being emancipated from its thraldom, and he longs to be freed from the prison of his body.) 2nd—to instruct Thoubut and lead him to perfection; 3rd—that the disputes that were to arise on account of the division and possession of his relics, should be quieted by the Pounha Dauna, who would fairly and peaceably effectuate the partition of those sacred remains.

Phra having reached the couch, laid down on his right side, with the noble composure and undaunted fearlessness of a lion. The left leg was lying directly on the right one; but in order to avoid pain and the accom-

92.—The posture assumed by Budha on this last stage of his life has supplied the subject of an artistic composition to the Southern Buddhist sculptors. A statue representing Phra in that reclining position, is to be seen in almost every pagoda. Some of these statues are made on truly gigantic proportions. I have measured one that was forty-five feet long. If we take such rough works as exhibiting the amount of skill possessed by natives in the art of carving, we must confess that art with them, is as yet in its infancy. The huge idols I have seen with, are never made of wood or hewed stones, but they are built up with bricks. The artist having made in this way, the principal parts of the statue, covers the whole with a thick coat of mortar, the softness of which enables him to put, without much labor, the finishing hand to his work. These statues are invariably made after a certain pattern belonging to the antiquity, and to an epoch when the art was yet in its very infancy; they are, in an artistic point of view, the worst, rudest and coarsest attempts that statuary, I have ever seen. Gold is, however, profusely lavished on these shapeless and formless works. The big idol above referred to, was covered with gold, that is to say, gilt from head to feet.

Idols of smaller dimensions,—those in particular representing Budha sitting in a cross-legged position, in the attitude of meditation,—are likewise wretched specimens of art. A great many are made of a soft stone, almost white, in appearance resembling marble, and capable of receiving a most perfect polish. About three miles west of the old and ruined city of Tagain, is a place where the manufacturing of marble idols, is carried on to a great extent. The stone used by the carvers, is brought from a place north of Anerapoora, where it is abundant. It is soft, transparent, white and sometimes, when polished exhibiting a slightly bluish appearance. The in-panying trouble, the situation of the two legs was such as to prevent the immediate contact of the two ankles and knees. The forest of Sala trees lies at the southwest of the city of Koutheinaron. Should any one wish to go to the city from the forest, he must at first go due east, and then turn to the north. The place, therefore, where Phra stood was a tongue of land, surrounded on three sides by the river.

When Budha was reclining on the couch, the two Sala trees became suddenly loaded with fragrant blossoms, which gently dropped above and all round his person, so as almost to cover it. Not only these two trees, but all those of that forest, and also those in ten thousand worlds, exhibited the same wonderful and graceful appearance. All the fruit trees yielded out of season, the best fruits they had ever produced; their beauty and flavour exceeded all that had ever been seen. The five kinds of lilies shot forth from the bosom of the earth, and from every plant and tree; they displayed, to the astonished eyes, the most ravishing sight. The mighty mountain of Hymawonta which has three thousand youdzanas in extent, shone with all the richness of colors of the peacock's tail. The Nats, who watched over the two Ingien or Sala trees, showered down without interruption the most fragrant flowers. From the seats of Nats, the flower Mandawwan, which grows on the banks of the lake Mandawan, and glitters like the purest gold, with leaves expanding like an umbrella, was showered down by the Nats, together with powder of sandal wood and other odoriferous plants. The Nagas and Galongs, joining the Nats, brought from their respective seats, all kinds of flowers and perfumes which they let drop like dew, over and about Budha's sacred person. Phra seeing the wonderful display performed by men, Nats, Nagas and Galongs, to do him honor, and hearing the sweet accents of Nats' voices, singing his praises, called Ananda and said to him: you witness all that display 99 which is intended to do me

298. LEGEND OF THE BURMESE BUDDHA.

93.—If Buddha has ever deserved the surname of sage, it is assuredly on this occasion that he has entitled himself to such an honorable distinction. All nature has reversed its course on his account: wonders of the most extraordinary character have loudly proclaimed his supereminent excellencies: the most exalted beings have united their voices in extolling his transcendent merits, and showing their unbounded respect for his person; all that could dazzle the eye, please the ear and flatter the heart, had been displayed on an unparalleled scale, for doing honor to him who was about to leave this terrestrial abode. Buddha, however, solemnly declares, and hesitatingly says to Ananda, that such a display is infinitely below his merits and perfections, and can bear no comparison with his fathomless wisdom and boundless knowledge of truth. Such things, in his opinion, are mere externals, quite destitute of substantial worth; they confer no real honor to him. They, adds he, who truly do honor to me, are those who practice all that is enjoined by the most excellent law; nothing short of the observance of the law can please me; the practice of the virtues leading to perfection, give alone the right to be called my disciple. My religion can rest firmly, but on such solid foundation.

These expressions make every reader understand that, in Buddha's opinion, religion is not a mere theory, teaching fine moral precepts, destined to excite a vain admiration in the mind, or elicit useless applause; but it is a moral and practical system, making man acquainted with the duties he has to perform in order to shun vice and practice virtue. Nothing can be more explicit and positive than the notions he entertains of religion. They are worthy of the founder of a religious system, now believed and admitted, with more or less considerable variety, by nearly one fourth, or at least, one fifth of the great human family. It must be admitted that the high religious sense entertained by Buddha, and communicated, in all its purity, to his immediate disciples, has almost vanished away, in all Buddhist countries. With the people, religion consists in certain exterior observances, such as giving alms to the Talapoons, building pagodas, and making offerings during the three months especially consecrated to religious duties. The influence of religious teachers, owing to ignorance, and want of zeal, may be thought by many, to be almost null, and scarcely felt by the masses of nominal Buddhists. Two causes, however, seem to be the generators and supporters of the religious sentiment that influences the people, education, and the political institutions. The male portion of the community is brought up in the monasteries, by the Phongies. All the books that are put into their hands, and most of those that they subsequently read, are treatises on religious subjects. This system keeps up, in a wonderful manner, the knowledge of religion which exercises a great control over the actions of individuals, and regulates their conduct. But, besides, the religious element almost predominates in the body of the civil laws; it acts indirectly upon the people and must be allowed a great share of influence in all that regards their morals. It is, therefore, to political institutions that Buddhism owes much for the continuation of its existence in these regions. Were it deprived of such a powerful support, there is every reason to believe that it could not perhaps retain long its hold over the masses, when regularly and extensively attacked by the followers of another honor: it is not as yet worthy of me who possess the knowledge of the most sublime law. No one can be my true follower, or accomplish the commands of the law, by such a vain and outward homage. Every Rahan or Rahaness, every believer, man or woman, who practises the excellent works leading to perfect happiness; these are the persons that render me a true homage, and present to me a most agreeable offering. The observance of the law alone entitles to the right of belonging to my religion. Ever remember this, O Ananda, and let every believer in my religion act up to it.

Why did Budha, on this last occasion, lay little stress on the offerings that were made, whilst on former occasions he had much extolled the innumerable merits to be derived from the making of offerings? The reason of his conduct was to give every one to understand, that religion could not subsist, unless by the practice of all the duties it commands, and that it would soon disappear, were it supported only by almsdeeds, offerings and other outward ceremonies. Almsdeeds are productive of great rewards; but the practice of virtue alone, secures to religion a prolonged existence.

At that time an illustrious Rahaness, named Oupalawana, at a single word from Budha, lowered her fan and system. But the first cause is, by far the weightier and the most influential.

* In the first edition of this work, the writer had made an error, in supposing Oupalawana to have been a male Religious. Another palm leaf manuscript that he has consulted, leaves no doubt upon her real character. She was, among the female body of Religious, the disciple of the left, and Kama, who had been for many years, the first wife of King Pimpathara, was the disciple of the right. Oupalawana belonged to a distinguished family of Kanlapot. The female portion of the Thanga or Assembly, was constituted after the male of the Rahan. Thripata and Manakhan were respectively the disciples of the right and of the left. One of the duties of the Rahaness of the left, was to fan Budha on certain occasions, and render to him such services, as were compatible with her sex. The order of Nuns in Burma, in our days, has fallen very low. Instead of the yellow color, they have adopted the white one for their dress, which, in other respects, resembles that of the Phongies. Their head is shaved. They are to be seen in the neighborhood of Pagodas, and in the streets, going about to beg the food required for their maintenance. The only large convent of these Nuns which went to sit at a certain distance. Ananda, who had seen this Rahaness attending assiduously on Budha’s person, during more than twenty seasons, was surprised at seeing that, without any apparent reason, she had been desired on that occasion, to withdraw to a distance. Phra, reading in the soul of Ananda his innermost thoughts, said to him: Ananda, I am not displeased with Oupalawana, but her body being of a very large size, it prevents the myriads of Nats, that have come from 10,000 worlds, to see and contemplate me on this supreme moment. The Nats can see through the bodies of the generality of men, but this power falls short, with persons much advanced in merits. I therefore, desired her to remove a little far, that the Nats might not be angry at not seeing my person.

Ananda put a great many questions to Budha, which are related at full length in the Parinibana Thoots.

He asked him among other topics, how the Rahans were to behave when women should resort to their monasteries. 94 Ananda, answered Budha, a Rahan desirous have ever met, is one on the right bank of the Irawady, about five miles north of Tsagain. It contains about forty or fifty inmates. Some of them belong to good families, and reside in the house for a few years, after which they return into their home. That house is under the special protection of the King, who supplies the Nuns with all the necessaries of life. In the valley of Tavoy, a small convent also has been pointed out to the writer. It was situated on a beautiful spot, west of the river. When he went to see it, he was surprised to meet with two or three old women, habitated in the canonical dress, who appeared to be wretchedly poor and slovenly in their dress. The house was in every respect in keeping with the exterior appearance of the tenants. The Nuns do absolutely no work, except in certain localities where, they try to do away with a portion of their time, in clearing the weeds which grow so luxuriantly in the enclosure of some famous Pagoda. They have no schools to teach girls, the rudiments of reading and writing. They are, on this head, greatly behind the Buddhist monks who have assumed upon themselves the great and important task of teaching boys in the towns and villages.

94—The founder of Buddhism shows himself on this particular subject a consummately moralist. He who can have spoken as he did, on this truly delicate point, must have been deeply versed in the knowledge of human nature, and thoroughly acquainted with its frailties and weaknesses. Budha desired to maintain the members of the assembly in a state of spotless purity. To attain that desirable object, he thinks of raising the strongest barrier against the wildest passion of the heart. No virtue, in his opinion, to free himself from the sting of concupiscence, and keep his heart firm and steady, ought to have his door shut, can withstand the incessant assaults directed against it; by a daily and familiar intercourse with persons of another sex. He would have, if possible, the inmate of a cell in a monastery, out of the reach of temptation itself;
he knows that the best tactics against such an enemy, do not consist in boldly meeting the adversary, but rather in carefully avoiding encounter with him, manoeuvring in such a way as to keep far from it. Hence idle conversations with female visitors, are not only forbidden in a most positive manner, but the very sight of women is to be, if possible, avoided. When duty shall oblige a recluse to come face to face with the enemy, it is his bounden obligation to keep at as great a distance from female visitors as practicable. The subject of the conversation ought to be of a purely religious character; some portions of the law may be expounded; doubts of conscience may be proposed, and a solution given to them, &c., &c. On such occasions, the spiritual adviser is never to be left alone, but he must be surrounded by some of his brethren or disciples, at all times very numerous in the monasteries.

It is not without interest to place oneself in the centre of the Budhistic system, and examine therefrom, the motives that have induced Budha to enjoin celibacy on all the members of the Assembly, and enforce it with the utmost rigor, by all the means that the profoundest moralist could devise.
The philosophy of Budhism has for its primary object to lead man into the way of freeing himself from the influence produced upon the soul by exterior objects, through the medium or channel of the senses. That influence sets in motion the various passions which darken the intellect and trouble the heart, opposing an insuperable barrier to the attainment of intuition of truth, and to the progress towards the state of quiescence, so ardently coveted and longed for, by every true Budhist. No one is ripe for the state of Neibhan, as long as he retains affection for things without self.
The last and greatest effort of wisdom, is the emancipation of self, from every possible influence created and produced by objects or things distinct from self. Concupiscence, as the meaning of the word implies, is that disposition of the soul to search after, long for, and cleave to, things placed without self. Such a disposition is diametrically opposed to the perfect independence aimed at, by a perfect Budhist, and leads to results the very reverse of those to be arrived at; it retains man in the vortex of never ending existences, and precludes him from the possibility of ever reaching the state of Neibhan. Concupiscence, taken in a more restricted and limited meaning, signifying the propensity to the indulgence of sensual pleasures, by the union of sexes, must ever prove the greatest obstacle in the way leading to perfection, inasmuch as it fosters in men the strongest affection to external objects.

Budha is great, in his own opinion, because he has conquered all passions, not by curbing them under the yoke of reason, but by rooting them out of his very being. When he wished to become an ascetic, he practised, at first, self renouncing, not merely by giving up riches, palaces, dignities and honors, but chiefly and principally by denying to himself and forever, the enjoyment of sensual pleasures. A firm and unshaken resolution of parting forever with his wife, concubines, and living in a perpetual celibacy, was considered as a preliminary and essential step for entering upon the course of life of a sincere searcher after truth and perfection. During the six years, and never look at the women coming to the monastery or standing at the entrance; because, through the eyes, concupiscence finds its way into the heart and shakes its firmest purposes. But, replied Ananda, what is to be done when they come over to bring food to the inmates of the monastery? Ananda, said Budha, in such a case, no conversation is to take place with them. Much safer and better it would be, to hold conversation with a man, who, sword in hand, would threaten to cut off our head.

he spent in solitude, he laboured with unremitting zeal for securing, to the spiritual principle, an undisputed control over the material one, by stilling the vehemence and ardour of his passions. His austerities and mortifications during that long period had no other object but that of weakening at first, and finally destroying passions, and, in particular, concupiscence. When he is praised in the writings, he is much extolled for having come out from the net of passions. His victory over concupiscence is repeatedly alluded to as the greatest of all achievements. The master, therefore, having laid such stress on this favorite and important axiom, could not but preach and enjoin it, to all his future imitators and disciples. The earliest records of Buddhism bear testimony to the paramount importance attached to the practice of chastity. It has ever been considered as an essential requirement in all those that have desired to follow the footsteps of Budha, and imitate his mode of life. No qualification, ever so great and shining, could be admitted as substitute for chastity. Science, talent, zeal, and fervor could never entitle an individual to the distinction of member of the assembly of the perfect, without having previously given up the gratification of sensual pleasures. Independently of what is found written on this subject in the Wini, or book of discipline, the opinion of the Buddhist public, is, on this subject, positive, universal, and absolute. He who leaves the condition of layman, to become a religious, must live in a state of perfect continence. An infraction of the regulations, on this point, is looked upon with horror and inignation by the people at large. The guilty individual is inexorably expelled from the religious house, after having been previously stripped of his religious dress and subjected to an humiliating degradation in the presence of the assembled members of the community. Nothing short of such a severe treatment could satisfy a public so deeply hurt and offended in their religious feelings. How is it that the practice of perfect continence is not merely a desideratum in an individual consecrated to religion, but an absolutely required qualification, which cannot be equivalently supplied by any other moral or scientific attainment? How is it that such a notion is universally adhered to, by nations noted for the undoubted laxity of their morals? Can a notion so generally believed, and so tenaciously retained, in spite of its direct opposition to the wildest and the deepest passion of the heart, be ever called a prejudice? Is it possible to trace its connection with some of the noblest feelings of our nature and the most refined ideas of our mind? To a superficial and biased observer, many things appear contradictory and irreconcilable, which a serious, acute and dispassionate inquirer after truth, readily comprehends, easily connects and accounts for, and satisfactorily conciliates one with the other. or with a female Biloo, ready to devour us, the moment we open the mouth to speak. By conversing with women, one becomes acquainted with them; acquaintance begets familiarity, kindles passion, leads to the loss of virtue and precipitates into the four states of punishment. It is, therefore, most prudent not to have any conversation with them. What is to be done, O Budha, in cases when women come to the monastery to hear religious instructions, to expose their doubts, to seek for spiritual advice, to learn the practice of religious duties, and render becomingly certain services to the Rahans? Should a Rahan be silent on such occasions, they will ridicule him, and say: this Rahan forsooth, is deaf, or too well fed: he, therefore, cannot speak. Ananda, replied Budha, when, on such occasion, a Rahan is obliged to speak, let him consider as mothers, those who are old enough to be his mothers; as elder sisters, those who appear a little older than he; as younger sisters or children, those that are younger than he. Never, O Ananda, forget these instructions.

Ananda inquired from Budha what ceremonies were to be performed on his mortal remains, after his demise. Ananda, replied Budha, do not be much concerned about what shall remain of me after my Neibban: but be rather earnest to practice the works that lead to perfection. Be not over solicitous concerning the affairs of this life, where the principle of change is ever entire; put on those inward dispositions, which will enable you to reach the undisturbed rest of Neibban. There are many among the Princes, Rich men and Pounhas, who are well disposed towards me, and who will gladly perform all the usual ceremonies, on my remains. They will, replied Ananda, no doubt come to me, and ask advice as to the most suitable mode of arranging every thing in a becoming manner. Ananda, answered Budha, here are the funeral ceremonies performed after the death of a Tsekia-waday King. When such a monarch is dead, they wrap his body with a new fine cloth of Kathicaritz, surround it with a thick layer of the whitest cotton, wrap it again with a second cloth of the same country, place over it another layer of cotton, and repeat the same process five hundred times. The body thus prepared, is deposited in an open coffin, gilt outside, and rubbed inside with fragrant oil. Another coffin also gilt, is turned over it as a covering. The pile is made of sandal and other odoriferous woods; flowers, perfumes, and scented water are profusely spread over it. The coffin having been placed on the pile, fire is set to it. Similar ceremonies shall be performed on my body after my death. On the spot where four roads meet, a dzedi is to be erected. Whoever shall come to that place, and make offerings of flags, umbrellas, flowers and perfumes, shall thereby perform an act of religion, and give a token of his respect and affection for my person. He shall gain many merits, among others a complete exemption from all troubles and disquietudes during a long period. Ananda, four sorts of persons are deserving of the honor of having dzedis erected after their death. 1, the Budha who

95.—It is curious to investigate the origin and the real nature of the worship and honor paid by Buddhists to Guadama, to his relics, to his statues, as well as to comments erected for enshrining and sheltering those objects of devotion. The attempt at elucidating this point is beset with difficulties. The more we attentively reflect on the inward operations of the soul, in all that relates to religion, the more we find ourselves puzzled, and hesitating in qualifying and selecting the appellation most befitting them.

All the simple terms of our language intended to express all sorts of acts of worship and adoration paid to objects partaking of a religious nature, are inadequate to represent to us, by sounds, the nature of the inward workings of the soul, when she carries on a pious intercourse with the object of her devotion. The terms that are used, merely express to us, the exterior acts of worship, as manifested by peculiar attitudes of the body, which vary according to the habits and customs of various nations, or by singing, making offerings or other visible signs. They may be, in fact, they are, used with equal fitness, all over the world, by the worshipers of the true God, as well as by the adorers of idols. The difference between the true and false worship does not consist, therefore, in the externals, nor in the ceremonies, or exterior signs that make impression on the ear and the eye, but it is to be found in reality, in the objects that the adorers have in view. Here lies the essential difference between the true and false worship.
LEGEND OF THE BURMESE BUDHA.

possesses the infinite science; 2, a semi-Budha; 3, a Rahanda; 4, the Tsekiawaday King. He who builds a

This being premised, we have naturally to ask: what is Gaudama, the great and principal object of worship to all Buddhists? Gaudama, in their opinion, is a more man, that has attained by the practice of virtue, and principally by his almost infinite science, the highest point of perfection a being can ever reach. The first qualification entitles him to the unbounded admiration of his followers: it inspires them with expressions the best calculated to eulogize him, and represent him as the first and greatest of all beings. Again, Gaudama is represented to them, full of benevolence and compassion for all beings, whom he earnestly wishes to deliver from their miseries, and help them to obtain that state in which they come for ever to a perfect rest from all transmigrations, or to what they emphatically call the deliverance. The second qualification is much insisted upon by Buddhists, and from it, originate those feelings of love, tender affection for him who has labored so much for enlightening all beings, and showing to them the way that leads to the deliverance. Buddhists on this subject are very eloquent. The writer has often admired many fine thoughts, and truly beautiful expressions, met in some writings devoted to the praises of Budha.

It may be asked whether the followers of Gaudama, in the worship they pay the author of their religion, expect any aid or assistance from him. The answer is an easy one. Gaudama to them, is no more. His interference with the affairs of this world or of his religion, has absolutely ceased with his existence. He sees no one; he hears no prayer; he can afford no help neither here on earth, nor in any other state of existence. In fact, to the Buddhists there is no providence, and consequently, there can be no real prayer, none of the feelings that constitute its essence. All the worship of Gaudama may be summed up in a few words: he is admired as the greatest, wisest and most benevolent of all beings; he is praised, eulogized as much as language can express; he is the object of a tender affection, for the good that he has done. No idea whatever of a supreme being is to be met within the genuine worship paid to Gaudama, by his most enthusiastic adherents. It cannot be denied that in practice Buddhists of these parts betray oft n, without perceiving it, that they have some vague idea about a supreme being, who has a controlling power in the affairs of this world and the destiny of man. But such an idea does not come from their religious creed; it is the off-spring of that innate sentiment adherent to our nature, as is maintained by some philosophers; or it is a remnant of a primitive tradition, which error has never been able entirely to obliterate, as asserted by others.

The worship paid to Budha, does not extend further than it has been above stated, since it is always placed on a footing of equality with the one due to the law and to the assembly. These three precious things are always enumerated together; no distinction is made between them; they are equally entitled to the veneration of all believers.

Let us come now to the veneration offered to the statues and relics of Gaudama and to the religious monuments, called dzealia. In the foregoing pages we have seen Budha giving to two brothers, who had requested him to supply them with some object of worship, eight hairs of his head. After his death, and the combustion of his body, the remaining bones or parts of bones, even the very ashes and charcoal were piously coveted with an

eagerness, that indicated the high value people set on these articles. According to several Buddhist authors, Gaudama, previous to his death intimated to his disciples that his religion was to last five thousand years; that, as he would be no longer among his believers, in a visible manner, he wished that they would keep up his statues, as his representatives, and pay to them the same honor they would pay to his own person. Relying upon this positive injunction, the Buddhist looks on the statues of Budha, as objects destined to remind him of Budha: they are the visible remembrances of him who is infinitely dear to his affection; they put him, by their variety of shapes, and form, in remembrance of the principal events connected with his existence. The Princes that have been most remarkable for their religious zeal and piety, such as Auzatathat and Atheka, were anxious to multiply the statues of Budha, and the religious monuments, to nourish into the soul of all the faithful, as says our Burmese author, a feeling of tender affection, of lovely disposition for the person of Budha and his holy religion. The relics being articles that have been most intimately connected with Budha's person, they are designed to act on the religious feeling of the people, even more powerfully than the statues. They are treasured up with the greatest care, worshipped with the profoundest respect, looked upon with a most affectionate regard. No earthly treasure can be compared with them. As Budha's sacred person is more valuable in their eyes, than the whole world, his relics partake of that invaluable estimation. It becomes evident that the statues and relics are so much valued, esteemed and worshipped, because of the intimate connection they have with the person of Budha, and the great help they afford in keeping alive a religious spirit and a tender affection for him.

In the worship of statues and relics, superstition has had its share too, in giving an undue extension and development to the religious sentiment. This development has brought into existence the belief in prodigies, and miracles worked by the virtue of the relics. This popular error has always found a powerful support among the ignorant masses; it has been much propagated by that inordinate and irrational tendency towards all that is new and extraordinary. Man wants but a pretext, even a very futile one, to give credit to the most incredible occurrences, when they have a reference to a deeply cherished, and, as it were, favorite object. But in no way do we find genuine Buddhism countenancing such spiritual eccentricities or extravagancies, which have their origin in ignorance and an inordinate fondness of the marvelous.

The articles of worship offered to, or placed before, the statues of Budha and the shrines supposed to contain some of his relics, are few and remarkable for their simplicity. They consist in flowers arranged in fine bouquets, in flags and streamers made of cloth, sometimes of paper, and cut into a great variety of figures, with considerable taste and skill. There are to be seen also small wax candles, little earthen lamps, and sometimes incense and scented wood, which are consumed in large burners, placed on pedestals made of masonry. The worshippers are generally in a squatting position, the back resting on the heels, the body slightly bending forward, the joined hands raised to the forehead. Ordinarily a string of flowers, or little bits of wood, adorned with a small paper flag, are held on these occasions. On the days of worship, particularly during the three months of lent, the crowd of build a dzedi in honor of a semi-Budha, an inferior reward shall be awarded in a lower seat of Nats, and a similar reward shall be enjoyed by those who erect dzedis in honor of Rahandas and Tsekiawaday Kings. It may be asked why the honor of a dzedi is conferred on a King who lives in the world, enjoys its pleasures, &c., whilst it is denied to a Rahan, who has renounced the world and practised the excellent works. Formerly, in Ceylon, the dzedis erected in honor of deceased Rahans, became so numerous, that they threatened to cover the superficies of the whole country. It was then resolved that none should be built for Rahans, though it is acknowledged that they deserve such distinction. The same reason does not exist for a Tsekiawaday King who is alone and appears in that world at but distant intervals. But all the Rahans that are full of merits, are deserving, after their demise, of all honors except that of a dzedi.

When Budha had finished his instruction, Ananda thought within himself: Phra, the most excellent among all beings, has just taught me how to honor dzedis and other religious monuments raised to the glory of religion; he has pointed out to me the source of merits: he has indicated to me the sure way to deal with women, when they resort to our monasteries, for the purpose of hearing the preaching of the law and finally he has declared that there were but four sorts of persons de-people of all age, sex and conditions, resorting to the most venerated pagoda of the place, is truly extraordinary. Men and women of a certain age, have in their hands, a string of beads, upon which they repeat the formula Aneita, Duka, Anatta, or some other.

Since the Buddhist knows that his Budha is no more, and therefore, can afford him no assistance whatever, that there is no virtue inherent in his relics or images, in fact, that there is no Providence, it is difficult to account for the zeal that he often displays, in honoring the great founder of his religion and all that has a reference to him. To account satisfactorily for such a moral phenomenon, we must bear in mind the belief that he has in the intrinsic worth of the devotional practices he performs. These works are good per se; they give rise, power and energy to the law of merits, or to the good influence which will procure to him abundant rewards in future existences, and gradually lead him to the harbor of deliverance, the object of his most ardent wishes. That hope is, as it were, the great feeder of his devotion.
serving of the honor of a dzedi, after their death. From the tenor of these instructions, I know with certainty that, on this very day, Budha is to enter the state of Neibban. Unwilling to show his profound affliction in the presence of his illustrious master, he retired into the hall of the Malla Princes, close by, and leaning on the door bolt, he wept bitterly and said: Alas! the most excellent Budha soon shall be no more. By what means shall I obtain the three last degrees of perfection? Who shall be my teacher? To whom shall I henceforth bring water in the morning, to wash the face? Whose feet shall I have to wipe dry? For whom shall I prepare the place for sitting, and the couch for sleeping? Whose Patta and Tsiwaran shall I have to hold ready, and to whom shall I render the ordinary services? In the midst of sobs and wailings, he was giving vent to his deep affliction.

It was not long, ere Budha not observing the faithful Ananda among the Rahans said: My dear Rahans, where is Ananda? Having been informed of all that was taking place, he desired a Rahan to go and call Ananda. The message having been conveyed rapidly to Ananda, he hastened to come back into the presence of Budha, whom he saluted as usual, and then took his seat. Budha addressing him, said: O Ananda, your tears and lamentations are to no purpose; do not give yourself up to disquietude; cease to shed tears. Have I not previously said to you that distance or death must separate us from the dearest objects? In the body there is a principle which causes its existence and its preservation as long as the opposite principle of destruction does not prevail. It is true you have ministered unto me, for many years, with all your strength and the most perfect devotedness. But you shall reap the reward due for so many good offices. Apply yourself to the exercise of Kamatan, and soon you shall be freed from the world of passions, and the influence of mutability.

Addressing then, with a gentle voice, all the Rahans present, Budha began to praise Ananda, saying: Beloved Rahans, Ananda has been during many years my faith-

96—On a former occasion Budha had raised his voice to bestow praises on the memory of the great Thariputra, whose relics he was holding on the palm of one of his hands, in the presence of the assembled Rahans. Now, a short time before he yields up the ghost, he summons all his strength, and at great length, passes the highest eulogy on his amiable and ever devoted attendant, the truly kind-hearted Ananda. These are the only two instances mentioned in this compilation, when Budha has condescended to eulogize the great virtues and eminent merits of two disciples. In Thariputra, Budha extolled the transcendant mental attainments, the heroic achievements in the practice of virtue, the fervor and zeal for the propagation of religion, which had ever distinguished the illustrious friend of Manikalan. In Ananda the searching and keen eye of Budha discovered excellencies of a less shining and bright hue, but in point of sterling worth, second to none. Ananda is a matchless pattern of gentleness, amiability, devotedness and placid religious zeal. He loves all his brethren, and he is, in return, beloved by them all. His superior goodness of heart and placidity of temper secure to him an almost undisputed precedence over the other members of the assembly. Tearing the veil that conceals futurity from our eager regards, Budha foretells the future conquests to be made by the mild and persuasive eloquence of his ever dearly beloved disciple. The far spread fame of Ananda shall, in days to come, attract crowds of visitors, eager to see and hear him. The sight of his graceful and lovely appearance, shall rivet on his person, the attention and affection of all. Euraptured at the flow of this tender, touching and heart moving eloquence, visitors shall eagerly listen to him: they will experience sadness only when his silence shall deprive them of that food, their mind and heart were feasting on.

The eulogium of Ananda by Budha is unquestionably one of the finest passages of the Legend. Diversel of its original beauties, by having passed through several translations, it retains, however, something that charms and pleases. The reader is involuntarily reminded of similar specimens, found here and there, in the earliest records of antiquity.

In the instructions that Ananda is to give to laymen, it is somewhat curious to see Budha distinctly stating that Ananda will exhort the people to make offerings, both to Rahans and to Pounhas, that is to say, to the members of the Assembly, and to the Brahmins. From this passage, it becomes evident, that in the days of our Budha, the two sects that were subsequently to struggle, during many ages for superiority over the Indian Peninsula, subsisted free from imetical feelings towards each other. It might be said that no line of separation kept them apart, indicating or pointing out their respective limits. The wide gap that was, during succeeding centuries, to intervene between those two great religious sects, was, not perceptibly felt. The levelling results of Buddhism had not yet awakened the susceptibilities of the proud Brahmins. Buddhists and Brahmins lived on friendly terms and looked upon each other as brethren. The discrepancies in the respective creeds, were regarded with indifference, as involving only philosophical subtleties, well suited to afford occupation to ideologists, and give to disputants the opportunity of displaying their abilities in arguing, reasoning and defining. It is not easy to determine whether the conduct of Budha was regulated by a well calculated policy, intended to calm the suspicious scruples of his opponents, or whether he was actuated by plain and straightforward ful and devoted attendant. He has served him who is worthy to receive all offerings, and is, moreover, acquainted with all the laws of the physical and moral world. Ananda is a true sage; he is well versed in all that relates to my person; he can show to the male Rahans and female Rahans, as well as to the crowds, the time, the moment and the place to approach my person, and pay the honors due to me. Ananda is graceful and full of amiability amidst all other Rahans. He has heard and seen much; he shines in the midst of the Assembly. Rahans will come from a distance on hearing all that is said of his graces, to see and admire him; and all will agree in saying that what they observe, surpasses all that they had heard. Ananda will make enquiries regarding their health; they, on hearing his words, will be filled with joy. He will then keep silent, and they will retire with an increased desire to listen to him. He will say to the female Rahans that will come to see him: Sisters, observe the eight precepts. On hearing Ananda, they will be exceedingly glad. He will then remain silent, and his silence will grieve them. The laymen and laywomen, on hearing all that is said of Ananda, shall come to contemplate him. He will say to them: Adhere to the three precious things; observe the five great commands; keep the four days of worship of each month; pay honor and respect to your father and mother; feed the Rahans and Pounhas that observe strictly the law. They will all be delighted at hearing his instructions. His silence will leave them earnestly wishing to hear something else from him. Beloved Rahans, Ananda much resembles a Tsekiawaday King. Like him, he is exceedingly beautiful, amiable and lovely: He can fly through the air: He can teach the people, and justly administer the law.

When Budha had finished his discourse, Ananda said:

principles. It is probable that, at that time, many Brahmans followed a mode of life, almost similar to that of the disciples of Budha; they were therefore, entitled to the same honors and support.
LEGEND OF THE BURMESE BUDDHA.

O illustrious Budha, it is not becoming your dignity, that you should go to Neibban near such a small city, and in a place almost surrounded by forests. We are in the neighborhood of the great countries of Tsampa, Thawatte, Thakila and Baranathee. The Kings, Pounhas, Noblemen and people of those countries, are full of love and reverence for your person. They could render greater honors to your mortal remains. Ananda, replied Budha, do not call the country of Koutheinaron, a small country. I have on former occasions often been to this place and extolled its riches and crowded population. This is the place where it is most becoming I should enter into the state of Neibban. Go now to the city, and inform the Malla Princes that, to-morrow morning, at the break of the day, the most excellent Budha shall go to Neibban. Let them have not to complain, hereafter, that they have not received a timely information of this event, nor say that they had not had a last opportunity to come and see me. Ananda, putting on his dress and carrying his patta, went alone to the city. At that moment the Princes were assembled in the hall to deliberate upon some important affair. As soon as the message was delivered, the Princes, with their wives, their sons and daughters began to cry aloud: Alas! the most excellent Budha is too soon going to Neibban. Some appeared with dishevelled hair; some lifted their hands to their foreheads; some crying out, and wailing, threw themselves on the ground, rolling and tossing about, as persons whose hands and feet had been cut off. They all set out in haste, with Ananda at their head, towards the place where Budha was lying on his couch. All of them were admitted into the presence of Budha and paid their respects to him.

In the city of Koutheinaron lived a certain personage holding heretical opinions. 97 His name was Thoubat, a

97.—Budha had so much at heart the conversion of the heretic Thoubat, that the earnest desire of performing this great and meritorious action, was one of the three motives that induced him to select the comparatively in-Pounha of the Oudeitsa race, who wore a white dress. His mind, hitherto uncertain and unfixed, hesitated be-significant city of Kontheimaron, for the last stage of his existence. Particulars regarding that personage would prove interesting, because he is the last convert Budha made. From what has been alluded to, in some Buddhistic writings, regarding Thoubat, it is certain that he was of the caste of Pounbas or Brahmans. He had studied in some of the numerous schools of philosophy, at that time so common in India. From his way of addressing Budha, there is no doubt but he was acquainted with the principal theories, upheld by the most renowned masters in those days. It is related of Thoubat, that during former existences, he was tilling a field, and one of his brothers, when some Brahans happened to pass by. His brother gave abundant alms to the holy personages, whilst Thoubat showed less liberal dispositions. When, then, Budha appeared, the law was announced to the generous donor and in company with eighteen Koundes of Brahmas, he obtained the state of Thantapan. The rather parsimonious Thoubat obtained the favor of conversion at the eleventh hour. He must have, however, subsequently atoned for this offence, as his dispositions seem to have been of the highest order, when he came into Budha's presence. In a few hours he had gone over the four ways leading to perfection, and had become a Rahanda.

In the days of Budha, the philosophical schools of India seem to have had six eminent teachers, whose doctrines exhibited on some points a considerable variance. Reading a book of religious controversy between a Christian and a Buddhist, composed more than a hundred years ago, by a Catholic priest at Ava, the writer has had the chance of meeting with a faint outline of the leading tenets upheld by the six teachers, so often alluded to, in this compilation. One of them maintained the existence and agency of numberless genii, who at their will, could favor man with fortune and every possible temporal benefit, as well as visit him with their displeasure, by depriving him of all happiness, and heaping misery and all sorts of calamities over his head. Genialatry was the necessary consequence flowing from such a principle. A second teacher denied, at once the dogma of metempsychosis, and maintained that every being had the innate power of reproducing by way of generation, &c., another being of similar nature. A third one had singular notions regarding the nature of man. He said that he had his beginning in the womb of his mother, and that death was the end and destruction of his being: such a destruction he called Nibhan. A fourth teacher taught that all beings had neither beginning nor end, and that there existed no influence of good and bad deeds. A fifth doctor defined Nibhan, a long life, like that of Nats and Brahmans. He saw no harm in the killing of animals, and he asserted the existence of a state of reward and punishment. The last teacher boldly asserted the existence of a Supreme Being, creator of all that exists, and alone worthy of receiving adorations.

Thoubat's mind was rather perplexed by so many contradictory and opposite opinions and doctrines. He had lived, it appears, in a state of doubt and uncertainty, fluctuating, as it were, between conflicting theories which could not carry conviction to his soul. He had heard of Budha and wished to see him, hoping that perhaps he might fall in, with the truth he was so ardently panting after. With these dispositions, he came to the spot where Budha was lying on his couch, in the hope of easing his mind from the tween the belief in Buddha's doctrines and his former opinions. Having been informed that there was a Buddha in the neighbourhood, and that he was soon to go to Nirvana, he desired to see him, and, in his conversation, to clear up his doubts. His age was not great, but he enjoyed such a renown for learning that he was called the master of masters. Thoubat went, at first, to Ananda, stated to him that he felt irresistibly a strong attachment to, and a sincere affection for, the great Buddha, that his mind was preyed upon by doubts and uncertainties, and that he hoped a short conversation with the great Gaudama would relieve his mind from its present painful situation. Ananda, fearing that such a conversation might be much state of doubt, and fixing it in truth. Like a man of consummate abilities in the way of arguing and at once convincing his adversary, Buddha sets aside all that was put forward by his assailant, and coming at once to the point, preaches to him the true doctrine. As light dispels darkness, so truth disperses the mist of errors. Thoubat seeing truth, at once embraced it, gladly ridding himself from the burden of errors that had hitherto weighed down his soul. All his doubts vanished away, and he found himself, on a sudden, safely anchored in the calm and never agitated harbour of perfect truth.

Next to the conversion of Thoubat, follows an interesting instruction delivered to Ananda and the assembled Rahans. Here Buddha displays the superiority of his lofty mind. Clinging to the principles of abstract truth, he has no regard for persons or things. This material world, man included, is, in his opinion, a mere illusion, exhibiting nothing real, but only an uninterrupted succession of changes, which exclude the idea of immutable fixity. He apparently has no wish to infuse consolation into the afflicted souls of his disciples. He supposes that, being all initiated, in the knowledge of truth, and having entered in the ways of perfection, they must know that the person of a Buddha is subjected to the law of mutability, and, therefore, to destruction or to death. He says plainly to them that his absence from among them is a circumstance scarcely worth noticing; by his doctrines contained in the Abhidama, the Thots and the Wini, he will ever be present among them. In these sacred writings, they will possess something more valuable than his material being; they will have, and enjoy the truth that was in him, and that he has communicated to them by his oral instructions. He earnestly invites them to lay stress only on that doctrine they have received from him.

It is hardly necessary to notice a serious anachronism made by the unskilful compiler of this legend, on this occasion. We know that Buddha wrote nothing, and that the compilation of his doctrines, and its division in three distinct portions, has been the work of the three great councils held after Gaudama's death or Nirvana. How could the dying originator of Buddhism speak of compilations of his doctrines, which were not, a yet, existing?
protracted, refused to admit Thoubat into the presence of Budha, representing his extreme weakness and inability to speak much. Thoubat made several instances, but with no better success. Ananda persisted in his refusal to introduce him. Budha hearing some noise, enquired from Ananda what was the cause of the noise he heard. Ananda related to him all that had taken place between him and Thoubat. Allow him to come, said Budha, I wish to hear him. Soon he shall be enlightened and convinced. I have come to this spot, for the very purpose of preaching to him the most perfect law. Ananda returned to Thoubat and said to him: the most excellent Budha desires to see you. Thoubat, full of joy, arrived in the presence of Budha, saluted him, and, sitting at a becoming distance, said to him: Do the six celebrated teachers, who are always attended by a great number of disciples, who are famous amidst other doctors, know all laws? Are there some laws they are unacquainted with, or do they teach some doctrines which they but partially understand? Budha, having gently reminded Thoubat that such questions were not suitable and unprofitable, said: O Thoubat, I will preach to you the law; listen with attention to my words; and treasure them in your heart. No heretic has ever known the right ways that lead to perfection, and, in the religion of heretics, no one can obtain the state of Thautapan, and become a Rahanda. But in my religion, there are found persons that have become Thautapan, Anagam, &c., and finally Rahandass. Except in my religion, the twelve great disciples who practise the highest virtues, and stir up the world, to free it from its state of indifference, are not to be met with. They are not to be found among heretics. O Thoubat, from the age of twenty-nine years, up to this moment, I have striven to obtain the supreme and perfect science; and I have spent to that end, fifty-one years, following the ways of Ariahs, that lead to Neibban. On hearing these words, Thoubat, overwhelmed with joy, endeavoured, by several similitudes, to express to his great instructor, the pleasure he had derived from his preaching. O most illustrious Budha, added he, now I believe in you, and adhere to all your doctrines; I wish to become a Rahan. But it is a custom with you, not to admit to the dignity of Rahan, an heretic who is newly converted, but after a four month's probation. I wish to remain during that period as a probationer, and beg afterwards to be admitted among the Rahans. Budha, who knew the fervour of the new convert, desired to dispense in his case with the four month's probation. He called Ananda and commanded him to admit Thoubat to the dignity of Rahan. Ananda forthwith led Thoubat into a becoming place, poured water over his head, whilst repeating certain formulas of prayers, shaved his head and beard, put on him the tsiwaran, and taught him to repeat the formulas whereby he professed to take refuge in Budha, the Law and the Assembly. When this was done, Thoubat was conducted into the presence of Phra, who desired he should be promoted to the dignity of Patzin, and instructed in the knowledge of Kamatan. Thoubat went into the garden, walked for a while, and soon learnt the forty Kamatans. He was the last convert Budha made, before he entered the state of Neibban.

Budha calling Ananda and all the Rahans, said to them: when I shall have disappeared from the state of existence, and be no longer with you, do not believe that the Budha has left you and ceased to dwell among you. You have the Thoots and Abidama which to you I have preached: you have the discipline and regulations of the Wini. The law, contained in those sacred instructions, shall be, after my demise, your teacher. By the means of the doctrines which I have delivered to you, I will continue to remain amongst you. Do not, therefore, think or believe that the Budha has disappeared or is no more with you.

A little while after, Budha, addressing the Rahans, gave them some instructions regarding the attention and respect the Rahans were to pay to each other. As long said he, as I have been with you, you have called one another by the name of Awoothau; but after my demise, you will no more make use of such a title. Let those who are more advanced in dignity and in years of profession, call those that are their inferiors, by their names, that of their family, or some other suitable appellation; let the inferiors give to their superiors the title of Bante. Ananda, let a Rahan Hauna be visited with the punishment of Brahma. But what is this punishment? replied Ananda. The Rahan Hauna is indiscreet in his speech; he says indiscriminately all that comes to his head. Let the other Rahans avoid speaking with him or even rebuking him. This is the punishment of Brahma.

Addressing again all the assembled Rahans, Budha said to them: my beloved Bickus, if among you there be one...

98—Budha's zeal is not chilled in the least by the cold of approaching death. His boundless knowledge enabled him at a glance to obtain the most intimate acquaintance of the inward dispositions of his disciples' minds. If, therefore, he asked them three successive times, whether they entertained doubts on some doctrinal points, it was not to satisfy himself that their faith was firm and unshaken. "He wished to make them conscious of a fact which was felt and clearly understood by every one in particular, but was not as yet fully appreciated by the universality of his disciples. Every individual in particular was well aware of the unwavering dispositions of his mind respecting Budha's teachings; but no one ever had the opportunity of ascertaining that all his brethren had the same firmness of belief. On this solemn occasion, they witnessed the most comforting sight of a perfect unity of faith, in all the members of the assembly. Budha revealed then one great truth which no one, but himself, could be acquainted with. A true Rahan, says he, has entered at last, in the first way that leads to perfection—he is, therefore, no more exposed to the danger of wavering in his belief; he knows enough of truth to adhere firmly to it, and is enabled to prosecute safely his researches after what is still unknown to him. Every member of the assembly is a true believer, more or less advanced in the knowledge of the law; it is true, but at least, he is conscious of his being in the right way. On this subject, no doubt subsists in his mind; he adheres to Budha and his doctrines, as to the centre of truth, and never thinks for a moment to question the veracity of his doctor, or to call in doubt any portion of his instructions.

The last words of Budha to the assembled Bickus, are designed to remind them of the great and vital principle he endeavoured to inculcate in their minds during the forty-five years of his preaching, viz: that change and mutability are acting upon all that exists, and are inherent in all parts of nature. This world, therefore, offering but an endless variety of forms, that appear and disappear, has no real existence. It is an illusion from beginning to end. As long as man remains tied up, if this expression may that has any doubt respecting Budha, the Law, the Assembly, the ways of perfections and the practice of virtues, let him come forward and make known his doubts, that I may clear them up. The Rahans remained all silent. The same question was three times repeated, and three times the Rahans continued silent. Then he added: my beloved Bickus, if you have any respect for my memory, communicate your dispositions towards my person and doctrines, to the other Rahans whom you shall, hereafter, meet with.

be made use of, to nature, he is carried away by the ever acting principle of change: no where can he find any rest or fixity; he quits one existence to pass into another; he leaves one form to assume a different one. What happens to man, befalls all other parts of nature. From this notion, Budha infers that there is nothing existing but name and form. There is no substance in nature, and therefore, no reality. So much stress was laid by Budha on this capital principle, that he bequeathed it, as his last Will, to his disciples; he wished that they would ever bear in their minds, and remember that he came among them for the purpose of making them thoroughly acquainted with it. From this cardinal point, he inferred the chief conclusions that form his religious system, viz: Metempsychosis, the contempt of the world and Nirvanna. By the law of endless changes, man is hurried from one state into another, or from one form of being, into another form. Where is the wise man that could love a world, or an existence therein, when he finds no substance, no reality in it? Is he not induced or rather compelled to search after a state in which he can find reality, reality and truth, or at least an exemption from the harassing condition of perpetual migration from one state, into another?

The reader who has been almost born with, and educated in, Theistic notions, and who sees in the world nothing but what has been created by a supreme and all wise Being, is at a loss to understand how a grave philosopher, as undoubtedly Budha was, gifted with great powers for observing, arguing, discussing and inferring conclusions, could have fallen into errors so glaring and so contrary to his reason. That we might properly appreciate the efforts of such a genius, and have some correct ideas about his process of arguing, we must divest ourselves of the knowledge supplied to us by revelation, and descend to the level occupied by the founder of Buddhism. Unacquainted with a first cause, or with the existence of a Supreme Being, he studies nature as he finds it. What does he see in it? Perpetual changes, endless vicissitudes. The form that he perceives to-day has undergone some change on the following day. Every thing about him, grows, reaches a certain point and then falls into decay. He finds nothing that stands always in the same condition. Hence he proclaims the great law of mutability pervading all nature, and concludes that all that we feel, see or hear, is illusion and deception, &c., &c., deprived of all reality, fixity and substance. His philosophical mind is not satisfied with such a discovery. He pants after truth and reality which are not to be found here. He feels that he must disentangle himself from the condition of illusion and deception. But where is to be found reality, and fixity? Beyond all that exists, in Nirvanna.
The Rahans still remained silent. Ananda then said to Budha: O most exalted Budha, is it not truly surprising that among so many, not one could be found entertaining any doubt respecting your doctrine, but all should feel so strong an attachment to it? Ananda, replied Budha, I knew well that doubt and false doctrine could never be harboured in the soul of a true Rahan. Supposing a number of five hundred Rahans, and taking the one who is the last in merits; he is at least a Thautapan, and as such there is no demerit in him that could lead him to one of the four states of punishment; his heart is fixed upon the first way that leads to perfection; and he constantly strives to advance into the three superior ways of perfection. No doubt, therefore, and no false doctrine can ever be found in a true Rahan.

After a short pause, Budha addressing the Rahans said: beloved Bickus, the principle of existence and mutability carries along with it, the principle of destruction. Never forget this; let your mind be filled with this truth; to make it known to you, I have assembled you.

These are the last words Budha ever uttered. As a man who is about undertaking a long journey, takes an affectionate farewell of every one of his relatives and friends and fondly embraces successively all of them, Budha, likewise, wished to visit for the last time the abodes wherein his soul had so amorously dwelt during his long and lofty mental peregrinations. He entered into the first state of dzan, then in the second, the third and fourth; he ascended therefrom successively to the first, second, third and fourth immaterial seats. When he had reached the fourth state, which is the farthest boundary of existence, Ananda asked the Rahan Anoorōuda, whether Phra had completed his Neibban. Not, as yet, answered Anoorōuda, but he has reached the last stage of existence. A little while after, Budha had entered into the perfect state of Neibban.99

Thus in the first watch of the night, he had preached the law to the Malla Princes; at midnight, he had converted the heretic Thoubat; and in the morning watch, he had instructed the Rahans. It was not quite full dawn of the day when he entered the state of Neibban.

mese annals place that event somewhat before the middle of the sixth century, before the Christian era. The difference of dates is but of a few years, and so inconsiderable, as not to be worth notice. The Thibetans and as a consequence, the Mongolians with the Chinese, place that event several hundred years previous to the epoch just mentioned. Notwithstanding this discrepancy, it seems difficult not to adopt the chronology of the southern Buddhists. The Scyths in Europe, who have bestowed a considerable degree of attention on this interesting subject, give a decided preference to the opinion of the former.

We have not to depend solely on the chronological tables of kings, supplied by the Hindus, for settling this point, but fortunately we are put indirectly, by Greek writers, in possession of a fixed and well established epoch, from which we can take, with a sufficient degree of certainty, our departure for arriving at a satisfactory conclusion. After the death of Alexander the Great, Seleucus, one of his lieutenants, obtained for his share, all the provinces situated east of the river Euphrates, in which the Indian conquered territories were included. Seleucus, at first, in person, and next, by an ambassador, came in contact with a powerful Indian king, named Chandragupta, who had the seat of his empire at Pataliputra or Patapaliputra. This intercourse took place about 310 B.C. The Hindu chronological tables mention the name of this prince as well as that of his grandson, called Athoka, who, according to the testimony of the Burmese authors, ascended the throne of Pataliputra, 218 after Gautama's death. We may suppose that Athoka reigned in, or about 270 or 260 B.C. These two periods added together will give but a sum of five hundred years. There will remain a difference of only forty years, for which it is not easy to account with a sufficient precision, unless we suppose that the reign of Athoka began earlier than is generally admitted. Cunningham has given very strong reasons, for fixing the period of Gautama's death sixty six years later than the usual one, hitherto generally admitted, 543, that is to say, in the year 477 B.C. This new epoch enables us to adhere at once with perfect safety, to the computation above related, and does away with the small discrepancy of a few years that has been mentioned. Tradition and ancient inscriptions leave almost no doubt upon this important point.

Our Legend is positive in stating that Gautama died under the reign of Adisathat, as it will, hereafter, be seen. But the Hindu chronologists place the reign of that monarch, about 250 or 260 years, before that of Chandragupta, who, as stated, was a contemporary of Seleucus Nicator. We have, therefore, the combined authority of both foreigners and natives, for admitting the chronology of the southern Buddhists, respecting the epoch of Gautama's death, in preference to that of the northern Buddhists, and for fixing that event, during the first part of the sixth century, before the Christian era, or rather 66 years later, in the beginning of the fourth part of the fifth century.

100.—What is Neibban, the end a true Buddhist ever longs for, during his great struggles in the practice of virtue and his constant efforts for attaining to the knowledge of truth, which he finally reaches, when he has become perfect? The writer confesses, at once, his inability to answer satisfactorily this question, because Buddhists do not agree among themselves, in explaining the nature of the state of Neibban. From the earliest period of their religion, we see the Brahmins keenly taunting their opponents for the discordance of their opinions on a subject of the utmost importance; a subject which had ever been prominent in Buddha's teaching, and held up as the only one worthy of the most earnest and ardent desires, the fittest reward of the generous and extraordinary exertions of a perfected being; and the final state in which his soul, wearied after such a prolonged spiritual warfare, longed to rest for ever. A certain school of Buddhists has maintained that Neibban implied the destruction of the state of being, and consequently a complete annihilation. This opinion is, at once, practically rejected by the portion of the southern Buddhists, who are not so well acquainted with the more philosophical part of their creed. They assert that a perfected being, after having reached Neibban, or having arrived at the end of his last existence, retains his individuality, but they utterly fail in their attempts at explaining the situation and condition of a being in Neibban. At a later period, the opinion about a supreme Buddha, uncreated, eternal and infinite, began to gain ground, and modified to a considerable extent, on many points, the views of the earlier Buddhists. Neibban, according to the comparatively modern school, is but an absorption into the supreme and infinite Buddha. This opinion so much approximates to that of the Brahmins, that we may say it is almost the same. The means to obtain perfection, are somewhat different in both systems, but the end to be obtained is precisely the same.

Setting aside idle speculations, let us try to form some idea of Neibban by explaining the meaning of the term, and the definition such as we find it in the Burmese writings.

The word Neibban, in Sanscrit Nirvana, according to its etymology, means what is, no more agitated, what is in a state of perfect calm. It is composed of the negative prefix nir, and va, which means to be set in motion, as the wind. It implies the idea of rest, by opposition to that of motion or existence. To be in the state of Neibban, it is, therefore, to be carried beyond the range of existence, as understood by Buddhists; there can be no longer migration from one state of one being to another. This point is admitted by all sects of Buddhists. To the idea of Neibban is often attached that of extinction, as a lamp which ceases to burn and its light becomes extinct, when the oil is exhausted. The idea of existence being exhausted, a being ceases to be, oil, to move within the range of existence; he becomes extinct relatively at least to all kind of existences, we have a notion of. In conversing with the Buddhists of Burmah, the writer has observed that the ideas of rest and extinction are invariably coupled with the notion of Neibban. In their rough attempt at explaining the inexplicable nature of that state, they had recourse to several comparisons, intended to convey to the mind, that they believed Neibban to be a state of undisturbed calm and a never ending cessation of existence, at least such as we have an idea of it, in this world. When questioned on the situation of Buddha in Neib-

ban, they answer that they believe him to be in a boundless space, or vacuum, beyond the boundaries ever reached by other beings, alone with himself, enjoying, if the expression be correct, a perfect rest, unconcerned about this world, having no further relation with all existing beings. They assert that he, for ever, is to remain a stranger to all sensations of either pain or pleasure. But it must be borne in mind that this is the popular opinion, rather than the philosophical one. Talking, one evening, with a well informed Burman on Neibban, the light of a lamp that was burning on the writer's table, happened to die away for want of oil: the Buddhist with an exulting tone of voice, exclaimed: do not ask any more what Neibban is; what has happened to the lamp just now, tells you what Neibban is: the lamp is extinct because there is no more oil in the glass; a man is in Neibban, at the very moment that the principle or cause of existence, is at an end or entirely exhausted. How far such an answer can satisfy a superficial mind like that of a half civilised Burman, it is difficult to say; but it appears certain that he does not carry his researches, nor pursue his inquiries, beyond these narrow boundaries. Any further attempt to penetrate deeper into the darkness of Neibban, is, in his opinion, presumptuous and rash.

Buddhist metaphysicians in India in their foolish efforts to survey that terra incognita, have originated several opinions that have had their supporters in the various schools of philosophy. The more ancient philosophers or heads of schools in attempting to give an analysis of a thing they knew nothing about, approximated to the opinion that Neibban is nothing more or less than a complete or entire annihilation. Following the course of arguments, and admitting their premises, one is reluctantly compelled to come to the awful conclusion that the final end of a perfected Buddha, is the destruction of his being or annihilation. This opinion is still further corroborated by the short exposition of Buddhist metaphysics at the end of this volume. The crudest materialism is openly and distinctly professed. There is nothing in man, distinct of the six senses. The faculty of perceiving the object they come in contact with, is inherent in their nature. The sixth sense, that is to say the heart, has the power of perceiving ideas, that is to say, things that have no form, nor shape. But this power is not distinct from the living sense; it disappears, when the life of that sense is extinct, or, in other terms, when the heart is destroyed. To the holders of such an opinion, the cessation of existence, the going out of the circle of existences, by the destruction of kan, or the influence of merits and demerits, must be, and cannot be, but complete annihilation.

From a long period the plain sense of the masses of believers, unprejudiced by sophistical bias, revolted against such a doctrine, and at once rejected the horrible conclusion arrived at, by former disputants. No one in practice, openly admits that Neibban and annihilation are synonymous terms. If their views can be properly understood, we may infer from what they say, that a being in Neibban, retains his individuality, though isolated from all that is distinct from self: he sees the abstract truth, or truth as it is in itself, divested from the material forms under which, we but imperfectly se both in our present state of existence. Passions and affections are not to be found in such a being: his position in truth can scarcely be understood and still less expressed, by us, who can never come in communication with all that has already been related on this subject, by stating that he was conceived in his mother's womb, in the an object, but through our passions and affections. We know that there exists a spiritual substance, but we can have no distinct idea of it. We vouchsafe for its existence by what we observe of its operations, but we are in the impossibility of explaining its nature. It is not, therefore, surprising that Buddhists should be at a loss to account for the state in which a perfected being is in Neibban. The idea of a state of apathy or rest, must be understood as expressing simply a situation quite opposite to that of motion, in which all beings are, as long as they are within the pale of existences. If it be admitted that the perfected being retains in Neibban his individuality, it must be inferred that he becomes, as it were, merged into the abstract truth, in which he lives and rests for ever. But we must distinctly state anew, that this view is in opposition with the doctrines of the earliest Buddhists, and the philosophical principles and inferences held up as genuine. This contradiction illustrates the truth of an above made remark, that error can never entirely obliterare from man's mind, the knowledge of certain fundamental truths, almost constitutive of his moral being.

Let us come now to a definition of Neibban, translated from Pali by the Burmans. Neibban is the end of all existences, the exception from the action of kara, (the good or bad influence produced by merits or demerits); of dhita, (the principle of all volitions, desires and passions); of the seasons, and of taste or sensations. What means this rather curious, not to say, almost unintelligible definition? To understand it, the reader must be aware that kara is the principle which causes all beings to move incessantly from one existence into another, from a state of happiness, to one of unhappiness; from a position where merits are acquired, into another where further merits are to be obtained and greater proficiency in perfection secured; from a state of punishment or demerits, into a worse one, &c. Kara may be called the soul of transmigration, the hidden spring of all the changes, experienced by an existing being. In Neibban the law of kara is destroyed, and therefore, there are no more changes or transmigrations.

By ditta is understood the principle of all volitions and desires. Buddhist metaphysicians, always fond of divisions and classifications, reckon 120 dhitas. Some are the root of all demerits, and their opposite are the principles of merits. Some have for object matter, or this material world; others have for object the immaterial world, or as I believe, ideas and things that have no form. The last of dittas, and of course the most perfect, is entire finitness. This is the last stage ever to be reached by a perfected being in the world of existences: one step farther, and he has reached the undisturbed shores of Neibban. In that latter state, there is no more operation of the mind nor of the heart, or at least there is no intellectual working, such as we conceive it in our actual condition.

The word Ude, or season, is evidently used for designating a revolution of nature. The meaning is obvious and affords no difficulty. In Neibban there is neither nature nor revolutions of nature. Neibban, if a state it be, lies in vacuum or space, far beyond the extensive horizon that encircles the world or worlds, or systems of nature.

The word Ahara, which literally means taste, is intended to designate all sensations acquired through the senses. By means of senses, indeed, we obtain perceptions and acquire knowledge; but the perfected being having year 67 of the Eotzana era, under the constellation Uttarathathan, and born in 68, under the constellation Withaka, on a Friday. He went into the solitude in the year 96, on a Monday. He became a Budha in the year 103, on a Wednesday (Withaka). In the year 148, on the full moon of Katson, on a Tuesday (Withaka), he expired; on the 12th after the full moon of the same month, his corpse was laid on the funeral pile.

At the very moment he had yielded up the ghost, a tremendous earthquake was felt throughout the whole come to the possession of universal science, no further knowledge is needed; senses are, therefore, useless. Senses, moreover, are the appendages of our nature, as it is during its existences. No human putting an end to further existences, it destroys too, the constituent parts or portions of our being.

Admitting that the above definition of Neibhan is a correct one, and that it has been understood in a purely Buddhist sense, we may conclude that in that state, there is no sense inflammas and consequently, no transmigration, no volition of the mind, no desires of the heart, no materiality, and no sensations. The difficulty as to whether Neibhan is annihilation seems all but entirely and completely solved. There is another way of arriving to a similar conclusion. Let us ascertain what are the constituent parts of an intelligent being, and then inquire whether these parts are entirely destroyed and annihilated in Neibhan. In an intelligent being, according to all doctors, we find materiality, sensations, perceptions, consciousness and intellect. These five aggregates constitute a thinking being. These, the same doctors, do not exist in Neibhan: they are destroyed. One word more, and the question would be settled: but that word has not been, at least to my knowledge, ever distinctly uttered. It is probable that these five aggregates or component parts, are, in the opinion of many, the conditions of existence such as we now understand it. But it would be too easy to conclude that a being under different conditions of being, could not retain his individuality, though deprived of these five component parts. Buddhists, as already said, have very imperfect notions of a spiritual substance: it is not surprising that they cannot express themselves in a manner more distinct, precise and intelligible, when they treat of subjects so abstract and difficult. In practice they admit the existence of something distinct from matter and surviving in man, after the destruction of the material portion of his being: but their attempts at giving a satisfactory explanation of the nature of that surviving individuality, has always proved abortive. In their process of arguing, the learned reject such an admission.

The question, as may be inferred from the foregoing lines, if considered in the light of purely theoretical notions, is philosophically little left open to discussion, though it will probably ever remain without a perfect solution. But the logical inferences to be deduced from the principles of genuine Buddhism, inevitably lead to the dark, cold and horrifying abysms of annihilation. If examined from a practical point of view, that is to say, laying into account the opinions of the masses of Buddhists, the difficulty may be considered as resolved too, but in an opposite sense.
world; it took place with such a violence, that it filled every one with fear and trembling, and caused the hairs to stand on end.

CHAPTER XV.

Stanzas uttered after Budha's death—Ananda informs the Malla Princes of Budha's demise—Preparations for the funerals—Arrival of Kathaba to the spot where the body was exposed to public veneration—He worships the body—Wonder on that occasion—The burning of the corpse—Partition of the relics made by a Powa called Dauna—Extraordinary honors paid to the relics by King Adsatathat—Death of that King and of Kathaba.

On the occasion of the Budha's Neibban, the chief of Brahmas uttered the following stanzas: O Rahans, the great Budha who has appeared in this world, who knew every thing, who was the teacher of Nats and men, who stood without an equal, who was mighty and knew all laws and all the great principles, the most excellent and glorious Budha is gone to Neibban. Where is the being who shall ever escape death? All beings in this world, must be divested of their terrestrial and mortal frame.

The chief Thagia, on the same occasion, repeated aloud the following words: O Rahans, the principle of mutability is opposed to the principle of fixity. It carries with it the elements of creation and destruction. There is no happiness, but in the state of Neibban, which puts an end to all changes.

The great Anoorouda said in his turn: O Rahans, the most excellent Budha, free from all passions, has entered, by this death, into the state of Neibban. He whose soul, ever firm and unshaken, was a stranger to impatience and fear, has gone out from the whirlpool of existences, and is no longer subject to the coming into existence and to the going out therefrom. Passions have no more influence upon him. He is disengaged from the trammels of mutability, and has ended, like the light of a lamp, the oil of which is exhausted.

Ananda added: O Rahans, when the great Budha, full of the most transcendent excellencies, attained the state of Neibban, the earth quaked with that violence which fills the soul with fear, and causes the hairs of the head to stand on an end.

After the demise of Budha, the Rahans that had reached the two states of Thautapan and Thakadagan, lifting to the forehead their joined hands, began to wail and loudly lament. Men threw themselves down on the ground, bitterly lamenting the loss the world had met with. They all exclaimed: the glorious and illustrious Budha has too soon gone to Neibban. He who never spoke but good and instructive words; he who has been the light of the world, has gone too soon to Neibban. In these and other words they gave utterance to their grief and affliction, with tears and lamentations. The Rahans who had reached the two last states of perfection, the Anagans and Rahandas, more calm and steady in their mind, were satisfied with repeating in solemn tones: there is nothing fixed in the principle of mutability: Budha entering in the current of change, could not but die; his body was to be destroyed. They remained meditating on this great truth, retaining an unchangeable and calm composure.

Anoorouda, assembling together all the Rahans, said to them: cease now to weep and lament; banish sorrow and affliction from your hearts; remember presently what the most excellent Budha has told us, that all that exists, is liable to destruction, which it can never escape. What will become of Nats and men? What will they say, when they see the Rahans delivered up to grief, and giving vent to it, in loud wailings?

Ananda enquired from Anoorouda what actually took place among the Nats on the occasion of the death of the great Budha. He was told that some of them, lifting up the joined hands to the forehead, loudly wept and lamented;
but others more wise, bearing in mind what Budha had said on the subject of the principle of mutability, remained wrapt up in a solemn and resigned composure of mind. Anoorouda spent the remainder of the night in preaching the law. He said to Ananda: go now to the city of Koothchinaron, say to the Malla Princes that the great Budha is gone to Neibban; that they ought to dispose everything for the funerals. At day-break, Ananda putting on his tsiwaran, and taking his patta, went alone to the city. He met the Princes assembled in the public hall, deliberating on what was to be done when Phra should have gone to Neibban. He said to them: O Princes, of the Wathita race, the great Budha has gone to Neibban; the moment is come for you to go to the spot where are his mortal remains. When the Princes heard this sad news from the mouth of Ananda, they, with their wives and children, began to wail and lament and give all the marks of the deepest grief, unceasingly repeating; the most excellent Budha, who was infinitely wise and knew all laws, has too soon gone to Neibban. The Princes now selecting one of their family, directed him to go throughout the city and collect all the richest and rarest perfumes; to keep in readiness the drums, harps, flutes, and all other musical instruments, and have them carried to the place where the remains of Budha were lying. Having reached the spot, the Princes began to make offerings of flowers and perfumes with the greatest profusion, in the midst of dancings, rejoicings and the uninterrupted sounds of all the musical instruments. A temporary canopy was erected with the finest pieces of cloth, and they remained under it, during seven consecutive days. After this lapse of time, eight of the youngest and strongest Princes, having washed their heads and put on their finest and best dresses, prepared to carry the corpse to a place situated in the south of the city, where they intended to have it burnt. In spite of their united efforts, they could not remove it from the place it was laid on. Anoorouda consulted on the subject of this extraordinary and unexpected occurrence, said: O Princes, your intent does not agree with that of the Nats. You wish, after having performed all ceremonies about the corpse, to carry it to a certain place in the south of the city; but the Nats will not agree to this: they intend to accompany the corpse with music, dancings, singings and offerings of flowers and perfumes. They desire that the corpse should be carried to the western side of the city, thence to the northern one, afterwards to reenter through the northern gate, and go to the middle square; thence to sally forth, through the eastern one and take the body to the place called Makula-bandan, where the Malla Princes are wont to assemble for their festivals and rejoicings. Let it be done, answered all the Princes, according to the wishes of the Nats.

The funeral procession then set out. The Nats in the air, honored the corpse with their music, singing and 101.—The lengthened description of Budha's funerals, has suggested the idea of laying before the reader, a brief account of the ceremonies observed by Budhists in Burmah, when funeral rites are performed on the mortal remains of Talapovis, who have been eminent in the profession, and have spent their whole life in monasteries. By comparing the following account with the narrative of the Legend, we will see that the rubrics of the funeral service, in our days, are nearly the same as those existing at the origin of Buddhism.

When a Budhist Recluse has given up the ghost, the corpse is carefully and diligently washed by laymen, or the younger inmates of the monastery. A large incision is made in the abdomen; its contents are taken out and buried in the earth without any ceremony being observed on the occasion. The empty cavity is filled up with ashes, bran, or some other desiccative substances for preventing putrefaction. The corpse is then tightly wrapt with bands or swathes of a white color, from head to feet, and then covered with the yellow habit of the profession. Sometimes a coat of black varnish is put over and then leaves of gold, so that the whole body is gild. It is afterwards bound up all over, with ropes tightened as much as possible, so as to bring it within the narrowest dimensions. When thus prepared, the corpse is placed in an open coffin. The coffin is made of the trunk of a tree, rudebly hollowed, and often so imperfectly scooped out, as not to afford sufficient room for the corpse. In the middle of the interior part of the coffin, an opening, about two inches in diameter, has been made, to afford issue to the humors that may come out through the swathes. The coffin is ceremonially laid on the floor of the monastery. A bamboo, 7 or 8 feet long is procured; one of its ends is inserted into the hole made in the coffin, and the other is sunk into the ground below; it is the channel through which the humors flow into the earth. After a lapse of ten or the showering down of flowers and perfumes. Men did the same all round the corpse. The way the procession twelve days, the body is supposed to be quite dry; they set about putting a covering over the coffin and effectually shutting it.

Whilst residing at Tavoy, I wished, on a certain day, to go and witness all the particulars observed on such occasions. A most favorable opportunity favored the prosecution of my wishes. A Talapoin of my acquaintance had died a fortnight before, after thirty years of profession. His body laid in the coffin, was to be, for ever, concealed from human sight. I went into the monastery where I met a large party of the brethren of the deceased, who had assembled for the ceremony. Most of them were known to me; my reception was at once kind and cordial. Great was my surprise at seeing, instead of grief and mourning, which the circumstance seemed to command, laughing, talking and amusement, going on at a rate which is to be called scandalous. No one appeared to take the least notice of the deceased whose corpse was lying at our feet. A momentary stop was put to the indecorous behaviour of the assistants, by the appearance of two stout carpenters bringing a board four or five inches thick, designed for the cover. They vainly tried to fit it in its place: the hollow of the coffin was neither broad nor deep enough for holding the corpse, though reduced to the smallest proportions. The operation was not a very easy one to bring the board in contact with the sides of the coffin, despite the resistance that was to be offered by the corpse. The carpenters were determined not to be disappointed. At the two ends and in the middle of the coffin, ropes were passed several times round the coffin with the utmost tension, in such a manner as to have six or seven coils in the same place. Enormous wooden wedges were inserted right and left, in three places, between the sides and the coils. On these wedges the workmen hammered with their whole strength, during about 20 minutes, to the great amusement of all the bystanders. Each blow of the hammer lessened the distance between the cover and the brim of the coffin. Every perceptible success, gained over the latent resisting power, elicited a burst of applause, and a cheer to the persevering workmen. At last all resistance being overcome, the cover rested fixedly in its place. It is needless to add that the corpse inside was but a hideous mass of mangled flesh and broken bones.

According to the custom observed on such occasions, a rude building was erected for the purpose of placing therein the mortal remains of the deceased, until preparations, on a grand scale, should have been made, for doing honor to the illustrious departed individual. That building as well as those made for similar purpose, are but temporary edifices raised for the occasion, and made of bamboos with an attap roof. In the centre of that large bungalow, was erected a kind of estrade, about 12 feet high, well decorated. The upper part is often gilt, but always plated with thin metal leaves and tinsels of various colors. From the sides hang rough drawings representing animals, monsters of various kinds, religious subjects, and others, but rarely, of great indecency. Around this estrade, are disposed posts, from the top of which are suspended small flags and streamers of different forms and shapes. On the summit is arranged a place for the coffin, but the four sides at that place are about two or three feet higher than the level whereupon rests the coffin, so that it is concealed entirely from the sight of the visitors.

Things remained in that state during four months, that is to say, until slowly moved through, was strewed with the finest and choicest flowers. When the cortège had reached the centre of the city, the widow of General Bandoola, named Mallika, hearing of the approach of the funeral procession, took a magnificent piece of cloth, called Mahalatta, which she had never worn since her husband’s death. She perfumed it with the choicest essences, and, holding it in her hands, until the procession reached the front of her house, she desired the bearers to wait for a while, that she might offer to the body, her beautiful piece of cloth, and extend it over it. Her request was granted. By a very happy all the arrangements had been made for the grand ceremony, the expense of which is commonly defrayed by voluntary contributions. The arrangements being all complete, a day was appointed at the sound of gongs, for burning the corpse of the pious recluse. At noon of that day, the whole population of the town flocked to a vast and extensive plain beyond the old wall and ditch, in the north. Men and women, dressed in their finest attire, swarmed in every direction, selecting the most suitable and convenient situations for enjoying a commanding view of the fête. The funeral pile occupied nearly the centre of the plain; it was about fifteen feet high, of a square shape, ensconced with planks, which gave to it a neat appearance. It was large at the base and went on diminishing in size, in the upper part, terminating in a square platform where the coffin was to be deposited. A small roof, supported on four bamboo posts, elegantly adorned, overshadowed the platform. A huge four wheeled cart, decorated in the most fantastic manner, was described at a distance: it was drawn by a great number of men, and brought to the foot of the pile. Upon it was the coffin. Immense cheers, shouts of thou-ands had announced the progress of the cart with its precious relics, as it passed through the crowd. The coffin was forthwith hoisted on the platform. Mats were then spread round the pile, whereupon sat numbers of Talapoa, reciting aloud long formulas in Pali. The devotions being performed, they rose up and prepared to depart, attended with a retinue of their disciples, who loaded themselves with the offerings made on the occasion. These offerings consisted of plantains, coconuts, sugar canes, rice, pillows, mats, mattresses, &c., &c. Masters and disciples returned to their monasteries, with their valuable collections.

The place being cleared, the eyes were all riveted on two large rockets, placed horizontally, each between two ropes to which they were connected by two side rings. One of the ends of the ropes, was strongly fixed at posts behind the rockets, and the other was made as tight as possible at the foot of the pile. At a given signal, the rockets emitting smoke, rushed forward with a loud, hissing and irregular noise, tremulously gliding along the ropes, and in an instant penetrating into the interior of the pile, and setting fire to a heap of inflammable materials amassed beforehand for that purpose. In a short while, the whole pile was in a blaze, and soon entirely consumed with the coffin and the corpse. The bones, or half burnt bits of bones that remained, were carefully collected, to be subsequently interred in a becoming place.

chance, the cloth in breadth and length had the desired dimensions. Nothing could equal the magnificent sight of the body; it looked beautiful like a gold statue, when covered with that splendid cloth, finely worked and adorned with the richest embroidery. The cortège having reached the place Matulabandana, where the funeral pile was erected, the corpse was lowered down. The Princes inquired from Ananda what was to be done for performing, in a becoming manner, the last rites over Budha's remains. Faithful to the last request of Budha, Ananda said to them that, on this occasion, they were to observe the same ceremonies as were prescribed for the funerals of a Tsekiawade Prince. The body was forthwith wrapt up with a fine cloth, covered with a thick layer of cotton; a second cloth came, and, then, another layer of cloth, and so on, until the same process was repeated five hundred successive times. When this was done, the corpse was placed in a golden coffin, and another of the same form and size was turned over it, as a covering. A funeral pile, made with fragrant wood and sprinkled with the choicest perfumes, was prepared. Upon it the coffin was pompously deposited.

At that time, the great Kathaba, attended with five hundred Rahans, was going from the city of Pawa to the city of Kootheinaron. On their way, at noon, the heat was so excessive, that the soil appeared burning like fire, under their feet. The Rahans, extremely fatigued, desired to rest during the remainder of the day, intending to enter the city of Kootheinaron during the cool of the night. Kathaba withdrew to a small distance from the road, and having extended his drougout, under the shade of a large tree, rested upon it, refreshing himself by washing his hands and feet with water poured from a vessel. The Rahans followed the example of their chief, and sat down under the trees of the forest, conversing among themselves upon the blessings and advantages of the three precious things. Whilst they were resting, a heretic Rahan appeared, coming from the city of Koothei-naron, on his way to that of Pawa, carrying in his hand a stick, at the extremity of which there was a large flower, round like a broad cupboard, forming as it were, an umbrella over his head. Kathaba perceiving the man at a distance, with that extraordinary flower, the Mandawara, Erithrina fulgens, thought within himself: it is very rare ever to see such a kind of flower; it appears but through the miraculous power of some extraordinary personage, and on great and rare occasions. It shot forth when my illustrious teacher entered his mother's womb, when he was born, when he became Budha, wrought miracles at Thawattie, and came down from the seat of Tawa-deinth. Now, my great master is very old, the appearance of this flower indicates that he has gone to Neibban. Whereupon he rose from his place, wishing to question the traveller; but he desired to do it in such a way, as to show his great respect for the person of Budha. He put on his cloak, and, with his joined hands raised over his forehead, he went to the traveller and asked him whether he knew his great teacher, the most excellent Budha. The Ascetic answered that he knew him well; but that since seven days, he had reached the state of Neibban, and it was from the place where this occurrence happened, that he had brought the Mandawara flower. He had scarcely said this word, when those among the Rahans who had but entered into the two first ways of perfection, began to wail and loudly lament over this untimely occurrence, exhibiting every sign of the deepest grief and greatest desolation. The others that were more advanced in perfection, remained calm and composed, remembering the great maxim of Budha, that every thing that has come into existence, must also come to an end.

The name of this heretic was Thoubat.* He had been

* In the course of this work, allusion is often made to Pounhas who appear to have led a mode of life, not altogether the same, but varying considerably according to circumstances. All the Pounhas were doubtless Religious, who practised certain duties not regarded as obligatory, by ordinary previous to his apparent conversion, a hermit, leading an ascetic's life. Subsequently he became a disciple of Gaudama, but retained in his heart, an ill feeling towards his spiritual master, which revealed itself in the manner he communicated the sad news to Kathaba and his companions. Seeing them penetrated with the deepest affliction, and exhibiting in an unfeigned manner, the grief which weighed on their heart, he said to them: why do you weep and cry; you have no reason for doing so; we are now freed from the control of the great Rahan; he was always telling us: do this, or do not do that: in every way he annoyed and vexed us: now every one can act as he pleases.

The Rahan Thoubat bore envy to, and revenge towards Budha, for the following reason. Formerly he was a barber in the village of Atooma, where he then became a Rahan. At the time we speak of, Budha was coming to that place, attended by twelve hundred Ra-people, and lived under certain regulations, which separated them more or less from society, and distinguished them from those who followed the ordinary pursuits of life. The difference among them originated in a sort of religious enthusiasm, which impelled many to perform penitential deeds of the most cruel and sometimes revolting nature.

Some of the Pounbas are described as living into villages or towns, and wearing a white dress. In many practices, they appear to have approximated to the Buddhist monks, except that, in many instances, they married. Others are mentioned as living in a state of complete nakedness, staying in the midst of filth and dirt. It seems that those whom Alexander the Great met in some parts of the Punjab, belonged to this class. Many of those disgusting fanatics delivered themselves up to cruel tortures, much in the same way as we see some Fakhirs and Jogies do, even in our days, and under our eyes. A third class of Pounbas affected to live in lonely places, on high mountains, in small huts made of branches of trees, and sometimes at the foot of trees, exposed to the inclemency of the weather. They were hermits. They clothed themselves in the skin of wild beasts, allowed the hairs of the head to grow to the greatest length, divided them into several parts which they twisted separately like a rope, so that, when looking at them, one would have thought that instead of hair, several small ropes were hanging down on the back and the shoulders, giving to them the wildest and most fantastic appearance. Some of those hermits, famous by their science, attracted round their persons many pupils eager to acquire science and discipline under them. Such were the three Kathahas, whom Gandama converted during the first year of his public life. Others travelled through the country, exhibiting themselves in the capacity of preachers and mendicants.
hans. Thoubat wished to make an offering to Budha and his followers, and give them food. For this purpose he resorted to the following very questionable expedient, for obtaining from the villagers rice and other eatables, and preparing them for the great occasion. Thoubat had two sons who wore the dress of Samane. He gave to each of them a pair of scissors, and desired them to go through the street of the village and shave the head of all the children they would meet with, as a token of their entering into religion. The order was punctually executed. The parents of the lads were, then, told, that on such an occasion, it was customary to make considerable offerings. The offered articles, however, would be on this occasion, employed for feeding the great Gaudama who was expected in the place, with a great number of disciples. All the people brought in large offerings of various articles of food, such as rice, oil, butter, and other comestibles. In this manner, by means of such an expedient, the cunning Thoubat, without any cost to himself, was able to make a great display of the choicest dishes to be laid before Gaudama and his disciples, on their arrival to Atoma, and earn for himself the reputation of a very liberal and generous man. Budha acquainted with his conduct on the occasion, refused to accept the offering and forbade all his followers to eat of the food prepared by Thoubat. From that time the latter ever entertained ill-feelings towards Budha, though he did not dare openly to give vent to his passion.

Kathaba was thunderstruck at hearing such an unbecoming language 102 from the mouth of the Rahan Thou-

102.—The virtuous and zealous Kathaba was at once convinced of the absolute necessity of soon holding a meeting of the wisest members of the assembly, for the purpose of ascertaining, and authoritatively determining the genuineness of Budha's doctrines. Human passions were already at work, deforming more or less in various ways, the instructions of the great preacher. Many, laying more stress on their talents, than on the authority of their departed instructor, began to entertain on certain questions, views and opinions evidently at variance with those of Budha. The enemies of truth were numerous, even during his life time, when as yet overshadowed by
but. He said to himself: if at this time, when there are but seven days since Buddha entered Neibban, there are his presence and matchless wisdom. Kathaba sarcastically foresees that their number and boldness would soon increase to a fearful extent and threaten the very existence of religion. He was roused to exertions by such considerations, and on that very moment, he resolved to assemble the Elders of the assembly, as soon as convenient after Buddha's funerals. He was, it appears, acknowledged by common consent the first of the disciples. He was entitled to that distinction by the renown of his abilities, before his conversion, and by his great proficiency under Buddha's teachings, subsequently to that event. But a circumstance related by Kathaba, clearly indicates the intimate familiarity existing between the master and the disciple, and the unbounded confidence the former placed in the latter. During a walk, the two friends, if such an expression be allowed, had entered into a more than usual intimate communion of thoughts and feelings: the soul of one had passed into the person of the other or rather: both souls were blended together, and united so as to become one, in the bosom of a virtuous, high, refined, sublime and philosophic friendship. They made an exchange of their cloaks. Kathaba, by putting on Buddha's cloak, inherited, as it were, his spirit and his authority. Hence his legitimate right to be appointed President or head of the first Council, assembled a little while, after Gaudama's Neibban.

Our author maintains that the first council was held three months after Gaudama's demise. This important step was taken at Badzagi, the capital of the kingdom of King Aizatathat, who doubtless, made use of his royal power to secure tranquility during the deliberations of this assembly, under the presidency of Kathaba. The number of Religious that formed the council is reckoned at five hundred. Its object was, as mentioned by Kathaba himself, to silence the voice of many who wished to innovate in religious matters, and follow their own views, instead of the doctrines of Buddha. They wished to shake off the yoke of authority, and arrange all things in their own way.

The second general assembly of the Buddhist Religious, was held one hundred years later, at Wethalie, in the tenth year of the reign of King Kata-thoka, under the presidency of Ratha, who was assisted by seven hundred Religious. The object of this assembly was to regulate several matters of discipline. It is probable that a spirit of innovation had respruced and begun to undermine the strictness of the disciplinary institutions, threatening to weaken the ties that kept together the members of the religious body, and deprive it of that halo of sacredness, that had hitherto rendered it an object of so profound and general esteem, respect and veneration. The council, moreover, revised the cannon of sacred books, and purified it from all the imperfections and spurious writings that had been embodied with it.

Two hundred and eighteen years after Gaudama's death, King Damathoka or Athoka, ascended the throne of Palibotra, which was the capital of a vast and powerful empire. It was in the seventeenth year of that monarch's reign, that the third and last general assembly was held at Palibotra, under the presidency of Mangalipata. The last and final revision of the sacred scriptures was made with the greatest care and labor. The pious Athoka lent his decisions of the assembly, the influence of the secular power. The Pitàgat, or the collection of the religious books, such as it to be found people holding such a language, what will happen hereafter. These persons will soon have followers who will embrace the profession of Rahans, and, then, the true religion shall be totally subverted: the excellent law shall be in the hands of such persons, like a heap of unstrung flowers that are scattered by the wind. The only remedy to such an impending misfortune, is to assemble a council composed of all the true disciples, who, by their decisions, shall insure stability to religion, and fix the meaning of every portion of the law, contained in the Wini, the Thoots and the Abidama. I am, as it were, bound to watch over the religion of Budha because of the peculiar predilection he has ever shown to me. On now exists, is supposed to be the work of that council. In the two following chapters, the subject of the councils, shall receive the attention it deserves.

There is a most important fact to be noticed here which must be considered as a most remarkable result of the third assembly. It forms the grandest era in the history of Budism, and it is carefully noted down by our Burmese author. I mean the extraordinary zeal and fervor which seemed, at that time, to have simultaneously and powerfully acted for bringing about this mighty but peaceful religious commotion, that was to be felt, not only in the Indian Peninsula, but far beyond the valley of Cashmere, the country of Guzerat in the west and northwest, beyond the snowy ranges of the Himalaya in the north, and the territories and kingdoms in an eastern direction. King Athoka was then at the height of his power. His religious zeal induced him to make use of all the vast resources at his command, to favor the development of the comparatively new religion. During the holding of the council, the Religious, tempered, as it were, their zeal, fervor, devotion and ardor for their religious creed, in the middle of their conferences. They resolved to propagate with unremitting zeal, the tenets of the holy religion and extend it all over the world. The spirit of Gandama seemed to have been infused in the soul of every individual Religious. His ardent fervor glowed in the soul of all, who from that period, had but one desire, that of extending the boundaries of their spiritual empire.

This is certainly one of those extraordinary epochs, when the indolent and apathetic mind of the Hindus, after centuries of a profound slumbering, seems on a sudden, to awake, and, with an unexpected vigor and youthful energy, bursting forth as a terrific hurricane, brings about the most astounding revolutions, or commotions, that sweep with irresistible power, the old political and religious forms, to establish new ones on the ruins of the former. The religious zeal that seized on the Buddhists of those days, and impelled them with an unheard of resolution, for disseminating their doctrines, coupled with the astonishing success that attended their preachings, forms one of the most prominent periods in the religious history of the world.
one occasion, I walked with Budha, the distance of three gawots; during that time he preached to me, and at the end of the instruction, we made an exchange of our tsiwarans, and I put on his own. He said: Kathaba is like the moon: three times he has obtained the inheritance of the law. His affection to my person, his zeal for my religion, have never been equalled. After my demise, it will behove him to stem the current of evil, to humble the wicked, and condemn their false teachings as subversive of the genuine doctrine. With such energetic means, my religion shall remain pure and undefiled, and its tenets shall not be lost and drowned in the midst of the raging waves of errors. Therefore, said the great disciple, I will hold an assembly of all the disciples, for the promotion and exaltation of the holy religion. This design Khthaba kept perfectly secret, and made known to no one.

At that time, four of the ablest Malla Princes, having washed their heads, and each put on a fine new dress, tried to set fire to the funeral pile made of sandal and other odoriferous woods, and one hundred and twenty cubits high. Their efforts proving useless, all the other Princes joined them, with the hope that, by their united exertions, they would be able to set fire to the pile.
Fans made of palm leaves, were vigorously agitated over the heap of coals; bellows made of leather blew in the same direction; but all the efforts were of no avail. The Princes, surprised and disheartened, consulted Anoorouda as to the cause of such a disappointment. Anoorouda said to them, that the Nats did not approve of their proceedings; they wished that the great Kathaba should arrive and venerate the corpse, ere it be consumed by fire. No fire could be lighted, before the great Rahan had made his appearance.

The people hearing the answer of Anoorouda, wondered at the transcendent merit of the great Kathaba, and anxiously waited for his arrival. They said to each other:
who is indeed this distinguished Rahan? Is he white or black, short or tall? They took perfumes, flowers and flags and went out to meet him and honor him in a becoming manner.

When the great Kathaba arrived in the city of Kootheinaron, he, without delay, repaired to the place where the funeral pile was erected. He adjusted his clothes in the most becoming manner, and, with his hands joined to the forehead, three times turned round the pile, saying at each turn: this is the place of the head; that is the place of the feet. Standing then on the spot opposite to the feet, he entered into the fourth state of dzan for a while; his mind having emerged therefrom, he made the following prayer:—I wish to see the feet of Budha, whereupon are imprinted the marks that formerly prognosticated his future glorious destiny. May the cloth and cotton they are wrapt with, be unloosened, and the coffin, as well as the pile, be laid open and the sacred feet appear out and extend so far as to lie on my head. He had scarcely uttered his prayer, when the whole was suddenly opened, and there came out the beautiful feet, like the full moon emerging from the bosom of a dark cloud. The whole assembly burst into loud applauses and continued cheers, on seeing this matchless prodigy. Kathaba stretching his two hands, that resembled two lilies just blooming, held both feet firmly by the heels, placed them on his head and worshipped. All his disciples followed his example and worshipped. Perfumes and flowers were profusely offered by the crowd. When this was done, the feet slowly withdrew into their place, the pile and coffin resumed their natural position. As the sun and the moon disappear below the horizon, so the feet of Budha disappeared, buried as it were, into the folds of cloth and cotton. The people, at this moment, wept and loudly wailed: their affection for Budha was evinced on this occasion more forcibly than when he entered the state of Nibbana.

The feet had hardly been concealed from the sight of the people, when, without the interference of any one, fire caught the pile and soon set it in a blaze of flames. The skin, the flesh, the muscles, the entrails and liver of the body were all consumed, without leaving any trace of ashes and charcoal, as butter or oil, poured on a great fire, burn and are consumed without any thing remaining. Of the body all had disappeared except the relics. All the pieces of cloth that served to wrap up the body, except the outermost and innermost, were also consumed. The relics of former Buddhas whose lives were very long, resembled a lump of gold. Our Budha, whose life had been comparatively of a short duration, had said whilst yet alive: during my life time, religion has not been sufficiently diffused; those, therefore, who after my Neibban, shall obtain of my relics a small portion, be it but of the size of a mustard seed, and build a dzedi to place them in, and worship and make offerings to them, shall obtain a place of happiness in one of the seats of Nats. Among the relics, were the four canine teeth, the two bones that connect the shoulders with the neckbone, and the frontal bone. These are the seven great relics. They were in a state of perfect preservation, not at all damaged by fire, and are called Athambilana. Besides these relics there were some others of a smaller dimension, in sufficient quantity to fill up seven tarerouts. Here is the size and shape of those sacred remains: the smallest were of the size of a mustard seed and resembled the bud of the Hingkow; the middle ones equalled the size of a rice grain, divided into two parts, and looked like pearls; the largest were of the size of a pea and appeared like gold.

When the pile was consumed by fire, water came down from the sky, as thick as the arm, which soon extinguished the fire. The Malla Princes poured also upon it an immense quantity of scented water. During all the while, the pile was burning, streams of flames issued from the leaves and branches of the trees, shining forth with uncommon brightness, without burning the trees; insects of every description were seen flying in swarms on those trees, without receiving the least injury.

In the place where the corpse had been exposed during seven days, the relics were deposited during the same length of time, and offerings of perfumes and flowers were incessantly made. Above them, a canopy bespangled with gold and silver stars was raised, and bouquets of flowers and perfumes were hanging therefrom. From that place, to the one where the ornaments were deposited, the road was lined on both sides with fine cloth; the road itself was covered with the finest mats. Above the road was spread a splendid canopy bespangled with gold stars and flowers. The interior of the building was richly decorated; perfumes and flowers were seen hanging from the canopy. Around the building, masts were planted, and adorned with the five sorts of flags. Plantain trees were planted on both sides of the road, and jars of cool water were laid down, at a very short distance one from the other. From posts of well polished wood, were suspended lamps to be lighted day and night. The box containing the relics, was placed on the back of a richly caparisoned elephant, and the precious remains were honored in every possible way, by offerings of flowers and perfumes, by dancing, singing, music, rejoicings and loud acclamations. The Malla Princes, to insure the safety of the relics, had a line of elephants drawn round the place, then a second line of horses, then a third of chariots, then a fourth of warriors. Such precautions were taken both for ensuring the safety of the relics, and allowing time to every body to come and do honor to them.

At that time the courtiers of King Adzatathat,* knew

* In what year happened the conversion of King Adzatathat to Buddhism, it is not easy to determine with precision. Though his father Pimpatharz was a zealous Buddhist from the very beginning of the preaching of Gandama, his son seems to have kept aloof from the religious movement that took place in the royal city of Bagan, within the precincts of the royal palace, and continued to adhere to the tenets of the ancient creed. His faith, however, in the hitherto national religion, that is to say, Brahmining well the tender affection their royal master bore unto Budha's person, were reluctant to convey to him the sad ism, does not appear to have been deeply seated in his soul. He was a shrewd, ambitious and crafty politician, and from what we know of the beginning of his reign, his political principles were of the most elastic nature. Even after his conversion to Budhism, he does not appear to have scrupled, in the least, in resorting to the most questionable means, for satisfying his ambition. The disputes between the upholders of the contending systems, had, as it is often the case, shaken his former convictions, without imparting new ones. Perhaps he remained in that ambiguous position, for a political object. He was glad to place himself at the head of the malcontents who, on account of the King's religious innovations, must have been numerous. So that as it may, we see the Crown Prince of Kathala praying with open arms, Dewadat, the enemy of Budha, espousing his party, and looking upon him as his spiritual adviser. This occurred about ten or twelve years before Budha's death. With the avowal of his new friend, hecompassed and effected the destruction of his father three or four years afterwards, and became King in the 7th year before Pura. Nebilban. His conversion probably took place after the death of Dewadat, four or five years subsequently to that event. But it appears to have been sincere and earnest. His love for Budha's person was so intense, that it atoned fully for the harm which, under his name and protection, Dewadat had endeavored to inflict on his great relative.

Adstathat reigned 32 years, that is to say, twenty-five years after Gau-dama's death. Under his reign, the first council was held with his consent and a promise to make the decisions of the Assembly to be received with respect, and strictly attended to. This is the first direct interference of the secular power in matters of a purely ecclesiastical nature. Adstathat was, however, too prudent in his policy, to persecute directly the holders of anti-buddhist opinions, who were as yet forming the great mass of the people. He zealously supported the new creed he had adopted; but he left full liberty to the followers of the Punnas. By the advice of Kathala, Adstathat fixed the beginning of the religious era, on the year of Budha's demise. It is the one which is followed by all the southern Buddhists. It was not the necessity of correcting certain errors in the calendar, which induced the King to adopt that measure, since a correction had been made 148 years ago, by King Eshara, with the assistance of a celebrated hermit. A religious motive, alone, induced the King to adopt the decisions of Kathala on this subject, and lay as the point of departure for the reckoning of years, the great event of the death of the founder of religion.

The two names of Empathara and of his son Adstathat, are indissoci-ably connected with the origin of Budhism, and its spread through the Magatha country. To the first, Gau-dama owed much for the extraordinary success that attended his preachings, and the conversion of remarkable personages. In a country like India, the example of the King must have exerted an extraordinary influence over the courtiers and the wealthy and powerful persons. The second rendered no less important service to the cause of religion, by supporting openly the great Kathala, the Patriarch of Budhism, and countenancing the decisions of the first council, which secured unity among the members of the assembly, at the very time that evil-minded individuals endeavored to sow the seeds of dissension among the religious, and upset the fabric which Budha's geniuses and zeal had just set Intelligence of his demise, for fear of causing to him, too great an affliction. They took every possible precaution, and devised various means for preparing the King's mind to bear, with composure, the loss he had sustained. As soon as the monarch understood what the courtiers intended to say, he fainted successively three times. On each time, steam baths and an abundant pouring of water over the head, restored him to his faculties. When he became conscious, he wailed and lamented for a long time. Recovering from the shock of his deep affliction, he desired to assuage the grief caused by Budha's death, by procuring some of his relics. For that purpose, a messenger was despatched to the Malla Princes with the following request: You are the descendants of the great Thamadat, I, too, who rule over the Magatha country, boast of the same noble origin. For this reason, I put forward my claim for obtaining the possession of some of Budha's relics, which are now as his representatives. I will give directions for the erection of a beautiful and tall dzedi, wherein they shall be deposited. I and my people shall have thus an object of worship. The Princes of Wethalic and of the neighboring states, sent a similar request. Those of Kapilawot and Alekapaa followed their example. The Kings of Rama and Pawa, the Pounhas of Withadipa also sent in their reclamations, with a threat of having recourse to the force of arms, were their demands disregarded. They soon followed their messengers at the head of their troops.

The Malla Princes, on receiving those messages, consulted among themselves as to what was to be done. They agreed that, the relics of Budha being the most valuable thing in the world, they would not part with them. Many angry words were exchanged among contending parties. They were almost ready to draw the sword, when a celebrated Pounha, named Dauna, made his appeal. Under the reign of those two sovereigns, religion gained a strong footing in Magatha, and secured for itself an ascendancy which it retained with various successes, for many centuries.
pearance. He stood on an elevated spot, and making a sign with his hand, he began to speak in a language calculated to smooth the irritation of the parties. Great was his influence over all, since there was scarcely a man in the island of Dzampoudipa who did not acknowledge Dauna as his teacher. O Kings and Princes, said he, hear one word that I have to say to you. Our most excellent Budha always extolled the virtue of forbearance. But you are ready to fight for the possession of his relics; this is not good. Let all of you be now of one mind, with cheerful dispositions. I will divide the relics into eight equal portions. Let every one be ever solicitous to multiply, in all directions, dzedis in honor of him, who was possessed with the five visions, that many may feel affection for the most excellent one. Dauna went on explaining more fully the two stanzas he had recited, saying:
O kings and princes, our most excellent Budha previous to his obtaining the Budhaship, whilst he was even an animal, a man and a Nat, practiced the virtue of patience;
he always recommended it, in all his subsequent preachings. How could you have recourse to open violence, to warlike weapons, for his relics? You are kings of eight countries; come to a quiet and peaceable arrangement on his subject: speak, to each other, words of peace and good will. I will have the relics divided into eight equal parts. You are all equally worthy to receive your share.

The Kings, on hearing the words of Dauna, came to the place where he stood, and entreated him to make eight equal portions of the relics. Dauna assented to their request. They went with him to the place of the relics. The golden coffin that contained them, was opened, and there appeared to their regards all the relics, beatiful like gold. The Princes seeing them said: we have seen the most excellent Budha gifted with the six glories, and all the bodily qualifications of the most accomplished person: who could believe that these are the only things that remain of him? They all wept and lamented. Whilst they were overwhelmed with grief, Dauna abstracted one of the canine teeth and concealed it in the folds of his turban. All the relics were duly apportioned to all the Kings. A Thagia, who had seen the doing of Dauna, took adroitly the tooth, without being perceived, carried it into the Nats’ seats and placed it in the Dzoolamani dzedi. When the partition was over, Dauna was surprised not to find the tooth he had stolen. He did not, however, dare to complain, as his pious fraud would have been discovered. To console himself of such a loss, he asked for the possession of the golden vessel, wherein the relics had been kept. His demand was favorably received and the golden vessel was given to him.

The Maurya Princes, who ruled over the country of Pipilawana, hearing what had been done by Adzatatathat and other Kings, went also with a great retinue to the city of Kootheinaron. The Malla Princes informed them that the relics had already been divided, and that there remained nothing but the coals of the funeral pile. They took them away, built a large pagoda over them, and worshipped. The place where the relics were deposited, are Radzagio, Kootheinaron, Wethalie, Kapilawot, Allakapa-ta, Rama, Pawa, and Witadipakka.

King Adzatatathat ordered a beautiful and well levelled road, eight oothabas broad, to be made from the city of Kootheinaron to that of Radzagio. The distance is twenty-five youdzanas. He wished to adorn it, in all its length, in the same manner as the Malla Princes had done for the road leading from the place where the cremation of the corpse had been done, to that where the relics had been deposited. At fixed and proper distances, houses were built for resting and spending the night. The King, attended by a countless crowd of people, went to take the relics and carry them into his country. During the journey, singing, dancing and playing of musical instruments were uninterrupted. Offerings of perfumes and flowers were incessantly made by the people. At certain intervals, they stopped during seven days, when fresh honors were paid to the relics, in the midst of the greatest rejoicings. In this manner, seven months and seven days were employed in going over the distance between the two countries. At Radzagio, the relics were deposited in a place prepared for that purpose, and a dzedi was erected on them. The seven other Kings built also dzedis over the relics they had obtained. Dauna built one, too, over the golden vessel, and the Maurya Princes erected likewise one religious monument over the coals. Thus there were at that time ten dzedis, situated respectively in Radzagio, Kootheinaron, Wethalie, Kapilawot, Allakapata, Witadipaka, Rama, Pawa, the Dauna village, and Papilawana. The partition of the relics happened on the 5th of the waxing moon of Nayon, (June). There were altogether 8 Tsarouts of relics, that is to say, a basketful. Each Prince had one Tsarout, that is to say, two Pyis. The upper right canine tooth was token to the Nats' seats. The lower right tooth was carried to the Gandala country; the upper left tooth was removed to Kalingga, and the lower left tooth, to the Naga seat. The other teeth and hairs of the head and body, were distributed by the Nats, in a great number of other worlds.

When the funeral ceremonies were completed, and the distribution of the relics effected in a manner satisfactory to all parties, Kathaba who was the acknowledged head of the Assembly, advised King Adzatatathat to do away with the Eetzana era, and establish a new one, that would be called the era of Religion, beginning with the year of Budha's Nibban, that is to say, on the year 148 of the Eetzana era. The King joyfully assented to the pious request of the Buddhist Patriarch, and was exceedingly rejoiced to have this opportunity of affording a fresh token of the great esteem he had for Budha's person.

Many years afterwards, the great Kathaba entertained some fear in this mind, respecting the safety of the relics, distributed over eight distinct places, viz: Kootheinaron, Radzagio, Kappila, Allakabat, Watadipaka, Rama, Pawa and Wethalie.* He wished to have them all put together in a safe and secure place, where they could be preserved, until better circumstances would afford an opportunity to produce them out, and expose them to the respect and veneration of the true believers, all over the Dzampondipa island. For this purpose, in the year of religion 20, he went to King Adzatatathat and said to him, that precautions were to be taken for securing the preservation of the relics. The King asked him by what means all the relics could be had from those who now possessed them. Kathaba replied that he would know how to manage such a delicate affair. He went to the seven Kings who gave to him all the principal relics, keeping by themselves only what was strictly necessary to be deemed an object of worship and good will towards Budha's person. One exception was made in favor of

* We are without any direct information concerning the history of Buddhism during the twenty years that elapsed after Gaudama's death. But we have allusions made in several places, which clearly indicate that the new religion had to struggle with many difficulties, before it could gain a strong footing in the places lying north of the Ganges. Though they had been the seat of Budha's preachings, though the people had been intimately acquainted with all his doings, it appears that the Poouhas contrived to thwart, to a great extent, the results of his labors. At Noothsinaron, on the very spot illustrated by his death, we have seen an individual rejoicing at Budha's demise, because he would be now at liberty to act according to his wishes. He was not a solitary instance of open insubordination, since Kathaba felt that it was necessary, in order to check the growing evil, to assemble a council, three months after the death of Gaudama. This stop does not appear to have produced all the good effects that were anticipated. The Patriarch of the Buddhist Church is represented to us as troubling for the safety of the relics. What could have caused this great anxiety? Doubtless there was a strong party, either within or without the Assembly, which was inimical to the worship paid to the remains of Budha, and aimed at procuring their total destruction. In the relation of Hwee-Tsang, the writer has met with a passage in which mention is made of a period of time, when the pure doctrine alone was held, and of a subsequent period, when the worship of relics would be prevailing. It is not improbable that in this passage, allusion is made to the time when the relics, by the care of Kathaba, were buried secretly in the neighborhood of Radzazio, and remained concealed during two hundred years. The conduct of Kathaba for securing the safety of the relics, reveals an important fact, viz.: that there existed, from the earliest days of Buddhism, a great antipathy, in a faction of the community, against the keeping and venerating Budha's remains. It brought in, a split among the disciples which, was never mended, as the sequel will show.

the relics deposited in the village of Rama, because they were, in future times, to be carried to Ceylon and placed in the great Wihara or Pagoda. All the relics having been brought to Radzagio, Kathaba took with him, those pious articles, and went out of the city. He directed his steps in a south-east direction, loaded with this precious burthen, which he carried all the way. Having reached a certain spot, he made the following prayer: may all the rocks and stones of this place disappear, and there be, in place thereof, a fine sandy soil; may water never issue from this spot. Adzatalath ordered the soil to be dug very deep; with the earth, bricks were made, and eight dzedis were built. This was done for the express purpose of preventing people to suspect the real object that both Kathaba and the King had in view. The depth of the hole was eighty cubits. Its bottom was lined with iron bars. To that bottom was lowered a chapel monastery made of brass, similar in shape and proportions to the great Wihara of Ceylon. Six gold boxes containing the precious relics were placed in this chapel monastery. Each box was enclosed in one of silver, the latter in one adorned with precious stones, and so on, until eight boxes were placed one in the other. There also, were arranged 550 statues, representing Budha in 550 preceding existences, described in the sacred writings: the statues of the 80 great disciples, with those of Thoodaudana and Maia. There also were arranged 500 lamps of gold and 500 lamps of silver, filled with the most fragrant oil, with wicks made of the richest cloth. The great Kathaba taking a leaf of gold, wrote upon it the following words: In after times, a young man, named Piadatha, shall ascend the throne, and become a great and renowned monarch under the name of Athoka. Through him, the relics shall be spread all over the island of Dzampon diplomats. King Adzatalath made new offerings of flowers and perfumes. All the doors of the monastery were shut and fastened with an iron bolt. Near the last door, he placed a large ruby, upon which the following words were written: Let the poor King who shall find this ruby, present it to the relics. A Thagia ordered a Nat to watch over the precious deposit. The Nat disposed around it, figures the most hideous and terrifying, armed with swords. The whole was encompassed by six walls made of stones and bricks; a large slab of stone, covered the upper part, and upon it, he built a small dzedi.

Five years afterwards, that is to say, in the 25th year of the Religious era,* King Adzata that died; and, like-

* In the previous note on Neibban, the writer, having forgotten to mention the application the Burmese make of this term to three distinct objects supplies here the omission, in the hope that the following may enable the reader to come nearer to the true Buddhistic meaning of Neibban.

There are, say the Buddhist Doctors, three kinds of Neibban, respecting the person of Gaudama, the Neibban of Kittitha or passions; the Neibban of Khandas, or supports of the existence of a living being; and the Neibban of Dhatos, or of the relics.

The first took place at the foot of the guinong or bodhi tree, when Gaudama became Buddha. Then, to make use of the language of Buddhists, at that moment, the fifteen hundred passions, that is to say, all passions were quieted, extinguished, and for ever put an end to.

The second kind of Neibban, happened near the town of Kookheinaron, when the five Khandas, or the constitutive parts of Gaudama's being, were quieted, that is to say, ceased to act, and were absolutely destroyed.

The third kind will take place at the end of the period of five thousand years, reckoning from the death of Gaudama. This is the period which he has assigned to the duration of his religion. Then all the relics of Buddha that will be still existing, will be miraculously congregated on the spot where stood the tree Bodhi. After having been the centre of the display of several extraordinary wonders, they will be consumed by a fire that is to come out of them. They will disappear and vanish for ever, as the flame that has consumed them.

The idea suggested to us by the application of the word Neibban to these three objects, is that of a cessation of action, cessation of existence, and cessation of being. Indeed, it is impossible not to see in the meaning of this world the horrifying idea of absolute annihilation. The writer frankly avows that he has been, during many years, unwilling to adopt a conclusion, which the obvious meaning of the words pointed out in a clear manner. He hoped that a deeper insight into the system of Buddhism would lead him to a conclusion more consonant with reason. But he has been completely disappointed in his expectations. By what process of arguing has the founder of Buddhism, arrived to such a despairing terminus? How has he been led into that horrible abyss? How has he contrived to silence the voice of conscience, and set aside the clearest innate notions of human mind? Gaudama took his departure from a true principle, viz.: that there are miseries in this world, attending the condition of all beings moving within the circle of existences. But ignorant of the real cause that has imported miseries into this world, he never could discover the way by which man can convert them to a useful and beneficial result. He declared that all the wise, all those that had been present on this occasion, disappeared one after the other, from the scene of this world. A small dzedi indicated the place where the sacred relics had been religiously deposited. But in due course of time, the place being no longer heeded by the people, soon become overgrown with bushes, which screened from sight, the modest monument itself. The relics remained buried in that manner, in the bosom of the earth, until after a long period of time, there was to appear, at last, a mighty ruler, full of zeal for the promotion of religion, who would be worthy to render a becoming honor to the relics, and to propagate them throughout the length and breadth of the island of Dzam-poodipa. This great event shall be subsequently narrated in a following chapter.

efforts of a wise man ought to converge towards one point, that of freeing himself from all the states of existence. The four means or ways to perfection, lead to that great result. By science, connected with the practice of virtue, the wise man frees himself from all passions which are the real causes which make a being move into the circle of existences. When they are, not subdued but exterminated, there is no longer a cause that impels man into another existence. The end of a being has come. When we speak of the end of a being, we understand its complete and entire destruction, or in other terms its Nibbāna. Nothing remains of him. The materialist principles of genuine Buddhism forbid us to think of a soul or spiritual substance surviving the destruction of the terrestrial portion of man's being. When Gāndāma unfolds his precepts and maxims for guiding man in the acquisition of science, and the destruction of his passions, he elicits the admiration, nay the astonishment of the reader, at the sight of the profound knowledge of human nature which he displays. But this feeling soon gives place to another of pity, sadness and horror, when one sees that he has been led to the brink of Nibbāna.
Chapter XVI.

After Budha's death, zeal of Kathaba in upholding genuine doctrines—He selects 500 elders, to become Members of a Council or Assembly—Radzagio is fixed upon for the holding of the council—He requires thither with a portion of the appointed members—Behavior of the amiable Ananda, previous to his departure for Radzagio—King Adzatalhat supports Kathaba in his views—The Hall for holding the council is prepared by his orders—Ananda is qualified in a miraculous manner for sitting as a member of the council—Holding of the council under the presidency of Kathaba—Establishment of the Religious era—Destruction of Watathie by Adzatalhat—The successors of that Prince—In the days of King Kalathauka, a second council is held at Pataliputra, under the presidency of Batha—Causes that provoked the holding of a second Assembly.

Having completed the narrative of all that relates to the relics, we have to retrace back our steps, and give an account of the development and spread of Budhism, into various countries.

After the cremation of Budha's mortal remains, and the distribution of the relics, peaceably managed by the Pouinha Dauna, Kathaba, on account of the high esteem Budha ever had for him, esteem which he had manifested in a striking manner when he vested him with his one robe, considered himself as having been thereby, especially appointed to provide effectual means for placing the law on an unshaken foundation. As a monarch, before his death, appoints his son to succeed him, to wield the supreme power and keep it in his family, in a like manner, Budha had appointed his eldest spiritual son, to take his place. Being, therefore, the acknowledged head of the Assembly, he had but one object in view, the maintenance of the doctrines and institutions of his great master, in their original purity, and the establishment of Religion on a firm basis. When on his way from the town of Pawa, to that of Kooteinaron, to be present at the funeral of Budha, he had met with a Rahan, who had given him particulars respecting the last moments and death of Gaudama, and the same time, had dared to express feelings of satisfaction on that mournful occasion, in the following manner: now that our master has gone to Neibban, he will be no longer amongst us to tell us, you must do this, you have to shun that: such a regulation ought to be observed; such a duty is to be performed. We shall hear no longer the reproaches he was wont to address to us. At present, we are at liberty to do what we like, and to follow our own inclinations. Such an unbecoming, nay impious language stung to the quick the ardent soul of the venerable Kathaba. From that moment, he was daily engaged in revolving in his mind, and examining within himself, what would be the best course to be entered upon, in order to keep intact the doctrines he had heard from the mouth of Budha himself, and establish upon a firm basis the religious institutions he so much valued. As soon, said he within himself, as the funerals of the most excellent Phra shall have been performed with a becoming solemnity, I shall congregate together the most zealous and learned members of the Assembly, and with their united efforts and energy, I will oppose the spreading of false doctrines, which obscure the true ones. I will put down the newly invented erroneous disciplinary regulations, by setting in a strong light, the genuine ones. To prevent, in future, the recurrence of similar evils so detrimental to religion, all the preachings of Budha, as well as the disciplinary rules, shall be arranged under several heads, and committed to writing. The books containing the above, shall be held up as sacred.*

* Kathaba speaks of the Pitagat or collection of the scriptures as of a compilation that was to be put in writing, for better securing its fixity and permanency, and preventing, as far as human wisdom could reach, the introduction of new and heterodox doctrines. I feel inclined to believe that this expression is put into the mouth of the Patriarch and that, in all likelihood, he never uttered it. It is probable that during the first ages of Bud.
Agreeably to the plan he had fixed upon, twenty days after Budha's demise, the great Kathaba profiting of the circumstance that had brought together so many Rahans from all parts, to the town of Kootheinaron, communicated his views to all the Rahans congregated in that place. Having received from all his brethren, a suitable encouragement, Kathaba selected from among them all, four hundred and ninety-nine of the most learned. They were all Rahandas, that is to say, they had all reached the last degree of perfection, with the exception of Ananda, who was but a Thautapan, and, therefore, had only entered into the current that was to drift him to perfection.

It may be asked why was Ananda selected as a member of the future council, since, in point of spiritual attainments, he was very inferior to all his brethren upon whom Kathaba's selection had fallen. Let it not be believed that he owed this distinction, to his royal extraction, or to his being first cousin to Budha and the friend of Kathaba, or to the venerable appearance, grey hairs imparted to his person. His brethren were full of love, and esteem for him. They had the greatest regard for all that he said, because having always attended on Budha's person, during twenty-five years, lived with him in hism, the doctrines were not put in writing, but orally transmitted. For supporting this apparently incredible assertion, we have the testimony of the authors of the Cingalese collection, who distinctly state, that during more than two hundred years, after the introduction of the religion in Ceylon, tradition was the only vehicle for transmitting the contents of the Pitagat. Moreover, it is by no means certain that the inhabitants of the Irrawaddy valley, possessed a copy of the sacred scriptures, previous to the voyage of Budhagosa from Thaton, to Ceylon, in the beginning of the 5th century of our era. He went to that island for the express purpose of making a copy of the Pitagat, and bringing it over to his countrymen. Be that as it may, the question on this subject is far from being settled. It well deserves the attention of the learned. A satisfactory solution may throw a much wanted light, upon the history of early Buddhism. When we consider that Mahinda, the son of the mighty and pious Athoka, was the head of the mission which, after the termination of the third council, went to preach religion in Ceylon, it is impossible not to suppose that he would have brought over with him a copy of the collection of the sacred scriptures, had that collection been put in writing, at the time that he left Pataliputra for his pious errand.

the greatest intimacy, and followed him as the shadow does the body, he was perfectly conversant with the doctrines of Gaudama which he had heard expounded on all occasions and to all sorts of people. All the Religious were unanimous in declaring him worthy to be associated to those who were to compose the synod. Kathaba was delighted at such an opinion which agreed so well with his own.

Kathaba examined afterwards what was the most befitting place for holding the council. Having reviewed successively the various cities situated in the neighborhood of Koothcinaron, he was pleased with none of them. Radzagio appeared to him, on every respect, the best place that could be selected. The city and its suburbs were very populous; the people lived in affluent circumstances; alms could easily be procured, even for a large Assembly, during any period of time; monasteries about the city were both numerous and of great extent. All those advantages combined together, induced Kathaba to give the preference to that city. To this, his brethren unanimously assented.

When those preliminaries had been settled, Kathaba, on the fifth of the waxing moon of Nayon, spoke as follows to the members of the future council: Brethren, you have before you forty days to prepare yourselves, and dispose every thing to hold yourselves ready for beginning the great and important affair, for which we have to assemble at Radzagio. Let none of you bring forward any pretext for postponing his going to the place that has been fixed upon, such as sickness, or the consideration of parents, friends, relatives, or even teacher. Every one of us must be prepared to forsake every thing, for promoting the great object we have in view, the exaltation of religion.

When he had spoken in this manner, he took with himself two hundred and fifty Religious, and shaped his course in the direction of Radzagio. Some while afterwards, Anoorouda attended with nearly a similar number of brethren went to the same place, by following another road. The venerable Pounna remained in Kootehinaron with seven hundred brethren. The other Religious, not designated by Kathaba, withdrew in various other localities.

Whilst these things were taking place, the ever kind hearted and affectionate Ananda availed himself of a portion of the forty days allowed by Kathaba, to proceed to Radzagio, to give full scope to the feelings of love he entertained for the person of Budha. He employed a part of that time, in revisiting the various places that had been the favorite resorts of his beloved departed Master, the Dzetawon monastery, in particular. Full of love for the memory of Budha, he was seen entering into the monasteries where he was wont to serve him daily, with a most affectionate regard, his eyes bathed in tears, and doing out of respect for him, the same humble but devoted services. He swept the room, made the bed, brought the water, in the same way as if Budha had been present. With a low tone of voice often interrupted by sobs, he was heard repeating with the accent of deep sadness, tempered by love: this is the place where the most excellent Phra sat down: this is the bed upon which he slept; this is the verandah through which he paced to and fro; this is the place where he bathed; and on each spot, he stood a while and shed abundant tears. At such a sight, the people felt their love towards Budha's person, increasing to a tenfold. They accompanied his loving disciple, joined him in his pious offices, and with him wept as bitterly, in remembering the person of the great teacher, his manners and his preachings, as they did, when they heard of his death. Having performed all those pious duties, Ananda left that place and hastened to the city of Radzagio.

When all the Religious had congregated, the occupants of the eighteen monasteries that were spread in the neighborhood of Radzagio, had to leave them, and make them over to the new comers. All the five hundred Reigious spent the festival day of the full moon of Watso, together with occupants of those places. After the performance of the usual devotions, they were left alone in the undisturbed possession of the above named monasteries. But the buildings were found in such a bad order, that they required important and immediate repairs. Moreover, they were in a state of unbearable uncleanness, and it was deemed necessary to have them well rubbed and washed. The cause of this disordered state was this: when the occupants of those places heard of the approaching death of their great teacher, they had hastened to Kootheinaron, and there was not one left to take care of the dwellings, and keep them in good order. To have the evil remedied, Kathaba accompanied by a large retinue of his most remarkable brethren, went, on the second day after the full moon of Watso, to the palace of King Adzatathat, who received him with every mark of respect and immediately inquired about the subject of his visit. Kathaba explained to the monarch the object of his coming to Radzagio, with five hundred of the most distinguished Religious. I desire, said he, to confute error and to proclaim truth. My greatest wish is to promote the sacred cause of our holy religion. For that purpose, I have with the concurrence of all my brethren, resolved to hold a synod composed of the principal members of the Assembly. We ask from you, O King, the favor of causing the 18 monasteries of Radzagio, to be repaired, for our dwelling, and also to give orders for the erection of a spacious hall, which shall be the place of our meetings, for discussing various subjects relating to religion.

Adzatathat joyfully assented to the proposal and demands of the Buddhist Patriarch. He gave full liberty for the holding of the council saying: my power and that of the Law are now at your command. He gave immediate orders for putting in perfect order the dwelling place of the Rahans. On the southern face of mount Webhara, there was a cave which had been a favorite place of resort with Budha, during the seasons that he spent at Radzagio, in the Weloowon or bamboo grove monastery. That spot was fixed upon, as the fittest for the holding of the Assembly. Adzatathat summoned in his presence the most skilful workmen, and commanded them to exert all their skill and talents in erecting a Hall, worthy of the members of the assembly that was to meet within its precincts. The ground was, at first, encircled with a fence. A fine flight of steps made with the utmost care, led from the bottom of the hill to the spot, where was built the magnificent Hall, decorated with a profusion of the choicest ornaments, and surpassing in beauty and elaborate work, the stately dwellings of Princes. Five hundred mats for the accommodation of the Religious, were disposed in the south of the Hall. The seat of the President was placed opposite, in the northern part. In the centre, but facing the east, a seat resembling a pulpit, was raised; upon it was laid a beautiful fan made of ivory. When the work was finished, Adzatathat informed Kathaba that the work was completed, and the Hall ready for the projected meetings.

It was on the full moon of the Wakhhaong, (August), that the first conference was to take place and the council to be opened. On the day previous, some Rahans made a remark on the circumstance of Ananda being allowed to become a number of the council, though he was but a Thautapan, and had, as yet, to ascend the three other steps of Thakadagan, Anagan and Rahanda, before he became a Arahat. This remark made with very little moderation, greatly affected and grieved the tender heart of Ananda. No time was to be lost; he knew that on the following day, the council would be opened, and he could scarcely hope to be tolerated as an exception, in the midst of his brethren. He withdrew in a quiet and retired place, resolved to do his utmost to obtain that which he felt he was in need of. He began to meditate with much attention; but the desired object of his wishes was as yet far from him. He thought of Budha. Whilst he was continuing his mental labor until midnight, he heard a voice telling him to apply himself to the labor of a higher order, to Kamatan. This was a flash of light, that illuminated his mind. The exercise lasted until a little before day break. At that time, Ananda left the walking place, and went to his room to take a little rest. He sat on his bed. Between the short time that it took to raise his feet from the ground, and lay the head over the pillow, Ananda was delivered from the bands that keep a being in the whirlpool of existences, and he became a Rahanda.

On the fifth of the waxing moon of Wakhaong, the 499 venerable members attired with their cloak, and carrying the mendicant's pot, assembled in the Hall, at the entrance of the Webhara cave. Each member occupied his own. Ananda's place alone was without its occupant. On a sudden, by the power of the virtue now inherent in his person, Ananda appeared among his brethren. The appearance of his face resembled a ripe palm fruit. It was beautiful as the moon in its full, emerging from the bottom of a cloud; as a newly polished precious stone, on a piece of fine cloth; as the water lily blooming at the rays of the morning sun. It reflected the inward perfection which had just been communicated to him, and exhibited it, in unmistakable signs, to the assembled Religious.

Every arrangement being completed, and the members occupying in silence their respective seats, Kathaba three times praised Budha. He then asked the fathers of the assembly, which of the three parts, the instructions, the discipline, or the metaphysics deserved the priority in the discussions that were to begin. They answered that the discipline being the soul and ornament of religion, it deserved the preference. He asked them to appoint him whom they thought the fittest to occupy the pulpit. They all were unanimous in selecting Oopali, though Ananda was worthy of such a distinction. The reason of the selection is the following: On one occasion, Budha had openly declared that among all the Religious, or the members of the Assembly, Oopali was the most fervent in observing the regulations of the Wini. Then Kathaba said: Brethren, since you have given the preference to the venerable Oopali, let him have it. The venerable Oopali said in his turn: Brethren, hearken to my words: having been selected by the Assembly for answering all the questions relating to the Wini, I accept the honorable task, thus imposed upon me. When he had spoken, he rose from his place, threw a part of his cloak upon one shoulder, bowed to the members of the Assembly, went to the pulpit, sat down, and held the ivory fan in his hand.

Kathaba, from his own seat, addressed Oopali and said: venerable Oopali, in what place, has the most excellent Phra enacted the commandment, respecting the first of the four sins, called Paradzika? Oopali answered: in the country of Wethalie. To whom was allusion made, when this commandment was published? Allusion was made to Thoudein, the son of Tananda Pounha. What was the cause of such an enactment? The sin of fornication he had committed. The President addressing the assembled fathers, said: Brethren, you have all heard what regards the circumstances connected with the first Paradzika: let this article be noted down, and its admission and sanction be proclaimed aloud. It was done so. All the members accepted it. At that moment an earthquake was felt. The same method was observed as regards the three other Paradzika. They were unanimously accepted by the members of the assembly. Oopali was successively questioned by the President, upon the other regulations of the Wini, viz: the 13 Thingaditheit, the 2 Donay-a-niga, the 30 Niseggi Padzeit, the 92 Padzeit, the 4 Walidathani, the 75 Theikkabot which are named Adikarana-thama. In all 227 regulations. Moreover, there were added the 80 (Banawara), Khandaca, and the 25 Parawira. These several divisions form the collection called Wini Pitagat. When the final sanction had been given to all those points, a mighty earthquake was felt a second time. The venerable Oopali laid down the ivory fan, rose up, came down from the pulpit, reverentially saluted all the Brethren, and returned to his own seat.

The President addressing the company said: Brethren, hearken to my words: If it be your good pleasure, we shall discuss at present the Thoots or the instructions, orally delivered unto us, by our most excellent Master. Whom shall we appoint to answer the questions I shall put him on this subject? They all unanimously elected Ananda, who having always, and on all occasions, accompanied Budha, was better acquainted with his preachings than any other Religious. Then the President added: Brethren, if it be agreeable to you, I will duly question the venerable Ananda. The latter likewise said: Brethren, hearken to my words: Since it is acceptable to you, I will answer all the questions on the Thoots, which our venerable President shall put to me. Then, he rose from his seat, arranged his cloak on one of his shoulders, respectfully bowed to the Assembly; and ascending the steps of the pulpit, he sat down and held in his hand the ivory fan.

The President addressing the Assembly, said: Brethren, in the Thoots, there are several parts or divisions. There is the division called Thingiti, which has also subdivisions. Which shall I fix upon, to begin our session? They answered: let us begin with the Diga-thingiti which contains 35 Thoots, and out of this, the Silakhanda which includes 13 Sermons or Thoots. It was on the first, called Bhramadzala that the questions were put. The President put the following questions to the venerable Ananda: In what place was the Bhramadzala Thoot preached? He answered: in the Mingoon Hall, situated in the middle of a grove of Mango trees, half way between Radzagio and the village of Nalanda. To whom was allusion made? To Thouppya a holder of false doctrines, and to a young man, named Bramada. For what reason was such allusion made? Because both had been ungrateful to Budha. Similar questions were put for each thoot of this division, and suitable answers were given in a like manner. The same mode of proceeding was observed for each sermon or thoot of the following divisions. When all the explanations had been given, by the speaker, all the assembled brethren, with a perfect unanimity, assented to all that had been said.

When the work on the Thoots was completed, the whole collection was called the Pitagat Thoots. Ananda rose from the pulpit, placed the ivory fan upon the table, respectfully bowed to the Assembly, and returned to his own place.

The President addressing again, the assembly, requested them to designate him, who, in their opinion, appeared to be best fitted for answering all questions, on the third part of the sacred scriptures, the Abidama. They unanimously selected the venerable Anooroudha. When the choice had been fixed upon and agreed to, Anooroudha accepted the honor conferred on him, rose from his seat and saluted his brethren. He then, gravely ascended the pulpit, sat down and held the ivory fan, into his hand.

The President questioned him on the seven divisions of the Abidama, following the same order he had observed previously, in treating of the two first parts called Pitagat. The occupant of the pulpit having returned due answers, and the assembly having testified their approbation in a unanimous manner, the council was brought to a close. It had lasted seven months, from the full moon of Wakhaong, to the full moon of Tabaong.*

* The collection of the Buddhist scriptures is divided into three parts, called the three Pitagats, or the three baskets, respectively named the Wini Pitagat, the Thoots Pitagat, and the Abidama Pitagat. The manuscript that the writer has had for his use, though correct in the main, is certainly defective in the enumeration of the divisions and subdivisions of the three great collections. He will, however, mention them such as they are enumerated by the Burmese author, the few errors that may be detected, can easily be corrected by those who have in their possession the Ceylonese collection, as there is no doubt that the work now under consideration, is an abridgment of a more voluminous compilation to be found in Ceylon.

The divisions of the Wini are: Bikoo Pathingouk, Bikoonee Pathingouk, Bi-
The first council is called Pitzasatika Sangarana, because, it was composed of 500 Religious. It is also koo Witin (probably Bikoo Win), Bikooni Win, 12 Kundaka and 16 Pari-waras.

The thoots are considered as the instructions orally delivered by Gaudama himself, either to his disciples in private, or to the assembled multitudes, during the 45 years of his public mission. In this collection, the disciples have learned the doctrines of the master, and found all the elements necessary to compose all the treatises, which, subsequently, have formed the collections, called Wini Pitagat and Abdana Pitagat. No one could ever believe that the author of Budhism could have buried himself in writing treatises on metaphysics, or minutely and elaborately publishing the regulations under which, the body of his followers, called the Sanga were to live and spend their time. In his instructions Gaudama gave utterance to certain principles, which being seized upon by his disciples and their successors, were enlarged, developed and reduced into the shape of a treatise. In fact, he sowed the seed which being let into the soil of the minds of enthusiastic disciples, grew up and multiplied into the voluminous above named collections. Genuine Budhism must be found in the thoots of the oldest stamp. Any where else, we meet with the Budhism such as it has been developed by doctors and commentators.

There are four collections of the thoots, named Nidia Nika, Mithima Nika, Thangoutta Nika and Engouttana Nika. They are likewise arranged under 15 heads called: Koualaka; ata, Dammagaha, Oodana, Ihhi, Wouthaka, Thuouannih, Wi, Manka-woutto, Pita-woutto, Terakatta, Terikatta, Dzattakani, Pitoumbika, Apudana, Budhwa-wattoo.

The Abdanima has seven divisions, viz: Dammathingakani, Wittin, Datoogatta, Ponggala-pigma, Kathawattoo, Yannik, Patau.

The attentive reader cannot be but surprised: to see how the three great divisions of the Budhist scriptures, are mentioned by the members of the first council, as things already existing and arranged with the same method as they have been disposed during succeeding ages. It is certain that such divisions of Gaudama's doctrines, did not then exist at that time. Are we to conclude thence, that the fact of the holding of the first council, is to be rejected, as a mere invention, because the mode of relating some particulars concerning that great assembly, is liable to be seriously objected to. It seems that such a conclusion would be a too hasty one.

For establishing the fact of the holding of the first council, we have the evidence supplied to us by all the Budhist writings, found in the various countries were that religion has been established. Moreover, several monuments of very antiquity allude to that first assembly. We can scarcely raise a doubt upon the existence of the fact. But how are we to account for the manner in which mention is made of compilations, which undoubtedly were not existing at that time? The reduction of all the particulars connected with the first assembly, must have been made a considerable time after the holding of the said assembly, at an epoch, when the Budhist scriptures had already been arranged under three distinct heads. The author, familiar with the division or compilation into three parts, called Pitagata, has arranged his narration in such a way, as to give to it a sort of agreement with a form which he thought must have been as familiar with others, as it was with himself. It is probable that most of the points of discussion, such as we find them in the narrative, were actually brought for-named Terika-sangarana, because it was composed of Religious of the first order. The soul of Kathaba, at the happy conclusion of this important undertaking, was overflowed with the purest joy. He felt that with such a work, the Religious Institutions rested on a strong basis, and would last the whole period of 5000 years, assigned to the duration of religion, by Gaudama himself.

It was at the conclusion of the council, that King Adzatathat, with the concurrence of the Buddhist Patriarch, did away with the Eetzana era, and substituted thereto, the religious era beginning in the year 148 of the said era, that is to say, on the year of Gaudama's death, on a Monday, the first of the waxing moon of Tabao.

Here is inserted, as a genealogical link, the names of the Kings who reigned at Pataliputra, from Adzatathat to Kalathoka, under whose reign was held the second council.

Agreeably to the prediction of Gaudama respecting the future calamities that were to befall Wethalio, on the third year of the religious era, Adzatathat having contrived to sow, through the instrumentality of a famous Pounha, the seed of dissension among the Princes of that city, flung himself, on a sudden, with a large force, on the devoted city, possessed himself of it, and totally destroyed it. On his return into his own territories, the conqueror carried as captives, three hundred of the Princes and Nobles of the conquered state. His wages before the Assembly, but in a shape, more simple and general, and less technical and positive. This is what can be said, in the present imperfect knowledge of the history of Buddhism, for extenuating the charge of wilful forgery, which might be brought against the author of the reduction. On another hand, whilst prudent discretion commands us not to be too hasty in passing a sweeping condemnation against the compilation, we must be very cautious in not admitting, at once, and not giving an absolute credit to all what is found in writings which do convey to us many things of great antiquity, but evidently mixed with multifarious details of a comparatively modern origin. This last remark ought to be ever present to the mind of him who peruses some portions of the Pitagata. The huge mass of rubbish which constitute the largest portion of the scriptures, is the production of the various Buddhist schools, which flourished eight and ten centuries after the first council.
reign lasted altogether, thirty five years. He died in the year 25th of the religious era. He was slain by his own son Oudaia-badda, who succeeded him and reigned until the year 40. He was in his turn, murdered by his son Anoorouda, who, also fell after a short reign, by the hand of his son and successor, Manta. This Prince reigned until the year 49. He met with a similar tragical end. His son Nagata-saka killed him and ascended the throne. He reigned until the year 53. The people of Pataliputra, justly shocked at the horrible and barbarous murders, which incessantly sullied the very steps of the throne, revolted against the race of those bloody Princes, and put an end to the line of Kings, who are aptly called the parricide Kings.

Among the 300 Princes and Nobles, whom Adzata that had brought over from Wethalie, one of them had a daughter remarkable for the accomplishments of her person, and the attainments of her mind. She was, by the order of the King raised to the position of a courtesan, in Radzagio. Whilst engaged on that course, she had a male child, whom, with unnatural feelings, she ordered to be thrown, during the night, in the midst of bushes, outside the city. A Naga guardian of the place watched over the infant and carefully protected him. On the following morning, the King happening to pass by, heard the sound thoo-thoo, many times repeated. It was the Naga who made this noise, in order to attract his attention. The King having sent one of his officers to the spot, the sound was coming from, was informed that an infant still alive, was laying there, under the guard of a Naga. Moved with compassion, he ordered the child to be forwarded to his palace, and had him carefully brought up. On account of the sound thoo-thoo which had been heard, and of the Naga that had been met on the spot, the child was named Thoo-thoo naga. He grew up and became an accomplished Prince. The people who had rid themselves from the line of Parricide Kings, unanimously proclaimed him King, in 63.
That monarch, not unmindful of his mother's origin, reestablished the city of Wethalie and fixed in it, the royal residence. From that time, Radzagio lost her rank of royal city, which she never, hereafter, recovered. He died in 81, and was succeeded by his son Kalathoka, who, as we shall see subsequently, had a long reign of 28 years.

We must show, now, how there has ever been a regular and uninterrupted succession of eminent doctors, who have successively communicated to each other, the genuine doctrine, from Budha, down to the time of the third council, that is to say, during more than two hundred years. The venerable Oopali had learned the Wini at the feet of Budha himself, and had for his chief pupil, the venerable Dantaka, who, in his turn, became the teacher of the venerable Thaunaka. The latter was the instructor of the venerable Seiggiwa, who, also, brought up to the knowledge of the true doctrine, the venerable and renowned Mauggali-patta. Dantaka, by birth, belonged to the Pounha race of Wethalie. Having become a Patzin, he attained to so great a proficiency in the religious science, that Oopali placed him as the instructor of a thousand Religious, in the three Pitagats. Thaunaka was the son of a rich merchant. He became a convert to Buddhism and entered in religion, at Radzagio. His remarkable mental attainments induced his superior, to give him the charge of initiating others, to the knowledge of the sacred doctrines. Seiggiwa was the son of a Nobleman of Pataliputra. On a certain day, he went with many companions into the monastery of Thaunaka and found him in a state of trance. The young visitor wondered at what he saw. From admiration, he passed to respect and love, and wished to become a disciple under him. He succeeded so well in his studies, that he deserved to become the master of the most celebrated of all, Mauggalipatta. Prvious to his present existence, the latter was in one of the seats of Brahmans. He incarnated in the womb of a Pounha woman. When he was born, he grew up, and showed a decided inclination for becoming a Buddhist, and treading on the foot steps of Gaudama. It was in 163 that the future President of the 3rd Council, became a Patzin.

In the 20th year of the reign of Kalathoka, in the year 100, there happened a sort of schism amongst the Rahans of Wethalie. Those of the Weitzi district, little regarding the positive injunctions of the Wini, indulged into certain practices openly at variance with them. This occasioned strong remonstrance from the part of the Rahans living in the western district, called Pawera. The dispute among the Religious was soon noised abroad and caused some scandal. It was the following incident which revealed all the peril.

The venerable Ratha was then living in the monastery, situated in the Mahawon, in the district of Wethalie. Chancing to travel through the Weitzi district, he heard that, on festival days, the Rahans were wont to place near the entrance of their monasteries, certain vessels, half full of water, and advised the people to put therein, each of them, a piece of silver, saying that the produce would be employed in purchasing dresses, and the other required utensils for the use of the Rahans. They were also allowing as lawful, the use of spirits, and were not very particular, respecting the observance of the law of celibacy. Ratha was greatly scandalized at all what he saw. He boldly told the people that it was not good to make offerings of money, because it was unlawful with Religious, to possess any. He made similar observations, respecting the other trespassings.

On the following festival day, no money was offered. The Rahans were much incensed at such a neglect. Ratha said to the people: laymen, because of such irregularities, the beauty of the days of worship is fading, the glory of religion is darkened. Budha, in his days, forbade the offering of money, the use of liquors, and several other practices which are now introduced in this place. By the innovators, I am held up as a reviler of the Rahans and as one deficient in benevolence towards you. I, as well as the Rahans of the royal race, attend only to the prescriptions of the Wini, such as they have been laid down and published by Budha. The people replied to him: venerable Ratha, you are a true Rahah and you follow the right way. Pray, stay with us, and be our teacher; we will abundantly supply you with the necessaries of life. Ratha going on his way, was always followed by the people, who in token of their respect and love, accompanied him to the Kootagara monastery, in the midst of the forest of Sala trees.

The guilty Rahans, hearing of all that had been said, and fearing the paramount influence of the venerable Ratha over the people, said to them: we shall not join with the Rahans of the royal race. We shall hold no intercourse with them. We shall expel Ratha from this district. With these dispositions they encouraged each other in the determination to offer a most decided opposition, and maintain their newly invented practices.

On his side, the venerable Ratha anxious for the safety of the genuine practices, and zealous for the exaltation of religion, hastened to Kothambi, to warn the Religious of that and the neighboring districts, against the evil practices of the Weitzi Rahans. To those he could not meet in person, he sent letters and messengers to say to them: brethren, before the evil doers succeed in their iniquitous efforts to subvert religion, and render doubtful and uncertain the genuine regulations of the Wini; ere they have time to set up false tenets, let us assemble, and with our united efforts, let us give strength and confidence to the good and righteous, and crush the wicked and the impious.

At that time there lived on a mountain, in the upper Ganges a celebrated Religious, named Sampakami. He was 120 years old, and had been a disciple of Ananda. To him, the zealous Ratha applied in order to have the questions at issue with the Weitzi Rahans, finally settled. He minutely explained to him the ten points of discipline, on which they were at variance with the Wini. Sampakami fully agreed with the proposal and was of opinion that there should be held a general assembly in which the points in dispute should be examined and the schism put an end to.

Some Religious, about sixty in number, appeared to have a leaning towards the schismatical party. They resolved to go to Thaurya, where lived the celebrated Rewati whose extraordinary wisdom equalled the quickness and flash of the lightning. The venerable Rewati, hearing of their wicked design, would not, in his abhorrence for their opinions, meet them on any account. He left his own place and went from Thaurya, to the the town of Sankasa. When he had heard that they were following him and were already close to the place he lived in, he removed to Kainna-goutra, then to Oudampara, subsequently to Eggalamoura and to Tharaudzati.

At the same time, it happened that Ratha, with the venerable Tsamput, wished to go and have a meeting with Rewati, in order to place him on his guard, and to bring him over to their party. They met him at Tharaudzati in the evening, and during the whole night, made him acquainted with all the doings of the Weitzi Rahans, and begged him to declare openly which of the two parties, was in the right. Rewati, at once, pronounced in favor of the Pawera Rahans, and condemned the opposite party, on each of the ten points in dispute, and looked upon them as innovators and schismatics.

During that time, the schismatic Rahans were not idle. They wished, also, to draw Rewati to their party. Having ascertained that he lived in Tharaudzati, they went by boat and ascended the river as far as that place. They carried with them many presents, suitable for Religious. Having landed, they took their quarters under a large tree. Rewati knowing their wicked intent, would not receive their presents, nor hold communion with them. Undismayed by this first check which they had received, they tried to obtain access to the master by the means of the disciple. They offered him some presents, which in his simplicity he accepted. Meanwhile they urged him to prevail upon his teacher, to give them a favorable hearing. He made but once the attempt to introduce the subject with the greatest caution. Rewati, however, was on his guard: he administered, to his imprudent disciple, such a rebuke as to deter him, from making any further attempt. His name was Outtara. He and all the Rahans went to Wethalie.

To calm the heat of discussion, and bring the question at issue, to a complete settlement, the Walikarama monastery in Wethalie was selected, as the fittest place for holding a general assembly, where both parties would attend, and endeavor to come to a mutual understanding. Out of an immense number of Religious, 700, the most conspicuous for their learning, were selected by Ratha and Rewati to be members of the assembly. But to render the discussion clearer and easier, it was agreed that each of the ten points should be first discussed by eight Rahans, four from each party. Rewati, Samputa, Ratha and Thoumane represented the western or orthodox party; Samputakami, Thala, Koudyabantaka and Wathakami acted for the opposite party.

It is evident that in this dispute, the question was not about the Pitagat itself; it was admitted by both parties. The difficulty rested with certain points of discipline, ten in number which were to be settled by the authority of the Kambawa and Patimauk. The eight delegates having met in a private hall of the monastery, Rewati was desired to question the venerable Samputa-kami on the ten points on which there was disagreement. He said: is it lawful to add to the food that is received, some salt or other condiments? Samputa-kami answered: it is not lawful. In what place was that point settled? In Wethalie, as being contrary to the spirit of the Wini. What sin is entailed on him, who does such thing? The sin of Patzeit. Questions of a similar import were put as regards the drinking of milk in the afternoon; the use of waters, half fermented; the drink of spirits; the receiving of gold and silver. Answers were given agreeably to the tenor of the Wini regulations.

When the eight delegates had come to a decision, upon the ten points of discipline, they went into the great hall, where the 700 Rahans were assembled. Ratha was the President of the Assembly. Samputa-kami was desired to ascend the pulpit, and hold the fan. The President said to the assembled Rahans: Brethren, if it be pleasing to you, I will interrogate the venerable Samputa kami, on the Wini, and on the ten points in discussion. He followed the same order that had been observed in the first meeting of the eight Rahans. The answers were unanimously received and approved of by the whole Assembly. Then the President said: all discussion concerning the ten points, is now over; let every one accept the decisions of the assembly and act agreeably to them.

This second council is called Thattasakita or the Assembly of the 700 Rahans. It was held in 102, under the reign of Kalathoka. That Prince appears to have favored the party of the Weitzi Rahans. The Assembly lasted eight months. The canon of scriptures was likewise arranged and determined as it had been done by Kathaba, in the first council.

Among the principal members of the Assembly, were Samputa-kami, Thala, Koudzasambita, Rewati, Thauna and Sambuta, who had been disciples of Ananda. Thoumana and Wauthabakami had been disciples of the venerable Anoorouda.

Partly from the countenance given by the King to the condemned party, and partly from the obstinacy shown by the easterners, in resisting the decisions of the council, the Budhistic society was divided into two great factions. The latter, that is to say the Weitzi Rahans established the great school called the Maha Thingika. The Therathaka was that of the Orthodox, it never changed in doctrine nor in discipline. Until the third council, that is to say, during the space of more than a century, 18 different schools branched off.* Of these, seventeen offered the sad spectacle of important changes in points of discipline.

* The few and meagre particulars which we possess respecting the causes that have occasioned the holding of the second council, disclose a curious state of things, existing in the Buddhist community. The disciplinary regulations appear to have occupied a conspicuous part in the discussions that took place, during the period of the first century. Some of these regulations were of a trifling importance. We wonder how the Religious could lay so much stress upon such a trifle as this: is it lawful to put some salt, or other condiments, in articles of food, that would have been offered without such requisites. The activity displayed by both parties, in the controversy, indicates the gradual working of opinions, which in these parts, had been always intuitional to genuine Buddhism. In Wathalie and Thawattie, the holders of false tenets had been, at all times, bold and numerous. In the days of Buddha, heretics were swarming in those places. In the beginning of the 5th century of our era, Fa-hian, when he visited those places, says that he found that religion had almost disappeared, and that heretics were prevailing in every direction. We must conclude from these two circumstances, that Buddhism never flourished in those places, or, at least, that it was never the prevailing creed of the mass of the people.

The disputes that took place in those days, were not looked upon, as of a serious moment, since we see several Religions of eminence supporting the anti orthodox party. King Kalathoka himself was in favor of those whose opinions were condemned by the council. We may, also, infer from this state of things, that the disciplinary regulations were far from being settled at that time. It required the experience of succeeding generations, to determine exactly that which was the best fitted for promoting the well being of the religious body, and causing its members to live agreeably to the spirit which Gautama desired to infuse into the souls of his followers. It cannot be, therefore, a matter of surprise to see the Assembly, striving, in the midst of discussions, to elaborate the framing of the rules destined to guide the Religious in the details of their daily duties. Under such circumstances there could not be but a great variety of opinions, supported with that heat and ardor, so peculiar to individuals who live estranged from the world. Moreover, the conflicting opinions were maintained by the various schools, which, from the early period of the existence of Buddha, sprung up, and divided the members of the religious body. Circumstantial details respecting the various schools we allude to, would prove of the greatest advantage for elucidating the state of the great religious system, under consideration, for enabling us to enter into the history of its internal development, and witnessing the various incidents that have marked its progress through ages, down to the period when it has lost successively its footing in the Indian Peninsula.

The eighteen different schools which have obtained celebrity, throughout the Buddhist world, are mentioned in the Cangkoe collection, and in that of all the northern Buddhists, including the Chinese. In the manuscript which the writer possesses, nothing is mentioned respecting these schools, but their respective names. Had the chief opinions held out by each school, been given out, they would have been exposed here at great length, and with a scrupulous correctness. Such not being the case, he has thought that it was useless to the reader, to lay before him, a dry and uninteresting enumeration of names.
and of doctrine. But the Terawada never changed: it retained both doctrine and discipline in their original purity. All the different schools received their denomination, from their respective founders.

CHAPTER XVII.

Kalathoka is succeeded by his eldest son Buddhacena—And finally by the youngest, Pitaminka—This Prince is killed and succeeded by a chief of robbers, named Oyygasena-nanda—King Tsanda-eka—King Bandusara—Miraculous dreams of Athok’s mother—King Athoka—His conversion—His zeal for Buddhism—Finding of the relics—Distribution of them—Third council held under the presidency of Maunggalipata—Preaching of religion in various countries, and particularly in Thaton—Voyage of Budhagosa to Ceylon—Establishment of religion in Pagan—Various particulars relating to the importation of the scriptures in Burma.

At the conclusion of the synod, Samputakami and several of the most distinguished members of the Budhistic Assembly, astonished at the progress of schism and dissension, which the united voices of 700 Religious had not been able entirely to root up, endeavored to divine as far as human wisdom could reach, what would be, in future times, the fate of Religion. They foresaw that 120 years hence, there would be, at Pataliputra, a mighty ruler, full of love for religion, and zealous for its propagation, who would do much to promote its exaltation. But, before the reign of that pious monarch, they saw distinctly that there would appear many heretics, fond of their own will, coining doctrines of their own invention, and that they would, thereby, inflict the most serious harm on religion. They had, however, the consolation to know that this was to come to pass, after their death. But who was the fortunate being, who was destined to check effectually the coming evil? They saw him in one of the seats of Brahmans. His name was Teissa. In due time he would come down on the seat of man, operate his incarnation in the womb of a Pounha female, named Mauggali, and would, afterwards, become a famous Religious, under the name Mauggalipatta. This vision filled their souls with the purest joy, which was as yet increased by the view of the expansion and development which religion would receive through the zeal of that great personage.

After a reign of 28 years, King Kalathoka died, leaving nine sons, the eldest of whom was named Baddasena. They all reigned, one after the other, during a period of thirty three years. The last of them Pitzamuka was the youngest. During his reign, a gang of robbers desolated the country of Magatha. On a certain day, a man, named Ougggasena having fallen in, with that gang, inquired from them what pursuit they followed in order to obtain their livelihood. They plainly told him that they knew nothing about the tillage of the fields, and were unacquainted with the business of trade: they had no other way left, for maintaining themselves, but to seize by force whatever they chanced to meet. Ougggasena taken up with the boldness of these desperadoes, offered to join their company, with his eight brothers. The offer was gladly accepted. It happened, afterwards, that in one of their depredatory expeditions, their chief was slain. Ougggasena was appointed, by common consent, to take his place. Being of a bold and lofty daring, he said to his associates: Friends, it does not suit brave and enterprising men as you are, to confine your attacks on petty villages and small towns: you ought to aim higher. He then represented to them in a forcible language, that King Pitzamuka was deficient in courage, and neglected entirely the duties of a King. The moment is favorable, added he, to attack Pataliputra itself. His opinion was universally accepted. The King more fond of pleasure than of business, offered little resistance. He was killed at the taking of his capital, and Ougggasena sat on the throne, under the name of Ougggasena-nanda.

He was succeeded by his eight brothers. They reigned successively during the short period of 22 years.
signs foreshowing his future greatness. He purchased him, for the sum of one thousand pieces of silver, and brought him up along, with his other adopted son. Each of the boys had a splendid necklace of gold. On a certain day, Dzanecka ordered Pouppata, for such was the name of the first adopted son, to take a sword and go to Tsanda-gutta whilst asleep, and take from him, his necklace of gold, without, however, cutting the thread, or even unloosing it. Pouppata, agreeably to his father’s order, went near the place where his brother was sleeping. He stood over him, and examined attentively, by what means he could execute his father’s order. After many fruitless combinations, finding it impossible to do so, he went back to his father, and related his disappointment. Dzanecka without addressing him a word of blame, remained silent.

A few days afterwards, Dzanecka called Tsanda-gutta and commissioned him to take a sword, and during his brother’s sleep, to take away from him, his gold necklace, carefully avoiding either to cut the string, or to untie it. Tsanda-gutta went to the place where his brother was sleeping. After a few moments of reflexion, seeing but one way to obey his father’s order, he cut off at once his brother’s head, and brought entire the necklace of gold, which he placed at his father’s feet. The latter without giving a sign of approbation or displeasure, remained silent.

Dzanecka gave all his treasures to Tsanda-gutta. Having pointed out to him and minutely explained the course he had to follow, for obtaining the high station he was destined to, the Pounha repaired to some other place, bidding him to remember him, after his having become a King. With the treasures left at his disposal, Tsanda-gutta levied men, and went on from success to success, until he possessed himself of Pataliputra and killed Dananda. He received the water of consecration, and began his reign in 163. That monarch seems to have been accustomed to the use of poisons. For it happened that, on a certain, his first Queen belonging to the Maurya race, tasted a mouthful of a dish prepared for the King. This caused her death. At the time of that fatal occurrence, she was far advanced in pregnancy. The King, without a moment's delay, ordered her belly to be opened; the infant was taken out and put in the belly of a goat freshly slain. The child lived and was called Bandusara.

Tsanda-gutta after a reign of 24 years, died in 187, and was succeeded by his son Bandusura only 16 years old. Both the father and the son, were supporters of the Pouhhas, and fed daily an immense number of them in their palace. Bandusura reigned 27 years, that is to say, until the year 214. He had altogether 101 sons. His first Queen called Damma, had become the mother of two sons called Athoka and Teissa. When she was pregnant of the first, she had five dreams. 1st.—She thought she was stretching her two feet, one resting on the sun; and the other, on the moon; 2nd.—It appeared to her that she was devouring the stars; 3rd.—She fancied she was eating the clouds; 4th.—She imagined she was eating the worms' dunghills; 5th—and finally she imagined she was eating the leaves of all the trees. According to the prediction of the soothsayers, the five dreams meant that the son whom she had in her womb, would rule over the whole of the island of Tsampondipa; that he would destroy all his brothers who would unite to dispute him the throne; that he would disperse all the heretics or upholders of false tenets, who like clouds, obscure the glory of religion; that he would possess all above the earth to the height of one youdzana; and all below the earth, to an equal depth.

When Athoka was 16 years old, his father sent him to Outzeni, to govern that city, and the territories annexed to it. On his way to that city, Athoka had to pass through Wedika, distant 50 youdzanas from Pataliputra, in an eastern direction. The town had been founded by the Princes of Kapila-wot, when that city had been almost destroyed in the days of Budha. In that place he married the daughter of a richman, named Dewa. After his arrival at Outzeni, Athoka's wife presented him first with a son, who was named Maheinda, and subsequently with a daughter called Seingamitta. Athoka remained nine years at Outzeni. At the end of that period, hearing that his father lay dangerously ill, he hastened to Pataliputra, to assist him and render all the services dictated by filial love. On his return, having to pass through Wedika, he left in that place, his wife and his two children. A little while after his arrival at his father's capital, the King breathed his last, and Athoka was proclaimed King.

The new monarch, however, found himself soon surrounded with many enemies. With the exception of Teissa, who was born from the same mother, all his brothers conspired against him. The oldest of all, named Thoumana was the originator and leader of the rebellion. After a protracted struggle, Athoka's good fortune prevailed. His rebellious brother Thoumana was overcome and made a prisoner; soon after, he was put to death. The same sad and cruel fate befell the other ninety eight brothers. But it took three years, before Athoka could free himself from all his enemies. On the fourth year after his accession to the throne, that is to say, in 218, he received the royal consecration, and in honor of his mother, took the name of Dammathoka. He obtained a universal sway all over Dzampoundipa.

Up to the period of his consecration, Athoka had always favored the Pounhas. In imitation of his father's conduct, he fed daily an immense number of them in his palace. They all dressed in white clothes. It was but after he had received the royal consecration, that he became a convert to Buddhism, through the instrumentality of his own nephew, the Rahan Nigranda. A few particulars respecting this celebrated Religious may not be unacceptable to the reader.

After Thoumana's death, his wife Thoumana-dewi was near the moment of her confinement. Under disguise, she contrived to baffle the snares of her husband's enemies, and elude their pursuit. She went in the neighborhood of the village of Doumtanka, a little distant from Pataliputra, in an eastern direction, and rested under a Banyan tree. A small shed was provided for her, and the headman of the village, who looked upon her, as his daughter, supplied her with food. She was delivered of a son, whom she named Nigrauda. When he was about seven years old, he was confided to the care of the venerable Varuna, who instructed him in his monastery, and taught him the Kamatan. He became a Religious, and was made a Patzin. The monastery of the venerable Varuna, was not very distant from the southern gate of the city.

On a certain day, the young Religious Nigrauda rose up at an early hour, and having paid his respects to his great instructor, put on his cloak, and taking under his arm the mendicant's pot, left his monastery, entered the city by the southern gate, and shaped his course towards the eastern one, with the intention of going to visit his mother. At that very moment, King Athoka was standing over the lion's gate of his palace, enjoying the cool of the morning breeze. He saw the young Religious passing with a grave and steady step. All was graceful and dignified in his deportment. A placid joy, a serene modesty and a majestic appearance, beautified his countenance to such an extent, that at the first look, the King felt an irresistible affection for the young Samane. Without a moment's delay, he despatched an Officer to call him. With a kind and affectionate tone, the King invited him to ascend the steps of his palace, and insisted on serving him his meal. When the repast was over, Athoka said: young Samane, do you know well all the doctrines taught by your instructor? I am somewhat acquainted with them, replied modestly Nigrauda. If such be the case, will you be pleased to explain them to me? He then said in reply: He who is diligent in practising the duties that procure merits, enjoys true happiness; he shall be exempt from death. He who neglects the duties that procure merits, is unhappy, and is in a state of death. The King delighted with the instruction delivered to him by the young Samane, offered him several presents, suited with the religious profession. But Nigrauda would not accept them, except in the name and for the benefit of his instructor; because it was he who had the charge of teaching people to avoid evil, to do good, and to practise the religious duties. As to him, he was but a disciple. Athoka was greatly pleased with the modesty and disinterestedness of the young Samane.

On other occasions, the King sent for Nigrauda and heard his instructions, with such a good result, that he gradually became a perfect convert. By the advice of his spiritual guide, Athoka made daily presents to a certain number of Religious of the Budhistic persuasion. The number of the Religious, who every day attended the court, for receiving presents, gradually swelled to the amount of 60,000. Nigrauda instructed his royal pupil on the three Saranans, and the five precepts. He infused into his soul, a tender love for Budha and his Religion. The great change in the King’s dispositions, happened on the fourth year after his coronation. Up to that time he had favored the party of the Pounhas, as his father and grandfather had done. He was in the habit of daily affording food and maintenance to sixty thousand Pounhas, wearing the white dress.

Not satisfied with the liberal offerings of every day, the King said to the Rahans: my intention is to build a great number of Dzedis, in all the cities of Dzampondipa. But where are to be found the relics of the most excellent Budha that they may be divided and enshrined into the principal Dzedis? By his order, the relics were searched in every direction. The Dzedis already built in Wethalie, Kapilawot, Allakappa, Pawa and Koutheinaron, were all demolished. An exception was made in favor of the dzedi in the village of Rama. The Nagas, guardians of the place would not allow that monument to be touched. In vain, did the workmen strive with pickaxes, to demolish the dzedi. Their instruments broke into pieces, as soon as they came in contact with the building. But in none of them could the precious deposit be found. The King commanded that the demolished sacred monuments, should be rebuilt precisely in the same shape and form as they stood previously. Athoka disappointed but undismayed by his want of success, directed his steps towards Radzagio, resolved not to relent in his exertions, until he had found the precious object of his eager desires. Having arrived into that place he assembled all the Rahans and people, and inquired if there was no person, who could lead him in the way to discover the relics. In the crowd there was a Rahan, 120 years old, who said, that when he was a Samane about seven years old, his superior directed him to take some flowers and perfumes, and leading him to a retired place, said to him: you see that dark bush in the middle of which, there is a small stone dzedi; let us prostrate before it, and make our offering. When this was done, he added with a solemn tone of voice; young Samane observe well this spot, and ever remember it. He said nothing more, and we returned to our home. This is, doubtless, said the King, the very spot I am searching after, without having ever been able, hitherto, to discover it. The King and his people hastened to the indicated place. Great offerings were made to the guardian Nat, in order to propitiate him. The Nat assuming the shape of a young man, removed all the obstacles that obstructed the way to the place. When the King was near to the first door, he discovered the ruby whereupon was seen the above related inscription. On touching the bolt, the door was suddenly opened, when, to the great surprise of all present, the lamps that had been lighted 218 years ago, were found burning and full of oil; the flowers, without the least sign of withering, were as fresh and beautiful as those in the gardens; the smell of the perfumes seemed to be even more exquisite than that of new ones. The King taking the gold leaf, read the inscription concerning him. He took all the relics, except a few that he left therein, replaced and arranged everything as he had found it. The finding out of the relics happened in 218.*

* It is has been thought of some importance to mention in a particular note, all the principal epochs named through the course of this work, and to show how they stand relatively to the Christian era. As a matter of course the starting point for the reckoning and computing of years, is the epoch of Gandama's death, which is fixed by the southern Buddhists, in the year 543 B.C. The exactness of this epoch has been contested by A. Cunningham, one of the greatest authorities in such matters. In his opinion, the epoch of Gandama's Nirvana, ought to be placed seventy years later. But as his views on this subject have not, as yet, been universally received by the learned in Europe, we will remain satisfied with the hitherto generally accepted data.

The first era is that of King Eetanka, the grand father of Gandama, by his mother's side. It was made by the help and under the guidance of a famous hermit named Yewela, who is mentioned as highly versed in the science of astronomy, such as it existed in those days. The King's object was to correct the glaring errors that had crept in the calendar. It is said that he did away with the era 8940, on a Saturday, on the day of the new moon of Tabaung, (March), and fixed the beginning of the new era, on the following day, that is to say on a Sunday, the first day after the new moon of the same month. This happened in the year 691 B.C. This new reckoning of years lasted only 148 years, epoch of Gandama's Nirvana, 543 B.C.

The second era, the most celebrated of all, is the religious one. King Adzathat and the venerable Kathaba, actuated by the desire of rendering ever memorable the death of the founder of their religion, and paying to him an homage that would be reechoed by succeeding generations, came to the resolution of doing away with the Eetanka computation, and fixed a new reckoning of years, from the annual revolution which witnessed that event, which, in the opinion of Buddhists is the greatest of all. In the year 148, the first day of the month of Taego, (April), which fell on a Sunday, was fixed as the beginning of the new computation, emphatically called the era of Religion, 543 B.C. It is adopted by all the southern Buddhists.

In addition to this general era, each Buddhist nation has had, for one reason or for another, particular periods, from which they have reckoned time, and computed years. It is probable that the reform in the calendar, necessitated by the errors introduced into it, owing to incorrect computations, have given rise to several eras, which are generally known by the name of the Kings under whose reign, they have taken place, and by whose authority, they have been introduced and brought in common use.

The Burmans have the era called Daudoratha. It was introduced by Thaungdara, or, as spelt by others, Thamugdarts, King of Prome, in the year of religion 635=to 81 A.C. That monarch is represented as well informed and skilled in the knowledge of the astronomical calculations. The months were no longer in unison with the seasons. What did the royal reformer of the calendar, to remedy the evil? No other particular is mentioned in the manuscript, which the writer has in his possession, except
All that has been herein above related, respecting the partition of the relics by Dauma, &c., has been extracted from the book, called Nibana Thoot. But he who wishes to know all the particulars concerning the places where the relics have been deposited, &c., must have recourse to the books called Data Win, and Nalatatada Win.

On a certain day, a likeness of Budha was placed before the eyes of Athoka. The King was delighted with it. He wished to multiply the number of statues, so that they could be seen in every part of his dominions. He gave orders for the building of monasteries, in the 84,000 towns of his immense dominions. This happened in 220 of the Religious era. It was but three years afterwards, that is to say, in 223, that took place the de-that the King did away with 632, and began the reformed computation with two, so that its beginning must be made to agree with the year 79 A. C.

That era lasted only 562. The reformer on this occasion was Pouppadzau, King of Pagan, who is represented to us as well versed in the science of astronomical computations. This monarch imitated in this reform, the conduct of the King of Rome. He did away with 560 years and had his new era to begin with two. This happened in the year of religion 1182 = to 639 A.C. This is the common era used by the Burmese up to this day, and is known as the Pagan, or Pouppa-dzau era.

We find also mentioned occasionally the Thaton era. It is made to begin with the year of the arrival of the two Buddhist Missionaries, Thauma and Ottara, in the great place of Thaton, in the year of religion 237 = to 366 B.C. Thirimathoka was, at that time, King of that country. That period of years has lasted 1262 years. It ended in the year of religion 1599 = to 1186 A.C., when the King of Pagan Naurata-dzau invaded the country, possessed himself of Thaton, and carried away captive, the last King, Main-buit.

It is perhaps as well to mention here an epoch which has been, at all times, famous in the history of Budhaian in Burma. I allude to the voyage which a Religious of Thaton, named Bulhagca, made to Ceylon, in the year of religion 943 = to 400 A.C. The object of this voyage was to procure a copy of the scriptures. He succeeded in his undertaking. He made use of the Burmese or rather Taling characters, in transcribing the manuscripts, which were written with the characters of Marathia. The Burmese lay much stress upon that voyage, and always carefully note down the year it took place. In fact, it is to Bulhagca, that the people living on the shores of the gulf of Martaban owe the possession of the Buddhist scriptures. From Thaton, the collection made by Bulhagca, was transported to Pagan, six hundred and fifty-six years after it had been imported from Ceylon.

Without the knowledge of these various epochs, it is difficult to understand with anything approaching to clearness and correctness, the dates that we find alluded to and mentioned in the Burmese literary compositions. The foregoing particulars appear to be sufficient for all practical purposes.
dication or consecration of the dzedis in which portions of the relics were to be enshrined. Throughout his realm, the King issued a proclamation inviting all the people to attend to the observance of the eight precepts. The royal mandate was duly attended to, and the religious festival celebrated with the greatest solemnity. On that occasion, the King made abundant donations to the Religious, and strove to display his zeal for the promotion of religion.

Delighted with all that he had done, the King said to the venerable Mauggalipata: I have endeavored to labor for the exaltation of religion, by every means in my power. I have built religious monuments through the length and breadth of my dominions; I have made offerings on the grandest scale: Can I now consider myself as entitled to the inheritance of religion? The venerable Mauggalipata replied: Great Prince, you have indeed done much towards the advancement of the good cause. But something else more excellent, is, as yet, to be performed, that you may acquire a right to the inheritance of religion. What is that, asked the King? It is most perfect and meritorious, replied Mauggalipata, that you should consecrate your son Mahcinda, and your daughter Singameitta, to the service of religion. Athoka, immediately asked his son, who was eighteen years old, whether he would like to become a religious. Mahcinda answered in the affirmative. He was forthwith ordained Samane. Mauggalipata acted, on the occasion as President, and Mahadewana as master of the ceremonies. Singameitta was equally ordained. The President was Dammmapata, and the person acting in the ceremony, was Oopali. This happened in 223. Mahcinda learned the Pitagat under the immediate superintendance and tuition of Mauggalipata himself. His proficiency both in the study of religious science, and in the practice of virtue was so great, that his teacher placed him at the head of a thousand Rahans whom he was commissioned to instruct.
The great liberality of the King towards the Buddhists, the efforts that he made for the promotion of the new religion he had embraced, alarmed those who belonged to the opposite party. The Pounhas saw themselves without support and unable to provide for their maintenance. They had recourse to the following expedient, to secure their livelihood, and also, by a well concerted plan, to weaken their enemies. They all assumed the yellow dress, entered into the Buddhistic monasteries, and affected to be converts. But they were not so in reality. They retained their own opinions, and even, as regards regulations, they refused to comply with some of the ordinances of the Wini. Some of them were in the habit of feeding large fires; others exposed themselves to various degrees of excessive heat; others had the mania of fixing their eyes upon the sun, in the morning, and followed it in its course during the whole day.* Many appeared to lay little stress on several portions of the Pitagat. As a matter of course the true Religious were much scandalized at such a conduct, and refused to hold communion with them on the days of worship. This state of things, after having lasted seven years, produced an irritation in the minds, that could be no longer tolerated. Manggalipata disgusted at such a perturbation, leaving Maheinda at the head of the community, withdrew to the Ahan Gingga mountain, to enjoy some tranquility.

King Athoka was informed of the prevailing disorder. With the view of pacifying the inmates of the monasteries, he sent an Officer of his household, with stringent

* From this passage, we see that in those days of remote antiquity, there existed in the Indian Peninsula, individuals, who led away by a fanaticism still existing in our own days, devoted themselves to rigorous and extravagant penances, often in a state of complete nakedness. In the days of Alexander the Great, the same fanatics were met with in the Punjab. Such ridiculous and unnatural exhibitions, far from being approved of and countenanced by the founder of Buddhism, were positively prohibited. Though he aimed at subduing passions, and elevating the spiritual principle above the material one, he recommended in the spiritual warfare, a line of conduct more consonant with reason, and supplied his disciples with weapons of a far better quality, and superior description.
orders, to oblige the two parties to come to an understanding, to communicate with each other, and to worship in common, on the festival days. The Officer went to one of the monasteries, explained the royal order, and drew his sword, threatening to cut off the head of the first Rahan who would dare to offer opposition. One of the orthodox party came forward, and, having explained the true state of things, concluded by firmly stating that he would not hold communion with heretics. The Officer in vain expostulated, and entreated the Religious not to be so tenacious in his views, but rather to show a willingness to obey the King's orders; for the sake of peace. The latter persisted in his refusal. The Officer carried away by passion, struck off the head of the refractory Rahan. An immense uproar followed this tragical ocurrence. All hopes of bringing about a pacification were, then, at an end. The Officer withdrew from the monastery, and related to the King all the particulars that had occurred.

Athoka bitterly deplored the murder that had been committed on a saintly personage, and reproached the Officer with having outstepped the orders he had received. His religious feelings were grievously hurt, and his conscience greatly alarmed. He sent for several Religious and consulted them as to whether he was responsible for the murder committed by his Officer. The spiritual advisers did not agree in their decision. Some of them were of opinion that the King was answerable for the doing of his messenger; others declared that the King having given no order to the effect of using vioence, the Officer alone was responsible for the murder.
Such conflicting opinions increased the King's perplexities, and threw him in a state of great anxiety and uneasiness.

Some courtiers grieved at the sadness which over-spread their master's mind, advised him to send for the celebrated Maugggalipata, and abide by the decision of that eminent man, whose knowledge was unsurpassed.
The King gladly accepted the proposal. A messenger with a great retinue, was at first sent to the place of Mauggalipata. The King's desires were respectfully explained. But the old Ascetic refused to quit his abode of peace. A second messenger was despatched, but with no better success. At last, a third one was sent on the same errand, with several Religious. The latter who knew the great zeal of Mauggalipata, for promoting the cause of religion, represented to him the imminent dangers religion was threatened with, and entreated him to come and by his presence, save it from an approaching ruin. On hearing this sad news, the old man no longer hesitated. He immediately left his abode, went in the boat prepared for him, and gently sailed down the mighty stream to Pataliputra. The news of his coming down was spread in a moment. When the boat was reported to be near the city, the King with his whole court hastened to the banks of the Ganges. On her nearing the bank, Athoka went knee deep into the stream, and helping the venerable Mauggalipata with his royal hand, out of the boat, led him into a garden, where a suitable place had been prepared for his residence. There he sat at his feet, and rendered to him, the same humble services which a disciple is wont to tender to his teacher.

The King anxious to alleviate his scruples, and relieve his much troubled conscience, related the particulars of the case of the Rahan's murder, and concluded by asking whether he was to be considered as responsible for the death of the Religious. Mauggalipata said: O King, had you, when you despatched the Officer, the intention of having any refractory Rahan, put to death? No, replied King. Since you gave no such order to your Officer, and you had no intention that any disobedience to your orders, should be visited with capital punishment, the murder of the Religious can, in no way, be imputed into you, because intention is the thing that makes actions good or bad, and entails merits or sin on the perpetrator. Athoka recovered at once the peace and tran-quality of mind. Meanwhile he entreated the venerable Maugghalipata to labor for the extinction of schism and the exaltation of religion.

Seven days after the arrival of the great Religious, a vast hall was erected in the grove where Maugghalipata was living. At the end of it, a fine pavilion made of cloth of various and bright colors, was prepared for the accommodation of the monarch. Each Religious had then, to be examined separately in the presence of Maugghalipata, on the doctrines, and practices he held as genuine and good. Those, whose doctrines and observances were found to be at variance with the Pitagat, were expelled from the Assembly, stripped of the canonical robe, and compelled to resume the white dress, that is to say, the one befitting the Poumhas. The presence of the King silenced all murmurs, and rendered impossible any attempt at resistance. In this manner, the orthodox Rahans were separated from the heterodox ones.

To heal the wounds inflicted on religion by schism, to restore purity of doctrine, and confirm the genuineness of the canon of scriptures, such as had been done by Kathabha in the first Council, and by Ratha in the second one, Maugghalipata with the concurrence of the pious Dammathoka, resolved to hold a third Council. Among the Rahans, then present at Palibotra, he selected a thousand, and with them, he regulated the Pitagat. The Council was opened in the year 235, and ended in 236—to 307 B. C. It was presided over, by Maugghalipata, who was seventy two years old.*

*It is much to be regretted that no details concerning the third Assembly of the Buddhists, in Pataliputra, could be found by the writer, in the manuscript he has in his possession. The cause that occasioned the holding of the Council, was the desire to establish a perfect unity in the practices of discipline among the Religious, and to come to an agreement on the subject of the genuineness of the scriptures.

During the period of 236 years that elapsed from the death of Gauḍaṇa, Buddhism seems to have remained confined within the limits of Magatha, that is to say, north and south Behar. Its hold over the mind of the people, within those limits, appears to have been very imperfect and uncertain, particularly in the parts north of the Ganges. It is from the reign of King Athoka, that dates the propagation of Buddhism in every directions.
At the conclusion of the Council, the President, who was acknowledged the head of the Budhists, thought of extending throughout the whole of Dzampoundipa, the sway of the new religion. Hitherto it had been confined within the limits of Magatha. Now, the time had come to make it spread far and wide among the nations and tribes of the whole world. To carry out such a bold and comprehensive plan, Manggalipata made an appeal to the ablest and most zealous Members of the Council, and charged a certain number of them, to go and preach the true law, into the countries beyond the boundaries of Ma-

The uninterrupted successes which attended his arms, enabled him to afford a powerful support to the propagators of the new religion in the remotest parts which they visited. But, we have no reason to suspect that he had recourse to violence in order to gain proselytes. No doubt he protected them and supplied all their wants on a liberal scale. He does not appear to have extended farther the effects of the countenance he lent to the heralds of the new religion. He built monasteries and dzedias throughout the breadth and length of his immense dominions; he erected stone pillars which he covered with inscriptions commemorative of his piety and zeal, a few of which exist up to this day. Athoka may be looked upon as a monarch who did more for the propagation of Budhism in foreign parts, than any of those who preceded him or came after him.

The establishment of Budhism in Ceylon is mentioned at great length in the writer’s manuscript, but he has thought it unnecessary to relate all that he has found on this subject, as being foreign to the purpose he has had in view, in the publication of this book. In a foregoing note, it has been stated how extraordinary is the fact that during more than two hundred years, Budhism was propagated in Ceylon, solely by the means of oral tradition, without writing. The Cingalese authors are so unanimous on this point that it cannot be doubted. But in the Burmese manuscript, we have found stated in unmistakable expressions, that the Religious who assembled in the village of Malliya, wrote in sanscrit and with the sanscrit characters, the Pitagat. The word made use of is Sanskarain, which surely is designed to mean sanscrit. How can this be reconciled with the undoubted fact that all the southern Budhists have the scriptures in Pali and not in Sanscrit, whilst the northern nations that have embraced Budhism, possess the scriptures in sanscrit? Until we can obtain further information on the subject; I have no hesitation in stating that the Burmans ignorant of the existence of the two distinct languages, the Pali and the Sanscrit, are very apt to mistake one for the other, and that in their opinion, what they call the language of Magatha, Pali and Sanscrit, are but one and same language, to which different names have been given by ancient authors. As the translator of a manuscript, the writer was bound to render into English what he has found written in Burmese. This is the reason why he has, against his intimate conviction, made use of the word sanscrit, applied to the first compilation of scriptures, made in Ceylon, under the reign of King Watakamani.
gatha. The venerable Mitzaganti, with four companions, was directed to proceed to the country of Kashmera-gandara. Rewati was ordered to go to Mahithakan-pantala. Gaunaka-damma Reckita went to Aparanta. Maha-damma Reckita was sent to the Mahrata country. Damma Reckita received mission to proceed to Yaunaka, which is the country inhabited by the Pantsays. The venerable Mitzi directed his steps, in company of several brethren, towards some parts in the Himalayas. Thauna and Outtara proceeded in a south eastern direction, to the country of Souwana-boumi. Finally Maheinda, Ittia, Outia, Thamala and Baddathala went to establish religion into the Island of Tappapani, (Ceylon).*

Great success attended the preachings of the Budhist heralds. If credit can be given to all that is related in the books on this subject, religion must have cast deep root in the heart of the people dwelling in those distant lands.

As regards Ceylon, there is an important fact to be stated. It appears that until the year of religion 454, the knowledge of the Pitagat was transmitted by the means of oral tradition. The heads of monasteries required from their pupils, to know by heart the whole collection. It is probable that one portion of the scriptures was learned by a section of the community; and another part was mastered by another division of the community. In this manner, the whole Pitagat was known in each monastery, and could be rehearsed in full by the inmates. This state of things lasted two hundred years. Great inconvenience necessarily attending it, was soon felt so keenly, that some means had to be devised in order to render surer and easier the study of the sacred books. In the reign of King Watakamani, five hundred Religious assembled in the village of Mallaya, and wrote the whole Pitagat, in sanscrit and with the sanscrit characters.

* The island of Ceylon was called, says the Burmese author, in former times, by different names: Audzadipa, Waradipa, Mautadipa, Sinigadipa, Sihala and Tappapani. There is no doubt but the last name was corrupted by the Greeks into Tapobrane.
Under the reign of that monarch, a great dearth prevailed all over the island. Numerous Buddhist Religious crossed over the continent, and established religion in many parts of the southern portion of the Peninsula. That Prince, also, built the famous Bayagiri monastery. With the Mahawihara already existing, and the Dzetawon monastery subsequently erected, there sprung up three distinct schools. The latter was erected in 811, in the time of King Mathena of Ceylon. But the teaching of the Mahawihara was the only one truly orthodox. After a protracted existence, they were all merged into the Mahawihara school, under the reign of Thiri Singa-bodiparanna-maba, in the year of the Pouppa-dzan era, (Pagan era) 522; of religion 1714—1161 A. C.

The venerable Thanna and Outtara of the Pounha race, came to the district of Thaton, which is called

* The Burmans have, from the time of their conversion to Buddhism, or, at least, from the period they have become familiar with the scriptures, had the mania to give Pali names to countries, large towns and new places that were settled by the authorities of the rulers, in addition to the ordinary and common names. What has been the result of such a measure? The people have continued to designate such places by the vulgar names, whilst in most of the public documents, and in the court, they have always used the scientific and uncommon names. Hence has arisen a confusion in the minds of the people, to such an extent, that in many instances, they believe that two names given to the same place, indicate two distinct towns and localities.

The position of Thaton is well known, between the mouths of the Salween and the Tsitang rivers. Its actual distance from the sea, is about eight or nine miles. In the days of Budhagosa, that is to say, in the beginning of the 5th century of our era, it was, as yet, a sea port. The Burmese writer invariably call Thaton, not by the name of city, but by that of country. They add the epithet of Souwana-boun, the land of gold. According to the same writers, Thaton was situated in the state or kingdom of Ramagnia. From what is found mentioned about Ramagnia, it appears that it comprised three distinct parts or districts, that of Kouthein which is the present Pounhein or Bassein, including the territory situated between the Irrawady and the mountains of Arraean; that of Henthawati, between the Irrawady and the Tsitang river, and that of Montama or Martaban, between the Tsitang and the Salween. It seems that the kingdom or Ramagnia extended in the north as far as Akaonk-taon, south of Prome. The limits that are assigned must have undergone considerable changes, on account of the continual wars that have raged in those parts, but they are those assigned by several native authors.

The people that dwelt in Ramagnia are called Moun. They are the Ta-laings or Peguans of modern times. They had attained a considerable de-Souwana-bouni, in the country of Ramagnia, for the purpose of establishing religion in that distant land, which lays south-east of Mitzima. Thirimathauka was the King, who, at that time, reigned at Thaton. Previous to the arrival of the Buddhist messengers of peace, the town was desolated by the ravages of Biloos, who coming from the sea, devoured all the newly born infants. A great consternation and panic had seized the inhabitants, when they saw the two strangers, clothed in yellow, robes, setting their feet upon the shore. They mistook them for monsters of a new description, who were coming to increase their misfortune. They ran to arms, and were preparing to attack the two Religious. The latter perceiving the danger that threatened them, said with a meek tone of voice, to the infuriated mob: why do you attack us? We are not Biloos; nor are we come hither with any hostile intention. Know ye that we profess a religion which forbids us to take away intentionally the life of even the smallest insect, to rob, to commit adultery and to use spirituous and intoxicating liquors. By our regulations, we are allowed to eat rice but once in a day. On hearing the explanations given by the two strangers, the people of Thaton were quieted. They regard of civilization, at a time, when the Burmans were in a state of barbarism. The proximity of the sea afforded them opportunities of coming in contact with other nations, the Hindous in particular, who appear to have settled at Thaton in great numbers. The Bahun Budhagosa is said to have belonged to the Pounha race, though he was a fervent Buddhist.

The town which was the capital of the territory called Hinzawati, cannot be, we believe, the town which is called, at present Pegu, but another one, much more ancient, the ruins of which are still visible close to the eastern side of Pegu.

The language of the Talings, is totally different from that of the Burmans, but the characters for writing somewhat are the same. It is from them, that the latter have received their religion, the scriptures, and the characters used in writing.

Since the final conquest of Pegu by Alaong-phra in the middle of the last century, and the extermination of a great number of its inhabitants, the remaining Peguans have gradually amalgamated with the Burmans. With their nationality, they have lost also their language, to such an extent, that it is now spoken only in a few isolated places. It is not unusual to meet with descendants of Peguans, whose aged parents still speak their native language, whilst they know and speak only Burmese.
ceived them with kindness and treated them with great respect. By the power inherent in the two Religious, the sea Biloo was put to flight, and was seen no longer. The King and the people grateful for the service they had received, and delighted with the new doctrine preached to them, accepted joyfully the five precepts which they promised to observe. An immense number of men and women were converted. Among the new converts, a great many embraced the religious life.

King Thiri-mathauka was informed that, a little while after Gaudama's death, a Rahan named Gambawatti had brought thirty three teeth of Budha, and deposited them in a dzedi, upon the mount Inda-danoo, which lays north-east of Thaton. Moreover, he had heard that after the 8th season, Gaudama had gone to Mitila. Whilst he dwelt into that place, it happened that a certain Rahan, came to remember of some of his relatives whom he had known during a former existence. He saw them living in Thaton. He then earnestly supplicated his great master, to condescend to go to that place and preach the law to his relatives. Gaudama complying with the request, resorted thither through the air, attended with a great retinue. He preached the law, and previous to his departure, gave to the ruler of Thaton, eight hairs of his head. Relying on the accuracy of the information, Thiri-mathauka felt a great desire to find out the precious relics, in order to have them distributed in 11 towns of Henzawatti, in 11 towns of Kouthein, and in 11 towns of Mouttama. Those three countries, constitute what is called Ramagnia. All happened agreeably to his wishes. The relics were duly found on mount Inda-danoo, in the very dzedi in which they had been enshrined, and were distributed in the various towns, as above mentioned. It is probable that there occurred at Thaton, the same curious fact which we know to have taken place in Ceylon, viz: Religion was propagated, at first, by the means of oral tradition.

The first one who made an attempt to possess himself of a copy of the sacred scriptures was Budhagosa a Religious of Thaton, of the Pounha race. That man embarked at Thaton who was, then, on or near the sea. That place is in the Ramagnia country, and is inhabited by a people called Moun. He sailed to Ceylon in the year of religion 943,* under the reign of King Mahanama. He resided three years on that island, wrote on palm leaves with the Burmese characters, the Pitagat, which was found written in the language and characters of Ceylon. In another manuscript we read that he translated into Pali the scriptures, which were in the language of Ceylon. Budhagosa remained three years in Ceylon, in order to complete the work he had undertaken. During his stay in that island, the people were so much pleased with him, that they made him many and costly presents, on his leaving their country. With him, he brought over to Souwana-boumi, which is in the Ramagnia country, a complete collection of the scriptures.

In or about the year of the Pagan era 419,† the 42nd, some say, the 44th King of Pagan, named Anaurata, having invaded the Ramagnia country, possessed himself of the Moun’s territories and entered triumphant in the venerable city of Thaton. He took away from that place, the collection of scriptures, brought over from Ceylon, by Budhagosa, as well as the most learned among the Rahans. With the aid of these distinguished Rahans, religion was, then, firmly established in Pagan. He became master of the whole of the Ramagnia country, which includes Henyawati, Mouttama and Kouthein.

We have alluded briefly to the reconciliation that has taken place in Ceylon, between the three great schools. Two of them the Bayagiri and the Dzetawon merged into the great Mahawira school, which had always held up the orthodox doctrines. In the year that followed that event, that is to say, in the year of religion 1714 of the Pagan’s era 522,‡ many Rahans natives of Thaton, Pagan and other places in Ramagnia, attended by a large retinue, crossed over to Ceylon, for the express purpose of worshipping the relics, and the Bodi tree, and making themselves perfectly acquainted with the genuine doctrine and discipline. As a matter of course, they joined the Mahawihara school. They remained on that island, during nearly one year. One of the party, named Tsapada, who was but a young Samane, was raised to the dignity of Patzin, according to the rules and regulations, adopted by the Mahawihara. The party having performed their devotions, and penetrated themselves with the spirit of the community in which they had spent a year, returned to their countries. The young Religious who had been but recently ordained, applied to his superior and obtained the permission to remain behind in Ceylon, for the purpose of studying the Pitagat, and mastering its contents. After ten years of unwearied application, he went back with four companions named Maheinda, Thiwali, Ananda and Rahula. After their landing in the neighborhood of Cape Negrais, they spent a year in Koutheim, and finally reached Pagan in the 8th year of the reign of King Narapati-sisoo of the Pagan era 534—to 1173 A. C. In this manner by the exertions of those five Religious, the religion of Ceylon was firmly established and set up in Pagan. In this manner, the doctrines and institutions preached and set up in Ceylon by Maheinda and his companions, were blended with the doctrines and institutions which the venerable Thauna and Outtara had established in Thaton. Both flourished in Pagan and were much extended.*

* It is obvious from the testimony of Burmese writers, that they acknowledge the fact that the Scriptures brought from Ceylon by Budhagosa, and the Institutions flourishing in Thaton, found their way to Pagan in the reign of King Naurata-dzau. Likewise, they affirm that under the reign of Narapati-sisoo, the Religious who came from Ceylon, imbued with the spirit of the Mahawihara School, set up practices which were little or not observed in Pagan at that time.

There has been, no doubt, a great revival of Buddhism in Pagan, from the days of King Naurata-dzau, to those of Narapati-sisoo. Most of the great monuments which cause the admiration of the travellers who visit Pagan, were raised during that period.
The brilliant and glorious reign of Narapati-sisoo was soon followed by a series of misfortunes, which contributed to the weakening of his great empire, and finally brought in its total overthrow. Pagan was taken by foreign invaders. In the midst of such calamities, three noblemen named Radzasingian, Asinkara and Sihasoo set themselves up as Kings, the first in Miynstain, the second in Pekkara, and the third in Pinlay, in the year 662—1301 A. C. The King of Miynstain having treacherously enticed Kiantza, the King of Pagan, to visit him in his new capital, detained him under various pretexts, and finally had him murdered. Thamit, the son of Kiantza, hearing of his father’s detention, ascended the throne of Pagan and reigned 22 years. He was succeeded by his brother Mou-hnit, who reigned 43 years. With him ended the line of Pagan’s Kings in 730—1369 A. C.

Sihasoo, the King of Pinlay reigned in that place 12 years, and in 684, removed the seat of royalty to Panya. In that place, there were successively five Kings, whose aggregate number of years on the throne, amounts to 15.

One son of Sihasoo, named Athinkara-dzau-gonn, established royalty in Tsitkain, in 684—1323 A. C. Under the reign of his son and successor, named Thirimega, one canine tooth of Gaudama was brought to Tsitkain. The King had the precious relic placed in a golden casket, and enshrined in a turret of his palace. He daily worshipped it.

Thirimega having died, his two sons Dzeta and Tissa quarrelled about the crown. Neither of them ever had the title of King; both of them oppressed the country, during nine years. The son of Dzeta, named Budadasa became King and reigned during 29 years. It was under the reign of that monarch, that five venerable Religious, who were well versed in the science of the Pitagat, wrote the whole compilation which was in sanscrit, into the language of Ceylon, (Pali).

Tsitkain ceased to be a royal residence in 725—1364 A.C., and in the following year, the city of Ava was founded on the 6th of the waxing moon of Tabaong, on a Tuesday at noon, under the constellation Pounna-phasheu.

On the following year, Mouhnit, King of Pagan died at the age of 64, after a reign of 43 years. In him, ended the line of the Pagan monarchs. In the great city of Ava religion greatly flourished, and in 1134—1773 A.C., this book was composed* in the province of Dibayan.

* When the writer set at work, for publishing the second edition of this book, he has had at his disposal a Burmese palm leaves manuscript, in which he has found a vast amount of information respecting the history of Buddha, which was wanting in the work called Malla-linkara-wouttoo, the translation of which has afforded matter for the first edition of the Legend of Gaudama. The work is named Tathagatha-oudana, the meaning of which is: Praises of Him who has come, like all his predecessors. This is one of Buddha’s honorific titles. He is sometimes called Bagawat, the blessed or benevolent; Sugatha, he who has happily come; Dzina, the conqueror. From what is stated at the end of the work, it appears that it has been composed in the town of Dibayan, sometimes called Tabayin, lying west of the river Mu, at a distance of about 15 miles. The place is, at present in a ruined condition. Though the Province continues to bear the name of Tabayin, the residence of the Governor is in the town of Ye-ou, on the right bank of the Mu.

The compiler of the work was a Phongie, who agreeably to his testimony, finished his task on the 38th year after he had become a Patzin, 93 years ago. He was, therefore, at least, 58 years old, as he could not become a Patzin, before he had reached his 20th year. The compilation contains 636 pages of 10 lines each, on palm leaves, and forms two huge volumes. We may well say that the narration begins at the beginning. The author informs us of the origin of Gaudama, since he has obtained the Buddha-ship, but of the being who was indeed hereafter to become a Buddha, but who had to move into the circle of countless existences, slowly gravitating towards that perfected state in which he was to be fitted for discharging the duties of a deliverer. He presents us with a sketch of the origin of the country of Kapilawot, and of the Kings from whom Gaudama’s father descended. The above particulars were not to be found in the Malla-linkara. In all that relates to the birth, boyhood, &c., of Gaudama, both compilations agree in the main. The variations are few and unimportant. The author of the Tathagatha-oudana, is immensely diffuse when he relates all that has taken place in Buddha’s mind during the 49 days that he has spent around the tree Bodi. Besides the important theory of the twelve Nidamas, or causes and effects, he supplies us with a complete exposition of the whole Buddhistic system on methaphysics, ontology, geography and cosmography, the various seats, on which all rational beings are placed, from the lowest hell, to the last or the highest of the immaterial seats. All these details are purposely omitted by the compiler of the Malla-linkara. Finally the author supplies us with a few particulars respecting Budha, during the 20 first seasons, or years of his public life. The story of Dewadat is presented at great length. But what is more important, we possess in the compilation of the Tathagatha-oudana, a concise account of the three great Assemblies or Councils held in Radzagio, Wethalie and Pataliputra, with the names of the sovereigns who have ruled over Magatha, from Adzatathat, under whose reign Gaudama died, to Athoka, who promoted religion more than any of his predecessors, and by his royal influence, supported the decisions of the last Council. He likewise mentions the names of the Religious, who, after the third Council, were commissioned to go and preach religion in various countries out of Magatha. From this last expression, we learn that Buddhism, until 236 after Gandama's death, had not extended its influence beyond the boundaries of Magatha. At a matter of course, our author dwells more particularly on the two missions that were sent, the one to Ceylon, and the other to Thaton. He enables us to follow the development of Buddhism in Pegu and Burma, by informing us that King Naurat-dzau of Pagan, after the conquest of Thaton, took the King prisoner, seized upon the collection of the scriptures, and with all that, carried to his capital all the best informed of the Phongies, in 1036 A.C. Our author brings his narration to the time of the foundation of Ava, in 1365 A.C.

In imitation of all other compilers, our author ends his narrative with the following pious wishes. As a fit reward of the good work that I have happily brought to a close, I desire, to become, in some future existence, a true Budha, possessing all the science which will enable me to know all beings, their state and condition, and all the relations subsisting between them, and likewise, to be gifted with a true compassion for, and benevolence towards all beings, which will prompt me to labor for their deliverance. I desire that during the existences which are to precede the last one, I may continually practice the ten great and principal virtues. May my father, mother, relatives, teachers and friends have their share in this my good work!

Though for more comprehensive than that of the author of Malla-linkara, the compilation of the Tathagatha-oudana is very inferior to it, as regards the drawing up of the subject and the disposition of its parts. Both are made by Burmans. We do not mean to say that the Burmans have made works of an original character. The authors have extracted from various parts of the scriptures, all the materials they wanted for composing a work, which might be considered as the history of the founder of their religion.

103.—The Burmese translator of the Malla-linkara finishes his work, by candidly stating the motives that have induced him to undertake it. He desires to create, promote and propagate in the heart of future generations, religious sentiments, and feelings of the tenderest affection for the person of Budha and his doctrine, that is to say, the Law, and the Assembly of the Perfect. Such are the lofty objects he had in view when he began to write. He was encouraged in his difficult task by purely religious considerations, viz.: the promotion and triumph of Buddhism. For securing the attainment of what he considered to be a most desirable end, he summoned all his abilities with a most praiseworthy energy and perseverance.

With a somewhat different object in view, the Burmese work has been translated into an European language. The translation has been accompagreater than the three rational beings, towards his glorious perfections, as well as the Law and the Assembly, I have, to the best of my abilities, endeavoured to translate from the Pali into Burmese, the sacred book called Malla-linkara Wouttoo, or history of the most excellent flower.

niced with notes intended to explain the text, which would otherwise prove, in many parts, almost unintelligible to the generality of readers. The principles of Buddhism, such as they are held and professed by Buddhists in general, but in particular by those inhabiting Burmah, have received a certain degree of attention, and have been examined as carefully as possible, from a Budhistic point of view. That great religious system has been considered, as it is in itself, without any regard to its intrinsic merits or demerits. The notes are not designed to be an apology or a confutation of Buddhism, but an exposition of its doctrines, such as they are found in the best writings and believed by its votaries. When certain tenets or practices were to be accounted for, recourse has always been had to the general principles of Buddhism and to the notions certainly prevailing, at various periods, in Buddhist countries. It is needless to add that the notes, having been hurriedly written in the midst of almost uninterrupted and time absorbing occupations, are destitute of pretensions either to deep research or scientific merit. In former years, the writer has bestowed a certain amount of time and efforts on the study of Budhism, in Burma, where it has been for centuries the only religious creed. A portion of the knowledge thus acquired, has been embodied in the foregoing notes, with the intention of compressing within a narrow compass, the elementary principles and general notions of Budhism, affording thereby to the readers, who cannot have access to the voluminous writings of the French and German Orientalist Savara, on the great religious system of Eastern Asia, comparatively easy means to obtain some information on a religion, which, false as it is, deserves to be known and understood, since in point of antiquity it is second to none except to Brahminism; and as regards diffusion, it extends its sway over probably one fifth of the human race.
AN ABSTRACT OF A FEW SMALL DZATS,
NEMI AND DZANECKA.

The writer has thought that it would not be without interest to the reader, to make a few remarks respecting the five hundred and ten Dzats, so famous amongst the Burmese, and to give, as a specimen of those compositions, the abbreviated translation of some of those fabulous accounts. We will begin with a few of the small Dzats, and end with the compendious summaries of two of the great ones, known under the names of Nemi and Dzanecka. The Buddhists of these parts maintain that all the Dzats contain a short and concise narrative of some of the circumstances attending certain existences of Gaudama, when he was born in a state of animal, man, prince, nobleman, poor, rich, Nat, &c. The narrator is no other than Gaudama himself, who is supposed to have condescended to make his disciples and the crowds of hearers acquainted with certain particulars, relating to his person whilst he was passing through the slow process of me-tempsychosis, and gradually gravitating towards the perfection he had at last reached. In fact, each of these pieces is prefaced with these words: when the most excellent Budha was in such a monastery, surrounded with his disciples, he spoke as follows, &c.

It is not improbable that some of these stories may have been told by Gaudama for the two following purposes: first, to impress his hearers with a profound respect for his incomparable wisdom, which enabled him to penetrate into the deep recesses of the past, and to bring to light some events hitherto buried into its dark bosom. The second and principal object he had in view, was to give some important lessons to his disciples, to correct some of their defects, and stir up others to the practice of the highest deeds, he had himself performed during former existences. On his respect Gaudama followed the practice of all eastern Sages, who had recourse to the use of pa-tables, similitudes, apalogues, &c., in order to convey under a gentle, amiable, graceful and interesting form, the most important instructions, designed to enlighten the mind, and correct the heart.

The collection or compilation comprises most of those fables, that are to be met with, amongst most of the Asiatic nations, whence they have found their way to Europe, first among the Greeks, and next reached the western nations. The writer has been not a little surpriised to find in that collection, a number of fables, the very same as those that have been inimitably narrated by the great French fabu-list, the good Lafontaine. This is another confirmation to the old adage: there is nothing new under the sun.

These stories have certainly an Indian origin, at least the Burmans have received them, as almost all the things that are connected with their religion, from that quarter. Under despotist governments, the plain and naked truth cannot show itself, nor make her voice to be heard, without exposing her friends to the most imminent dangers, from the part of those tyrants, who practically maintain that their will must ever stand above truth and reason. Stories nicely told, were the pleasing and innocent but necessary dress which that sacred Goddess was obliged to wear; in order to make her presence supportable to the despots, and help her friends to find favor before those whose absolute and uncontrollable sway made every body bow the head in their awful, though detested, presence.

The first five hundred stories have, it seems, no historical value whatever. They are most of them short and concise. But the last ten may very likely contain many facts or allusions to individuals and places that might afford a clue to some parts of the history and geography of India, in days of a remote antiquity. A complete translation of the ten Dzats might not be without interest, provided such a work be accompanied with copious notes, made by a competent person well acquainted with the ancient history of India.

All the stories end with a most important disclosure made by Gaudama himself. The personage that has played the most important and praiseworthy role, is, as a matter of course, our Budha himself. Those who have befriended him, assisted him, and rendered him some services, are those who have subsequently become his favorite and most distinguished disciples and hearers. Whilst those who have acted in some reprehensible manner, who have opposed him and done him harm, have since become the individuals who are, in his days, heretics, or holders of false doctrines, and in particular his arch enemy, the notoriously wicked Dewadat.

The compilation of all these stories is prefaced as follows:—In the country of Amarawadi, lived a Pousha named Thoumea. After the death of his father, he became the owner of a considerable estate. Having enjoyed it during many years, he began to reflect on the many and various accidents attending human life, and came to the resolution of leaving the world. He therefore, distributed in alms, all his riches, and withdrew into solitude, to lead an ascetic life. He soon reached a high degree of perfection. At that time Deipinkara, one in the series of the twenty eight Budhas, came to that country, attended by 400,000 Rahans, to beg his food. Our Rathee Thoumea having nothing to offer to the great Budha and the Assembly, came, threw himself at his feet, and delivered himself up soul and body to his service. In another compilation, it is stated that Thoumea had volunteered his services to level a portion of a road that Deipinkara was to follow. The work was finished with the exception of a small gap that was not yet filled, when the Budha made his appearance. The Hermit, without a moment's hesitation, flung himself on the ground, and bridged the place with his own body.

It was at the sight of such a perfect abnegation of self, that Budha gave to Thoumeda the assurance that one day, he would become a Budha. On that occasion, great wonders took place.

From that time, he began to practise with a fervent earnestness the great virtues and perfections prescribed by the law. The whole period of time that elapsed from the time Gaudama was the Pounha Thoumeda, to the time he became prince Wethandara, that is to say, reached that existence which immediately preceded the last one, when he became Budha, is of four Thingies and one hundred thousand worlds or revolutions of nature. A detailed account of the most meritorious and interesting actions performed by him, during several existences that illustrated that almost incalculable period, is to be found in the great Dzedi of Ceylon.

The accounts must be short and concise, otherwise the dzedi above referred to, how large soever we may suppose it to have been, could never have held them.
The Fox and the Lion.

1st.—When the most excellent Budha was in the Dze-tawn monastery, surrounded with his disciples, desiring to correct a Religious who was in the habit of keeping bad company, he narrated the following story: At the time that the Princes Bramanas reigned at Baranathee, Phralaong was then a lion, father to two little ones, one male and the other female. The first was named Menandza. The lion's household, when Menandza was grown up and had married, was composed in all of five individuals. Menandza, strong and bold, went out, every day, in quest of prey, for the support of his four relations, that remained in the den. One day, in the middle of one of his predatory excursions, he happened to meet with a fox which was lying on his belly, in a most respectful posture. On being asked, by the proud lion, with a terrific voice, heightened by a threatening glance, what he was doing, the fox respectfully answered: I am humbly prostrated here, to do homage and pay my respects, to your majesty. Well, said Menandza; and he took him alive to his den. As soon as the father saw the fox, he said to his son: my son, the fox is an animal full of cunning and deceit, faithless, without honor, addicted to all wicked practices, and always engaged and embroiled in some bad affairs; be on your guard; beware of such a companion and forthwith send him away. Unheeding his father's wise advice, Menandza persisted in his resolution, and kept his new friend with him.

On a certain day, the fox intimated to Menandza that he longed to eat the flesh of a young colt. Where is the place these animals are wont to graze, asked Menandza?
On the banks of the river of Baranathee, replied the fox.
Both started immediately for the indicated spot. They saw there a great number of horses, bathing in the river. Menandza, in an instant, pounced upon a young one, and carried it to his den. It is not prudent, said the old father, to eat those animals which belong to the king. One day he will cause you to be shot from a distance with arrows, and kill you. No lion, that eats horse flesh, has ever lived long. From this day, cease to attack those animals. Deaf to such wholesome warnings, Menandza continued to carry destruction among the horses. News were soon conveyed to the king that a lion and a fox were making great havoc among his horses. He ordered the animals to be kept within the town. The lion, however, contrived to seize some and carry them away. Orders were given to keep them in an enclosure. Despite this precaution, some horses yet disappeared. Enraged at this, the king called a bowman and asked him, whether he could transfix a lion with his arrows. The bowman said that he could do it. Hereupon, leaving the king he went and hid himself behind a post, waiting for the offender. It was not long, ere he made his appearance; but the cautious fox had remained somewhat back behind, hidden in a drain. In one start, the lion with the quickness of lightning, was on the wall, and straight on, he went to the stable. The bowman said within himself: the lion's movements are very quick, I will wait until he come back loaded with his prey. He had scarcely revolved this thought in his mind, when the lion was already on his way back carrying a horse. The bowman ready shot an arrow that transfixed through the fierce animal. The lion made a start; crying with a terrific voice, I am wounded. The fox hearing his friend's accents, and the sharp whistling of the bow-string, knew at once what had happened. He said to himself, shaking his head: there is no friendship, forsooth, with the dead; my friend has fallen under the bowman's arrow; my life is safe; I will go back to my former place.

The wounded lion, making a last effort, went back to his den, and dropped dead at its entrance.
Menandza's relatives perceiving the wound and the blood gushing out of it, understood at once that he had been shot through with an arrow, and that the fox was the cause of his miserable and untimely end. His mother gave vent to her grief as follows: Whoever associates with the wicked, shall not live long; behold my Menandza is no more, because he followed the fox's advice. The father, in his turn, bewailed the loss of his son: He who goes in company with the wicked, shall meet with some evil fate; witness my son whom his desolate mother sees weltering in the very blood she gave him. His sister cried aloud: he who does not follow the advice of the good, shall repent for it: he is mad, and, like my brother, shall come to an untimely and cruel end. Menandza's wife exclaimed: he who belongs to a superior rank ought to beware to associate with those of a rank inferior to his own; otherwise he soon becomes despicable as those he associates with. He loses his position, and becomes the laughing stock of all.

Budha concluded his discourse with this reflection, that no one ought to keep company with those that are wicked and of an inferior position. The Religious profitted so well of the lecture, that he broke at once with his former friends, and soon reached the state of Thautapan. The fox has been since Dewadat; Menandza, the Religious, the object of the lecture; Menandza's sister, Oopalawon; his wife, Kema; his mother, Yathandara; his father, Phralaong.

The Jackal and the Hunter.

2nd.—When the most excellent Phra was in the Weloo cowon monastery, alluding the Dewadat, who aimed at harming him, he spoke as follows: At the time the Princes Bramanas reigned at Baranatheee, Paralaang was then a jackal, presiding over 500 others jackals of his own tribe. His dwelling place was in a cemetery. One day, it happened that the inhabitants of Radzagio made a great feast, where every one ate and drank as much as he liked. The repast was nearly over, when some one asked for a last piece of meat, to give the finishing stroke to his appetite. He was told that not the smallest morsel remained. On hearing this unwelcome news, he rose up, laying hold of a wooden club, and went straight to the cemetery. Then stretching himself on the ground, he laid down, as if dead. Phralaong cautiously drawing near to the pretended dead body, smelled it from a becoming distance, and soon discovered the snare laid for him. Coming up unperceived close to him, he suddenly seized the club with his teeth, pulling it with all his might. The young man did not let go his hold. The animal withdrawing, said to the hunter: young man, I perceive now that you are not dead. The hunter, goaded with shame and anger, rose up, and, with more energy than dexterity, flung his club at the jackal; but he missed him. Go away, said he, wretched beast, you may boast that you have escaped this time. Yes, mildly replied the jackal; I have been saved from your club; but no one shall ever be able to preserve you from the punishments in the eight great hells. Having thus spoken, he soon disappeared. The young man having washed away, in the ditch, the dust that covered him, walked back, quite disappointed, into the town. The hunter was the same, that subsequently has become Dewadat. As to the jackal, he is the same that has since become Budha.

3rd.—When Phra was in the Dzetawon monastery, desiring to give instruction to the young son of a nobleman, named Ootara, he spoke as follows. At the time, the princes Bramanas reigned at Baranathoe, Phralaong was a pigeon. There was then a man in that country, who was wont to catch pigeons, bring them to his house, and carefully feed them, until they had become fat, when he then sold them at a high rate. Together with other pigeons, Phralaong was caught and brought over to the house. But he would not peck the grain that was spread before him. Should I eat, said he ‘o himself, I will soon get fat; and then be sold like others. He soon became wretchedly thin. Surprised at this, the hunter took him out of the cage, placed it on the palm of his hand to examine him more closely, and find the cause of this great leanness. Phralaong watching the opportunity of a favorable moment, when the attention of his guardian was called to some other object, flew away to his own old place, leaving the hunter quite vexed at, and ashamed of his confiding simplicity. The hunter is in these days Dewadat; and the pigeon is now Budha himself.

4th.—When Phralaong was a deer he became intimate friend with the bird khaoukshia and a turtle. On a certain night, it happened that a hunter, having laid down his net, the deer was caught. A tortoise that was near to the place, came and bit the net; the deer then soon made his escape from the dangerous position he was in. Whilst this was going on, the friendly khaoukshia perceiving the danger his friend was in, amused the hunter, by flying right and left close to him, to retard his progress towards the place where the net was laid. Mad at the escape of the deer, he seized the turtle and thrust her in his bag. But the wily bird contrived, by its peckings, to make a large hole in the bag, and the tortoise too made her escape.

5th.—One day Phralaong, being then a husbandman, observed once, to his great surprise, that a lion of an uncommon size, was paying frequent visits to his rice field, ate and destroyed much of the young plants. On a certain occasion, he examined closely the intruder, and perceiving the extremities of his feet, he discovered that the pretended lion was but a colt, that had clothed himself in a lion’s skin.
When the most excellent Buddha was in the country of Mithila, he went, attended with a great many Rahans, to the monastery of Meggadawa, situated in the middle of a beautiful grove of mango trees. He spoke as follows to the assembly. Beloved Bickus, in former times I lived in this very place, where we are now congregated and was the ruler of the country of Mithila. He then remained silent. Ananda respectfully entreated him to descend and narrate to them, some of the principal events that happened at that time. Buddha assented to the request and said: Formerly there reigned at Mithila a prince named Minggadewa. During 82,000 years, he remained a prince, and spent all his time in the enjoyment of all sorts of pleasure: he was crown prince of that country during the same space of time, and reigned, as king, during a similar period.

On a certain day the barber of the king having detected a grey hair on the royal head, exhibited it to his astonished regards. The king, struck at such a sight, soon understood that this object was the forerunner of death. He gave up the throne, and resolved to become a Rahan. Having put into execution his resolve, he practised with the greatest zeal, the highest virtues, and after his death migrated to one of the fortunate seats, of Brahmas. 82,000 princes, who succeeded him, followed his footsteps, inherited his virtues, and, after their demise, obtained a place in the same seat.

Prince Minggadewa who had opened the way to such a succession of pious monarchs, perceiving that his race was near being extinct, left the seat of Brahmas and took flesh in the womb of the queen of the king, who then governed Mithila. On the tenth month, the queen was delivered of a son, who received the name of Nemi. The Pourhas who were invited to the palace to tell the horoscope of the royal child, assured the king, that this child would follow the example of all his predecessors, who

From his tender age, the young prince displayed the most liberal and pious dispositions in making abundant alms and fervently observing all the religious practices. All the inhabitants of that kingdom followed his example, and when some one died, he migrated to one of the Nats' seats. During those happy times, hell seemed to have become quite unnecessary.

On a certain day, Nemi appeared to be most anxious to know which was the most excellent practice, the bestowing of alms, or the observance of the precepts. The great Thagia came down from his glorious seat, encompassed with an incomparably shining brightness, and went to the place where the prince was busy in revolving this thought in his mind. The angelical visitor told him that the bestowing of alms could but procure an admittance into the seats of Nats, but that a perfect compliance with the ordinances of the law, opened the way to the seats of Brahmas. As soon as he had given this decision, he returned to his blissful seat. On his arrival, he found crowds of Nats given up to rejoicings. The Thagia gave them a detailed narrative of all that he had seen on earth during his errand, and in particular eulogized at great length the religious dispositions of Prince Nemi. Enraptured with the heart moving description they heard, all the Nats at once exclaimed that they wished to see in their seats so accomplished and virtuous a Prince. The Thagia commanded a young Nat, named Matali, to have his carriage ready, depart for the country of Mitila and bring, in this fortunate seat, the ruler of that country. Matali, bowing before the Thagia, left forthwith the seat of Nats, on a magnificent chariot. It was then the day of the full moon, when all the inhabitants of Mitila were busily engaged in discharging the prescribed religious duties. On a sudden there appeared coming from the east the magnificent and bright equipage of the Nat, splendidly emerging from the bosom of clouds at the same time as the moon in its full. Surprised at such an unexpected sight, all wondered and believed that two moons were miraculously rising on that occasion. They were soon undeceived by the nearer approach of Matali's carriage. The messenger went to the king and conveyed to him the intelligence that the Nats were exceedingly anxious to see him. Without a moment's hesitation, the king stepped into the carriage and abandoned himself to the guidance of his heavenly guide. Two roads are now opened before us, said Matali, the one through the dismal dungeons where the wicked are consigned to undergo punishment for their offences, and the other through the blissful seats where the good are enjoying the rewards allotted to them for their virtues. Which of the two do you wish to follow? The prince said that he wished to visit both places. Matali answered in a mild tone of voice, that his request should be complied with.

The celestial guide directed his rapid course through the regions of desolation where dwells an eternal horror. The first object they met with was a broad and deep river, filled with frightful whirlpools, where the water seemed as if boiling. It was glowing like a flame, and the whole mass of water appeared like a lake of fire. The river is called Wattoorani. On the banks of that river stand the infernal ministers, armed with all sorts of sharp edged instruments, cutting, wounding, piercing through the unfortunate wretches, why try to get out of that horrible and burning water. They are forcibly pushed again in that same place of torments and tumble over pointed darts, whence they are taken up and roasted on living coals. Nothing is heard but the horrifying howlings and yells of those unfortunate beings, who are waiting with the greatest impatience the moment of their deliverance. What are the crimes, asked the terrified prince, that have committed the unfortunate inhabitants of this place, for being subjected to such unheard-of sufferings? These are, replied Matali, the persecutors of the weak, the heartless oppressors of the poor, &c., who are doomed to undergo such punishments. Thence the guide drove rapidly to another place where dogs, each with five hideous heads, famished eagles, devouring crows, fed with a ravenous hunger over the bodies of unfortunate victims, the flesh of which is incessantly reproduced, to afford a continual prey to those never satiated ferocious animals. These, said Matali, suffer for having done no good to their fellow creatures, preventing others to do some, and borne envy to their neighbours.

Here follows a long description of the other places of hell, given to Nemi by his celestial guide. We omit it, lest its tedious and revolting particulars tire and disgust the reader. Suffice it to mention that the torments of Tantalus are described here with an horrifying correctness, that almost casts in the shade the description given to us by the Latin poet.

Having ranged the various regions of hell, and heard all the particulars given to him by Matali, Nemi was suddenly brought over to the beautiful, smiling and blissful seats of the blessed. He soon descried, at a distance, the celebrated palace, made of diamonds, disposed in an immense square of twelve youdzanas, on each side, and five stories high; then the garden, the tank and the padetha tree. In that palace, Biranee occupied a splendid apartment; she was then lying on a soft sofa, surrounded by more than a thousand beauties. What good works, asked Nemi, has Biranee practised, for deserving such a magnificent reward? Matali replied: This daughter of Nats was formerly a slave in the house of a Pounha. She always was very attentive to all the duties of her position, and at the same time regularly observed the precepts of the law. On a certain day, her mistress, who was wont to feed daily eight Rahans, fell into a fit of anger, and said that she was unable to bear any longer the fatigue attending the maintenance of those Religious. But the young slave, full of religious zeal, took upon herself the labor of feeding the Rahans. For this good

Nemi was successively led into the various seats of the inhabitants of those blissful regions, and his guide explained, at great length, the good works that had procured to each of them the respective happy situation they enjoyed, and occasionally mentioned the period of time they were allowed to dwell in those abodes of unparalleled happiness. He was finally introduced to the presence of the great Thagia, who is the chief of all Nats. Having finished the survey of all the seats of Nats, Nemi was brought back to the seat of Men, in his own capital by the same celestial guide.

On his return, Nemi saw himself surrounded by his pious subjects, who eagerly inquired from him all the particulars respecting his journey. He minutely explained to them, all that he had seen both in the region of hell, and in those of Nats, and concluded by exhorting his people to be liberal in bestowing alms, that they might hereafter be admitted to share in the enjoyment of the Nats' happiness.

Nemi perceiving that his hairs were turning grey, became still more zealous in the practice of alms deeds, and resolved to embrace the profession of Rahans. But previous to his taking such a step, he had his son Ralaradzana appointed to succeed him. In that prince, terminated the long succession of Kings, who, in the decline of their lives, became Rahans.

Dzanecka.

This is one of the best written Dzats possessed by the Burmese. The writer has translated it from beginning to end; but he will give here but an outline of its contents. The narrator, as usual, is our Budha himself, when he was in the Weloowon monastery, surrounded by the Members of the Assembly, and a crowd of hearers.

In the country of Mitila, there reigned a king named Dzanecka, who had two sons, called Arita Dzanecka and Paula Dzanecka. After a long and prosperous reign, he passed to another existence. Arita Dzanecka having celebrated his father's funerals, and made the usual purifications, ascended the throne. He confirmed his younger brother in the situation of Commander-in-Chief he had hitherto held.

On a certain day, a vile courtier, by a false report, awakened in the king's breast, sentiments of jealousy and suspicion against his brother's fidelity. The innocent prince was cast in a dungeon; but by the virtue of his innocence he found means to make his escape and went to a part of the country where he had powerful supporters, and soon found himself in a condition to bid defiance to his brother. The king assembled his troops; a battle ensued, in which the king was slain, and Paula Dzanecka ascended the throne.

The Queen who was with child, on hearing the news of such a disaster, went to the treasury, took some ornaments of the purest gold, and the most valuable precious stones, and placed the whole in a basket. She then spread the rice so as to cover the treasure, and extended an old and dirty cloth over the opening of the basket. Putting on the dress of one of the meanest woman, she went out of the town, carrying the basket over her head. She left the city, through the southern gate and passed into the country, without being noticed by the guards.

Having gone to a certain distance from the place, the Queen did not know what way to direct her steps. She sat in a dzeat during the heat of the day. Whilst in the dzeat, she thought of the country of Tsampa where lived some of her relatives, and resolved to go thither. She began to make enquiries from the people that were passing by, respecting the route she would have to follow.

During this time, the attention of a Nat was suddenly attracted by the virtue of Phralaong that was in the Queen's womb, on the sad position his mother was in. He, forthwith leaving his blissful seat, assumed the appearance of an old man, who was guiding a carriage along the road. He came close to the dzeat and invited the Queen to ascend on his carriage, assuring her that he would safely convey her to Tsampa. The offer was accepted. As the Queen was far advanced with child, there was some difficulty for her to get in the conveyance, when that portion of the earth she was standing upon, suddenly swelled and rose to the level of the carriage. The Queen walked into the chariot and they departed. During the night they arrived at a beautiful place, close to the neighborhood of Tsampa. The Queen alighted in a dzeat. Her celestial guide bade her to wait until day break, before she ventured into the city, and returned to the seat of Tawadeintha.

During that very night, a famous Pounha, attended with five hundred of his disciples, had left the town at a late hour, to take a walk by moonlight, and to enjoy the cool of the night and a bath in the river. Pamaouka, for such is the name of the Pounha, came by chance to the very place where was seated the Queen. His disciples continued their walk and went on the bank of the river. She appeared full of youth and beauty. But by the virtue of Phralaong, the Pounha knew that she was in family way, and that the child she bore was a Phralaong. Pamaouka alone approached close to the Queen and entreated her to entertain no fear whatsoever; that he looked upon her as his sister. The Queen related to him all the particulars of her misfortune. The great Pounha moved with compassion resolved to become her supporter and protector. At the same time, he recommended her to say that he is her brother, and when his disciples should come back, to shed tears in token of the tender emotion she felt at meeting with her brother. Every thing having being arranged, Pamoanka called his disciples, told them how happy he was at having found his sister, from whom he had parted many years ago. Meanwhile he directed them to take her to his house, and recommended her to the special care of his wife. As to him, he would be back soon after having performed the usual ablutions. The queen was welcome in the Pounha's house, and treated with the greatest care and tenderest affection. A little while after, she was delivered of a beautiful child, resembling a statue of gold. They gave him the name of Dzanecka.

Hazing reached the years of boyhood, he was one day playing with the boys of his age, when by way of teasing, they called him the son of the widow. These keen tauntings made him urge his mother to indicate to him the name of his father. It was then that he knew the author of his birth. Pamaouka taught him all the sciences known in those days, such as medicine, mathematics, &c. At the age of 16 years, young Dzanecka had completed all his studies.

Dzanecka resolved to devote himself to trade and acquire thereby ample means to reconquer one day the throne of his ancestors. With a part of the treasure his mother had brought with her, he was in a position to fit out a ship in company with several other merchants. He resolved to sail for a place called Caumawatoura. He had scarcely been at sea during two days, when a mighty storm came on. The vessel after having resisted some time, against the roaring and raging billows, at last gave way and was broken into pieces. All the crew and passengers, amounting to 700, miserably perished in the sea, without making the least effort to save themselves. Our Phralaong, on the contrary, seizing the extremity of a log of wood, swam with all his strength, resolved to struggle to the last against adversity. Mighty were his efforts during several days. At last a daughter of Nats, whose duty was to watch over the sea, saw his generous and courageous behavior, took pity on him and came to his assistance. There followed a sort of dialogue between her and Dzanecka. The latter displayed his undaunted courage and firm purpose. The former admired the more his determined resolution. She resolved to save him from the dangerous position. Taking him in her arms she carried him, according to his wishes to the country of Mitila, in the garden of mango trees, and placed him on the very table-stone where his ancestors were wont to enjoy themselves with a numerous retinue. Phralaong immediately fell asleep. The daughter of Nats, having enjoined to the Nat, guardian of the place, to watch over the Prince, returned to her blissful seat.

On the very day that the vessel was wrecked, the ruler of Mitila had died, leaving one daughter named Thiwalee. Previous to his giving up the ghost, and ascending to the seats of Nats, the King had ordered his ministers into his presence and enjoined on them to select for the husband of his daughter, a man remarkable for the beauty and strength of his body, as well as by the acuteness and penetration of his mind. He was to be able to bend and unbend an enormous bow, a feat that the united efforts of a thousand soldiers could scarcely achieve, and find the place where he had concealed 16 golden cups. On the seventh day after his death, the Ministers and Pounhas began to deliberate among themselves about the choice of a match worthy of the Princess. Several competitors offered themselves for the hand of Thiwalee, but they were all rejected. At last, not knowing what to do, they resolved to leave to chance, the solution of the difficulty. They sent out a charmed chariot, convinced that by the virtue inherent in it, they would find out the fortunate man whose destinies were to be united to those of the Princess. The chariot was sent out, attended by soldiers, musicians, Pounhas and noblemen. It came straight forward to the mango trees garden, and stopped by the side of the table-stone Phralaong was sleeping upon. The Pounhas, on inspecting the hands and feet of the stranger, saw the unmistakable signs foreshowing his elevation to the royal dignity. They awakened him at the sound of musical instruments, saluted him King, and begged of him to put on the royal dress, mount on the chariot, and proceed triumphantly to the royal city. He entered the palace through the eastern gate. Having been informed of the king's last intentions, he forthwith bent and unbent the bow, found out the 16 golden cups, and was duly united to the beautiful and youthful Thiwalee. All the people showed signs of the greatest rejoicings; the rich made him all sorts of offerings; the Pounhas in white costume, holding the sacred white shell, adorned with flowers and filled with water, the body bent forward, poured respectfully the water, imploring the blessings on the new monarch.

When the rejoicings were over, the king rewarded the Pounha Pamanouka, who had been as a father to him during his exile. He applied himself to do as much good as he could, in relieving the poor, and promoting the welfare of all. He delighted in mentioning to his courtiers his misfortune, and the great efforts he had made to extricate himself from difficulties. He praised the reward attending generous efforts, and exhorted them never to flinch under difficulties, but always to exhibit a strong and unconquerable resolution under all trials, because it must sooner or later be crowned with success.

During the 7000 years that he reigned over Mitila with the queen Thiwalee, he faithfully practised the observances of the law, governed justly, fed the Rahans and Pitzeaga-budhas, and gave abundant alms to the poor.

On the 10th month, Thiwalee was delivered of a son whom they called Digaout. On a certain day, the king having received from his gardener some mangoes full of flavor and beauty, wish to go to the garden to see the tree that yielded such delicious fruits. When he arrived at the place, he saw two mango trees, one with a luxuriant foliage, but without fruits, the other loaded with fruits. The monarch approached the tree, riding his elephant, and plucked some mangoes which he ate and found delicious. Thence he proceeded further to inspect the other parts of the extensive garden. The courtiers and the people that followed, plucked fruits from the same tree, and did it with such eagerness that they left neither fruits nor leaves on the tree.
On his return, the king was surprised to see the fruitful tree destitute of both leaves and fruits, whilst the barren one had a beautiful appearance. The monarch after a lengthened dialogue with his courtiers, concluded as follows: the riches of this world are never without enemies; he who possesses them, resembles the fruitful mango tree. We must look out for goods that excite neither envy, jealousy nor other passions. The Rahans and Pitzega-budhas alone possess such riches. I will take a lesson from the barren mango tree. That I may cut off and eradicate the troubles, vexations, and anxieties of life, I will renounce every thing and embrace the profession of Rahan.

With this idea strongly impressed on his mind, Dzanecka, came back to his palace. He forthwith sent for the general of his troops and directed him to place a strong guard, in front of his appartment and allow no one to come to his presence, not even the queen, but only him who would bring his daily meal, during four consecutive months. He gave orders to his ministers to judge with impartiality, agreeably to the law. Having thus arranged every thing, he withdrew alone to the upper apartment of his palace. Here follows a stanza in praise of the prince, who had separated from his queen, concubines and all the pleasures and honors attending royalty.

Dzanecka alone began to meditate on the happiness of the life of Pounhas and Pitzega-budhas; he admired their poor diet, their zeal in practising the observances of the law, their earnest longings after the happiness of Neibban, their disengagement from the ties of passions, the state of inward peace and fixity their souls enjoyed. In his enthusiasm he venerated them with a holy fervor, called them his masters and preceptors, and exclaimed: who will teach me to imitate their lives, and help me to become similar to them. In ten stanzas, Dzanecka reviews successively all that had belonged to him, his capital with its stately edifices, fine gates, the three walls and ditches, the beautiful and fertile country of Wintzeartiz, the palace, with its lofty domes and massive towers, the beautifully ornamented throne, the rich and magnificent royal dresses, the royal garden and tank, the elephants, horses and chariots, the soldiers, the Pouns, the Princes, his Queen and concubines. He then concludes each stanza with the following words: When shall I leave all these things, become poor, put on the humble habit of Rahans, and follow the same mode of a perfectly retired life. With these and similar reflections Dzanecka endeavored to cut one after the other many threads of passions, to pull down successively the branches of the impure tree, until he could give a final stroke to the roots.

At the conclusion of four months' retirement, Dzanecka sent for a faithful servant, and directed him to procure for him the various articles of the dress of a Rahan. He had his head and beard shaved; put on the cherished habit, and placing a staff in his hand, walked out of his appurtenances and directed his course towards the gate, with the dignified deportment of a Rahan of sixty years profession.

Queen Thiwalee was tired of having been so long deprived of her husband's company. She summoned seven hundred of the handsomest damsels of the palace, to go with her to the king, and by the efforts of their united charms entrap him in the net of passion and prevail upon him to come back to their society. When they ascended the stair-case, they met with Dzanecka, in his new attire. None recognized him; but all paid him due reverence as to some holy personage that had come to give instructions to the king. Having reached the appartment and seen the royal dress set aside, and the beautiful and long black hairs laid on one of the sofas, the queen and her attendants soon understood the sad and heart-rending meaning these objects were designed to convey. She ran in all haste with all her retinue down the stairs and overtook the new Rahan, at the moment he was crossing the outer gate of the palace. Every means that could be devised to make impressions on the king’s heart were resorted to by the queen and the damsels, in order to prevail upon him to forego his resolution. Tears, cries, wailings, striking of the breast, display of the most graceful and seducing forms, supplications, entreaties, were all used in vain; the new Rahan, unmoved and firm, continued his course saying that passions and concupiscence were dead in him, and that what could be said or done to engage him to change his resolution, was in vain. During his progress towards the solitude of Himawonta, he is comforted and encouraged by the advice and instruction of two Rathees, who from their solitude flew through the air to witness the beautiful struggle between passions and virtue, and help him not to flinch before the repeated obstacles the queen put in his way, to retard, impede and prevent the execution of his holy design. The names of these two instructors are Narada and Migalzein; they were clothed in the skin of Panthers. They instructed him in the duties of his new calling, and exhorted him to root from his heart, with perseverance, all passions, and in particular concupiscence and pride.

Comforted with such timely instructions, the new Rahan felt himself more than ever fixed in his resolution. On his way to the solitude, Dzanecka arrived one evening at the gates of a town called Daunu. He passed the night under a tree, at a distance from the queen and the crowd that followed her. On the morning, he entered the town and went as usual along the streets to beg his food. He happened to stop for a while in the shop of a man that was fabricating arrows. Dzanecka seeing the workman shutting one eye and looking with the other to see if the shaft of the arrow was straight, asked him the reason of his doing so, as he would see better with both eyes than with one. The workman told him that it was not always good that each object in this world should have a match. Should I, said he, look on this shaft with both eyes, my sight, distracted by several objects, could not perceive the defects of the wood, &c., but by looking on it with but one eye the least irregularity is easily detected. When we have a work to perform, if there be two opposite wills in us, it cannot be regularly made. You have put on the habit of Rahan; you have apparently renounced the world; how is it that you are followed by such a large retinue of women and other attendants? It is impossible to attend well to the duties of your profession, and at the same time keep such a company. This cutting remark made a deep impression on Dzanecka. He had gone over a little distance, when he met a number of little girls playing together. One of them had one silver bangle on each hand, with one of gold on the right hand. When she agitated the right hand, the two bangles hitting each other produced a sound. Dzanecka, willing to try the wit of the little creature, asked her the reason why the movement of one hand produced a sound, whilst that of the other did not. She replied; my left hand that has but one bangle, is the image of the Rahans who ought to be alone. In this world, when an object has its match, some collision and noise inevitably result. How is it that you, who have put on the habit of Rahan, you allow yourself to be followed by that woman who is still full of freshness and beauty? Is she your wife or sister? Should she be but your sister, it is not good that she should be with you. It is dangerous for Rahans to keep the company of women.

This sharp lecture, from the mouth of a little girl, produced a deep impression on our Rahan. He left the city. A large forest was in the vicinity: he resolved to part at once, company with the queen. At the entrance, he stopped a while, and paused for a moment. There, on a sudden, stretching his arm, he broke the small branch of a tree, and showing it to Thiwalee, he said: Princess, you see this small branch: it can never be reunited to the stem it has been taken from. In a like manner, it is impossible that I should ever go back with you. On hearing the fatal words, the queen fainted.
All her attendants crowded round her, to afford her some relief. Dzanecka himself in the tumult and confusion that was going on, stole away with rapidity and disappeared in the forest. The queen was then carried back to Daunu by her attendants, whence they all returned to Mitila. Alone in the solitude, Phralaong enjoyed the sweets of perfect contemplation, during a period of three thousand years. Thiwalee, on her part, resolved to renounce the world and follow the example of her husband. She became a Rahanesse, in one of the royal gardens, during the same period of years, and subsequently migrated to one of the seats of Brahmases, called Brahma-pari-thitisa.

At the conclusion of the narrative, Budha added: Mani-megala, the daughter of Nats, who saved me in the midst of the sea, is now my beloved discipless of the left, Oopalawon. The little girl who gave me such a wholesome instruction, at the gate of the town of Daunu is now Kema, my discipless of the right. The Rathee Narada, has since become my great disciple Thariputra, whose wisdom is second only to my own. The other Rathee Miga-dzein is now my disciple Maukalan, whose power for displaying wonders yields but to mine. The arrow maker has since become Ananda, my faithful and dutiful attendant. Queen Thiwalee has become the princess Yathaudara. As to prince Dzanecka, he is now the Phra who is before you and addresses you, who is perfectly acquainted with all the laws and principles, and who is the teacher of men, Nats and Brahmases.
REMARKS ON THE SITES AND NAMES OF THE PRINCIPAL PLACES, MENTIONED IN THE LEGEND.

The identification of the places mentioned in the course of the Life of Gaudama, is certainly a great desideratum. This difficult and laborious task has been boldly undertaken by several Government servants of both services. Great and important successes have attended their efforts. One of the most successful among them, has been Major General Cunningham, the Archaeological Surveyor to the Government of India. The sphere of his laborious and scientific researches has extended over north and south Behar, the cradle of Buddhism, and some parts of the Punjab and Peshawar. Under his direction, excavations have been made, inscriptions found and deciphered, the nature and dimensions of old ruined monuments correctly ascertained. In his valuable reports, may be found important elements for reconstructing the History and Geography of ancient India. He has been greatly assisted by the History of the voyages of the Chinese pilgrim, Hwen Thsang, who spent sixteen years in travelling throughout India, and visiting all the places rendered famous by the actions connected with the life of Budha, and the spread of his Doctrines and Institutions. The voyage began in 629 and ended in 645 of the Christian era. The itinerary begins with the starting of the traveller from a city on the banks of the Hoang-ho. He shaped his course through the centre of Tartary; entered by the northern extremity of the plateau of Panin into what is called now independent Tartary, visited Samarcand, where there were no Buddhists, but only worshippers of the fire. Thence he passed over to Balk, where he found religion in a flourishing condition. He ascended the mighty Hindoo Kush mountains, penetrated into Cabul and Peshawar, crossed the Indus at Attock, and turning abruptly to the north, visited Oudiana, where he found dzosdis and monasteries on the grandest and most magnificent scale; and came back to Attock, in following the western bank of the Indus. He then proceeded through the Punjab to Mathura, and minutely examined all the Buddhistic monuments to be found in the territories situated between the Ganges, the Gunderuck and Nepaul. He went to Benares, Pataliputra and all the places in Magatha, or south Behar, where his religious curiosity could be satisfied. Thence he shaped his course in an eastern direction, and visited the whole of Bengal. He passed to Orissa, visited many places in central India, and a portion of the upper Deccan. He went to Molwa and Guzarat, returned to Magatha, and began his homeward voyage. He recrossed the Indus at Attock, followed up the valley of the Cabul river, and with unheard of difficulties and dangers, passed over the Hindoo Kush range. His route crossed Chinese Tartary, led him back through Kashgar, Yarkand and Khotan, to his native place.

It is a matter of surprise to see how acute in his observations, correct in his descriptions, and exact in his measurements, our pilgrim has been with his book in hand, the above named eminent archaeologist was enabled in many instances, to identify at once, mere mounds of ruins, and satisfy himself that they were the remains of the monuments described by our pilgrim. When he entertained some doubts in his mind, he had recourse to excavations which in most instances, demonstrated the perfect accuracy of Hwen Thang.

Nearly two hundred years previous to the voyage of Hwen Thsang, another Chinese pilgrim named Fa-hian had undertaken a similar journey. Impelled by a purely religious zeal, he came to India, for the sole purpose of visiting the places rendered famous and venerable, by the birth, life, doings and death of Bce, the same personage who is known in these parts, under the name Budha Gandama. His object was also to make a complete collection of all the religious books acknowledged as genuine, in India, and carry them with him to China. The errand of Hwen Thsang had a similar object.

Our worthy traveller, according to his account, passed through southern Thibet, little Tartary, and visited successively Cabul, Cashmere, Candahar and the Punjab. Following a nearly south-eastern direction, he reached Mathura on the upper Jumna, crossed the Ganges at Kanouj, at the confluence of the Kali with that river, travelled almost in an eastern direction, through Oude, and crossed the Gogra near the Fizabad. Keeping close to the eastern bank of that stream, he struck in a slightly northern direction, passing the Rapti south of Goruckpore, and followed the same course, nearly to the western bank of the Gunduck. From thence he shaped his course in a south-easterly direction, parallel to the course of that river, which he crossed a little higher up the place where it empties in the Ganges. Following then, a southern direction, he crossed the Ganges near the place where is now the city of Patna. From thence our pilgrim travelled in a south-easterly direction, crossed successively the Morhar and the Fulgo, examined all the places in the neighborhood, south and south-west of Behar, which are so celebrated in Budhist annals. After having spent three years in India, busy in mastering the Pali language and collecting copies of the religious works, he then embarked on the Ganges. Near its mouth he went on board of a ship bound to Ceylon. After having visited that celebrated island, Fa-hian sailed in the direction of the Malayan Archipelago, called at Java, and safely arrived to his country, after having performed one of the most extraordinary and difficult journies any man could have undertaken in those ancient times. It was in the beginning of the fifth century, that this feat was performed in the space of more than seven years. He spent three years in India and two at Ceylon.
The Chinese original of Fa Hian has been translated in French, by A. Remusat. The English version, from the French, is accompanied by the annotations of Remusat, and those of other celebrated orientalists. The book of Hwen Thsang has been translated by Mr. Julien. For the loan of these two works, the writer is indebted to the ever obliging kindness of the worthy and learned Chief Commissioner of British Burma, Col. A. P. Phayre. From these works we have extracted the above and following particulars.

1.—The name given by northern Buddhists, to Budha, is Thakiamuni, which means the Religious of the Thakia family. He belonged to the Kshatria or the warriors' caste. The name Gautama, according to the opinion of the late E. Burnouf, is the name of the religious instructor of his family, which members of families of that caste often adopted. This instructor might have been a descendant of the celebrated philosopher Gotama, mentioned in certain writings, but distinct from our Budha.

2.—Kapila, or Kapilawot, the birth place of Budha, was situated on the left bank of the Gogra, direct north of Benares. It was a heap of ruins when Fa Hian visited it, and the country almost a desert. Some are of opinion that it was situated near the mountains that separate Nepal from Goruckpore, on the river Rohini, a mountain stream, feeder of the Rapti. But this assertion has very few supporters and appears improbable.

3.—The river Anauma, cannot be the Amanat in Behar, south of Patna. It is probably one of the feeders of the Gogra, and to be met with half way between Kapila and Radzagio, the site of which city, as will be subsequently seen, lays close to modern Behar. The Legend bears out this supposition. Budha travelled 30 youdzanas from Kapila to the river Anauma; thence 30, to Radzagio. The youdzana of those times in Magatha, is supposed to have been equal probably to seven miles.

4.—Oorouwela was one of the mountains famous for the number of the hermits that withdrew thither for the purpose of meditation. It is not far from Gaya Budha.

5.—The river Neritzara, in Mongol, Nirandzara, is a considerable stream flowing from the south-west; it unites with the Monah and forms the Fulgo.

6.—Baranathee is, beyond doubt, the famous city of Benares. The Burmans call it by the name of Baranathee, or rather Varanasi. The town is so named from its situation between the small river Varana, and the Asi, a mere brook. The solitude of Migadawon, whither Budha went to preach the law to the five Rahans that had served him during the six years of mortification, which he spent in the forest of Oorouwela, lays in its vicinity. Benares is famous in the Budhistic annals, because in its neighborhood, the law of the wheel, or rather the super-excellent law of the four sublime truths, was announced for the first time. The meaning of Migadawon is, the deer forest. It lays 3½ miles from Benares in a northern direction. It is said that after having travelled nine miles from the Bodi tree, Budha had to go over a distance of 18 yonduzanas, ere he reached Benares, making a total of about 120 miles.

7.—Radzagio, or Radzagihra, was the capital of Magatha, or South Behar. Its situation is well ascertained. Its ruins have been minutely described by several travellers. It was situated on the left bank of the same small river as Behar, but a few miles south of that place. The mountains or peaks surrounding that ancient city are full of caves tenanted, in former ages, by Buddhist ascetics. The mountain Gayathitha, where Budha preached his famous sermon, lays in the neighborhood. It is perhaps the same as the Gridrakuta, or the Vulture's Peak.

8.—The Buddhist annals often mention the country of the middle or Mitzima-desa. It comprised the countries of Mathura, Kosala, Kapila, Wethalee and Magatha, that is to say, the provinces of Agra, Delhi, Oude and South Behar.

Magatha, south of the Ganges, had for capital, at first Radzagio, until Kalathoka, a hundred years after the death of Gaudama, transferred the seat of his empire to Pataliputra, or Palibothra. The celebrated Welooxon monastery was situated in the neighborhood of Radzagio, and was offered to Budha by King Pimpathara, the ruler of that country.

9.—Kosala is the same as the kingdom of Ayodya, now called Oude. Thawattie, or Crawastu, was the capital of a district of that country. It was situated nearly at the same place where at present stands the modern town of Fizabad. According to the Legend, the distance from Radzagio to Thawattie is forty-five yonduzanas of about 7 miles. Twelve hundred paces from that city, was to be met the renowned monastery of Dzetawon, or the grove of the victorious. Many ruins that have been visited and examined, leave no doubt regarding the certain position of Thawattie.

10.—Thing-ka-tha, or Tsam-pa-tha, lays in an eastern direction between Mathura and Kanouj, near the site occupied by the town of Ferruckabad. Captain A. Cunningham has met with the ruins of that place in the village of Samkassa, on the left bank of the Kali-nadi, twelve cos from Ferruckabad. According to a popular tradition, it was destroyed in 1183, by the King of Kanouj, at the instigation of the Brahmins, who endeavoured, by all means in their power, to make all the remnants of Buddhism, disappear from those parts of the Peninsula. It was in that place that Budha arrived, on his return from the seats of Nats, whither he had gone to preach the law to his mother. According to the Legend, the distance from Thawattie to Thing-ka-tha is thirty yonduzanas, in a westerly direction. Fa Hian says that he saw in one of the temples of that place, the ladder Budha had used when he came down from the seats of Nats.

11.—The village of Patali is the very place where was subsequently established the renowned city of Patalibothra, capital of Magatha.
The place had reached the height of its glory, when Megasthenes, the Ambassador of Seleucus, visited it, in the reign of Chandragupta. In the time of Budha, it was but an insignificant place. There was, however, a sort of fort to arrest the inroads of some troublesome neighbours. Budha, when he passed through that place, predicted that it would become a flourishing town. The prediction began to have its accomplishment, one hundred years after his death, when King Kulathoka left Radzagio, and removed the seat of his empire to Palibothra, near the place where stands the modern city of Patna.

12.—The town of Wethalie is supposed to have stood north of Patna, on the Gunduk, not far from the place where that river joins the Ganges. The large village of Besarh, 20 miles north of Hajipur, occupies a portion of the place over which stood Wethalie. In the seventh century, Budhism was there on its decline; false doctrines, as says one of the Chinese pilgrims, were much prevailing. Nothing was to be seen, at that time, but a ruined town and many monasteries almost deserted and also falling into decay. Many signs of ancient ruins are also to be met with between Besarh and Bakra, they belong to the same city which was both populous and wealthy. Its circumference was about 12 miles, including the two modern places of Bakra and Besarh. All the mounds of ruins have been carefully searched and described by A. Cunningham, and the sites of ancient tanks exactly laid down. There is a curious episode in the Legend, connected with the name of Wethalie. A courtezan, who despite her dishonorable calling, occupied a brilliant position in the country, courted the favor of feeding Budha with all his followers. The latter accepted her invitation and received a beautiful grove she presented to him and to the Assembly. It does not appear that her avocation was looked upon as a disgraceful one. It is probable that persons of this description, were as much for the intellectual as for the sensual enjoyments of their visitors. There existed in Greece and at Rome something similar to what is here alluded to. According to Plutarchus, Aspasia at Athens, was courted by Pericles on account of her high literary attainments and political abilities. Socrates visited her sometimes, in company with his disciples. Visitors took occasionally their wives to her place, for the purpose of enjoying the charms of her highly refined and instructive conversation. The same philosophical biographer does not scruple to quote sometimes the sayings of the celebrated Roman courtezan, named Flora.

13.—Nala or Nalanda was a Brahmin village about seven miles north of Radzagio. It was the birth place of the great disciple Thariputra. It seems that there was there a sort of Academia, whither the learned of Radzagio resorted for discoursing on moral and philosophical subjects. The magnificent ruins which subsist up to this day, in that locality, have been minutely examined, measured and described by several visitors. The great temple, in the opinion of A. Cunningham, must have been built in the 6th century of our era.
14.—Kootheinaron, the city of the grass Kushi, is the place in the neighborhood of which Budha entered in the state of Neibban, or died. Some antiquarians laying much stress on the name of a village, up to this day, called Kushia, have placed the position of Kootheinaron on the road between Betiah and Goruckpore. On that spot, is to be seen a pyramidal looking mound of bricks over which spreads a large Banyan tree. But, from the narrative of the Legend, we must look for the site of Kootheinaron, nearer to the river Higniarari or Gunduck, since the spot where Gaudama died, was near to the city, and is described as surrounded on three sides by the river. Kootheinaron was situated a little north or north-west of Betiah, on or near the banks of the Gunduck. There, too, ruins are to be seen, which, doubtless, will prove to be those of Kootheinaron. The name may have subsequently migrated to the locality above mentioned.

15.—Papilawana, the capital of the Mauria Princes, was situated between the Rapti and the Gunduck, nearly east of Goruckpore. South of that place, Fa Hian visited the dzedi of the coals. The Mauria Princes, agreeably to the text of the Legend, having come too late for sharing in the partition of the relics, took with them the coals that remained after the cremation of Budha’s remains, carried them into their country, and built a dzedi over them. It was not far from that place, that the Brahmin Darna built another dzedi over the vessel that had contained Budha’s relics.

16.—The village of Rama is the same as the Ramaganio of the Cingalese collection. The two Chinese pilgrims in their relations, call that place Lan-mo. Would it be that the modern Ramagar is indicative of the ancient Ramaganio? At all events, we would not be far from the truth, if we place it between the Gogra and the Rapti, but nearer to the latter, almost due west of Goruckpore.

17.—The Pawa town is supposed by A. Cunningham, to have occupied the same site as the large village of Padarawana, 12 miles to the west of the river Gunduck, and 40 miles north-north-east of Goruckpore. A large mound of more than 200 feet in length by 120 in breadth, exists in that locality. From the excavations made on the place, it is supposed that there was a court yard, with cells for monks, on each side, the centre being, as was often the case, occupied by a dzedi. The people of Pawa obtained one-eighth of the relics, after the cremation of Budha’s remains, and built one dzedi over them.

18.—Kapilawot or Kapilawottu was situated between Fyzabad and Goruckpore, but a little nearer to the latter place. It was on or near the banks of the Gogra. The small river Rohini formed the boundary between the territory of Kapilawot and that of Kaulia.

19.—Gaya and Budha-Gaya are two distinct places. The first is well known as the town of Gaya. The second lays six miles southward, and is famous as the locality of the Pipal or Bodi tree, under which Gaudama has obtained the Budhahood. A tree of the same description, is, as yet, to be seen on the same spot. The present one was in 1811 in full vigour, when Dr. Buchanan saw it. He describes it as not being more than a hundred years old. A. Cunningham says that it is now much decayed. One large stem with three branches on the westward are still green; but the other branches are barkless and rotten. Hwen Thsang, in his itinerary, speaks of an early renewal of that tree by king Purna Varmma, after its destruction by king Sasanga-ku, who, with a true brahminical and inimical feeling, dug up the very ground on which it had stood, and moistened the earth with sugar cane juice, to prevent its renewal. The same eminent archeologist describes a massive brick temple, standing east of the Bodi tree, and with every probability, maintains that it is the same which has been described by the above named Chinese pilgrim. As Fa Hian is silent respecting that temple, A. Cunningham concludes that it was erected during the 6th century of the Christian era, when Buddhism, under the favor of king Amara-sinha and some of his successors, regained a vigorous ascendency at least, in Magatha. It is probable that all the temples, the ruins of which have been examined at Budha-Gaya, Nalanda and Behar, having a similarity in architectural plans and ornaments, have been erected during the 6th and a part of the 7th century of our era. The inference therefrom is that Buddhism was flourishing in Magatha at that period. Hwen Thsang, who has visited and described those monuments, in or about 625, speaks of them in the highest terms. How long have lasted the prosperous days of Buddhism in those parts? It is difficult to state with any degree of accuracy. But it seems probable that it maintained itself in a satisfactory condition, until the beginning of the 10th century. It had then, to give way before the irresistible and triumphant ascendency of Brahminism.

To the south-east of the great temple is a small tank which is probably that of the Naga, who protected Budha, during one of the several stations that he made round the Bodi tree.

20. — Anawadat is the name of a lake famous in Buddhist sacred history. Its etymological meaning is, agreeably to some Savans, exempt of tumult, and according to others, not brightened. This last appellation is owing probably to the high peaks that surround it and prevent its being brightened by the rays of the sun. This is, certainly, the famous and extensive lake, which covers a portion of the high table land of Pamir. It has been visited and described by Lieut. Wood. What he states from a careful observation on the spot, agrees well with what is found in the itineraries of Chinese travellers. From that high plateau which embosoms the lake, flows in an eastern direction one of those small streams that form the river Ganges; whilst, in an opposite direction, the Oxus issuing from the western slope, shapes its course nearly towards the west.

21. — Udiana is a country the position of which is fixed on the banks of the Indus, between Cabul and Cashmere, west of the latter country. Gandara is, it appears, the country called Candahar by the Mussulmans, lying between the Swat and the Indus. The Burmese author mentions always Kashmira, along with Gandara. This would indicate that the two places are in the vicinity of each other, and that they formed primitively one and same state. Yauaka is, perhaps, the peninsula of Guzerat. But the writer entertains serious doubts on this subject. It might be the countries situated west of the Hindoo Kush, that is to say the ancient Bactriana. The Burmese author states that Yauaka was inhabited by a people called Pantays. What that people may have been? Is it an allusion to the Greeks that had settled in Bactriana? It is not without interest to hear our Chinese traveller stating that religion was flourishing in the above mentioned countries, whilst in the Punjab, he met with Religious with whom he declined holding intercourse, and of whom he speaks in rather unfavorable terms. Hence we may conclude that heretical opinions were then prevailing in that country, and that doctrines, at variance with those of Budha, had already cast a deep root, and in their growth, almost choked genuine Budhisim, if it had ever been the prevailing creed in the land of five rivers.

22.—On his way down the Ganges, our pilgrim does not appear to have left his boat for any considerable time; he contents himself with mentioning a fact that, to some, may appear somewhat doubtful, viz: the flourishing condition of the Budhist religion as far as the neighborhood of the present metropolis of India. He speaks of the kingdom of Champa. Campapuri, or Karnapura, was the capital of that state. It was situated on the site of the present Bhagulpore, or not far from it. Thence Fa Hian came to the state of Tamaralipiti. The town, which bore that name, is the modern Tumlook, on the right bank of the Hoogly, not far from Calcutta. It was at that port that he embarked on board of a ship bound to Ceylon. Tamaralipiti must have been a famous sea port several centuries before Fa Hian’s days. We are informed that Maheinda and his companions who were appointed to proceed to Ceylon, for preaching Budhism to the people of that island, embarked at the same place.
THE SEVEN WAYS TO NEIBBAN.

This is an abridgement of all the principles that constitute the system of Buddhism. In the Legend of Budha, the reader has become acquainted with the life of the founder of Buddhism, the establishment of his religion, and the promulgation of his chief doctrine. In the following pages, he will find compressed within narrow limits, the several observances to be attended to, in order to reach the goal of quiescence. As it is chiefly and principally by the help of meditation and contemplation that such a point can ever be attained, the reader must be prepared to wade up to his very chin, in the somewhat muddy waters of metaphysics, if he has a wish to penetrate into the very sanctuary of Buddhism.

To encourage the reader, and console him in the midst of his fatiguing journey through such dreary tracts, the writer will say to him that he has first borne up the fatigues of such a journey, and that, impelled by friendly feelings, he has endeavored to smooth the rugged path, in behalf of those that would follow him on the same errand. How far he has succeeded in his well meant efforts, he will not presume to state. But he will say so much, that if the success be commensurate with his exertions, he may entertain a well founded hope, that he will not be altogether disappointed in his hope and anticipation, and feel somewhat confident that he has afforded to the uninitiated, some help to go over the difficult ground of metaphysics.

Following in this instance, the line of conduct he has adopted through the foregoing pages of this book, the writer will allow the Buddhist author to speak for himself and explain his own views on the different subjects under consideration. His sole aim will ever be to convey as faithfully and as succinctly as possible, the meaning of the original he has under his eyes. The task, however, simple it may appear, is far from being an easy one, as the Burmese are utterly incapable of fully understanding the metaphysical portion of their religious system. Their ignorance is calculated to render even more obscure what is per se almost beyond the range of comprehension, because they must have frequently put an erroneous interpretation on many Pali words, the meaning of which is far from being accurately determined.

Our Buddhist Doctor begins his work with enumerating the advantages to be derived from a serious and constant application to the earnest study of these seven ways. Such an exercise, says he, has the virtue to free us from all evils; it expands the intelligence in the highest degree, and leads straight forward to Neibban. Man, through it, is delivered from all errors, is, happy and becomes, during his life, an honor to the holy religion of Buddha.

The various subjects, he intends to treat in this work, are arranged under seven heads, which are laid down in his own original way as follows: The observance of the precepts, and the practice of meditation are the twofold foundation of the spiritual edifice. The consideration of the nature and form of matter shall be the right foot of the sage; the investigation about the causes and principles of living beings, shall be as his left foot; the application of the mind to find out the four high roads to perfection, and the obtaining the freedom of all passions, shall be as his right and left hands; and the possession of the perfect science or knowledge shall be as his head. The happy man who shall have reached so far, will be certain to obtain the deliverance.

This summary is thus, by our guide, divided into seven distinct parts, which will be condensed into six articles.

It is as well to add that this work an abridged translation of which, is now set before the reader, was composed, at first, in the Siamese language at Bangkok, and has been subsequently translated into Burmese. We find, therefore, that all the principles exposed throughout, are received as genuine on the banks of the Irrawaddy as well as on those of the Meinam, and may be looked upon as a faithful exposition of the highest tenets of Buddhism, such as they are held in both countries. This observation confirms a notion which has been denied by many, viz., that the chief doctrines of Buddhism are pretty nearly the same in all the places where it has become the dominant creed. The discrepancies to be met here and there, relate principally to practices and observances which present to the eyes of the observer, an infinite variety of hues and forms. When Buddhism was established in several countries, it did not destroy many observances and practices that were found deeply engrained on the customs and manners of the people: it tolerated them, and made with them a tacit compromise. As, for instance, the worship of Nats existed among the tribes of the Irrawady valley, long before the introduction of Budhism. Most of the superstitious rites now prevailing in Burma originate from that belief. With the Chinese, the ancestors' worship continues to subsist side by side with Budhism; though the latter creed has nothing to do with it.

In Nepal and at Ceylon, Hindoo superstitions obtrude themselves on the view of the observer, to such an extent, that it is not easy to state which of the two creeds obtains the preference.

ARTICLE I.

OF THE PRECEPTS.

Our author in a truly philosophical spirit, at first puts to himself the three following questions: What is the origin of the law? What is man, the subject of the law? What is the individual who is the promulgator of the law? The three questions he answers in the following manner: 1st. All that exists, is divided into two distinct parts, the things which are liable to change, and obey the principle of mutability, such as matter, its modifications and all beings, which have a cause; and those which are

* The distinction alluded to, by our author, is the most important one. What does he mean when he states that all things in this world obey the principle of mutability, and are liable to perpetual changes and modifications, and that they have a cause? One would be tempted to believe that the Buddhists admit of a first cause. But such is not the case. To understand such a language coming from a Buddhist's mouth, we must bear in mind the theory of the twelve Nidanas or causes and effects. Each of the Nidanas is effect relatively to the preceding one, and cause to the following one. All the existing beings are, relatively to each other, effects and causes. All undergo the irresistible influence of mutability and change. The beings that reside in the seats of Brahma are not without the reach of that influence, not even those who dwell in the four immaterial seats.

Are there things which are fixedly and everlastingly the same, upon which no change no vicissitude can ever act? There is the Law, there is the state of Neibban. The law is the expression of truth which is reality, by opposition to the unreality of the visible world. The essence of the law is contained in the four sublime truths, which are emphatically called the Law of the Wheel. They are the declaration of the true state and condition of all beings; they proclaim the necessity of putting an end to such a miserable state of things, and point out the sure means of freeing oneself from the miseries attending existence. These truths are eternal, in so much that, what they proclaim has ever been true in all the worlds that have preceded the present one, since they always resembled each other, and will ever be equally true, during the endless series of worlds that will follow. In this sense the law, in the opinion of Buddhists, being the declaration of truth, or of what is, must be eternal, as truth itself is everlasting. The state of Neibban, by opposition to that of existence such as we comprehend it, is likewise a thing which never changes, since it is the end of changes. It remains always the same: it is the opposite of existence. What is then, called here everlasting, or eternal, is, in the opinion of Buddhists, but the things that are conceived as subsisting abstractively per se and never being affected by the great principle of mutability, that pervades all beings. To sum up the whole in a few words: the science which points out the means of coming out of the whirlpool of existences, and the being out of that circle, such are the two things which are always the same, never undergo any change, and are eternal.
eternal and immutable, that is to say, the precepts of the law and Neibban. These have neither author nor cause; they are self-existing, eternal, and placed far beyond the reach of the influence that causes mutability. 2nd. As to the publisher of the law, Budha, he is a mere man, who, during myriads of centuries has accumulated merits on merits, until he has obtained the Neibban of Kiletha, or the deliverance of all passions. From that moment, till his death, this eminent personage is constituted the master of religion and the doctor of the law. Owing to his perfect science, he finds out and discovers all the precepts that constitute the body of the law. Impelled by his matchless benevolence towards all beings, he promulgates them for the salvation of all. He is not the inventor of those precepts; he merely discovers them by the power of the supreme intelligence, in the same manner, as we perceive clearly during the night, by the help of a light, objects hitherto wrapped in utter darkness. 3rd. Man who is to be subjected to the observance of the law, is distinguished by the following characteristics. He possesses more knowledge than the animals and other beings, except the Nats and Brahmas; his intelligence and thoughts reach farther than those of other beings; he is capable of reflecting, comparing, drawing inferences, and observing freely the rules of life;* despite the

* In the definition of man which is given by the Budhist author, we find the words intelligence, capacity for reflecting, comparing and drawing inferences, &c. He who is not familiar with the revolting materialist doctrines of Budhiem, would be tempted to believe that they admit of a soul or spiritual principle subsisting in man. But such is not the case. The faculty for performing all the functions which we rightly attribute to the soul, resides in the sixth sense, called mano, or the heart, or the knowing principle. But this sense, in their opinion, is as material as the eye, the ear and the other senses. It is delightful to the Christian reader, to find in the midst of a heap of rubbish and fables, a few fragments of the primitive revelation. We see man coming from a noble origin, appearing in this world with the most glorious privileges, which he forfeits by eating the rice called Teale, which produced on his being, the same destructive effects, which the eating of the forbidden fruit caused on our first Parents in the garden of Eden.
allurement of his passions, he can free himself from the three great passions, concupiscence, anger and ignorance; finally, he is a descendant from those Brahmas, who in the beginning of this world, came from their seat, lived on earth, and by their eating the rice Tsole, lost all their glorious privileges and became beings similar to those who are known to us under the denomination of men.

The great end to be aimed at, in the observance of the precepts of the law, and the exercise of meditation, is the obtaining of a state of complete indifference to all things. (The state of indifference alluded to, does not consist in a stupid carelessness about the things of this world. It is the result of a knowledge acquired with much labor and pain. The wise man which has possessed himself of such science is no longer liable to the influence of that vulgar illusion which makes people to believe in the real existence of things that have no reality about them, but subsist only on an ephemeral basis which incessantly changes and finally vanishes away. He sees things as they truly are. He is full of contempt for things which are but, at best, a mere illusion. This contempt generates a complete indifference for all that exists, even for his own being. He longs for the moment, when it shall be given to him to cast away his own body, that he may no longer move within the circle of endless and miserable forms of existence. In this sense, must be understood the state of perfect quietism or indifference which is the last stage the wise man may reach by the help of the science he possesses. The Religious of the Brahminical creed have professed the same indifference for all the accidents of life.) Hence our Budha, when he became a perfected being, looked on the wicked Dewadat, with the same feelings as he did on the great Maia, his mother. Numberless Rathees or Anchorites have ever been eulogized for having allowed themselves to be devoured by ferocious beasts, or bit by venomous snakes, rather than offering the least resistance that could exhibit a sign of non-indifference. Entire was their uncon-cern towards their very body, which, they knew well, is as every thing else, a compound of the four elements, a mere illusion, totally distinct from self.

Five commandments constitute the very basis whereupon stand all morals, and are obligatory to all men without exception. They include five prohibitions. (It is not a little surprising that the five precepts obligatory to all men, are merely five prohibitions, designed not to teach men what they have to do, but warning them from not doing such things that are interdicted to them. This supposes that man is prone to do certain acts which are sinful. The Budhist law of the five precepts forbids him to yield to such propensities, but it does not teach him particular duties to perform. It does not elevate man above his original level, but it aims at preventing him from falling lower.) The five prohibitions are: not to destroy the life of any being; not to steal; not to commit adultery; not to tell lies; not to drink any intoxicating liquors or beverages.

Our author seems to be a perfect master in casuistry, as he shows the greatest nicety and exactness in explaining all the requisite conditions that constitute a trespassing of those precepts. We will give here but a few samples of his uncommon proficiency in this science. As regards the first prohibition, says he, five things are necessary to constitute an offence against the first commandment, viz., a being that has life, the intention and will of killing that being, an act which is capable of inflicting death, and the loss of life of that being, consequent to the inflicting of that act. Should but one of these conditions be wanting, the sin could not be said to have taken place, and, therefore, no complete trespassing of the first prohibition.

Again, as regards the second precept, five circumstances or conditions are necessary to constitute a trespassing, viz., an object belonging to another person, who never by words or signs, showed any intention to part with it; the knowing that the owner intends to keep possession of it; having the actual intention to take away secretly or forcibly that object; an effort to become possessed of the thing by deceiving, injuring, or by mal-practices, causing the owner or keeper of the thing to fall asleep; and finally to remove the thing from its place, however short may be the distance, should it be but that of the length of a hair of the head.

For the infraction of the third precept, the following conditions are required: the intention and will of sinning with any person of another sex, that comes within the denomination of Akamani-jathan, that is to say, persons it is forbidden to touch; acting up to that intention, and the consummating of such an act. Women that fall under the above denomination, are divided into twenty classes. The eight first classes include those that are under the guardianship of their parents or relatives; the ninth class comprises those affianced before they be of age; the tenth, those reserved for the king. Within the ten other classes come all those who, owing to their having been slaves, or for any other causes, have become the concubines to their masters, or married their seducers, &c.

The fourth prohibition extends not only to lies, but likewise to slander, coarse and abusive expressions, and vain and useless words. The four following conditions constitute a lie, viz., saying a thing that is untrue; the intention of saying such a thing; making manifest such an intention by saying the thing; and somebody that hears and clearly understands the thing that is uttered. That the sin of mediscance may be said to exist, it is required that the author of it, should speak with the intention of causing parties to hate each other, or quarrel with each other, and that the words spoken to that end, should be heard and understood by the parties alluded to.

The fifth precept forbids the drinking of Sura and Meria, that is to say, of distilled liquors, and of intoxicating juices extracted from fruits or flowers. The mere act of putting the liquor in the mouth, does not constitute a sin; the swallowing of it is required.

Besides these five general precepts, obligatory on all the faithful without exception, there are three other precepts, or rather counsels that are strongly recommended to the Upasakas or pious laymen. They are designed as barriers against the great propensity inherent in nature, which causes men to exceed in all that is used, through the senses of taste, hearing, seeing, smelling and feeling. They are so many means that help to obtain a sober moderation in the daily use of the things of the world.

The first counsel regulates all that regards eating. It forbids using any comestible from noon, to day break of the following morning. The second interdicts the assisting to plays, comedies, and the use of flowers and essences with the intention of fondly handling and smelling them. The third prescribes the form and size of beds, which ought never to be more than one cubit high, plain without ornaments. The use of mattrasses and pillows, filled with cotton, or other soft substances, is positively prohibited. The very intention of laying upon these enervating superfluities, and a fortuori the reclining on them, constitutes the breaking of such a command.

These three latter precepts are to be observed chiefly in the following days, on the 5th, 8th, 14th and 15th of the waxing moon, and on the 5th, 8th and 14th of the waning moon, as well as on the new moon. The pious Upasakas sometimes observe them during the three consecutive months of the season of lent.

In the opinion of our author, are deserving the respectable title of Upasakas, men and women, who have the greatest respect for, and entertain a pious affection towards, the three precious things, Budha, the Law, and the Assembly of the perfect. They must ever view them as the land of salvation, and the securest asylums. They must be ready to sacrifice every thing, their very life, for the sake of these three perfect things. During their lifetime, under all circumstances they must aim at following scrupulously the instructions of Budha, such as they are embodied in the law and preached by the Rahans.

Five offences disqualify a man for the honorable title of Upasaka, viz: the want of belief and confidence in the three precious things, the non-observance of the eight precepts, the believing in lucky and unlucky days,* or in good and bad fortune, the belief in omens and signs, and keeping company with the impious who have no faith in Budha.

We now come to the rules which are prescribed to all the Budhist Religious. They are 227 in number, and are found in a book called Patimauk. This book is the Vade Mecum of all Religious. They study it, and often learn it by heart. On certain days of each month, the Religious assemble in the Thein. The Patimauk is then read, explained and commented upon, by one of the elders of the fraternity. It is an abridgement of the Wini, the great book of discipline. It teaches the various rules respecting the four articles offered by the faithful to the Religious, that is to say, vestments, food, mats and the ingredients for mastication. These rules

* Budhists lay the greatest stress, on the belief in the three precious things. It is the foundation on which rests the whole spiritual edifice. But it is somewhat extraordinary to see that the superstition in believing in lucky and unlucky days, in good and bad luck, is openly condemned, and entails upon him who is addicted to it, the severest penalty. Though such childish belief is so exceedingly common in Burmah, that it influences men in his daily and hourly affairs, yet we must admit that it is opposed to the tenets of strict Budhism. There can never be any good or bad luck in the opinion of him who has faith in the influence of merits and demerits. There is no other agent in this world, but that one: it is he alone, who brings in and regulates all the accidents that attend the life of man. Such is, indeed, the theory of the true Budhist. But how widely differ the practice from the theory? He who has lived for some time in a Budhist country, and made himself acquainted with the intimate habits of the people, will soon discover that superstitious ideas, and, as a necessary consequence, superstitious practices, are the spring and prime mover of all actions, from morning to night. In this respect, Budhist monks differ not from the laity, nay, they are often seen as the leaders of the people, in the performance of rites at variance with the tenets of their creed.
likewise regulate all that relates to the mode of making prayers, devotions, walking, sitting, reclining, travelling, and c., and c. Every thing is described with a minute particularity.

Here, if any interest could be awakened, would be the place to enter into the system of casuistry, carried by Buddhist Religious to a point of nicety and refinement truly astonishing. Suffice it to state that they have gone over the boundless field of speculative conjectures, respecting all the possible ways of fulfilling or trespassing the precepts and regulations that concern the body of Religious.

Every law and precept must have a sanction. This essential requisite is not wanting in the Buddhist system. Let us examine in what consists the reward attending a regular and correct observance of the precepts, and what is the punishment inflicted on the transgressors of these ordinances. As usual we will follow our author and allow him to make known his own opinions on this important subject. It is often inquired from us, says he, why some individuals live here during many years, whilst others appear, but for a short time, on the scene of this world. The reason of the difference in the respective condition of these persons, is obvious and evident. The first, during their former existence, have faithfully observed the first command and refrained from killing beings; hence their long life; the second on the contrary have been guilty of some trespassings of this precept, and therefore, the influence of their former crimes causes the shortness of their life. In a similar manner we account for all the differences that exist in the conditions of all beings. The observance or trespassing of one or several precepts, creates the positions of happiness and unhappiness, of riches and poverty, of beauty and ugliness, that chequer the lives and positions of mortals in this world.

In addition to the rewards bestowed immediately in this world, there are the six seats of Nats, where all sorts of recompenses are allotted during immense periods, to those who have correctly attended to the ordinances of the law. There are likewise places of punishment in the several hells, reserved to the transgressors of the precepts. The conditions of animal, Athoorikes and Preittas, are other states of punishment.

A lengthened account of all that relates to the blissful regions of Nats, and the gloomy abodes of hell, is found in one of the great Dzats, or accounts of the former existences of Gaudama, given by himself to his disciples, when he was a Prince under the name of Nemi. The writer has read and partly translated this work, which delightfully reminded him of the fine episodes on similar subjects he had read in the sixth book of the Enéid. The wildest, most fertile and inventive imagination seems to have exhausted its descriptive powers on the one hand, in multiplying the pleasures enjoyed in the seats of Nats, and beautifying and adorning those delightful regions; and on the other, in representing with a dark and bloody pencil, the frightful picture of the numberless and horrid torments of the regions of desolation, despair, and agony.

All that is so abundantly related of the fortunate abodes of Nats, in their sacred writings, supply the Buddhists with agreeable and inexhaustible topics of sermons which they deliver to their hearers, to excite them more effectually to bestow on them abundant alms. The credulous hearers are always told that the most conspicuous places in those regions, are allotted to those who have distinguished themselves by their great liber- alities. We think it idle and superfluous, uninteresting and fatiguing, to repeat those fabulous accounts of the seats of Nats and abodes of hell, as given at great length by Buddhists authors. The only particulars deserving to be attended to are these: the reward is always proportionate to the sum of merits; and punishment, to that of demerit. There is no eternity of reward nor of punishment.*

* This is a consequence of the axiom established by our author, viz., that the principle of mutability pervades all the beings which reside in the 31 seats allotted to them. It cannot be supposed for a
This first article shall be concluded by an important remark bearing upon the system under consideration. The seats of happiness, as already mentioned, are divided into two great classes, the one including the superior, and the other, the inferior seats. The latter are the six seats of Nats, and are tenanted by beings as yet under the influence of concupiscence and other passions. Those who observe the five general precepts have placed, and, as it were, established themselves, on the basis whereupon stands perfection, but not yet in perfection itself; they have just crossed the threshold thereof. They are as yet imperfect; but they have prepared themselves for entering the way that leads towards perfection, that is to say, moment, according to Buddhists, that a being, whatever may be the amount of his merits and demerits, can ever be placed without the pale of the influence of his good or bad deeds. It accompanies him in all positions, and causes the vicissitudes that attend his existence. It works upon him in hell, as well as on earth, and in the seats of Nats and Brahmas. Fixity is to be found nowhere except in the going out of the circle of existences, that is to say, in Neibban. When we speak of existence, in a Budhistic sense, we mean a state of being, in any conceivable form or situation or place. Fixity in the enjoyment of reward, or in the undergoing of punishment is a contradiction with the first principle of Budhism. The awarer of reward or punishment is the above named influence, which proceeds from the actions performed, and, in its turn, allots good or evil in exact proportion with the cause that has created it.

Gaudama having willfully and unwillfully ignored a first cause, from which all the things that exist, draw their being and life, has been forced to allow to an imaginary agent, the very same attributes which belong exclusively to the supreme Being. On the rock of Atheism, he has made a sad ship wreck. Apart of this capital error, it is surprising to see him maintaining with an admirable acuteness, the existence of many fundamental truths, such as for instance, the reward for good actions, and the punishment for bad ones. With him, the doing of evil is ever attended with consequences fatal to the perpetrator, whilst the performance of good is always accompanied with beneficial results. One would be inclined to believe that Gaudama has appropriated to himself, with a great tact, all the truths emanating from the belief in a supreme Being; and whilst he has, with a barefaced and impious audacity, denied to the eternal author of all things, the very existence, he has been placed under the necessity of accounting, in a most unlogical manner, for the existence of this world.
meditation, or the science of Dzan. The very reward enjoyed, in those seats is, therefore, as yet, an imperfection. The superior seats can only be reached by those who apply themselves to mental exercises. These exercises are the real foundation of the lofty structure of perfection, and the high road to it.

ARTICLE II.

OF MEDITATION AND ITS VARIOUS DEGREES.

This and the following articles contain subjects of so abstruse and refined a nature, that it would require to be possessed of the science of a Budha, in order to come to a right understanding of such obscure topics. The difficulties, arising from this study, are owing to the confused and very unsatisfactory ideas of the Buddhist philosophers respecting the soul and its spirituality, and perhaps to the inability of the writer to understand the vague and undefined terms employed for conveying their ideas on these matters. The field of Buddhist metaphysics is to a European, in a great measure, a new one; the meaning of the terms is half understood by the Burmese translators; definitions of terms do not convey explanations such as we anticipate, and ideas seem to run in a new channel; they assume, if we may say so, strange forms: divisions and subdivisions of the various topics have no resemblance with what a European is used to in the study of philosophy. The student feels himself ushered in a new region; he is doomed to find his way by groping. Finally the false position assumed by the Indian philosophers and the false conclusions they arrive at, contribute to render more complicated the task of elucidating this portion of the Buddhist system. That the difficulties may be somewhat lessened, and the pathway rendered less rugged, and a little smooth, the writer proposes to avoid as much, as it is in his power, overcharging with Pali terms, the explanations he is about to afford, under the guidance of the Buddhist author.
In the preceding article, we have treated of meritorious actions that are purely exterior, and briefly alluded to the nature of the rewards bestowed on earth and in the six seats of Nats, to those who have performed these good actions. Now we leave behind all the exterior good deeds, and turn the attention of our mind to something more excellent, to those acts that are purely interior, and are performed solely by the soul and the right exercise of its faculties, that is to say, by meditation and contemplation.

The root of all human miseries, is ignorance. It is the generating principle of concupiscence and other passions. It is the dark but lofty barrier that encircles all beings and retains them within the vortex of endless existences; it is the cause of all existences, and of all those illusions to which beings are miserably subjected; it causes those continual changes which take place in the production of all beings. This great cause once found and proclaimed by Budha, it was necessary to procure a remedy to counteract the action of ignorance, and successfully oppose its progress. Another antagonistic and opposite principle was to be found, able to resist the baneful agency of ignorance and stem its sad and misfortune-creating influence. That principle is science or knowledge. Ignorance is but a negative agent; it is only the absence of science. Let knowledge be, and ignorance shall vanish away in the same manner as darkness is noiselessly but irresistibly dissipated by the presence of light.

All beings in this universe, says our author, are doomed to be born and die. We quit this place to go and live in another; we die here to be born elsewhere. We can never be freed from pain, old age and death. Whether we like it or not, we must suffer and always suffer. But why is it so? Because we do not possess the perfect science. Were we blessed with it, we would infallibly look towards Neibban, and then escaping from the pursuit of pain and miseries, we would infallibly obtain the deliverance from those evils, which now incessantly press upon us. It rests with us, but to perfect our intelligence, so that we might gradually attain to the perfect science, the source of all good. But by what means is so desirable an end to be obtained? By the exercise of meditation, answers, with a decided tone, our philosopher. This word implies, besides, other intellectual operations of a superior order, such as contemplation, visions, ecstasy, union, &c., which are the more or less complete results of that intellectual exercise.

The act of meditating can take place but in the heart, where resides the mano, or the faculty of knowing. Its object can never be but the nam-damma, literally the name of the thing, or in other terms, the things of a purely intellectual nature. But it can by no means happen in the seats of the other senses or organs, such as the eyes, the ears, &c., &c., which are only channels to communicate impressions to the faculty of mano.

The constitutive parts of meditation are five in number: Witteka, the action of raising the mind to an object; Witzara, the attentive consideration of that object; Piti, the bringing of the soul and body to a state of satisfaction; Sukha, the pleasure enjoyed in the thing considered; Ekatta, the perseverance or stability of the mind in that object. There is also Upeska, which implies a greater and more intense degree of fixity of the mind, extending not only to one object in particular, but to all things.

It may be called the absolute quietism of the soul, and the general result of a complete course of general meditation on the universality of things. It is the last and highest point that can ever be reached.

To explain more fully the nature and definitions of the two first parts, our philosopher has recourse to the following comparison. Let us suppose a man that has to cleanse a rusty copper vessel. With one hand he grasps the vessel, and with the other he rubs it up and down, right and left. This is exactly what is done by the means of Witteka and Witzara. The first gets hold of the object of meditation, and the second causes the mind to pass and repass over it, until it has perfectly seen it in all its particulars.

The third stage in the exercise of meditation, is that of Piti, which consists in a sort of transitory delectation, experienced by him who has reached that third step of mental labor. It produces on the whole frame the following effects: It seems to him that is engaged in that exercise, that the hairs of his head stand on an end, so strong is the sensation he then feels; at other times, it produces in the soul sensations similar to that of the lightning that rends the atmosphere: sometimes it is is a commotion resembling that of mighty waves breaking on the shore; at other times, the subject is, as it were, carried through the air, or only raised above the ground; and occasionally it causes a chill running throughout all the limbs. When these results have been, through persevering efforts, repeatedly experienced with an ever increasing degree of intensity, the following effects are attained: the body and the soul are completely restrained subdued and composed; they are almost beyond the influence of concupiscence; both acquire a remarkable lightness, so that the exercise of meditation offers no further trouble nor labor; the natural repugnance or opposition to self recollection is done away with; then the exercise of meditation becomes pleasing from the pleasurable state of the soul and body, and finally both parts are in a true and genuine condition: so that what there was previously in them, either vicious or opposed to truth, disappears at once and vanishes away. Such are the various effects experienced by the soul that has reached the degree of Piti, or mental delectation.

When the soul and body have thus been perfectly subdued, and freed from all that could wrongly affect them, the soul then reaches the state of Suka, that is to say, of perfect and permanent pleasure and inward delight. The effects or results thereof are called Samati, or peace or quiescence of the soul. As a matter of course, that state of inward peace has several degrees both as regards the time it lasts and the intensity of the affection. It lasts sometimes for a moment, or for a period of uncertain duration, as it happens when we reflect on some subject, or we listen to a sermon. At other times, its duration is longer, when, for instance, we are about entering into contemplation or ecstasy, and it lasts as long as we are in one of the these states.

From Piti originates the Samati-tseit, the idea or consciousness of inward quiescence. It is the secondary cause of the real joy and delight, and is followed by an unshaken resolution of adhering to all the precepts of the law. It produces in the soul a certain freshness, expansion, and ravishment in the practice of virtue. Such a state is illustrated by the following comparison. A traveller has to go over a very difficult road; he is exposed to an intense heat, and tormented with a burning thirst. Let us imagine the intensity of his delight, when he finds himself on the brink of a rivulet of clear, and cool water; such is precisely the state of the soul under the influence of Piti. The state of Suka follows it very soon. It is exemplified by the condition of the traveller, who has been perfectly refreshed and relieved from thirst and fatigue, and enjoys the delightful and pleasurable effects resulting therefrom.

The last state or the crowning point to be arrived at, by the means of meditation, is that of Upakka, or perfect fixity, whence originates an entire indifference to love, or hatred, pleasure or pain. Passions can no more affect the soul in that happy condition. But in this as well in the preceding states, there are several degrees, according to the various objects it refers to. In the upakka, relating to the five senses, man is no more affected by beautiful or unseemly objects, by harsh or melodious sounds, &c. As to what refers to creatures, man has neither love nor dislike for them. Man obtains the state of Upakka, relating to science or knowledge, by examining and considering all things through the medium of the three great principles \textit{aneitsa, duka, anatta}, that is to say, change, pain and illusion. There is also the \textit{u\textbf{\textit{irya upekka}}, as when a man, after great struggles and efforts to obtain a certain object, sees that he cannot reach it he becomes indifferent to it, and without trouble or the least disquiet, gives up the undertaking. There are many other effects of the Upekka mentioned by our author, the enumeration of which would prove tedious. What has been just stated is sufficient to afford a correct idea of the nature of the highest state of meditation that human mind can ever reach. The last and most transcendent result of the condition of Upekka, is this: when an individual, by successful exertions has ascended to the top of the spiritual ladder, there is a certain virtue that attracts every thing to him. He becomes a centre to which all appear to converge. He is like the central point of our planet, that ever remains distinct from the bodies it incessantly draws to itself. Seated in the centre of the most complete quietism, the Sage contemplates, without the least effort, the unclouded truth that indefinitely unfolds itself before him. Hence, as our author observes, the sage that has reached the state of Upekka, has no more to pass successively through the four preceding stages, to be enabled to meditate; that is to say, he does no more require the help of thought, reflection, satisfaction and pleasure. He is in the middle of the cloudless atmosphere of truth which he enjoys, and therein remains as unmoved as truth itself.

As stated in the previous article, the observance of the precepts or the performance of exterior good actions, draws abundant rewards over those who faithfully comply with them. These rewards are bestowed either in the seat of man, or in the six abodes of Nats, which we will agree to call the six inferior heavens, where concupiscence as yet holds its empire.

The inward good deeds produced by the operation of the intellectual faculties of the soul, being of an incomparably greater value than the external ones, the recompense of the former is of a higher order than that of the latter. Hence there are twenty superior heavens reserved to the sages that have made progress in meditation. The accounts of the Buddhists respecting the extent of these seats, their respective distance, in following the perpendicular, the myriads of centuries to stay in each of them,

* It is perhaps of some interest to a few readers to have mentioned the names of the thirty one seats, into which Buddhists have located all beings. Let us begin with the lowest step of that immense ladder. The four first steps are the four states of punishment. In them are to be found living the unfortunate beings, who pursued by the inflexible law of their demerits, are doomed to atone in different ways, for the evil that they have done. The lowest seat is Nga-yai or hell. It is placed in the centre of our planet, and subdivided into eight principal quarters. The last of which is called Awidi. The second step of the ladder is occupied by the seat of Animals; the third by certain monsters called Preita; and the fourth by another kind of inferior beings named Athourika. These four seats are tenanted by beings who undergo punishment for the evil deeds they have performed.

The fifth seat is that of Manusa, or men. The beings that occupy it, are in a state in which they can merit or demerit. It may be called a position of probation.

Above the seat of man, are the six seats of Nats called Tsadoomaritza, Tawadeintha, Yama, Too-rita, Ninumarati, Pare-neimmittawasawati. The denizens of these seats enjoy the reward awarded to them for the performance of good and meritorious exterior works.

The three places above those of Nats, called Brahma-parisitsa, Brahmanh-paran-hita, Mah-Brahma, are occupied by the contemplatives who have reached the first step of Dzan, or meditation. The three following; Pareitta-ba, Appa-ma-naba, Appa-sara, are tenanted by the Beings who have attained the second degree of contemplation. The three next to those just enumerated, are: Paweiitta-sou-ba, Appa-manasou-ba, Souba-kannaka. They are the abodes of the contemplatives who have ascended to the third step of meditation. The two following steps of the ladder, Wa-happala, A-sou-gna-sat, are tenanted by the contemplatives of the fourth degree; and the five that follow, viz., Awiha, Atabpa, Sou-dasa, Sou-dasi, Agga-nita, are occupied by the contemplatives of the fifth degree, that is to say, by the beings who have entered the Thoda, or current of perfection, and who have qualified themselves for obtaining the state of deliverance, or Neibban.

Above those seats, we find the four and last abodes of Arupa, without form. They are called: Akasa-nitza-yatana, Wigniana-witza-yatana, Akeitsignia-yatana, Newa-thagnia-nathagna-yatana.
&c., are so many puerilities not worth attending to, and in no way belonging to the old and genuine Buddhism. They are the inventions, in subsequent ages, of individuals, who wished to emulate their neighbours and rivals, the Hindoos, at a time when the latter substituted the gross and revolting idolatry of the Puranas, to the purer doctrines of the Vedas. But what comes directly to our purpose is the distinction of these twenty seats into two classes. The first comprises sixteen seats, under the designation of Rupa or matter; the second includes four seats, called Auppa, or immaterial abodes or conditions. Here are located, as on grand and immense scale, according to their respective proficiency in science and meditation, the beings that have striven to advance in knowledge, by the exertions of the mental faculties. The general appellation given to each class, bears a great meaning, and therefore, deserves explanation. In the 16 seats of Rupa, are placed the contemplatives who have as yet a body, and have not been hitherto able, to disengage themselves from some affection to matter. The subjects of their meditations, are still the beings inhabiting this material world, together with some of the Kathain, or coarser portion of their being. But in the four seats called Arupa, which terminate the series of Budhists heavens, the contemplatives are destitute of shape and body; they are almost brought to the condition of pure spirits. In their sublime and lofty flight in the regions of spiritualism, they seem to have bid a last farewell to this world, and to be no longer concerned with material things.

Let us glance rapidly over these various seats, and pay a visit to the beings that have been rewarded with a place in them, owing to their great proficiency in the mental exercise of meditation. We will begin with the lowest seat, and from it, successively ascend to the loftiest. We must bear in remembrance that there are, as above stated, five degrees of meditation or five parts, viz., perception, reflection, satisfaction, happiness and fixity. He who has been much exercised in the first degree, shall inhabit one of the three first seats of Rupa. Those who, leaving aside the first degree, shall delight in the second and third, shall inhabit, according to their respective progress, one of the three following seats. Those who take delight but in the fourth degree, having no further aid of the three first parts, perception, consideration and satisfaction, shall be located in the 7th, 8th and 9th seats.

When the fifth degree of Dzen, or meditation, has been attained, that is to say, when a privileged contemplative is able to meditate and contemplate, without having recourse to the representation and consideration of the object, without allowing oneself to be influenced by pleasures or joy, then he has attained to the state of fixity and indifference; he occupies the 10th and 11th seats. The five remaining seats bear the collective name of Thoodawata, or abodes of the pure or perfect, that is to say, the dwelling place of those who have entered into the current of perfection. They are inhabited by the Kaliana Putadzans, and the four sorts of contemplatives called Thautapan, Thakadagan, Anagan and Rahandas. The latter have entered into the Thoda, or current of perfection. The Thautapan and Thakadagans are pure and exempt from all influence of demerits; the Anagans are delivered from the five concupiscences. The Rahandas are enjoying a perfect indifference for all. They are strangers to such a language as this: I am great, I am greater, I am greatest. Such terms of comparison are but mere illusions; they are deceitful sounds that confuse, distract and bewilder the ignorant.

Above the Thoodawata seats, are the four, called Aruppa, or immaterial. The denizens of these places have, at first, recognized that the miseries attending man, in this world, have their origin in the body. They then conceive the utmost disgust and horror for it; they long for the dissolution of this agent to all wickedness. So great is their horror for bodies and matter, that they no longer select them for subjects of meditation; they endeavor to cross beyond the limits of materiality, and launch forth very limited sketch of this part of the work under consideration, the attention of the reader shall be directed on man as the most interesting of all beings. With our Buddhist author, therefore, he will take human beings as the subject of his investigations. Provided with the philosophical dissecting knife, he will anatomise all the component parts of that extraordinary being, whose nature has ever presented an insolvable problem to ancient sages. What shall be said on this subject, will be sufficient to convey a correct idea of the mode of reasoning and arguing followed by Buddhist philosophers, when they analyze other beings and select them for the subjects of their meditations.

At the very beginning, our author proclaims this great maxim—all beings living in the three worlds, heaven, earth and hell, have in themselves but two things, or attributes: Rupa and Nam, form and name. Accustomed as we are to a language that expresses clear and distinct notions: we would like to hear him say, in nature there are but two things, matter and spirit. But such is not the language of Buddhists, and I apprehend that were we giving up their somewhat extraordinary, and to us, unusual way of expressing their ideas, we could not come to a correct knowledge of the notions they entertain respecting the nature of man. Let us allow our author to speak for himself, and, as much as possible, express himself in his own way. By rupa, we understand form and matter, that is to say, all that is liable per se to be destroyed by the agency of secondary causes. Nam, or nama is the thing, the nature of which is known to the mind, by the instrumentality of mano, or the knowing principle. In the five aggregates constituting man, viz: materiality or form, the organs of sensation, of perception, of consciousness, and those of intellect, there is nothing else to be found but form and name. We are at once brought to this materialist conclusion, that in man we can discover no other element but that of form and that of name.
To convey a sort of explanation of this subject, our author gives here a few notions respecting the six senses. I say six senses, because with him, besides the five ordinary senses, he mentions the mano, or the knowing principle that resides in the heart, as one of the senses. The organs or faculties of seeing, hearing, feeling, tasting, smelling and knowing, he calls them the inward senses. These same organs, as they come in contact with exterior objects, are called exterior senses. The faculty inherent in each of the senses whereby is operated the action between the organ and its object, is designated by the appellation of the life of the senses, as, for instance, the eye seeing, the ear hearing, &c. In this treble mode of considering the senses, what do we meet with, but form and name, ideas and matter? Supposing the organ of seeing to exist, and an object to be seen, there will necessarily result, as an essential consequence, the perception or idea of such a thing. Even as regards the mano, where there exists the heart, on one side, and truth on the other, there will follow immediately the idea or perception of truth.

This materialist doctrine, if the meaning of our author be accurately understood, is further confirmed by the method he proposes for carrying on the investigation respecting the nature of things. He who desires to penetrate deep in such a sublime science, must have recourse to the help of meditation. Having selected an object, he considers it by the means of witekka. He passes successively through the ideas and impressions he derives from the contemplation of such an object. He then says to himself: the ideas obtained by the means of witekka, or the first degree of dzan or meditation, are nothing but nam-damma, since their nature is to offer themselves to the arom, as the thought to its object. But where is the seat of that arom? It resides in the substance of the heart, which in reality affords asylum both to it and to the nam-damma. It is no where else to be found. But what is the heart? Whence does it come?
By what is it formed? To these three questions we answer that the heart is composed of the four elements. It is but one and the same thing with them. This startling doctrine is explicit and excludes, at once, the idea of a spiritual substance.

Our author has now reached the elements or the parts constituting all that exists with a form. He boldly asserts that all that has an existence, is but an aggregate of earth, water, fire and air; all the forms are but modifications and combinations of the four elements. The bare enumeration of this general principle, is not sufficient to satisfy our philosopher. He wishes to know and explain the reason of every thing. Here begins an analysis entirely unknown to our chemists and philosophers of the West. The body is divided into thirty-two parts, which are often enumerated in formulas of prayer, by pious Buddhists. Each of these thirty-two parts is subdivided into forty-four. The hair, how slender soever it appears, is submitted to that minute analysis. The result of this subtle division is to show what is the proportion of each element that enters in the formation of these anatomical parts. We have not the patience to write down these uninteresting details, nor do we believe that the reader will be displeased, if we spare him the trouble of going over such worthless nomenclature. There is another division of matter, or body, into forty-two parts, called achen. This is based upon the distinction of the four elements that enter unequally in the formation of the body: 20 parts belong to the earth; 12, to water; 6, to fire; and 6, to wind. Then again the body is divided into 60 parts: the division is based upon the distinction of the ten constitutive parts belonging to each of the senses, as it will be hereafter explained. The object Buddhist philosophers have in view in entering into so many divisions and subdivisions of the forms of the body, is to prove, in their opinion, to demonstration, that, by the nicest analysis of every part of the body, we find, at the end, nothing but the primary elements that are called the supports of all that exist.
We have now to follow our author through a path more difficult than the preceding one and hear him explain the theory of the ideas and their various modifications. These, says he, are known, not by their forms, since they have none, but only by their name. Through the practice of reflection and meditation, we become acquainted with them. We call them arupa dhamma, things without a form or shape. They are designated under the name of tseit and tsedathit,* that is to say, ideas and the

1.—The tseits or ideas of the beings as yet under the influence of passion; they are named Kama-watsara-tseits.

2.—The tseits or ideas peculiar to beings who have not as yet been able to raise themselves entirely above materiality; they are called Rupa-watzara-tseits.

3.—There are four tseits peculiar to those beings who sitting aside the coarser portions of this world, launch forth in abstructive truth, and delight in the contemplation of the highest, purest and boundless things the mind may imagine. They are known as the ideas working on what may be called immaterial, impalpable objects.

The ideas of the first series belong to all the beings located in the 4 states of punishment, in the seat of man, and in the six seats of Nats, that is to say, in the 11 seats where is the reign of passions.

Those of the second series belong to the beings located in the 16 seats of the Brahmas, including those who have entered into the current of perfection, by following the four Meggas, and enjoying the merits and rewards connected with the condition of the perfect.

The ideas of the third series are the happy lot of those superior beings who soar high in the regions of pure spiritualism, leaving below them, all the things that have a reference to this world, such as we see it.

The Tsedathits or results essentially connected with ideas are fifty two in number. The seven enumerated at the end of this article are: contact, sensation, perception, inclination, fixity, command over self, and remembrance: they are inherent in all ideas. Six Tsedathits are connected with the act of perception, viz., thought, reflection, decision, energy, pleasure and liberty. Fourteen others are connected with the ideas of demerits, viz., impudence, audacity in evil, unsteadiness, concupiscence, pride, boasting, grievous offence, envy, anxiety, want of respect, lowness of feelings, doubt or indecision, covetousness.

The Tsedathits connected with merits are: affection for all that refers to religion, remembrance of all that is good, shame of all that is bad, fear of evil, exemption from concupiscence and from anger, sereresult of ideas. Where are to be met these ideas? Where have they their seat? In the six senses, and no where else, is the answer. Having already become acquainted with the organs of senses, it will be easy to find out the ideas that are as the tennants of the senses.

All the tseits inhabiting the organs of senses are called loki tseit, that is to say, ideas of the world, because they are to be met with in all the beings as yet subjected to concupiscence. They are distinct from lokoudra tseits, which belong properly to the beings free from passions, and who have entered in the four megga or ways to perfection. The tseits of this world are eighty-one in number, classified as follows: the perception of each of the five organs, and the perception of the respective faculties of those organs. This gives ten tseits. There are three for the sense of the heart, the perception of the substance of the heart, of its faculty of knowing, and of the object of its knowledge.

Each of the six senses has ten constitutive forms or parts, viz: earth, water, fire, air, color, odor, taste, fluid, life, and the body attached primitively thereto. Now there is an action from each of these forms upon the subject. Thence ten tseits to each of the six senses.

There is no word so ill defined and so ill understood by our philosopher, as the two words Tseit and Tsedathit. The first in a moral sense means idea, thought, perception, &c.; in a physical sense, it means that secondary cause created by kan producing the living being, the senses wherein reside the moral tseit. Tsedathit being the result of ideas, must, of course, have likewise two meanings. In the first place it will designate the impressions made upon us by ideas; in the second, it will mean

nity of soul, freedom of evil inclinations and of evil thoughts, swiftness of the body, and of the mind, good habits of the body and of the soul, uprightness in the feelings, in the thoughts, good words, good actions, good behavior, compassion, joy at the prosperity of others, wisdom, or the acquirement of the knowledge of truth by reflection.
the secondary cause or life in the body, or the modifications of the principles of corporeal life.

This being premised, we may a little understand our author when he says: There are seven tsedathits existing at the same time as the 81 above mentioned tseits, viz: pasa tsedathit, so called because it is the real effect of the tsedathit to attain its object, and, as it were, to touch it. We may call it the agreement between the idea and its object. Wedana tsedathit, the feeling of the impression of an idea. Thagnia tsedathit, the comprehension of the object. Dzetana tsedathit, the inclination for the object. Eketa tsedathit, the fixity on the object. Dziwi-teindre tsedathit, the observance of what relates to form and name; and Mana sikaramana tsedathit, consciousness. It is evident, therefore, that the tsedathit is neither the idea, nor the object of the idea, but it is the result from the idea that has come in contact with an object. These seven results are, if we may say so, the third part of the idea. They do not give occasion to modifications of ideas. But those who really give rise to the greatest variety of results, are the akuso tsedathit, or the results of evil thoughts and ideas, and their opposite, or kuso tsedathit, or the consequence of good and virtuous thoughts. The mentioning here of all the kuso and akuso tsedathit, would be but a dry exposition of the nomenclature of the vices, and virtues, such as it is met with, in the catalogue of Buddhist moralists. They are all enumerated in the proceeding note.

ARTICLE IV.

OF THE CAUSE OF THE FORM* AND OF THE NAME, OR OF MATTER AND SPIRIT.

The duty of our intelligence is to investigate the cause of all the modifications of forms and names. This being effected, we are delivered from all doubts and disquietude. When we perceive such a form, such an idea, &c.,

* Having in two previous notes, explained what regards the ideas, and the results from, or the things connected with, ideas, we must we are able forthwith to account for their respective causes. In this study we must copy the conduct of the

come to the third great principle, viz., Rupa or Form, or Matter, and show out the curious divisions of our Burmese metaphysicians. 1—
The form of all that is visible is found in the four elements: earth, water, fire and air. 2—The form for coming in contact, are the five senses, the eyes, the ear, the nose, the tongue and the body, or rather the skin of the body. 3—The form of the objects of the senses is likewise divided into five parts, essentially connected with the five above enumerated senses. 4—The forms peculiar to the living beings are the male and female sexes. 5—The forms of life taken abstractedly, are the life of the body, and the life of language or uttered words. 6—The forms in which appearance exhibits itself, are swiftness, softness, and acting, 7—The forms of the signs of being are: the appearance of being, or coming into being, the remaining into being, the fulness of the state of being, and the destruction of being.

The last great principle is Neibban, that is to say: the exemption from the action of the influence originating from merits and demerits, from the volitions of the mind, from the seasons or time and from nourishment, which are the causes of mutability: it is the end of existence.

As regards the state of man and that of other rational beings, there are several notions which are arranged in a curious manner, under several heads, which it is thought necessary to notice as briefly as possible. 1—The five Khandas, or supports of man's being: materiality, sensation, perception, mutability, and intellect or thought. 2—The inward five Ayatana, or seats of the sense of seeing, of hearing, of smelling, of tasting and of feeling. 3—The outward five Ayatana, or seats of what is perceived by the senses, viz: appearance or form, sound, odor, taste, tangibility and idea. 4—The ten Dat, or constitutive parts of the five senses, and of the five results of the perception of the five senses, as above enumerated. 5—The four Thista, or truths: the truth of the miseries attending existence; the truth of concumescence or passions, the cause of all miseries; the truth of the Neibban of passions, or the destruction of passions, the summit of which is Neibban, the truth of the Megga or Ways to Neibban. 6—The twenty-two Indray, or dispositions or capacities for acting, viz: the capacity of seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, feeling, of uniting one sex with the other, of thinking, of enjoying peace, of bearing pain, of yielding to anger, of enjoying pleasure, of remaining indifferent, of using exertions, of being attentive, of adhering to ture doctrine, of putting on sentiments of benevolence, of searching after wisdom, of using meekness, of entering the four ways of perfection, and of enjoying the happiness resulting from following those ways. 7—The nine Phola or rewards resulting from walking into the path of perfection are: intensity of benevolence, of diligence, of attenphysician, who, when attending a patient, sits by his bedside, closely examines the nature of the distemper and the causes that have given rise to it, in order to find out counteracting agents or remedies to check its progress at first, and gradually to uproot it from the constitution. In the moral order, the philosopher, too, has to examine the nature of all moral distempers, ascertain the principles or causes they spring from, and thereby become qualified to cure those disorders.

The beings that inhabit the three worlds, says our author, must have a cause. To say that they exist of themselves and without a cause, is an absurdity. The very dissimilarity we observe among them, indicates that their mode of existence results from certain causes. We, however, cannot agree with our antagonists, the Brahmans, who maintain that Maha Brahma is the cause of all that exists. This being is not out of the circle of Rupa and Nam; he is himself a compound of Nam and Rupa, that is to say, effect but not cause. In vain our opponents will add that all that is distinct of Maha Brahma, is subjected to a cause, but that the Rupa and Nam, constituting his essence, are without a cause. This is removing the difficulty a little farther, without advancing a step towards its solution; our answer must ever be the same.

Before exposing the opinions of our philosopher on this important subject, it is necessary to state the views

tion, of fixity, of wisdom, of shame of all that is bad, of fear for a 1 that is bad, of diligence in avoiding evil, and the fear of hardness in sin. 8—The Megga, or ways are: good doctrine, good thinking, good language and good actions. What follows is but a complective of the above, viz: good conduct, good diligence, good attention and good fixity. 9—The Dzan, or meditation have five parts, viz: thought of the object, reflexion on the object, satisfaction resulting therefrom, affectionate inclination for the object, fixity in the object.

The writer craves the reader's indulgence for setting before him such a dry nomenclature; but no one can understand the language of Buddhist metaphysicians, unless he has made himself familiar with the terms they use, and the arbitrary distinctions they have adopted.
entertained by that class of philosophers, whose doctrines appear to have taken root in these parts. It is easy to perceive that they are modifications of the opinion of the Hindoos on the same subject, and akin to that respecting the Adi Budha, or supreme Budha.

Some doctors maintain that there is a first cause or being that has made matter and spirit. Others, admitting the eternal co-existence of matter and of the supreme Being, say, that he is the remote cause of the organization of matter, as we at present see it. But all agree in this, that no one can ever come to the knowledge of that first cause, and it is impossible ever to have an idea of it. Hence it is the height of folly and rash presumption, to attempt to come to the knowledge of what is placed beyond the remotest range of investigation, human mind can ever survey. It behoves us to apply all the powers of the mind to discover the immediate cause that certainly produces existence.

The sage, to be worthy of his sublime calling, must remain satisfied with striving to find out that immediate cause, which brings into action the form and name, and causes the appearance of all those modifications which we call beings or forms of existence. He ought to strive to account for the organization of matter and all its modifications, by discovering the hidden spring that effectually sets all in motion, in action, in combination of existences.

Now our author puts this important question: What thing is to be considered as the mover of the forms and ideas? We know, says he, that the human body has its beginning in the womb of the mother; we are acquainted with its position in that fetid and narrow prison; its being surrounded with nerves, veins, &c., having above it the new elements, and under it the old ones. The manner, the body originates in the womb much resembles the process by which worms and insects are formed in rotten substances, and in putrid and stagnant water. But this is not accounting for the real cause of living bodies.
The real causes, according to some doctors, are five in number, viz: ignorance, concupiscence, desire, kan, (the influence of merits and demerits), and ahan, (the aliments.) They concur together in the formation of the living body in the following manner. Ignorance, concupiscence and desire give asylum to the body, as the mother supplies the infant, with a refuge in her womb. Kan, like the father, is the cause productive of the body. Ahan affords nourishment to the body.

The ideas are but the result of the formation of the organs of senses. Let us suppose for instance the organ of seeing. The Tsekkoou Wignian, that is to say, the life of the eyes, or the ideas connected with the use of that sense, presupposes two things, the organ, and a form or an object, on which acts the organ. These existing, there necessarily result the idea of vision, the perception, &c., in a word all the ideas arising from the action of the eyes upon various objects. The same mode of arguing is employed, relatively to the other five senses.

Other philosophers argue in the following way. The primary causes of all ideas and thoughts are disposed under two heads, that of the ideas which have a fixed place, and that of those that have no fixed place. Under the first head, are comprised the six Ayatana, or seats of senses, and the six Arom, or the objects of senses. Thence flow all the ideas and consequences that relate to merit and demerit. Under the second head are placed the causes or agents that produce ideas and thoughts; the exercise of the intellect holds the first rank. He who applies his mind to the meditation of what is good, such as the commands, and other parts of the most excellent law, and labors to find out that all that is in this world, is subjected to change, pain and illusion, opens at once the door to the coming in of the tseit or ideas connected with merit. On the other hand, the application of the mind to things bad, and erroneous, contrary to the prescriptions of the holy law, generates the ideas of demerit. Such are the causes of the ideas and thoughts.
As to the cause of form, they assert that kan, tseit, fire and ahan, are the sole agents in the formation of the living body. Kan, as the workman, makes the body and sets in it all that relates to its good and bad qualities. The tseit, 75 in number, are also principles of the existence of the body, of which 44 are called Kamawatzara tseit; they relate to the demerit and merit of those as yet under the influence of concupiscence; 15 rupa watzara tseit, relating to beings in the seats of rupa; 8 arupa watzara tseit, relating to those in the seats of arupa; 8 lokoudara tseit, relating to the beings that have entered in the four ways of perfection. The Tedzo-dot, or the element of fire, contributes its share, by the heat and rays of light; and ahan, by supplying the required aliment.

Some other philosophers account for the causes of form and ideas, in following this course of argument. The form and ideas that constitute all beings, are liable to miseries, old age and death, because there is generation and death; generation exists, because there are worlds; worlds exist, because there is desire; desire exists, because there are organs; organs exist, because there are form and name; form and name exist, because there are concepts; concepts exist, because there is merit and demerit; merit and demerit exist, because there is ignorance. The latter is indeed the real cause of all forms and ideas. There is no doubt but this latter opinion is the favorite one with our author. It is based upon the theory of the twelve Nidanas, or causes and effects, and appears to be the orthodox opinion, and bears the stamp of great antiquity.

Having thus accounted in the best way he could, for the existence of all that relates to the beings in the three worlds, our author fondly dwells on the benefits that accrue from the knowledge of causes. It dissipates all doubts, that had previously darkened the mind; it quiets all the anxieties of the heart, and affords perfect peace. For want of it, the impious fall from one error into another error; the disciples of Budha are chiefly perfected by its help.

We read in the Budhist scriptures that a Brahmin went to consult Budha on some points that much perplexed his mind. He said to him: I am beset with doubts respecting the past, the present and the future. Respecting the past, I ask to myself: Have I passed through former generations or not? What was my condition during those existences? My answer is: I am ignorant on all those points. What was my position previous to those generations? I know it not. As to the present, is it true that I exist? or is my existence but an illusion? Shall I have to be born again or not? What are those living beings that surround me at present? Are they but so many illusions, which deceive me by their appearance of reality? On these points, I am sunk into complete ignorance. The future is likewise full of doubts and most perplexing uncertainties. Shall I have other generations or not? What shall be my condition during those coming existences? A thick veil hides from eyes all that concerns my future destiny. What are the means to clear up all those doubts that encompass me on all sides?

Budha said to him: reflect at first on this main point, that what we are wont to call self or moi, is nothing but name and form, that is to say, a compound of the four elements, which undergoes perpetual changes under the action or influence of Kan. Having acquired the conviction of the truth of this principle, it remains with you to investigate carefully the causes which produce both name and form. This simple examination will lead you, at once, to the perfect solution of all your doubts. Behold the difference that exists between the holders of false doctrines and the true believers. The former, whom we may almost call animals, never take the trouble to examine the nature of beings or the causes of their existence. They are stubbornly attached to their false theories, and persist in saying that what the ignorant, delivered up to illusion, are used to call an animal, a king, a subject, a foot and a hand, &c., are really animals, king, subject, foot and hand, &c.; whilst all living beings and their component parts are nothing else but name and form, that is to say, a compound made up of the four elements. Those impious are delivered up to error; hence it happens that they follow all different ways. We reckon among them more than sixty different sects, all at variance among themselves; but all uniting in a common obstinacy to reject the true doctrine of Buddha. They are doomed to move incessantly within the circle of endless and wretched existences.

How different is the condition of the true believers, our followers! They know that the living beings, inhabiting the world, have a beginning. But they are sensible of the folly of attempting to reach this beginning or first cause. This is above the capacity of the loftiest intelligence. It is evident, for instance, that the seeds of plants and trees, which are continually in a state of reproduction, have a beginning. But what that beginning is, no one presumes to determine it. So it is with man and all living beings. They know well, too, that what is vulgarly called man, woman, eyes, mouth, are all illusory distinctions, vanishing away in the presence of the Sage, who sees nothing in all that, but name and form, the production of Kan and Wibek, that is to say, of the first and second cause. These two things are not the man, or the woman, &c., but they are the efficient causes of both. What we say, respecting man and woman, may be applied to animals, and to all other beings. They are all the productions or results of Kan and Wibek, quite as distinct from these two agents, as effect is distinct from its cause. To explain this doctrine, Buddhists have recourse to the comparison of a burning glass. When there is such an instrument, on one hand, and the rays of the sun to fall on it, on the other, fire then is produced; but fire is quite distinct from the two causes that have concurred jointly in producing it. Our disciples, too, are aware that the five khandas, or aggregates constituting a living being, succeed each other at each generation, but in such a way, that the second generation partakes, or retains nothing of the khandas of the first. But the causes producing them, such as Kan and Wibek, never change; they ever remain the same. Let us suppose lamps lighted up. If they burn always, it is owing to the action of individuals that supply them with oil, and light them as soon as they are extinguished. Such is the condition of the khandas. Those which belong to one existence, have no more in common with those of the following one, than the fire of the lamp just lighted anew, has with that of the fire of the lamp that has just died away. As to the way beings are reproduced, we say that when a man is dying, the last tseit having appeared, and soon disappeared, it is succeeded forthwith by the patti tseit or the tseit of the new existence: the interval between both, is so short that it can scarcely be appreciated. This first tseit has nothing in common with the last one. It is, let it be well remembered, the production of kan, or of the influence of merits and demerits, as well as the khandas above alluded to.

This article is by far the most important of all. The latter part, in particular, elucidates, in a distinct manner, the genuine opinions of Buddhism on points of the greatest concern. We may sum up the whole as follows:—

1—There is a first cause that has acted in bringing into being all that exists; but that first cause is unknown, nor can we ever come to the knowledge of it.

2—The immediate causes of all the modifications of beings, or states of being, are ignorance and kan.

3—All beings are but a compound of the four elements. The intellectual operations are carried on, by the instrumentality of the heart, in the same manner as vision is obtained by the means of the eye and of an object to act upon.

4—Each succeeding existence is brought on and modified by the action of kan or the influence of merits and demerits.

5—The component parts of a new being are in no way connected with those of the previous being. This is the key to the difficulty many persons find in accounting, in a Budhistic sense, for the process of metempsychosis. A new term ought to be coined to express that doctrine.

6—The question respecting Neibban may be theoretically resolved without difficulty, by application of the principles contained in this and the preceding article. There is no doubt that the solution forced upon the mind by what has been above stated is that the end of the perfected being is annihilation. Horrifying as this conclusion is, it is not, after all, worse than that which is the terminus of the theories of some modern schools. What an abyss is poor human mind liable to fall into, when it ceases to be guided by revelation!

ARTICLE V.

OF THE TRUE MELOGAS OR WAYS TO PERFECTION.

The subject under consideration is a very important one. It comprehends and comprises a summary of many particulars already alluded to, in the foregoing two articles. The reader will find less rugged the path he has to follow, and less dry the ground he will have to go over.

Our author seems to lay great stress on this special point. The sage, says he, who is desirous to arrive to the supreme perfection, must apply all the powers of his mind to discern the true ways from the false ones. Many are deceived in the midst of their researches after wisdom. The real criterion between the true and false ways is this: when, in considering an object, and making a philosophical analysis of it, the sage finds it somewhat connected with concupiscence and other passions, so far that he cannot, as it were, dissolve it by the application of the three principles of anicitta, duka and anatta, that is to say, change, pain and illusion, then he must con- clude that he is out of the right ways; the high road to perfection is barred before him. But on the contrary, whenever by the appliance of the three great principles, he sees that all the objects brought under his considera- tion, are nothing more or less than the mere compound of the four elements, divested of these illusory appearances which deceive so many, then he may be certain that he is in the right position, and is sure of making progress in the way to perfection.

To facilitate the study of the Meggas, Buddhists have classified all real and imaginary beings under a certain number of heads. The Sage, to complete his laborious task, has to examine separately each of these subjects and submit them to the following lengthened, difficult and complicated process. He takes up one subject, atten- tively considers its exterior and interior compound parts, its connection and relation with other things, its tendency to adhere to, or part with, surrounding objects. Pursuing his inquiries into the past, he endeavors to make himself acquainted with the state and condition of that object during several periods that have elapsed; when his mind is satisfied on this point, he follows up in futurity the same object and calculates from the experi- ence of the past, what change it may hereafter become subjected to. This study enables him to perceive dis- tinctly, that it is subjected to the three great laws of muta- bility, pain and illusion. This conviction once deeply seated in his soul, the Sage holds that object in supreme contempt; far from having any affection for, or attach- ment to it, he feels an intense disgust for it, and longs for the possession of Neibban, which is the exemption from the influence of mutability, pain and illusion.

What we have now stated is tolerably clear and intel- ligible; but what follows is less evident. It partakes of that obscurity and complication so peculiar to Budh-} ist methaphysics. This state of things, is created and maintained chiefly by a mania for divisions and subdivisions that would have puzzled even the schoolmen of the middle ages. We have to listen to what our author says respecting the method to be observed in carrying on the great examination of all subjects of investigation. If that labor be patiently and perseveringly prosecuted, until all the objects of inquiry be exhausted, ample and magnificent shall be the reward for such labors. The Sage shall be in possession of the perfect science; Neibban will appear to him; he will long for it, and unremittingly shape his course in its direction; in a word he shall have reached the acme of perfection. Seated on that lofty position, enjoying a perfect calm in the bosom of absolute quietism, the sage is beyond the reach of passions; there is no illusion for him: he has cut the last thread of future generations, by the destruction of the influence of merits and demerits; he has obtained the deliverance from all miseries: he has reached the peaceful shores of Neibban. But such a prize is not easily obtained; it is to be purchased, but at the expense of an immense amount of lasting and strenuous mental exertions.

The Sage, agreeably to the old and always true saying, know thyself, very properly begins his mightily difficult task with the examination of the five aggregates, constituting a living being, the organs of the six senses, and all that relates to them. Then he applies himself to the studies of the five Dzan, or the parts of meditation and contemplation, and to all that is connected with the seats of Rupa and Arupa. All the objects of examination ranged on that scale, are 600 in number. We will rapidly glance over this table, indicating but the heads of the principal divisions.

We ought not to forget that the five aggregate, or khandas, constituting a living being are: form, sensation, perception, consciousness, and intellect. Supposing that we take the first of those attributes, as subject of examination. We must represent it to the mind, carefully examine it in all its bearings and properties, respecting the past, the present, and the future. We must proceed on and bring it in contact with the three great principles of anicitta, duka and anatta, and inquire whether form be changeable or not, passive or impassive, transient or permanent. We thereby acquire the knowledge of the following great truth, viz.: form is essentially liable to change, to pain and illusion. The examination of each of the four other attributes is proceeded on, in a like manner, and a similar result ensues.

The six organs of the senses come next under consideration. These are eyes, ears, nose, the tongue, the body, or rather the skin that envelops it, and the heart in a physical sense, and mano, in a moral one. Each of the six senses partakes of the eleven conditions or attributes we are about to describe; and each of these eleven attributes being brought successively in relation with each of the six senses, must be considered, as above stated, under the treble relation to mutability, pain and illusion. This will supply the enquirer with a good amount of information. But to shorten this long enumeration, we will mention now successively these eleven attributes the senses may be affected by, and make the application of all, to one of the senses, the eye. The same process may be easily repeated for each of the other senses. Nothing is to be changed, but the name of the sense that has become the subject of examination.

1—Ayatana, the door, the opening of each of the senses. Applied to the eye, it is the opening through which exterior sensations are communicated to the heart by the organ of seeing.

2—Arom, the object of each of the senses. With regard to the eye, it is the appearance or form perceived by the eye; with respect to the ear, it is the sound.

3—Winian, the action of perceiving and knowing. Applied to the eyes, it is the eye seeing and perceiving, or the sight.

4—Phasa, literally the feeling, or coming in contact with objects, applied to each of the senses. With the eye, it is the passive and active impression it derives from the objects it considers, and which it conveys to the heart. With the ear, it is the impression it receives, and similarly communicates to the heart.

5—Weduna, the sensation of pain or pleasure obtained through the senses. With the eye, it is the sensation created by the sight of objects perceived by the eye, and communicated to the heart.

6—Thangia, the idea or persuasion resulting from the six senses, or according to some doctors, the identity of the appearance with reality. With the eye, it is the conviction we have that such an object, perceived by the eyes, is round or square, &c., according to the impressions received by that organ.

7—Lzetana, the inclination or rather adhesion to good or bad, consequently to the impressions received from each of the six senses.

8—Tahna, concupiscence originating from the impressions of agreeableness communicated by the six senses.

9—Witeka, the idea or representation of objects to the mind through the agency of the senses.

10—Witzara, the consideration of the objects, offered to the mind, by the instrumentality of the senses.

11—Dat, the matter or elements of the six senses, or to speak the language of our author, that on which the organs rest, that which supports them.

After the examination of the senses and of the eleven subjects just related, we find the almost boundless field of enquiry to expand in proportion as we appear to make rapid progress. Then come successively for examination: 1. The 10 Kasaings, or the ten parts or elements to be found in each part of a living being, viz.: earth, water, fire, color, odor, flavor and grease, to which we add the Dziwa or life, and that of the organ to which belong the part under consideration. 2. The thirty-two Akan, or thirty-two parts of the living body, of which the first are the hairs, the beard, the nails, the teeth, &c. 3. The twelve Ayatana, or seats of the six senses. Each sense is double as far as it is considered in a double capacity, that of receiving, and that of transmitting the impressions. 4. The 18 Dat, or matter of the six senses; the organs afford six dat; the objects that act upon the organs supply six other Dat; and the last six, are afforded by the objects submitted to the action of the senses. 5. The twenty-two indre, or faculties or capabilities of the organs. Each organ has three, viz: the eye, for instance, is capable of receiving an impression, and of transmitting it; the eye really receives and transmits impressions. The mano, or heart being a double organ, it has six faculties; three, if it be considered physically, and three, if morally or intellectually. 6. The nine Bon, or seats occupy by the Brahmas. 7. The five Rupa Dzan, or degrees of contemplation proper to the Brahmas who have a form. 8. The four Megga, or ways that lead near to Neibban. They are followed by the Brahmas occupying the four superior seats of Rupa. 9. The Arupa Dzan, or contemplation proper to those who inhabit the four immaterial seats. 10. The 19 Damma. This word means what we know as certain by the use of our mental faculties. When the mano, by a right use of its three faculties, has freed itself from the principle of illusion and error, then there will be the sixteen virtues or good qualities, known by the name of Phola and Megga. 11. Finally the twelve Patan, or elements that are in the mano, which constitute the memory and enable man to remember, and silently repeat the impressions transmitted by the senses.

Such is the immense extent of observations the sage has to range for obtaining the perfect science. This task is truly an Herculean one; very few can perform it.

Before coming to the last article, the writer will make a remark tending to show that there is more of the analytic spirit in all what is told us by Buddhist philosophers, respecting those abstruse subjects, than one may be tempted to give them credit for. We have seen that the number of precepts and counsels is almost countless; yet it is agreed by all doctors, that the five general precepts are the basis of all, and that he who observes them in all their bearings, is as much advanced in the path of righteousness as can be expected. Again, Buddhists can never exhaust the stores of all what they have to say about the mental operations and meditation. Yet all is summed up in the comparatively short doctrine of tseit and tseđathit. The living beings are by them infinitely modified; yet after all, we find everything condensed in two words, Nama and Rupa. The theory respecting the generation of beings, their mutual dependence from each other, is a boundless field. We find, however, that after all, kan, or the influence of merits and demerits, is the sole cause of, and agent in, the existence and modification of all beings. Mental operations are numbered by hundreds, but the six senses are, after all, the foundation on which is raised that enumeration. The general principles and primary ideas of all these metaphysical, theories, doubtless, belong to genuine and early Buddhism. But such plain and elementary principles, having been got hold of, by heads of philosophical schools, and worked upon in their intellectual laboratory, there have come out therefrom, at various periods, those theories, which have given to the doctrines of Buddhism so many different hues, and at the same time, so much contributed to puzzle and torment the European student.

ARTICLE VI.

OF THE PROGRESS IN PERFECT SCIENCE.

In the preceding article, we have reviewed the whole scale of beings and analysed summarily some of them, merely to show the way to the general analysis of all others. The ultimate result of such an investigation, is to acquire the conviction that all beings are subjected to mutability, pain and illusion. This conviction, once seated in the soul, generates a generous contempt for so miserable objects. In this article, we must see by what means this philosophical sentiment may be firmly rooted in the soul, and man may finally entertain a thorough disgust for all creatures, even for his own body. This loathsome for all that exists, is immediately followed up by an ardent desire of becoming free and disentangled from all the ties and trammels that encompass other beings. When a man has become familiar with such a conviction, to the extent that his thoughts, desires and actions are entirely regulated by its immediate influence, he is free from the errors that deceive almost all other beings; he sees things as they are in their nature, and appreciates them to their real value. He estranges himself from them. He is, in mind, in the state of Neibban, until death will complete outwardly, what was already existing inwardly in his mind.

We are all aware, says our author, that the principle of instability pervades all that exist in hell, on earth, and in the superior seats. But this important science is, with many, too superficial and but imperfectly understood. Our great object is to root it deeply in our mind, so that we might ever be preserved from those false impressions which, too often, tempt us to believe that mutability and changes are not affecting all beings. What are the obstacles that oppose in us the progress into true science? There are three. The first is Santi, or duration of existence. We allow ourselves to be lulled in the opinion that our life shall be much longer prolonged: that we have as yet many days, months and years, to spend in this world. This groundless supposition prevents us from attending to the principle of mutability. To counteract this dangerous impression, let us examine how all things are born, but soon to die; and therefore, let us have always death present to our mind. Let us consider the short duration and vanity of our being; then we will soon be convinced that the form of the body, is like the waves of the sea, that swell for a moment and soon disappear; that sensation is produced like froth from the dashing of the waves; that the Thangia or persuasion we acquire, has no more stability or reality than lightning; that the Sangkara, or concept, or production is like the plantain tree without strength, and that the view of objects through our senses deserves no more credit than the words of a quack. Let us reason in a similar manner, on the ephemeral existence of all the beings that are in this world: we will easily come to a similar conclusion, that they are the victims of mutability, incessantly tossed about as a piece of wood by the billows of the sea.

A second obstacle to our perceiving the great principle that pain is heavily weighing on all creatures, is the iriabot, or the four situations or positions the body does assume, viz.: sitting, standing, laying and walking. If a man enjoys good health, he owes it chiefly to the change of situation. Were he doomed to occupy always the same place, or remain in the same situation, he would feel quite miserable. He momentarily relieves himself from his temporary afflictions, by a change of situation. This relief makes him forgetful of the great principle of dukha. But in truth, our body is like a patient that requires the constant attendance of the physician. We must feed it, refresh it, wash it, clothe it, &c., to save it from hunger, thirst, dirt and cold. What is all that, but a sad and constant proof that we are slaves to pain. There is nothing but pain and affliction in this wretched world. The same fate awaits all other beings: they are all in a state of endurance and suffering, proclaiming aloud the irresistible action of dukha.

A third obstacle to our being convinced that all is illusion, in this world, is that false persuasion which makes us to say: this is a foot, a hand, a woman, &c. Whilst these things have no reality, no consistence, but are mere shades ready at any moment to vanish and disappear. These and like expressions being always used, import, at last, a sort of conviction that they are true; but after all what are all these things, but a compound of the four elements, or more simply, nama and rupa?
In addition to this examination, the Sage considers also our ideas and the operations of our mental faculties. Here he sees these ideas appearing for a moment and then disappearing; he concludes that ideas are likewise subjected to the great law of mutability. He finds as much misery in his own mind as he has met with in the exterior objects; all around his mind, is but illusion. When he has reached this point, he is delivered at once of the three Nimeit that make one believe that there is something real in birth, existence and action. The destruction of all beings, of all things, is ever present to his mind. In such a state, the Sage is free from all erroneous doctrines; he is disgusted with life; the exercise of meditation is easy to him, and almost uninterrupted. He is free from all passions.

Our author has another chapter devoted to the consideration of the miseries attending all living beings. To make us better informed on this subject, he desires the Sage to meditate upon the miseries attending birth, existence, old age and death; he wishes him to examine attentively the condition of all creatures, that he might never be seduced by the dazzling appearance that encompasses them. He, at great length, insists upon the dangers surrounding the wise man, as yet compelled to remain in contact with this material world. To make us better understand this subject, he makes use of the following similitude. A man worn out with fatigue, enters a cave wherein he longs to enjoy a refreshing rest. He is just lying down in the hope of abandoning himself to the sweet delight of undisturbed repose, when, on a sudden, he perceives close by him an infuriated tiger. At that moment all idea of rest, of sleep, of happiness, vanishes away; he is taken up solely with the imminent danger of his position. Such is the position of the Sage who, living among creatures, may be tempted to allow himself to look on them with an idea of enjoyment. But when he has come to that state, to be disgusted with all the modifications matter is subjected to, he is likened to the pure swan who never sets his feet in low and dirty places, but delights to rest on the bosom of a beautiful lake, of limpid and clear water. Our Sage who has in abhorrence all the filth of this miserable world, is delighted only in the consideration of truth. He is displeased with the world and all things that are therein. His mind is busily engaged in finding out the most effectual means to break with this world, and rend asunder the ties that retain him linked to it. He is like a fish caught in the net, or a frog seized by a snake, or a man shut up in a dungeon. All three strive, to their utmost, to escape the danger that threatens them and regain their liberty. Such is the condition of the perfect, who has attentively considered the many snares that are around them. He, too, has but one object in view, that of freeing himself from them and obtaining the deliverance.

The best and surest means to save himself from the dangers attending existence, is a profound and unremitting meditation on the three great principles: aneitsa, dukka and anatta. We will select among many reflections supplied by our author, a few on each of these principles, to convey to the reader, some ideas respecting the subjects that engross much the attention of the Buddhist Sage. Most of these reflections are strikingly true, and could as well find place in the mind of a Christian, as in that of a Budhist.

Speaking of aneitsa, our author says: Let us reflect on this, that there is nothing permanent nor stable in this world. We hold all things, as a sort of borrowed property, or on tenure; we are by no means proprietors of what we possess. We acquire goods, but to lose them very soon. All in nature is subjected to pain, old age, and death; all come to an end, either by virtue of its own condition, or by the agency of some external cause. Shall we ever be able to find in this world any thing stable? No; we leave one place, but to go and occupy another, which in its turn is soon vacated. No one is able to enumerate the countless changes that incessantly take place. What exists to-day, disappears to-morrow. In fact all nature is pervaded from beginning to end, by the principle of mutability, which incessantly works upon it.

On the miseries of this world, our philosopher speaks as follows: Pain is the essential appendage of this world. Survey, if you can, the whole of this universe, and every where you will find a heavy load of pain, and afflictions, so harrassing and oppressing, that we can scarcely bear them with a tolerable amount of patience. Look at birth, examine existence during its duration, consider senses, the organs of our life. In every direction, our eyes will meet with an accumulation of pain, sufferings and miseries; on every side we are beset with dangers, difficulties and calamities; no where lasting joy or permanent rest are to be found. In vain we may go in quest of health and happiness; both are chimerical objects, no where to be met with. Every where we meet with afflictions.

In speaking of the anatta, or illusion in which we are miserably rocked as long as we stay in this world, our philosopher is equally eloquent. If we consider with some attention this world, we will never be able to discover in it any thing else, but name and form; and, as a necessary consequence, all that exists is but illusion. Here is the manner we must carry on our reasoning. The things that I see and know, are not myself, nor from myself, nor to myself. What seems to be myself, is in reality neither myself nor belongs to myself. What appear, to me to be another, is neither myself nor from myself. The organs of senses, such as the eyes, the ears, &c., are neither myself, nor to myself. They are but illusions, or as nothing relatively to me. The form is not a form; the attributes of a living being, are not attributes; beings are not beings. All that is an aggregate of the four elements, and these again are but form and name, and these two are but an illusion, destitute of reality. In a being, then, there are two attributes, form and sensation, that appear to have some more consistency than other things. Yet they have no reality; their nature and condition is to be destitute of all reality and stability.* Penetrated with the truth of these and like considerations, the Sage declares at once that all things are neither himself, nor belong to himself. Nothing, therefore, appears worthy his notice. He at once divorces with the world and all the things that are therein. He would fain have nothing to do with it; he holds it in supreme contempt and utter disgust.

He who has reached this lofty point of sublime science, is at once secure from the snares of seduction, and the path of error. He will escape from the whirlpool of human miseries, and infallibly reach the state of Neibban. The most perfect among the perfect are so much taken

* In this latter part, our author clearly explains his opinion on this world, that is to say, on all that exists. He states, at first, in general terms, that all what we see and perceive by the means of our senses, possesses no reality: it is a mere illusion. Our ignorance of the real state of things deceives us, by making us believe in the reality of objects that have nothing but an ephemeral and illusory existence. He proceeds a little farther, and treats our senses in like manner. They are the instruments that procure unto us, a general illusion. But the senses, what are they? They are distinct from us. By a strict analysis we find them to be but a compound of the four elements, liable to dissolution and destruction. A living being has certain attributes which are the supports of his existence; but those attributes are equally a compound of the elements, subjected to the same modifications of reproduction and destruction, and deprived of consistence. The attributes of the living beings being disposed of in this manner, the being itself vanishes away. There remain but name and form. But does, what we call form, possess a real existence? Undoubtedly not. It is a mere phantom, an illusion. Our author comes to the necessary and final consequence that there is no world really existing. In fact he denies the existence of matter and spirit. With such an abuse of the powers of reasoning, there is no wonder, that he looks upon Neibban, or annihilation as the only end to be arrived to. Man, in his opinion, being but a compound of the four elements, which have no real existence, cannot be himself but an illusion, without a reality. Gracious Heavens! what an excess of mental aberration, will man reach when he is left to himself, deprived of the light from above! Never has the writer witnessed such a total eclipse of human intellect.
upon with, and deeply affected by, the view of Neibban, that they tend in that direction without effort. Others, somewhat less advanced in the sublime science, discover, it is true, the state of Neibban at a distance, but its sight is as yet dimmed and somewhat obscured. They want as yet to train up their mind to, and perfect it in, the exercise of that meditation of which we have given an abbreviated analysis.

OR

In the foregoing pages, we have, at first, given a sketch of the life of the founder of Budhism, and, in the accompanying notes, endeavored to explain the most important particulars, respecting the extraordinary religious system he has established. Subsequently, in the way to Neibban, we have laid down in as few words as possible, the great metaphysical principles upon which is raised the great structure of Budhism, and pointed out the way leading to the pretended perfection, or rather the end of perfection, Neibban. It seems to be necessary to devote a particular Notice to the religious Order, which forms the most striking feature of that religion which has extended its sway over so many nations. This association of devotees holds the first rank among the followers of Budha; it comprises the elite of that immense body. The system of discipline the Buddhists Religious are subjected to, is the highest practical illustration of the doctrines and practices of Budhism. We may see, reflected in that corporation, the greatest results the working of these religious institutions can ever produce. All that Budha, in his efforts, has been able to devise as most fit to lead man to the perfection such as he understood it, will be found in the constitutions of that Order. It is a living mirror in which we may contemplate the master piece of his creation. The Buddhist Religious constitute the Thanga, or assembly of the Perfect, that is to say, of the disciples who have left the world, conformed their life to that of their teacher, and striven to acquire the science that will qualify them for entering into the way leading to perfection. They are the strict followers of Budha, who, like him, have renounced the world to devote themselves to the two-fold object of mastering their passions and acquiring the true wisdom which alone can lead to the deliverance.

* The word Talapoin, imported into Europe by the writings of early Portuguese authors in the East Indies, derives its origin probably from two Pali words Tala-pat, meaning the leaf of the palm tree. These two words coupled together are used by the Siamese to designate the large fan made of palm leaves, set in a slender wooden frame, which Talapoins carry with them on certain occasions when they go abroad.

In the course of this Notice, we will indiscriminatelyly make use of the words Phongies, Talapoins and Rahans, to designate the Buddhist Religious.
The best method for obtaining a correct information respecting the Buddhist Religious, is not, it seems, to consider their order from an abstract point of view, but rather in connection with the religion it has sprung from, as affording a perfect exemplification of its highest practices, maxims and tendencies, as well as of the real nature and true spirit of that creed.

Buddhism is evidently an off-shoot of Brahminism. We find it repletes with principles, practices, observances and dogmas belonging to the great Hindoo system. Gandama, being himself a Hindoo, reared in a Hindoo society, trained up in the Hindoo schools of philosophy, could not but imbibe, to a great extent, the opinions and observances of his contemporaries. He dissented from them, it is true, in many important points, but in the generality of his teachings, he seems to have agreed with them. He found existing, in his times, a body of Religious and Philosophers, whose mode of life was peculiar, and quite distinct from that of the people. When he laid the plan for the religious institution he contemplated to establish, he found, around him, most of the elements he required for that work. He had but to improve on what he saw existing; and make his new order agree with the religious tenets he innovated.

In the hope of tracing up the ties of relationship that must have existed between the Religions of the Brahminical Order, and those of the Buddhist one, the writer will begin this Notice, with establishing a short parallel between the former, such as they are described in the Institutes of Menoo, and the institution of the latter, such as it is explained in the Wini, or Book of discipline. Afterwards the nature of the Buddhist Order and the object its members have in view in embracing it, shall be examined; next to that, the constituent parts of that body and its hierarchy shall receive a due share of attention. We will describe at the same time, the ceremonies observed on the solemn occasion of admitting individuals into the religious society, and expose briefly the rules that direct and regulate the whole life of a professed member, as long as he remains in the brotherhood. It will not be found amiss to inquire into the cause and nature of the great religious influence undoubtedly possessed by the members of the Order, and examine the motives that induce the votaries of Buddhism to show the greatest respect, and give unfeigned marks of the deepest veneration to the Talapoids or Phongies. This will be concluded with a short account of the low and degraded state in which the society has fallen in these parts, particularly in what has reference to knowledge and infor-manation.

A SHORT PARALLEL BETWEEN THE BRAHMINICAL AND THE BUDHISTIC RELIGIOUS ORDERS.

It has been stated on apparently incontrovertible grounds in the foregoing pages, that Buddhism has originated to a considerable extent, from Brahminism. The following remarks will corroborate the statement and give an additional weight to the reasons already brought forward. In fact, both systems have the same objects in view; viz. the disentangling of the soul from passions, and the influence of the material world, and its perfect liberation from metempsychosis and the action of matter. The final end to be arrived at, is however, widely different. The perfected Brahmin longs for his absorption in the infinite being; the perfect Budhist thirsts after a state of complete isolation, which is nothing short of total annihilation. But the means for obtaining the ardently coveted perfection are on many respects the same. The moral observances enforced by both creeds differ so little from each other, that they appear to be almost identical. In both systems, moreover, we find a body of individuals who aim at a complete and perfect observance of the highest injunctions, striving to reach the very summit of that perfection, pointed out by the founders of their respective institutions; these are the Brahmin and Budhist Religious. To glance over the regulations enjoined to the Brahmins, such as we find them in the Institutes of Menoo, and those prescribed by the Wini, to the Talapoins, cannot fail to be truly interesting. A summary comparison will enable the reader to perceive at once, how closely allied are the two creeds, and how great is the resemblance between them both. He will see on the clearest evidence, that to Budha is not to be ascribed the merit of having originated so many fine moral precepts, and admirable disciplinary regulations, but that he found in his own country, in the schools where he studied wisdom, already well known, pure moral precepts, actually discussed, studied, and by many strictly observed, together with the disciplinary regulations. He was brought up in a society which beheld with astonishment and admiration a body of religious men, entirely devoted to the great work of securing the triumph of the spiritual principle over the material one, and endeavouring by dint of the greatest and severest austerities, the most rigorous penances and the most entire renouncing to all this material world, to break down the material barriers that had hitherto kept the soul captive, and prevented her to take her flight into regions of blissful freedom and perfect quiescence. There is, however, a remarkable difference between the sacerdotal caste of Brahmins, and the members of the Budhist monkish institution. The position of the former is hereditary; he is rendered illustrious by his lineage and descent. That of the second is personal and ends with him; it is the result of his own free choice; he derives all the glory that shines round him, from his virtuous life and a strict adherence to the institutions of the Wini. The Brahmin owes every thing to religion and to birth. The Buddhist Religious is indebted for all that he is, solely to religion; the monk's title to distinction is the holy mode of the saintly life that he has embraced. Both are the greatest and most distinguished in their respective society; but merit and intrinsic worth alone, elicit veneration, and respect in behalf of the humble Religious; whilst the casual birth of the Brahmin from individuals belonging to the highest caste, centres upon his person the reluctant homage of men belonging to inferior castes, who in virtue of the prejudice in which they are reared, consider themselves obliged to do homage to him. The person of both is sacred and looked upon with awe and veneration, but from somewhat opposite and different motives.

Notwithstanding these and many other differences and discrepancies, it is not the less striking to find in the Brahminical body, such as it is constituted by the regulations of the Vedas, the germ of all the principal observances enjoined to the Budhist that leaves the world, to follow the path, leading to perfection.

The life of a Brahmin, not as it is now, but as it originally was, and now ought to be, if the regulations of the Vedas had not been partly set aside, is one of laborious study, austerity, self denial and retirement. The first quarter of his life is spent in the capacity of student. His great and sole object is the study of the Vedas, and the mastering of their contents. Worldly studies are not to be thought of. He is entirely under the control of his preceptor, to whom he has to yield obedience, respect and service in all that relates to his daily wants. He must moreover daily beg his food from door to door. The Budhist novice likewise withdraws from his family, enters the monastery, lives under the discipline of the Head of the house, whom he obeys, and serves in his daily necessities, and devotes all his undivided attention to the study of religious books. He pays no regard to worldly knowledge. He has likewise to go out every morning to beg the food that he will use during the day.

The second quarter of the Brahmin's life is thus employed. He marries and lives with his family, but he must consider his chief employment to be the teaching of the Vedas and a zealous discharge of the religious observances and of all that relates to public worship. He must sedulously abstain from too sensual and worldly enjoyments, even from music, dancing and other amusements calculated to lead to dissipation. The Budhist monkish institution being not hereditary, and its continuance and development having not to depend from generation, its members are bound to a strict celibacy, and to an absolute and entire abstinence from all sensual and worldly enjoyments, inconsistent with gravity, self-recollection and self denial. Their chief occupation is the teaching to children the rudiments of reading and writing, that they might read religious books, which are the only ones used in schools.
He must pay a strict regard to devotional practices, and take care that the religious observances and ceremonies be regularly observed in his monastery.

The third quarter of his life is spent, by the Brahmin, in solitude as an anchorite. He dwells in the forests, where he must procure what is necessary for food and raiment. The latter article is looked after, when he thinks it to be a requisite, to cover his nakedness. With many of them, fanaticism has so far prevailed upon reason and the sense of decency, that they live in a state of disgusting nakedness. The roots of plants, the fruits and leaves of wild trees will supply the needful for the support of nature. That time, too, must be devoted to the infliction of the severest penances and to the practice of the hardest deeds of mortification. To the Buddist monk solitude and retirement must ever be dear. Ascetic life is much recommended and praised as most excellent. It was formerly much in use among religious Buddists. In Burmah several places are with respect pointed out, as having been sanctified by the residence of holy anchorites. Now, in our days, a few zealots, to bear, as it were, witness to this ancient observance, retire into solitude, during a portion of the three months of lent. The spirit of mortification and self-renouncing is eminently Buddist; but from the very days of Gaudama, we remark a positive tendency from the part of his Religious to give up, and renounce those unnatural and ultra rigorous penances, regularly observed by their brethren of the opposite creed. The principle is cherished by them, but the mode of carrying it into practice, is more mild and more consonant with reason, and modesty.

The last portion of the Brahmin's life is devoted likewise to meditation and contemplation. He is no more subjected to the ordeal of rigorous penances; nature has been subdued; passions silenced and destroyed; the soul has obtained the mastery over the body and the material world. She is free from all the trammels and obstacles that impeded her contemplation of truth. She is ready to quit this world as the bird leaves the branch of the tree when it pleases him. The Buddist Religious having likewise crushed his passions, and disentangled his soul from affection to matter, delights but in the contemplation of truth. As the mighty whale sports in the bosom of the boundless ocean, so the perfected Buddist launches forth into abstract and infinite truth, delights in it, completely estranged from this world which meditation has taught him to consider as a mere illusion, destitute of reality. He is then ripe for the so ardently coveted state of Neibban.

When Budha originated the plan of a society of Religious, and framed the regulations whereby it was to be governed, he had but to look around him for patterns of a religious life. The country where he had been born, the society in which he had been brought up, swarmed with Religious following the different systems of philosophy prevailing in those days. He saw them, conversed with them, and, for some time, lived in their company, under the same disciplinary institutions. He was, therefore, thoroughly conversant with all that, in his days, constituted a religious life. But the same bold and enterprising spirit which made him dissent from his masters and contemporaries on many important questions of morals and metaphysics, and induced him, in his opinion, to improve and perfect theories in speculative and practical philosophy, impelled him also to do something similar respecting the disciplinary regulations to which his Religious were to be hereafter subjected. We freely confess that on this latter point, he was eminently successful. The body of Buddhist Religious is infinitely superior, in most respects, to the other societies of Indian Religious. The regulations of the former breathe a spirit of modesty, mildness and un-affectation, which, in a striking manner, contrasts with those disgusting exhibitions of self inflicted penances so fondly courted by Brahmins, where immodesty seems to dispute the palm with cruelty. Budha opened the door of his society to all men without any distinction or exception, implicitly pulling down the barriers raised by the prejudices of caste. Did he, in the beginning of his public career, lay down the plan of destroying all vestiges of caste, and proclaiming the principle of equality amongst men? It is, to say the least, very doubtful. The equalizing principle itself was never distinctly mentioned in his discourses. But he had sown all the elements constitutive of that principle, in his instructions. Every member put on the religious dress of his own free choice, and set it aside at his pleasure; no hereditary right therefore, could be thought of; the dying Religious could bequeath to his brethren but the examples of his virtues. His complete separation from the world, had broken all the ties of relationship. The double vow of strict poverty and of celibacy cutting the root of cupidity and sensual enjoyments, precluded him from aiming at the influence and power, which is conferred by wealth and rank. With the Brahminical Religious the case is the very reverse. His sacerdotal caste, exclusive of his personal merits, confers on him an almost divine sacredness, which is to be propagated by generation. He may possess riches and have a numerous posterity. He is, therefore, almost irresistibly impelled to seize on a power, which is forced on him, by the treble influence of birth, religion, and wealth.

This subject of the comparison between the two societies of Religious, might receive further developments, but what has been briefly stated, appears sufficient to bear out the point it was intended to establish, viz: the close resemblance subsisting between the two religious Orders in both systems, and the necessary inference that the Order of Buddhist Religious is an improvement on the Orders of Religious subsisting in India, in the days of Gaudama.

There is another characteristic of the Religious Order of Buddhists which has favourably operated in its behalf, and powerfully contributed to maintain it for so many centuries, in so compact and solid a body that it seems to bid defiance to the destructive action of revolutions.
We allude to its regularly constituted hierarchy, which is as perfect as it can be expected, particularly in Burmah and Siam. The power and influence of him whom we may call the General of the Order in Burmah, and who is known under the appellation of Tha-thana-paing, when, as was very often the case, backed by the temporal power, was felt throughout the whole country, and much contributed to maintain good order and discipline in the great body of Religious. The action of the provincial or superior of the religious houses of a province, is more directly and immediately felt by all the subordinates. It does not appear that the Religious of the Hindoo schools, at least in our days, possess such an advantage that they may well envy to their brethren of the Budhists sect. The members of the Brahminical body are not kept together by the power and government of superiors, but by regulations that are so deeply rooted and firmly seated in the mind of individuals, that they are faithfully observed. The superiority of caste, connected, too, with a certain amount of spiritual pride, has been hitherto sufficient to maintain that body distinct and separate from all that is without self. The religious spirit that pervades that body in our days, seems to have abated from its original fervor and energy. The Brahmin has maintained with the utmost jealously the superiority that caste confers upon him, but appears not have been so particular in keeping up the genuine spiritual supremacy which a strict adherence to the prescriptions of the Vedas, must have ever firmly secured to him.

NATURE OF THE RELIGIOUS ORDER OF PHONGIES.

He who has not seriously studied the religious system of Budhismus, nor acquired accurate notions of its doctrinal principles, is scarcely capable of forming a correct opinion of the religious order of those austere Recluses, whom Europeans, with a mind biased by educational influence, denominate Priests of Budha. Were we to apply to the members of that Order the notions generally entertained of a priesthood, we would form a very erroneous conception of the real character of their institution. For, in every religious system admitting of one or several beings superior to man, whose providential action influences his destinies, either in this or the next world, persons invested with a sacerdotal character, have always been considered as mediators between men and the acknowledged Deity, offering to the supreme being, on all public occasions, the prayers and sacrifices of the people, and soliciting in return His gracious protection. When in the early ages of the world, the sacerdotal dignity was coupled with the patriarchal or regal ones; when, in the succeeding ages, there existed a regular and distinct priesthood, such as subsisted under the Mosiac dispensation or among the Greeks, Romans, Gauls, &c., the priests were looked upon as delegates of the people in all that related to national worship. carrying on, in his name, the mysterious intercourse that links heaven to earth. Priesthood, therefore, necessarily implies the belief in some being, superior to man, and controlling his destinies. The moment that such a belief is disregarded, the very idea of priesthood vanishes. Buddhism, such at least as it is found existing in Ceylon, Burma, Siam, and other places, is a purely atheistical religious system, and presents the solitary instance, at least as far as my information goes, of a religious creed, admitted by various nations, the doctrines of which are not based upon the notion of a Supreme Being, controlling more or less the affairs of this world. In support of an assertion that may appear to many somewhat hazardous, we will briefly lay down the leading tenets of the Budhistic doctrine.

According to that system, matter is eternal. The existence of a world, its duration, destruction and reproduction, all the various combinations and modifications matter is liable to, are the immediate results of the action of eternal and self-existing laws. Through life, man is submitted to the continual but successive influences of his good and bad deeds. This double influence always attends him through his numberless existences, and inevitably awards him happiness or misfortune according as the respective sum of good or evil predominates. There exists an eternal law, which, when obliterated from the memory of men, can be known again, and, as it were, recovered; only and thoroughly understood, by the incomparable genius and matchless wisdom of certain extraordinary personages, called Budhas, who appear successively and at intervals during the various series or successions of worlds. These Budhas announce that law to all the then existing rational beings. The great object of that doctrine is to point out to those beings, the means of freeing themselves from the influence of passions, and becoming abstracted from all that exists. Being thereby delivered from the action of good or evil influence, which causes mortals to turn incessantly in the whirlpool of never ending existences, men can obtain the state of Neibban or rest, that is to say, according to the popular opinion, a situation wherein the soul, disentangled from all that exists, alone with herself, indifferent to pain as well as to pleasure, folded, as it were, upon herself, remains for ever in an incomprehensible state of complete abstraction and absolute rest. I say that such is the popular opinion, fortunately unbiased by scholastic theories. But the opinion of the Budhist Doctors respecting Neibban, is that it means the negation of all states of being, that is to say, a desolating and horrifying annihilation. A Budha is a being who during myriads of existences, slowly and gradually gravitates towards this centre of an imaginary perfection, by the practice of the highest virtues. Having attained thereto, he becomes, on a sudden, gifted with a boundless genius wherewith he at once discovers the wretched state of beings, and the means of delivering them from it. He thoroughly understands the eternal law which alone can lead mortals in the right way, and enable them to come out of the circle of existences, wherein they have been unceas-ly turning and moving in a state of perpetual agitation, opposite to that of fixity or rest. He preaches that law whereby man is taught the practice of those virtues which destroy gradually in him, all evil influences, together with every affection for all that exists, and brings him at last to the end of existence, the possession of Nibbāna. His task fulfilled, Buddha dies, or rather to use the language of Buddhists, he enters into the state Nibbāna. In that situation which is truly inexplicable, he knows nothing of, and enters no wise into, the affairs of this world. He is as if he was not, or had never been. He is, indeed annihilated.

Buddhists venerate three precious things, Budda, his Law, and the Assembly of the just or perfect, in the same sense as we venerate and admire what is morally good and beautiful, such as virtue considered abstractedly, and the acts originating from it. The statues of the last Buddha Gaudama, are honored by his followers, not with the idea that certain powers or virtues are inherent in them, but solely because they are the visible representations of Buddha, who according to Buddhists, desired that the same honors should be paid to them, as would be offered to his person, were he yet living among them. This faint outline of the Buddhist creed is sufficient to bear out the above assertion, that it is in no wise based on the belief in a Supreme Being, but that it is strictly atheistical, and therefore that no real priesthood can ever be found existing under such a system. It may prove, too, of some assistance, for better understanding what is to be said regarding the subjects of this Notice.

The Talapoins are called by the Burmese Phongies, which term means great glory, or Rahans, which means perfect. They are known in Ceylon, Siam Thibet, under different names conveying nearly the same meaning and expressing either the nature or the object of their profession.

What induces a follower of Buddha to embrace the Talapoinic state? What is the object of his pursuit, in entering on such a peculiar and extraordinary course of life? The answer to these questions will supply us with accurate notions of the real nature of this singular order of devotees. A Buddhist on becoming a member of the holy society, proposes to keep the law of Budha in a more perfect manner than his other co-religionists. He intends to observe not only its general ordinances obligatory on every individual, but also its prescriptions of a higher excellency, leading to an uncommon sanctity and perfection, which can be the lot of but a comparatively small number of fervent and resolute persons. He aims at weakening within himself all the evil propensities that give origin and strength, to the principle of demerits. By the practice and observance of the highest and sublimest precepts and counsels of the law, he establishes, confirms and consolidates in his own soul, the principle of merits, which is to work upon him during the various existences he has as yet to go through, and gradually lead him to that perfection which will qualify him for, and entitle him to, the state of Neibban, the object of the ardent desires and earnest pursuit of every true and genuine disciple of Budha. The life of the last Budha Gaudama, his doctrines as well as his examples he proposes to copy with a scrupulous fidelity and to follow with unremitting ardour. Such is the great model that he proposes to himself for imitation. Gaudama withdrew from the world, renounced its seducing pleasures and dazzling vanities, curbed his passions under the yoke of restraint, and strove to practice the highest virtues, particularly self-denial, in order to arrive at a state of complete indifference for all that is within or without self, which is, as it were, the threshold of Neibban.

The Talapoin fixing his regards on that matchless pattern of perfection, would fain reproduce, as far as it lays in his power, all its features in his own person. Like Budha himself, he parts with his family relatives and friends, and seeks for admission into the society of the perfect; he abandons and leaves his home, to enter into the asylum of peace and retirement; he forsakes riches of this world, to practise the strictest poverty; he renounces the pleasures of this world, even the lawful ones, to live according to the rules of the severest abstinence and purest chastity; he exchanges his secular dress, for that of the new profession he enters on; he gives up his own will, and lets his own liberty to attend, through every act and all the particulars of life, to the regulations of the brotherhood. He is a Talapoin, for himself and for his own benefit, to acquire merits which he shares with nobody else. On the occasion of certain offerings or alms being presented to him by some benevolent admirers of his holy mode of life, he will repay his benefactors by repeating to them certain precepts, commands and points of the law; but he is not bound by his professional character to expound the law to the people. Separated from the world by his dress and his peculiar way of living, he remains a stranger to all that takes place without the walls of his monastery. He is not charged with the care of souls; and, therefore, never presumes to rebuke any one that trespasses the law, or to censure the conduct of the profiteer.

The ceremonies of the Budhistic worship are simple and few. The Talapoin is not considered as a minister whose presence is an essential requisite when they are to be performed. Pagodas are erected, statues of Budha are inaugurated, offerings of flowers, tapers, and small ornaments are made, particularly on the days of the new and full moon; but on all those solemn occasions, the interference of the Phongie is in no way considered as necessary. So that the whole worship exists independently of him. He is not to be seen on the particular occasions of births and marriages. He is, it is true, occasionally asked to attend funerals, but he then acts, not as a minister performing a ceremony, but as a private person. He is present for the sake of receiving alms that are profusely bestowed upon him by the relatives of the defunct.

NOTICE ON THE BUDHIST MONKS.

July to the full moon of October, particularly devoted to a stricter observance of the practices and ceremonies of the law. Crowds of people of both sexes resort to the Pagodas, and often spend whole nights in the buildings erected close to those places: the most fervent among them, fast and abstain from profane amusements during that period; they devote more time to the reading of their sacred books, and the repetition of certain formulas calculated to remind them of certain important truths or intended to praise the last Budha Gaudama, and the Law he has published: Alms more abundant are pouring into the peaceable dwellings of the pious Recluses. During all the time, the Talapoin quietly remains in his place, without altering his mode of life, or deviating in the least, from his never changing usages and ordinary habits. By the rules of his profession, he is directed to pay, during that time, a particular regard to religious observances, to join his brethren, from time to time, in the recital of certain formulas and in the reading of the book embodying the regulations of the profession. He enjoys, as usual, the good things which his liberal co-religionists take pleasure in proffering to him. On two occasions, the writer has seen and on many, has heard of some Talapoins, withdrawing during the three months of lent, to some lonely place, living alone in small huts, shunning the company of men, and leading an eremite life, to remain at liberty to devote all their time to meditations on the most excellent points of the law of Budha, combating their passions, and enjoying in that retired situation, a foretaste of the never troubled rest of Neibban.

In many respects the Talaponic institutions may be assimilated to those of some religious orders that appeared successively in almost every Christian country previous to the era of the Reformation, and that are, up to this day, to be met with amidst the churches of the Latin and Greek rites. Like the monk, the Talapoin bids a farewell to the world; wears a particular dress, leads a life of community, abstracts himself from all that gives strength to his passions, by embracing a state of voluntary poverty, and absolute renunciation of all sensual gratifications. He aims at obtaining by a stricter observance of the law's most sublime precepts, an uncommon degree of sanctity and perfection. All his time is regulated by the rules of his profession, and devoted to repeating certain formulas of prayers, reading the sacred scriptures, begging alms for his support, &c.

These features of exterior resemblance, common to institutions of creeds so opposite to each other, have induced several writers, little favorable to Christianity, to pronounce without further inquiry that Catholicism has borrowed from Budhism may ceremonies, institutions and disciplinary regulations. Some of them have gone so far as to pretend to find in it, the very origin of Christianity. They have, however, been ably confuted by Abel Remusat, in his Memoir entitled Chronological Researches into the Lamaic Hierarchy of Thibet. Without entertaining in the least, the presumptuous idea of entering into a controversy entirely foreign to his purpose, the writer will confine himself to making one or two remarks calculated to show that the first conclusion is, to say the least of it, a premature one. When in two religious creeds, entirely opposed to each other in their ultimate object, there are several minor objects, equally set forth by both, it will necessarily happen that, in many instances, means nearly similar shall be prescribed on both sides, for effectually obtaining them, independent of any previously concerted plan or imitation. The Christian system and the Budhistic one, though differing from each other in their respective objects and ends, as much as truth from error, have, it must be confessed, many striking features of an astonishing resemblance. There are many moral precepts equally commanded and enforced in common by both creeds. It will not be deemed rash to assert that most of the moral truths prescribed by the Gospel, are to be met with in the Budhistic scriptures. The essential, vital and capital discrepancy lies in the difference of the ends the two creeds lead to, but not in the variance of the means they prescribe for the attainment of them. The Gospel tends to reunite man to his Maker, points out to him the way he must follow for arriving at the possession and enjoyment of Him who is the great principle and end of all things, and teaches him, as a paramount duty, to conform his will and inclinations to his commands. Budhism tends to abstract man from all that is without self and makes self, his own and sole centre. It exhorts him to the practise of many eminent virtues, which are to help him to rise to an imaginary perfection, the summit of which is the incomprehensible state of Nirbham. It is the mildest expression which the writer can command, when he has to speak of so sad a subject, the final end of a Budhist. It would be more correct to say at once, that the pretended perfect being is led, by the principles of his creed, into the dark and fathomless abyss of anis hila i n.

If the end aimed at by the followers of Budhia, is widely different from that which the disciples of Christ strive to obtain, the means prescribed for the attainment of these two ends are, in many respects, very much similar to each other. Both creeds teach man to combat, control and master the passions of his heart, to make reason predominate over sense, mind over matter, to root up from his heart every affection for the things of this world, and to practise the virtues required for the attainment of these great objects. Is there any thing surprising that persons having in many respects, views nearly similar, resort to means or expedients nearly alike for securing the object of their pursuit, without having ever seen or consulted each other? He who intends to practise absolute poverty, must of course abandon all his earthly property. He who proposes renouncing the world, ought to withdraw from it. He who will lead a contemplative life, must look out for a retired place far from the gaze and agitation of the world. To control passions, and particularly the fiercest of all, the sensual appetite, it is required that one should keep himself separate from all that is calculated to kindle its fires and feed its violence. Every profession has its distinctive marks and peculiar characteristics. Hence peculiarity of dress, manners and habits, in those who have adopted a mode of life differing from that of the rest of the community. He who has bound himself to the daily recitation of certain prayers or devotional formulas, a certain number of times, will have recourse to some instrument, or devise some means for ascertaining the number of times he has complied with his regulation in this respect. He, too, who is eager to acquire self-knowledge and to carry on a successful war with himself, will apply to a guide to whom he will lay open his whole soul, and ask spiritual advice that will enable him to overcome the obstacles he meets on his way to perfection.

These and many other points are common to all those that intend observing not only the precepts but also the mere counsels of their respective creeds. Causes being the same, in many instances, in both systems, consequences almost analogous must inevitably result therefrom. Religious institutions always bear the stamp of the religious ideas that have given rise to them. They, together with their rules and regulations, are not the principle but the immediate consequence or offspring of religion, such as it is understood by the people professing it. They exemplify and illustrate religious notions already entertained, but they never create such as are not yet in existence. When the learned shall have collected sufficient materials for giving an accurate history of the origin, progress, spread and dogmatical revolutions of Buddhism, it will not be uninteresting to inquire into the causes that have operated in communicating to two religious systems, essentially differing in their respective tendencies, so many points of resemblance. But that study is as yet, to be made. We know very little on all those points. The best informed are compelled to acknowledge, that in the present state of information, we are still in the dark, the thickness of which is occasionally relieved by a few transient and uncertain glimpses which are insufficient to enlighten the mind, and enable the searcher after truth, to guide safely his steps. In reading the particulars of the life of the last Buddha Gaudama, it is impossible not to feel reminded of many circumstances relating to our Saviour’s life such as it has been sketched out by the Evangelists. The origin of the close affinity between many doctrinal points and maxims common both to Christianity and Budhism, having been ascertained, it will not be difficult to find out and explain how the votaries of both, have come to adopt so many practices, ceremonies, observances, and institutions nearly similar.

Having endeavoured to explain the nature of the institution of the Talapoins, and the object aimed at, by its professed members, we will now proceed to examine its systematical organization, or sacred hierarchy.
ARTICLE III.

HIERARCHY OF THE ORDER.

It is somewhat surprising to find in the middle of half civilized nations, such as the Burmese, Siamese, Cingalese, and Thibetans, a religious Order, with a distinct and well marked Hierarchy, constitutions and regulations, providing for the admission of members, determining their occupations, duties, obligations and their mode of life, and forming as it were, a compact, solid and perfect body, that has subsisted, almost without change, during several centuries, and survived the destruction of kingdoms, the fall of royal dynasties, and all the confusion and agitation produced by political, commotions and revolutions. It is in Thibet, that the order is found existing in the greatest perfection, under the fostering care of the Great Lama, or High Priest, who combines in his own person the regal as well as the sacerdotal dignity and power. In the city of Lassa, a Pontifical Court, an elective sacerdotal chief, and a college of superior Lamas, impart to the Order, dignity, decency, respectability and stability, which insure its continued existence, and more or less extend its influence over its members living in distant countries. The period of the introduction of Buddhism from India into Thibet, is very uncertain, if not quite unknown. Buddhist annals mention that after the holding of the third council, 236 years after Gautama's death, some missionaries were deputed by the president of that assembly, to go and preach religion in some parts of the Himalaya range. We may suppose, that this had reference to the southern slopes of the mountains. Be that as it may, it appears certain, that the establishment of a Pontifical chief or sovereign, with royal prerogatives, was set up by one of the grandsons of the great Tartar warrior Gengis, in or about the middle of the thirteenth century. In other countries, where the Order has no connection whatever with the civil power, we can scarcely expect to see it surrounded with an equal splendour, or subsisting in the same state of splendor and regularity. Though this is the case in Burmah, it is impossible not to acknowledge the fact that the regulations of the Wini are more carefully attended to, in this country than in Thibet. The conduct of the monks here is incomparably more regular. The public could not bear an open dereliction of the duties imposed by the vows of poverty and chastity. But, if credit be given to the narratives of travellers, the Thibetan monks do not scruple to forsake occasionally those duties, without appearing to fear the rising of a popular cry of indignation, on account of their misbehavior, in points considered of such vast importance. Extraordinary indeed would be its vital energies, were the remotest parts of this great and far spread body to receive the same impulse and exhibit the same symptoms of vitality, as those nearest to the heart or principle of life. Having never met with any detailed particulars regarding the Thibetan monks, we must remain satisfied with laying before the reader an account of all that relates to the constituent parts of the order, such as they are found existing in Burmah, and developed in the sacred writings.

The whole fraternity is composed, 1st, of young men who have put on the Talapoinie dress, without being considered professed members of the Fraternity, or having hitherto passed through a certain ordeal somewhat resembling an ordinary—they are called Skyins: 2nd, of those who having lived for a while in the community, in a probationary state, are admitted professed members with the ceremonies usually observed on such occasions, whereby the title and character of Phongyie are solemnly conferred—they are denominated Patsins: 3rd, of the Heads of each House or community, who have the power to control all the inmates of the house: 4th, of a Provincial, whose jurisdiction extends over all the communities, spread in the towns and villages of the Province or District: 5th, of a Superior General, residing in the capital or its suburbs, called Tsaiadaw, or great master, having the general management and direction of all the affairs of the order throughout the Empire. He is emphatically called by the name of Tha-thana-paing, which means that he has the power over religion. Let us say something upon each of these five degrees of the Budhistic Hierarchy.

It is an almost universal custom among the Burmese and Siamese to cause boys who have attained the age of puberty, or even before that time, to enter, for a year or two, some of the many Talapoinic houses, to put on the yellow dress, for the double purpose of learning to read and write, and of acquiring merits for future existences. On the occasion of the death of some persons, it happens sometimes that a member of the family will enter the community for six months or a year. When a young lad is to make his first entrance into a house of the Order, he is led thereto, riding on a richly caparisoned pony, or sitting in a fine palankeen carried on the shoulders of four or more men. He is allowed to use one or several gold umbrellas, which are held opened over his head. During the triumphal march, he is preceded by a long line of men and women, attired in their richest dresses, carrying a large quantity of presents destined for the use of the inmates of the Kiaong (such is the general name given to all the houses of the Brotherhood in Burmah) the young postulant is to reside in. The procession in this stately order, attended with a band playing on various musical instruments, moves on slowly and circuitously through the principal streets of the town, towards the monastery that has been fixed upon. This display of an ostentatious pomp is, on the part of the parents and relatives, an honor paid to the postulant who generously consecrates himself to so exalted a calling; and on the part of the youth, a last farewell to worldly vanities. He has no sooner descended from his splendid conveyance and crossed the threshold of the Kiaong, but he is delivered by his parents, into the hands of the Superior, and placed under his care. His head is instantly shaved; he is stripped of his fine secular dress, and habited in the plain and humble yellow garb; he must lay aside every sort of ornament, and remain contented with the unassuming simplicity, becoming his new position. The Kiaong is to become his home, and its inmates are substituted in the room of his father and mother, brothers and sisters.

The duty of the young Shyin is to minister to the wants of the elders of the house, to bring and place before them, at fixed times, the usual supply of water, the betel box, and the daily food; to attend them on some pious errand through the town, or the country. A portion of his time is devoted to acquiring the art of reading and writing, and occasionally the elements of arithmetic. There are five general precepts obligatory to all men; but the Shyin is bound to the observance of five additional ones, making ten altogether, by which he is forbidden—1st, to kill animals; 2nd, to steal; 3rd, to give himself up to carnal pleasures; 4th, to tell lies; 5th, to drink wine or other intoxicating liquors; 6th, to eat after midday; 7th, to dance, sing, or play on any musical instrument; 8th, to color his face; 9th, to stand on elevated places, not proper for him; 10th, to touch or handle gold or silver.*

* In glancing over the latter part of Buddha's life, the reader has seen that the less important points of discipline have been the subject of much discussion, in the early days of Buddhism. Among those points of dispute and contention, were the last five articles above enumerated. The second Council was assembled for the purpose of settling warm disputes which distracted the Buddhist. Thanga or Assembly, and caused great disturbances. The venerable Rasa, who lived in Wethalee, a city situated on the Gonduck, north of Hajipoor, undertook a long journey, as far as Kosamle, for the express purpose of warning the Religious of that country against the dangerous innovations which were introduced by a considerable body of Brahans, belonging to the eastern districts of Wethalee.

The journey was certainly a long one, in a western direction. The ruins of the famous city of Kosambl have been discovered at a place called Kosam, thirty miles above Allahabad, on the Jumna. They are most extensive and indicate at once the importance that place must have had in the days of its prosperity. A broken pillar, the polished shaft of which must have measured 34 feet, is covered with inscriptions; it is one of the most important Buddhist relics. It is probably one of those pillars erected by Athoka in every part of his extensive dominions. It bears no inscription more ancient than the 2nd and 3rd century of the Christian era. A similar one was erected at Prayag, an ancient city mentioned by Hwen Tisang, as being situated at the confluence of the Ganges and the Jumna, and finally destroyed by the gradual encroachments of the rivers. The place remained abandoned, until the days of the Emperor Akbbar, who built a fort called Bhahbas. The new city has received the name of Allahabad from the Emperor Shah Jehan. The famous pillar called the Allahabad pillar bears three inscriptions. The first is that of Asoka, 240 years B.C., recording
NOTICE ON THE BUDDHIST MONKS.

The trespassing of the five first precepts is visited with expulsion from the Kiaoong; but that of the five last, may be expiated by a proper penance.

The young Shyins, as before observed, do not remain in the Kiaoong beyond the period of one or two years; they generally leave it and return to a secular life. There are however some of them, who, fond of the easy and quiet life of Talapoins, or actuated by other motives, prefer remaining longer in those places of retirement. They be- take themselves to the study of the duties, rules and obligations of the professed members of the society; they pay more attention to the reading of religious books, and endeavour to obtain the required qualifications. Being sufficiently instructed on all these points, and having attained the age of twenty years, they are solemnly admitted among the professed members of the brotherhood, under the name of Patzin. The interesting ceremonies observed on the occasion shall be hereafter fully described. The state of Patzin is, therefore, properly speaking, that of Phongyie, though that name is sometimes reserved to him who is the head of a monastery. Every other step or promotion in the hierarchy, is purely honorific, in so far that it does not impose upon him who is so promoted, any new duty or obligation, different from what is obligatory on every professed member; but it confers a power or jurisdiction for commanding, controlling and governing all the Brethren under his care. In virtue of such distinctions, a superior, how high soever his rank may be, is bound to the observance of the same rules, duties, and obligations, as the last Patzin; his sacred character is not enlarged or altered; he is only entrusted with a certain amount of jurisdiction over some of his brethren.

The Talapoin is bound to his community, so that in every Kiaoong or House of the Order, there are ordinarily to be met several Patzins, and a good number of Shyins. Each Kiaoong has a chief who presides over the community, under the appellation of Tsaya, or, as is more often the case, under that of Phongyie. He is, in most instances, the nominee of the individual who has built the monastery, and who is vested with a kind of right of patronage, to appoint whom he likes to be the Head of the house he has erected. He who is the head of the house, has power over all the inmates, and every one acknowledges him as his immediate superior. He has the management of all the little affairs of the community, enforces the regular observance of the rules and duties of the profession, corrects abuses, rebukes the trespassers, spurs the lazy, excites the lukewarm, keeps peace and maintains good understanding amongst his subordinates. He receives, in his official character, the pious visitors who resort to his monastery, either for the sake his edicts for the propagation of Buddhism; the second is that of Sumudra Gupta, in the 2nd century of our era, commemorating his extensive dominions; the third is that of Jehangir, mentioning his accession to the throne. The last resetting up of this famous pillar took place in 1838.

of making voluntary offerings, presenting him with some tokens of their respect for, and admiration of, his eminent sanctity, or for conversing with him on some religious subjects, which, let it be said quietly, out of deference to human frailty, sometimes make room for those of a worldly character. If the alms-givers or advice-seekers, belong, as it often happens, to the fair and devout sex, they must remain at a distance of six or twelve cubits, as the place may allow, from their pious adviser. It is supposed that a nearer proximity might endanger the virtue of the holy Recluse.

In every town a considerable number of Kiaongs are found, either in the suburbs or within the walls, in a quarter reserved for the purpose. In every village the Kiaong is to be met with, as the parson’s house in our villages of Europe. The poorest place is not without a small, and how humble soever, house for the Phongyie who resides there, if not during the whole year, at least during the rainy season. One or several dzedis, a sort of flag-staff, painted, with some of its parts gilt, bearing the emblem of the sacred bird Henza, or brahminical duck, at three fourths of its height, from which hang down, gracefully, several streamers, and a grove of fruit trees, indicate to the traveler the habitation,—sometimes humble, sometimes stately,—with its superposed three roofs, where dwell the Rahans. The Kiaong is also a place where the traveler is well received and can stay for a day or two. During the dry season, when there are few boys remaining with the Phongyies, it is a place much safer than the Dzeats. The inmates are generally very glad to receive strangers, who, by their conversation, afford them some moments of pleasant diversion to the habitual monotony of their life. These various communities are placed under the jurisdiction of a general superior or a provincial, named Tsaia-dau, or great master; they form, under his authority, a province of the Order; a division much similar to that of several religious Orders in Europe. He enjoys a large share of public respect and veneration. His Kiaong outshines the others in splendour and decorations. The first and wealthiest inhabitants of the place are proud to call themselves his disciples and supporters, and to supply him liberally with all that he may require. His chief duty is to settle disputes that not unfrequently arise between rival communities. The demon of discord often haunts those abodes of peace and retirement. The authority of the Provincial interferes to put down feuds and contentions which envi and jealousy, the two great enemies of devotees, not unfrequently excite. When a Talapoin is accused of incontinence or other serious infringement of the vital rules of the profession, he is summoned to the tribunal of the Tsaya-dau, who, assisted and advised by some elders, examines the case and pronounces the sentence. Superior intellectual attainments do not appear to be the essential qualifications for obtaining this high dignity. The writer has met with two or three of these dignitaries, who, in his opinion, were vastly inferior to many of their subordinates, in talents and capacity. They were old and good-natured men, who had spent almost all their lives within the precincts of the monastery. Their
ren of inferior grade.

In the kingdom of Ava, the key-stone of the Talapoinic fabric, is the superlatively great master residing in the capital or its suburbs.
His jurisdiction extends over all the fraternity within the realm of his Burmese Majesty. His position near the seat of Government, and his capacity of king's master, or teacher, must have at all times conferred upon him a very great degree of influence over all his subordinates.
He is honored with the eminent title of Tha-thana pain, meaning that he has power and control over all that appertains to Religion. It does not appear that peculiarly shining qualifications or high attainments are required in him who is honored with such a dignity. The more accidental circumstance of having been the king's instructor when he was as yet a youth, is a sufficient, nay, the only necessary recommendation for the promotion to such a high position. Hence it generally happens that each king, at his accession to the throne, confers the highest dignity of the order, to his favorite Phongyie. In that case, the actual incumbent has to leave the place to his more influential brother, and becomes an ordinary member of the fraternity, unless he prefers leaving the society altogether, and re-entering into the lay condition. Great indeed is the respect paid by the king to the head Phongyie. When on certain days of worship, he is invited to go to the palace, and deliver some instructions to his majesty, the proud monarch quits the somewhat elevated place he occupies, and takes one almost on a level with that of the courtiers, whilst the venerable personage goes to sit on the very same carpet just vacated by the king.
When he happens to go out to visit some monasteries, or places of worship, he is generally carried on a gilt litter, in great state, attended by a large number of his brethren, and a considerable retinue of laymen. During the passage, marks of the greatest respect are given by the people. The monastery he lives in, is on a scale of splendor truly surprising. Its form and appearance are similar to that of other religious houses, but in variety and richness of decorations it surpasses them all. It is entirely gilt both out and inside; not only the posts are covered with gold leaves, but often they are inlaid with ru-bies which I suppose are of the commonest description and of little value.

To confer an additional sacredness to his person and position, the Tha-thana-pain lives by himself, with but one or two Phongyies, whom we may consider as his secretaries or major-domos, who remain in an apartment, near to the entrance, to receive visitors and usher them into the presence of the great personage. Besides, there are lay guardians who take a good care that not the least noise should ever disturb the silence of the place.

When the writer visited, for the first time, that dignitary, he was much amused on the approach to the place, to meet with those mute guardians, who by all sorts of signs and gestures were endeavoring to make him understand that he must walk slowly and noiselessly, and beware to speak aloud. When admitted to the presence of the Tsaya- dan, he was not a little surprised to find a man exceedingly self-conceited, who thought that to him alone belonged the right of speaking; his language was that of a master to whom no one was expected to presume to offer the least contradiction. He appeared quite offended, when his visitor was compelled to dissent from him on certain points brought forward during the conversation. He was then about fifty years old. He was, for a Burman, of a tall stature, with regular and handsome features. The face was a little emaciated, as becomes a monk. His spiritual pride cast a darkish and unpleasant appearance on his person. He spoke quickly and sententiously; appearing all the while scarcely noticing his interlocutor. Admiration of self and van- ty pierced through the thin veil, which his affected humility spread over his countenance. The writer left him with an impression very different from that a worthy English Envoy, in the end of the last century, entertained of a similar personage, whose mild, benign, and pious exterior captivated him to such an extent as to elicit from him a request to be remembered in his prayers.

In our days, the power of the Tha-thana-paing is merely nominal; the effects of his jurisdiction are scarcely felt beyond his own neighbor- hood. Such, however, was not the case in former times. Spiritual commissioners were sent yearly by him, to examine into, and report on, the state of the communities throughout the provinces. They had to inquire particularly whether the rules were regularly observed or not, whether the professed members were really well qualified for their holy calling or not. They were empowered to repress abuses, and whenever some unworthy brother, or black sheep, was found within the enclosure of a monastery, he was forthwith degraded, stripped of the yellow garb, and compelled to assume a secular course of life. Unfortunately for the welfare of the Order, those salutary visits no more take place; the wholesome check is done away with. Left without a superior control, the Order has fallen into a low degree of abject- ness and degradation. The situation of Talapoins is often looked upon now as one fit for lazy, ignorant, and idle people, who, being anxi- ous to live well and do nothing, put on the sacred dress for a certain time, until, tired of the duties and obligations of their new profession, they retire and betake themselves anew to a secular life. This prac- tice as far as my observation goes, is pretty general, if not almost universal. There are, however, a few exceptions. Though laboring un- der many serious disadvantages, the society continues to subsist with all its exterior characteristics; the various steps of its hierarchy are as well marked and defined now as they were before, under more favor- able circumstances. Its framework remains entire; but the materials composing it are somewhat imperfect and unsound.

There is in that religious body a latent principle of vitality, that keeps it up and communicates to its place an amount of strength and energy that have hitherto maintained it in the midst of wars, revolutions and political convulsions of all descriptions. Whether supported or not by the ruling power, it has remained always firm and unchanged. It is impossible to account satisfactorily for such a phenomenon, unless we find a clear and evident cause of such an extraordinary vitality; a cause independent of ordinary occurrences, time, and circumstances; a cause deeply rooted in the very soul of the populations, that exhibit before the observer this great and striking religious feature. That cause appears to be the strong religious sentiment, the firm faith that pervades the masses of Buddhists. The laity admire and venerate the Religious, and voluntarily and cheerfully contribute to their maintenance and welfare. From its ranks, the religious Body is constantly recruited. There is scarcely a man that has not been a member of the fraternity for a certain period of time.

Surely such a general and continued impulse could not last long, unless it were maintained by a powerful religious conviction. The members of the Order preserve, at least externally, the decorum of their profession. The rules and regulations are tolerably well observed; the grades of hierarchy are maintained with a scrupulous exactitude. The life of the Religious is one of restraint and perpetual control. He is denied all sorts of pleasures and diversions. How could such system of self-denial be ever maintained, were it not for the belief that the Rahans have in the merits that they amass, by following a course of life which after all, is repugnant to nature? It cannot be denied that human motives often influence both the laity and the Religious; but divested of faith and of the sentiments inspired by even a false belief, their action could not produce, in a lasting and persevering manner, the extraordinary and striking fact we witness in Budhistic countries.

ARTICLE IV.

ORDINATION, OR CEREMONIES OBSERVED AT THE ADMISSION INTO THE SOCIETY.

We will now explain rather minutely, and describe as accurately as possible, the various ceremonies performed on the occasion of the promotion of a Shyin to the rank of Patzin, or professed member. It must be borne in mind that this ordeal through which he has to pass, or ordination as we may aptly perhaps term it which he has to receive, does not confer any peculiar character, or give any special spiritual power to the admitted Candidate; but it merely initiates him to a more perfect course of life, and makes him the member of a society composed of men aiming at a higher degree of sanctity or perfection. The incumbent must be provided, for the ceremony, with a dress such as is used in the community; he ought to be found exempt from certain moral and physical defects that would render him unworthy of being admitted a member of the Order; he ought to pledge himself to a rigorous observance of certain regulations which form the constitutions of the society.

The place where the ceremony is to be performed is a hall, measuring at least twelve cubits in length, not including the space occupied by the Rahans whose presence is required on the occasion. The assembly of Phongyies, or Rahans, must include 10 or 12 members at least, if the ceremony be performed in towns, and 4 or 6, if it be in the country. He who presides over the ceremony, is called Upitze, meaning master or guide; he has an assistant, named Cambawa Tsaiia, whose office it is to read the sacred Cambawa, or book of ordination; to present the Candidate to the Upitze and his assembled brethren, to put to him the requisite questions as prescribed by the ritual, and to give him instructions on certain points, the ignorance of which would prove highly prejudicial to, and greatly offensive in, a professed member of the Order. All the regulations prescribed and the ceremonies observed on the occasion, are contained in a book written in Pali, the sacred language. This book may be aptly termed the Ritual of the Buddhists. It is held in great respect, and some copies written on sheets of ivory, with guilt edges, are truly beautiful and bespeak the high value Buddhists set on the work. The copyists have retained the use of the old square Pali letters, instead of employing the circular Burmese characters. All the ordinances and prescriptions in this book are supposed to have been promulgated and sanctioned by no less an authority than Gaudama himself, the last Budha and the acknowledged originator and founder of the Talapoinic Order. Hence the high respect and profound veneration all Buddhists bear to its contents. The Candidate, previously to the beginning of the ceremony, must be provided, as aforesaid, with his Patta, or mendicant's pot, and a Tsiwaran, the clerical dress, or Monkish habit. The Patta is an open mouthed pot of a truncated spheroidal form, wherein each member of the brotherhood must receive the alms which, every morning, he goes to collect in the streets.

The Tsiwaran or yellow* garment, the only dress becoming a Rahan, is composed first, of a piece of cloth bound to the loins with a leathern girdle and falling down to the feet; second, of a cloak of a rectangular form, covering the shoulders and breast and reaching somewhat below the knee; and third, of another piece of cloth of the same shape, which is folded many times and thrown over the left shoulder, the two ends hanging down before and behind. Another article, always required for completing a full dress of the Rahan, is the

* Among southern Buddhists, preference is given to the yellow color, for the Monk's habit. The juice extracted from the Jack-tree wood, by the process of boiling, supplies the necessary ingredient for dyeing.
Awana, a sort of fan made of palm leaves, set in light oval-shaped wooden frame with a serpentine handle, somewhat resembling in appearance the letter S.

The Burmese translator of the Pali text has interpolated his work with many remarks tending to elucidate the text and to shew the various motives and reasons that have induced Gaudama to decree and publish as obligatory the regulations laid down in the sacred Cambawa. It must be borne in mind too, that the omission of some essential parts of the ceremonies, annuls de facto the ordination, whilst the non-compliance with others of minor importance, though not invalidating the act of admission into the sacred family, entails sin upon all members of the brotherhood, assembled ex-officio for the ceremony. The reader must be prepared to observe many points of close resemblance between the ceremonies observed at the reception of a monk, or the ordination of a Priest, and those performed in these parts, on the solemn occasion of admitting a Candidate to the dignity of Patzin.

The preparations for the solemnity being completed and the assembled fathers having occupied their respective seats under the presidency of the Upitze, the Candidate is introduced into their presence attended by the Assistant or reader of the Cambawa, and carrying his Patta and yellow garments. He is enjoined to repeat distinctly thrice the following sentence to the Upitze, kneeling down, the body bent forward, with his joined hands raised to the forehead: “Venerable President, I acknowledge you to be my Upitze.” These words having been three times repeated, the Assistant addressing himself to the Candidate says: “Dost thou acknowledge this to be thy Patta, and these, thy sacred vestments?” To which he audibly answers, yes.”

Thereupon, the translator remarks that on a certain day, a Rahan that had been ordained without being supplied with either Patta or Tsawaran, went out quite naked, and received into the palms of his joined hands the food offered to him. So extraordinary, one would have said so unedifying a proceeding, having been mentioned to Gaudama, he ordered that thenceforward no Rahan should ever be ordained, unless he had been previously interrogated regarding the Patta and the vestments. Any disobedience to this injunction would entail sin on the assembled fathers.

The Assistant having desired the Candidate to withdraw from the assembly to a distance of twelve cubits, and the latter having complied with his request, he turns towards the assembled fathers and addresses them as follows:—Venerable Upitze and you brethren herein congre-gated, listen to my words! the Candidate who now stands in a humble posture before you, solicits from the Upitze the favor of being honored with the dignity of Patzin. If it appears to you that everything is properly arranged and disposed for this purpose, I will duly admonish him. O Candidate, be attentive unto my words, and beware lest, on this solemn occasion, thou utterest an untruth or concealest aught from our knowledge. Learn that there are certain incapacities and defects which render a person unfit for admittance into our order. Moreover, when before this assembly thou shalt be interrogated respecting such defects, thou art to answer truly, and declare what incapacities thou mayest labor under. Now this is not the time to remain silent and decline thy head; every member of the assembly has a right to interrogate thee, at his pleasure, and it is thy bounden duty to return an answer to all his interrogations.

Candidate, art thou affected with any of the following complaints, the leprosy or any such odious maladies? Hast thou the scrofula or other similar complaints? Dost thou suffer from asthma or coughs? Art thou afflicted with those complaints that arise from a corrupted blood? Art thou affected by madness or the other ills caused by giants, witches, or evil spirits of the forests and mountains? To each separate interrogation he answers: “From such complaints and bodily disorders, I am free.” “Art thou a man?” “I am,” “Art thou a true and legitimate son?” “I am.” “Art thou involved in debts?” “I am not.” “The bounden man and underling of some great man?” “No, I am not.” “Have thy parents given consent to thy ordination?” “They have given it.” “Hast thou reached the age of twenty years?” “I have attained it.” “Are thy vestments and sacred Pattra prepared?” “They are.” “Candidate, what is thy name?” “My name is Wago,” meaning, metaphorically, a vile and unworthy being. “What is the name of thy Master?” “His name is Upitze.”

The Assistant, having finished the examination, turns his face towards the assembled fathers, and thus proceeds: “Venerable Upitze, and ye assembled brethren, be pleased to listen to my words. I have duly admonished this Candidate, who seeks from you to be admitted into our order. Does the present moment appear to you a meet and proper time that he should come forward? If so, I shall order him to come nearer.” Then turning to the Candidate, he bids him to come close to the assembly and to ask their consent to his ordination. The order is instantly complied with by the Candidate who, having left behind him the distance of 12 cubits that separated him from the fathers, squats on his heels, the body bending forward and the hands raised to his forehead, and says: “I beg, 0 fathers of this assembly, to be admitted to the profession of Raham. Have pity on me, take me from the state of layman, which is one of sin and imperfection, and advance me to that of Rahan, a state of virtue and perfection." These words must be repeated three times.

* The writer does not think it worth repeating the reasons that induced Gandama to lay down those several regulations. They owe their origin to the fact that some individuals contrived to be ordained, though laboring under physical defects, and, thereby, became a sort of standing disgrace to the society. It was at the request of his father that Budha forbade the receiving to the order of sons who had not the consent of the parents, and fixed twenty years as the age requisite in him who would offer himself for the promotion to the order of Patrin. No slave, no debtor, could be ordained, because man in such a condition, does not belong to himself and cannot dispose of his person, which to a certain extent, is the property of his master and Creditor.

The Assistant then resumes his discourse as follows: O ye fathers here assembled, hear my words! This Candidate, humbly prostrated before you, begs of the Upitze to be admitted into our holy profession; it seems that he is free from all defects, corporeal infirmities, as well as from mental incapacities, that would otherwise debar him from entering our holy state; he is likewise provided with the Patta and sacred vestments; moreover, he has asked, in the name of the Upitze, permission of the assembly to be admitted among the Rahans. Now let the assembly complete his ordination. To whomsoever this seems good, let him keep silence; whosoever thinks otherwise, let him declare that this Candidate is unworthy of being admitted." And these words he repeats three times. Afterwards he proceeds: "Since, then, none of the fathers object, but all are silent, it is a sign that the assembly has consented; so, therefore, be it done. Let therefore this Candidate pass out of the state of sin and imperfection, into the perfect state of Rahan, and thus, by the consent of the Upitze and of all the fathers, let him be ordained."

And he further says: "the fathers must note down under what shade, on what day, at what hour, and in what season, the ordination has been performed."

This being done, the reader of the sacred Cambawa adds: "Let the Candidate attend to the following duties, which it is incumbent on him to perform, and to the faults hereafter enumerated which he must carefully avoid.

"1. It is the duty of each member of our brotherhood to beg for his food with labor, and with the exertion of the muscles of his feet; and through the whole course of his life he must gain his subsistence by the labor of his feet. He is allowed to make use of all the things that are offered to him in particular, or to the society in general, that are usually presented in banquets, that are sent by letter, and that are given at the new and full moon, and on festivals. O Candidate, all these things you may use for your food." To this he replies, "Sir, I understand what you tell me."

The Assistant resumes his instructions: "2nd. It is a part of the duty of a member of our society to wear, through humility, yellow clothes, made of rags thrown about in the streets, or among the tombs. If, however, by his talents and virtue, one procures for himself many benefactors, he may receive from them, for his habit, the following articles, cotton and silk, or cloth of red* and yellow wool." The elect answers, "as I am instructed so I will do.

* It is probable that the allusion to the red color, has a Thibetan origin. The Buddhist monks of that country have adopted the red for their dress, in preference to the yellow, which is the canonical color of the habit of all the monks among the southern Buddhists.

The instructor goes on: "3dly. Every member of the society must dwell in houses built under the shade of lofty trees.* But if, owing to your proficiency and zeal in the discharge of your duties, you secure to yourself powerful supporters, who are willing to build for you a better habitation, you may dwell in it. The dwellings may be made of bamboo, wood, and bricks, with roofs adorned with turrets or spires of pyramidal or triangular form." The Elect answers: "I will duly attend to these instructions."

"After the usual answer, the instructor proceeds: 4thly. It is incumbent upon an elect to use, as medicine, the urine of the cow, whereon lime and the juices of lemon or other sour fruits have been poured. He may also avail himself, as medicines, of articles thrown out of bazars and picked up in corners of streets. He may accept, for medicinal purposes, nutmegs and cloves. The following articles may also be used medicinally,—butter, cream, and honey."

Now the Assistant instructs the new Religious on the four capital offences he must carefully avoid, under penalty of forfeiting the dignity he has just attained to, and solemnly warns him against committing one of them. Those sins are, fornication, theft, murder, and spiritual

* In this part of the regulations, the Elect is reminded of the primitive condition of the Members of the Society. In imitation of their bro-thers of the Brahminical persuasion, and also for the purpose of living in seclusion, the Rahans, in the beginning, were satisfied with dwelling u nits, raised at the foot of some tall tree. As soon, however, as Buddhism gained footing in various countries, we see that kings, nobles, and wealthy persons vied with each other in erecting splendid houses for the use of the monks. Gautama himself was presented by King Pimpathara, at Radazgio, with the splendid Weloowon monastery. In Thawatte the rich man Anatapein offered him the famous Uzetzawon monastery; and the rich lady Withaka of the same country, gave him, as a gift, the no less splendid mans on, named Pouppayon.

General A. Cunningham has discovered the ruins of Thawattie, fifty-eight miles north of Fyzabad, on the Rapti, in a place called Sahet Mahet, situated between Akoona and Falampur, five miles from the former and twelve from the latter. It was the capital of King Pathemadi, situated in north Kosala. In the Legend of Budha, we have seen how that monarch was dispossessed from his throne by one of his sons, and died, while on his way to the capital of Adzathath, his son-in-law. The ruins of the renowned Uzetzawon monastery have been identified, by the means of the information supplied by the writings of the Chinese pilgrims we have often mentioned. The monastery was distant 1200 paces from the southern gate of the city. The scarcely 1 sa famous Pouppayon monastery was erected to the east of the Uzetzawon, 3 ounds of ruins in that very same direction leave no doubt that, in their bosom are entombed the last remains of that celebrated place. It is said that Gautama, being 55 years old, began to reside permanently in monasteries built for him, and that he spent, out of the last twenty-five seasons, nineteen in the Uzetzawon, and six in the Pouppayon. According to Hwen Thang, the place occupied by the Uzetzawon monastery was a square, having 1000 cubits on each face, or side. Besides the monastery, there were two temples and two tanks within the enclosure.
pride. The committing of one of these sins by Religious, after their ordination, in the days of Gaudama, induced him to declare de facto excluded from the society those who had been guilty of such offences; and he enjoined that the Assistant should immediately after the ceremony, solemnly admonish the newly ordained Patzin carefully to shun such odious offences.

The Assistant, without delay, proceeds as follows: "O Elect, being now admitted into our society, it shall be no longer lawful for you to indulge in carnal pleasures, whether with yourself or animals. He who is guilty of such sin, can no longer be numbered among the perfect. Sooner shall the severed head be joined again to the neck and life be restored to the breathless body, than a Patzin, who has committed fornication, recover his lost sanctity. Beware, therefore, lest you pollute yourself with such a crime.

"Again, it is unlawful and forbidden to an Elect to take things that belong to another, or even to covet them, although their value should not exceed about 6 annas (\(\frac{1}{4}\) of a tical.) Whoever sins, even to that small amount, is hereby deprived of his sacred character, and can no more be restored to his pristine state, than the branch, cut from the tree, can retain its luxuriant foliage and shoot forth buds. Beware of theft during the whole of your mortal journey.

"Again, an Elect can never knowingly deprive any living being of life; or wish the death of any one, how troublesome soever he may prove. Sooner shall the cleft rock re-unite so as to make a whole, than he, who kills any being, be re-admitted into our society. Cautiously avoid so heinous a crime.

"Again, no member of our brotherhood can ever arrogate to himself extraordinary gifts or supernatural perfections, or, through vain glory, give himself out as a holy man, such, for instance, as to withdraw into solitary places, and, on pretense of enjoying ecstacies like the Arians, afterwards presume to teach others the way to uncommon spiritual attainments. Sooner the lofty palm tree that has been cut down, become green again, than an Elect guilty of such pride, be restored to his holy station. Take care for yourself, that you do not give way to such an excess. The Elect replies, as before: 'As I am instructed; so I will perform.' Here ends the ceremony. The Elect joins the body of Rahans and withdraws in their company to his own Kiaong.

It has already been mentioned that this ceremony or ordination does not impart any spiritual character inherent in the person of the Elect; but it is a mere formality he has to go through, to enter into the family of the perfect. The admitted member is not linked indissolubly to his new state; he is at liberty to leave it when it pleases him, and re-enter into secular life. He may moreover, if inclined, apply for re-admission into the Order, but he must go through the same ceremonies that were observed on his first ordination. It is not very common to meet among the Burmese Rahans, men who from their youth have persevered to an old age in their vocation. Those form the rare exceptions. They are very much respected, and held in high consideration during their life-time, and the greatest honors are lavished upon their mortal remains after their demise. They are often designated by the honorable denomination of "pure from their infancy."

ARTICLE V.

RULES OF THE ORDER.

The obligations inherent in the dignity of Patzin, and the multifarious duties prescribed to the Buddhist monks, are contained in a book called Patimauk, which is, properly speaking, the manual of the Order, and the Vade Mecum of every Talapoin, who is obliged to study it with great care and attention. It is even ordered, that, on festival days, a certain number of Recluses shall meet in a particular place called Theirn, to listen to the reading of that book, or at least, a part of it, that every brother should have always present to his mind the rules and regulations of his profession, and be prompted to a strict observance of all the points they enforce. This injunction is a very proper one, since it is a fact confirmed by the experience of ages, that relaxation and dissipation find their way in all communities at the very moment the rules are partially lost sight of. So attentive to this duty are some Phongvies that they can repeat by heart all the contents of the Patimauk. We have read the book with a good deal of attention. Many wise and well-digested rules are to be met with here and there, but they are merged in a heap of minute, not to say ridiculous and childish, details, not worth repeating. In order, however, to give a correct and distinct outline of the mode of life, manners, habits, and occupations of the Talapoins, we will extract from it all that has appeared to be interesting and calculated to attain the above purpose, leaving aside the incongruous mass of useless rubbish.

Every member of the order, on his entering the profession, must renounce his own will and bend his neck under the yoke of the rule. So anxious indeed has been the framers of its statutes to leave no mom or field open to the independent exertions of the mind, that every action of the day, the manner of performing it, the time it ought to last, the circumstances that must attend it, have all been minutely regulated. From the moment a Rahan rises in the morning, to the moment he is to go to enjoy his natural rest in the evening, his only duty is to obey and follow the ever-subsisting will and commands of the founder of the society. He advances in perfection proportionately to his fervent compliance with the injunctions and to his conscientiously avoiding all that has been forbidden by the sagacious legislator. The trespassing of one article of the rule constitutes a sin. The various sins of a Rahan is liable to commit, are comprised under seven principal heads. 1st, the Paradzékas; 2d, the Thinga-de-ceits; 3d, the Patzéi; 4th, the Toolladzi; 5th, the Duka; 6th, the Dupaqi; and 7th, the Pati-de-kani. These seven kinds of sins are subdivided and multiplied to the number of 227, which constitute the total amount of sins either of commission or omission that a Phongvie may commit during the time that he remains a member of the holy society. The Paradzika are four in number: fornication, theft, killing, and vain-glory in attributing to one's self high attainments in perfection. A Recluse, on the day of his admission, is, as before related, warned never to commit these four sins, under the penalty of being excluded from the society. They are irremissible in their nature. The meaning of this is, He who has had the misfortune of yielding to temptation, and committing one of those four offences, is no longer to be considered as a member of the Thanga, or of the Assembly of the Perfect. He is de facto excluded from the society. He may exteriorly continue to be a member of the Thanga, but inwardly he really no longer belongs to it. All other offences are subjected to the law of confession, and can be expiated by virtue of the penances imposed upon the delinquent, after he has made a public avowal of his sins.

The reader will no doubt be startled by the unexpected information that the practice of confession has been established among the Talapoins, and is, up to this day, observed, though very imperfectly, by every fervent Religious. Some zealous Patzins will resort to the practice once and, sometimes, twice a day. Here is what is prescribed on this subject, in the Wini, or book of scriptures, containing all that relates to the Phongies, the Patimauk being but a compendium of it:
When a Rahan has been guilty of a violation of his rule, he ought immediately to go to his superior, and kneeling before him, confess his sin to him. Sometimes he will do this in the Thein, the place where the brothers assemble occasionally to speak on religious subjects or listen to the reading of the Patimauk in the presence of the assembly. He must confess all his sins, such as they are, without attempting to conceal those of a more revolting nature, or lessening aggravating circumstances. A penance is then imposed, consisting of certain pious formulas to be repeated a certain number of times during the night. A promise must be made by the penitent to refrain in future from such trespasses. This extraordinary practice is observed now, one would say, pro forma. The penitent approaches his superior, kneels down before him, and having his hands raised to his forehead, says: "Venerable superior, I do accuse here all the sins that I may be guilty of, and beg pardon for the same." He enters upon no detailed enumeration of his trespasses, nor does he specify anything respecting their nature and the circumstances attending them. The superior remains satisfied with telling him, "Well, take care lest you break the regulations of your profession, and thenceforward endeavor to observe them with fidelity." He dismisses him without inflicting any penance on him. Thus an institution, so well calculated to put a restraint and a check upon human passions, so well fitted to prevent man from occasionally breaking commands given to him, or at least from slumbering into the dangerous habit of doing it, is now, by the want of fervor and energy in the hands of that body, reduced to be no more than an useless and ridiculous ceremony, a mere shadow of what is actually prescribed by the Wini.

The punishments inflicted for the repeated transgressions of one or several points of the rule are, generally speaking, of a light nature, and seldom or never corporeal as flagellations, &c., &c. The superior sometimes orders a delinquent to walk through the court yard, during the heat of the day, for a certain time, to carry to a distance a certain number of baskets full of sand, or a jug of water. Meekness being a virtue most becoming a Recluse, forbids the resort to penances of a more severe nature.

Humility, poverty, self-denial, and chastity are to him who has received the order of Patzin cardinal and most essential virtues, which he ought to practice on all occasions. He must, in all his exterior deportment, give unequivocal marks of his being always influenced by the spirit they inspire. The framer of the rules and regulations of the Order seems to have had no other object in view but that of leading his brethren by various ways and means to the practice of these virtues, and inculcating on their minds the necessity of attending to the observances prescribed for this purpose. It is from this point we must view the statutes of the fraternity, in order to understand them well and rightly, and appreciate them according to their worth and merit. We would indeed form a very erroneous opinion of institutions of past ages if we were to examine them, to praise or blame them, without a due regard being paid to the spirit that guided the legislator, and to the object he aimed at when he laid them down. Our own ideas, customs, manners, and education will often dispose us to disapprove at first of institutions made in former ages, amongst nations differing from us in all respects, under the pretext that they are not such as we would have them to be now, making, unawares, our own prejudices the standard whereby to measure the merit or demerit of all that has been established previously to our own times. The institutions of the middle ages, a celebrated modern historian has said, are intelligible to him that has entered into the spirit of those days, and who thinks, feels, and believes as did the people of those by-gone centuries. This observation holds good, to a certain extent, and, mutatis mutandis, in respect to Buddhist institutions. The whole religious system must be understood, the object the founder of the order had in view, ought to be distinctly remarked and always borne in mind, ere we presume to pronounce upon the fitness or unfitness of the means he has employed for obtaining it.

For humility's sake every Talapoin is bound to shave every part of his body. In complying with this regulation he must consider that the hairs that are shaved off are useless things, serving merely for the purposes of vanity, and he ought to be as unconcerned about them as a great mountain which has been cleared of the trees on its summit.
Influenced by the same spirit, the Religious must always walk bare-footed, except in case of his laboring under some infirmity, or for some other good reason; he is then allowed to use a certain kind of plain and un-ornamented slippers; the shape, color, and dimensions of which are carefully prescribed by the rule. When the Rahans travel from one place to another, they are allowed to carry with them the broad fan made of palm-leaves, and a common paper umbrella to protect their bare head from the inclemency of the weather; or screen it from the heat of the sun. Their dress, consisting as above mentioned of three parts, is as plain as possible. According to the Patimauk, each separate part must be made of rags picked up here and there, and sowed together by themselves. This regulation, though disregarded by many, is to a certain extent observed by the greater number, but in a manner rather contrary to the spirit, if not to the letter, of the rule. On their receiving, from benefactors, a piece of silk or cotton, they cut it in several small square parts, which they afterwards contrive to have stitched in the best way they can, so as to make their vestments according to the prescription of the statutes. The vestment ought to be of one color, yellow in those countries in which Mahometanism does not prevail. The yellow color is a mark of mourning, as the black is amongst most of the nations of Europe.

Seven articles are considered as essential to every member of the holy family, viz: the kowot, thin-bain, dugout (the three pieces constituting his vestment,) a girdle, a patta, a small hatchet, a needle, and a small apparatus for straining the water he drinks. The whole number of articles he is permitted to use and possess, amount to sixty. They are all plain, common, almost valueless, offering no incentive to cupidity, and leaving him, who is only possessed of them, in the humble state of strict poverty.

The possession of temporal goods is strictly forbidden to the Rahans, as calculated to hinder them from meditating upon the law, and attending to the various duties of the profession. Nothing, indeed, opposes a stronger barrier to the attainment of the perfect abnegation of self and a thorough contempt for material things, than the possession of worldly property. Hence a true Rahan has no object which he can, properly speaking, call his own. The Kiaong wherein he lives has been built by benefactors, and is supplied by them with all that is necessary or useful to him. Food and raiment are procured for him, without his having to feel concerned about them. The pious liberality of his supporters assiduously provides for his wants. But it is expected that he shall never concern himself with worldly business or transactions of what nature soever they may be. He can neither labor, plant, traffic, nor do anything with the intent of deriving profit therefrom. Agreeably to the maxim "sufficient is to the day the evil thereof," the Rahan cannot make any stores for the time to come. He must trust in the never-failing generosity, and ever-watchful attention of his supporters for his daily wants. Now, let it be said to the
he places on them.

That he may be more effectually debarred from a too easy and frequent use of the things of first necessity, a Talapoin is bound to go through a tedious ceremony called Akat, or presentation, before he can licitly touch any thing. When he has occasion for food, drink, or anything else, he turns to his disciples and tells them to do what is lawful. Whereupon one of them or several, as circumstances may require, rise from their place, and taking the thing or things he wants with both hands, they approach him respectfully and present to him the articles, saying, This is lawful. Then the Rahan takes the things into his own hands, and uses them or lays them by as may suit his convenience. When a thing is presented, the disciple must be at a distance of some cubits, otherwise the recluse is guilty of a sin, and if what he receives is food, he commits as many sins as he eats mouthfuls. Gold and silver being the two greatest feeders of covetousness, the rule forbids the Phongyies to touch them, and, a fortiori, to have them. But on this point, however, human covetousness has broken through the strong barriers the framer of the statutes has wisely devised for effectually protecting Recluses from its dangerous allurement. Gold and silver are not, indeed, touched by the pious devotees, but the precious and dazzling metals are conventionally handed to the disciples, who put them into the box of the superior, who, whilst bowing obsequiously to the letter of the rule, disregards its spirit. Sometimes an innocent ruse is resorted to by a greedy Religious for silencing the remorse of his conscience; he covers his hands with a handkerchief and without scruple receives the sum that is offered to him. It would be unfair to pass a general and sweeping sentence of condemnation for covetousness upon all the members of the fraternity. There are some whose hands have not been polluted by the handling of money, and whose hearts have always been, we may say, strangers to the cravings of the auri sacra fames; but it cannot be denied that many among them are insatiable in their lust for riches, and not unfrequently ask for them.

No Rahan can ever ask for any thing; he is allowed to receive what is spontaneously offered to him. In this point, too, the spirit of the rule is frequently done away with. The Recluse will not ask an object he covets, (I beg his pardon for making use of such a term) in direct words; but by some indirect means or circuitous ways, he will give significantly to understand that the possession of such an object is much needed by him, and that the offering of it would be a source of great merits to the donor. In this manner he moves the heart of his visitor, and soon kindles in his breast a desire to present the thing, almost as eager as his own is to receive it.

Celibacy is strictly enjoined on every professed member of the soci-
ty. On the day of his reception, he is solemnly warned by the instructor never to do any thing contrary to that most essential virtue. The Founder of the Order and the framer of its statutes has entered, on this subject, into the most minute details and prescribed a multitude of regulations tending to fortify the Rahans in the accomplishment of the solemn vow they have made, and to remove from them all occasions of sin, even the most distant. We must give him credit for an uncommon acquaintance with the weakness of human nature, as well as with the violence of the fiercest passion of the heart, since he has labored so much to strengthen and uphold the former, and bridle the latter by every means his anxious mind could devise. He was deeply read in the secrets of the human heart, and knew well that the surest tactics for carrying on successfully the warfare between the spirit and the flesh, consist in rather avoiding carefully the encounter of the enemy, and skilfully manoeuvring at a distance from him, than in boldly encountering him in the open field. Hence the repeated injunctions to shun all the occasions of sin.

The Phongyies are forbidden to stay under the same roof, or to travel in the same carriage and boat, with women: they cannot receive any thing from their hands. To such a height are precautions carried that the Religious are not permitted to touch the clothes of a woman, or caress a female child, however young, or even handle a female animal.*

When visited in their dwellings by women who resort thither for the purpose of making offerings, or listening to the recital of a few passages or the sacred books, they must remain at a great distance of them and be surrounded by some of their disciples. The Phongyies are to look upon the old ones, as mothers, and upon the young, as sisters. The conversation must be as short as decency allows, and no useless or light expressions be ever uttered. On the festival days when crowds of people, men and women, go to the Kiaongs to hear the tara, or some parts of the law repeated, the Rahans, arrayed in front of the congregation, keep their fans before their faces all the while, lest their eyes should meet with dangerous and tempting objects. Much greater precautions are still required in their intercourse with the Rahanesses, a sort of female Reclines, whose institute is greatly on its decline in almost all parts of Burmah. For better securing the observance of continence, a Phongyie never walks out of his monastery, or enters a private dwelling, without being attended by a few disciples. Popular opinion is inflexible and inexorable on the point of celibacy, which is considered as essential to every one that has a pretension to be called a Rahan. The people can never be brought to look upon any person as a priest or minister of religion unless he live in that state. Any infringement of this most essential regulation on the part of a Rahan, is visited with an immediate punishment. The people of the place assemble at the Kiaoong of the offender, sometimes driving him out with stones. He is stripped of his clothes; and often, public punishment, even that of death, is inflicted upon him by order of government. The poor wretch is looked upon as an outcast, and the woman whom he has seduced, shares in his shame, confusion, and disgrace. Such an extraordinary opinion, so deeply rooted in the mind of a people rather noted for the licentiousness of their manners, certainly deserves the attention of every diligent observer of human nature. Whence has originated among corrupted and half-civilized men, such a high respect and profound esteem for so exalted a virtue?

* In treating of the precept of never touching women, it is added in the Wimi that this prohibition extends to one’s own mother; and even should it happen that she fall into a ditch, her son, if a Talapoin, must not pull her out. But in case no other aid is near at hand, he may offer her his habit, or a stick, to help her out; but at the same time he is to imagine that he is only pulling out a log of wood.
Why is its rigorous practice deemed essential to those who professedly tend to an uncommon degree of perfection? Owing partly to the weight of public opinion, and partly to some other reasons, the law of celibacy, externally at least, is observed with a great scrupulosity, and a breach of it is a rare occurrence. As the rule, in this respect, binds the Phongyie only as long as he remain in the profession, he who feels his moral strength unable to cope successfully with the sting of passion, prefers leaving the fraternity and returning to a secular life, when he can safely put an end, by a lawful alliance, to the internal strife, rather than exposing himself to a transgression which is to entail upon him consequences so disgraceful.

The sagacious legislator of the Budhist religious Order, pre-occupied with the idea of elevating the spiritual principle above the material one, and securing to reason a thorough control over bodily appetites, has prescribed temperance as a fundamental virtue, essential to every Rahan. In common with all their fellow religionists, the Rahans are commanded to abstain from the use of spirituous liquors and of in toxicating substances. Such a prohibition is the wisest step that Gaudama could have adopted to preserve his followers from the shameful vice of drunkenness. All uncivilized people make use of spirits for the sole purpose of creating in them the effects of intoxication. Were it not for such an excellent regulation, the members of the Thanga would soon become, by their excesses, the laughing stock of the laity. The time allotted for taking their meals extends from day-break to the mo-moment the sun has reached the middle of its course; but as soon as the luminous globe has passed the meridian, the use of food is strictly interdicted. A stomach, more or less loaded with nutritive substances taken in the evening, weighs down the body, enervates the energies of the soul, clouds the intellect, and renders a man rather unfit to devote himself to the high exercises of study, meditation, and contemplation, which ought to be the principal occupations of a fervent Rahan. He is allowed to make two meals in the forenoon; but it is expected that he will eat no more than is required to support nature. He must always take his meals in company with the members of his community.
To stifle the craving of gluttony and eradicate immoderate desires, he
eat this rice, not to please my appetite, but to satisfy the wants of nature; just as he says when he puts on the habit, "I dress myself, not for the sake of vanity, but to cover my nakedness." Rice and vegetables are, according to the statutes, the staple food of the Phongyes; the use of fish and meat is tolerated, and now it has become a daily prevailing custom which has rendered the practice a lawful one. Strictly speaking, a Talapoin must remain satisfied with rice and various sorts of boiled vegetables which he has received in his Patta during his morning perambulations through the streets of the place.

As it happened among the Romans that the law repressing convivial sumptuousness and luxury, proved an ineffectual barrier against gluttony and other passions, so amidst the Rahans, the strict regulations prescribing a poor and unsavory diet have been obliged to yield before the tendencies to satisfy the ever-increasing demands of appetite. Most of the Phongyes give to dogs or to the boys who live in the monastery, the vulgar food they have begged in the streets, and feed on aliment of better quality, supplied to them regularly by some persons in easy circumstances, who call themselves supporters of the Kiaoong and of its inmates. The ordinary fare consists of rice and several small dishes for seasoning the rice, in which are some little pieces of flesh, dressed according to the culinary abilities of the cooks of the country, which are not certainly of the highest order. To this are added some of the fruits of the season, accompanied by sweetmeats, which female devotees are wont, every where, so carefully to prepare and so fondly to offer to those who are the objects of their pious admiration and respect. The aliments supplied to the humble Recluses are of the best description for the country they live in. One would say, that they live on the fat of the land. The most delicate rice, and the finest fruits, invariably find their way to the monasteries. But, withal, the Phongies are not to be charged with the sin of intemperance or gluttony.

The quantity of food they may take, is also an object of regulation, as well as the very mode of taking and even of swallowing it. Each mouthful must be of a moderate size; a second ought not to be carried to the mouth before the first has been completely disposed of by the masticatory process, and found its way down through the oesophagus passage. The contrary would be considered as gluttony, and an evident sign that the eater has something else in view besides appeasing the mere wants of nature. It is rather an amusing sight to gaze at the solemn indifference of a Talapoin taking his meal. One would be tempted to believe that he is reluctantly submitting to the dire necessity of ministering to the wants of a nature too low and material. The rule forbids Talapoins to eat human flesh, or that of the monkey, snake, elephant, tiger, lion, and dog.* As a mitigation of the severity

* The Phongyes profess to have a tender compassion for the life of animals, and would not, on any account allow themselves to be suspected of having contributed to the killing of an animal, for the sake of feeding on his flesh. The writer has often taken a pleasure in taunting them on this ac-of the disciplinary regulation prohibiting the Recluses from taking any food from twelve o'clock in the day until the next morning, the use of certain beverages is permitted during that time, such as cocoa-nut water, the juice of the sugar-cane, and other refreshing draughts.

The rule being silent regarding the consumption of the betel leaf and other ingredients constituting the delicious mouthful for masticatory purposes, the Talapoins avail themselves largely of the liberty left to them on this subject. The quantity of betel and other accompanying substances, which they consume, is truly enormous. These articles hold a pre-eminent place amongst the objects that are presented to the inmates of monasteries. The dark red substance adhering to the teeth and occasionally accumulating at the corners of the mouth, the incessant motion of the lower jaw, the stream of reddish spittle issuing frequently from the lips of the Talapoins, are unquestionable proofs of both their ardent fondness and copious consumption of that harmless narcotic. Except during the short moments alloted for taking meals, a Rahan's mouth is always full of betel, and the masticating or chewing process is incessantly going on.

A great modesty must distinguish a member of the family of the perfect, from a layman: that virtue must shine forth in his countenance, demeanor, gait, and conversation. Any sign on his face indicating the inward action of anger or any other passion, is found unbecoming in a person whose composedness and serenity of soul ought never to be disturbed by any inordinate affection. He never speaks precipitately or loudly, lest it might be inferred that passion rather than reason influences him. Worldly or amusing topics of conversation are strictly interdicted, either with his brethren or laymen. The rule requires him to walk through the streets with affected simplicity; avoiding hurry as well as slowness, keeping his eye fixed on the ground in front, looking not farther than 10 or 15 cubits.

Curiosity tends to expand the soul on surrounding objects; but a Rahan's principal aim being to attend diligently to himself,—to prefer count, when he happened to see them eating pieces of boiled meat, by showing to them that their practice was little in accordance with their theory. They always answered that "they had not killed the animal, the flesh of which they were eating; but had merely received a piece of meat that had no life. As to the man who had deprived the animal of its life, he had certainly sinned and would suffer for his misdeed. But that was an affair for which the perpetrator of the deed was alone answerable, and which concerned him alone." To this answer, of a rather elastic nature, the writer jocosely replied, that "if there was no eater of meat there would be no killer of animals; and that, in his opinion, if sin there was, both had a share in it." Whereupon, the yellow-dressed interlocutors invariably laughed, and feeling that they stood on insecure ground, they adroitly changed the subject of conversation. There is no doubt that the Phengyies believe that it is sinful to kill animals, but at the same time they confess that it is difficult, nay almost impossible, to live in this world without committing such a trespass.
the care of self before all other cares, and to concern himself very little about all that takes place without,—he assiduously labors to keep his soul free from vain inquiry, from eager desire of hearing news, and from an idle or unnecessary interference in things or matters strange to him. It seems that he has the wise saying always present to his mind, "Where art thou when thou art not present to thyself? And when thou hast run over all things, what profit will it be to thee, if thou hast neglected thyself?" During his perambulations he never salutes or notices the persons he meets on his way; he is indifferent to the attentions and marks of the highest veneration paid to him by the people; he never returns thanks for offerings made to him, nor does he repay, with a single regard, the kindness proffered to him. Objects most calculated to awaken curiosity by their novelty and interest, ought to find him cold, indifferent, and unconcerned. His self-collection accompanies him every where, and disposes his soul to an uninterrupted meditation on some points of the law. It is a counsel of the Wini to observe particularly the four cleanliness, viz.: great modesty in the streets and public places, the confession of all failings, the avoiding of all occasions of sins, and the keeping oneself free from the seven kinds of sin. Such a wise injunction can only be attended to and observed, by keeping a vigilant watch over senses which are the very gates leading into the sanctuary of the soul. We could enter into fuller and more particular details regarding the regulations of the Talapoin Order, but they would prove little interesting, and only corroborate what has been previously stated, that every action of a brother, even the most common, such as the manner of sitting, rising up, sleeping, eating, &c., has become the object of the legislative attention of the Founder of the Order. Nothing seems to have escaped his clear foresight, and he has admirably succeeded in leaving no room for the exercise of individual liberty. The rule, is as a great moral being whose absolute commands must be always obeyed. Every individual is bound to lay aside his own self, and unconditionally follow the impulse of his guiding influence.

OCCUPATIONS OF THE BUDDHIST MONKS.

The whole life of a Recluse being confined within a narrow compass, we will have very little to say regarding his daily occupations. As soon as a Talapoin has left, at an early hour, the sleeping horizontal position, he rinses his mouth, washes his face, and recites a few formulas of prayers which he lengthens or shortens according to his devotion. He attires himself in his professional costume, gets hold of his mendicant's pot and sallies forth in company with some brethren or disciples, in quest of his food. He perambulates the streets in various directions, and without any solicitation on his part, receives the rice, curry, vegetables, and fruits which pious donors have been preparing from two to three o'clock in the morning, watching at the door of their houses the arrival of the yellow-clad monks. Having received what is considered sufficient for the day, he returns to the monastery and sets himself to eat either what he has brought or something more delicate and better dressed, which his supporter, if he has any, has sent to him.

On the principal festivals, or on extraordinary occurrences, abundant alms are brought to his domicile. Sometimes he is called by a pious donor to come and receive in the Pagodas, or in large temporary sheds erected for the purpose, reserved for the occasion. They consist chiefly of mattresses, pillow, hotel boxes, mats, tea-cups, and various articles he is allowed to make use of. On these occasions, he repays his benefactors by repeating to them the five great precepts, and some of the principal tenets of the Budhistic creed, and the chief points of the law. He enumerates, at great length, the numerous merits reserved to alms-givers. On this point, it must be confessed that he is truly eloquent, and his language flowing and abundant: his expressions are ready at hand, and most glowing, calculated to please the ears of his hearers and warm their souls to make fresh efforts in procuring him more copious alms. Occasionally he will recite long praises in honor of Gandama, the last Budha, for having, during his previous existence practiced eminent virtues, and thereby qualified himself for the high dignity of Phra. The sermon goes on, sometimes in Pali or sacred language, which neither he nor his nearers can understand.

The Phongyies are sometimes requested to visit the sick, not so much for the purpose of ministering to the spiritual wants of the sufferer, as for affording him some relief by his presence. It is believed that the appearance of a holy personage may have some effect in freeing the deceased from his distemper, and frightening the evil spirits, that may be the mischievous agents in harming patients. The visitor repeats over them, some points of the law that are intended to act as antidotes against the agency of the wicked one. Phongyies are very particular on the point of etiquette. When one of them has to enter into upper-storied houses, the yellow-habited Religious, previous to his venturing into the lower story, will make it sure that there is no one, and particularly no woman, in the upper apartments, as it would be highly unbecoming that any man, and, a fortiori, a woman, should have their feet above his head. To avoid such an indecorous contingency, in case the sick person lies in a room up stairs, the Phongyie has recourse to an expedient, few, I presume, would have thought of. By his direction, a ladder is brought, the lower part of which rests on the street, and the upper leans on one of the upper windows; up goes the pious visitor, who by such a contrivance, reconciles the observance of etiquette with the compliance to his duty. The writer confesses that he was much amused the first time that he witnessed such a feat performed at Pinang, by a Siamese Phongyie. The little crowd attracted by this novelty, exhibited a curious mixture of feelings. Some laughed; many remained silent; but their deportment was evidently indicative of the respect and admiration that inspired them to the scrupulously tender conscience of the Religious.

We must allow that the Talapoins confer a truly invaluable benefit upon the people of these countries by keeping up schools, where the boys resort for the purpose of learning to read, write, and acquire the rudiments of arithmetic. In this respect they are eminently useful, and the institution, though, to a certain extent, burdensome to the people, on this respect, deserves well of the country. The many abuses that at present attend it, are almost fully stoned by the great service its members gratuitously render to their countrymen. There are no other schools but those under their management. The tyrannical governments of Siam and Burmah do not take any steps to propagate instruction among their subjects, whom they look upon as slaves, fit only for bodily labour. The houses of Talapoins are so many little seats of elementary learning; and as they are very numerous throughout the country, every facility is afforded to male children, to learn to read and write. The female children are excluded from partaking of this great boon, by the strictness of the monastic regulations. It is a great misfortune, much to be lamented; as one half of the population is thus doomed to live in perpetual ignorance. Owing to the gratuitous education given by the Buddhist monks, there are very few men, throughout the breadth and length of Burmah, who are not able to read and write. It is true that, too often, the knowledge thus acquired is very superficial and incomplete. But as regards the other half of the population, it may be stated that scarcely a woman, among thousands, can be found capable of spelling one word.

The Talapoins being much addicted to sloth and indolence, the schools are undoubtedly miserably managed. The boys are often left to themselves without regular control or discipline. When a boy enters in the monastery as student, his teacher places into his hands a piece of blackened board, whereupon are written the first letters of the alphabet. The poor lad has to repeat over and over the name of the letters, crying aloud with all the powers of his lungs. He is left during several weeks on the same subject, until his instructor is satisfied that he knows his letters. In the next step, the boy is directed to study the symbols of the vowels, which are to be joined with consonants so as to form syllables and words. When this is done, he is initiated to the art of uniting together, and articulating properly, the several consonants with the symbolic characters. He slowly shapes his course through the apparently much-complicated system of all the combinations of letters, so as to be able to spell correctly all the words of the language. Owing to the lack of order and method, on the part of the teachers, boys spend a long time, sometimes one or two years, in mastering those difficulties, which if properly explained, would much shorten the time usually devoted to such a study.
The Burmese alphabet, and the various combinations of letters and symbols for making words, is based on a most perfect and scientific, methodical and simple process, borrowed from the Sanscrit. The method is plain and easy, as soon as it is understood. Any person that has received some education, and whose mind is somewhat developed, will be able, with the occasional assistance of an intelligent master, to go all over the various combinations in less than two months. The results derived from the method adopted by the Burmans are so great and complete, that after having gone over the general alphabet with attention, the beginner is able to read all the Burmese words he may meet with. We do not mean, of course, to say that he will be able to pronounce correctly every word. This is another thing altogether. But it is no less evident that the system used by Burmese in the combinations of letters, leads to results infinitely more satisfactory than those obtained through the systems of elementary reading and spelling used in Europe.

Unacquainted with the rules of Grammar, the teachers are incapable of imparting any sound knowledge of the vernacular language to their numerous pupils. Hence, writing, as far as orthography goes, is extremely imperfect; the spelling of words, having no fixed standard, varies to an indefinite extent. As soon as the scholars have mastered the difficulties of the long and complicated alphabet, some portions of the sacred writings are put into their hands for reading. The result is that the Burmese in general acquire some knowledge, more or less extensive, of their religious creed. Though none among them can be found who understands, comprehensively, the Buddhistic system, yet most of them are possessed of a certain amount of more or less limited information concerning Buddha, and his law. In this respect, they are perhaps ahead of many nominal Christians in several countries of Europe, who dwell in large manufacturing towns and remote country districts, and belong to the lower classes, and who live without even a slight acquaintance with the essential tenets of the Christian creed.

In addition to the eminently useful task of teaching youth, the Buddhistic Recluse devotes occasionally some portion of his time to the useful labor of copying manuscripts on palm leaves, either for his personal use, or to increase the small library of his monastery. The work is considered as a very excellent one, deserving of great merit, and much recommended by the rule of the society. It is a matter of regret that the native laziness of the Phongyies, as well as their total want of order in acquiring knowledge, thwart, to a great extent, the practical working of the wise provisions made by the framer of the rules. Were it not for such causes, copies of all the best and most interesting works on the religious system of Buddhism would be greatly multiplied, and could be easily procured; whilst now they are exceedingly scarce and hardly to be had at all. The few copies to be had with much difficulty, are to be paid for very high. All the books are made of palm leaves. The leaves are about twenty inches in length, and from three to four in breadth. On each face of the leaf, from seven to nine or ten lines are written. A copyist uses, for his pen, a style of iron. With the sharp point, he scratches the epidermis of the leaf to form the letters. In order to render the letters perfectly visible, he rubs over the page just written, with a piece of rag, some petroleum, which, penetrating into the parts scratched by the style, causes the letters to become quite distinct and apparent.

The Talapoins spend the best part of the day in sitting down in a cross-legged position, chewing betel and conversing with the many idlers that are always to be found in great numbers about their dwellings. When tired of the vertical position, they adopt the horizontal one, reclining the head on pillows and gently submitting to the soporific influence of good Morpheus. They have always in their hands a string of beads on which they are used to repeat certain devotional formulas. The most common is the following: "Aneitas, duka, anatta;" meaning that every thing in this world is subjected to the law of change and mutability, to that of pain and suffering, and to that of entire and uninterrupted illusion. There is, indeed, an immense field opened to a reflecting mind by these three very significative expressions, for carrying on serious and prolonged meditation; but none of the Talapoins, at least of those I have been acquainted with, are capable of understanding comprehensively, their meaning. They often repeat the forty great subjects of meditation, and the rule enjoins them to be zealously addicted to contemplation, which is pronounced to be the chief exercise of a true follower of Budha. But how can there ever be expected from weak and ignorant persons the habitual practice of so high an exercise, requiring an intellectual vigor of the very first order? They must repeat on their beads, at least a hundred and twenty times a day, the four following considerations on the four things more immediately necessary to men; food, raiment, habitation, and medicine: "I eat this rice, not to please my appetite, but, to satisfy the wants of nature. I put on this habit, not for the sake of vanity, but, to cover my nakedness. I live in this Kiang, not for vain glory, but, to be protected from the inclemency of the weather. I drink this medicine merely to recover my health, that I may, with greater diligence, attend to the duties of my profession."

ARTICLE VII.

RELIGIOUS INFLUENCE OF THE PHONGYIES—RESPECT AND VENERATION PAID TO THEM BY THE LAITY.

When we speak of the great influence possessed by the religious Order of Buddhist Monks, we do not intend to speak of political influence. It does not appear that in Burmah they have ever aimed at any share in the management or direction of the affairs of the country. Since the accession of the house of Alamphra to the throne, that is to say, during a period of above a hundred years, the history of Burmah has been tolerably well known. We do not recollect having ever met with one instance, when the Phongyies, as a body, have interfered in the affairs of the state. They likewise seem to remain indifferent respecting family or domestic affairs. The regulations they are subjected to, and the object they have in view in entering the religious profession, debar them from concerning themselves in affairs that are foreign to their sacred calling. But in a religious point of view alone, their influence is a mighty one. Upon that very Order hinges the whole fabric of Buddhism. From it, as from a source, flows the life that maintains and invigorates religious belief in the masses that profess that creed. We may view the members of the Order as Religious, and as instructors of the people at large, and principally of youth. In that double capacity, they exercise a great control and retain a strong hold over the mind of the people.

There is in man a natural disposition and inclination to admire individuals who, actuated by religious feelings, are induced to leave the world and separate from society in order to devote themselves more freely to the practice of religious duties. The more society is corrupted, the more its members value those persons who have the moral courage to estrange themselves from the centre of vice, that they may preserve themselves from contamination. In fact, Religious are esteemed in proportion to the extent of the contempt they have for this world. The Phongyies occupy precisely this position in the eyes of their con-religionists. Their Order stands in a bold relief over the society they belong to. Their dress, their mode of life, their voluntary denial of all gratification of sensual appetites, center upon them the admiring eyes of all. They are looked upon as the imitators and followers of Budha; they hold, ostensibly before ordinary believers, the pattern of that perfection they have been taught so fondly to revere. The Phongyies are as living mementos, reminding the people of all that is most sacred and perfect in practical religion. No one will deny that the view of a body of Religious existing in a community, keeping an intercourse with its members, must ever have a powerful tendency to foster religious feelings in the mind of a half-civilized people as the Burmese are. It is in this manner that the Phongyies command the respect and veneration of the people, and exercise a considerable amount of religious influence over the masses.

But in the capacity of instructors of the people, the members of the Order act, as yet, more directly and actively over the people. In Burmah there are no schools but those kept by the Religious. The monasteries are as so many little seminaries where male children receive elementary instruction. The knowledge that is imparted to them by their masters is not secular, but purely religious. It is a point upon which the undivided attention of a keen observer must be centered, in order to understand the full meaning of the following remarks. We do not mean to say that the instructor has always present to his mind, as a professor, the direct teaching of religious tenets; but the fact is that no information is conveyed to the pupils except that which comes from religious books. No other books are ever used in schools.

As soon as boys are able to read, religious books are put in their hands. During all the time they remain at school, they go over the books that have a direct reference to religion. They, without even being aware of it, imbibe religious notions, and become acquainted with some parts of the religious creed, particularly with what relates to Gaudama's preceding and last existence. When they grow up to manhood, if they happen to read, they have, as a general practice, no other books but such as have a reference to religion. When people assemble together either in the desks, on the occasion of festival days, or at home, on other public occasions, particularly in the days following the death of some relatives, one or several elders read some passage of their scriptures, and thereby supply topics for conversation of a religious turn. This state of things originates almost entirely from the early education received in the monasteries, at the hands of their masters the Phongyies. It powerfully contributes to popularize and foster religious notions, whilst it indirectly heightens and brightens in the eyes of the people, the position of the Religious.

Moreover, the early intercourse between the youth and their masters tends to bring, hereafter, in closer contact and union both the Religious and the laity. It draws nearer the ties that bind together these two fractions of the Buddhist society. The relations thus established between the teachers and the taught, is further strengthened by the fact that the greatest number of the male portion of the community become affiliated, during a longer or shorter period, to the society, and subjected to its rules and regulations; they are cast into the mould of Religious, and retain, during the remainder of their life, some of the features that have been, at an early period, stamped on their young mind. Their memory remains loaded with all that they have learned by heart, during the days they have spent in the monasteries, as students, or members of the Society.

Though the Phongyies or Talapoins are not remarkable for their zeal in delivering instructions or sermons to the people, they discharge occasionally that duty on the eve of, and during the, festival days, and on all occasions when considerable offerings are brought to them in their monasteries. Sometimes, too, they are requested to go to certain places prepared for that purpose, to deliver instructions and receive offerings tendered to them by some pious laymen. The preaching never consists in expounding the text of the religious books, and developing certain points of the law; it is a mere rehearsing and repetition of the precepts of the law, or of regular formulas in praise of Gaudama, and an enumeration of the merits to be gained by those who bestow alms on them. These and similar circumstances much contribute to keep up the position of the Religious and aid them to retain a powerful religious hold over their respective communities. We repeat it as our deliberate opinion, that upon the religious association under consideration, principally rests, as on a strong basis, the great fabric of Buddhism. Were such an institution to give way and crumble to the dust, the vital energies of that false creed would soon be weakened and completely paralyzed. Buddhism would yield before the first attack that would be skilfully and vigorously directed against it.

In Burmah the Phongyies are highly respected by every member of the community. When they appear in public, walking in the streets, they are the object of the greatest attention. The people withdraw before them to leave a free passage. Women are seen squatting on both sides of the way, through respect for the venerated personages. When visited in their dwellings, even by persons of the highest rank, the etiquette is; that every visitor should prostrate himself three times before the head of the monastery, uttering the following formula:—

"To the end of obtaining the remission of all the faults I have committed through my senses, my speech, and my heart, I make a first, second, and third prostration, in honor of the three precious things — Phra, his law, and the assembly of the perfect. Meanwhile I earnestly wish to be preserved from the three calamities, the four forms of punishment, and the five enemies."

To which the Recluse answers:—

"For his merit and reward, may he who makes such prostrations be freed from the four states of punishment, the three calamities, the five sorts of enemies, and from all evil whatsoever. May he obtain the object of all his wishes, walk steadily in the path of perfection, enjoy the advantages resulting therefrom, and finally obtain the state of Neibban." On the visitor withdrawing from his presence, the three prostrations must be repeated; he then stands up, falls back to a distance of ten feet, as it would be highly unbecoming to turn, suddenly, the back on the holy man, wheels round on the right and goes out. This usage is, doubtless, very ancient, and is, at the same time, looked upon as a very important one. In the Life of Gaudama, we have seen it mentioned on all occasions, where visitors went to pay their respects to him. Princes and Nobles observed the ceremony with the utmost punctuality.

The best proof of the high veneration the people entertain for the Talapoins, is the truly surprising liberality with which they gladly minister to all their wants. They impose upon themselves great sacrifices, incur enormous expenses, place themselves joyfully into narrow circumstances, that they might have the means to build monasteries with the best and most substantial materials, and adorn them with all the luxury the country can afford.* Gold is often profusely used for

* The writer when he visited Bhamo two years ago, had the opportunity of witnessing a striking illustration of the above assertion. Living in a fine and substantial dārā, in the vicinity of a large Pagoda, he remarked an elderly Burmese woman, coming every morning with some flowers which she respectfully deposited in front of a niche tenanted by a huge marble gilding the posts, ceiling, and other parts of the interior, as well as several trunks or chests for storing up manuscripts. Two or three roofs superposed upon each other, (a privilege exclusively reserved to royal palaces, pagodas, and kiaongs) indicate to the stranger that the building is a monastery. The Recluse's house is well supplied with the various articles of furniture becoming the pious inmates. The individual who builds, at his own expense, such a house, assumes the much envied title of Kiaong-taga, or supporter of a monastery. This title is forever coupled with his name; it is used as a mark of respect by all persons conversing with him, and it appears in all papers or documents which he may have to sign. The best, finest, and most substantial articles, if allowed by the regulations as fit for the use of the Talapoins, are generously and abundantly afforded by benevolent persons. When the king is religiously inclined, the best and most costly presents he receives, are deposited in the monasteries, to adorn the place or hall where is the principal idol.

Government does not interfere or give any assistance in building pagodas or kiaongs; nor does it provide for the support of the pious Rahans: but the liberality of the people amply suffices for all contingencies of the kind. When a man has made some profit by trading, or any other way, he will almost infallibly bestow the best portion of his lucre in building a Kiaong, or feeding the inmates of a religious house for a few months, or in giving general alms to all the Recluses of the town. Such, by no means an uncommon liberality, has its root, we believe, in a strong religious sentiment, and also in the insecurity, may the danger of holding property to a large amount.

When a Talapoin is addressed by a layman, the latter assumes the title of disciple, and the former calls him simply Taga, or supporter. The attitude of the layman in the presence of the Phongvye, is indica-idol. She was poorly dressed, but her mien and countenance indicated that she had seen better days. Entering into conversation with her, the writer learned from her that she was the widow of a wealthy man who had been the principal writer of the Governor. Her husband had spent twelve thousand rupees in building the Pagoda in front of us and the dreat, and had just died when the work was completed, leaving to her and her only daughter nothing but the house they now dwelt in. She was without any means of support. Having been asked whether she did not feel some regret that nothing had been left for her subsistence, and whether she did not think her husband would have behaved better in bestowing one half of his money for religious purposes, and keeping the other half for the maintenance of his family, the old lady gently smiled, and said, without hesitation, or showing the least sign of repining, that her husband had acted very well and for the best; that she and her daughter, by their exertions, would always be able to support themselves in their humble and poor condition.

In many places, the traveller's eyes are attracted by the site of a lofty and roomy Kiaong, adorned with fine carvings. When he inquires about the individual whose pious liberality has erected that edifice, he is surprised and astonished to see him living in the poor and wretched house, which is pointed out to him.
tive of the veneration he entertains towards his person. He squats down, and he never addresses the yellow-dressed individual, without joining his hands in token of respect, and raising them up with a little motion indicative of intended prostration. As there is in Burmah a court-language, so there is a language, or rather a certain number of expressions, reserved to designate things used by Talapoins, as well as most of the actions they perform in common with other men, such as eating, walking, sleeping, shaving, &c. The very turn of the most common sentence, is indicative of respect when speaking to a Rahan. He is called Phra, the most honorific term the language can afford. His person is sacred, and no one would dare to offer him the least insult or violence. The influence of the Talapoin upon the people is considerable; in proportion to the great respect borne to his sacred character. So extraordinary has it been on certain occasions, that Phongyies have been seen, rescuing forcibly from the hands of the police, culprits on their way to the place of execution. No resistance, then, could be made by the policemen, without exposing themselves to the danger of committing a sacrilege, by lifting their hands against them, when such an occurrence takes place. The liberated wretches are then forthwith led to the next monastery. Their heads having been shaved, they are attired in the yellow garb, and their persons become at once sacred and inviolable.

The veneration paid to Talapoins during their life-time, accompanies them after their death. Their state is considered as one of peculiar sanctity. It is supposed that their very bodies, too, partake of the holiness inherent in their sacred profession. Hence their mortal remains are honored to an extent scarcely to be imagined. As soon as a distinguished member of the brotherhood has given up the ghost, his body is opened, the viscera extracted and buried in some decent place without any particular ceremony, and the corpse is embalmed in a very simple manner, by putting ashes, bran, and other desiccative substances into the abdominal cavity. It is then swathed with bands of linen, wrapped round it many times; and a thick coat of varnish laid upon the whole. On this fresh varnish, gold leaves are sometimes placed, so that the whole body from head to feet is gilded. When the people are poor and cannot afford to buy gold for the above purpose, a piece of yellow cloth is considered as the most suitable substitute. The body, thus attired, is laid in a very massive coffin, made, not with planks, but of a single piece of timber hollowed in the middle for receiving the earthly frame of the deceased. A splendid cenotaph, raised in the centre of a large building erected for the purpose, is prepared to support a large chest wherein the coffin is deposited. The chest is often gilded inside and outside, and decorated with flowers made of different polished substances of various colors. Pictures, such as native artists contrive to make, are disposed round the cenotaph. They represent, ordinarily, religious subjects. In this stately situation, the body remains exposed for several days, nay several months, until preparations are completed for the grand day of the funerals. During that period, festivals are often celebrated about it, bands of music are playing, and people resort in crowds to the spot for the purpose of making offerings to defray the expense to be incurred for the funeral ceremony. When the appointed day for burning the corpse is at last arrived, the whole population of the town will be seen flocking, in their finest dress, to witness the display of fire-works which takes place on the occasion of burning the corpse. A funeral pile of a square form is erected on the most elevated spot. Its height is about fifteen feet, and ends with a small room made for receiving the coffin. The corpse having been hoisted up and laid in the place destined for its reception, fire is set to the pile in a rather uncommon way. An immense rocket, placed at a distance of about forty yards, is directed towards the pile by means of a fixed rope guiding it thereto. Sometimes the rocket is placed on a huge cart and pushed in the direction of the pile. In its erratic and uncertain course, it happens occasionally that it deviates from its course, and plunges into the ranks of the crowd, wounding and killing those it meets. As soon as it comes in contact with the pile, the latter immediately takes fire by means of combustibles heaped for that purpose, and the whole is soon consumed. The few remaining pieces of bones are religiously collected and buried in the vicinity of some Pagoda. Here ends the profound veneration, amounting almost to worship, which Buddhists pay to their Recluses during their life and after their demise.

Two chief motives induce the sectaries of Budha to be so liberal towards the Talapoins, and to pay them so high a respect, viz., the great merits and abundant rewards they expect to derive from the plentiful alms they bestow upon them, and the profound admiration they entertain for their sacred character, austere manners, and purely religious mode of life. The first motive originates from interested views; the second, has its root in that regard men naturally have for persons who distinguish themselves from others by a more absolute self-denial, a greater restraint and control of their passions, a renunciation of licit pleasures and sensual gratifications from religious motives. According to the fundamental dogma of Budhism, any offering made to, or indeed any action done for, the benefit of a fellow-man, is deserving of reward during future existences, such as digging a well, building a resting-place, a bridge, &c.; but far more abundant are the merits resulting from presenting a Talapoin with one or several articles necessary to his daily use, as they increase proportionately to the dignity of the person to whom the things are offered. We may judge, from the following instance, of the plentiful harvest of merits: a supporter of Phongyies is promised to reap hereafter: He who shall make an offering of a mendicant's pot or Thabeit, shall receive as his reward, cups and other utensils set with jewels; he shall be exempted from misfortunes and calamities, disquietude and trouble; he shall get, without labor, all that is necessary for his food, dress, and lodging; pleasure and happiness shall be his lot; his soul shall be in a state of steadiness and tranquillity, and his passion for the sex shall be considerably weakened. The offering of other objects, secures to the donor wealth, dignity, high rank, pleasure, and an admittance into the fortunate countries or seats of the Nats, where are to be met with, and enjoyed, all the things calculated to confer on man the greatest sum of happiness. The people believe unhesitatingly all that is said to them on this respect, and they gladly strip themselves of many valuable things, in order to obtain and enjoy during coming existences, the riches and pleasures promised to them by their Rahans. The insecurity of property under tyrannical rulers, may operate to a certain extent, in determining people to part with their riches, and consecrate them to religious purposes, rather than to see themselves violently deprived of them by the odious rapacity of the vile instruments of the avarice, tyranny, and cruelty of their heartless princes and governors.

It can scarcely be a matter of wonder that Buddhists so much honor and respect a Talapoin, when we consider that, in their opinion, he is a true follower of Budha, who strives to imitate his great prototype in the practice of the highest virtues; particularly in his incomparable mortification and self-denial, that he might secure the ascendency of the spiritual principle over the material one, weaken passions which are the real causes of the disorder that reigns in our soul, and finally disengage her from their baneful influences, and from that of matter in general. He is exceedingly reserved and abstemious regarding food, the use of creatures, and the enjoyment of pleasures, in order to secure to reason, the noblest faculty of an intelligent being, a perfect control over the senses. He is, indeed, in the right way leading to Neibban, the summit of perfection. In the opinion of a Buddhist, nobody can be compared to a true and fervent Rahan, in sterling worth and merit. His moral dignity and elevation cast in the shade the dazzling splendor that surrounds royalty. He is a pious Recluse, a holy personage, a true member of the holy Thanga, and deserving, therefore, of the highest admiration and respect.

As a consequence of the profound veneration in which Talapoins are publicly held, they are exempted from contributing to public charges, tribute, corvees, and military service. It is an immense favor, particularly among the nations of eastern Asia, where the rulers look upon their subjects as mere slaves and tools under their command, for executing the absolute orders of their capricious fancy. Under the present ruler of Burmah, the fathers and mothers of Phongyies are benefited by the fact of their sons being in a monastery. They are exempted from paying taxes, and are treated with some attention by the officials who wish to ingratiate themselves in the favor of his most Buddhist Majesty. They have often the honorific affixes joined to their names.

In concluding this notice, we will briefly sketch the actual situation of the Talapoinic order in those parts where we have had the opportunity of observing it, and will allude to the causes that have acted in bringing into it vices, abuses, and imperfections, which are lowering it greatly in the opinion of all foreigners and of a few well-informed natives.

The first and principal cause that has brought the Society into disr pute and opened the door to numberless abuses, is the total absence of discernment in the selection of the individuals that seek for an admittance therein. Every applicant is indiscriminately received as a member of the brotherhood. No previous examination takes place for ascertaining the dispositions, capacity, and science of the postulant. No inquiry is ever made regarding the motives that may have induced him to forsake the world, and take so important a step. His vocation is exposed to no trial. He has but to present himself and he is sure to be immediately received, provided he consent to conform exteriorly to the usual practices of his brethren. No account is taken of his former conduct. The very fact of his applying to be admitted into the society of the perfect, atones amply for all past irregularities. The only respectability inherent in the modern Taipaoins, is that derived from the sacred yellow dress he wears. It may aptly be said of him that he is Monk by the fact of his wearing the canonical dress. The houses of the Order, are, in many instances, filled with worthless individuals totally unfit for the profession, who have been induced by the basest motives to enter into them, chiefly by laziness, idleness, and the hope of spending quietly their time beyond the reach of want, and without being obliged to work for their livelihood. In confirmation of this, I will mention the following instance. During the second year of my stay in Burmah, I had with me, in the capacity of servant, an old stupid native. On a certain day he gravely told me that he intended to leave my service and become a Phongyie. I laughed at first at what I considered to be a very presumptuous and impertinent language. The old man, however, kept his word. Having left my house a few days after our conversation on the subject of his new vocation, I heard no more of him till it happened, a few months after, that I met him in a monastery, attired in the full dress of a Phongyie, and so proud of his new position, that he hardly condescended to put himself on a footing of equality with his former master.

Ignorance prevails to an extent, scarcely to be imagined, among the generality of the Phongyies. I have met with a great number of laymen who were incomparably better informed, and far superior in knowledge to them. Their mind is of the narrowest compass. Though bound by their profession to study, with particular care, the various tenets of their creed and all that relates to Buddhism, they are sadly deficient in this respect. They have no ardour for study. While they read some book, they do it without attention or effort, to make themselves fully acquainted with the contents. There is no vigor in their intellect, no comprehensiveness in their mind, no order or connection in their ideas. Their reading is of a desultory nature; and the notions stored up in their memory, are at once incoherent, imperfect, and, too often, very limited. They possess no general nor correct views of Buddhism. I never met with one who could embrace the whole system in his mind and give a tolerably accurate account of it. The only faculty that they are cultivating with great care is memory. It is surprising to hear them repeating by heart the contents of a book they have studied. As the number of books is very limited, in countries where the art of printing has not been introduced, the pupils of the monasteries are compelled to commit to memory, the greatest portion of the books they study. He who has lived in Burmah must have often heard, to his great surprise, laymen repeating, during sometimes a whole hour, formulas in Pali, or religious stories in Burmese, which they had learned in the school, or when they had put on the monkish habit.

Phongyies are fond of exhibiting their knowledge of the Pali language, by repeating from memory, and without stammering or stumbling, long formulas and sentences; but I have convinced myself that very few among them understood, even imperfectly, a small part of what they recited. Those who enjoy, in the opinion of the people, a reputation of uncommon knowledge, affect to speak very little, show a great reserve, despising, as ignorant, the person that approaches their abodes or holds conversation with them. But silence, which in a learned man is a sign of modesty, is, too often, with them a cloak to cover their ignorance, and a cunning device for disguising pride under the garb of humility. The latter virtue, though much recommended in the Wini, is not a favorite one with the Talapoins. It is indeed impossible that they could ever understand or practice it, since they are unacquainted with the two great ways that lead to it, viz: a profound knowledge of God and a thorough knowledge of self. Talapoins, who are distinguished among their brethren for their great austerity of manners, and more perfect observance of their regulations, are the most unpleasing beings the writer has ever met with.

They are cold, reserved, speaking with affected conciseness: their language is sententious, seasoned with an uncommon dose of pretension. Sentences falling from their lips are half finished, and involved in a mysterious obscurity, calculated to fill with awe and admiration their numerous hearers: a certain haughtiness and contempt of others, always shows itself through their affected simplicity and humble deportment. Vanity and selfishness, latent in their hearts, force themselves on the attention of an acute observer. In their manners they are occasionally so affected by a ridiculous reserve that one might be tempted to think that their brain is not quite sound. Talapoins in general entertain a very high idea of their own excellence; and the great respect paid to them by the people contributes not a little to foster it, and make them believe that no body on earth can ever be compared to them. To such a height has their pride reached, that they believe it would be derogatory to their dignity to return civility for civility, or thanks for the alms people bestow on them.
The most striking feature in the Talapoin's character, is their incomparable idleness. We may say that, in this respect, they resemble their countrymen, who are very prone to that vice. Two causes of a very different nature seem, in our opinion, to act together on the people of these countries, to produce such a result. The first is a physical one—the heat of the climate, coupled with a perpetual uniformity in the temperature, producing a general relaxation in the whole system, which is never combated or counteracted by an opposite action or influence. The second cause is a moral one—the tyranny of the despotic Governments ruling over the populations of eastern Asia. Property is everywhere insecure. He who is suspected of being rich, is exposed to numberless vexations, on the part of the vile satellites of tyranny, who soon find out some apparent pretext for confiscating a part or the whole of his property, or depriving him of life, should he dare to offer resistance. In such a state of things, every one is satisfied with the things of first necessity. Wants form the strongest ties that bind together individuals and races, and, at the same time hold out the most powerful incentive to exertions. The people of these parts have but few wants, and, therefore, they lack inducement to labor for acquiring anything beyond what is strictly necessary. Emulation, ambition, the desire of growing rich, which are the main springs that move man to exertions, disappear, and leave him in an abject and servile indolence, which soon becomes his habitual state, and the grave wherein is entombed all his moral energy.

Like their countrymen, Phongpies are exposed to the influence of the above causes, but their mode of life is a third additional cause, which makes them even more indolent than others. They have not to trouble or exert themselves for the articles required for their subsistence and maintenance; they are abundantly supplied to them by their co-religionists. They are bound, it is true, to read, study, and meditate; but their ignorance and laziness incapacitate them for such intellectual exercises. They remain during the best part of the day sitting in a cross-legged position, or reclining, or sleeping, or at least attempting to do so. They occasionally resume the vertical position to get rid of their ennui, (one of their deadliest enemies,) and by repeated stretchings of arms and legs, and successive yawnings, try to free themselves from that domestic foe. The teaching of their scholars occupies a few of them for a short time, in the morning and the evening. They are often relieved from their mortal ennui by visitors as idle as themselves, who resort to their dwellings to kill their time in their company.

To keep up their respectability before the public, the Rahans assume an air of dignity and reserve. They avoid all that could lead them into dissipation. Exterior continence is generally observed, and though there are occasional trespasses, it would be unfair to lay on them generally the charge of incontinence. Their life so far, may be considered as exemplary. Though partly divested of that open-heartedness, which is a peculiar characteristic of their countrymen, they are tolerably kind and affable with strangers. They, however, cannot relinquish in their conversation with them, a certain air of superiority, inspired by the admiration of self, and the high opinion they entertain of their exalted profession and sacred character. They are unwilling to see them sitting unceremoniously close by themselves; and when this cannot be avoided, they seek for an opportunity of removing to another place a little more elevated than that occupied by the visitor, as it would be highly unbecoming that laymen should ever presume to sit on a level with a Recluse. Such a step would imply a sort of equality between them both which is never to be dreamt of. Their smooth and quiet countenance, their meek deportment, are, as it were, slightly undulated with a certain roughness and rudeness peculiar to individuals leading a retired life and estranging themselves, to a certain extent, from the place of society.

In the foregoing pages we have endeavoured to give a faithful account of the great religious Order existing in countries where genuine Buddhism is the prevailing creed. We have been obliged, for the sake of truth, to mention many abuses that have slowly crept into it; but we never entertained the slightest intention of casting a malignant contempt or a sneering ridicule upon its members. Most sincerely we do pity those unfortunate victims of error and superstition who are wasting their time and energies in the fruitless pursuit of an imaginary felicity. No language can adequately express the ardor and intensity of our desires, sighs, and prayers, to hasten the coming of the day, when the thick mist and dark cloud that encompass their souls, shall be dissipated, and the sun of righteousness shall shed into them his vivifying beams. However deplorable their intellectual blindness may be, we always felt that they have a right to be fairly and impartially dealt with. The religious Order they belong to, is after all, the greatest in its extent and diffusion, the most extraordinary and perfect in its fabric and constituent parts, and the wisest in its rules and prescriptions, that has ever existed, either in ancient or modern times, without the pale of Christianity.
ADDENDA.

Many persons have often put to the writer the following question:—Is it credible that the founder of Buddhism has, from the beginning, established a body of Religious, with so perfect an hierarchy and so complete an organization, as to elicit the wonder and astonishment of all those who contemplate it with a serious attention? No doubt, Buddhists attribute to Gaudama all the regulations contained in the Patimauk, or the book of the enfranchisement; they maintain that the contents of Cambawa, or book for the ordination of Patzins, have been arranged by the same hand. But the absurdity of such an assertion cannot fail to strike the eyes of even a superficial observer. These two books, with their elaborate divisions and subdivisions, have been gradually prepared and arranged, at an epoch when Buddhism had cast deep root and spread its branches far and wide, and had become the dominant religion in the countries where it is flourishing. To confer splendor to the admittance of individuals into the body of monks, the rules of the Cambawa were enacted. To render the life of Religious an object of greater veneration in the eyes of the community, the regulations of the Patimauk were devised, and were very likely, by a slow process, brought to the state of completeness we see them at present.

Though Gaudama had nothing to do with the redaction of the books under examination, he is, nevertheless, the author of the principal and most important regulations. It is in the Thoots or instructions he has delivered on different occasions, that we must search for discovering the germ and origin of the principal points contained in the Patimauk and the Cambawa. At the conclusion of many of his instructions, we find some hearers believing in him, and applying for admittance into the society of his disciples. When he approved of their dispositions, the applicants had but to renounce the ordinary pursuits of life, exchange their dress for the one regularly prescribed, and engage to live in a state of strict chastity; they then became at once members of the Thanga, without having to go through a prescribed ordeal. Faith in Budha on one hand, and on the other, willingness to live in poverty and chastity, were the only requisites for obtaining admittance into the spiritual family of Budha. The applicants were obliged to live in poverty and depend, for their food, on the alms they could procure by begging. Hence they were called Bickus or mendicants. They had to wear a dress made with rags picked up in cemeteries and stitched together. They placed themselves under the guidance of Gaudama, and denied to themselves all sensual gratifications. Such were the first and principal obligations imposed on the new converts who embraced a re-religious life. The Bickunies, or women who had embraced the holy profession, were gradually subjected to the same regulations. The minor details of the rule were introduced as consequences flowing from the general principles. This has been the work of time, and perhaps of one of the Councils.

It does not appear from the instructions of Gaudama, that the steps of the Hierarchy were defined and fixed by him, as they have subsequently been. We remark in the Assembly, the Bickus, or mendicants, constituting the great mass of the Religious, then the Thera, or, as the Burmans write it, Mathera, the ancients, or members of the Assembly distinguished by their age and proficiency in learning and virtue, and the Aryias, or those who had made the greatest progress in meditation and contemplation, and had entered in the current of perfection.

It has been asked also whether those who had reached one of the four Meggas, that is to say, who had become a Thautapan, a Sakadagam, &c., were always members of the Thanga, and could not live in the world. From the tenor of certain passages in the life of Gaudama, we see that many pious laymen became Thautapan, Sakadagam, and even Anagam, that is to say, followed the three first Meggas, though they continued to live in the world. The father of Budha, King Thoudaudana, the father of Ratha and many others, reached one of the above-mentioned states, though they continued to follow the ordinary pursuits of life. This fact deserves attention, because it shows that the Institutions of Gaudama rested on a broad basis, and that a life in the world was not an obstacle to following the ways of perfection.
ON THE WORD NAT.

In one note on the Nats, the writer having expressed the opinion that the word Nat, used by Burmans, was derived from the Sanscrit term Nath, which means lord, Major Phayre gave it as his decided opinion that the expression was a purely Burmese one, not at all derived from the Sanscrit. Leaving aside the etymological question, of which it may be said that adhuc sub judice bis est, we are happy to communicate to the reader the following reflections that have come from the pen of that distinguished scholar, who is so intimately acquainted with all that relates to Buddhism.

"The modern Burmans acknowledge the existence of certain beings which, for want of a better term, we will call "almost spiritual beings." They apply to them the name, Nat. Now according to Burmese notions, there are two distinct bodies or systems of these creatures. The one is a regularly constituted company, if I may say so, of which Thagya Meng is the chief. Most undoubtedly that body of "Nat" was unknown to the Burmans until they became Buddhists. Those are the real Dewah or Dewata.

"But the other set of Nats are the creatures of the indigenous system, existing among all the wild tribes bordering Burmah. The acknowledgment of those beings constitutes their only worship. On these grounds, I consider that the Burmese acknowledged and worshipped such beings, before they were converted to Buddhism.

"Now if they acknowledged such beings, they, no doubt, had a name for them, similar in general import to the "fairy, elf," and so on, among the inhabitants of Britain, for beings of a quasi spiritual nature. I may observe there is a complete analogy in the state of Burmese belief in the existence of such beings, and that which prevailed formerly in Europe, and some remnants of which may be found even now existing among the uneducated. I mean that before the Anglo-Saxon tribes were converted to Christianity, the belief in fairies and elves was universal. With Christianity came a belief in a different order of spiritual beings, and with that, a new name derived from the Latin, Angel. This is somewhat analogous to the state of things among the Burmese before and after their conversion to Buddhism.

"But to return to the Burmese. They, when they received Buddhism appear to have generally retained their vernacular name for the beings called in Pali, Dewa. Why this should be done is certainly not apparent. Why have the English and all Teutonic nations retained the ancient name Evil, and Spirits, though they adopted with Christianity a new term for good Spirits generally? I allude to the term Devil, which, there is no doubt, is philologically connected with that Pali word Dew-à or Dev-à.

"Regarding the meaning of the word Nat in Pali, I have no Pali dictionary, but I have the ordinary Oordoo Dictionary which includes all ordinary Sanscrit words. I find there the Sanscrit word "Nath," and the meaning rendered, "master, husband, lord." There is nothing to show it refers to any supernatural being, but is only a term of respect. As such, it might, in Pali, be made applicable to Nats. In Burmese, the people who believe in Nats, seldom use that word, but some honorific phrase. Some fishermen, I knew, quarrelled about their shares in a pool of water. In the case they constantly referred to the share of the "Aashing-gyee," who was no other than the presiding Nat of the said pool."
