THE CHOLA TEMPLES

TAṆṆĀṆŪR
GAṆṆAIKONṆḌACHOLAPURAM & DĀRĀSURAM

BY
C. SIVARAMAMURTI

PUBLISHED BY THE DIRECTOR GENERAL OF ARCHAEOLOGY IN INDIA
NEW DELHI
1960

Price : 75 Naye Paise
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>CONTENTS</th>
<th>PAGE</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>General information</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>History</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Architecture</td>
<td>7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bṛhadiśvara temple, Tanjāvūr</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bṛhadiśvara temple, Gaṅgaikondacholapuram</td>
<td>20</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Airāvatesvara temple, Dārāsuram</td>
<td>26</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Appendix: Stories of Śaiva saints depicted at Dārāsuram</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Glossary</td>
<td>44</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bibliography</td>
<td>46</td>
</tr> </tbody>
</table>
LIST OF PLATES

I. Bṛihadiśvara temple, Tañjavūr.
II. Bṛihadiśvara temple, Tañjavūr: A, Bhikshāṭana-mūrti; B, Ṭīkāgana-Chandraśekhara-mūrti; C, dvāra-pāla.
III. Bṛihadiśvara temple, Tañjavūr: Kālāntaka.
IV. Bṛihadiśvara temple, Tañjavūr: musicians (painting).
V. Bṛihadiśvara temple, Tañjavūr: Rājarāja and his guru (painting).
VI. Bṛihadiśvara temple, Gaṅgaiṅḍaṭhaṭhapuram.
VII. Bṛihadiśvara temple, Gaṅgaiṅḍaṭhaṭhapuram: Caṅḍaṭhaṭhapuram.
VIII. Bṛihadiśvara temple, Gaṅgaiṅḍaṭhaṭhapuram: A, Naṭaṛāja; B, Śiva burning Manmatha.
IX. Bṛihadiśvara temple, Gaṅgaiṅḍaṭhaṭhapuram: A, Brahmā; B, Kṛttikēya.
X. Bṛihadiśvara temple, Gaṅgaiṅḍaṭhaṭhapuram: navagrahas.
XI. Airavatesvara temple, Dāraśuram.
XII. Airavatesvara temple, Dāraśuram: maṇḍapa.
XIII. Airavatesvara temple, Dāraśuram: A, female chaṭi-bearer; B, Kaṅkāla-mūrti.
XIV. Airavatesvara temple, Dāraśuram: wives of rishis.
THE CHOLA TEMPLES

TAṆṆĀVŪR,
GAṆGAIKOṆḌACHOṆAPURAM & DĀRĀSURAM

GENERAL INFORMATION

TAṆṆĀVŪR, the headquarters of the District of that name, lies about 200 miles to the south-west of Madras and is reached from Madras by rail or road. The main temple of the place, the Bṛhadiśvara, is about a mile away from the railway-station. The retiring-rooms of the station, the Inspection Bungalow belonging to the Public Works Department and the Raja’s chaultry are the places where the visitor may stay.

GaṅgaikōṇḍacholaṆapuram, in Udayarpalayam Taluk of Tiruchirāppalli District, is situated to the east of Tiruchirāppalli and is conveniently approached from that place (62 miles) or from Kumbakoṇam (22 miles), via JayamkoṇḍacholaṆapuram, by good roads served by a regular bus-service. There is no proper rest-house at the place, which is now a stragglng village, unimportant except for its famous Bṛhadiśvara temple.

Dārāsuram is situated 3 miles to the south of Kumbakoṇam, where there is a Travellers’ Bungalow. It has a railway-station on the Madras-Dhanushkoṭi line of Southern Railway and is also served by good roads from TaṆṆāvūr and Tiruchirāppalli.

The monuments remain open to visitors daily from sunrise to sunset. Subject to the observance of religious conventions, visitors are allowed to take photographs of the monuments, but the use of a camera-stand or artificial light other than synchronized flashlight is prohibited. While there is no bar against the preparation of eight-millimeter cinematographic films, licence is required for the preparation of larger films which require the use of a camera-stand or involve other special previous arrangements.

Photographs of the monuments are available on payment from the Director General of Archaeology in India, New Delhi 11, and the Superintendent, Department of Archaeology, Southern Circle, Fort St. George, Madras 9.
HISTORY

The Cholas of Tañjāvūr (ninth to twelfth centuries) were great conquerors, who were not only paramount in south India but for some time extended their sway as far as the river Gaṅgā in the north and brought Ceylon, a part of Burma, the Malayan peninsula and some islands of south-east Asia under their influence. They were also mighty builders, who erected a large number of temples in their empire, some of them constituting the finest specimens of south Indian architecture. Inheritors of the Pallava tradition, the edifices also reflect the power and genius of their authors.

Karikāla, the early Chola emperor of the Saṅgam age, is lost in legendary grandeur. It was several centuries later that Vijayālaya, in circa 850, established a small kingdom around Tañjāvūr, which developed into a gigantic empire under his successors. In the time of Āditya and Parāntaka, the son and grandson respectively of Vijayālaya, there was a great temple-building activity. Parāntaka ruled for fortyeight years. Bearing such heroic titles as vīraśolan and samara-kesari, he extended his dominions by conquests. As the conqueror of the Pāṇḍyas, who ruled further south at Madurai, and of Ceylon, he was styled Maduraiyum Ilamum-konda, i.e. one who captured Madurai and Ceylon. He was a great devotee of Śiva in the Chidambaram temple, which he covered with gold. That he was also a great scholar and patron of literature is suggested by his title pandita-vatsala. He had sons who inherited his qualities but were unfortunately short-lived. His eldest son, Rājāditya, while almost defeating the Rāshtrakūṭa king, Kṛishṇa III, died on the battlefield on his elephant just at the moment of victory.
The Chola Temples

His younger brother was Gaṇḍarāditya, whose queen, widowed early with a little child in her arms, was a pious lady, remarkable for her generous practice of building and endowing temples.

This was a weak period in Chola history, when Krishna III asserted his power in Toṇḍai-maṇḍalam, and, the son of Gaṇḍarāditya being just a babe, Ariṅjaya, the younger brother of Gaṇḍarāditya, ascended the throne. But he soon lost his life on the battlefield in trying to regain the lost territory from the Rāṣhtrakūṭas. His son, Sundara-Chola, who succeeded him, was a great warrior and a just ruler. Like his grandfather Parāntaka, he was a great patron of literature. His last days were clouded by the sad assassination of his warlike eldest son Āditya. His second son, Rājārāja, was then a youth, accomplished and powerful; but the nobility of Rājārāja was such that even though desired by his subjects, he refused to ascend the throne, as his uncle Uttama-Chola, the son of Gaṇḍarāditya, now quite grown up, longed for it. Rājārāja eventually succeeded Uttama-Chola.

Rājārāja I, known as Rājakesari Arumoliivarman, ascended the throne in 985 and was probably the greatest of the Chola emperors. His military triumph, organization of the empire, patronage of art and literature and religious tolerance are only partially eclipsed by those of his son Rājendra, who was unparalleled in military genius. As the Chola kingdom had just recovered from the onslaught of the Rāṣhtrakūṭas, Rājārāja started his reign with military campaigns to strengthen his position. He brought low the Keralas, Pāṇḍyas and Siṃhalas, overcame the western hilly tracts, Mysore and Gaṅgavāḍi. He also overcame the Chāḷukya king Satyāśraya, the large treasures captured from whom was utilized in the enrichment of the temple at Taṅjavūr. As a sagacious conqueror, Rājārāja gave his daughter Kundavai in marriage to Vimalāditya, whose elder brother Śaktivarman, the Eastern Chālukya king, was under his protection. He sent his son Rājendra to Kaliṅga and established a pillar of victory on the Mahendra hill. With his mighty navy, Rājarāja conquered the Maldives, besides a number of other islands, and crippled the power of the Cheras known for their naval strength. He was a great builder and erected at Taṅjāvūr the magnificent temple known as the Bṛihadīśvara or Rājarājēśvara.

Rājarāja was followed by his equally brilliant son Rājendra (1012-44), undoubtedly the greatest ruler of his line, who asserted his power in Ceylon, the Chera and the Pāṇḍya countries and Vanavāsi and overcame the Chālukya Jayasimha. He then turned his eyes to the north in his desire to bring to his kingdom the waters of the sacred river Gaṅgā by the might of his arm. In less than two years, Rājendra successfully overcame the Eastern Chālukya territory, Kaliṅga and Dakṣiṇa-Kosala and overcame the Pāla king Mahīpāla of east India.

To celebrate his triumph, Rājendra created ‘a liquid pillar of victory’ (jalamaya-stambha) in his new capital at Gaṅgaikonḍacholapuram, ‘the city of the Chola, the bringer of the Gaṅgā’. In a great irrigation-tank, now in ruins, the waters of the Gaṅgā were poured from pots brought by the vassal-kings as the only tribute demanded by the emperor, who then assumed the title of Gaṅgaikonḍachola, ‘the Chola king who brought the Gaṅgā’. As thanksgiving, he erected a large temple in honour of Śiva, also known as the Bṛihadīśvara, at his capital.

Rājendra then utilized his mighty navy for attacking and subduing the Śailendra king Saṅgrāmavijayot- tuṅgavarman of Śrīvijaya (Sumatra-Java). A number of place-names mentioned in his inscriptions have been understood as connoting places mostly in Malaya, included in the empire of Śrīvijaya. His conquest of Burma, the islands in the Eastern Archipelago, Ceylon, Laccadives and Maldives clearly proves the efficiency of his unparalleled naval power. His great scholarship and literary attainments earned him the title pandita-Chola. The marriage of his daughter Ammaṅgādevī to his own nephew, the Eastern Chāḻukya king Rājarāja, shows his diplomatic genius. The child born of this marriage was the great Rājendra-Chola Kulottuṅga.

Rājendra-Chola succeeded his maternal uncles Rājādhīrāja and Vīrarājendra in 1070 and ruled over a large empire that combined the Chola and Chāḻukya dominions. He was powerful not only on land but on sea. His power was felt even in distant Kālīṅga. Vikrama-Chola succeeded Rājendra-Chola.

Kulottuṅga II, the son of Vikrama-Chola, effected elaborate renovations at the temple at Chidambaram. This building-activity was sustained in the reign of his son Rājarāja II (1150-73), whose title Rāja-gambhirā is recorded in the mandapa of the Dārāsūram temple. The growing zeal in the royal house for Śaivism is manifest in the stories of the Śaiva saints at Dārāsūram.

Rājarāja’s nephew, Rājādhīrāja, was followed by Kulottuṅga III, the last of the great Chola emperors, who, by his power and personality, checked the forces of disruption that had been steadily eating into the vitals of the empire. He was a great builder, and his reign is marked by several additions to the glorious chapter of Chola architecture. His hand is evident not only in the Kampaharesvara temple at Tribhuvanam, the most important monument of his reign, but also at Kāṅchi, Madurai, Chidambaram, Tiruvarur, Tiruvī- damarudur and Dārāsūram.
ARCHITECTURE

To understand the architecture of the Chola temples, it is essential to know something of the pre-and post-Chola architecture. The Pallava temples of the seventh to the ninth centuries, the earliest in south India, have certain features which differentiate them from the later ones. As Jouveau-Dubreuil has very clearly illustrated, the niche, the pavilion, the pillar- and pilaster-corbel and the horseshoe-shaped windows (kūdu), among others, are the most important factors which help in the ascertainment of the dates of the monuments.

Fig. 1. Niches: A, Pallava; B, Chola. (After Jouveau-Dubreuil)

A typical niche (fig. 1) in the earlier Pallava rock-cut monuments at Mahābalipuram and in the Kailāsanātha temple at Kāṅchipuram is rather wide, and the makara-torana decoration on the niche-top is flat, the floriated tail of the makara overflowing on the sides; but in a Chola niche, as in the later Pallava ones, the space is narrower and the decoration on the niche-top more round. The simulated railings for the pavilions on monuments at Mahābalipuram are quite different from their Chola counterparts. The küdu (fig. 2), which at the Mahābalipuram monuments has a shovel-headed finial, develops a lion-head in the Chola monuments, and this continues thereafter.

!Fig. 2. Küdus: A, Pallava; B, Chola; C, Vijayanagara. (After Jouveau-Dubreuil)

!Fig. 3. Pillar-capitals: A, Pallava; B, Chola; C, Vijayanagara. Top row, oblique view; bottom row, side view. (After Jouveau-Dubreuil)
The capital of the pillar (figs. 3 and 4) and pilaster in the Chola monuments, rectangular with its sides cut off in a slant at $45^\circ$, has the central portion projecting. It is from this that the later Vijayanagara lotus corbels develop. It is easily seen that without the central projecting block the Chola corbel is not essentially different from the early Pallava one, where the same angle also occurs in addition to the rounded corbel.

The central shrine in the Pallava structural temples, like the Kailasanatha at Kanchipuram, is prominent and the gopura is quite dwarfish. In the early Chola temples the shrine is magnified, and in the time of Rājarāja and his successors it becomes colossal, as one notices in the temples at Taṅjāvūr, Gaṅgaikōṇḍacholapuram, Dārāsuram and Tribhuvanam. The gopura in the early Chōla temples, though larger in size than in the Pallava ones, is still comparatively short, and it is only in the late Chōla period that gigantic gopuras come into being and dwarf the central shrine.

The earlier Pallava dvāra-pālās (door-keepers), with a very natural look and mostly with a single pair of arms, are replaced in the Chōla structures by those with a fierce mien and four arms, the ones in the Taṅjāvūr and Gaṅgaikōṇḍacholapuram temples being typical examples: they carry the triśūla (trident) on their crowns, bear tusks protruding from their mouths and strike terror with their knit eye-brows, rolling eyes and hands always in the tarjani (threatening) and vismaya (wonder) attitudes.

In the large Chōla temples, long flights of steps from the sides lead to the platform, whence one enters the sanctum; the balustrade is massive, curls up at the end and is decorated on the exterior. Alternating kōshtha-pañjaras and kumbha-pañjaras (fig. 5) form a regular feature of the decoration, and the niches are flanked by pilasters crowned on the top by a curved roof-moulding adorned by two kūḍus with crowning lion-heads. The base of the entire series of these niches has yāti-decoration, and at corners and intervals there are makara-heads with warriors in action issuing from their mouths. The pavilions are usually two pañjaras flanking a sālā (wagon-roof pavilion), the former with a single finial and the latter with three. The kumbha-pañjara itself shows stages of development, and the earlier and simpler ones, which we find in the early Chōla temples, become more decorative and developed in the later ones.
Separate mandapas, which form a regular feature in the late Chola and Vijayanagara temples, with a number of pillars adorning them, are not so prominent in the early Chola structures, though the front of the temple is a long mandapa for different forms of bhoga-worship. A large courtyard and small shrine against the enclosure-wall at the cardinal and intercardinal points for the dik-pālas (guardians of the directions) form a feature in the early Chola examples.
THE CHOLA TEMPLES

The following pages describe three of the most important Chola temples, viz. the two Brihadiśvara temples, respectively built by Rājarāja I (985-1012) and Rājendra (1012-44) at Taņjāvūr and Gaṅgai-kōṇḍacholapuram, and the Airāvateśvara temple, built by Virarājendra (1063-69) or Rājarāja II (1150-73) at Dārāsuram.
BṛIHADĪŚVARA TEMPLE, TAṆJĀVŪR

TaṆjāvūr attained prominence under the Chōlas in the ninth century, Vijayālaya, the first great ruler of the dynasty (850-71), having captured it and made it his capital. The Bṛihadiśvara temple is a symbol of the greatness of the Chōla empire under its author, emperor Rājarāja (985-1012), whose splendour it reflects. The long series of epigraphs incised in elegant letters on the plinth all round the gigantic edifice reveals the personality of the emperor.

The Bṛihadiśvara temple (pl. I) is a monument dedicated to Śiva, whom the emperor established here and named Rājarājeśvaram-uḍayār after himself. As we gather from the inscriptions running throughout the plinth, the king, on the two hundred and seventy-fifth day of the twentyfifth year of the reign (A.D. 1010), presented a gold-covered finial to be planted on the top of the vimāna of the temple.

The temple is the most ambitious of the architectural enterprises of the Chōlas and is a fitting symbol of the magnificent achievements of Rājarāja. The endowments that he made for this temple were numerous, and in this munificence he was joined by not only the members of his family but high officials and noblemen. Several large images in bronze and gold were presented to this temple, and their ornaments, described in detail in the inscriptions, give a vivid picture of the contemporary jeweller’s art. Even though most of the images and all the jewels have now disappeared, there are still some exquisite bronzes, representing Naṭarāja, Tripurāntaka, Devī and Gaṇeśa, to give an idea of what great art-treasures were originally housed in the temple. True to his surname, Śivapāda-śekhara, Rājarāja spared nothing for embellishing and endowing the great institution, and in this his sister Kundavai and other members of his family fully associated themselves. The endowments, together with the mention of even small weights and measures, the custom and method of receiving, maintaining and paying amounts or interest on amounts of donation for the regular conduct of special items of worship or for burning a lamp and similar details, give a vivid idea of the economic conditions of the time.

Fine arts were encouraged in the service of the temple: the sculptures, the paintings in the dark passages of the sanctum and even the inscriptions in elegant Chola Grantha and Tamil letters give an idea of the great art that flourished under Rājarāja. Dance and music were greatly cultivated and were equally employed to serve the temple: every evening it was at once an entertainment and a ritual that the townsfolk, assembled in the mandapa, witnessed and enjoyed during the ceremony of the waving of lights and the chanting of the Veda and Devāram hymns. Cooks, gardeners, flower-gatherers, garland-makers, musicians, drummers, dancers, dance-masters, wood-carvers, sculptors, painters, choir-groups for singing hymns in Sanskrit and Tamil, accountants, watchmen and a host of other officials and servants of the temple—all are referred to in the inscriptions as having been endowed with adequate grants of land. Taking just a single fact, that Rājarāja constructed two long streets (talichcheri) for the accommodation of four hundred dancing women attached to the temple, we can well imagine the lavish scale on which he endowed the temple and its functions. The annual income from the lands set apart for the temple alone is estimated as one hundred and sixteen thousand kalams of paddy. The emperor's presentations in silver, gold and cash, not to mention various other gifts, form a staggering account of liberality.

The temple is constructed of granite, mostly of large blocks, a rock which is not available in the neighbourhood and had therefore to be brought from a distance—itself a colossal task. The plinth of the central shrine is 150 ft. square, the shrine proper 100 ft. square and the vimāna 200 ft. high. On the massive plinth, covered throughout with inscriptions, there are niches on three sides in two rows, containing representations of deities such as Siva, Vishnu and Durgā. On the southern wall the lower niches contain Gaṇeśa, Vishnu with Śrī-devī and Bhū-devī, Lakshmi, a pair of dvāra-pālas (pl. II C), Vishṇuvaraha-mūrti, Bhikshātana (pl. II A), Virabhadra, a pair of dvāra-pālas, Dakshinā-mūrti, Kālāntaka (pl. III) and Nateśa. In the lower niches on the west are Hari-Hara, Ardhanārīśvara, a pair of dvāra-pālas and two Chandrasekharas, one with and the other without halo. On the north, in the lower series, are Ardhanārīśvara, Gaṅgādhara, a pair of dvāra-pālas, Virabhadra (without the usual moustache but with a sword and shield), Āliṅgana-Chandrasekharā (pl. II B), Śiva holding a śūla (spear), a pair of dvāra-pālas, Sarasvatī, Mahishamardini and Bhairava. Of these, the first and last pairs of dvāra-pālas and the first and last four forms in niches are on the front porch of the temple, while all the rest are on the main walls of the vimāna. The top series shows a number of Tripurāntakas repeated in each niche. In the small circular space of the niche-tops are again carvings of deities like Gaṇeśa, Vṛshavāhana, Bhikshātana, Narasimha, Varāha, etc.

As we enter the temple from the east, there is a flight of steps leading to a pillared mandapa, which is a later addition, so that originally the dvāra-pālas on either side and the princely warriors in the niches faced the visitor. Apart from the mandapa and the steps leading to it, there are two other flights of steps on the north and south, as also between the front porch and the main shrine on either side. The Nandis on the vimāna, seated sideways but with their heads turned to the front, remind us of their counterparts at Mahābalipuram.

The stone constituting the huge sikhara, which is said to weigh 80 tons, is popularly believed to have been raised to its present height by being dragged on an inclined plane, which had its base at a place known as Sārapallam (‘elevation from depression’), 4 miles away.

The vast inner courtyard of the temple is about 500 × 250 ft. and is surrounded by a cloister. At the entrance there are two gopuras, widely separated from each other, the first larger but the second better decorated. The carvings on the second gopura, guarded by two monolithic dvāra-pālas, illustrate Śaivite stories like the marriage of Siva and Pārvatī, Śiva protecting Mārkaṇḍeya and Arjuna winning the pāśupata weapon. Beyond the gopuras, in the court facing the central shrine and under the canopy of a mandapa added in recent times, is a huge monolithic Nandi, indeed a fitting vehicle for the colossal liṅga installed in the central shrine, the height of which is more than 12 ft. As is stated in the inscription, this liṅga was called āda-vallān, ‘one who can dance well’, and dakshina-meru-viṭāṅkan—names associated with the deity at Chidambaram, whom the Chōlas greatly revered and adopted by them for this liṅga, which is also known, after Rājarāja, as Rājarājeśvaram-uḍayār.

The dark passage surrounding the sanctum of the temple contains important specimens of sculptural art. Here there are three colossal sculptures, respectively located in the south, west and north and representing Siva as holding a spear, seated Siva carrying a sword and trident and with fierce mien and Siva with ten arms dancing in the chatura pose as Vishṇu plays the drum and Devī sits in padmāsana with a lotus-bud and rosary in her hands.

The entire wall-space and ceiling of the passage were originally covered with exquisite paintings, most of them now obscured by a coat of painting executed during the Nāyaka period in the seventeenth century. The original paintings, as far as they have been exposed, are mainly on the western and northern walls. On the western side, the entire wall-space is occupied by a huge panel in which Siva as Dakshiṇā-mūrti is shown seated on tiger-skin in a yogic pose approximating the mahārāja-līlā with the paryāṅka-bandha or yoga-paṭṭa across his waist and right knee, disinterestedly watching the dance of two apsarases (celestial nymphs), while Vishṇu, dwarf gaṇas and other celestial musicians play on the drum and other instruments (pl. IV), a few princely figures watch the scene and two saints, Sundara and Cheramān, hurry to the spot on elephant and horse. Up and further away is depicted a temple (architecturally a typical early Chola one) with Nāṭarāja enshrined in it, outside which are seated princely, devotees. Further down is painted the story of how Siva came down in the form of an old man with a document in his hand to establish his right to carry away Sundara on his marriage-day to his abode at Tiruvenṭpainallūr. Still below is a lively scene of women cooking and food being served during the marriage-festivity. Beyond this, on the other side of the wall, is a large figure of Nāṭarāja dancing in the golden hall at Chidambaram with priests and other devotees on one side and a stately prince, obviously Rājarāja, and three of his queens with followers including kaṅchukis and other attendants carrying rods of office.
behind them. On the opposite wall are some charming miniature figures of graceful women. A little further up is Rājarāja with his Guru Karuvūr Devar (pl. V). Beyond this, on the wall opposite the northern one and facing the passage, are five heads peeping out of a partially-exposed painting.

The entire northern wall is covered by a gigantic figure of Tripurāntaka Siva on a chariot driven by Brahmā. Tripurāntaka, accompanied by Kārttikeya on peacock, Gaṅeśa on mouse and Kāli on lion, with Nandi in front of the chariot, is in the ālīḍha pose of a warrior with eight arms, all carrying weapons and in the act of using a mighty bow to overcome a host of aggressive and fearless demons with their womenfolk clinging to them. This painting is the greatest masterpiece of the Chola artist, distinguished by its power, grandeur, rhythm and composition and unparalleled by any contemporary painting or sculpture.

This representation of Siva shows the earlier Pallava tradition, as in the Chola period Tripurāntaka generally stands in the āhāṅga and sometimes in the tri-bhaṅga pose, with one of his legs planted on the head of either the dwarf Apasmāra or a lion. This great panel portrays several sentiments in one: the heroic sentiment in the expression on Tripurāntaka's face and form and in that of the vigorous rākṣasas in action; the emotion of pity in the sorrowful faces of their women clinging to them in despair; the spirit of wonder in the paraphernalia of gods surrounding Siva; and the sense of the grotesque in the attitude of the dwarf ganaṇas and of Gaṅeśa hastening on his mouse. The Cholas being great warriors and conquerors, and Rājarāja himself the greatest of them all, it is in the fitness of things that the theme of Tripurāntaka, the mighty warrior-god, is glorified here, virtually as the keynote of the Chola power.
TAṆJĀVŪR

The colours in the paintings are soft and subdued, the lines firm and sinewy and the expression vivid and true of life; above all, there is an ease in the charming contours of the figures. They constitute the most valuable document of the painter’s art during the days of the early Chōlas, and it is interesting to note that all the grace of south Indian classical painting that is seen in the earlier Pallava paintings at Śittannavāśal, Panamalai and Kāñchipuram is continued in the present series.

The highest achievement in plastic art in the Chōla period is revealed in the fine series of the one hundred and eight dance-poses carved all around the inner walls of the first floor of temple. They form an invaluable document in the history of Indian art and are the predecessor of the labelled dance-poses on the Chidambaram gopuras, with the important difference that at TaṆjāvūr, Siva himself, the lord of dance (Nātarāja), is depicted as the dancer.

The temples of Devi near the Nandi-mandapa and of Subrahmanya are later additions, the former during the time of Konerinmaikoṇḍān, a Pāṇḍya of the thirteenth century, and the latter during the Nāyaka period in the seventeenth century. The shrine of Gaṇeśa and the mandapa of Nātarāja are also very late in date. The temple of Subrahmanya has exquisite carvings and is an excellent example of south Indian temple-architecture in the late medieval period.
BRIHADISVARA TEMPLE, GAÑGAIKONDA-CHOLAPURAM

The great monument at Gañgaikonoḍacholapuram, the second Brihadisvara Gañgaikonoḍacholesvara temple (pl. VI), rears its head nobly and bespeaks the imperial dignity of the capital that Rājendra (1012-44), the son of Rājarāja, established after his victorious march to east Indiā up to the river Gañgā. The capital itself has disappeared: even the palace where the emperor dwelt does not exist except in ruins marked by brick débris about a mile away from the temple, at a place known as Ulkottai, where a mound even now called Māligaimoḍu, ‘palace-mound’, supplies bricks to the villages. In the vicinity is another village with a large tank known as Toṭṭikuḷam excavated by the king. A mile to the south of the temple is a third village, Vānadipatṭam, ‘place of fireworks’, which is believed to be the place where fireworks for the temple-festivals were prepared. Yet another place, Meikāvalputṭūr, a mile to the east, is so named as it was the place for the watchman of the temple. A fifth village, a mile beyond the last one, is called Tīrthakoḷam, which had the teppakuḷam, the tank for floating the barge in the festivals of the temple. Two miles to the west is the large water-reservoir known as Ponneri, now all in ruins. In this or in the reservoir outside the gopura of the temple, which is also dilapidated, must have been poured the sacred waters of the Gañgā, which Rājendra caused to be brought from east Indiā.

At the temple itself a ruined gopura greets the visitor: it is in the inner compound-wall of the temple, the outer and larger wall, with its gopuras, having been despoiled long ago. On entering through the gopura,
PLATE II

Bhishamara temple, Tānjavur:
A. Bhikṣhūsana-mūrti; B. Alīgana-Chandāskhara-mūrti;
C. Pārśva-pāla. See p. 15.
Bṛhadiśvara temple, Thanjavur: Kālāntaka. See p. 15.
Bṛhadiśvara temple, Taṇjāvur: Rājarāja and his guru (painting).

See p. 18
Bṛhadiśvara temple, Gaṅgaikondacholapuram. See p. 20
Bṛhadīśvara temple, Gaṅgaikondacholapuram: Chandesānugraha-mūrti. See p. 22
Bṛhadiśvara temple, Gaṅgaikondaṭhāpoṇḍapuram: A, Naṭarāja; B, Śiva burning Manmatha, See pp. 22 and 23
Bṛhadiśvara temple, Gāngaikōṇḍacholapuram: A, Brahmā; B, Kārttikeya. See pp. 23 and 24
Airāvateśvara temple, Dārāsuram. See p. 26
Airavatesvara temple, Darasuram: mandapa. See p. 33
PLATE XIII

A. Airavatesvara temple, Darasuram: A, female chaundi-bearer; B, Katakala-martic. See pp. 29 and 33 Airavatesvara temple, Darasuram: wives of rishis. See p. 34 one sees, beyond the bali-pitha, a huge bull, which, unlike its counterpart at Taṇjāvūr, is not monolithic. Two flights of steps, on the northern and southern sides, as at Taṇjāvūr, lead up to two dvāra-pālas—huge monoliths that guard the first entrance to a long closed mandapa. The plinth of the entire mandapa up to the ardha-mandapa and mukha-mandapa of the main temple is a part of the original structure itself, though its wall appears to have been renovated; the pillars and the platform are later additions.

The ardha-mandapa of the temple is approached by two flights of steps from on the north and south. Here the mukha-mandapa is guarded on either side by two pairs of dvāra-pālas, and a third pair may be seen at the entrance to the east leading on from the main mandapa to the mukha-mandapa. Yet another pair of colossal dvāra-pālas guards the entrance to the sanctum. In the mukha-mandapa, the walls on the east, on either side, are decorated with carvings representing Śiva in different aspects of anugraha (favour), such as Vishnuvanugraha-mūrti (bestowing grace on Vishnū who worships him with his lotus-eye), Rāvaṇānugraha-mūrti (blessing Rāvaṇa who is penitent after having raised mount Kailāsa), Devyanugraha-mūrti (bestowing grace on Devī who worships the linga), Kalyānasundara-mūrti (going forth for his marriage attended by his bhūta-ganas, goblins, and the marriage itself with all the incidental rejoicing and merrymaking), Mārkandeyānugraha-mūrti (blessing his devotee Mārkandeya by rescuing him from Yama, the god of death, whom he overcame) and Chaṇḍesānugraha-mūrti (blessing Chaṇḍesā, who did not refrain from cutting off his father’s legs for having interfered with his worship of Śiva and bathed the linga with the milk of cows in his care). To the north-east is a beautiful large-sized panel, a masterpiece of Chola art, which shows Śiva bestowing his grace on Chaṇḍikesvara.
THE CHOLA TEMPLES

The temple is 180 ft. high and in arrangement follows its Taṇḍjavūr predecessor. But while the latter is tall and stately, with its contour straight and severe, suggestive of strength, the present one is shorter and its contour more graceful and delicate and somewhat feminine in its lack of angularity.

The sculptures in the temple are less numerous than in the Taṇḍjavūr one but are of the same nature. Here again we have representations of princely warriors, with swords and shields. Lakṣmi and Sarasvatī are shown seated in niches as at Taṇḍjavūr. In the northern and southern niches of the central shrine are Bhikṣāṭana-mūrti and Chaṇḍesāṇugraha-mūrti (pl. VII), the former disfigured with a plaster-coat. In the southern niches a figure, presumably that of Dakshināmūrti, is missing; the rest variously represent dancing Gaṇēśa, Ardhanārīśvara beside the bull, Hari-Hara and Naṭarāja (pl. VIII A) dancing along with Kāli and Brīṅgī attended by gaṇas and Kiśodarī playing cymbals. On the sides of the niche Viṣṇu plays the drum, Gaṇēśa and Kārttikeya approach the scene on their vehicles, and Devī, with her arm resting on the bull beside her, watches the dance. To the west is Śiva as Gaṅgā-dhara appeasing Devī who is forlorn and sullen on account of her lord having received Gaṅgā on his matted locks. On the sides of the niche is narrated the story of Bhagiratha's penance to bring Gaṅgā down to the earth. Then there are Liṅgodbhava, Viṣṇu with his consorts and Kārttikeya or Indra and Śiva as Umā-sahita. On the walls of the niche with Umā-sahita Viṣṇu is shown adoring him by offering his eye as a flower. The northern niches contain the figures of Kālantaka with the story of Mārkaṇḍeya on the sides of the niche, eight-armed
GAṆΓAIKONḌACHOṆAPURAM

Mahishamardini standing beside her lion, Brahmā with a beard, accompanied by his consorts Sāvitri and Sarasvatī (pl. IX A), Bhairava with eight arms, Śiva as Madanāntaka burning Manmatha (pl. VIII B), one of his hands in tarjani (threatening) attitude, Manmatha and his consort Rati, the former first shooting with a bow and then helpless, and other gods intervening on his behalf. The lowest series of panels on the base of the temple shows seated lions with one of the paws raised and rearing in an attitude usually found in the Pallava temples of the time of Rājasimha (690-715) and with analogues at Prambanan in Indonesia.

The niches are arranged in the same fashion as at Taṅjāvūr: there is a large central niche flanked on each side by two smaller ones, all projecting out of the main wall, with a kumbha-pañjara pattern between each pair of niches. Noteworthy are the roof-forms on the respective tiers, in the shape of śālā, koshṭha and kūdu. In the eaves of the lowest niches are bracket-figures of the ganas of Śiva and rearing lions. The principal niche on each side is devoted to one or the other of the gods of the Trinity—Brahmā, Vishṇu, and Śiva: Śiva Dakshiṇā-mūrti on the south, Vishṇu with consorts on the west and Brahmā with consorts on the north. The bays of the niches at every stage have rows of yāli as decoration, with makara-heads at the extreme ends from which warriors are issuing. The niche-tops are decorated to a circular fashion as in the Taṅjāvūr temple.

The space on the temple-base below the yāli-frieze is covered with inscriptions, though not as completely as at Taṅjāvūr. In the niches numerous iconographic forms are repeated in a different order and with the addition of a few more, such as Varāha rescuing the Earth, space for the representations being made available by the utilization of the space for the kumbha-pañjaras in other niches in addition to the five main niches.

The shrine to the north of the main temple, dedicated to Chaṇḍi keśvara, contains a large fine carving representing the steward of Śiva’s household. There are two other shrines, respectively to its north and south, contemporary with the main temple, on either side of the main shrine. There is no deity in the southern shrine, but in the shrine to the north is installed an image of Devī of a later date. That this shrine was also originally intended for Śiva is indicated by the bull guarding the door. A feature to be noted here is that the bull is quite different from those of Chola workmanship and resembles those of the earlier Chāluukya period. The dvāra-pālas in the two shrines and the images in the niches, wherever they are extant, are contemporary with, but less carefully executed than, those in the main temple.

To the south-west of the main temple is a small temple with a large image of Gaṇeśa, his trunk curling round the sweets (modaka), as is usual in some early Chola representations of the deity.

Beyond and to the north of the shrine of Chaṇḍi keśvara is another shrine, wherein is housed a fine early image of Mahishamardini. Further beyond is a large representation of lion in plastered brickwork, through the body of which runs a flight of steps leading into a large well known as Siṃhakānar. The popular story goes that the Chola king got water from the Gaṅgā and poured it into this well, so that there could be a perpetual supply of it for the bath (abhisheka) of the deity.

Among the bronzes in the temple the following are specially noteworthy: a large Somāskanda, Bhoga- sakti-devī, another Devī and Mahāsena or Kārttikeya as war-god carrying a vajra, shield and cock (pl. IX B).
The significance of the remarkable figure of the war-god to the ideal of the royal warrior Rājendra cannot be underestimated.

The unique slab with the nine planets (navagraha) (pl. X) in the large temple, hidden in total darkness, is an eloquent testimony to the cosmopolitan spirit of Rājendra, who, after his northern conquests, combined northern and southern elements to produce this most interesting group.

The most remarkable carving here, the Chaṇḍeṣānugraha-mūrti panel, is almost a suggestion of the laurels won by Rājendra through the grace of Śiva, and he humbly presents himself as a devotee of the Lord, who blessed Chaṇḍeṣā.
AIRĀVATEŚVARA TEMPLE, DĀRĀSURAM

As one enters the Airāvatesvara temple at Dārāsuram (pl. XI), one finds a large gopura, the upper portion of which is completely lost but the form of which may be imagined from the complete second (inner) gopura. The larger prākāra-wall all around the temple, decorated with couchant bulls at intervals, is in continuation of the second gopura. Supporting the gopura are pillars in a row, which have some fine carvings of lovely apsarases, Śiva-ganas and other motifs. Beyond the gopura is a large bali-pitha with beautiful lotus-petal decorations. Towards one side of it, just behind the large Nandī, is a quaint standing dwarf Śiva-gana blowing a conch, which, together with the bull, is a fine artistic product. Long narrow strips of frieze, with a whole series of miniature figures dancing in lovely poses with musical accompaniment, provide, even as we enter, the key-note of the decoration in this temple—nitya-vinoda, perpetual entertainment.

On either side at the entrance are small balustrades, intended to flank steps (now missing), with beautiful makara-decoration on their outer side. The makara with a floriated tail, short legs and curled-up snout and a pair of dwarf gana-riders on it forms a lovely decoration. At the entrance the visitor is greeted by a beautiful mandapa with a number of pillars, to be approached through an extension of it towards the south, with flights of steps on the east and west. The balustrades for these steps are beautifully decorated on the outer side with a long curling trunk issuing out of a lion-head; a similar second one runs parallel to the trunk of an elephant, lost in the open jaws of a makara whose floriated tail is curled up, to balance the complete design. The elephant is beautifully decorated and has on its back dwarf ganas viz. the śankha- and padmanidhis. The eight outer pillars of the mandapa are supported by squatting yālis with their trunks curled up and with pronounced abaci. The lotus-petal decoration below has prominent petal-tips. The capital, as in the other pillars in the mandapa, has the beginning of the bodhika-decoration, which, in the late Chōla and Vijayanagara periods, develops into the lotus-decoration. Each of the four inner pillars is divided into sections, three oblong and two polygonal. The decoration which later develops into the nāga-bandha is just present, and, as in other early Chōla structures, is only a decorative pattern of the double-geese. The rectangular portions of the pillars are decorated with small panels illustrating mythological stories, such as the attack of Manmatha, the penance of Pārvatī, the prayer of the gods for a son of Śīva, the birth of Kumāra, Śīva’s marriage, his fight with the asuras, etc. On four pillars which lead on to the extension of the mandapa short inscriptions are repeated, describing it as svasti śrī-Rāja-gambhīran tiru-mandapam. If the elephants on the sides of the balustrades of the steps mentioned above are lovely specimens, there are equally lovely galloping horses, one on either side of the mandapa-extension immediately beside the flight of steps, with a huge wheel carved behind it, which gives the mandapa the semblance of a chariot. The front of the base of this mandapa-extension is decorated at the bottom with panels showing: Śīva fighting the Tripuras from the chariot and as Kālāntaka repelling Yama for protecting the son of Mṛkandu whom he had blessed with a long life; Śīva burning Kāma who dared attack him with his flowery bow and arrow even while his lovely queens, including Rati, and other gods pray for his being spared; and the destruction of Daksha’s sacrifice by Virabhadra. Above this, in five niches at intervals, are Agni, Indra, Brahmā, Vishnu and Vāyu, all standing with hands in the attitude of reverence to Śiva. It may be noted that the original plan of the flight of steps east of the mandapa has been completely spoilt by later renovations, and the symmetry, which no doubt originally existed, is now lost.

The main mandapa is in continuation of the mukhā-mandapa of the main shrine and is covered completely on the northern side at the extreme ends of the eastern and southern sides, providing on the outer face of the wall as in other portions of the temple, the usual pattern of niches with pilasters in between. The same pattern of alternating niche and pilaster with a main niche for every pair of subsidiary niches is found on the outer walls of the second mandapa, which is a completely closed one, all the pillars being inside. The main mandapa is decorated with a pair of dwarf yakshas guarding padma- and śāṅkha-nidhis in niches on either side on the east. These figures, like all the other special forms of deities in the niches, are of fine-grained black basalt, distinguished from the granite used in the entire structure. The pillars of the first (main) mandapa contain beautiful patterns of decorative creepers so arranged that in the circular medallions created therein are figures dancing in diverse poses, musicians and sometimes forms of deities such as Gaṅgādhara and Trīpurāntaka. These figures adorn panels, arranged in tiers of niches and sālās on the sides of other pillars. Even where the pillars have purely decorative patterns, there are figures, mostly in dance-poses or playing musical instruments, introduced very deftly into them.

The ceiling shows square and rectangular patterns, bands of which are all filled with decorative designs. Almost all the central medallions contain similar dance and musical groups. The pillar-capitals here have the precursor of the bodhika-type, the ornamental precursor of the nāga-bandha being also present.

As we enter the next mandapa, which leads on to the ardha-mandapa and the main shrine, there are in niches Devī with lotus, and ratna-kalaśa (pot filled with gems) and Nandīkesvara standing with hands in adoration on one side and saint Kaṇṇappa and seated Sarasvatī on the other. It should be noted that the openings of the main mandapa have been bricked up here and there in modern times for converting portions into rooms and the centre of the northern side has been improvised into a cell for Devī; the chaurī-holding dvāra-pālikās, (pl. XIII A) fixed on either side of the doorway, also improvised, are lovely and belong to the same period as the other fine sculptures arranged in the niches of the main temple itself. The pillars in the mandapa adjoining the main one, which leads on to the main shrine, are somewhat simpler, notwithstanding their being polygonal and with flower-petal decoration at intervals and corbels, which recall the Chālukya type.

The mukha-mandapa, approached by long flights of steps from the north and south, marks the end of the mandapas and the beginning of the main shrine. Here there is a couchant Nandi smaller than the one at the start of the main mandapa. The dvārapālas of the main shrine are depicted as furious and with huge clubs; they have four hands in the threatening attitude (tarjani), bear tusks and carry triśūla on their bound-up hair decorated with the lion-head design. The garland-decoration of their yajñopavīta again recalls Chālukya influence.

A six-headed Kumāra standing to the left of the entrance of the main cell is a fine sculpture.

The walls of the mandapa and the main shrine contain niches, some of which still possess exquisite specimens of early Chola sculpture; the other niches either have no image or have poor modern substitutes in brick-and-plaster. Of the noteworthy Chola specimens are: a fine Ardhanārīśvara, unique of its kind, with three faces and eight arms; a four-armed Nāgarāja having snake-hoods over his head and hands joined in adoration; Agastya, the dwarf sage, seated with one of his hands in the teaching attitude and the other carrying a water-vessel; another seated sage carrying the rosary and manuscript; dancing Mārtanda-Bhairava or Aghora-Vīrabhadra with four hands, three heads and a terrible countenance; Śiva as Sarabha destroying Nara-simha (in a niche to which a small mandapa, reached by a flight of steps, is provided); standing Ganeśa; Dakshiṇa-mūrti attended by sages seated under a banyan-tree and expounding the highest truth; Liṅgodbhava Śiva, issuing from a flaming pillar, Brahmā and Vishṇu unable to reach the top and bottom, adoring the liṅga; Brahmā; eight-armed Durgā on the severed head of buffalō; seated Devī as Bhuvanesvari carrying pāśa and ankuśa, in two of her hands the other two being in abhaya and varada; Śiva as Tripurāntaka, carrying the axe, deer, bow and arrow; multi-armed Gajāntaka destroying a demon in the guise of an elephant and dancing against the spread-out hide of the animal in the bhujāṅga-trāṣita pose, Devī shrinking away from him in fear; Bhairava with six arms standing with his dog behind him; a sage carrying a water-vessel and teaching two disciples; and Maheśa-mūrti seated with three heads and four arms carrying the spear, axe, rosary and water-vessel. All these sculptures, made of polished black basalt, are of exquisite workmanship.

In describing the sides of the main shrine, it should be mentioned that the lower half of the base is of the same type all over including the mandapas. The lowest series of panels above the lotus-petal decoration is divided by decorative bands and in them are yālis, couchant or rearing, in pairs or single, women dancing to the accompaniment of music, dwarf ganas in queer poses, dancing, playing a drum, blowing a conch, carrying the chaurī or holding their hands in wonder, often in the company of a bull. Above this is a long yāli-frieze, which is again repeated a little below the niches. There are miniature decorative carvings a little below the second row of yālis, above it and immediately below the niches. In the main shrine the carving below the niche depicts scenes illustrating stories of Śaivite saints, some of which have labels in Tamil¹. Separating these scenes there are miniature carvings of dancing figures and Śiva or Devī in different attitudes.

On the outer walls, on either side of the niches, are also carved fine figures corresponding to those enshrined in the niches, simulating the tradition of the earlier temples at Taṅjavūr and Gaṅgaikonḍacholapuram. Thus, Gaṇeśa’s niche is flanked by bhūtaganas, dwarf attendants, carrying offerings with the deity’s vehicle, the mouse; the niche of Dakshiṇā-mūrti is flanked by exquisitely-carved figures of rīshis, which are, however, hidden by a later brick structure. The niches of the main temple are three in number. The central one, larger than the flanking ones, has a double-pillar decoration on its either side. It has a top fashioned as a śālā, while the tops of the niches on either side illustrate the koshṭha-pattern. The double-pillar decorations between these have the lion-headed kīdu for their top. Between the niches and the double-pillar decorations, all of which project forward, there are kumbha-paṅjara decorations against the main wall itself. Above the niches, near the eaves, there is a whole row of dwarf gaṇas, dancing, playing musical instruments or otherwise merry. Against the roof here and there are kūḍus. Gaping bhūta-heads serve as gargoyle for discharging water from the roof. The kūḍu-, pavilion- and śālā-patterns are repeated in the different tiers of the vimāna.

¹ See Appendix, p. 37.

All around the main shrine is a broad strip, 12 ft. wide, paved with granite slabs, and a low wall, 10 in. high, of the same material, the latter beautifully carved with the lotus-pattern and Nandis seated in between. This beautiful row of Nandis is unfortunately mutilated everywhere. The existence of outlets for water at intervals shows that it was intended to be a sort of a pleasant water-receptacle to give the idea of a pool surrounding the temple in spring and keep the atmosphere cool in summer. A number of circular rings with low rims, carved out of stone, appear to have been lamps.

The gargoyle for discharging water from the main cell is on the north. It is long, has a dip and double course, is decorated with two lion-head motifs, one at the source and the other where it starts the lower course at the point of the dip, and discharges water into a large well-carved water-reservoir with the figures of dancing gaṇas on the sides. The gomukha is supported at the base by a caryatid dwarf gaṇa, as in the gargoyle in the temple at Taṅjāvūr (though the figure here is standing), by a rearing yāḷi and again by triple gaṇas at the end.

In the vicinity of the main temple near this gargoyle is the shrine of Chaṇḍīkēśvara, similar to the one at Taṅjāvūr.

The inner side of the entire prākāra, surrounding the large paved courtyard, has a beautiful series of mandapa-decoration, which, in the main, is one long row of pillar-cloister with cells at intervals for deities, some of which have disappeared. At the four corners the cloister has been enlarged and embellished into mandapas, approached by steps decorated with balustrades, showing interesting motifs as a ferocious lion pouncing on an elephant with curled-up trunk lost in the mouth of a makara and with its sides covered up at the points where a niche or trellis-window is added as decoration (pl. XII). The base, as usual, has fine panels showing scenes of dance, jugglery tricks, themes of sculptural pun and so forth. All these points are best observed in the mandapa towards the north-west. Towards the north-east there is a similar mandapa, but lacking the trellis-work. Here the pillars are well-decorated with dance-figures; the ceiling also is profusely covered with beautiful panels and medallions filled with danseuses and musical figures.

The top of this mandapa is decorated with śālā-roof suggesting Nāṭarāja’s sābhā: this is the nāṭya-mandapa of the temple—a fact clearly borne out by not only the sculptures on the pillars and ceiling but also by a carving on the base of Vishnu playing the drum in the front of the mandapa. Though now in a bad state of preservation, this must have been the place where originally the Nāṭarāja bronze should have been housed. To the east, beyond this, is the yāga-śālā, and further on is the representation of a king and queen, in addition to figures of deities. The two portrait-statues are probably intended to represent either Vīrarājendra or Rājarāja II, either of whom was responsible for this temple, and his queen.

In the cloistered hall to the west of the nāṭya-mandapa there is a remarkable group of large carvings in the round, representing Śiva as Kaṅkāla-mūrti (pl. XIII B), a number of rishi-patnīs, the wives of sages of Dārukā-vana who attended on Śiva and were astonished at his beauty. The garments of one of the women in a pair (pl. XIV) are slipping off and the other has a finger on her lips indicative of wonder. Gana-dwarfs are playing the drum or sounding a gong in quaint and picturesque attitudes. Kaṅkālamūrti himself is calm and serene and fondles a deer with one of his hands, while a dwarf-attendant carries his begging bowl. Of the ladies, some carry ladles for offering food to the divine beggar. The composition is one of the great masterpieces of Chola art. There are also carvings representing Manmatha and Rati on a chariot and Kaṅṇappa-nayanār, the saintly hunter.

Beyond this are one hundred and eight Śivāchāryas (Śaiva saints) in a row fixed in the wall, with their names and short descriptions incised below each. To the south a large portion of the pillared cloister has tumbled down.

In the roof of the niches, all along the wall of the manda pa to the north, there are representations of rishis, which, together with similar figures in the niches, point to the element of peace and tranquillity, as opposed to the heroic element which is the key-note of sculpture in the temples at Taṅjavūr and Gaṅgai-konḍacholapuram. The long series of stories from the Śiva-purāṇa and Śaiva devotees portrayed here also suggest the same. When we remember that this was the period when the stories of the Śaiva kings and the sacred Devaram hymns were collected together, we can understand the purpose of this. It is not unlikely that the name Dārāsuram has something to do with Dārūkā-vana, especially when we consider the magnificent group of sculptures representing Kaṅkāla and the rishi-patrnis described above.

The linga of the temple is known as Rājarājesvaram-udayār, and the story goes that the temple was erected by Rājarāja himself to satisfy a cowherdess who made a gift of the huge stone used as the šikhara of the large temple at Tanjavur in accordance with her wishes that there should be a temple in her village.

Adjacent to this is the shrine of Devi, which is contemporary with the main temple. The balustrade-decoration of yātis with riders on either side as we enter the shrine are fine works of art. Some lattice-window carvings are also worthy of note. The gargoyle, which presents a dwarf ganā in quaint pose both to receive and disgorge the water from the cell, is interesting even in its mutilated state. The niches of the outer walls of the shrine contain forms of Devi. The tiny dance-figures in the lattice-windows and the nāga-decoration are remarkable.

The profuse occurrence of dance and musical scenes and of figures in various dance-poses cannot but attract the attention of the visitor. The Chola period was one of great patronage and encouragement for dance and music, and when we remember that the gopuras at Chidambaram, of slightly later date, have a number of dance-figures to illustrate the various sthānas and karanas of Bharata’s Nāṭya-śāstra, we can understand the reason for this exuberance of nāṭya-figures in the embellishment of the temple.

The narration of stories of the Śaiva saints, with depictions of temples, ponds or rivers full of fish, shells and other aquatic animals and, in one case, a crocodile, along with the frequent figures of kings with royal paraphernalia, such as peacock-feather parasol, sages and Brāhmaṇas with umbrellas in their hands and similar themes strongly recall the corresponding scenes of an earlier date at Borobudur and Prambanan in Indonesia. In fact, even the lions in the lowermost panels of the base of the main shrine remind us strongly of their counterparts at Prambanan. This is not at all surprising, as the intercourse between the Eastern Archipelago and India was considerable in the Chola period, most of these islands being under Chola sway for at least some time. The decorative elements, specially the creeper-patterns providing medallions for dance-figures on the pillars, and some of the pillar-capitals recall their Rāshṭrakūṭa and Chāḷukya counterparts. This is easily accounted for by the constant Chola, Rāshṭrakūṭa and Chāḷukya inroads into the territories of one another. A dvāra-pāla figure which was originally in the Dārāsuraṃ temple but has now been removed to the Taṅjāvūr temple is of Chāḷukya workmanship and contains an inscription on its pedestal in early Chola letters mentioning it was brought by the Chola king as a war-trophy after the sack of Kalyāṇapura, the capital of the Western Chāḷukyas.
APPENDIX

STORIES OF ŚAIVA SAINTS DEPICTED AT DĀRĀŚURAM

The series of stories illustrated in miniature panels as the top line of the base of the temple and the manḍapa in the Dārāśuram temple is full of narrative interest. Most of them are explained by means of labels incised in characters of the period.

The story of Appar, the great saint who converted Mahendravarman Pallava and who is always represented with a spud held by his hand against his shoulder, is graphically depicted in a number of scenes.

Then there is the story of Tīrumūlar bathing with his wife in the tank beside the temple. This is followed by the story of a saint, who was fond of feeding Śaiva devotees and whom Śiva, in the guise of a Brāhmaṇa, once tested by demanding food at midnight, which he supplied. The label for this runs Itaiyamāranguḍi Mārar kadai.

The next panel illustrates a loin-clad saint carrying a rod in his hand and standing before a scale, in which on one side there are two figures of a man and woman in adoration, and Śiva and Pārvatī on Nandi grant them darśana.

There is a scene of a king offering his sword to a young loin-clad Śaiva saint carrying a staff.

The devotion of Kanṭappanayanār is illustrated by representing him as plucking his eye with an arrow and offering it.

Mārkaṇḍeya appears next with the noose of Yama surrounding not only the neck of the adoring saint but also the liṅga itself.

Beyond it is the story of a woman with her hair being cut off, as a saint watches this and Śiva appears with his consort on his bull high up in the sky.

1 See p. 31.
THE CHOLA TEMPLES

This is followed by the representation of the legend of a saint playing the flute in a forest surrounded by cows and close to an elephant when Śiva and Pārvatī on bull visit him.

The next scene presents a devotee carefully preparing a garland and adoring with it Śiva seated in front of a temple with a rosary in his hand.

Then comes the legend of Nanda, the great saint, who bathed in the tank and entered the fire to have access into the portals of the Chidambaram temple and Śiva and Pārvatī on bull grant him darśana. This is labelled Tirunālai-povār kadai.

This is followed by the story of Tirukkuripputondoar, the saintly washerman of Kāñchi, whose sincerity was tested by Śiva, who is here shown as an old Bṛahmaṇa with a staff in his hand demanding his clothes that could not be washed by that evening owing to a storm.

Scenes from the life of Chaṇḍesā are now shown. The boy-saint is bathing a liṅga under a tree with the milk of his cows: on his father angrily interrupting, Chaṇḍesā, not brooking interference, cuts off his legs with an axe. For this he is rewarded by Śiva by winding a garland on his head. Chaṇḍesā is shown reverently seated at the foot of seated Śiva and Pārvatī, while he is adorned with the garland. The inscription here reads Saynallurpillaiyār kadai.

Next is the story of the boy-saint Tirujñānasambanda, who overcame the Jainas, all shown impaled, by performing the miracle of floating a manuscript against the current of the stream. The saint is depicted as a very small boy with cymbals in his hand and as adored by a devotee from behind. Three nude Jainas, with flowers and other objects in their hands, are shown standing, probably to throw them into the stream and perform a miracle. The king is in the centre of the panel and beyond him are impaled the defeated Jainas.

Another carving shows a devotee, who, failing to secure ghee for lighting lamps as directed by an aerial voice from the Śiva temple at Tiruvalur (indicated by a bull at the top) is shown filling a vessel with water from a lotus-pond full of fish and birds. The clear inscription here reads Nāminandi aṭigal.

Then there is the story of the boy-saint Sambanda, described as Āṭudaiya-pillaiyar in the inscription. The father is questioning the boy, who points to Śiva and Pārvati on Nandi and explains that he was fed by them with divine milk.

Beyond it is the legend of the warrior Kalikkāmānāyanar, dying on his bed rather than getting cured of paralysis by Sundara-mūrti, who, in turn, attempts to commit suicide rather than return without curing him. Finally the one is brought to life and the other prevented from killing himself. The inscription here runs eyarkon Kalikkāmānādar.

Two priests are now presented, homa-fire between them, with a label painted Somāśimāranar. A saint adoring Śiva with a garland is shown next with the label Sakkiyanar. This is the story of a Jaina who took to Śiva worship and was so lost in it that he did not know even when he used bricks instead of flowers.

This is followed by the legend of a great Śaiva devotee, who offered his son’s flesh to his guest who was no other than Śiva in disguise and demanded this ghastly food. When, however, it was cooked, the guest refused to take food in the house of the childless couple but finally appeared before them and restored to life the child, whom the mother received with joy. The label here is Śiruttoṇḍar kadaī.

Next we have Śeramān, the Chera king, going to Kailāśa on an elephant. The label for it runs Śeramāṇaperumāl kadaī.

Beyond this is a scene showing a number of scholars and a king. The inscription is in two strips, Poyyaśimaiyilāda pulavar and Kurruvanar, who were all Śaiva saints.

The next is a story which is described in the inscription as Pugalcholanar. Here the saintly Chola king is so filled with sorrow at the sight of a head of a devotee of Śiva in the midst of a number of heads piled in front of him by his victorious commander that, to expiate the sin, he took this enemy’s head on his own and entered the fire when Śiva and Pārvati appeared on Nandi to bless him.

Beyond this is a scene from the life of a king who was fond of rewarding Śaiva saints whether they were sincere or not. He is shown in the company of six \textit{pand\=aram} saints. The label for this reads \textit{Naras\=ingamun\=an\=iayar\=aiyar}.

The story narrated next is that of Adipattan, a fisherman, who used to offer the best fish from his daily catch to Siva at N\=agapa\=t\=tinam. When one day he caught only one fish he willingly offered even that to the god, who immediately appeared before him with his consort on his bull and blessed him. The inscription reads \textit{Adibattar-kadai}.

Then is the story of a devotee, who was in the habit of feeding Siva devotees and who cut off the hands of his wife since she hesitated to welcome and wash the feet of their old servant now turned a recluse, standing at their door as the guest. He is consequently graced by the \textit{dar\=sana} of Siva and Parvati on bull. The inscription here reads \textit{Kalikkamb\=an\=ad\=ar kadai}.

A saint is now shown as driving a pair of bulls for pressing oil, which is taken by him to the Siva temple beyond the river. One day he failed to get the required oil, so that, to feed the lamps with his own blood, he tried to cut his head, but Siva appeared and blessed him. The fragmentary inscription here is \textit{Kaliyan\=ar}.

The next story, as the inscription shows, is of Sattiy\=an\=dar, a devotee of Siva, who used to cut off the tongue of those who spoke ill of Siva devotees.

A Pallava king who abandoned royal glory for serving the god is now shown four times adoring temples at different places. The inscription here reads \textit{Aiyyadigal K\=\=adavarkon\=ar}.

This is followed by a scene illustrating the story of the saint who regularly used to light lamps in temples, and once failing to obtain money by selling grass for purchasing ghee for the lamps, first lit the grass itself and later his own locks of hair. The devotee is K\=anampul\=an\=dar, as the inscription states.

The next carving is of the famous author of \textit{Tirukkovai}, who spent all his wealth in renovating temples and finally reached mount Kail\=asa. The inscription reads \textit{K\=ariy\=ar}.

The next scene shows the conversion of the \textit{P\=and\=yan} king Ne\=dum\=aran through his queen and minister. The inscription here reads \textit{Ne\=dum\=aran\=ar}.
STORIES OF ŚAIVA SAINTS

Beyond this is portrayed a sage seated with a rosary in his hand. The inscription names him Vāyilār.

Another scene shows a king cutting off the hands of his queen with a sword. It illustrates the story of a Pallava king who mutilated his queen for having inadvertently smelt a flower intended for the deity. She had already had her nose cut off by a saint named Śruttunai for the same offence. The inscription for this reads Kalanchingenār.

The incident of the queen’s nose being cut by Śruttunai is given in the adjacent panel. The inscription here reads Śruttunaiyāndār.

Beyond this is illustrated the story of the saintly priest of the temple at Śrivilliputtūr, who steadfastly worshipped Śiva even in the days of a great famine. When he once dropped his water-pot on a linga on account of his extreme infirmity, the god appeared and directed him to seek and find a coin daily near the bali-pīṭha, so that he could sustain himself. The inscription here reads Pugalṭtunaiyār.

The next is a scene of a warrior killing a child with his sword, while some women shout in fear and crouch away from him. He then adores Śiva on Nandi with Pārvatī. It illustrates the story of the commander of a Chola king who killed all his men, including even babies, for having consumed paddy intended for Śiva during a famine when he was away in the battlefield. The inscription here reads Kolpuliyāndār.

The next scene is of saint adoring a number of other saints—an act which is as meritorious as adoring Śiva himself. The inscription reads Battarāippanīyar.

The following scene shows, devotees singing and sounding cymbals in front of a Śiva temple. The label reads Paramanaiye pāṭuvār, meaning that their songs of praise are only for Śiva.

In the same train of thought is a scene showing a saint in contemplation, seated in the vicinity of a temple whence the deity is taken out in procession to the accompaniment of music and dance outside the temple near the bali-pīṭha and Nandi.

The next scene shows saints adoring Śiva at Tiruvārūr. The inscription reads Tiruvārūrpirandār, meaning that everyone born in the holy spot of Tiruvārūr is saintly enough to be adored.

Beyond this a saint is worshipping liṅga; there is a bell hanging from above and below there is a conch on a tripod, reminding us of similar objects portrayed in Javanese sculpture. This, with its inscription Mukkālam tirumeti tinḍuvār, glorifies the greatness of those who worship Śiva thrice a day.

Another panel depicts the story of the Pāṇḍya king and his queen Maṅgayarkarasi, who, with the help of the boy-saint Sambanda, converted her husband to Śaivism. The inscription reads Pāṇḍimādevi...

Then there is the story of the weaver-saint Neśāndar, who always gave away the products of his loom to Śaiva devotees. This is indicated by the respective inscription.

A beautiful sculpture beyond this shows a king adoring a temple: this is a portrait of one of the Chola monarchs who was ranked among the saints for his devotion. The inscription reads Ko Śingapparumāl.

The scene that comes next illustrates the story of a devotee and his wife who played musical instruments and sang near the temple of Śiva at Madurai. In the hand of the saint is an early type of viṇā (interesting for the study of ancient musical instruments), and his wife plays on cymbals. The inscription reads Tirunilakaṇṭapperumbāṇanār.

Beyond this can be recognized with the help of the inscriptions Śadaiyanār and Isaiṇāniyār, the father and mother of Sundara, whose story is illustrated in the succeeding panels.

An old Brāhmaṇa with a manuscript and umbrella in his hand talking to a princely youth, with the inscription reading Āvana-olaikāṭṭinapadi, illustrates the incident of Śiva come disguised as a Brāhmaṇa to fetch Sundara-mūrti on the day of his marriage to his temple at Tiruvennainallūr by presenting a document in proof of his claim over Sundara’s person as also earlier over those of his father and grandfather.

The scene that follows shows some Śaiva saints and a youth sounding cymbals in front of a temple. This illustrates the beginning of Sundara’s career as a composer of hymns. The inscription reads Uṭṭaiyanambiyai āṇḍukonḍaruliyapadi.
STORIES OF ŚAIVA SAINTS

After this a princely youth, evidently Sundara, is shown eading a king beside a temple and directing him to cross a river to reach another temple of Śiva beyond it. The inscription here reads Udaiyanamibikku ollernaruvinapadi.

The next scene shows Sundara, almost princely in appearance with peacock-feather umbrella carried by one of his attendants, waylaid by dacoits and robbed of the wealth he got from the Chera king. The inscription here runs Udayanamibiyai vedar valipparittavidam.

Further up is a scene showing Sundara sounding cymbals in the vicinity of a temple where a number of bags are piled before him. This illustrates how the thieves restored the wealth robbed from Sundara at the command of the god at Tirumuruganpūndi. The inscription reads Tirumuruganpūndiyil percrapadi.

Beyond this is the last scene which shows a woman receiving her child from the jaws of a crocodile in a tank adjoining a temple. The princely figure here is saint Sundara with his hands in adoration. The scene illustrates the story of how, by singing a hymn, Sundara caused a crocodile to disgorge the child it had swallowed near the temple at Avināši. The inscription reads Avināsiyāndār mudalaivāipillai.

43
GLOSSARY

ābhaṅga, slight flexion (in the standing pose of a figure).
ālīḍha, the pose of a warrior with his right leg bent forward.
ardha-maṇḍapa, 'half hall', the smaller hall connecting the shrine and the larger pillared hall (maṇḍapa) bali-piṭha, altar for the placing of offerings.
bhujaṅga-trāsita, 'scared by snake' a dance-pose suggesting movement away from a snake out of fear.
bodhika, a corbel surmounting the capital of a pillar like the pushpa-bodhika, 'corbel of flower-pattern'.
chatura, a dance-pose, with the left foot slightly raised but still touching the ground.
gaṇa, a dwarf follower of Śiva.
gopura, the imposing temple-gateway.
kaṅchuki, 'shirt-wearer', a chamberlain in the royal harem.
koshtha, a cell or niche.
kosṭha-paṇjara, a niche decorated with curved cage-motif
(cf. kumbha-paṇjara).
kudu, the arched-window motif on roof-line with shovel-or lion-head top.
kumbha-paṇjara, a vase with foliage crowned by curved cagelike pattern, a motif alternating with kosṭha-paṇjara niches.
mahārājalilā, a royal pose of sitting at ease.
makara, the motif of a crocodile with floriated tail.
maṇḍapa, the pillared and canopied hall.
mukha-maṇḍapa, the narrow hall connecting the ardha-maṇḍapa or the maṇḍapa with the shrine.
nāga-bandha, a pillar-decoration simulating the hood of a snake.
padmāsana, a seated pose of ease with the legs crossed and soles turned up.
GLOSSARY

pañjara, 'nest', a cage-like decorative motif for a niche or base.

paryaṅka-bandha, legs bound in a strap for being easily kept in a yogic pose of meditation (cf. yoga-paṭṭa).

śālā, a hut-shaped barrel-roofed pavilion.

tri-bhaṅga, triflex (in the standing pose of a figure).

vimāna, the elevation of the shrine with the superstructure.

yāli, leogryph.

yoga-paṭṭa, a band-strip for binding the legs in a pose of meditation (cf. paryaṅka-bandha).
BIBLIOGRAPHY

Annual Reports of South Indian Epigraphy (Madras, 1887-1940).

Śiva-bhakti-vilāsa of Upamanyu Maharshi, ed. K. Krishna Sastrigal (Madras, 1931).

K. V. Subrahmanya Aiyar, Historical Sketches of Ancient Deccan (Madras, 1917).