IMAGES OF NEPAL

BY KRISHNA DEVA

PUBLISHED BY THE DIRECTOR GENERAL
ARCHAEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF INDIA
JANPATH, NEW DELHI-110011
1984
ARCHAEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF INDIA
GOVERNMENT OF INDIA
CONTENTS

List of Plates .................................................. v
Preface ........................................................... ix
Introduction ...................................................... 1
  Historical background ....................................... 1
Religious Inspiration of Nepalese Art .................... 3
  Buddhism ....................................................... 3
  Vaishnnavism ................................................ 6
  Saivism ........................................................ 8
Characteristics of Nepalese Art ............................ 14
Brâhmañical Images ............................................. 17
  Vaishnava Images ........................................... 17
  Images of Sûrya ............................................. 27
  Saïva Images ................................................. 30
  Uma-Maheśvara .............................................. 32
  Hari-Hara ..................................................... 38
  Nātarāja ...................................................... 40
Brâhmañical Tântric Images in Sundari Chowk, Patan .... 40
Brâhmañical Tântric Images in Sadâśiva (Bhairava) Chowk .... 57
Brâhmañical Tântric Images in Kumârî Chowk, Bhaktapur .... 59
Brâhmañical Tântric Images in Mahâdeva Temple, Rani Pokhari .... 69
Buddhist Images ................................................ 71
  Yaksha-Bodhisattva ........................................ 71
  Buddha Figures .............................................. 71
  Dhyâni-Buddha ............................................. 74
  Other Buddhist God ....................................... 74
  Bodhisattvas ............................................... 75
  Lokeśvara .................................................... 75
  Mañjuśrî .................................................... 80
  Maitreya .................................................... 82
Bibliography .................................................. 86
Index ............................................................ 88
LIST OF PLATES

I. Hanuman Dhoka, Kathmandu, seventeenth century
II. Degutale Temple, Patan
III. Darbar Square, Patan
IV. Kṛṣṇa Temple, Patan, AD 1637
V. Darbar Square, Bhaktapur
VI. Nyatapol, Bhaktapur, AD 1703
VII. Kumbheśvara Temple, Patan, AD 1391
VIII. Jala Vinayaka Temple, Chobar, AD 1391
IX. The Stūpa, Chabel
X. Paśupatinātha Temple, Kathmandu
XI. A. Pārvatī doing penance, Nagaltol, Kathmandu, c. seventh century
   B. Śiva in the disguise of a Brahmachārī
XII. A. Chakra-purusha, Aryaghat, c. sixth century
     B. Virūpākṣa, Aryaghat, c. fifth century
XIII. Viṣṇu as Trivikrama, dated AD 467, Lajimpat, Kathmandu
XIV. Viṣṇu as Trivikrama, dated AD 467, Pasupati area, Tilaganga
XV. Viṣṇu as Trivikrama, Changu Narayana, c. eighth century
XVI. Viṣṇu as Trivikrama, Shikha Narayana, Pharping, c. eleventh century
XVII. Vaikuṇṭha with Lakṣmī seated on Garaṇa, Changu Narayana, c. seventeenth century
XVIII. Gaurājāsana Vaikuṇṭha (Tāntric), Sankhu, c. seventeenth century
XIX. Gaurājāsana Viṣṇu, Changu Narayana, c. eighth century
XX. A. Gaurājāsana Viṣṇu, Changu Narayana, c. tenth century
   B. Gaurājāsana Viṣṇu, Kumbheśvara Temple, Patan, c. fifteenth century
XXI. A. Viṣṇu standing on Garaṇa, Patan, c. seventeenth century
   B. Gaurājāsana Viṣṇu, Deo-Patan, c. eleventh century
XXII. Viṣṇu from Simraongarh, National Museum, Kathmandu, c. twelfth century
XXIII. Viṣṇu, Naxal, Kathmandu, c. tenth century
XXIV. Viṣṇu, Naxal, Kathmandu, c. ninth century
XXV. A. Viṣṇu, Changu Narayana, c. ninth century
   B. Viṣṇu as Dhanvantari, Deo-Patan, c. thirteenth century
XXVI. A. Viṣṇu standing, Pharping, c. seventeenth century
   B. Viṣṇu standing, Archaeological Garden, Patan, dated AD 1416
XXVII. Viṣṇu as Viśvarūpa, Changu Narayana, c. eighth century
XXVIII. A-B. Viṣṇu as Viśvarūpa (details), Changu Narayana
XXIX. Jala-śayana, Budha Nilakanṭha, c. seventh century
XXX. A. Narasiṃha, Darbar Square, Patan, c. seventeenth century
     B. Hanuman, Darbar Square, Bhaktapur, dated AD 1700
XXXI. Narasiṃha, Hanuman Dhoka, Kathmandu, dated AD 1673
XXXII. A. Narasiṃha, Changu Narayana, c. tenth century
   B. Narasiṃha, Darbar Square, Bhaktapur, seventeenth century
XXXIII. A. Varāha, Rani Pokhari, c. nineteenth century
     B. Dhum Varāha, Vishal Nagar, c. sixth century
XXXIV. A. Balarāma, Deo-Patan, c. fifteenth century
     B. Balarāma, Kṛṣṇa Temple, Patan, AD 1637
XXXV. A. Kalki, Kṛṣṇa Temple, Patan, AD 1637
     B. Kṛṣṇa, Indresvara Temple, Panauti, c. seventeenth century
XXXVI. Vishṇu Chaumukha, Kumbheśvara tank, Patan, c. tenth century
XXXVII. Garuḍa, Changu Narayana, c. seventh century
XXXVIII. A-B. Garuḍa, Hari Gaon, c. seventh century
XXXIX. A-B. Garuḍa, Kṛishṇa Temple, Patan, AD 1637
XL. Garuḍa, Hanuman Dhoka, Kathmandu, c. seventeenth century
XLI. Vāsudeva-Kamalajā, Indresvara Temple, Panauti, c. fifteenth century
XLII. A. Vāsudeva Kamalajā, Nārāyana Temple, Patan, c. seventeenth century
B. Vāsudeva-Kamalajā, Gāinidhara, Patan, c. seventeenth century
XLIII. Inscribed bronze image of Vāsudeva-Kamalajā, Asutosh Museum, Calcutta, c. seventeenth century
XLIV. A. Vāsudeva-Kamalajā (Tāntric), Bhaktapur Art Gallery, eighteenth century
B. Vāsudeva-Kamalajā, Bhaktapur Art Gallery, c. eighteenth century
XLV. A. Ardhanārīśvara, Sarasvaṭi Kund, dated AD 1611
B. Ardhanārīśvara (terracotta), Rani Pokhari, c. seventeenth century
XLVI. A-B. Śiva Parvati, Kumbheśvara Temple, Patan
XLVII. Uma-Maheśvara, Kumbheśvara tank, Patan, c. ninth century
XLVIII. Kumbheśvara tank, Uma-Maheśvara, Kumbheśvara tank, Patan, c. twelfth century
XLIX. Uma-Maheśvara, Mulchowk, Patan, c. twelfth century
L. Uma-Maheśvara, Gahīti, Patan, c. tenth century
LI. A. Uma-Maheśvara, Gahīti, Patan, Pedestal detail
B. Uma-Maheśvara, Uma-Maheśvara temple, Kirtipur, c. seventeenth century
LII. A. Uma-Maheśvara, Sunḍhara, Patan
B. Uma-Maheśvara, Kvalkhu, Patan
LIII. A. Ekamukha-līṅga, Pasuṣpata area, c. seventh century
B. Chaturmukha-līṅga, Bhūbanesvari Temple, Deo-Patan, c. thirteenth century
LIV. A. Chaturmukha-līṅga, Nāla, c. fourteenth century
B. Chaturmukha-līṅga, Tamresvara Temple, Deo-Patan, c. twelfth century
LV. Śiva as Ekapāda-trīṁārti, Kathmandu
LVI. Five-headed Śiva (Tāntric), Kathmandu, c. sixteenth century
LVII. Hari-Hara, Bhaktapur Art Gallery, AD 1697
LVIII. Hari-Hara, Pasuṣpata area, c. fifteenth century
LIX. Hari-Hara, Hari-Shankar Temple, Patan, sixteenth century
LX. Hari-Śaṅkari (Tāntric), Rani Pokhari, Kathmandu, c. seventeenth century
LXI. Tāntric god, (Kārttikeya) Hari-Gaon, c. twelfth century
LXII. A. Kumāra, Pharping, c. sixteenth century
B. Kumāra, Kathmandu, c. ninth century
C. Kumāra, Vajrayogini Temple, Sankhu, c. seventeenth century
LXIII. A. Gaṇeśa, Banepa, dated AD 1453
B. Gaṇeśa, Hanuman-Dhoka, Kathmandu, c. seventeenth century
LXIV. A. Gaṇeśa (Tāntric), Hanumanghat, Bhaktapur, mid seventeenth century
B. Gaṇeśa with Vighneśvari, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
LXV. A. Tāntric form of Gaṇeśa, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
B. Tāntric from of Gaṇeśa with Vighneśvari, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
LXVI. A. Kubera, Patan, c. seventeenth century
B. Kubera, National Museum, Kathmandu, c. seventeenth century
C. Kubera, Hanuman-Dhoka, Kathmandu
LXVII. Sūrya, Kathmandu, dated AD 1158
LXVIII. A. Chandra, Gokarna, c. eighteenth century
B. Chandra, Kumbheśvara tank, Patan, c. seventeenth century
LIST OF PLATES

LXIX.  A. Sūrya seated on horse, Nārayana Temple, Kirtipur, dated AD 1651
       B. Sūrya, Changu Narayana, c. fifteenth century
LXX.  A. Sūrya, Patan, dated AD 1083
       B. Sūrya in Navagraha mandala, Bhaktapur, c. twelfth century
LXXI. A. Sūrya, National Museum, Kathmandu, c. eighteenth century
       B. Sūrya, Panauti, c. fourteenth century
LXXII. A. Sūrya, Banepa, dated AD 1394
       B. Sūrya, Tamrēsvāra Temple, Deo-Patan, c. seventeenth century
LXXIII. Vishnu as Agasty, Sankhu, c. sixteenth century
LXXIV. Hariharapitamahā, Kumbhēśvara Temple, Patan, c. seventeenth century
LXXV. Durgā, Simraongarh, c. twelfth century
LXXVI. Pārvatī, National Museum, Kathmandu, eighth-ninth century
LXXVII. A. Pārvatī, Paśupati area, c. ninth century
       B. Pārvatī, Paśupati area, c. ninth century
LXXVIII. A. Tārā, Banepa, c. tenth century
       B. Tārā, Kathmandu, c. twelfth century
LXXIX. Mahāgaurī, Deo-Patan, dated AD 1238
LXXX. Tārā, Gokarna, c. twelfth century
LXXXI. Pārvatī, Saraswati Kund, c. thirteenth century
LXXXII. Mangalā Gaurī, Paśupati area, c. tenth century
LXXXIII. Mahishāsuramardini, Sundari Chowk, Patan, c. mid seventeenth century
LXXXIV. Mahishāsuramardini, Darbar Square, Bhaktapur, dated AD 1700
LXXXV. A. Mahishāsuramardini, Pharping, c. fourteenth century
       B. Mahishāsuramardini, Umā-Mahēśvara Temple, Kirtipur, c. sixteenth century
LXXXVI. Kāli, Deo-Patan, c. sixteenth century
LXXXVII. A. Kaumārī (terracotta), National Museum, Kathmandu, eighteenth century
       B. Vārāhī (terracotta), National Museum, Kathmandu, eighteenth century
LXXXVIII. A. Gaṅgā, Patan, c. seventeenth century
       B. Sarasvati, Indrēśvara Mahādeva Temple, Panauti, c. fourteenth century
LXXXIX. Brahmā, Deo-Patan, c. eighth century
XC. A. Nāga, Kumbhēśvara tank, c. seventh century
       B. Nāga, Simraongarh, c. twelfth century
XCII. Svayambhunātha, Kathmandu
XCIII. Bodhmāth, Kathmandu
XCIV. Chaitya, Dhvaka Bahal, Kathmandu, c. seventh century
XCV. Akshobhya, Svayambhunātha, dated AD 1635
XCVI. Māra-vijaya, Mulchowk, Patan, c. eighth century
XCVII. Nativity of Buddha, Deo-Patan, c. tenth century
XCVIII. Padmapāṇi Lokeśvara, Gahiti, Patan, c. ninth century
XCIX. Padmapāṇi Lokeśvara, Katheshimhū, c. ninth century
C. A. Padmapāṇi Lokeśvara, Dhvaka Bahal, Kathmandu, c. seventh century
       B. Padmapāṇi Lokeśvara, Yangu Bahal, Patan, c. ninth century
CI. A. Bodhisattva Vajrapāṇi, Dhvaka Bahal, Kathmandu, seventh century
       B. Lokeśvara, Godavari, seventeenth century
CII. A-B. Terracotta panels, Mahabodhi Temple, Patan, c. sixteenth century
CIII. Mahabodhi Temple, Patan, c. sixteenth century
CIV. A. Aśokan stūpa, Patan
       B. Stūpa, compound of Rudravarṇomahāvihāra, Patan
CV. Sukhāvatī Lokeśvara, National Museum, Kathmandu, dated AD 1806
CXL. Maitreya, National Museum, Kathmandu
CXLI. A. Halâhala Lokesvara, Swayambhunâtha
B. Halâhala Lokesvara, National Museum, Kathmandu, dated AD 1718
CXLI. A. Namasamjiti, Swayambhunâtha, dated AD 1870
B. Mahattari Târâ, Thahiti Bazar, Kathmandu, dated AD 1714
CXIII. Namasamjiti, National Museum, Kathmandu
CXIV. Manjuśrî in mapdala, Chabel, c. sixteenth century
CXLV. Vasudhârâ, National Museum, Kathmandu
CXVI. Mahisha-Samvara, National Museum, Kathmandu
CXVII. Kurukulla (wood), National Museum, Kathmandu
CXVIII. Mahâkâla, Swayambhunâtha, dated AD 1660
CXIX. Bhairava, Darbar Square, Bhaktapur, dated AD 1700
CXII. A. Bhairava with Śakti, Rani Pokhari, Kathmandu, c. seventeenth century
B. Kâlî (Tântric), Rani Pokhari, Kathmandu, c. seventeenth century
CXIII. Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
CXIV. Water fountain, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
CXV. Lakshmi Nârâyana on Garuḍa, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
CXVI. Tântric Bhairava, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
CXVII. Harihara in mapdala, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
CXVIII. Tântric Kâlî, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
CXIX. Śakti of Naṭârâjâ, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
CXX. Varâha with Śakti (Tântric), Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
CXXI. A. Tântric Vaishnâvi with consort, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
B. Tântric Brahmâ with consort, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
CXXII. A. Tântric Naṭârâjâ, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
B. Tântric Naṭârâjâ as Ardhanârîśvara, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
CXXIII. A. Tântric Hari-Hara with Śakti, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
B. Tântric Narasîniha with Śakti, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
CXXIV. A. Tântric Kâlî, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
B. Tântric Mahâkâla, Sundari Chowk, Patan, mid seventeenth century
CXXV. Viśvesvara Temple, Patan
CXXV. Viśvesvara Temple (details), Patan
CXXVI. Wooden brackets, Banepa
CXXVII. Wooden brackets
A. Rudravarpa-mahâvihâra, wooden bracket, Patan
B. Bhubanâswari temple, wooden bracket, Deo-Patan
C. Tyagal Toli, wooden bracket, Patan
CXXVIII. A-C. Wooden brackets, Panauti
CXXX. Devotee, Chabel, c. tenth century
CXXXI. A. Wooden bracket depicting Vidyâdhara, National Museum, Kathmandu
B. Peacock window (wood), Poojarari Math, Bhaktapur, c. sixteenth century
CXXXII. A. Lokesvara with Târâ, National Museum, Kathmandu, c. sixteenth century
B. Lokesvara (wood), National Museum, Kathmandu, c. sixteenth century
CXXXIII. A. Gilt metal tympanum showing six-headed Tântric Devi, Taleju temple, Bhaktapur, mid seventeenth century
B. Wooden tympanum, Chhushya Bahal, Kathmandu, c. sixteenth century
CXXXIV. A. Terracotta tympanum, Mahabodhi Temple, Patan
B. Gilt metal tympanum, Bhavani Temple, Mulchowk, Patan, c. sixteenth century
PREFACE

An iconographical survey in the Nepal Valley was carried out jointly by the Department of Archaeology and Culture of His Majesty's Government, Nepal, and the Archaeological Survey of India under the direction of the author during the months of May-June, 1963. The icons in the temples and the monasteries as well as the stray images in the Kathmandu Valley were studied with adequate photographic documentation.

Nepal has an immensely rich variety of image types both of the Brahmanical and Buddhist religions. The earliest images available in Nepal are mainly Brahmanical and few images of Buddhist affiliation have been found prior to the seventh century. The Valley has yielded fine images of numerous Vaishnava and Saiva deities and of Sūrya and Brahmā and various forms of Devī, including Pārvatī and the Seven Mothers made between the fifth and tenth centuries. The Vaishnava deities include Vīshṇu as Śrīdhara, Garuḍa-Nārāyana, Seshāyī and Viśvarūpa and the Vaishnava incarnations of Bhū-Varāha, Narasimha, Trivikrama and Kṛishṇa as Kāliya-damana. The Trivikrama images which incidentally constitute the earliest dated sculptures of Nepal are informed by elemental power and dynamism, characteristic of the early Chalukyan art of India. The sculpture of Vīshṇu as Viśvarūpa is a unique piece, strongly reminiscent of the famous seven-headed Śiva from Parel (Bombay) in conception and expression. Nepal has also yielded numerous Śiva-liṅgas of the symbolic as well as the iconic types, the latter comprising largely chaturmukha-liṅgas, besides figures of Gaṇeṣa and Kumāra and excellent seated images of Śiva-Pārvatī enjoying domestic bliss in Kailāśa often combining the Gaṅgādhara aspect, which have an unmistakable Rāṣṭrakūta flavour.

Like the Brahmanical images, the earlier Buddhist images too, are seen to have striking affinities with the Indian images in theme as well as in treatment and comprise simple but elegantly modelled figures of Buddha, Lokesvara, Tārā, and Māyā Devī. The artists of Nepal drew ample inspiration from the various Gupta and post-Gupta art-styles of India but transformed their art creations with the magic touch of their individual genius. From the tenth century onwards, the art-idioms and conventions of Nepal increasingly assert themselves, showing dominance of local features and physiognomy and Nepal is seen to develop her own style of sculpture marked by a peculiar innate grace and daintiness. The art conventions of Nepal tend towards greater stylization and complexity in course of the centuries. The plastic activity continues in full vigour till the close of the seventeenth century, though the momentum is not completely lost even during the eighteenth century.

The images are made of stone, bronze or brass, wood and terracotta and largely come from the numerous Brahmanical temples, Buddhist shrines and monasteries which dot the Valley. Particularly interesting are the figures on the wooden struts, which reveal an amazing variety of Lokesvara types and figures of different deities including the nakshatras (constellations) on the Buddhist shrines and monasteries and deities of the Hindu pantheon with a predominance of the figures of Bhairavas and Chaṇḍi on the Brahmanical temples.
Among the rare iconographic types may be mentioned Siva as Ekapāda-Trimūrti, Chandra (the moon-god) riding a chariot of geese, Mahisha-sambara and Vishnu in the ardha-nārī (androgy nous) form. Four-armed and eight-armed images of the last deity are found in large numbers throughout the Valley together with the more familiar types of the Vishnu icon.

From the eleventh century onwards, hundreds of Buddhist deities were conceived and fashioned under the influence of Tantrayāna and Vajrayāna sects which gained special popularity in Nepal. Many of these reveal a marked impact of Tāntric Śaivism which flourished in the Valley simultaneously. The interfusion between Buddhism and Brahmanism led to complex iconographical forms revealing Buddhist deities with Brahmanical features and Brahmanical deities with Buddhist traits, the latter exemplified by a number of Saiva and Vaishnava deities holding among other weapons vajra and vajra-gāna, which are usually associated with the Vajrayāna deities. The iconographical synthesis between Buddhism and Brahmanism is graphically illustrated by some Tāntric figures of Mahākāla in the Sundari Chowk, Patan, depicting on their pedestal a frieze showing a combined pattern of the stūpa alternating with the Śiva-liṅga.

In the following pages an attempt has been made to classify the rich iconographical wealth of the Nepal Valley and present a summary of the results of the iconographical survey which was undertaken as a project of the Indian Cooperation Mission in Nepal with the active help and cooperation of the Department of Archaeology and Culture of His Majesty’s Government, Nepal.

The author is grateful to Shri S. S. Bhandarkar who as Member (Education) of the Indian Cooperation Mission conceived the project and provided all encouragement and facilities for its execution. Needless to say that the accomplishment of this Survey was due largely to the ungrudging help and active cooperation of Shri R. J. Thapa, Director of the Department of Archaeology and Culture of HMG, Nepal. I am also beholden to Shri Purnaharsha Bajracharya of the same Department and to my colleague Dr. N. R. Banerjee for many valuable suggestions. I am happy to record my deep appreciation of the artistic acumen and dedicated work of Shri Ranjit Gupta, Photographer of the Archaeological Survey of India, who took all the photographs and to Shri S. P. Chatterjee, Artist of the Survey, who designed the layout of the cover. I am specially grateful to Shri K. M. Srivastava who took all pains to correct the proofs finally. Shri S. R. Varma was always on his feet to see the book through the Press. Thanks are also due to Kumari Arundhati Banerji for necessary help in going through the proofs and Shri P. K. Trivedi, who gladly accepted to prepare the index within a short time.

The opinion expressed and the interpretations offered in this book are my own and do not necessarily reflect the views of either the Archaeological Survey of India or the Department of Archaeology of His Majesty’s Government of Nepal.

CHAPTER I

INTRODUCTION

The Himalayan Kingdom of Nepal has an enchanting variety of topographical features. Its southern geographical division comprises the Tarai region which merges into the plains of India. The Tarai is bounded on the north by the gentle ridges of the Siwaliks followed by the higher Mahabharat hills, beyond which nestles the lush green valley of Kathmandu, the centre of Nepal’s economy and culture, where ‘there are nearly as many temples as houses, and as many idols as inhabitants, there not being a fountain, a river, or a hill within its limits, that is not consecrated to one or other of the Hindoo deities’¹. To the north of the Kathmandu Valley rise the successive ranges of the snow-capped Himalayas till the plateau of Tibet, ‘the roof of the world’, is reached. Thus situated between India on the south and Tibet on the north, Nepal was destined to be a veritable reservoir of cultural currents flowing from both her neighbours. Nepal had the genius to assimilate these currents and transform and catalyse them into something which became truly Nepalese and blended with her own cultural milieu. This cultural synthesis is reflected in all spheres of Nepal’s life and thought, including her social institutions, her religious beliefs and practices and her art, architecture and iconography.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Although Lord Buddha was born in the Nepal Tarai, the light of Buddhist art, religion and philosophy did not illumine Nepal until the time of Emperor Aśoka (273-232 BC). This pious emperor, who was responsible for spreading the teachings of the Master in many lands of Asia, not only made a pilgrimage to Lumbini and Nigali Sagar in the Nepal Tarai, the birth-places respectively of the Buddha and Kanakamuni Buddha, and recorded the fact by setting up pillar-edicts at these sites, but is believed by tradition to have visited the Kathmandu Valley and erected stūpas at Lalitpur (Patan), which indeed resemble the known Aśokan stūpas in general appearance and proportion. There is also a persistent tradition that his daughter Charumati was married to a local prince and lived in a monastery built by her at Deo-Patan where a Buddhist establishment is still known as Chabahal (Chānumati-vihāra). Be that as it may, there is indisputable evidence of Aśoka’s pilgrimage to the Nepal Tarai as also of an evangelical mission having been sent during his reign to the Himalayan countries, under the leadership of Kāsapagota, the inscription on whose relic-casket found at Sanchi extols him as ‘the teacher of all the Himavat region.’² The cultural contacts thus initiated with India grew ever stronger through the succeeding ages and encompassed almost all spheres of Nepalese life and activities.

¹ Kirkpatrick, An Account of the Kingdom of Nepal (London 1811), p. 150. The term ‘Hindoo deities’ is liberally used by the author to include also ‘Buddhist’ deities.
It is well-known that the main ruling dynasties of Nepal were of the Indian origin and the Lichchhavis were the earliest such dynasty, known to history, who organized civil life in the Kathmandu Valley and laid the foundation of her art and culture as expressed through the surviving specimens of images and sculptures, coins and copious Sanskrit inscriptions engraved in the Classical Gupta script of India. The Lichchhavis came probably from the homonymous republican tribe which flourished in the contiguous region of North Bihar from the sixth century BC onwards and were celebrated in the contemporary Buddhist and Jaina literature. Subsequently, they were commemorated in the coins and inscriptions of the early Gupta emperors of India whose rise to power was facilitated by a matrimonial alliance with them. Nepal is mentioned as a border kingdom of the Gupta dominion in the Allahabad Pillar inscription of Samudragupta who took pride in calling himself as ‘the grandson of the Lichchhavis.’ The Lichchhavis of Nepal who ruled from circa AD 400 to 850 (but for an interregnum of 70 years from AD 571 to 640) were practically contemporaries of the Guptas of India and their immediate successors and shared a common cultural heritage of script, literary language, religious beliefs and traditions and artistic inspiration.

Nepal came under the political influence of Tibet during the seventh century when King Aṃśuvarman of Nepal entered into a matrimonial alliance with king Tson-Tsan-Gam-Po of Tibet by giving away his daughter, who was the first to carry Buddhism to the land of Tibet. The Tibetan king subsequently married a Chinese princess who also brought Buddhist gods to Tibet. The grateful Tibetans adore the Nepalese and Chinese princesses respectively as incarnations of Bhṛkuṭī and Tārā. The other famous contemporaries of Aṃśuvarman were king Harshavardhana of India and the Chinese pilgrim Hiuen Tsang who has left an account of Nepal. He praises king Aṃśuvarmanan’s wisdom and literary attainments and the skill of the Nepalese craftsmen and says that there were two thousand Buddhist monks of the Hīnayāna as well as Mahāyāna sects and that the Buddhist monasteries and Hindu temples flourished side by side.

The Lichchhavis, some of whose later princes were connected matrimonially with the Maukhariś 1 and the Later Guptas of Magadha, were succeeded by the Thakuris who in turn were followed by the early Mallas by AD 1200. It is not unlikely that the Mallas originated from the homonymous republican tribe of Kusinagar and Pawa of the time of the Buddha, who are referred to in the early Buddhist literature of India, besides the Mahābhārata and the Manuṣmṛti. During the rule of the Thakuris and the early Mallas, north-eastern India first came under the rule of the Pālas (circa AD 750-1150) and then of the Senas (AD 1150-1280). Never was the cultural intercourse between India and Nepal more brisk and fruitful than during these centuries. Two events during these centuries, however, are worth noting, one is the establishment of the Nepalese Samvat, beginning AD 879, which is still popular and the other is the foundation of an independent kingdom of Tirhut by Nānyadeva with Simraongarh in the Nepal Tarai as its capital in AD 1097.

1 Vata-devī the mother of the Lichchhavi king Jayadeva II was the daughter of Maukhari Bhogavarman and the daughter’s daughter of the Later Gupta ruler of Magadha, Ādityasena (Paśupati Inscription of Jayadeva II dated 153=AD 743).
Nānyadeva was probably a feudatory of the Chalukyan king Vikramāditya V (circa 1076-1126) and calls himself as ‘the ornament of the Karnata family’.

For five centuries from the thirteenth to the eighteenth the Mallas moulded the course of the history of Nepal and left a deep impress on her culture. The Newar element in Nepalese culture became progressively dominant and besides Sanskrit, Newari also got a place in royal charters and donative and votive records. The Newars have been known for their skill as artists and craftsmen and excel in the art of metal-casting which has been practised in Nepal since at least the sixth century AD. During the reign of the fourth Malla king, Jayabhūmadeva, a Nepalese artist called Aniko was invited in AD 1260 to Tibet for the construction of the Golden Stūpa there. From Tibet, he was commissioned to China at the invitation of the Chinese emperor Kublai Khan who was so impressed with Aniko’s skill in bronze-casting, painting and artistry in clay and lacquer that he first elevated him as the chief of the metal-workers and subsequently as the controller of the Imperial studios. Thus the credit of introducing bronze-casting in Tibet and China goes to a Nepalese artist.

From the thirteenth century onwards the political history of Nepal was chequered and replete with internecine strife and wars among the rival dynasties except for short interludes. Nepal also experienced a disastrous invasion in AD 1349 by Shamsuddin Ilyas, Sultan of Bengal, who plundered the Valley and defiled and destroyed the temples and monasteries including the Paśupati temple and the Svayambhū-chaiyta.

In the history of Nepal AD 1480 is a landmark when her three principal kingdoms of Nepal, Bhatgaon and Patan were united under the same house and distributed among the three sons of king Jayayaksha Malla. But the centrifugal tendencies did not take long to assert themselves and the three kingdoms, which were ruled by a succession of chiefs of varying ability, again resumed their orgy of mutual intrigues and feuds which were often joined by some of the Bāisi or Chaubisi, the 22 or 24 principalities of the peripheral regions of the Valley. Of the latter the Gorkha was an important principality whose king Prithivinarayana Shah unified the warring principalities and united the whole of Nepal under one flag in A.D. 1769. The present ruler of Nepal is tenth in descent from king Prithivinarayana Shah.

RECENT INSPIRATION OF NEPALESE ART

BUDDHISM

All principal religious currents which stirred India also registered their ripples in Nepal. Historically, Buddhism was the first established religion which flourished in Nepal perhaps as early as the time of Aśoka. The early form of Buddhism believed in worshipping the Buddha through symbols and regarded the chaiyta or the stūpa as an important cult object symbolizing the Master. The immense popularity of chaiyta-worship in Nepal is indeed a relic of the Hinayāna stage and well-finished Lichchhavi chaiyas of pristine hemispherical form are found in hundreds scattered all over the length and breadth of the Kathmandu Valley. It must, however, be admitted that except for the earliest stūpas at Patan which are attributed to Aśoka, no other monumental stūpas of the pristine Hinayāna form have yet been identified in Nepal. It is not unlikely that the older folk divinities like Yakṣas and Nāgas which may have commanded popular worship in Nepal as they did in India, were assimilated in the Buddhist cult as acolytes or subordinate deities. The earliest image of the so-called Yaksha-Bodhisattva discovered in the Valley and recently published is more likely to represent a Yaksha (presumably as an attendant of a Buddhist chaitya) than a Bodhisattva who is rarely represented even in India at such an early age.

In course of time Hinayāna which comprised of the Śrāvakayāna and Pratyekabuddhayāna and was a strict and rigorous system, gave place to the more humane Mahāyāna or Bodhisattvayāna, symbolized by the compassion of Bodhisattva Padmapāṇi who is believed to have refused nirvāṇa until the entire mankind had attained deliverance. Mahāyāna soon swept the Kathmandu valley in Nepal with the result that the simple chaitya begins to be decorated with Buddhist images and we start getting images of the Buddha from circa fifth century and of the Bodhisattvas from circa sixth century onwards. Then followed successively the Tantrayāna and the Vajrayāna, each ensuring further loosening of the rigours. This is no place to go into their metaphysics and philosophy which are indeed subtle and abstrue. Suffice it to say that to the solid base of the vijnānavāda of the Yogāchāra school, which was an improvement on the śūnyavāda of the Mādhyamikas, the Vajrayānists added a new element of mahāsukha which marked the culmination of the liberalising process of Buddhist religion and philosophy. “Vajrayāna introduced many innovations of a revolutionary character. It introduced, for instance, the theory of the five Dhyāni-Buddhas as embodiments of the five Skandhas or cosmic elements and formulated the theory of the Kulas or families of the five Dhyāni-Buddhas from which deities emerge according to need. It introduced the worship of the Prajñā or Śakti in Buddhism for the first time, and a host of other things including a large number of gods and goddesses, their Šādhanas for the purpose of visualization, Mantras, Tantras, Yantras, Mudrās, Maṇḍalas, mystic realizations and psychic exercises of the most subtle character.”

Vajrayāna was indeed a catholic and eclectic system which combined the tenets and practices of the Buddhist Mantrayāna as well as Tāntric Śaivism and included in its purview the subtlest mystic experience and philosophical speculations to the grossest rites and practices. Vajrayāna also believed in psychic culture and the attainment of supernormal powers known as siddhis. Distinguished adepts in these were known as Siddhas. These spiritual attainments were often accompanied by esoteric rites and practices involving not only killing of animals and consumption of wine and meat but also indulgence in sexual orgies. Such permissiveness was often abused and exploited by the lesser adepts as well as the black sheep and led in course of time to the debasement of these exalted cults.

Whereas under the Mahāyāna the pantheon had been limited to the Buddhas and the Bodhisattvas and just a few goddesses like Tārā and Bhṛikuṭi, under the new dispensation of Vajrayāna there was a vast increase of the pantheon and a prominence was given to the female element called Śakti or Prajñā. Under Vajrayāna, deification was carried to an excess and all conceivable objects and ideas including even abstract and philosophical concepts, were anthropomorphised. Further many fierce divinities were introduced and the female deities were often represented in the yab-yum posture, i.e. in physical union with their consorts. Not being content with the five Kuleśas or Dhyāni-Buddhas, Vajrayāna conceived of the Ādibuddha as the progenitor of even the Kuleśas and the Ādibuddha was given the iconographic form of either Vajradhara or Vajrasattva, who was often represented with his Śakti in yab-yum. It may be noted here that cultural intercourse with Tibet also played a considerable part in the multiplication of the fierce divinities and the deities represented in the yab-yum posture.

---

2 B. Bhattacharyya, The Indian Buddhist Iconography (Calcutta 1958), pp. 11-12

The cult of the Dhyāni-Buddhas, who are assigned definite positions in the cosmography of the stūpa is quite popular in Nepal and may have been introduced from eastern India as early as the seventh century AD.

The cult of Ādibuddha, which is equally popular in Nepal, grew in the Buddhist monasteries of eastern India not earlier than the tenth century. According to the Svayambhū Purāṇa, Ādibuddha first manifested himself in Nepal in the form of a flame of fire and Manjuśrī erected a temple over it. This temple is identified as the Svayambhū-chaitya which is the most celebrated Buddhist monument in Nepal. According to a variant local tradition, Svayambhū is the self-born or the Ādibuddha who manifested himself in the form of a lotus.

Since the five Dhyāni-Buddhas played a primary role in the formulation of the Buddhist pantheon, we may define their characteristics indicating the deities which emanate from each.

The progenitor of the devesha family is Dhyāni-Buddha Akshobhya, who is blue in colour, exhibits bhūspāra-mudrā and presides over the eastern direction. His Śakti is Lochanā, his Bodhisattva is Vajrapāṇi, his cognizance is vajra and a pair of elephants constitutes his vehicle. Heruka, Hayagrīva, Yamārī. Chanḍaroshaṇa and Buddhakapāla are the principal gods, while Mahāchīna-Tārā, Jāngulī, Ekajātā, Prajñāpāramitā, Mahāmantrānusārīṇī, Mahāpratyāṅgirā and Nairātma are the principal goddesses emanating from him.

The mohā family is presided over by Dhyāni-Buddha Vairochana who holds dharmanāmucaka-mudrā and is white in colour. His Śakti is Vajradhātvīśvari and his Bodhisattva is Sāmantabhadra. He is assigned a place in the centre of the stūpa and is often shown between the east and the south. Among deities owing their origin to him may be mentioned Mārtchi, Uṣṇīṣhavijayā, Sitātapatrā, Aparājītā, Mahāsahasrapramardini, Vajrārāhī, Kṣitigarbha and Maitreyā.

The rāga family originates from Amitābha who is red in colour, shows the dhyānamudrā and presides over the western direction. His cognizance is lotus and vāhana is a pair of peacocks. His Śakti is Pāṇḍarā and his Bodhisattva is Padmapāṇi. Prominent deities of this family include Lokesvara, Saptasatika, Hayagrīva, Chandraprabha, Jālinīprabha, Kurukullā, Bṛhikuti and Mahāsitaśatvati.

The originator of the chintāmani family is Dhyāni-Buddha Ratnasambhava who is of yellow colour, holds the varada-mudrā and presides over the south. His Śakti is Māmakī, his Bodhisattva is Ratnapāṇi, while a pair of lions constitutes his vehicle. Prominent deities emanating from him include Jambhala, Uchchhushma-jambhala, Ganganagaṇja, Jnānaketu, Khagarbha, Pratibhānakūṭa, Mahāpratisarā, Vasudhārā and the Pāramitās.

The samaya family is presided over by Dhyāni-Buddha Amoghāsiddhi who is of green colour and exhibits abhaya-mudrā. He presides over the north direction, his cognizance being viśvavajra and vehicle a pair of Garuḍas. His Śakti is Tārā, while his Bodhisattva is Viśvapāṇi. Principal deities of this family are Vishkambhin, Vighnāntaka, Khadiravani-Tārā, Dhanada-Tārā, Parṇaśabarī, Mahāmāyūri, Vajraśriṇkhalā and the twelve Dhāriṇīs.

VAISHṆAVISM

Vaishṇavism, which originated as a syncretistic cult combining the elements of the Vedic sun-god Āditya-Viṣṇu, the cosmic god Nārāyaṇa and the epic hero Vāsudeva-Kṛiṣṇa, grew into a mighty religious movement in India by the Gupta age and had a profound impact on Nepal. It is, therefore, not without significance that the earliest dated images, hitherto found in the Nepal Valley, belong to the Viṣṇava sect. Under the upsurge of bhakti Vaishṇavism absorbed a multiplicity of tenets and concepts and its re-orientated ideology admitted the worship of Lord Viṣṇu under three main forms or aspects, viz. para or the highest, the vyūha or the emanatory and the vibhava or the incarnatory. Viṣṇu was conceived and worshipped in Nepal, as in India, in all the three aspects mentioned above. It is, however, noteworthy that between the fifth and eighth centuries when we first encounter the Viṣṇava images in Nepal, the heroic incarnatory forms, capable of dramatic representation, viz. Trivikrama, Varāha, Narasimha and Kṛiṣṇa as Kāliyadamanas are more popular than the peaceful (para) aspects like Śeshaśayi and Garuda-Nārāyaṇa. This was obviously due to the influence of the Gupta kings who were themselves parama-bhāgavatas, i.e., ardent devotees of Viṣṇava-dharma and took a strong fancy for the heroic avatāras of Viṣṇu, specially Varāha and Narasimha to which they frequently likened their own earthly role as saviours.

Vaishṇavism could not remain isolated from other contemporary religious movements and there were mutual borrowings among the Brahmānical sects of tenets and cult-practices and conscious attempts at syncretism. A classical example of syncretism between Vaishṇavism and Śaivism is provided by an epigraphic record dated AD 567 referring to an image of Śankara-Nārāyaṇa¹ which is also called Arddhaśaurīvara, alluding obviously to the pristine assimilation of the solar cult of Āditya Viṣṇu to that of Viṣṇu-Nārāyaṇa. Whatever rivalry or strife may have existed among the Brahmānical sects gradually wore off and Nepal seems to have headed towards the ideal of pañcha-devopāsanā perhaps sooner than India.

The earliest Viṣṇava images found in the Nepal Valley are the twin images representing Viṣṇu Vikrānta, i.e., Viṣṇu as Trivikrama, inscribed and dated 389 (AD 467)

¹ R. Gnoli, Nepalese Inscriptions in Gupta Characters (Rome 1956), Part I, p 28
in the reign of the Lichchhavi king Mānadeva. The inscription on both the images is identical and refers to the construction of a Vaishnava temple, probably one of Lakshmi, where these images were installed for the merit of the queen-mother Rājyavatī. An earlier inscription of the same king dated 386 (AD 464), engraved on a pillar standing in the courtyard of the Changu Nārāyaṇa temple, begins with an invocation to Hari residing in Dolāḍri and commanding constant worship, alluding obviously to the fact that the Viṣṇu temple at Dolāḍri (Changu hill) was already celebrated before the pillar was set up. Other Viṣṇu shrines mentioned in the Lichchhavi inscriptions, assignable to the seventh century, include those of Śridevi, Narasiṁhadeva, of Nārāyaṇasvāmī at Nuppunna and of Jalāśayana at Bhumbhukkikā as well as at Dakshina Koli, the last identifiable probably with Budha Nilakaṇṭha. It is not unlikely that the temple of Satyanārāyaṇa at Harigaon may also have been founded about this time.

Of the actual early Viṣṇu images found in the Valley mention has already been made of the twin images of Viṣṇu Vikranta dated AD 467. Images of Bhū-varāha from Dhum Varahi (pl. 33B) and of Kāliyadamana from Basantpur Palace, Kathmandu, assignable to circa sixth century, respectively represent the Varāha and Kṛishṇa incarnations of Viṣṇu. Two independent sculptures of Garuḍa datable to circa seventh century are known, the one from Harigaon (pl. 38) crowns an inscribed pillar, while the other from Changu Narayana (pl. 37) now lies loose. To the same period belongs the Jalāśayana at Budha Nilkaṇṭha (pl. 29), representing Śeshaśyā Viṣṇu. Changu Nārāyaṇa is indeed a prolific site which has yielded images of Trivikrama and Viṣṇu as Viṣvarūpa (circa seventh-eighth century), two images of Garuḍa-Nārāyaṇa respectively of eighth and ninth centuries, of Girija Narasiṁha (circa ninth century) and of Viṣṇu as Śrīdhara flanked by Lakshmi and Garuḍa (circa ninth-tenth century), besides numerous later images.

By the tenth century images of Viṣṇu became stereotyped and generally followed the conventional norms of North India. The concept of the chaturviṁśatimūrtis as outlined in the Paṁcharātra and the Purānic texts also received visual forms, but the plastic treatment in Nepal retained its individuality. A good number of Viṣṇu shrines built by the early Mallas prove the continued popularity of the cult which is also attested by the find of manuscripts, often illustrated, of Viṣṇu texts like the Mahābhārata, Rāmāyaṇa, Harināmā, Viṣṇudharma-purāṇa and of dramas based on the Rāmāyaṇa story, such as the Mahārāvaṇavadha and the Hanumāṇa Nāṭaka. During the rule of the later Mallas the Kṛishṇa cult gained popularity and so did the composite images of Lakshmi-Nārāyaṇa paralleling conceptually to the Śaiva icons of Ardhanārīśvara. After the twelfth century, Vaishnavism in Nepal became deeply permeated by Tantric forms of Shaivism and Buddhism, as is revealed by the popularity of Vaishnava mandalas.

SHAIVISM

How the Rigvedic Rudra was invested with the attributes inherent in the one hundred names enumerated in the Satarudriya text of the Sukla Yajurveda and how he was transformed and metamorphosed as the epic-Puranic Siva by assimilating the various cult-divinities and folk-deities is indeed an enchanting study. The horned deity represented on the well-known seal from Mohenjodaro as seated in meditation in a yogic pose, surrounded by animals, also appears to have been absorbed in the amalgam of the Siva concept. Though primarily charged, as a member of the Brahmanical triad, with the cosmic function of sanikha (dissolution), Siva came to be associated by his exclusive devotees also with the functions of srishthi (creation) and sthiti (preservation), besides being endowed with the attributes of anugraha (conferment of grace) and tirobhava (power of obscuration) and was visualized in forms appropriate to these functions.

There are references to the worship of Siva in Panini’s Ashtadhyayi (circa fourth century BC) and in Patanjali’s Mahabhasya (second century BC). We also get archaeological and glyptic evidence for Siva worship in India from circa second century BC. It is not unlikely that the Siva-bhagavatas of Patanjali had some association with the Pashupatins who are mentioned as one of the five principal religious and philosophical systems in the Mahabharata. A teacher called Lakulisha who was the systematizer, if not the founder of the Pashupata sect and was subsequently deified, flourished between the second century BC and second century AD. Lakulisha had four disciples, each of whom headed a sub-sect of the Pashupata. The practices and outlandish behaviour of some of Pashupata, which had an older tradition, were frequently commented upon in the religious and literary works of the early centuries of the Christian era. There also grew up other Shaiva sects like the Kapalikas and Kalamukhas of a ghora type and the Vedanta Saivas and the Agamanta Saivas of a moderate type. The Suddha Saivas, who considered the Agamas to be the direct revelation of Siva, believed in the three principles of pati, pasu and pasa and relied on charyya, kriyya, yoga and jhana for final deliverance. While the metaphysics of the Kapalikas and the Kalamukhas ran almost parallel to that of the Suddha Saivas, the former sects believed in the worship of the terrific forms of Siva as Kapali or Bhairava, involving human sacrifice, consumption of wine and meat and even raw flesh and blood and admitted women in the esoteric rites which included sexual orgies. These unsocial and extremist cult-practices, which were in vogue during early centuries of the Christian era became progressively more virulent after the seventh century under the Tantric influence. Now the Tantric form of Shaivism is known to have close affinities with Tantric Buddhism, both being obsessed by the concept of Sakti worship and visualizing numerous deities of fierce and weird aspects, some of which are strikingly alike.

1 Sir John Marshall, Mohenjodaro and the Indus Civilization (London 1931), pl. XII, 17, pp. 52-56. The deity is considered by the author as the prototype of Siva-Pashupati.
Śāivism has been the most popular religion of Nepal. Śiva has commanded worship both in the symbolic and the anthropomorphic forms. The symbolic worship in the form of liṅga, however, has been in greater vogue than the worship in human form and is also older, as is attested by inscriptive evidence. A liṅga has been found bearing a fragmentary dedicatory inscription dated 388 (AD 466), referring to the liṅga and a prāśāda (evidently the temple where the liṅga was set up). This is followed by a number of inscribed liṅgas, dated in the late fifth and early sixth centuries, which were named after the persons who consecrated them—a conventional practice followed in all subsequent centuries. It is not without significance that most of these early inscribed liṅgas (there are scores of uninscribed ones) were concentrated at Deo-Patan i.e., the area adjoining the Paśupati temple.

Scores of uninscribed liṅgas, resembling the inscribed and dated ones in form, material and finished workmanship, are found at Deo-Patan and hundreds of such liṅgas are scattered over the length and breadth of the Kathmandu Valley. These Lichchhavi liṅgas are normally plain and rarely of the eka-mukha or chaturmukha varieties.

As regards the Paśupati temple itself, it enshrines a Chaturmukha-liṅga which though Guptan in form and concept, is definitely datable to AD 1361 when the temple is recorded to have been reconstructed and the deity reinstated, following the destruction and desecration of the old temple at the hands of Shamsuddin Ilyas in AD 1349. Traditionally, believed to be ageless, the antiquity of the original Paśupatinātha shrine may go back earlier than the beginning of the sixth century AD, which is the date of the inscription found at Bhasmesvara near the Paśupati Temple, referring to the holy Paśupati-kṣetra. It is well to remember that the traditional form of Paśupatinātha as Chaturmukha-liṅga is a combination of the symbolic and the anthropomorphic forms of Śiva, which was effected in India in circa fifth century AD. By the beginning of the seventh century, we find Lord Paśupatinātha recognised as the guardian deity of Nepal. In almost all his inscriptions Amśuvarman styled himself as Paśupati-bhaṭṭāraka-pādāṅgrihiita or Paśupati-bhaṭṭārakapādāṅgrihiita-dhyāta. Subsequent kings of Nepal also paid obeisance to Lord Paśupati in similar terms and many of them from Amśuvarman onwards are known to have endowed the holy shrine with land and other offerings.

We have already seen that the Paśupatas were a prominent Śaiva sect in India during the early centuries of the Christian era. The shrine of Paśupatinātha was obviously founded by the Paśupatas who seem to have been well-established in Nepal during the Lichchhavi period and are mentioned in some Lichchhavi inscriptions. The very concept of chaturmukha-liṅga representing the deity of the Paśupati temple, marks the fusion of the twin eternal principles of Śiva and Śakti or purusha and prakriti. The four visible faces of Tatpurusha-Mahādeva Aghora-Bhairava, Vāmadeva-Umā and Sadyojāta-Nandi are cardinal

---

1 R. Gnoli, op. cit., p. 7
3 Abhilekha Saṅgraha, pt. I, p. 26
4 Gnoli, op. cit., pp. 79, 95, 107 oriented, the fifth face pertaining to the highest aspect of Śiva, viz. Isāna-Sadāśiva being invisible and incomprehensible to all but the perfected initiates.4

As regards actual representations, we have thousands of plain Śiva-liṅgas spread over the valley and thick clusters thereof at and around the Paśupati temple. These are of various ages and only a handful are definitely datable, those assignable between the fifth and sixth centuries having already been noticed above. As the criteria for the evolution of the plain liṅgas is not precisely defined, the liṅgas stylistically resembling the dated ones should be of a comparable date and some may even be earlier.

As regards the mukha-liṅgas, which combine the symbolic with the anthropomorphic forms, some examples with one face and quite a few with four faces are known. An ekamukha-liṅga from the Paśupati area with a fine oval face and thick warm lower lip is attributable to circa seventh century. A slightly worn chatumukha-liṅga of circa sixth century is now set up in the same area on the Bagmati bridge. Two chatumukha-liṅgas from Deo-Patan, which are typical of the class, are illustrated. The specimen from the Bhuvaneswari temple, referrable to circa eleventh century, resembles the main deity of the Paśupati temple and its principal eastern face representing Tatpurusha—Mahādeva has a handsome physiognomy with meditative expression. The other specimen from Tāmresvara (the metallic mask alone is visible covering and conforming in contours to the original stone liṅga) is stylistically not earlier than the twelfth century and has the four usual faces of which the north one pertaining to Vāmadeva—Uma actually represents the head of Ardhanārīśvara with the right half marked by the luxuriant curls belonging to Uma and the left half to Śiva as Vāmadeva.

The anthropomorphic forms of Śiva are also fairly popular and we get representations of Śiva in various beatific as well as terrific aspects. Generally, the terrific forms appear later than the beatific ones which show Śiva either alone or more frequently with his consort known by such appellations as Uma or Pārvatī. Śiva depicted seated with his consort and known in iconographic texts as Uma-Maheśvara, Āliṅgana-mūrti or Umāsahita-mūrti was a favourite theme in Nepal ever since circa fifth century. The earliest inscribed image of this theme comes from Lalitpur and is dated 495 (AD 473).2 During the Lichchhavī period the composition is simple, showing few attendants which multiply by the ninth century to include Nandi, Skanda, maid(s) of Pārvatī, a pair of Śiva’s attendant-guards, besides dancing Bṛiṅgī and host of Śiva-gaṇas led by Gaṇapatī. The theme of Śiva-Pārvatī enjoying domestic bliss in Kailāśa, depicted at Ellora in various contexts, is elaborated in Nepal and a significant addition made to include the descent of Gaṅgā so that the Gaṅgādhara aspect is also projected in the same figure. The Himalayan hillscape, with which the Nepal artist was so at home, is lovingly delineated as the locus of the events. After the twelfth century the popular theme of Uma-Maheśvara lost its freshness and vitality and was reduced into an iconographic cliché with Tāntric overtones often added to it.

The Ardhanārīśvara form of Śiva, combining the features and attributes of Śiva in one half and of Pārvatī in the other half, vividly represents the synthesis of the twin eternal principles of purusha and prakriti or Śiva and Śakti, which is already implied in the concept of the chaturmukha-liṅga. Images of Ardhanārīśvara are occasionally found in Nepal between the eleventh and the eighteenth centuries, the earliest known image being carved on a subsidiary stone shrine, assignable to circa eleventh century, in the compound of the Paśupati temple.

---

1 Ancient India, No. 2, p. 7
2 Ancient Nepal, No. 4, pp. 39-44, pl. VII

The syncretistic image of Hari-Hara or Śaṅkara-Nārāyaṇa also represents a similar concept combining the well-known aspects of Viṣṇu and Śiva in the same image. We have epigraphic testimony for the foundation of an image of Śaṅkara-Nārāyaṇa as early as year 469 (AD 567) and find an actual icon of this deity at Deo-Patan, dating from the eighth century. Images of Hari-Hara continued in vogue till the eighteenth century.

Sculptures of Naṭarāja are less common in Nepal, the earliest example being known from the subsidiary stone shrine, assignable to circa eleventh century, in the compound of the Paśupati temple. A few images of Naṭarāja also come from the Sundari Chowk, Patan, and other monuments assignable to the seventeenth century.

Among the rare beatific manifestations of Śiva encountered in Nepal may be mentioned Chhatra Chaṇḍeśvara, and Ekapāda-Trimūrti. Chhatra Chaṇḍeśvara, who is mentioned in a sixth century Lichhavi inscription, is represented ārdhva-meḍhra, three-eyed and four-armed, carrying akṣamālā, triśūla, kamala and kamaṇḍalu and is recognised by an umbrella placed over his head. Whereas Chaṇḍeśa or Chaṇḍeśvara of the south Indian tradition is a devotee exalted as a guardian of Śiva’s establishment, in Nepal Chaṇḍeśvara is a form of Śiva himself as is already stated in the inscription cited and confirmed by the iconographic attributes. Interesting images of Ekapāda Trimūrti from Nepal of circa eighteenth century represent Śiva combining the features of Ekapāda and Ardhanārīśvara with adoring Brahmā and Viṣṇu issuing respectively from the right and left sides of the waist of the principal figure, who is shown as four-armed. There is also a two-armed and three-eyed Šaiva deity from Aryaghat near the Paśupati temple who is identified by some scholars as Viśūpāksha and assignable stylistically to circa fifth century. Viśūpāksha is a form of Śiva as well as one of the Eleven Rudras according to some iconographic texts like the Viśvakarmaśilapṛakāśa and the Rūpamaṇḍana.

The worship of Śiva in his terrific form as Bhairava comes next in popularity in Nepal to the worship of Śiva-liṅga. Śiva was known in his terrific aspect as the god par excellence of cosmic destruction (śaṁbhara) and death and assumed fierce forms, holding a variety of lethal weapons whenever he fought the demons. He was also shown as nude and carrying a kapāla or a corpse when he expiated for the sins of chopping off the fifth head of Brahmā and killing Vishvakṣena. Śiva also took the forms of Bhairavas to preside as guardian deities over the Sakti-pīthas which sprang up at the spots where fell the severed limbs of Sati. Thus the Indian iconographic texts already knew of a fair number of Bhairavas, which according to one reckoning rose to sixty-four. Under the impact of Tāntrism there was an amazing proliferation in the number of Bhairava forms in Nepal, where they are normally depicted in the militant pose known as āḍīḍha or prayaḷīḍha. They may have two, four, eight, or ten arms and hold sword and shield, bow and arrow, noose, mace, hammer, spear, trident, bell, skull-cup and tarjani-mudrā, etc. in various combinations. They are often shown as nude or draped in tiger skin and in most cases stand on prostrate human figures and have a terrific mien with raised curls and rolling eyes and wear snake-ornaments and munḍa-mālā.
Bhairava figures were set up in large numbers during the Malla period as guardians or protective deities of shrines, villages and settlements.

An image of three-headed, three-legged and three-handed Śiva as Jvaraharesvara, combining both terrific and beatific aspects, stands facing the south gate of the sanctum of the Paśupati temple. All the heads are terrific and the main pair of legs is posed in ādiḥsana, while the additional central leg is folded in podmāsana. The three hands hold akshamālā, abhaya and kamaṇḍalu. The image, assignable to circa thirteenth century, has an obvious Tantric stamp.

Independent images of Śiva’s family members, viz. Pārvatī, Kumāra and Ganeśa are also popular. While Pārvatī is invariably represented in the beatific form, Kumāra and Ganeśa are depicted both in the beatific and terrific aspects. Originally both Kumāra and Ganeśa were malevolent folk-deities belonging to the class of yaksī and piśācha and had an obscure and lowly origin. Skanda or Kumāra was a bala-graha, i.e., killer of children and Ganeśa caused obstacles and was called Vighna. It was only subsequently that they were elevated and drafted in Śiva’s family as his sons and assumed the roles of benevolent deities. Skanda became a protector not only of the human beings but also of the gods and a personification of heroic qualities and good looks. Similarly Ganeśa became popular with the Buddhists as well as the Hindus as a god of good auspices, assuring success in all ventures and activities and was invariably represented in Nepal as a guardian of both Hindu and Buddhist shrines and establishments. As regards their sculptural depiction in Nepal they were conceived invariably in the beatific aspects prior to the twelfth century and thereafter they were frequently represented in terrific forms and occasionally even as blood-sucking deities under Tāntric influence.

During the later Malla period Nandi was also anthropomorphised and depicted as a drummer often with a fierce mien to form a pair with Bhṛṅgī, the two being inseparables in the popular mind.

RELIGIOUS TOLERATION

Religious strife and intolerance have been unknown in the history of Nepal and are alien to her national character. Although the rulers subscribed to the Brahmanical faith, they liberally patronised Buddhism and revered the Buddhist deities with the same zeal and devotion that they showed to the Brahmanical divinities. King Amśuvarman, who proudly styled himself as an ardent devotee of Lord Paśupati, endowed the prominent Buddhist, Śāiva and Vaishnava establishments of his time (early seventh century) without any discrimination, the scale of endowment being uniform for the Paśupati shrine, the temple of Dolāsikhanārāyaṇa (Changu Nārāyaṇa) and four Buddhist vihāras. The treaties and agreements signed between the ruling chiefs of the Malla period invoked the most important Buddhist as well as Hindu deities of Nepal including Karuṇāmaya and Machhendranātha, Paśupatinātha, and Gauḍa-Nārāyaṇa of Changū Nārāyaṇa, Talejū and Guhyesvarī, Harasiddhi and Vajrayogini. These deities, besides a few others, were not the exclusive preserve of any particular sect but were the national deities of Nepal and commanded universal homage from all inhabitants of the land, irrespective of caste and creed. Thus on a particular day in a year Lord Paśupati is worshipped as Buddha himself, while goddess Tulajā, popularly known as Talejū is adored as Bhavānī by the Hindus and as Ugratārā by the Buddhists. Similarly Matsyendranātha (commonly styled Machhendranātha) is equally sacred to the Hindus and the Buddhists who regard him as Lokesvara. Likewise, Mahākāla and Vajrayogini are both Śaiva and Buddhist deities, while Śītalā (locally known as Azimā) who is installed in a shrine at Swayambhūnātha is adored by the Buddhists as goddess Hari. A rare instance of cult-syncretism is provided by Budha Nilakanṭha, representing Vishṇu as Śeṣaśāyī who is simultaneously conceived as Nilkanṭha Śiva by the Śaivas and as Lokesvara by the Buddhists. It will thus be seen that religious catholocity and concord have been the way of life in Nepal ever since the time of Arṇśuvarman (seventh century). All her social and religious institutions are marked by an amazing spirit of sectarian amity and harmony and this was promoted by the Tāntric movement which was most eclectic in its outlook.

Buddhism in Nepal under the Tāntric dispensation lost its sectarian exclusiveness and accepted the caste system and the ritualistic bias of Brahmanism. From the eleventh century onwards hundreds of Buddhist deities were conceived and fashioned under the influence of Tantrayāna and Vajrayāna sects, which bore a marked impact of Tantric Śaivism. The Tāntric forms of Buddhism and Śaivism flourished in the valley simultaneously and their interfusion led to complex iconographical forms revealing Buddhist deities with Brahmanical features and Brahmanical deities with Buddhist traits, the latter exemplified by a number of Śaiva and Vaishṇava deities holding among other weapons vajra and vajra-gānantā which are usually associated with the Vajrayāna deities. The iconographical synthesis between the Tāntric forms of Buddhism and Brahmanism is graphically illustrated by some figures of Kāla and Kāli in the Sundari Chowk, Patan, depicting on their pedestal a frieze showing a repeat pattern of the stūpa alternating with the Śiva-liṅga.

Aggressive Buddhist deities trampling on Brahmanical gods and goddesses are seldom depicted in Nepal, since they are incompatible with the spirit of amity and concord subsisting between the two sects in the valley. This is illustrated by the image of the Buddhist deity Vighnāntaka where Gaṇeśa instead of being trampled upon appears as a docile pupil at the feet of the deity, thus softening the aggressive tone of the theme. Another deity represented in the Valley is Hari-Hari-Hari-Vāhana Lokesvara, which illustrates more the poetic pun on the word Hari than the spirit of militant Buddhism. Buddhist deities such as Vajrahumkāra trampling on Śiva or Vajrajvālānalārka trampling on Vishṇu and Lakshmi, Trailokyavijaya as trampling on Śiva and Pārvatī could never be popular in Nepal since these deities militated against the prevailing spirit of reconciliation.
CHARACTERISTICS OF NEPALESE ART

The art of Nepal, like that of India, is deeply religious. Gods and goddesses and their myths and legends together with the sacred symbols and imagery form the main theme of this art. The Nepalese artist, however, was not oblivious of nature and the life around, but these were not given prominence and were normally relegated as background decoration and were of importance in so far as they subserved the life religious. The Nepalese artists always had a keen sense for the spectacular and accordingly the sacred legends capable of dramatic representation specially caught their imagination. Even for the simpler themes of gods and goddesses which are by their very nature bound by hieratic conventions and prescriptions they chose unusual twists and angles which imparted them gripping and arresting appearance.

From circa first century AD Nepal was open to art influences from India. Several schools of Indian art such as the early Central Indian and Mathura; the classical schools of Magadha, Sarnath and Central India; the Vakataka, early Kalachuri-Chalukyan and Rashtrakuta schools of the Deccan; and the Late Gupta, Pāla and Sena schools of eastern India had impact on the art creations of Nepal. Nepal was mostly at the receiving end of the art influences from India and yet Nepal did not turn into a regional school of Indian art but retained her uniqueness and individual character. The Nepalese artists had the genius to pick and choose such elements of Indian art as interested them and assimilated the borrowed elements and transformed them into something novel by their magic touch. Various schools of Indian art enriched and left their impress on the Nepalese art. And as has been aptly put by Stella Kramrisch “The complexity of the form of sculpture in Nepal results from two factors. Nepal is on the receiving end of more than one tradition. Full-fledged they enter the country and are taken up by a living practice of which they become an integral part. The impact or heritage of one such style may continue while subsequently another style, from a different regional centre in India is being absorbed and finally gains ascendancy. These impacts from outside are the one factor in the fabric of Nepal sculpture. The other is the local tradition, the ineluctable mode of reception as part of the creativeness of the Newar sculptor. Fed by Indian sources and sustained by its own vitality the stream of the Newar tradition carries on a multiple heritage and blends its components. Influences once received persist and while they are being assimilated this new amalgam is ready to absorb one more influence. This appears to have happened in a particularly striking way between the eighth and twelfth century.”

That the process of transformation of Indian elements in the art of Nepal starts as early as circa first century AD is indicated by the torso of a Yaksha-Bodhisattva, which is the earliest sculpture hitherto found in Nepal, combining the features of the early Indian Yaksha and the Mathura Buddha-Bodhisattva types. The sculpture is fully carved in the round, though it is more sensitively modelled in the front than at the back. The samabhanga

---

2 Ancient Nepal, No. 4, pp. 37-39, pl. V

AMONG SCULPTURES OF THE FIFTH CENTURY, THE STANDING BUDDHA FROM CHABEL3 IS THE EARLIEST IMAGE OF BUDDHA HITHERTO FOUND IN THE VALLEY. SCULPTURED IN THE CLASSICAL GUPTA STYLE OF SARANATH, THIS IMAGE REPRESENTS THE BUDDHA STANDING IN AN ELEGANT ABHAṅGA, WITH THE TWO HANDS BROKEN OFF. THE MASTER IS DRAPED IN TWO PIECES OF CLOTH, BOTH SO DIAPHRAMOUS AS TO FULLY REVEAL THE MODELLING OF THE GRACEFUL BODY IN ALL SUBTLE NUANCES. THE SMOOTHER AND LUMINOUS PLASTICITY OF THE FIGURE, THE TECHNIQUE OF REPRESENTING THE TRANSPARENT DRAPE REVEALING THE VASTIKOSHA (MEMBRUM VIRILE), THE KNEE-CAPS AND THE UPPER AND LOWER ENDS OF THE CLOTHES AND THE RENDERING OF THE FOLDS OF THE UPPER GARMENT below the neck have striking affinity with the standing Buddha figures from Saranath.4 The face of the figure, however, follows the Mathura convention and resembles that of the seated image of the Buddha, dated year 64 of Trikamala from Bodhgaya5 save in the treatment of the eyes and eyebrows. On our figure the eyes are open and extrovert and the eye-brows are ridged which is a Nepalese feature.

The next batch of three cognate images of the Buddha from KATHMANDU,Assignable to circa seventh century stand alike in a graceful ABHAṅGA with the right hand stretched in the VARADA-MUDRĀ and the left hand raised shoulder high holding the gathered ends of the saṁghāṭi. Two of them are represented in two out of the four niches of the prismatic chaitya at Dvhaka Baha, which bears an inscription assignable to circa seventh century.

---

1 Saga of Indian Sculpture (Bhariya Vidya Bhawan, Bombay 1957), pl. 4(b)
2 Stella Kramrisch, op. cit., fig. 1
3 Photograph from Nepal Deptt. of Archaeology
4 D. G. A.S.I. Photograph 189/63
5 S. K. Saraswati, A Survey of Indian Sculpture (Calcutta 1957), p. 131, pl. XXI. 92
The faces of both are alike and lack the luminosity of the Indian Gupta type but in the treatment of the drapery one faithfully follows the Mathura and the other the Sarnath Gupta convention of the Buddha figures. The third sculpture of the Buddha from Ramshah Path\(^1\) also conforms to the Sarnath mode in the treatment of the drapery as well as the rendering of the body type and the face with half-closed eyes in meditative expression. Henceforth, the Gupta Buddha from Sarnath became the model for almost all subsequent standing figures of the Buddha in Nepal.

We have just seen how Nepal felt the impulse of the refined Gupta school of north India. In an image of Śītalā at Patan, attributable to the sixth century, the influence of the Gupta styles of eastern and central India, particularly Pawaya, is clearly discernible. We also find an echo of the Gupta-Vākāṭaka and early Chalukyan idioms in the roughly contemporary monumental Taksha—like figure of Chakra-purusha seated in pralambapādāsana from Aryaghat and more particularly in a later group of narrative reliefs from Nagaltol, Kathesimbu and Kankesvari, in Kathmandu. These reliefs in the setting of the Himalayan landscape depict scenes of worship, sylvan sports, dance and penance, etc. which have been plausibly identified by N. R. Banerjee with the Śaiva myths as narrated in the Kumārasambhavam.\(^2\) The modelling of these figures, wearing luxuriant curls and few ornaments, is suave and sensitive and the narrative content is marked by rich sensuousness and emotional vivacity. The gay abandon of the couple sporting with the dancing peacock, the surprise encounter of the lady with the young lad in a peculiar dress, the serene sylvan setting of the hills, where Pārvati is engaged in penance, attended by two devoted maids, sparingly dressed like her, the teacher instructing the fair pupil in the dance and the scene of worship with flowers by the couple with the nude child in between have been depicted with zest and telling sincerity. The modelling of the child in the last-mentioned relief is indeed strikingly akin to that of child Krishna subjugating the serpent Kāliya from the Basantpur Palace, Kathmandu. The latter sculpture, which is indeed a masterpiece of Nepalese art, is informed by elemental power and dynamic resilience of movement, which are characteristics of the early Chalukyan art of the Deccan.

The monumental quality and powerful dynamism of the Chalukyan and Rāṣṭrakūṭa arts are best echoed by the images of Vishnu as Trivikrama from Lajimpat and Changu Narayanana and by the fine series of early Vaishnava sculptures from the latter site, particularly Vishnu as Viśvarūpa and Garuḍa Nārāyaṇa (pls. 27 and 19). The heritage of the Rāṣṭrakūta art which added lyricism is taken up by the early series of the bronze and stone sculptures of Devī\(^3\) and is continued in the elegant sculptures of Uma-Maheśvara (pls. 47-48).

The early Bodhisattva type of Nepal owed much to the contemporary arts of the Deccan and Eastern India. To quote Stella Kramrisch\(^4\) many Indian styles "became blended or compacted and reshaped by the hand of the Newar sculptor who not only

---

\(^1\) Photograph from Nepal Deptt. of Archaeology

\(^2\) N. R. Banerjee, Nepalese Art (Kathmandu 1966), pls. XV-XVI

\(^3\) Stella Kramrisch, op. cit., fig. 2-4

\(^4\) Oriental Art, X, No. 4, 1964, p. 233
imparted his own creative rhythm to his work but also related it to the life and the people around him. He reformed or else transformed or replaced the Indian faces of gods by Nepalese countenances. This process took its course along with a perpetual if unobtrusive osmosis or infiltration of contemporary Indian form until, from the tenth century, a new and powerful impact of the Eastern Indian school made itself felt and, from the end of the twelfth century gained ascendency over the compounded creative magma of the then current tradition.

It is well known that Nepal provided refuge to numerous Buddhist scholars and artists from eastern India in the wake of the Muslim invasions and the art practices in Nepal were considerably influenced by them. A direct impact on the Nepal art was that of the Sena school or rather its derivatives which had its Nepalese centre at Simraongarh situated in the Nepal Tarai. But the Sena impact did not last long and its was the Pāla art of the eleventh century which had the deepest and most abiding influence on Nepal. The Newar artist groomed his presentation and added dainty elegance to the sure foundation of the sensuous and suave modelling derived from the Pāla art. He had devised his own techniques and devices of which counterbalancing the figure and the drapery and poising the composition were important. He presented his subjects from unusual angles and imparted them amazing lightness and movement. These qualities are present in the sculptures as well as the bronzes of which Nepal has been an important centre ever since the seventh century AD. It may be noted that the inlaying and gem-setting of the bronzes which were known to a certain extent in India were carried to perfection by the Newar artists who used them to maximum advantage.

From the thirteenth century Nepal art was characterized by profuse ornamentation which was carried to an extreme after the fifteenth century. The Malla art-products of Nepal of the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries, with their over-ornate and flamboyant appearance are in the full grip of the recoco.

BRAHAMANICAL IMAGES

VAISHṆAVA IMAGES

Vishṇu was conceived and worshipped in Nepal, as in India under three main forms or aspects, viz. para or the highest, the vyūha or the emanatory and the vibhava or the incarnatory. It is, however, noteworthy that between the fifth and eighth centuries when we first encounter the Vaishṇava images in Nepal, the heroic incarnatory forms, capable of dramatic representation, viz. Trivikrama, Varāha, Narasimha and Krishṇa as Kāliya-damana are more popular than the peaceful (para) aspects like Śeshaṣāyī and Garuḍa-Nārāyaṇa.

The para aspect of Vishṇu is best represented by Garuḍāsana form of Vishṇu locally known as Garuḍa-Nārāyaṇa. The earliest and the finest image of the type assignable to circa eighth century comes from Changu Narayana with Lord Vishnu gracefully seated on his mount Garuḍa whose plumes form a prabhāvali behind the god. The god is four-armed carrying fruit in the place of lotus, chakra, gadā and śaṅkha. He wears kiriṭa-mukūṭa adorned by three circular crests of which the central one is larger and shows a design of kīrttimukha. He also wears makara-kunḍalas, necklace of two strands of pearls with central bead-pendants, yajñopavita, wristlets, scarf worn as an udarabandha, and a lower garment fastened by a belt of chord. The loop of the scarf falling across the thighs resembles a cable. The god has an oval face with thick warm lips. The image is remarkable for its expressive quality and dignified bearing which recall to mind the sculptures from Ellora and Elephanta. Garuḍa, whose forepart is human and hind part that of a bird, is represented in the act of flight, both arms outstretched and the wings fully spread out, resembling the gorgeous plumes of a dancing peacock. The figure of Garuḍa is notable for its powerful chest and the expression of extraordinary dignity and devotion on the face, which is of a broad set with curly hair, rolling eyes and knit eye-brows.

The same theme is repeated in another image from Changu Narayana, assignable to circa ninth century (pl. 20A). Garuḍa here is seen seated on rocks. Although it is identical with the previous image iconographically, it lacks the power, dignity and terse modelling of the previous image.

The theme is continued in an eleventh century image from Deo-Patan (pl. 21B), though the god there is seated in padmāsana on a lotus pedestal which in its turn is being supported by the same type of flying Garuḍa. The plumage of Garuḍa, however, has lost its realism and is treated as scroll work, fringed by a border of flames, forming the prabhāvalī. Garuḍa here is represented on a pedestal which is carved with lotus scrolls. Vishṇu shows two flanking female attendants, each standing in tribhāṅga on an independent lotus pedestal, the flanking goddess on the proper right carrying abhaya and lotus stalk and that on the proper left holding a large lotus blossom with both her hands. This image follows the early artistic convention of representing the god flanked by two female attendants.

We may notice two examples of the same theme belonging to circa sixteenth century. The example from the Kumbheśvara Temple, Patan (pl. 20B) represents the theme in a circular stele showing the god seated in padmāsana on a lotus pedestal with flying Garuḍa represented as the mount. The god is flanked on each side by a female attendant, representing Bhūdevi and Śrīdevi, each standing on an independent lotus pedestal. The sculpture lacks freshness and vitality. The other example from the Archaeological Garden, Patan is even cruder but is interesting in that Vishṇu is shown riding on the shoulders of Garuḍa and carries his attributes in a different order viz. chakra, padma, gadā and śaṅkha.

Lastly we may also notice an example of Vishṇu standing on flying Garuḍa from Patan, assignable to circa seventeenth century. Vishṇu here stands in samabhāṅga and carries a different arrangement of attributes, viz. śaṅkha, padma, gadā and chakra.

STANDING IMAGES OF VISHṆU

The standing form of Vishṇu in the para aspect was most popular in Nepal since we get hundreds of images of this type. The earliest such images show Vishṇu standing in samabhanga flanked by Lakshmi on proper right and Garuda on proper left, each standing on an independent pedestal, that of Vishnu being invariably higher. In many cases they stand on three lotus pedestals emanating from the same stalk. Standing Vishnu is mostly represented in the form of Shridhara carrying varada-cum-padma, chakra, gada and sankha. In early examples, the god wear kirita-mukuta decorated with three chakra-shaped crests, the central one being larger and inset with a kirttimukha. The figure also wears rauna-kunjalas, torque of two strands of pearls with a central clasp, ananta-shaped armlets, wristlets, yajnopavita, uttarlya treated as an udara-bandha with side knots, laterally flaring ends and a central pendant loop and a lower garment secured by a jewelled belt. The pleats of the lower garment are schematically arranged between the legs in a zigzag fashion. The yajnopavita of Vishnu hangs from the left shoulder forming a loop over the pleats of uttarlya, passes below the uttarlya and is continued down to the right knee. The fluttering sash-ends of the uttarlya meet those of Lakshmi’s garment on the proper right and the cape ends of Garuda on the left. Three examples of this theme appear to be alike. The example from Changu Narayana (pl. 25A) shows Vishnu standing on a rectangular pedestal marked by lotus scrolls issuing from a purnaghatas, while Lakshmi stands on a lotus pedestal to indicate that she is kamalasan and Garuda stands on a circular rocky pedestal of two tiers. There are two examples of the same theme from Kathmandu which are now in the National Museum. One of them shows a similar arrangement of pedestals, though the rock-pedestal of Garuda has been left unfinished while in the other case the figures stand on lotus pedestals. In the latter case the luxurious treatment of drapery also has been avoided and the sash-ends of the shawl of Vishnu do not meet those of Lakshmi and the cape of Garuda, while the loin cloth of Vishnu is of the sakhachha variety without any central pleat. While the previous two images are datable to circa ninth century, the last one (pl. 23) may be assigned to circa tenth century.

There is a third image under worship in the open area at Naxal, which is similar to the image from Changu Narayana. This style appears to have been continued for at least three centuries as is indicated by a tenth-eleventh century specimen preserved in the Archaeological Garden at Patan. A degenerate version of the same theme is seen in a niche of the Kumbhesvara Tank, Patan which may date from circa fourteenth century. The image is much mutilated and Vishnu has lost the upper two hands with the attributes. The faces of the figures are completely of the Nepalese cast. This theme survived until the fifteenth century as is indicated by an inscribed sculpture, dated NS 537 (AD 1416) now preserved in the Archaeological Garden, Patan. Iconographically it continues the same theme but the sculptural style and modelling are typical of the Later Malla period. The lower right hand of Vishnu here clearly holds a lotus stalk. The figures of Lakshmi and Garuda are thick set and stumpy and a Siva-linga is depicted above the halo of Vishnu to indicate the predominance of Saivism.

The same theme is repeated on the four sides of a circular column which has been taken by some scholars to be a Siva-linga. Iconographically it represents the same subject but stylistically it is degenerate and may date from circa thirteenth century.
JALAŞAYANA VISHṆU

In comparison to the standing (sthānaka) and seated (āsana) varieties, the reclining (śayana) type of Vishṇu image is extremely rare. Two sculptures of this theme are well known, one from Budha Nilakantha of circa seventh century AD and the other from Balaju which is of later date. The image at Budha Nilakantha is enshrined in a square tank fed by natural fountains and represents a colossal figure of four-armed Vishṇu reclining on Ādiśesha. His lower right hand held in the varada carries a circular fruit. The remaining hands carry chakra represented as a wheel, gadā and śaṅkha. He lies on the coils of the Primordial serpent whose hoods numbering eleven provide a canopy over his head. He wears kiriṭa-mukūta, ratna-kunḍalas, ananta-shaped armlets, wristlets, torque, uttarīya treated as on udara-bandha with side knots and two jewelled loops and lower garment fastened by a jewelled belt. Scales are represented all over the coils of the serpent. This monumental image, characterised by elemental power and heroic proportions shares the modelling and features of the early images of Vishṇu from Changu Narayana. The convolutions of the nāgas are comparable with those of the Kāliyadamana image from the Basantpur Palace, Kathmandu and the lower part of the Vishṇu Viśvarūpa from Changu Narayana.

The later image from Balaju is smaller in comparison though still colossal and differs from the Budha Nilakantha in carrying divergent attributes in the two upper hands. While the Budha Nilakantha represents the familiar Śrīdhara form of Vishṇu, the Balaju image carries akshamālā in the upper left hand and flask in the upper right hand, representing Vishṇu as reclining in yōga-nidrā.

INCARNATIONS OF VISHṆU

Of the Daśāvatāras of Vishṇu early sculptural representations are available only of Varāha, Vāmana or Trivikrama, Narasimha and Kṛishṇa. Representations of the remaining Avatāras or of the full complement of the Daśāvatāras are not earlier than the Later Malla period.

The Varāha form is represented by the powerful sculpture of the god locally called Dhum-Varāha at Kathmandu assignable to circa sixth century. The god is represented as two-armed standing in pratyāśīdhāsana with a boar’s head and a human body. His right foot is being supported in adoration by the great serpent. The god has placed his right hand on his waist indicative of his strong determination and holds a śaṅkha in his left hand. He is caressing with his snout the petite delicate figure of Prithvi who has been supported on his powerful left arm. Although the figure is not as colossal as the famous Udayagiri Varāha, it is equally powerful and has bulky volume and proportion imbued with dynamic energy (pl. 33B).

The Kṛiśnāvatāra represented by the image of Kṛishṇa subjugating Kāliya from the Basantpur Palace, Kathmandu is roughly contemporaneous with the above and shows the prodigious child-god trampling on the head and shoulder of the powerful serpent who is writhing in helpless indignation. The lithe movement of Kṛishṇa and the massive proportions of the serpent and his convolutions are remarkable.
The Trivikrama form of Vishnu, incorporating the Vaman incarnation, caught the special fancy of the Nepalese artist and is represented by four images which are described below:—

The image from Lajimpat labelled as Vishnu Vikrantamurti, dated in year 389 (AD 467) represents eight-armed Vishnu as Trivikrama, dynamically striding the universe in three paces. The left leg of the god is flung up to the level of his forehead to span the heavens (svargaloka) and is violently stretched in one ascending oblique line with his right leg, planted in the patala-loka (nether world). His right foot, which Namuchi, an associate of Bali, is trying in vain to dislodge, is caressingly supported on the palms of Adisesha and his consort. Beneath the outstretched left leg of the god is represented Vishnu disguised as a two-armed puny vatuka (Vaman) receiving the gift of the three paces of land on which he had asked of king Bali, who, bent with devotion, is pouring water from the gold pitcher held in his hands to confirm the gift. Behind Bali stands his delicate petite queen Vindhyavali with hands folded, followed by two attendants of the sacrificial horse, one standing and the other seated, both holding their respective right hands in the stuti-mudra. The seated attendant carries a sword in the left hand. Behind the standing attendant is represented in relief the sacrificial horse with the yupa (sacrificial post) depicted in the background. The left foot of Trivikrama, lifted head high, is in contact with the terrific face of Rahu or Brahmanna. Beneath this foot is shown the figure of Jambavan (?) cutting somersaults while playing on a drum held in his hands. The main right hand of Trivikrama is held in kati, the remaining right hands hold gadha, chakra and the patakamudra. The main left hand carries bow (mutilated), while the remaining left hands carry shield, sakha and the tarjanamudra. The god wears kirita-mukuta widening towards the top, ear-pendants, torque, udara-bandha with its conspicuous knot and pleated ends fluttering down on the right side, vanamala and a lower garment fastened by a belt. On the right flank of the god is represented the slender figure of two-armed Lakshmi carrying lotus stalk and scarf and floating in the air to approach her Lord. She is followed by Garuda who is depicted as a winged human figure, with hands in ashati, flying towards his Lord. Above Garuda is shown a flying vidyadharas with hands folded. The image is worn out and defaced and carries a two-line inscription in the Gupta script on the pedestal.

The figures of Lakshmi and Vindhyavali are slender and recall the Pallava female forms in their delicate and sensitive modelling. In contrast to these is the powerful monumental figure of Trivikrama imbued with elemental energy and dynamism which are vividly portrayed by the dramatic stance of the god and heightened by the sweep of the god’s vanamala, the fluttering knot and pleats of his scarf, the helpless attitude of Namuchi clinging to his right foot, the sudden twist of the head and the snake-hoods of Adisesha, the floating lotus pedestal of Lakshmi who is thrown off in the air, the vigorous flight of Garuda and the violent somersault of Jambavan (?)..

Although the principal elements of the story are already present in the Trivikrama relief from Pawaya of the Gupta period and on the more elaborate rock-cut sculptures at Badami (sixth century) and Mahabalipuram (seventh century), the monumental energy and the dramatic vigour of the Nepal image anticipate the art of Elephanta and Ellora.
Its stance and tense vigour are strongly reminiscent of the sculpture of Tripurântaka (DGA Photo No. 804 of 1955) from the corridor of the Kailâsa at Ellora.

Such dynamism is not found in the Indian art of the fifth-sixth centuries and even the Râshtrakûta art of India has not produced a more powerful image of Trivikrama.

The image of Vishnu Vikrântamûrti found on the confluence of the Tilganga and the Bagmati (pl. 14) appears to be a poor copy of the image from Lajimpat, though it looks relatively fresh and shows the inscription on the pedestal in excellent preservation. It is obviously the handiwork of an inferior artist and lacks the power and dynamism of the Lajimpat figure. Its main figure has no strength and even the modelling particularly of the arms is poor. The way king Bali is shown pouring water from the golden pitcher is far from convincing. The figure of queen following the king also lacks delicacy. The head of flying Garuḍa is disproportionately large and most of the subsidiary figures lack animation and coordination.

Vishnu as Trivikrama from Changu Narayana is represented striding the three worlds with his right foot firmly planted on an ornate pedestal on the ground and the left leg flung up to heavens in a straight line with the right leg. The right foot of the god supported by worshipful Ádiśeṣha and adored by a female figure probably Bhû-devi represented half emerging from the pâlāla with an offering of basketful of flowers, is being vainly dislodged by Namuchi, an associate of king Bali, wearing a head-dress representing jatê-mukuta, kuṇḍalas and a heavy torque made of three strands of pearls. His left foot is also being supported in supplication by Râhu, whose bust is shown with a grotesque face and dishevelled hair and wearing kuṇḍalas of two types, besides a torque. The god is eight-armed. The lowest pair of hands is broken. Of the second or the main pair, the right one is stretched out in the pâlakā pose, while the left one is held in the tarjanî-mudrâ. The third pair carries a sword and gadâ, while the uppermost upraised pair of hands carries chakra and shield. The god wears kiriṣṭa-mukuta, squarish râma-kuṇḍalas, kaṇ̄ṭhī of three strands of pearls, yajñopavita of pearls, jewelled armlets, wristlets, udara-bandha with a looped knot on the left side and fluttering sash-ends on the right and a lower garment with a brocade border reaching below the knees. Beneath the legs of the god is represented his two-armed dwarf form (Vâmana) as a young brahmachārin wearing only a deer-skin which passes below his right arm and reaches up to the knees. He is shown accepting an offering made from a large bowl held in the left hand of king Bali, who stoops in humility and also offers water from a golden jug held in his right hand to confirm the gift asked for by the wily dwarf. King Bali, who is very modestly dressed as a yajamâna in a lower garment and a scarf (uttariya) without any jewellery and crown, is followed by his queen represented standing in a graceful tribhâṅga. On her left stands the Aśvamedha horse, below which is seated a guard wearing turban resembling jatâ-mukuta and carrying what looks like a bow and a mutilated sheaf of arrows. The front feet of the horse whose head is represented turning back gracefully are placed on a sacrificial pedestal. Behind the horse peep out the heads of two soldiers with hair-dress resembling jatâ-bhâra; one of them is shown as wielding a sword and the other holding a gadâ. Above them is represented a boyish figure hurled down from heaven by the thrust of the god’s left foot. To his left is depicted Jâmbavân.
flying with hands in āñjalī. On the corresponding right side appears the flying suave figure of winged Gāruḍa in full human form with hands in āñjalī. To the right of Gāruḍa stands on a full-blown lotus in graceful tribhanga Lakṣmī carrying a long winding lotus stalk and scarf. Above the oval halo of the god and on both flanks of it are represented clouds, with the orbs of the sun and the moon of equal dimensions, flanked on each side by a flying vidyādhara carrying a garland. The pedestal of this image shows geometrically treated floral carvings, done in low relief. This image is made of greenish grey stone and appears to date from circa eighth century. The figures of Lakṣmī and Vindhyāvalī are very sensitively modelled and both wear a net type of head-dress with a fillet (adding a triangular diadem in the case of Lakṣmī), patra-kundalas, torque of one strand of pearls (ekāvalī) with a cylindrical bead-pendant, armlets, bangles and anklets, besides an uttarīya (scarf) and lower garment secured by a jewelled mekhalā of three strands with a central clasp.

This figure repeats the theme of the Lajjimpat image with difference of details and is much better preserved. It not only maintains the classical quality of the Lajjimpat image but carries forward its vitality and dynamism to a more dignified pitch, with a touter modelling. Technically, it is better finished with a perforation in the central part of the stele to permit three-dimensional treatment of the arms of Trivikrama. It is worth noting that Rāhu is represented here as adoring the uplifted left foot of the god and flying Jāmbavān is clearly depicted below Rāhu, while the horse in the Lajjimpat image is shown with a tilted agitated head, participating in the drama being enacted.

Sikha Narayan has also yielded an image of eight-armed Viṣṇu as Trivikrama (pl. 16). The right foot of Viṣṇu rests on a lotus seat, upheld by Śeṣanāga, while Namuchi, an associate of king Bali, tries in vain to dislodge the foot. The left foot of the god is flung up neck high. His main right hand is stretched out in the daṇḍa-hasta pose while his main left hand is held in the tarjant-mudrā. The remaining right hands carry fruit (varada), sword and chakra. The remaining left hands carry gada, śākha and vajra. The occurrence of vajra is significant showing Tāntric Buddhist influence. On the proper right flank stands the figure of two-armed Lakṣmī on lotus-seat carrying fruit (varada) and lotus flower with a long stalk. On her right stands winged Gāruḍa in human form with hands in āñjalī. Below Lakṣmī is Ādiśeṣa in human form and below Gāruḍa is a female figure emerging from the earth with hands in āñjalī, representing Bhū-devī or Mahāśvetā. Below the stretched leg of Viṣṇu is represented the scene of Viṣṇu as a dwarf brahmachārin carrying a stick in the left hand and approaching Bali who is represented dressed as a yajamāna carrying a golden pitcher in the right hand and a basket of offerings in the left hand. On his left stands his queen Vindhyāvalī on whose left again stands Šukrāchārya with the right hand in vyakhya-na-mudrā, warning Bali against his rash act of charity. Adjoining Šukrāchārya is a yūpa (sacrificial post), complete with a garland and fluttering banner, on a platform with the sacrificial horse standing in front. Behind the horse are depicted two of its warrior attendants each holding a sword. Curiously enough one of the warriors wears a hair-dress resembling jatā-bhāra. An asura is shown plunging downwards beneath the left foot of Viṣṇu which is being worshipped by Rāhu, represented with a broad terrific face with bulging eyes. Beneath Rāhu is depicted Jāmbavān seated in virāsana with his hands in aṇžali. The oval halo of the god is flanked by vidyādhāraṇas carrying garland and by two gods (probably Brahmā and Śiva) whose heads alone are seen wearing jaṭā-mukūṭa. They peep out of a thick screen of clouds which is schematically depicted. On either side are depicted circular orbs representing the sun and the full moon.

This is a medieval version of the same scene with the self-same dramatis personae as represented on the Lajimpat and Changu Narayan images, but completely devoid of animation and without any inter-relation between the figures of the narrative. All the figures are depicted in a full frontal pose and are completely wooden and static. Even the great god is a mere caricature of the old dynamic one. From the degenerate style and the attribute of vajra indicating the creeping influence of Tāntricism the figure is attributable to circa eleventh century.

Four-armed Narasiṃha standing in pratyālīḍhāsana in a terrific attitude, rips open the chest of Hiranyakasipu with the main pair of hands and carries a bunch of flowers in the upper right hand and a full blown lotus in the upper left hand. But for the head which is that of a lion complete with manes, he is entirely human in form. His manes rise like flames in anger. He wears a kāṇṭhi of a single strand of large pearls (ekāvali) with a cylindrical bead-pendant, vaisjaya-nilā in the upavīta fashion, ananta-shaped armlets, wristlets and lower garment, decorated with stripes and diamond design. He is flanked on the right by two-armed Lākṣmī standing in samabhāṅga and carrying a fruit-like object (probably bīlva) and a tall winding stem of lotus flower. The modelling of this figure shows grace and elegance. She wears a net type of head-dress adorned by a jewelled fillet, patra-kundalas, kāṇṭhi (similar to that of the god) broad bunches of armlets and bangles, and anklets, besides a scarf on the upper body shown by faintly incised lines and the usual diaphanous lower garment reaching up to the ankles and fastened by a jewelled mekhālā of three strands with a central clasp. On the right of Lākṣmī, a little below her, stands winged Garuḍa in human form with hands folded. On the proper left of the god stands a moustached attendant (probably Vishva-ketu) wearing a peaked cap and a long coat resembling the Iranian chohga fastened by a tight belt of cloth. With his right hand held up in the stuti-mudrā (praising attitude) and a long staff in his left hand, he resembles Dānḍa in the Śūrya images. Hiranyakasipu wears hair resembling a jaṭā-bhāra and heavy kundalas, while his torque, armlets, wristlets and lower garment resemble those of the god. His right hand clasps the gadā which has partly broken and fallen down, while his left hand is dangling helplessly. The broken gadā alludes to the blow he dealt to a pillar in his palace challenging Prahlāda to prove the omnipresence of Viṣṇu. He actually stands on rocks indicating that he represents Girija-Narasiṃha while beneath him are shown two nāgas (meant to be Śeshaṇāga with his consort) with hands in aṇžali standing as it were in waist-deep water indicating the nether regions and the cosmic aspect of the scene. The oval halo of the god is flanked on the right by three-headed bust of Brahmā emerging through clouds and carrying abhaya-cum-akshamālā and a flask type of kamaṇḍalu in the two hands. Brahmā wears jaṭā-bhāra and torque (of the same type as the principal god) and has extended ear-lobes. On the left are seen busts of two gods similarly emerging from the clouds representing heaven; the right one is Indra carrying lotus and vajra and wearing kiriṭa-mukuta, kuṇḍalas, torque, armlets, wristlets and yajiṣpavita. He is shown as Sahasrāksha (thousand-eyed) with numerous eyes represented horizontally in two rows on his chest and shoulders, besides the third eye appearing on the forehead. The god on the left wearing jatā-jīṭa and carryig varada and kamaṇḍalu, probably represents Śiva as a Yogin. The fallen three-peaked jewelled diadem and the broken top portion of the heavy gadā of the demon are shown in a cavity of the rock, below the left foot of the god. This image, made of greyish black lime-stone appears to belong to circa eighth century. This is a powerful sculpture showing elemental energy and dynamism, though it suffers from the handicap of frontality.
BRAHMANICAL IMAGES

Vishnu as Viśvarūpa (pl. 28). A good part of the upper right corner of the stèle is obliquely broken off. From what has survived, the god appears to have had ten heads. The uppermost head (really a bust complete with two arms) wears a jatā-mukuta though mutilated, and obviously pertains to Brahmana, which is confirmed by the occurrence of a seated four-armed image of Śiva on the proper right flank (it may be presumed that the corresponding missing figure on the left flank represented Vishnu). The remaining nine heads are arranged in three superposed rows. The god is ten-bodied. The right hands hold fruit indicating benediction (varada-mudrā), a double axe, sword, bunch of arrows and chakra. The left hands carry gadā (kaumodakī), a tall bow (śāṅga), a highly ornate cushion-like shield, peacock feathers held like chāmara and śaṅkha. The god stands in samabhāṅga. His feet are supported by Bhū-devi, half emerging from the earth, as well as by the flanking nāgarājas, who stand in chest deep water flanked on each side by a pair of elephants (dīggajas). Bhū-devi with the nāgarājas and the elephants of the right flank are separated from the lower panel depicting Śeshaśayi Vishnu by the long staff (musala), held in one of his right hands.

The lower panel represents Vishnu reclining on the coils of Ađiśesha. The god, who may alternately represent Saṇkarśana, is four-armed and carries a powerful musala in the lower right hand, tall standard crowned by a double-faced makara as well as a plough-share (a combination of hala and makara-ketu) in the upper left hand and a flask in the lower left hand.

Viśvarūpa is flanked on each side by a flying figure carrying floral offerings, perhaps representing Lakṣmī and Urvaśī (or Bhū-devi) which are represented above the nāgas and the dīggajas. On the left of the left female figure is represented a stalky figure of flying Gaurḍa in human form with hands in aṇjali who is recognised by his wings, serpent-garland and plumes arranged as a three-tiered prabhāvali. On the right of the right female figure is represented two-armed figure of perhaps Arjuna with hands in aṇjali carrying a long bow (gāndiva) leaning against his right shoulder. He is distinguished by a mailed coat as befits a warrior and wears kiriṭa-mukuta, kuṇḍalas, torque and wristlets, resembling those of the main god.

Of the nine heads of the god, the three lowest are treated like those of Maheśa-mūrti, the central one wearing kiriṭa-mukuta pertains to Purushottama, while of the two remaining heads, which wear a slightly different type of kiriṭa-mukuta, the right one is terrific and the left one is of the female type with thick lower lips and a tender expression. The right head wears a sarpa-kunḍala and is shown as terrific with bulging eyes, a third eye on the forehead, gaping mouth, exposed teeth, and knit eye-brows, resembling the Aghora form of Śiva, but dons a kiriṭa-mukūṭa adorned by a skull. The three heads of the central row are all alike and wear the same type of kiriṭa-mukūṭa and ratna-kunḍalas as the middle head of the lowest row. Of the next upper row, the central head wears a jaṭā-mukūṭa pertaining probably to Brahmā, while the head on the right wears a kiriṭa-mukūṭa of the same type as worn by the female head of the lowest row. The main face (the central one of the lowest row) of the god wears a kiriṭa-mukūṭa adorned by three circular medallions, the middle one being larger. He also wears circular ratna-kunḍalas, torque of a single strand of pearls (ekāvalī), yajñopavita, wristlets, udara-bandha and a diaphanous lower garment with schematically arranged folds between the legs. The scarf falling over the thighs is connected with the udara-bandha, which shows side-knots higher up and hanging sashes lower down.

On the surviving portion of the proper left side of the backslab are seen at least two rows of bearded ascetics wearing jaṭā-mukūṭa with emaciated bodies. The corresponding figures on the right side, which are well preserved, show the following (from the bottom upwards): 1) Two ascetics wearing jaṭā-mukūṭa with hands in aṇjali; 2) Four Lokapālas in two rows, the upper row showing Indra and Yama both wearing kiriṭa-mukūṭa; the former carrying flower and vajra and the latter carrying staff. The lower row shows Varuṇa carrying pāśa and Kubera wearing a gorgeous coiffure falling on one side, carrying purse. 3) Five successively superposed rows of ascetics wearing jaṭā-mukūṭa with hands in aṇjali. On the top of this side is represented four-armed Śiva seated on lotus and carrying varada, rosary, triśūla and flask. He is flanked on the right by the solar disc. The missing counterpart on the left may have been carved with figures of Viṣṇu and a disc of the moon.

The stele is practically perforated around the heads of the god and the little ledges connecting the heads with the back-slab are utilized for carving attendant figures of flying vidyādhāras with hands in aṇjali, diving figures with hands in aṇjali, mailed figures carrying bow and arrow etc.

The flying figures of Lakshmi and Urvaśī (or Bhū-dvī) wear a triangular diadem on the head. The modelling of these female figures, the main god, the reclining Viṣṇu lower down and particularly of the elephant figures is noteworthy. This image dating from circa eighth century recalls to mind the vigour, dynamism and the compositional arrangement of the colossal figure of seven-headed Śiva from Parel, Bombay.

This is a powerful representation of Viṣṇu as Supreme God who encompasses within himself the entire cosmos. The transcendent power and immeasurable dimensions are expressed through the vertical extension of the heads in the space and through the spreading arms and the swelling chest, heaving with the latent supernatural energy. The diving and soaring divinities hovering round the god—a concept taken from the Liṅgodbhava form of Śiva—also stress the same idea. Viśvarūpa pervades the universe with his feet planted in the nether regions (pātala-loka) indicated by the nāgas and with his uppermost head piercing the heavens, which are shown by the representation of the sun and the moon (the latter broken off) at the top of the stele. The same concept is expressed in terms of horizontal extension by the portrayal of the four diggajas and the four Lokapālas.
BRAHMANICAL IMAGES

The threefold arrangement of the heads emphasizes the triple cosmic functions of creation, preservation and dissolution. The ideas of dissolution and creation are epitomised in the compositional arrangement of the stele itself. From the Śeshaśayi aspect of the god, in the lower field, representing the static stage of dissolution, emanates as it were the main form of Viśvarūpa like a lotus-stalk culminating in the crowning head of Brahmā who symbolizes creation. This great emanation is being watched with bewilderment by an admiring galaxy of gods and rishis who crowd round Viśvarūpa. This image indeed attempts a comprehensive visual representation of the Vedic myths of creation, a synthesis of the four sargas and the grand concept of Viṣṇu as Viṣṇu rūpa as propounded in the Bhagavadgītā. The image shows remarkable agreement with the Viṣṇu rūpa of Krishṇa as described in the Bhagavadgītā and the identification is reinforced by the presence of Arjuna depicted as a mailed warrior carrying his gāndiva bow.

IMAGES OF SŪRYA

Sūrya is the most important of the Vedic solar deities which were collectively known as Ādityas. Their number, indefinite in the early Vedic text, was later fixed as twelve, though there was no rigid uniformity regarding their names and attributes. Sūrya, as the visible celestial luminary, was represented in the beginning and, often subsequently, in the form of an orb, disc or wheel. The cult worship and iconography of Sūrya absorbed, in course of time, many features of Iranian sun-worship which are reflected in the so-called udichya-vesha given to the god, comprising a long coat, often armoured, trousers and high boots and some peculiar beliefs and practices connected with sun-worship. Representations of the sun-god start in India from the first century BC and become popular from the Kushana period onwards. Sūrya figures among the most popular Brahmanical gods and was worshipped either independently or together with or as a constituent of the Navagrahas, which were propitiated to ward off evils and diseases and to ensure happiness and prosperity.

Sun-worship was popular also in Nepal and we have epigraphical evidence for the installation of an image of the sun-god in the year 402 (AD 480) during the reign of the Lichchhavi king Mānadeva. No Sūrya image, however, is hitherto known from the Kathmandu Valley of a date earlier than the eleventh century.

The earliest known (pl. 67) image comes from a water-conduit at Naxal, Kathmandu and is now preserved in the National Museum, Kathmandu. Besides being the earliest, it is also remarkable in several other respects like investing the god with the udichya-vesha (northern dress) comprising the tunic, trousers and the high boots. The kirtīa-mukūṭa with conspicuous collars are among its exceptional features. So are also the two kneeling devotees on the flanks which are associated with the images of Padmapāni Lokeśvara dating from the ninth-tenth centuries. The dignified physiognomy of the god with wide open eyes, the symmetrical arrangement of the various constituents, the detailed treatment of the lotus blossoms held in Sūrya’s hands and crisp rendering of the lotus scrolls on the prabhāvalī are noteworthy. The god stands in samabhaṅga and carries full-blown lotus flowers in the two hands with palm-lines deeply incised (the deep incisions look suspiciously modern). He is draped in a double-breasted tunic with wide collars secured by an udara-bandha with a broad suspended loop and sash-ends fluttering schematically like a fan on either side. Below the udara-bandha is seen a jewelled waist-band with a central clasp securing the lower garment, though it is not at all clear where the tunic ends and the lower garment begins. The lower garment which is tucked into the high boots looks partly like trousers and partly like dhōti with centrally suspended folds and slightly spreading lateral folds. The image is inscribed and dated NS 179 (AD 1058), the inscription referring to the god as Ādītya (pl. 70A).

---

1 This particular sun-god was called Indra (Indro nāma divākarab). Gnoli, op. cit., p. 10. It is interesting to note that Indra is mentioned as one of the Ādityas in the Atharvaveda and the Taṁśiṇy Brahmapa (I, 1, 9, 1-3). Indra is also referred to as one of the Twelve Ādityas in the Suprabhadāgama, Gopinath Rao, Elements of Hindu Iconography, Madras, 1914, I, Appendix C, pp. 83-84) and also in the Bhavishya, Kṛṣṇa and Bhāgavata Purāṇas and the Śabakaṭalpaprakrama (N. K. Bhattasali, Iconography of Buddhist and Brahmanical Sculptures in the Dacca Museum, Dacca 1929, p. 155).

The next image of the sun-god, originally from Thapahiti, Patan and now deposited in the Archaeological Garden at Patan, is inscribed and dated NS 185 (AD 1065) and refers to the god as Mūladītya. It represents Sūrya as a well-built stately figure without boots, flanked by Daṇḍa and Piṅgala, each standing in an easy tribhaṅga and holding a staff. The flanking figure on the proper left also holds a chāmara. In the absence of the distinctive iconographic attributes, it is, however, difficult to distinguish Daṇḍa from Piṅgala. Sūrya wears a kirīṭa-mukuta and is dressed and ornamented exactly like contemporary standing figures of Vishṇu and Padmapāni-Lokeśvara. The treatment of the udara-bandha and the lower garment with the suspended loop and the central lateral folds indeed hark back to the ninth century convention.

The next image of Sūrya from Saugal Tol, Patan, inscribed and dated NS 203 (AD 1083), is almost a replica of the previous image, but with a taller build and a higher crown for the main god.

The next Sūrya image, fixed in a small shrine at Bhaktapur, stands on a large lotus pedestal. From the same lotus stalk stem smaller lotuses harbouring seated figures of the remaining eight planets, arranged in a maṇḍala, which together with the principal figure of the sun-god constitute the Navagraha group (pl. 70B). Chandra and Maṅgala, seated on the proper left and right flanks of the halo of Sūrya are easily identified by their respective attributes, viz. a pair of lotuses and a śakti held in the hands. Below Maṅgala and Chandra are depicted respectively Brihaspati and Budha, recognised by the akshamālā and bow. Again below Brihaspati and Budha are shown respectively Śani and Śukra, the latter identifiable by the akshamālā and kamaṇḍalu. The lowest pair comprising Rāhu and Ketu are easy to recognize, the former by the sword and the latter by the depiction of only the bust with hands held in aṇji-mudrā. The modelling of Sūrya who stands under an umbrella follows the model of the two dated images, just described, though the forelegs are stiff and wooden and the central pleats of the lower garment are arranged much too mechanically, suggesting a twelfth century date for the figure.
Roughly contemporary with the above is a stele showing standing Sūrya flanked by Śiva and Vishnū and riding in his chariot drawn by seven rearing winged horses. Among Sūrya's personal retinue we have, in the middle below Sūrya, charioteer Aruṇa driving the chariot and at the two ends Ushā and Pratyushā shooting arrows. Sūrya and all members of his personal retinue are represented wearing armoured coat which stands in sharp contrast with the bare upper bodies of Śiva and Vishnū. The sensitive modelling of the body type of Śiva and Vishnū follows the ninth century convention but the disproportionately large round faces betray a later date.

Sūrya driving a chariot of seven horses and accompanied by his charioteer and Ushā and Pratyushā became a very popular type which continued down to the eighteenth century. An example of this from Banepa dated NS 514 (AD 1394) introduces beneath the chariot two demons, weilding gadā and representing the forces of darkness, who are being shot at by the twin archers Ushā and Pratyushā (pl. 72A). Sūrya here has a typical Nepali face with a broad forehead and a smiling expression. A variant of the above type is found enclosed by the eight other grahas in a mandala, the entire composition comprising the image of the Navagrahas dominated by Sūrya. One such image in Tabahal, Kathmandu is dated NS 583 (AD 1462).

One of the niches on the eastern side of the Siddha Pokhari at Bhaktapur contains an image of Sūrya riding a similar chariot and with the same complement of companions but enclosed by as many as sixteen Ādityas, each carrying, like the principal god, a pair of lotus blossoms held by the stalk. The image is dated NS 589 (AD 1468).

Side by side with standing figures of Sūrya we also get figures of the god seated in padmāsana in his chariot drawn by either one or five or seven winged horses, and represented with or without attendants or companions. An image of Sūrya from Kirtipur, dated NS 772 (AD 1651) presents an interesting variant of this type which shows Sūrya seated in padmāsana on a couchant horse (pl. 69A).

We may now notice the aberrant types of Sūrya images. A worn out circular stele from Sikha Narayana of circa sixteenth century shows Sūrya seated on a throne which is placed on the usual type of chariot drawn by seven horses and with an unusual by large crowd of companions and attendants arranged below and on the sides of the main figure.

A badly defaced contemporary square stele from the Kumbhēśvara Tank at Patan shows Sūrya standing in the usual type of chariot accompanied by a multiple group of figures, besides the usual companions. Brahmā and Vishnū are represented on the right and left flanks and Śiva above the head of Sūrya indicating that the founder of the image was devoted to all the gods but considered Śiva as the highest. It is interesting to note that two worn out figures each perched on a lotus pedestal and resembling Buddha, are seen flanking the canopy of the umbrella depicted in the upper field of the stele, suggesting the thoroughly eclectic religious inclinations of its founder.

Two figures of Sūrya of the seventeenth century betray clear impact of Tāntric influence. One of them from the Sundari Chowk, Patan shows Sūrya, with his Śakti on his lap, seated on a lotus pedestal marked by a winged rearing horse. Sūrya is four-armed, carrying, besides the usual pair of lotus blossoms, abhaya and kalaśa. An interesting feature of this image is its background of clouds, represented in the Chinese style. The other image from Hanuman Ghat, Bhaktapur represents four-headed and ten-armed Śūrya standing in āśīhaśana on a pair of recumbent horses. Besides the usual lotus blossoms held in the main pair of hands, Śūrya also carries abhaya, rosary, arrow and javelin in the right hands and shield, bow, goad and varada in the left hands.

Independent images of Chandra are also available to a limited extent in Nepal, but none of these is assignable to a date earlier than the Late Malla period. According to the iconographic texts Chandra or Soma should hold a pair of kumudas (white water-lilies) and his chariot may be drawn by either horses or geese. In actual practice the Nepal artists only replaced the seven horses by the seven geese and modelled the Chandra image after the familiar Śūrya icon. No distinction was made even in regard to the attributes held in the hands and Chandra was represented, like Śūrya, holding a pair of lotus blossoms, wearing armour and riding in a chariot, accompanied by the charioteer flanked by the two female archers shooting arrows. Of the two representative Chandra images, one from Gokarna, assignable to the eighteenth century (pl. 68A), is simpler, while that from Gaidhara, Patan, datable to circa seventeenth century, depicts the god surrounded by the other members of the Navagraha group including Śūrya in a maṅgala (pl. 68B). In both of them Chandra can be distinguished from Śūrya only by his chariot drawn by seven flying geese in the place of horses.

Lastly we may note a pair of terracotta figures from Rani Pokhari, Kathmandu depicting a two-armed god holding kumudas (water-lily blossoms) in the hands and riding a crocodile mount. Since Chandra holds water-lilies and is believed to have emanated from Varuṇa whose mount is crocodile, Chandra has been depicted riding a crocodile as is prescribed in the illustrated iconographical text of the Pratishthālakshaṇasārāsamuchchaya, published from Nepal as Devatāchitra-saṅghraḥātmaika, I, (Kathmandu, 1963), p. 59.

There is a small terracotta shrine on a watertank at Bhaktapur which enshrines the terracotta figure of a two-armed god holding lotus blossoms and riding a peacock. Since Maṅgala is believed to have emanated from Kārttikeya whose mount is peacock, the god is identifiable with Maṅgala. It is interesting to note that peacock has actually been prescribed as a vāhana of Maṅgala in the illustrated iconographical text of the Pratishthālakshaṇasārasamuchchaya, p. 60.

IMAGES OF ŚIVA

The symbolic worship in the form of liṅga is conceptually older than the iconic worship of Śiva in India. That this was true also for Nepal is proved by a number of inscribed liṅgas, datable to the fifth and sixth centuries AD found in the Valley. The practice of naming Śiva-liṅgas after the persons who consecrated them also obtained in Nepal which was celebrated since early ages as the land of Lord Paśupatinātha. It is, therefore, stands to reason that the symbolic worship of Śiva was quite old and well-established in the land.
The iconic worship of Śiva appears to have started with the mukha-liṅgas, which combine the symbolic with the anthropomorphic forms. Some examples of mukha-liṅgas from Nepal with one face and quite a few with four faces are known. An ekamukha-liṅga from the Paśupati area (pl. 53A) with a fine oval face and thick warm lower lip recalling the Indian mukha-liṅgas of the Gupta period is attributable to circa sixth century. Two chaturmukha-liṅgas from Deo-Patan and one from Nala, which are typical of the class, have been illustrated. These show the main or eastern face as that of Tatpurusha-Mahādeva, the southern face as that of Aghora-Bhairava, the northern face as that of Vāmadeva-Umā and the western face as that of Sadyojāta-Nandin while the top represents the invisible fifth face of Īśāna-Sadāśiva. The face of Aghora-Bhairava is fierce and terrific and usually the serpent and the skull are associated with it. All other faces are beatific, that of Vāmadeva-Umā being particularly handsome. In Nepal all of them are represented as two-armed carrying the same attributes, viz. the rosary, being a symbol of the re-integration of this world, and the water-jar. The specimen from the Bhubanesvarī temple, referable to circa tenth-eleventh century (pl. 53B), resembles the main deity of the Paśupati temple and its principal eastern face representing Tatpurusha-Mahādeva has a handsome physiognomy with meditative expression. The other specimen from Tāmreśvarā (the metallic mask alone is visible covering and conforming in contours to the original stone liṅga) is stylistically not earlier than the twelfth century (pl. 54B) and has the four usual faces, of which the north one pertaining to Vāmadeva-Umā actually represents the head of Ardhanārīśvara, with the right half marked by luxuriant curls and a patra-kunḍala, belonging to Umā, and the left half to Vāmadeva, wearing jata-mukuta and a sarpa-kunḍala (which is unusual). The southern face of Aghora-Bhairava shows knit eye-brows and wears jata-mukuta adorned with skull and crescent and a sarpa-kunḍala in one of the ears. The chaturmukha-liṅga from Nala is largely similar and shows one of the faces wearing a sort of kirāṭa-mukuta, the developed design of which indicates that the specimen is not earlier than the fourteenth century (pl. 54A).

Two earliest known specimens of fully anthropomorphic forms of Śiva from Nepal belong to the sixth century, one of them being precisely dated in AD 573.1 But since these show artistically developed and complicated family-group of Umā-Maheśvara, they should have been preceded by simpler independent figures of Śiva and Pārvatī which are rather rare. A two-armed deity with the crescent in the curly locks and the third eye clearly marked on the forehead is under worship in a small shrine at Aryaghat, adjoining the Paśupatinātha temple and is locally known as Virūpāksha. Now Virūpāksha was a form of Śiva and according to some texts one of the Ekādaśa Rudras as well as a Śaiva guardian deity but the image does not conform to any textual description. On stylistic considerations it may be assigned to circa fourth-fifth century. The earliest known independent sculpture of Śiva, belongs to circa seventh century and comes like the associated image of Pārvatī, from Visalnagar in Kathmandu. Similar independent images of Śiva and Pārvatī of circa tenth century are also found in the Kumbheshvara temple at Patan. Standing in samabhaṅga, they form a pair stylistically and show a softly modelled heavy body type and wear similar mukuta and certain ornaments like torque, armlets and mekhalā. Śiva is four-armed, carrying varada-cum-ratna, rosary, triśula and water-flask and wears yajñopavita, uttariya tied as a udara-bandha with a centrally suspended loop and fluttering sash-ends on the sides and a lower garment with schematically arranged central folds. Pārvatī is two-armed, carrying varada-cum-ratna and a blue lotus (mutilated) and wears the same dress as worn by the goddesses from the seventh to the tenth centuries.

1 Ancient Nepal, No. 4 pp. 39-44, pl. VII. The undated specimen of similar theme and date is published in Ancient Nepal, No. 1, p. 26, pl. II B

The next sculpture, from Gokarna, represents Śiva like any other god, standing in samabhaṅga on a lotus pedestal, flanked by two figures which stand in ābhāṅga on smaller lotus pedestals, issuing from the same stalk. Śiva is four-armed and has the same attributes and wears practically the same dress and ornaments as on the previous image. The flanking figure on the proper left is Pārvatī whose attributes, dress and ornaments are similar to the previous figure. The flanking figure on the right is a two-armed god who wears a peculiar mukuta, usually associated with Indra. His right hand, which is mutilated, may be presumed to be held in varada while his left hand carries what looks like a book (vajra?). Stylistically this sculpture is assignable to circa eleventh century.

Independent images of standing Śiva, carrying the same attributes, continued to be made in subsequent centuries and show the stylistic peculiarities of the respective ages to which they belonged. The later images are often seen to be ithyphallic or draped in the tiger-skin as a loin-cloth, as illustrated by a very late eighteenth century image from Hanumanghat, Bhaktapur with a flamboyant background.

Tantric influence became dominant during the later Malla period and many peculiar and sometimes weird forms of Śiva were conceived. Two examples are noteworthy. The distinguishing feature of one is the depiction of Śiva as five-headed and four-armed carrying abhaya and paraśu in the right hands and mriga and varada in the left hands. A sculpture of this variety kept in the National Museum, Kathmandu, shows Śiva seated oddly on a lotus in lalitāsana with his right foot resting on Nandī represented couchant and regardant. Śiva wears mukuta on all the heads, sarpa-kuṇḍalas, torque, mālā, sarpropavīta, sarpa-valayas and munda-mālā. Below his lotus seat are shown a crowd of adoring gods seated in two tiers in a hilly setting, representing Kailāśa. Another Tantric form of Śiva comes from Hanumanghat, Bhaktapur which shows the god as four-headed and six-armed, standing in āśvāsana with his feet resting on a pair of bulls. He holds abhaya, akshamālā and paraśu in the right hands and triśula, mriga and kalaśa in the left hands. While the National Museum image belongs to circa sixteenth century, the Hanumanghat image is assignable to circa eighteenth century.

UMĀ-MAHEŚVARA

Śiva depicted seated with his consort and known in iconographic texts variously as Umā-Maheśvara, Āliṅgana-mūrti or Umāsahita-mūrti was a very favourite theme in Nepal. The earliest inscribed image of this theme from Patan dated 495 (AD 573)\(^1\) shows the divine couple without any attendants. Śiva is ārdhwa-medhra and two-armed and is represented seated in sukhāsana with his right hand holding varada and fruit kept on his thigh, while his left hand, which is broken off, presumably held Pārvatī in embrace. Śiva is draped only in a lower garment and wears a heavy mukuṭa widening towards the top and few ornaments, viz. two types of kundālas (perhaps a sarpa-kundāla in the left ear), torques and wristlets. Pārvatī is seated in a graceful sukhāsana, her right shoulder reclining against Śiva. The weight of her body rests on her right hand placed against Śiva’s folded left leg, while her left hand is kept languidly on her flexed left knee. Pārvatī wears only a lower garment. Her face is mutilated and of her ornaments only torque and bracelets can be made out. In spite of the poor preservation of the sculpture and the annoying modern restorations, the modelling of the powerful chest of Śiva and the supple waist of Pārvatī reminds one of Aurangabad and Ellora. An almost contemporary sculpture of the same theme, also from Patan,\(^1\) shows Pārvatī seated in a slightly different posture and accompanied by an attendant.

---

\(^1\) Ancient Nepal, No. 4, pp. 39-44, pl. VII

32

The sculpture from Dugahiti Sankhu marks the real beginning of the elaborately composed Śiva-Pārvatī stele, typical of Nepal. Although mutilated and truncated, it shows the divine couple in the Himalayan setting of Kailāsa accompanied by the Nandi bull, Skanda and Pārvatī’s maid. Śiva is ārdhwa-medhra and four-armed seated in lalitāsana, the lower right hand holding nose-gag against the chest, the upper right hand in the vyākyāna-mudrā, the upper left hand carrying triśūla (mutilated) and the lower left hand holding Pārvatī in ārṅgana. Pārvatī, seated in a combined sukhāsana-cum-lalitāsana, is languidly reclining against her Lord with her right arm placed intimately on his left thigh, while her left hand following the cadence of her serpentine flexion, is gracefully placed on her flexed knee. The dress and ornaments worn by Śiva, comprising a large conical mukuṭa, peculiar ear-studs, the kaṇṭhi of double strand of pearls, the yajñopavīta, the wristlets and the udara-bandha with a suspended loop are typical of the eighth-century art of Nepal. Pārvatī wears a diadem placed against her heavy bun of braided hair, large patra-kundālas, kaṇṭhi similar to Śiva’s bracelets and anklets and is draped in a lower garment secured by a broad mekhala. Although the head of Pārvatī’s maid is broken, her graceful stance and finely modelled limbs revealed through her near transparent drapery, like the poise and balance and the supple and sensuous modelling of Pārvatī’s body, are reminiscent of the style of Aurangabad and Ellora. The physiognomy of the divine couple, however, is typically Nepalese and the wasp-like rendering of Pārvatī’s thin waist, though inspired by Ellora\(^2\), is quite individualistic.

The earliest of the typical, well-preserved steles showing Umā-Maheśvara with a full complement of family members and attendants, assignable to circa ninth century comes

---

\(^1\) Ancient Nepal, No. 1, p. 26, pl. IX B. The sculpture has neither been reproduced well nor described fully.

\(^2\) The rocky landscape and the way Śiva is seated in lalitāsana with his right leg placed in a rocky recess is akin to the Ravanpānugraha panel in Ellora Cave 21 (Rāmeśvara).

The reclining posture of Pārvatī, however, is closer to the panel of Śiva-Pārvatī playing dice in Ellora Cave 14, though Ellora definitely shows a sturdier and better integrated body type.
from Kūmbheśvara tank, Patan (pl. 47). This is an elaborate composition of greenish black stone arranged in three parallel tiers and shows Śiva-Pārvatī enjoying domestic bliss in the rocky setting of Kailāsa. Śiva is ārthva-mēdhra and four-armed seated in lalitāsana over a couch. Śiva’s lower right hand (mutilated) is extended in varada, he playfully holds a few curls of his jatā in his upraised upper right hand to receive Gaṅgā (indicating his aspect as Gaṅgādhara-mūrti), he carries triśūla-cum-parāśu in the upper left hand and has carelessly placed his lower left hand on the right shoulder of Pārvatī, supporting the weight of her shoulders and head. Pārvatī is seated in sukhāsana on a smaller couch kneeling against her Lord with her right arm resting intimately on Śiva’s left thigh and the left hand placed with easy grace on her left knee. Śiva wears the crescent on the right side of his jatā-mukuta, ratna-kuṇḍalas, torque consisting of two strands of pearls with a common madhya-mañi, yajñopavīta, wristlets, udara-bandha and a lower garment fastened by a jewelled belt. Pārvatī wears jatā-mukuta, patra-kuṇḍalas, similar torques, wristlets, bell-anklets, besides a scarf (uttoriya) and a lower garment fastened by an elaborate jewelled belt of three strands with a central clasp. Behind Śiva is represented crouching Nandi with his dew-lap sensitively carved. A gāna attends on Nandi offering eatables. Over the head of Nandi is seated two-armed Kārttikeya wearing šikhaṇḍaka type of head-dress, and carrying a fruit in the right hand and śakti with a fluttering banner in the left hand. Behind Pārvatī is represented a flying figure of four-armed vidyādharī carrying lotus flower, chāmara, a bowl of offerings and sword. The dangling right foot of Pārvatī is carelessly supported by an attendant with a touching expression of devotion. The background also shows rocks, behind which stand waist upwards two four-armed dvārapālās (guards) of Śiva, flanking either side of his oval halo and carrying fruit (the left hand guard carries a flower instead of a fruit), rosary, triśūla-cum-parāśu and a flask-shaped water-jar. These guards wear different types of jatā-mukuta.

On the pedestal forming the lowest tier are represented gānas together with four-armed Gaṇeśa and Bṛṅgī dancing or playing music. From the proper right end they are: 1) Ulāka-mukha (owl-faced one) seated on rock and playing on flute, 2) dancing Kumbhāṇḍa with a terrific face carved on the belly and his right hand raised in the stutī-mudrā, 3) dancing four-armed Gaṇeśa, 4) dancing Ghanṭākarṇa, 5) dancing Bṛṅgī with a skeletal frame, 6) Simha-mukha playing on a drum suspended from his neck, and 7) seated Vānara-mukha playing on cymbals.

Gaṅgā is shown on the top of the stele as descending headlong; she is four-armed with her main pair of hands in aṅjali and holding in the other pair a fluttering scarf which convincingly indicates the terrific speed of her descent from the heavens represented by clouds, flanked by the orbs of the sun and the moon. Śiva is also represented here as Umāprasādana and is shown with his lower left hand placed carelessly on the right shoulder of Pārvatī to assuage her injured feelings on account of the acceptance by Śiva of Gaṅgā, who was after all another female.

The image is remarkable for the exquisite expression of the conjugal love and intimacy of the divine pair and reminds one of the initial verses of Kālidāsa’s Raghuvamśa:

बागवंशिब समपुष्को वागयं प्रतिपत्तये
अगतः पितरो बते पारवती परमेश्वरी॥

34
Note their oval faces with thick warm lips and dignified but tender expression. Note also the graceful double bend of the delicately modelled body of Pārvatī which closely hugs and caresses the limbs of her Lord. This image type is inspired by the Śiva-Pārvatī groups enjoying domestic bliss as represented at Ellora, but it offers a novel reinterpretation of the theme by combining also the Gaṅgādhara and the Umāprasādana aspects in the same composition and by underlining the expressions of tender intimacy and snug homeliness.

This is one of the most popular sculptural compositions and is found in hundreds spread over the entire length and breadth of the Valley, attesting the hold which Śaivism and particularly the theme of Śiva as Umāliṅgana-mūrti has ever had on the popular mind of Nepal. It is, however, to be noted that no two sculptures are exactly alike and there are always some variations in details, though the general type shows a surprising uniformity right from the ninth to the sixteenth century AD.

Two dated steles† of the same theme are known, which are significant for providing chronological fixed points. The stele from Kulimtol, Patan, dated NS 107 (AD 986) showing the urdhvaretas aspect of Śiva prominently, represents Skanda astride his vāhana peacock, shifts the adoring and descending Gaṅgā on the right flank of Śiva’s halo and introduces a flying vidyādhara carrying a garland on the corresponding left flank and adds a large umbrella as a crowning adornment of the stele. The other stele dated NS 132 (AD 1011) from Ganchanani, Patan represents Śiva-Pārvatī as well as Skanda (without a mount) seated in the same posture as on the ninth century stele, but the Gaṅgādhara aspect is emphasized here by a current of water flowing down from the hands of Gaṅgā (mutilated) and being received on the tresses of the jaṭā of Śiva who is shown wearing an elaborate jaṭā-bhāra and a sarpa-kunḍala in the right ear and a ratna-kunḍala in the left ear. This sculpture also introduces two standing maids attending on Pārvatī, called in the texts as Jayā and Vijayā. Another stele from Patan (pl. 50) assignable to circa tenth century represents the same theme with some interesting variations. The entire retinue is shown in a more lively and dramatic posture, except for the gaṇas as static, led by Gaṇeṣa, who are depicted seated in the lowest tier. Skanda’s representation as a baby straining to reach up to the knee of his divine father with a toy-like peacock by his side adds a homely touch. Its modelling is as sensitive and suave as that of the ninth century stele, though the physiognomy is broader and of the Nepalese cast. The Gaṅgādhara aspect is absent on this stele. The figures in the lowest tier below the pedestal represent from proper right to left, (1) Ghaṇṭākarna (2) three-headed, three-legged and three-armed figure of transformed Bhṛṅgī holding fruit, rosary and book in the three hands (3) four-armed Gaṇeṣa, (4) four-armed Kumbhāṇḍa carrying the same attributes as Śiva’s body-guards but showing a terrific face in the belly, and, lastly (5) emaciated Bhṛṅgī Rishi shown in profile, praising Śiva with the upraised right hand and carrying water-flask in the left hand.

† Ancient Nepal, No. 1, pp. 27-28, pl. XI
To the same time approximately may belong the simpler and smaller stele from Chyasaltol, Patan, published by N. R. Banerjee\(^1\) showing Śiva-Pārvatī seated in a similar pose but with both the left hands of Śiva embracing and caressing Pārvati and with fewer attendants. There are no figures at all above the haloed heads of Śiva-Pārvatī. On the right is seen probably Skanda astride the bull with a seated devotee below, while on the left is seen Pārvati’s maid standing with the upper pair of hands in the aṇjali-mudrā and carrying a sword in the lower left hand with an attendant below supporting Pārvati’s right foot.

To circa eleventh century may be assigned the stele from Nagal Tol, Kathmandu illustrated by Kramrisch\(^2\) which shows a bird perched on the left arm of Pārvatī and typical Nepalese faces for all the figures. To the next century may be attributed a stele from the Saraswati Temple without the Gaṅgādhara aspect and two steles from the Gairidhara, Patan of which one is of the usual run, while the other is of a novel type, and is described below:—

Śiva-Pārvatī is represented seated in ardha-paryāṅkāsana in the rocky setting of Kailāśa (pl. 48). Śiva is four-armed holding in the principal pair of hands a vase, while his upper right and lower left hands are held respectively in abhaya and varada. Pārvatī is seated oddly in the lap of her Lord and is also four-armed and holds a vase with her main pair of hands. A little lower down on the right is seated on a rock, a corpulent male figure (probably Kārttikeya) carrying abhaya and spear (śakti) with a fluttering banner. On the corresponding left side is seated a two-armed maid of Pārvatī carrying sword and shield. In the upper field on either side of the divine pair emerges from the rocks a four-armed attendant guard carrying abhaya, rosary, triśūla and kamaṇḍalū or kapāla. Above the halo are represented two flying vidyādharīs carrying a bowl full of flowers in one hand and a garland in the other. The lowest tier below the pedestal is carved with a seated bearded devotee on the left end, representing the donor couple. Other figures represented from right to left are Simhamukha playing on cymbals, Bṛṛṅgī dancing, Gaṇeśa dancing, Ghaṅtākarna dancing and Vānara-mukha playing on a drum. All figures here have definitely Nepalese features with broad face, prominent cheek-bones and puppet-like mouth. This image fashioned in greenish stone appears to date from circa twelfth century. It has been plausibly suggested that Śiva, carrying like his consort, vase in the main pair of hands, represents Kumbhešvara,\(^3\) the deity after whom this fountain and the temple nearby are known.

To the thirteenth century may be attributed three steles, one from Pharping,\(^4\) the second from the Bajrayogini temple, Sankhu and the third from the Archaeological Garden, Patan all emphasizing the Gaṅgādhara aspect. The last exhibits disintegrated modelling and a thoroughly Nepalese physiognomy and introduces some innovations. In this image the lion mount supports the right foot of Pārvatī whose injured feeling for

---

1. Ancient Nepal, No. 1, pl. X B, p. 26
2. Stella Kramrisch, op. cit., fig. IX, p. 41. The learned authoress has dated the image to the 8th-9th century which is a little too early.
3. Ancient Nepal, No. 1, p. 31
4. Discussed and illustrated in Boston Museum Bulletin, LXVI, No. 345 (1968) by Pratapaditya Pal who has dated this sculpture to the 15th century.
the attention paid to Gāṅgā is being assuaged by Śiva by caressing her bosom. The depiction of the Himalayan hillscape by conical configurations is also noteworthy.

The theme continued to be in vogue till the sixteenth century with progressively loose modelling and with some variations in the number and grouping of the attendants including Pārvati’s maids and the gānas below the pedestal. One of the latest examples comes from Kvalkhu, Patan which rearranges the iconographical cliche and introduces around Umā-Maheśvara seated figures of Brahmā and Vishnū, Ganeśa and Kumāra and Śiva as Yogi and Bhairava in three tiers, the entire composition forming a maṇḍala, which was consistent with the Tāntric proclivities of the age.

Alongside the larger steles, described above, smaller sculptures, representing Umā-Maheśvara were also produced both in stone and metal. We have already noted two such early sculptures from Patan, one undated and the other dated 495 (AD 573).

The next known representation of this theme from Nepal is the bronze image of Umā-Maheśvara in the Baroda Museum and Picture Gallery. It shows four-armed Śiva seated on a cushion in lañitāsana embracing with one of his left hands Pārvati who is seated in sukhasana leaning against Śiva, with her right hand placed on Śiva’s left leg and the left hand resting on her flexed left knee. Śiva’s lower right hand is in the vyākhānā-mudrā while his upper right hand is in the kātaka pose and held some object, which is now missing, like the attribute of one of the left hands. The poise and stance of the divine couple and particularly of Pārvati are directly inspired by Ellora (cf. the panel of Śiva-Pārvati playing dice in Ellora, Cave 14). The features are sharp but softly modelled. Stylistically the image is assignable to circa tenth-eleventh century, although Kramrisch dated it to eighth-ninth century.

To circa thirteenth century are to be attributed three bronzes of Umā-Maheśvara from Nepal, published by Pratapaditya Pal. One of these shows Umā-Maheśvara seated on the back of Nandi who is represented as regardant. Of the remaining two bronzes, one is simple and unaccompanied by any other figures, while the other is a fairly elaborate composition comprising the divine couple flanked by seated Sarasvati on proper right and by Skanda astride the peacock on left, besides five seated figures carved on the front face of the pedestal and dancing Bṛṅgī and a gāna on the two shorter sides. The figures on the front face of the pedestal are Ganeśa in the middle, with the usual body-guards of Śiva at the two ends and Jayā and Vijayā, Pārvati’s maids, in between. While Ganeśa and Śiva’s guards are four-armed, carrying the usual attributes, Jayā and Vijayā are only two-armed, the deity holding varada-cum-ratna and triśūla in the right hands pertaining to Śiva and pustaka and upāla in the left hands pertaining to Pārvati. The figure has a handsome and effeminate appearance with a well-modelled body type and wears jaṭā-bhāra adorned by a diadem, kuṇḍalas, torques, yajnopavīta, armlets, wristlets, pādaṅgadas and a lower garment secured by mekhalā. The hair-do below the diadem, the ornaments of the ears and legs and the treatment of the lower garment have been distinguished. Thus the deity is clearly seen wearing sarpa-kuṇḍala in the right ear and patra-kuṇḍala in the left ear and different types of ornaments above the right and left ankles and a tiger skin on the right (Śiva’s) side and a sārī with central folds on the left (Pārvatī’s) side. Half of the third eye on the forehead has been mistakenly shown on the left side pertaining to Pārvatī, whereas it should have been appropriately depicted on the right side pertaining to Śiva.

---

1 Stella Kramrisch, op. cit., fig. 9. p. 129
2 Boston Museum Bulletin, LXVI, No. 345 (1968). figs. 1-6. The author of the paper, however, has assigned three different centuries (13th, 14th and 15th) to the three bronzes inspite of their striking stylistic kinship.

A terracotta figure of Ardhanārīśvara, assignable to circa eighteenth century, from Rani Pokhari, Kathmandu shows the four-armed deity standing in ādiḥśāsana with the right foot resting on the back of Nandi and the left on that of lion. Like the attributes, the dress and almost all the ornaments are different for the two sides. Thus the right half of Śiva carries rosary and wears sarpa-kuṇḍala, sarpa-keyūras, sarpa-valayas, muṇḍa-mālā and is draped in tiger-skin, while the left half of Pārvatī carries utpala and broken and wears ratna-kuṇḍala and distinctive types of armlets, bangles, hāra, mekhala and vanamālā and is draped in a sārī with a centrally suspended jewelled tassel, characteristic of the eighteenth century Nepalese art (pl. 45B).

HARI-HARA

The syncretistic form of Hari-Hara or Śaṅkara-Nārāyaṇa combines the well-known aspects of Śiva and Vishṇu in the same image. We have evidence for the foundation of an image of Hari-Hara in an inscription dated year 489 (AD 567) from Deo-Patan. The next images of Hari-Hara coming from Naxal, Kathmandu, shows an image of the deity standing in samabhāṅga without any attendant. The right half represents Śiva and shows the jaṭā-mukuta peeping out of the diadem, while the left half shows the kriṭa-mukuta of Vishṇu. The ornaments have not been distinguished. The lower right hand is stretched in the varada and carries rosary, while the upper right hand holds the trīṣūla. The left hands pertaining to Vishṇu show chakra in the upper hand and śaṅkha in the lower one. The god wears torque, ananta-shaped armlets, wristlets, and yajñopavita and is draped in an uttariya treated as udara-bandha with a central suspended loop and lateral ends hanging alongside, besides a loin-cloth which is secured by a mekhala. The lower right and left hands rest on lotus stalks. The modelling of the figure is completely wooden. The figure is, therefore, stylistically assignable to circa twelfth century.

We also get images of Hari-Hara flanked by Pārvatī on the right and Lakshmi on the left, all the three figures standing on lotus pedestals issuing from the same central stalk. Of the two representative figures of this type, one comes from Balaju and is assignable to circa twelfth century, while the other (pl. 58) comes from Paṣupati area and is assignable to circa thirteenth century. Iconographically the two are alike. The main deity has the same attributes as the Naxal image and Pārvatī carries varada-cum-ratna and utpala, Lakshmi holds varada-cum-ratna and lotus, but while the figure from Balaju is closer to the early tradition of representing gods flanked by two female devotees or attendants standing in abhāṅga, the figure from Paṣupati area is farther removed from the tradition. Hari-Hara in the latter case stands not on a lotus but on a rectangular pedestal marked with a lotus stalk. Parvati stands on the right on an independent rocky pedestal, indicating her Himalayan association, while Lakshmi stands on an independent lotus pedestal on the left, showing that she is kamalasana. The god here has a very developed type of oval halo with highly stylised flames. The prabhavali is a larger version of the halo and shows a broad band of scrolls, fringed by a highly stylised band of flames. The faces are broader and of purely Nepalese cast, particularly of the goddess Parvati. While Parvati carries varada and blue lotus, Lakshmi carries abhaya and a lotus held by the stalk. Both of them wear two types of kundalas, viz. ratna-kundalas in the right ear, and asthi-kundalas in the left ear. Further Parvati and Lakshmi stand in tribhanga which itself indicates a later date.
Brahmanical Images

The theme of Hari-Hara continued to fascinate the Newar artist during the Later Malla period also. We have quite a few specimens of Hari-Hara sculptures without any attendant of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, which have completely degenerated into iconographic cliches and are over-burdened with ornamentation which includes flamboyant treatment of drapery. The right half pertaining to Siva reveals the jata-mukuta adorned by the crescent and the skull, sarpa-kundalas, sarpa-valaya and anklet of snakes, while the left half pertaining to Vishnu shows kiritamukuta, ratna-kundala, ratna-valaya and the jewelled padangada. The torques, mekhalas and the highly ornamented drapery which fit in with Visnu’s aspect co-exist with the sarpa-hana which are worn in common, but a distinction has been made with regard to the long mala which is munda-mala on the right side of Siva and vana-mala on the left side of Vishnu. The two representative examples of the latest type of Hari-Hara come from the Siva temple and the Art Gallery at the Bhaktapur Darbar (pl. 57) and are assignable to the seventh century.

The cult-image of stone in the temple of Hari Shankar at Patan is an elaborate composition representing eight-armed Hari-Shankara, (pl. 59), flanked by Parvati on the right and Lakshmi on the left. While the main deity has two mounts, Nandi as regardant on the right (Siva’s) side and Garuda in half human form with hands in aghjali on the left (Vishnu’s) side, Parvati and Lakshmi also have their mounts, lion and tortoise, represented on the pedestal. The right half of the deity pertaining to Siva carries kamandalu, aksh-mala, damaru and trijula in the four right hands and wears jata-mukuta, sarpa-kundala, sarpa-valayas and sarpa-padangada and is draped in a tiger skin. The left half pertaining to Vishnu carries gadha, sankha, chakra and padma in the four left hands and wears kiritamukuta and all jewelled ornaments and is draped in the usual lower garment. The jewelled torque, hara, mekhalas and vanamala as well as the sarpopawita are worn in common. This sculpture is typical of the sixteenth century hieratic art of Nepal.

Lastly we may notice a stone sculpture showing a Tantric form of Hari-Shankar from Rani Pokhari, Kathmandu, assignable to circa seventeenth century (pl. 60). The goddess is six-headed and twelve-armed and stands in adihsasana with her right foot resting on Garuda shown with folded hands and the left one on couchant Nandi. The right hands pertaining to the Vishnu aspect carry varada, vajra-gantra, padma, gadha, sankha and chakra, while the left hands pertaining to the Siva aspect carry trijula, utpala, khataanga, human head, damaru and abhaya. Each head wears a three-peaked diadem and shows the third eye. She also wears patra-kundalas, torque, sarpa-hara, munda-mala, armlets, bangles, padangadas and bell-anklets and is draped in lower garment fastened by a jewelled belt with a latticed apron. The stone image is datable to circa seventeenth century.

NAṬARĀJA

Sculptures of Naṭarāja are less common in Nepal, the earliest example being known from the subsidiary stone shrine, assignable to circa eleventh century, in the compound of the Paśupati temple. The western bhadra niche of the shrine shows twelve-armed Naṭarāja carrying varada, abhaya, trident, rosary and damaru in five right hands. The upper-most pair of hands holds the two ends of a serpent held stretched as a canopy. The remaining left hands carry bell, bird, khaṭvāṅga, and gajahasta. Dancing Pārvatī is represented on the left, while Nandi stands behind the god flanked by two-armed dancing Kārttikeya carrying śakti. A four-armed attendant-guard stands behind rocks on either side of the head of the god carrying varada, rosary, trident and kāmandaḷu. The pedestal shows Gaṇeśa with three gaṇas on each side represented as singing and dancing.

From the Sundari Chowk, Patan, dating from the middle of the seventeenth century come two elaborate steles depicting multi-armed Naṭarāja, dancing in ardha-paryāṅkāsana with his main pair of hands held in the abhaya and gajahasta poses and the uppermost right hand held up in the lalāṭa-tilaka pose. One of them (see infra, p. 45, no. 17) shows sixteen-armed Naṭarāja dancing with his left toes resting on couchant Nandi, surrounded by gaṇas and arranged in a maṇḍala. The dancing figures at the top and bottom of the stele are identifiable respectively with Bṛṇgī and Nandi (in human form), while the animal-headed gaṇas are represented as playing on a variety of musical instruments. The other stele (see infra, p. 47, No. Lower 1) shows eighteen-armed Naṭarāja dancing in a similar pose with his left toes likewise resting on Nandī as regardant, but the lion mount of Pārvatī is also introduced just to counterbalance Nandī. The bull and the lion mounts are depicted on a lotus pedestal which itself rests on a human corpse, indicating the Tāntric nature of the image. Below the pedestal is centrally carved the skeletal figure of Bṛṇgī dancing flanked on each side by four animal-headed gaṇas, playing on musical instruments. At the top of the stele is depicted an eight-armed miniature replica of the central figure of Naṭarāja as a crowning ornament.

Lastly we may notice a blatantly Tāntric form of Naṭarāja from Rani Pokhari, Kathmandu, also assignable to circa seventeenth century. Naṭarāja here is eighteen-armed dancing in ardha-paryāṅkāsana with the left toes resting on a skull-cup. His principal pair of hands significantly carries the bowl and the vindu-mudrā, while the second pair of hands holds the vajra and the vajra-ghanṭā which are all Tāntric emblems. Naṭarāja also wears the Tāntric bone-apron over the lower garment.

BRAHMANICAL TĀNTRIC IMAGES IN THE SUNDARI CHOWK, PATAN

The Sundari-Chowk is a quadrangular palace built by the Malla king Siddhi Narasimha Malla (cīra 1620-57). It is a three-storeyed palace, largely built of brick and timber on a sub-structure of stone plinth with a pent tiled roof. The courtyard is paved with flag stones and contains a circular tank marginally enclosed by two colossal serpents carved in relief. The tank has a fountain, called Kasā-Hiti and its gargoyle, made of gilt copper, represents a gomukha with numerous faces of fish and crocodiles issuing from its sides. On the gargoyle is placed a fine image of Lakshmi-Nārāyaṇa sitting on a flying Garuḍa whose wings form an ornate prabhāvali. Both Lakshmi and Nārāyaṇa are seated in lalitāsana. Nārāyaṇa holds lotus, chakra, śāṅkha and gadā. The right hand of Lakshmi is placed on the left foot of Nārāyaṇa, while her left hand is held in the attitude of exposition.

The fountain is treated internally as an octagon. The octagonal facets are carved into niches, with three to five niches in each facet. Each niche is framed between pilasters represented as tree trunks with overhead foliage forming canopy. There are two series of niches all round. The principal facet with the gargoyle facing south shows on the flanks two empty niches, each complete with the usual ornate tympanum.

The next facet on the proper left flank shows five niches in the upper row. The images are described clockwise starting from the left flank of the gargoyle.

1. Niche 1 shows a figure of Hari-Hara with his Śakti. The god is seated in loose padmāsana, while his consort is seated in lalitāsana on his left thigh. Beneath the seat are represented Nandi and two lions, the mounts respectively of Hara and his consort. In between these mounts is placed winged Garuḍa with folded hands, the vāhana of Hari. Hari-Hara is four-armed carrying rosary and trident-cum-axe in the right hands, pertaining to Hara, and gadā and śāṅkha in the left hands, pertaining to Hari. The Śakti is two-armed carrying ālingana and abhaya. Hari-Hara wears jaṭā-mukuta on the right side and kirīṭa-mukuta on the left, sarpa-kundala in the right ear and ratna-kundala in the left ear, torques, a long necklace, the right half of which is muṇḍa-mālā and the left half a vaījayantimālā, armlets, wristlets and pāṇḍāngadas. The Śakti wears five-peaked jewelled diadem, patra-kundalas, torque, wristlets, besides a scarf and lower garment, secured by a waist-band (ratna-mekhalā). Hari-Hara has a conical nimbus and prabhāvali fringed by flames.

2. The next god is five-headed, four-legged and sixteen-armed deity. Each head is that of a lion, but also shows a pair of horns. Of his two pairs of legs, the upper one is in lalitāsana and the lower one in āliḍhāsana with his right foot resting on seated Nandi looking up. The god carries rosary, khaṭvāṅga, mushti, gāmaru, mace, staff, chakra and trident in his right hands and axe, pāśa, goad, vajra, peacock feathers, serpent, hammer and shield in his left hands. The god is represented with a pot belly and wears fan-shaped raised curls, torque, muṇḍa-mālā, armlets, wristlets, pāṇḍāngadas and lower garment. The Śakti of the god is represented dancing in tribhanga on a seated lion. She is four-armed carrying varada, pāśa, goad, and abhaya. Out of her three heads only two are shown which is highly unusual. Like the god she also wears a muṇḍa-mālā, besides patra-kundalas, torque and wristlets. She is draped in a lower garment with a latticed apron in front.

This appears to be a Śaiva deity of Tāntric form associated with a variety of Simhayānini Durgā.

3. This shows a five-headed and twelve-armed form of Viṣṇu seated in padamāsana on flying Garuḍa, flanked by nāgis with folded hands. Garuḍa is six-armed with his main pair of hands in añjali and carrying in the remaining right hands rosary and chakra and in the remaining left hands umbrella and vase-and-foliage. Of the three lower heads of the god the central one represents the human head (Purushottama), while the side heads are of the boar on the right and of the lion on the left. The two crowning heads are also human. The principal head wears kirita-mukuta, the two side heads have raised curls and the crowning one has a jewelled diadem. The god is twelve-armed. His main right hand carries a jewel like object and the main left hand carrying vase-and-foliage is held in aśīṅga. He also carries bunch of flowers, lotus stalk, gādā, chakra and rosary in the other right hands, and trident, book, śaṅkha, umbrella and varada in the other left hands. He wears ratna-kuṇḍalas, torque, vajrayanti-mālā, wristlets and lower garment secured by a mekhalā. The Śakti of the god is seated on his left thigh in lalitāsana. She is two-armed and carries varada and abhaya. She wears jewelled diadem, patra-kuṇḍalas, torque, vajrayanti-mālā, wristlets and lower garment.

This is a Vaikuntha form of Vishnu shown with two additional heads and his Śakti under Tantric influence.

4. A god with terrific face riding a human mount, represented with his Śakti riding a lion. The god is seated in loose padmāsana and wears munda-mālā. He is fourteen-armed carrying in his right hands abhaya-cum-akshamālā, vajra, goad, mudgara, arrow, serpent and varada. The left hands carry abhaya, bow, flag, trident, shield and śaṅkha and the lowest left hand carried round the waist of the goddess holds vase-and-foliage. The god is represented as ārdhavakeśa with bulging eyes, gaping mouth and protruding fangs. He wears patra-kuṇḍalas, torque, pādaṅgadas and lower garment.

His Śakti, also wearing munda-mālā, is seated in lalitāsana. She is eight-armed with her main right hand carrying a bowl and the main left hand in the vindu-mudrā. She carries trident, rosary and sword in the other right hands and hammer, lotus flower and damaru in the other left hands.

This is a Śaivite deity with Śakti represented under Tantric influence.

5. A god with terrific face seated in loose padmāsana on horse, while his Śakti with a skeletal frame is seated in lalitāsana on a human mount carrying a skull. The god is ten-armed carrying a lotus-shaped śakti in the main right hand and fire, śaṅkha, damaru and sword in the remaining right hands. He holds a shield, serpent, chakra, trident and pāśa in the left hands. He is represented as ārdhavakeśa with bulging eyes and gaping mouth and wears patra-kuṇḍalas, torques, munda-mālā, pādaṅgadas, wristlets and lower garment. His Śakti is also terrific and is eight-armed. Her main pair of hands carries the bowl and the vindu-mudrā. Her other right hands carry trident, arrow and sword, while the other left hands carry khaṭvāṅga, I-shaped shield and bell. She is also represented as ārdhavakeśa, her head being flanked by flags marked with four-petalled rosettes. (Most of the Śaktis have similar flags). She wears patra-kuṇḍalas, torque, munda-mālā, wristlets and lower garment with a latticed apron. The image represents Chāmunda with her consort.

6. The next octagonal facet starts with a terrific god seated in loose padmāsana represented together with his Śakti. The god appears to be seated on a stag and has raised curls, bulging eyes and gaping mouth and wears a munda-mālā. He is eight-armed and carries in the principal right hand abhaya-cum-akshamālā and in the remaining right hands trident, damaru and goad. His left hands carry fire, peacock feathers, shield and umbrella. He wears patra-kundalas, torques, wristlets and anklets of snakes and lower garment.
BRAHMANICAL IMAGES

His Śakti who is seated on his lap in lalitāsana with her left foot placed on the crown of an elephant mount. Her head-dress is flanked by two flags. She is also eight-armed and carries the bowl and vindu-mudrā in her principal pair of hands, the other right hands carrying trident, an object resembling lotus stalk (?) and sword. The other left hands carry shield, vajra, and pāśa. She wears the usual apparel, a munda-mālā and a lower garment with a latticed apron in front. The image represents Indrāṇī with her consort.

7. A god with terrific face seated in loose padmāsana over a serpent mount represented with a boar-headed Śakti. Both of them wear munda-mālā. The god is eight-armed and carries in his principal right hand abhaya-cum-akshamālā while his other right hands carry śaṅkha, arrow and sword. His left hands carry shield, serpent, bow and khaṭṭāṅga.

His Śakti with boar’s head and raised curls is seated on a buffalo looking up. She is also eight-armed and carries in the principal pair of hands the bowl and the vindu-mudrā. The remaining right hands carry a trident, a curved staff and a sword. Her other left hands carry shield, bowl and pāśa.

This figure probably represents Vārāhi with her consort.

8. This is a tiny gilt brass image fixed in a niche resembling a miniature shrine. The figure is eighteen-armed Mahishāsuramardini, represented standing and facing front in pratītyādhiśāna. Her right foot is placed over her lion mount, while with the left foot she tramples upon the head of the buffalo (demon) whose tail is held in one of her left hands. On the pedestal is represented a miniature figure of the same goddess, flanked on each side by an attendant carrying the head and tail ends of a serpent (nāga-pāśa) in the two hands. Figures of the nine Durgās appear on the maṇḍala.

9. A four-armed god seated in loose padmāsana with his four-headed Śakti. They are seated on an elaborate wicker pedestal which is carried by three duck-like geese represented as mounts. There is a background of foliage behind these figures. The god has only one head and wears a five-peaked mukuta. He carries in his hands vajra, trident, chakra and gadā.

His Śakti is four-headed and four-armed. The principal pair of hands carries the bowl and the vindu-mudrā. The remaining hands carry the book and rosary, indicating that the goddess is Brāhmaṇī, which is confirmed by her four heads and the goose mounts which she shares with her consort. They wear the usual dress and ornaments including a long garland.

10. A four-armed god with raised curls and bulging eyes seated in loose padmāsana on a human corpse. He carries a skull-cup, sword, shield and tripatākā-cum-āliṅgana. He wears munda-mālā together with the usual apparel.

His Śakti also wears a munda-mālā and is two-armed. Her right hand is held in āliṅgana, while the left hand is held in vyākhyāna-mudrā. This may represent a form of Bhairava with his Śakti.

11. The third octagonal facet starts with a four-armed god seated in loose padmāsana on a stag, probably representing god Vāyu. He carries a fluttering scarf in the upper pair of hands, an umbrella-like heavy flag-staff with banner in the principal right hand, while with his principal left hand he embraces his Śakti. He wears a five-peaked jewelled mukuta, ratna-kuṇḍalas, torque, wristlets, pādāṅgadas and long mālā, besides the lower garment fastened by jewelled belt. His Śakti also wears the usual apparel and is two-armed carrying āliṅgana and abhaya. They are seated on a lotus pedestal.

12. A god seated in loose padamāsana over a reclining human mount carrying a skull-cup. He wears a five-peaked mukuta and patra-kuṇḍalas, torque, wristlets, pādāṅgadas and long mālā, besides the lower garment fastened by jewelled belt, and carries in his hands gadā, peacock feathers, a four-footed animal and āliṅgana. His Śakti is two-armed carrying āliṅgana and vase-and-foliage and wearing the usual dress and ornaments.

13. Umā-Maheśvara as āliṅgana-mūrti. Maheśvara is represented as four-armed seated in padmāsana on a lotus seat with couchant Nandī below the seat looking up towards the god. He wears jaṭā-mukuta adorned by jewelled diadem, sarpa-kuṇḍalas, torque, muṇḍa-mālā, sarpopavita, armlets, wristlets and pādāṅgadas, besides the lower garment. He carries in his hands abhaya, rosary, trident and kalaśa-cum-āliṅgana. Umā is only two-armed carrying āliṅgana and abhaya. She wears the usual ornaments including the long garland besides a jacket and the usual lower garment.

14. Lakhmi-Nārāyana as āliṅgana-mūrti seated in lalitāsana. Nārāyana is four-armed and carries padma, chakra, gadā and śaṅkha, the lowest left hand being held in āliṅgana. He wears kirita-mukuta, ratna-kuṇḍalas, torques, wristlets, pādāṅgadas, vaijñayanti-mālā and lower garment fastened by raina-mukhalā. He is seated on Garuḍa, represented as a bird with human hands. Lakshmi is two-armed carrying āliṅgana and abhaya and is seated on the lap of her lord over a lotus seat.

15. Three-headed, eight-armed, and four-legged god, standing together with his Śakti over a huge serpent. The main pair of legs on which the god stands are held apart, while the second pair is held in āliṅgana. The god carries goad, pāśa, peacock feathers and a khaṭvāṅga-cum-triśūla in the right hands and axe, rosary, small spear and skull-cup in the left hands. His Śakti is two-armed and is represented standing in tribhanga with hands in añjali. The god and the goddess wear long mālā. The goddess is represented smiling, while one head of the god is depicted in the terrific aspect. This is Maheśamūrti of a Tāntric form represented with his Śakti.

16. The octagonal facet on the other side of the flight of steps starts with a six-faced and eight-armed god seated in lalitāsana on a human mount, which wears short curls resembling a wig. All the faces are of the boar with raised curls adorned by jewelled diadem. The god holds in his right hands gadā, arrow, dāmaru and goad and in his left hands an elaborate bunch of flowers, bow, pāśa and āliṅgana. The god is pot-bellied and wears patra-kuṇḍalas, torques, vaijñayanti-mālā, armlets, wristlets and pādāṅgadas, besides the usual lower garment.

His Śakti is two-armed embracing the god with the right hand, while her left hand is kept in daṇḍa-hasta over her left knee. She is seated in lalitāsana on the lap of her lord and wears a five-peaked mukuta, patra-kuṇḍalas, torque, vaijñayanti-mālā, bangles and is draped in the usual lower garment.

44
This is a Tāntric form of Varāha with his Śakti.

17. Sixteen-armed Naṭarāja dancing in ardhanāra-kāsana with his left foot resting on couchant Nandi. The back-slab shows six figures of two-armed ganaś (with bird or animal heads) arranged in a maṇḍala. Starting at 7 o'clock the ganaś are seen playing respectively on a drum, small cymbals, and large cymbals, beating time with hands and playing on a bowl-like (anākyā) drum. The top figure of the maṇḍala represents the skeletal figure of four-armed Bhṛiṅgi in the same dance-pose as his Lord. The pedestal shows centrally a figure of two-armed dancer resembling Naṭarāja carrying abhaya and tridaṇḍi, flanked by a bird-headed and wolf-headed gana on each side playing on a bheri. The main hands of the god are held in abhaya and gaja-hasta poses. The attributes of the three lower right hands are mutilated. The remaining right hands carry a srūk, vajra-gaṇṭā and lotus flower and ārdhva-hasta dance pose. The left hands carry axe, trident, đamaru, khaṭvāṅga, bow, goad and a flower (chintāmaṇī). The god wears a five-peaked mukuṭa, sarpa-kuṇḍalas, torques, muṇḍa-mālā, wristlets, pāḍāṅgadas, bell-anklets and a lower garment, secured by a belt with three sets of tassels with pendant bells. Does the dancer on the pedestal represent Nandi in human form?

This is an elaborate form of Naṭarāja of a Tāntric variety encircled by musical ganaś.

The ganaś are all draped in full-sleeved tunics and skirt worn by the priests at Harasiddhi (on way to Godavari). While some ganaś have the heads of boar; others have those of bull, bear, wolf or birds.

18. Sixteen-armed god of a terrific form with raised curls, bulging eyes and protruding side-tusks seated in loose padmāsana and riding on a pair of winged Garuḍas with folded human hands. The god carries in his main right hand peacock feathers and in the remaining ones śaṅkha, vajra, arrow, goad, rosary, small trident and ghaṇṭā. The left hands carry skull-cup, mushtika, lotus flower, serpent, bow, bell with upper part resembling trident, small staff and book. The god wears patra-kuṇḍalas, torque, muṇḍa-mālā, wristlets, pāḍāṅgadas and the usual lower garment. His Śakti seated in laliśāsana on the lap of the god is eight-armed. Her main pair of hands carries the bowl and vinda-mudrā. The remaining right hands carry trident, chakra and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, mirror and pāśa. She also wears patra-kuṇḍalas, torques, muṇḍa-mālā, bangles and lower garment secured by a jewelled belt.

This is a Tāntric form of god combining the attributes of Śiva and Vishṇu, with his Śakti.

19. The next octagonal facet starts with a ten-armed god seated in loose padmāsana on a couchant boar looking up towards the god. The Śakti of the god is seated in laliśāsana over a peacock represented as regardant. The god carries in his principal right hand indistinct (vajra) and in the remaining right hands a flower (chintāmaṇi), vajra with a standard, đamaru and chakra. The left hands carry peacock feathers, trident-cum-khaṭvāṅga, small viṇā, small trident and aṅghana. He wears patra-kuṇḍalas, torques, ajīnāpavita, muṇḍa-mālā, armlets, wristlets and pāḍāṅgadas, besides a lower garment held by a mekhalā with bells attached. He has a terrific face with raised curls, bulging eyes and whiskers.
His Śakti seated on his lap in lalitāsana wears a five-peaked mukuta flanked on each side by a flag, patra-kundalas, torques, munda-mālā, wristlets and a lower garment with a frontal latticed apron. She is eight-armed carrying in the principal pair of hands the bowl and vindu-mudrā. The remaining left hands carry shield, lotus flowers and pāśa.

This may represent Kaumārī with her consort.

20. This represents a ten-armed god seated in loose padmāsana with a grinning but terrific face showing raised curls, bulging eyes and knit eye-brows. The forehead is marked by the third eye. These features are clearly visible as this figure is comparatively free from vermilion. He is seated on a lotus over a mount which resembles a leopard. He carries in his principal right hand a trident and in the remaining right hands damaru, bow-shaped pāśa, serpent and vajra. The left hands carry gadā, rosary, bow and tarjani. The fifth left hand embracing the Śakti is placed on her left shoulder. The god wears patra-kundalas, torques, munda-mālā, ananta-type armlets, wristlets and pādāṅgadas, besides a lower garment fastened by a jewelled belt with loops. The hair of the god is secured by a gold embroidered fillet with fan-shaped pleats at the two ends.

His Śakti is seated in lalitāsana on a crouching horse. She is eight-armed carrying in the principal pair of hands the bowl and the vindu-mudrā. The remaining right hands carry a small trident, damaru (?) and sword. The remaining left hands carry a shield, khaṭvāṅga, and pāśa. She wears a five-peaked mukuta flanked by flags, patra-kundalas, torques, munda-mālā, bangles and the usual lower garment.

This is a Tāntric form of Śaiva deity of a terrific aspect.

21. A twelve-armed god seated in loose padmāsana on a lotus seat. His mount is a lion, while that of his Śakti is a haṁsa. The god has a terrific face with raised curls, bulging eyes, gaping mouth with exposed teeth and whiskers. He carries in his principal right hand the trident and in the other right hands the kartari, sword, serpent, goad and abhaya. The left hands carry a skull-cup, axe, peacock feathers, shield and vajra. His lowest left hand embraces his Śakti and is placed on her left shoulder. The god wears patra-kundalas, torques, armlets, wristlets, munda-mālā, pādāṅgadas and a lower garment of tiger-skin. The hair of the god is secured by a fillet studded with skulls. This feature is also present on other gods of ferocious aspect.

His Śakti wears a five-peaked mukuta flanked by flags, patra-kundalas, torque, bangles, munda-mālā and the usual lower garment. She is eight-armed and carries in the principal pair of hands the bowl and the vindu-mudrā. The remaining right hands carry trident, damaru and sword. The left hands carry shield, book and pāśa.

This is a Tāntric form of Śaiva deity with Śakti.

22. The next octagonal facet shows seven-headed Gaṇeśa, the crowning head being human. He is seated in loose padmāsana on a lion mount and is ten-armed. His lowest right hand is placed in varada, the remaining right hands holding arrow, rosary, hammer and goad. His left hands carry pāśa, book, serpent and bowl of sweets. The lowest left hand of the god carrying a lotus flower embraces the Śakti and is placed on her waist. The god wears jewelled diadem on all the heads, torque, sarjopavita, long garland, armlets, wristlets, and a lower garment with armoured bits on the fore-legs.
BRAHMANICAL IMAGES

His Śakti resting on his lap is seated in lalitāsana on lotus. She is two-armed, her right hand held in ālīṅga and left in abhaya. She wears the usual dress and jewellery including a long garland.

This is a Tāntric form of Gaṇeśa with seven faces and his Śakti and lion mount. 23. This is an eight-faced (in four tiers) and sixteen-armed god standing in ālīṅghāsana with his right foot placed on a bull and left foot on a roaring lion. The lowest right hand of the god holds varada, the remaining right hands holding a nara-muṇḍa, axe, ḍamaru, trident, sword, trident-cum-khaṭvāṅga and a human victim. The left hands carry a flag-staff, mudgara, rosary, fly-whisk, lotus, monkey, pāśa and abhaya. Each head of the god wears a five-peaked mukuṭa. The main figure wears sarpa-kuṇḍala in the right ear and patra-kuṇḍala in the left, torques, garland of monkeys and squirrels, armlets, wristlets and a lower garment with a frontal latticed apron secured by a jewelled belt.

24. Umā seated in padmāsana suckling her child Skanda who is seated in her lap. She is four-armed. Her main right hand is placed on the right breast, the upper right hand carries ḍamaru, the upper left hand carries trident and the lower left supports the child. She wears a five-peaked mukuṭa, patra-kuṇḍalas, torques, long garland and wristlets. She wears a sari which also covers her belly and left shoulder in the upavita fashion. The back slab depicts a maṇḍala of seven deities seated in ardha-paryaṅkāśana or sukhāsana. Four of them are four-armed, while the remaining are two-armed. They carry different attributes such as skull-cup, lotus flower, varada, abhaya, etc. The top figure is seated in padmāsana on a lion mount, and carries in the hands varada, goad, book and abhaya. It is difficult to say whether this figure is male or female. There is no doubt that the figures with one or two exceptions are male. All of them except one wear long garland. The pedestal shows ashta-māṅgalas.

LOWER ROW

The figures of the lower row are described anti-clockwise starting from the octagonal facet on the left flank of the steps:—

Lower 1.—The first octagonal facet shows only one figure in the central niche. The flanking niches are two-tiered and empty. The niche contains eighteen-armed Naṭarāja dancing in ardha-pryāṅkāśana, his left toes resting on the haunches of the couchant Nandi looking up. On the corresponding right side occurs a couchant lion. The top of the conical slab shows a miniature representation of similar Naṭarāja with similar bull and lion mounts but eight-armed only. He may represent Bhringi. The principal right hand of the god is held in abhaya, while the remaining right hands carry trident, kartari, vajra, chakra, arrow, ḍamaru and sword. His uppermost right hand is held in ārdha-hasta pose. His main left hand is held in the gajahasta pose pointing towards his left foot. The remaining left hands carry shield, khaṭvāṅga, bow, a small staff, bell, skull-cup, nara-muṇḍa and kamaṇḍalalu. The bull and the lion mounts are depicted above the lotus pedestal, which rests on a human corpse. The god wears jaṭāmukūṭa adorned below by five-peaked diadem, sarpa-kuṇḍala in the left ear, torque, muṇḍa-mālā, armlets, wristlets, ball-anklets and a lower garment with latticed apron. At the base of the slab is represented a frieze showing centrally dancing Bhringī, flanked on each side by four musical gaṇas, some with heads of parrots and others of boar, wolf, etc. They play on bherī, drum, cymbals, bowl-like (oṅkya) drum, etc. One of them is beating time with the hands.

Lower 2.—Four-armed Bhairava standing in ādiḥkāsana on a human corpse and carrying dāmaru, vajra, triśūla and viṅā. He has a terrific face with raised curls, etc., and wears pata-kuṇḍalas, torque, muṇda-mālā, wristlets, pāṭāṅgadas and the usual type of lower garment. This is a form of Bhairava influenced by Tāntric Buddhism.

Lower 3.—Eighteen-armed Mahishāsura mardini standing in pratyādiḥkāsana with her right foot placed on her lion mount and the left foot trampling on the back of the buffalo demon from whose decapitated head issues forth the demon in the human form wearing armour and carrying sword and shield in the upper pair of hands and gada (?) and pāśi in the second pair. The main right hand of the goddess carries the tail-end of the nāga (nāgo-pāśa) as well as the triśūla with which she gores the chest of the demon, while she holds the demon’s tuft with her main left hand. The remaining right hands of the goddess carry kartari, vajra (?), chakra, dāmaru, khaṭvāṅga, double vajra, arrow and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, bow, flag, paraśu, goad, śankha, ghanta, and the tail-ends of the buffalo demon and the nāga-pāśa. She wears a five-peak diadem flanked by flags, pata-kundalas torques, armoured jacket covering also the shoulders, pearl necklace of two strands with a central locket, armlets, bangles and bell-anklets, besides the lower garment with latticed apron in front secured by a jewelled belt with side tassels.

The lion mount stands on a lotus seat below which is represented centrally a pair of birds, flanked on each side by a male attendant. On the right end is a lion and on the left end is an animal resembling jackal, the vehicle of Chāmuṇḍā. On each extremity is represented a mailed nāga in human form. Behind each such nāga is represented a realistic nāga whose tail-end is held in the hands of Durgā. The nāga on the right carries a sword in one of the hands. Behind left hand nāga in human form is represented four-armed boar-headed Vāraṇi carrying hammer and triśūla in the right hands and horn in the left hand. She rides on a reclining female figure.

The back-slab shows the nine Durgās, each represented as a four-armed deity seated in pralamba-pādāsana. The main pair of hands in each case carries the bowl and the vindu-mudrā. Clockwise from 7 o’clock onwards the first one (Māheśvarī) carries dāmaru and khaṭvāṅga-cum-paraśu, the second one (Vāraṇi) with a boar’s head carries lotus flower and goad. The third one (Vaishñavī) carries chakra and arrows, while the fourth one (Brāhmaṇi) carries rosary and book. The fifth or the top one is six-armed and carries bell and book in the remaining right hands and srūk and flask in the remaining left hands. The sixth one with sunken checks (Chāmuṇḍā) carries dāmaru and triśūla; while the seventh one (Kauṁāri) carries staff. The eighth one (Indrāṇi) carries vajra and lotus flower, while the ninth or last one carries sword and shield.

Lower 4.—Eight-armed god standing facing in ādiḥkāsana with each foot resting on a peacock. His main pair of hands holds the bowl and the vindu-mudrā which is somewhat unusual for a god. The remaining right hands carry mutilated, viṅā and sword. The left hands carry I-shaped shield, human victim and small trident. The god wears kirta-mukuta, ratna kundalas, torque, long garland, wristlets, padangadas and the usual lower garment. The god appears to represent Kumāra of a Tāntric form.

Lower 5.—Four-armed god standing in pratīyāliṅghāsana with his right foot resting on lotus and left foot on the lion mount. He carries a goad, Śiva-liṅga, pāśa and skull-cup. He has raised curls with a terrific face, and wears patra-kundalas, torque, muṇḍa-mālā, wristlets, padangadas and the usual lower garment. He represents Bhairava.

The next octagonal facet shows three mandala-shaped figure compositions.

Lower 6.—Lower 6 shows a group of three figures arranged in a conical form. The right lower figure represents eight-armed Chāmunda standing facing in ārīṅghāsana. She is flanked on each side by a dog and stands on a human corpse, resting on human skulls. Her main right hand carrying skull-cup is mutilated, while her main left hand is held up to her chin in the tarjānī pose. The top right hand carries damaru, the remaining right hands being broken. The remaining left hands carry khaṭvāṅga, abhaya and nara-muṇḍa. She wears raised curls flanked by flags, patra-kundalas, torque, muṇḍa-mālā, armlets and bangles, besides a lower garment with a latticed apron. She has a skeletal frame with sagging breasts, sunken eyes and cheeks.

The left lower figure represents four-faced and twenty-armed Mahishāsuramardini standing in ārīṅghāsana with her right foot resting on the lion mount. She carries in the principal pair of hands the bowl and the vindu-mudrā and in the next pair damaru and khaṭvāṅga. The remaining right hands carry trīśūla with which shegores the demon in human form, tuft of a warrior associate of the demon, goad, sākha, lotus, chakra, arrow and sword. The remaining left hands hold shield, bow, staff, vajra, mirror, serpent, and tuft of a warrior associate of the demon. An armoured warrior is represented seated on either side, each drawing out a sword in support of their demon leader. Their tufts are held in the penultimate pair of hands of the goddess.

The top figure shows a seven-headed and sixteen-armed god standing in ārīṅghāsana on a lotus seat marked by a nude couple treated as mounts. The god wears a long garland and his Śakti who stands in tribhāṅga also wears the same. The lowest pair of the god's hands are held in varada and abhaya, while the top left hand carries gada. The objects in other hands are too minute to be clearly visible.

Lower 7.—This is a mandala with the principal god in the centre and eight gods on the periphery. The lowest on the periphery is flanked by two others making a total of ten.
The principal god is six-faced and twelve-armed and seated on Garuḍa with a mutilated face. He carries in his right hands varada, arrow, chakra, double vajra, axe and sword and in the principal left hand a tall spear (śakti). His other left hands carry trīśūla, goad, bell, serpent and bow. His six faces and the principal weapon viz. śakti indicate that the god may represent Kārttikeya, (compare a similar cult image under worship at Harigaon).

The peripheral figure at 6 o'clock represents a ten-armed and four-faced goddess (?)
seated in padmāsana on tortoise. Her right hands hold varada, arrow, goad, chakra and trident, while the left hands hold damaru, kamaṇḍalu, pāśa, bow and abhaya. She is flanked by a nāgakanyā on each side with hands folded. She probably represents Lakshmi.

49
Proceeding clock-wise the figure next to Lakshmi is a four-armed god seated in padmāsana on a reclining human figure carrying broken, sword, shield and broken. He has raised curls and wears patra-kundalas, torque and munḍa-mālā. He may represent Nṛśīti.

Peripheral figure 3 at 8 o’clock represents six-headed and twelve-armed god seated in padmāsana on a bull mount. He wears munḍa-mālā and carries in his right hands hammer, skull-cup, arrow, chakra, śala and axe. Of the attributes of the left hands only khaṭvāṅga and bow can be made out. He may represent Iśāna.

Peripheral figure 4 at 10 o’clock is a six-headed and six-armed god seated on a stag. He also wears a munḍa-mālā and carries in the upper right hand peacock-feathers (śakti) and in the upper left hand a vase with flame-like foliage. He may represent Vāyu.

Peripheral figure 5 at 11 o’clock is a single-faced and eight-armed god seated in padmāsana on an elephant. He carries abhayā, rosary, goad and vajra in the right hands and peacock-feathers (śakti), trident, broken and varada in the left hands. He may represent Indra.

Peripheral figure 6 at 12 o’clock is a four-faced and eight-armed god seated in padmāsana on a bird which looks like a peacock but may represent a goose. He wears a munḍa-mālā. His right hands carry vākhyāna-mudrā, varada, srūk and rosary. His left hands carry book and bowl, while the attributes of the two lower hands are broken. Does he represent Agni or Brahmā?

Peripheral figure 7 at 2 o’clock is a five-headed and twelve-armed god seated in padmāsana on the bull mount. His main pair of hands holding some object is placed against his chest. Some of his right hands carry kartari and axe, while some of his left hands carry trident and vajra. He wears a munḍa-mālā.

Peripheral figure 8 at 3 o’clock is a four-headed and eight-armed god seated in padmāsana on a reclining human figure. He wears a munḍa-mālā and carries in his right hands śākha, trident, hammer and dāmaru and in his upper left hand a khaṭvāṅga.

Peripheral figure at 4 o’clock is a three-headed and six-armed god seated in padmāsana without any mount. He wears a munḍa-mālā. His lowest right hand carries trident and the lowest left hand appears to carry vajra-shaped śakti.

Peripheral figure 10 at 5 o’clock appearing on the proper left flank of Lakshmi is two-armed Varuṇa seated in loose padmāsana on a crocodile. He carries pāśa in the left hand, while the object held in his right hand is indistinct. With the exception of Lakshmi, this is the only other figure which does not wear munḍa-mālā and dons instead a scarf (uttariya).

It is not unlikely that this maṇḍala may represent the eight dīkpālas of whom a few like Indra, Vāyu and Varuṇa can doubtlessly be recognized from their mounts.

Lower 8.—The main figure represents a six-armed god standing in samabhāṅga on a human carcass. The main pair of hands holds the bow and the vindu-mudrā. The remaining right hands carry kartari and sword. The remaining left hands carry a blue lotus and nara-munḍa. He wears munḍa-mālā and a lower garment with a latticed apron. The figure is flanked on each side by a terrific monkey-headed four-armed god carrying kartari, dāmaru, khaṭvāṅga and bowl. The attendant god on the right stands in pratvāliṅghāsana, while that on the left stands in ādiḥśāsana with raised curls and proudly tilted head. The pedestal shows three registers. The first shows four gods, each four-armed carrying kartari, sword, shield and kapāla and separated respectively by an owl over cremation fire, cremation fire, serpent over cremation fire and elephant over cremation fire. The second register shows a boar, a jackal, a dog and an owl. The third register shows a frieze of stūpas alternating with Śiva-liṅgas. This is god Mahākāla, which is common to Buddhists and the Śaivas.

Lower 9.—This shows a six-armed goddess standing in samabhānga on a lion mount. She carries in her right hands varada, hammer (mudgara) and sword and in the left hands shield, mirror and kaṭi. She wears jewelled diadem flanked by flags, patra-kuṇḍalas, torque, lower garment with a latticed apron. She is flanked on each side by a smiling gana with folded hands. While the right gana wears patra-kuṇḍalas, the one on the left is Gajakarna with elephant’s ears. Each dwarf wears a scarf and shorts.

The pedestal of this figure also shows three registers. The first register shows four-armed warrior gods carrying kartari, sword, shield and skull-cup. In two cases, however, the attributes are slightly different. In one case the kartari is replaced by an arrow, while in the other the main pair of hands carries the bowl and the vindu-mudrā. These warrior gods are mutually separated by cremation fire surmounted in three cases by a dog, a lion and a tree and in one case only by owl. The second register shows five niches containing figures of two lions, a jackal, a bird and a cock. The bottom register shows stūpas alternating with Śiva-liṅgas.

Lower 10.—This composition shows in the upper part a four-armed god seated in padmāśana with his Śakti on a common lotus seat resting on a large crescent. The god carries in his hands varada, vase-and-foliage, chakra or crescent (?) and āliṅgana and may represent Chandradeva. The Śakti seated in lalitāśana on the lap of her Lord is also four-armed carrying varada, śaṅkha, lotus flower or jewel and abhaya.

The middle register of this composition shows three goddesses standing in ādiḥśāsana. The central one stands on a garuḍa; the right one on nandī and the left one on a peacock. Each is four-armed and stands against the background of a tree. The principal pair of hands in each case holds the bowl and the vindu-mudrā. Only the attributes of the second pair of hands vary. The right one carries ratna-manjari and triśūla, the central one sword and khaṭvāṅga and the left one perhaps a staff and peacock feathers. They probably represent Māheśvari, Vaishnavī and Kaumāri. Each figure wears similar dress and ornaments including a muṇḍa-mālā and a lower garment with a latticed apron.

The bottom register shows a two-armed figure probably of Mahākāla seated in padmāśana on a human mount carrying a kartari and skull-cup and flanked on each side by a preta in ādiḥśāsana carrying a naramuṇḍa and a skull-cup. Each figure of the bottom register wears a muṇḍa-mālā.

Lower 11.—This seems to represent four-armed Mahākāla standing facing in ādiḥśāsana with his right foot resting on a skull and the left foot on a human corpse about to be cremated. Two other cremations are shown below the figure of Mahākāla, a goblin issuing out of the one on the proper right. Though the head of the god is defaced, his raised curls are visible. He also wears patra-kuṇḍalas, torque, wristlets, pādaṅgadas, muṇḍa-mālā and a lower garment. The attributes of his principal pair of hands and the other left hands are broken, only the upper right hand carrying the sword is intact. The back-slab shows a frame of human skulls with a border of flames.

Lower 12.—Five-headed and ten-armed god standing facing in āliṅhāsana with his feet resting on a pair of lions. His two-armed Śakti stands in tribhūṅga on a lotus seat reclining against his left shoulder. The god carries in his right hands broken, mutilated vajra, khaṭvāṅga, peacock feathers and a large trident pierced with the figure of an armoured warrior carrying sword and shield. Most of the god’s left hands are mutilated with their attributes. Only damaru, serpent and rosary can be made out. The halo is surmounted by four-armed Vidyādharā figures carrying garlands and emerging from the clouds which are clearly depicted. The god and his Śakti wear muṇḍa-mālā and lower garments with latticed apron in front. The god also wears sarpa-kuṇḍalas.

Lower 13.—Sixteen-armed Ganeśa seated in āliṅhāsana with his Śakti, canopied by a serpent with two tiers of 7 and 5 hoods respectively. The main right hand of Ganeśa holds one of his tusks, while the other right hands carry varada, rosary, chakra, hammer, axe, trident and sword. The left hands carry shield, hammer, trisūla-cum-khaṭvāṅga, pāsa, peacock feathers, book and vessel, while his lowest left hand carrying sweets embraces his Śakti. The Śakti is only two-armed carrying abhaya and varada. Both of them wear the usual dress with the long garland, while Ganeśa also wears armoured bits on the fore-legs. Below Ganeśa is represented a pair of mice as his mounts. In the background are carved trees, while the pedestal is carved with lions to indicate that it is a śinḍhāsana.

Lower 14.—Six-faced and eight-armed god standing facing in āliṅhāsana with his three-faced and four-armed Śakti dancing in ardhaparyākāsana. Both of them stand on a human corpse. The main right hand of the god is held in abhaya. His remaining right hands carry khaṭvāṅga, damaru and serpent. His left hands carry kartari, axe, trident and skulceup. The god wears muṇḍa-mālā and a lower garment with a latticed apron. The main hands of the Śakti hold the bowl and the vindu-mudrā. The other right hand is broken, while the left hand carries goad.

Lower 15.—Five-headed and ten-armed Ganeśa facing front and standing in āliṅhāsana with each foot placed on a lion mount. The principal right hand of Ganeśa carries a rosary. The other right hands carry varada, hammer, axe and sword. His main left hand carries a bowl of sweets which the god is partaking with his trunk. His other left hands carry shield, pāsa, goad and abhaya. The god wears torque, wristlets, long garland and lower garment with armoured bits on his fore-legs.

Lower 16.—Eleven-headed and eighteen-armed Mahākāla dancing in ardhaparyākāsana with his left foot resting on a cremation fire. His main right hand is held up in the ūrdhvahasta pose, while his main left hand is held in the gajahasta pose. His remaining right hands carry radish, skull-cup, serpent, khaṭvāṅga, hammer, double vajra, trident and sword. His left hands carry a human victim, goad, damaru, vajra, gadā, lotus flower or jewel, serpent, and rosary. His Śakti standing in āliṅhāsana on a śinḍhāsana is four-armed, carrying kartaris, sword, nara-muṇḍa and kapāla. On the right of the god is represented a four-armed goddess.
seated in ardhaparyāhkhāsana beating time with the main pair of hands and carrying ḍamaru and khaṭvāṅga in the other pair. The back-slab is framed all round by human skulls with a border of flames. A pair of owls with jackal and wolf at the two ends is carved on the pedestal. The god and his Śakti wear mūṇḍa-mālā and a lower garment with a latticed apron.

Lower 17.—Five-headed and ten-armed god facing front and standing in āliṅghāsana on a human corpse. He carries in his right hands human victim, vajra, bell and sword. The left hands carry peacock feathers, bow and arrow, human head, khaṭvāṅga and skull-cup. This figure also wears mūṇḍa-mālā and a lower garment with a latticed apron.

Lower 18.—Eight-armed god with a terrific face standing facing in āliṅghāsana on a human corpse. His right hands hold varada, ḍamaru, triśūla and sword, while his left hands hold triśūla-cum-khaṭvāṅga, pāśa, indistinct and serpent. He has raised curls and wears mūṇḍa-mālā and a lower garment with a latticed apron.

Lower 19.—Six-headed and twelve-armed goddess standing facing in āliṅghāsana with her right foot placed on Garuḍa with hands in aṅjali and left foot resting on the hump of a bull looking up. The right hands of the goddess hold varada, bell, lotus flower, gadā, śāṅkha and chakra. Her principal left hand is held in abbaya, while the remaining left hands are broken. She wears a mūṇḍa-mālā and a lower garment with a latticed apron. She is the female counterpart of Hari-Hara in the Tāntric aspect.

Lower 20.—Eighteen-armed goddess dancing in ardhaparyāhkhāsana with her right foot on the lion mount. Her principal pair of hands carries the bowl in the right hand and peacock feathers-cum-vindu-mudrā in the left hand, the second pair carries vajra and ghanṭā. The remaining right hands carry rosary, goad, triśūla, axe, chakra, arrow and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, bow, gadā, nara-mūṇḍa, khaṭvāṅga, śāṅkha and vase. She wears jewelled diadem flanked by flags, śāṅkha-kumḍalas, torque, mūṇḍa-mālā, wristlets, bangles, bell-anklets and a lower garment with a latticed apron. She is flanked on the right by twelve-armed Chāmuṇḍā seated in pralambapādāsana in the European fashion carrying a serpent (which she is devouring) and bowl in the principal pair of hands. The remaining right hands of Chāmuṇḍā carry kartāri, human victim, indistinct, arrow and sword. Her remaining left hands carry shield, bow, khaṭvāṅga, etc. She is seated on a human corpse which rests on two tiers of human skulls.

The principal goddess is flanked on the left by an eighteen-armed goddess seated in pralambapādāsana. Her principal pair of hands carries the bowl and the vindu-mudrā. The sword is clearly visible in her uppermost right hand and the shield in her uppermost left hand. She also wears a mūṇḍa-mālā.

The back-slab is framed by human skulls with a border of flames.

Lower 21.—Six-faced and ten-armed Narasiṁha seated in ardhaparyāhkhāsana on a pair of human mounts. The god carries in his right hands varada-cum-akshamālā, lotus, gadā, śāṅkha and chakra. He holds in the left hands a flag, hala, a bowl of sweets, bunch of flowers and āliṅgana, his lowest left hand resting on the left shoulder of his Śakti, who is seated in lalitāsana in the lap of her lord. She is two-armed holding āliṅgana and bowl. In the upper field is represented a mutilated figure of Śiva-Pārvati as āliṅgana-mūrti seated respectively on the bull and lion mounts.

53
On each side-wall of the flight of steps is a niche. In the eastern niche is an image of two-armed god seated in loose padmāsana carrying sword and a bunch of flowers. The god is corpulent and wears jewelled mukura, \textit{ratna-kuṇḍalas}, torque, wristlets, a long mālā and the usual lower garment. In the western niche is a four-armed image of god standing on an animal which may be a buffalo or stag. He has only one leg and stands on his right foot. Another peculiarity of the image is that a four-armed god emerges from either side of his waist, with the upper pair of hands folded above the head. While the objects held in the lower pair of hands of the right hand figure are indistinct, the left hand figure carries śāṅkha and book. The main god holds bowl, trīśūla, goad and \textit{varada} in the hands, and wears mukura adorned by jewels with a conical object resembling \textit{dhātūrā} flowers projecting from the right, \textit{surpa-kuṇḍalas}, torque, garland, \textit{munḍa-mālā}, \textit{pāḍāṅgadas} and lower garment fastened by a jewelled belt. This figure probably represents Śiva as Ekapāda.

From the south-western end the uppermost circle shows:

1) Eighteen-armed god standing in \textit{pratyālīḍhāsana}, on the legs of a seated nude ascetic (facing the god) with the main pair of hands pressing down the head of the ascetic. The next pair of hands holds chakra and gada. The remaining right hands carry vajra, goad, a \textit{khuκri}-like sword, arrow, umbrella-like \textit{dhwaja}, ūmaru and trīśūla. The remaining left hands carry \textit{kaṭvāṅga}, mushti, lotus flower, bow, shield, pāśa and probably peacock feathers (\textit{śakti}). The god is flanked on the right by three-headed and four-armed Mahishāsura-mardini killing the buffalo demon in full animal form with trīśūla held in her lower right hand. The upper left hand is held in \textit{abhaya}, while there is no trace of the lower left hand. The corresponding figure on the left is six-armed \textit{Vārahi} standing in \textit{ālīḍhāsana} on a pair of nude human figures. In her lowest left and right hands she carries the tufts of her human mounts. The other hands carry śāṅkha, chakra, gada and \textit{padma}. The main god wears jewelled mukura, \textit{patra-kuṇḍalas}, torque, wristlets, \textit{munḍa-mālā}, \textit{pāḍāṅgadas}, scarf and a lower garment of tiger skin.

2) Two-armed god carrying sword and the reins and riding a horse. He wears jewelled mukura, \textit{patra-kuṇḍalas}, torque, wristlets and \textit{vaijayanti-mālā}.

3) Five-headed and eighteen-armed god seated in loose padmāsana on a pair of reclining human figures each carrying a skull-cup. The pedestal shows a pair of bulls flanking a two-armed seated figure with the right hand held in \textit{abhaya}. The main pair of hands of the god carries \textit{kaṭvāṅga} and \textit{nara-munḍa}. The second pair carries arrow and bow. The remaining right hands carry \textit{varada}, hammer, chisel, trīśūla, ūmaru, goad and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, pāśa, flag standard crowned by a club, axe, flower and \textit{abhaya}. The god wears jewelled mukura, \textit{ratna-kuṇḍalas}, torque, wristlets, \textit{pāḍāṅgadas}, a long mālā and a lower garment fastened by jewelled belt.

4) Two-armed Nāgāraja seated in loose padmāsana under the canopy of numerous serpent hoods. His seat and back-rest are also made of beautifully arranged serpent coils. He is flanked on each side by a two-armed Nāgī with hands in \textit{aṇjali} on whose coils he sits. He is two-armed carrying \textit{varada} and lotus flower in the right hand and \textit{kalasha} in the left hand. He wears jewelled mukura, \textit{ratna-kuṇḍalas}, torque, hāra, long mālā, armlets, wristlets, \textit{pāḍāṅgadas} and lower garment fastened by a jewelled belt.
5) Same as number 4 (Nāgarāja).
6) Same as number 4 with the difference that the right hand is held in abhaya (represents Nāgarāja).
7) Lakṣmī-Nārāyaṇa seated on lotus seat resting on Garuḍa represented realistically as a bird. Nārāyaṇa is four-armed but only his lowest left hand carrying vase and holding Lakṣmī in embrace is intact. Lakṣmī is two-armed carrying ālīṅga and indistinct. Her face is completely mutilated. Nārāyaṇa sits in loose padmāsana, while Lakṣmī is seated in lalitāsana. Nārāyaṇa wears jewelled mukūta, ratna-kuṇḍalas, torque, vaijayanti-mālā, pādaṅgada and flower garment fastened by a jewelled belt.
8) This is a repetition of number 6 (Nāgarāja).
9) Śiva-Pārvatī each seated in lalitāsana on a common lotus seat. Śiva is four-armed carrying varada, triśūla, triśūla and abhaya. Pārvatī carries blue lotus and abhaya. Śiva wears jaṭāmukūṭa, kuṇḍalas and wristlets of snakes, torque, ratnopoviṇa, muṇḍa-mālā, pādaṅgadas and a lower garment fastened by a jewelled belt.
10) Eight-armed Krishṇa standing in tribhaṅga in his characteristic pose holding a flute in the main pair of hands. The remaining hands carry five arrows, goad and chakra in the right hands and śankha, pāsa and bow in the left hands. He is flanked by a four-armed Gopi on each side, the right one carrying flowers in the lower right hand, the upper right hand held up in ūrdhva-hasta dance pose, while the left hands carry a book and a bowl of flowers. The Gopi on the left is in āṭīthāsana and carries rosary, abhaya, book and a flower. Krishṇa wears jewelled mukūta, ratna-kuṇḍalas, torque, vaijayantimālā, armlets, wristlets, pādaṅgadas, a lower garment fastened by a jewelled belt. He stands under a canopy of seven hoods, reminding of his aspect as Kāliya-damana.
11) Kāmadeva seated in loose padmāsana with his two consorts Rati and Pṛiti seated on his lap on either side. Kāmadeva is four-armed and carries arrows, flag, fish and bow made of sugarcane, with its string made of flowers. His consorts are two-armed, the right one carrying abhaya and bowl and the left one carrying flower and broken. The god wears a conical mukūta of flowers, ratna-kuṇḍalas, torque, wristlets, pādaṅgadas and a lower garment fastened by a jewelled belt.
12) Four-armed goddess seated in padmāsana carrying varada, lotus, vase and abhaya. She wears jewelled mukūta, ratna-kuṇḍalas, torque, wristlets and long mālā.
13) It is a small shrine-type niche. The image is missing.
14) The next half of the circle starts with number 14. This shows four-armed goddess seated on lotus in lalitāsana carrying varada, sword (broken), flowers and abhaya. She wears jewelled mukūta, ratna-kuṇḍalas, torque, wristlets and long mālā.
15) Five-headed and sixteen-armed god seated in lalitāsana on winged Garuḍa in human form. The three lower heads have raised curls adorned by jewelled mukūta, while the two crowning heads wear jewelled mukūta. The god also wears torque, armlets, wristlets, scarf, yogapatta, pādaṅgadas and lower garment. The four-armed Śakti of the god is seated on his lap. The principal head of the god is of lion (Narasiriha). The lower left head is of Varāha and the lower right of Garuḍa. The two surmounting heads are human. The main right hand of the god carries a flower. His remaining right hands carry varada, goad, vajra, lotus, kartari, arrow and sword. His left hands carry shield, bow, gadā, śaṅkha, lotus flower, hammer, abhaya and probably ālīṅgana, the last hand being indistinct. His Śakti carries abhaya, bunch of flowers, vase-and-foliage and varada. Below the siṁhāsana of the image is represented a reclining warrior (some demon) holding a sword and shield and wearing an armoured coat.

This is a peculiar five-headed form of Viṣṇu with prominence given to his form as Narasimha. Does his bird-head refer to Gauḍa?

16) Ten-armed Bhairava standing in pratvāliḍhāsana with his right foot placed on a human corpse and the left foot on a serpent. He carries the bowl and vindu-mudrā in the main pair of hands, his remaining right hands carry varada, damaru, vajra and sword; his remaining left hands carry khaṭvāṅga, pāśa, nara-muṇḍa and abhaya. He is shown as ārdhvaretas and has a terrific appearance with raised curls secured by a fillet with skull-clasps, bulging eyes, open whiskered mouth, sarpa-kuṇḍalas, sarpa-hāra, sarpa-valaya for the wrists and anklets, torque, muṇḍa-mālā, bell-anklets and lower garment of tiger-skin fastened by a jewelled belt.

17) Two-armed god standing in pratvāliḍhāsana carrying kalpa-tree in the right hand and vase-and-foliage in the left hand. He wears jewelled mukuta etc. including long mālā.

18) This is a repetition of figure 6 (Nāgarāja).

19) Four-armed Sūrya seated in loose padmāsana on a lotus seat which is marked by a winged horse. The god carries abhaya, lotus flower, while his left hand embracing the Śakti is held in varada. His Śakti is four-armed and seated in lalitāsana. Her main pair of hands is held in aṅjali; the remaining hands carrying lotus-bud and kalaśa.

20 to 22) 20 and 22 are repetitions of figure 6, while 21 is a repetition of figure 4 (images of Nāgarāja).

23) Eighteen-armed goddess seated with her knees tied with yogapatta. She is seated on a pair of fish which rests on a large skull-cup flanked on each side by a serpent. The serpents are flanked on the lower ground by two-armed kneeling attendants carrying gadā and chakra. The goddess carries the bowl and the vindu-mudrā in the main pair of hands. The second pair carries damaru and khaṭvāṅga. The next pair carries the tails of the flanking serpents. The remaining right hands hold varada, stick with a square top, hammer, vajra, triśūla and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, goad, human head, khaṭvāṅga, water-vessel and abhaya. The goddess wears jewelled mukuta flanked by flags, pata-kuṇḍalas, torque, wristlets, muṇḍa-mālā and lower garment besides the yogapatta.

24) Four-armed Kumāra seated in lalitāsana with his right foot resting on peacock and left knee resting on lotus flower. His hands carry abhaya, peacock feathers (śakti), cock and bow. He wears jewelled mukuta, ratna-kuṇḍalas, torque, armlets, wristlets and lower garment with central apron. True to the local tradition which depicts him in a terrific form, he wears muṇḍa-mālā. So also does his Śakti who is shown as four-armed, carrying abhaya, ālīṅgana, cock and nara-muṇḍa. The artist here has combined the terrific forms of Kumāra and Kaumārī who is one of the nine Durgās. She wears jewelled mukuta, ratna-kuṇḍalas, torque, armlets, wristlets, muṇḍa-mālā and lower garment with a central apron. She is seated in lalitāsana with her left foot resting on a human mount carrying skull-cup in the left hand.
25) Lastly, a two-armed militant goddess carrying serpent in each hand stands in pratýālīḍhāsana and attacks an armoured warrior carrying gadā and shield. The victim has been floored. The goddess wears kiriṭa-mukūṭa, patra-kūṇḍālas, torque, bangles, armour, scarf, bell-anklets and lower garment of skirt and is flanked on each side by a two-armed grinning preta (goblin).

BRAHMANICAL TĀNTRIC IMAGES IN SĀDĀŚIVA (BHAIRAVA) CHOWK

Sādāśiva Chowk, also known as Bhairava Chowk is an integral part of the royal palace complex at Bhaktapur. It was built by king Nareśamalla (AD 1637-1644) who was himself an expert on Tāntric studies. This has seventeen Tāntric figures of Bhairava besides a figure each of Durgā, Gaṇeśa and Kumāra, also of the Tāntric variety. All of them are shown as twelve-armed and stand in ālīḍhāsana on their respective mounts. Of the seventeen Bhairava figures fifteen are represented as Gajāsuravadhamūrti, as is indicated by the elephant hide held in their uppermost pair of hands. The Bhairava figures also show a variety of mounts, two figures each having horse, peacock, goose, and human mounts, and one each having a dog, bull, owl, cock, wolf, jackal, goat, Guruḍa and a pair of parrots as mounts.

1. Twelve-armed blue-coloured Bhairava standing in pratýālīḍhāsana on a human mount carrying skull-cup. The main pair of hands carries the bowl and vindu-mudrā. The remaining right hands carry kartarī, vajra, arrow, damaru and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, bowl, ball, triśūla and human head.

2. Twelve-armed Durgā standing in ālīḍhāsana with the lion mount below her feet. She carries bowl and vindu-mudrā in the principal pair of hands. The remaining right hands carry varada, vajra, arrow, sword and damaru. The remaining left hands carry shield, bow, bell, abhaya and khataūṅga.

North side

3. Red-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in pratýālīḍhāsana on a human mount. The raised curls are adorned by the crescent and skull. He carries in the principal pair of hands arrow and bow. The uppermost pair of hands carries gajā-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The remaining right hands carry vajra, kartarī, sword and damaru. The remaining left hands carry shield, nara-mūṇḍa, bell and skull cup.

4. Red-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in ālīḍhāsana on a dog mount. The right hands carry tripatakā-mudrā, fish, kartarī, arrow and sword. The left hands carry shield, bow, nara-mūṇḍa, goad and skull-cup. They all wear sarpa-kūṇḍālas, sarpa-valayas at the wrists and anklets, mūṇḍa-mālā, torque and tiger skin as lower garment.

5. Blue-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in ālīḍhāsana on a bull mount. The uppermost pair of hands carries gajā-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The other right hands carry damaru, goad, kartarī, arrow and small staff. The other left hands carry shield, bow, pāśa, skull-cup and triśūla.
6. Blue-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in āśīdhāsana on a horse mount. The uppermost pair of hands carries gaja-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The other right hands carry kartari, arrow, chakra, vajra and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, gadā, bow, bell and nara-muṇḍa.

7. Red-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in āśīdhāsana on a peacock mount. The uppermost pair of hands carry gaja-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The other right hands carry kartari, spear, goad, arrow and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, bow, pāśa, peacock feathers and skull-cup.

West Side

8. Green-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in āśīdhāsana on a white goose. The uppermost pair of hands carries gaja-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The other right hands carry karāṇa-mudrā, vajra, kartari, sword and stag. The remaining left hands carry shield, nara-muṇḍa, bell, skull-cup and serpent.

9. Yellow-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in āśīdhāsana on an owl mount. The principal pair of hands carries kartari and kalaśa. The uppermost pair of hands carries gaja-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The remaining right hands carry varada, arrow, vajra and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, pāśa, bow and abhaya.

10. White or yellow-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in āśīdhāsana on a cock mount. The main pair of hands carries kartari and kapāla. The uppermost pair of hands carries gaja-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The remaining right hands carry arrow, goad, chakra, and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, crescent, pāśa and bow.

11. Red-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in āśīdhāsana on a horse mount. The first pair of hands carries arrow and bow. The second pair carries spear and skull-cup. The uppermost pair of hands carries gaja-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The remaining right hands carry hammer, vajra and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, bell and fire.

12. Yellow-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in āśīdhāsana on a wolf mount. The main pair of hands carries kartari and kapāla. The second pair carries đamanu and khaṭṭāṅgā. The uppermost pair of hands carries gaja-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The remaining right hands carry vajra, arrow and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, bow and bell.

13. Blue-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in āśīdhāsana on a jackal mount. The main pair of hands carries kartari and nara-muṇḍa. The second pair carries dumb-bell-like object and khaṭṭāṅgā. The uppermost pair of hands carries gaja-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The remaining right hands carry arrow, sword and vajra. The remaining left hands carry bell, shield and bow.

14. Yellow-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in āśīdhāsana on a goat mount. The first pair of hands carries goad and pāśa. The second pair carries Šakti (resembling peacock feathers) and skull-cup. The uppermost pair of hands carries gaja-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The remaining right hands carry arrow, vajra and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, bell and bow.
BRAHMANICAL IMAGES

South Side
15. Red-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in ʻālīḍhāśana on a peacock mount. The first pair of hands carries kartari and kapāla. The second pair carries ḍamaru and khaṭvāṅga. The uppermost pair of hands carries gaja-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The remaining right hands carry peacock feathers, sword and goad. The remaining left hands carry pāśa, shield and flag.

16. Yellow-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in ʻālīḍhāśana on a white goose. The uppermost pair of hands carries gaja-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The other right hands carry goad, vajra, kartari, sword and broken (probably spear). The remaining left hands carry I-shaped shield, circular shield, ḍamaru, pāśa and kapāla.

17. Green-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava within grated enclosure on Garuḍa. The principal pair of hands carries arrow and bow. The second pair carries kartari and kapāla. The uppermost pair of hands carries gaja-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The right hands carry chakra, sword and vajra. The remaining left hands carry bell, shield and gadā.

18. Red-coloured twelve-armed Bhairava standing in ʻālīḍhāśana. A pair of parrots are depicted as mounts. The main pair of hands carries kariari and kapāla. The second pair carries ḍamaru (?) and khaṭvāṅga. The uppermost pair of hands carries gaja-charma (the hide of Gajāsura). The remaining right hands carry goad, vajra and sword. The remaining left hands carry tarjanī, small triśūla and pāśa.

19. Twelve-armed Ganeśa standing in ʻālīḍhāśana on a mouse. The main pair of hands carries karaṇa-mudrā and bowl of sweets. The second pair carries triśūla and parasu. The remaining right hands carry goad, rosary, arrow and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, bow, book and pāśa.

East

20. There is only one figure within the grated enclosure on the east showing twelve-armed Kumāra standing in ʻālīḍhāśana on a peacock. The main pair of hands carries bowl and vindu-mudrā and the second pair carries tarjanī and khaṭvāṅga. The remaining right hands carry varada, rosary, peacock feathers and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, flag, book and abhaya.

BRAHMANICAL TÂNTRIC IMAGES IN KUMARI CHOWK, BHAKTAPUR

The northern verandah of the Kumari Chowk is enclosed on three sides and has a low roof about 6′ high. Three sides of the verandah are decorated with three rows of relief figures of gods and goddesses. All of them are inscribed in Sanskrit verses.

Top row
Western face
1. Four-armed Ganeśa seated in lalitāśana on a mouse which actually looks like an animal. His Šakti is seated on his lap in pralamba-padāśana. Ganeśa carries varada, rosary, axe and sweets, the lower left hand being held in ʻālīṅgana. His Šakti carries ʻālīṅgana and bowl full of sweets which the god is partaking with his trunk.
2. Four-armed goddess Durgā seated on lion carrying varada, rosary, lotus flower and trisūla. Inscribed Sīhavāhinī.

3. Four-armed goddess seated on lotus carrying rosary, šakti, blue lotus and vijapūra. In the inscription the upper left hand is said to hold blue lotus and the lower left hand vijapūra.

4. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on Nandi carrying varada, damaru, triśūla and serpent. Called in the inscription Śailendra-sundarı.

5. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a swan carrying srūk, rosary, deer skin and gadā.

6. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus carrying varada, arrow, bow and abhaya.

7. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on elephant carrying varada, vajra, goad and abhaya. She is clearly Indrāṇī, although not so mentioned in the inscription.

8. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on crocodile. She carries varada-cum-rosary, goad, pāśa and cāmara.

9. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a stag. She plays on viṇā with the main pair of hands and carries rosary and dhvaja (flag).

Northern face

10. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lion carrying varada, skull-cup, casket for sindūra and abhaya.

11. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on an owl (kauśika) carrying varada, triśūla, nara-muṇḍa and kartārī. Labelled Nagendra-nandini.

12. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus carrying varada, lotus flower, chakra and abhaya.

13. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on Nandi carrying varada, rosary, kamaṇḍalu, and abhaya. Inscribed Bhavāni.

14. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on an elephant carrying varada, rosary, kamaṇḍalu and abhaya.

15. Four-armed goddess Sarasvatī (not labelled) seated in lalitāsana on a lotus flower. She plays on viṇā with the main pair of hands and carries abhaya in the upper right hand while her lower left hand is placed on the seat.

16. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus flower carrying varada, srūk, deer skin and abhaya. Inscribed Jagaḍīśvarī.

17. Four-armed Durgā seated in lalitāsana on the buffalo demon from whose decapitated head issues the demon as a warrior drawing out the sword. The goddess is represented as an archer and holds arrow in the lower right hand. The remaining hands carry sword, shield and bow. The inscription mentions that she carries arrow in one of the hands. Labelled Bhavāni.

18. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana carrying varada, garland, mirror and abhaya. She is seated on a lotus stalk.

19. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus stalk carrying varada, lotus flower, kamaṇḍalu and abhaya. Labelled Umā.
20. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus flower carrying varada, śakti, deer skin and abhaya. Inscribed Mahālakṣmi.

22. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus flower. She plays on vīṇā with the main pair of hands and carries varada and abhaya.

23. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus flower. She plays on vīṇā with the main pair of hands and carries varada and abhaya. Inscribed Bhavānī.

24. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a full vase flanked by two lotuses. She carries varada-cum-rosary, pāśa, goad and lotus flower. Inscribed Lakṣmi.

25. This is the main figure coming immediately above the main image of Durgā which appears in the centre of the middle row. The god is five-headed and ten-armed standing in aśādhiḥśana on a reclining human figure carrying skull-cup. The main head is of Hanumān. The feet are also of Hanumān. On the left is the head of a boar, while on the right are heads of wolf and Garuḍa. The crowning head is of a horse. The main right hand carries triśūla. The remaining right hands carry kartari, pāśa, vajraghaṇḍā and sword. The left hands carry gadā, skull-cup, rosary, hala and tarjani.

26. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a horse carrying varada, sword, shield and hammer. The hammer is called musala in the inscription.

27. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on lotus carrying skull-cup, lotus, lotus buds and full vase. She is called Guha-mātā in the inscription.

29. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus flower carrying varada, skull-cup, blue lotus and abhaya. Inscribed Girijā.

30. Four-armed goddess seated in padmāsana on a lotus carrying varada, śakha, book and abhaya. She is called Bhavānī.

32. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus flower carrying varada, skull-cup, triśūla and abhaya.

33. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus stalk carrying varada, triśūla, vajraghaṇḍā and kartari.

34. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a horse carrying varada, sword, triśūla and abhaya.

36. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus flower carrying varada, triśūla, sword and abhaya.

37. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus flower carrying arrow, vajra, chakra and bow. Inscribed Bhavānī.
38. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus flower carrying varada, rosary, sakti and abhaya. Inscribed Bhavāni.

39. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a bull. She plays on viṇa with the principal pair of hands and carries damaru and triśūla in the other pair.

Eastern face

40. Four-armed Kaumārī (not labelled) seated in lalitāsana on lotus carrying cock, peacock feathers, irīdaṇḍi and abhaya.

41. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on Garuḍa carrying varada, chakra, śaṅkha and abhaya. Inscribed Bhavāni.

42. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on an elephant carrying varada, vajra, goad and abhaya.

43. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a bull carrying varada, skull-cup, khaṭvāṅga and abhaya.

44. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus flower carrying skull-cup, rosary, human head and sakti. She is called Bhavāni. The inscription calls the sakti as triśūla.

45. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a lotus flower carrying an indistinct object which may be a small skin, rosary, human head and kartari.

46. Four-armed goddess seated in lalitāsana on a stag carrying varada, gadā, pāśa and abhaya.

47. Four-armed goddess seated on a lotus flower carrying kartari, sword, khaṭvāṅga and human head.

48. Four-armed goddess seated in padmāsana on an elephant. She plays on viṇa with the main pair of hands and carries vajra and goad in the other pair.

Middle row

North face

49. Five-headed and fourteen-armed god standing in ādiḍhāsana with the right foot on Garuḍa and left on a lotus flower. He carries in the first pair of hands chakra and śaṅkha and in the second pair lotus flower and gadā. The corpse of a warrior is suspended on his right knee, while another warrior carrying sword and shield and standing in front of his left foot is trying to fight the god. The remaining right hands of the god carry rosary, jewel, vajra, arrow and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, bow, vajra-ghanṭā, book and abhaya. The inscription calls the victims as Madhu and Kaitabha. Inscribed as Chaturbhuja.

50. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in ādiḍhāsana with her right foot on the lion mount and left foot on lotus. She carries pāśa, with which the neck of the demon has been tied and his tuft in the main pair of hands. The demon is depicted in human form as a mailed warrior carrying sword and shield. The second pair carries axe and skull-cup. The remaining right hands carry gadā, vajra, arrow, śaṅkha, triśūla and sword, while the remaining left hands carry shield, chakra, peacock feathers, bow, vajra (?) and bell. Three pairs of flags flank the central heads and the three tiers. She wears jewelled diadem on all the heads, torques, armour on her shoulders and chest, pearl garland, munḍa-mālā, armlets, bangles, bell-anklets and lower garment fastened by belt with the latticed apron in front. Inscribed Bhavânī.

51. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in ādihāsana with her right foot on the lion mount and left foot on a lotus. The main pair of hands carries sword and tuft of the demon. The second pair carries peacock feathers and ghanță. The remaining right hands carry triśūla, chakra, arrow, goad, vajra and hammer. The remaining left hands carry mirror, mushti, lotus flower, bow, pāśa and khaṭvāṅga.

52. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in ādihāsana with her feet resting on the lion-mount and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The first pair of hands carries gadā and staff. The second pair carries vajra and ghanță. The remaining right hands carry peacock feathers, arrow, chakra, śaṅkha, sword and spear. The remaining left hands carry a crescentic shield, a circular shield, pāśa, goad, bow and axe as well as the tuft of the demon.

53. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in ādihāsana with her feet resting on the lion-mount and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The first pair of hands carries chakra and lotus flower. The second pair carries hammer (musala) and pāśa. The remaining right hands carry arrow, goad, chisel (?), vajra and śakti. The left hands carry the tuft of the demon, shield, lotus flower or śakti, mirror, tarjani and bow.

North face

54. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in ādihāsana with her feet resting on the lion-mount and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. In the main pair of hands the goddess holds the śakti with which she gores the demon. The next pair carries kartari and skull-cup. The remaining right hands carry khaṭvāṅga, goad, arrow, śaṅkha, triśūla and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, lotus flower, peacock feathers, bow, pāśa and kalaṣa.

55. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in ādihāsana with her right foot resting on the lion-mount and fighting a mailed demon. With the left foot the goddess tramples upon the chest of the demon whose head has been severed. With the main pair of hands she draws arrow (śara-kshepa) and bow. The next pair holds the right hand upright in the danḍa pose and carries skull-cup in the left hand. The remaining right hands carry goad, gadā, vajra, śaṅkha, triśūla and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, jewel, peacock feathers, ghanțā, kalaṣa, pāśa and bow.

56. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in ādihāsana with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The main pair of hands carries the axe and śaṅkha. The second pair carries small spear-like weapon and skull-cup. The remaining right hands carry arrow, goad, vajra, small triśūla, sword and śaṅkha. The remaining left hands carry śakti, shield, chakra, ghanțā, pāśa and bow.

57. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in ādihāsana with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The head of the demon has been struck off. The main pair of hands carries gadā and musala. The next pair carries peacock feathers and axe. The remaining right hands carry vajra, arrow, chakra, śaṅkha, small spear and sword. The remaining left hands carry circular shield, a crescentic shield, goad, \( p\acute{a}\acute{s}a \), bow and bell.

58. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in \( \tilde{a}l\acute{i}\acute{d}h\acute{a}s\acute{a}na \) with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. With the main right hand she strikes a spear which pierces the demon’s chest and has cut his arm into two pieces. In the main left hand she carries \( p\acute{a}\acute{s}a \). The next pair of hands carries axe and \( \tilde{s}\acute{a}nk\acute{h}ka \). The remaining right hands carry goad, \( v\acute{a}j\acute{r}a \), arrow, \( \tilde{s}\acute{a}nk\acute{h}ka \), \( t\acute{r}\acute{i}\acute{s}\acute{\=u}la \) and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, \( c\acute{h}ak\acute{r}a \), peacock feathers, bow, bell and skull-cup.

59. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in \( \tilde{a}l\acute{i}\acute{d}h\acute{a}s\acute{a}na \) with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The right hand of the demon has been struck off. The main pair of hands carries the peacock feathers and tuft of the demon. The next pair carries \( c\acute{h}ak\acute{r}a \) and \( p\acute{a}\acute{s}a \). The remaining right hands carry goad, \( v\acute{a}j\acute{r}a \), spear, hammer, arrow and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, \( c\acute{h}ak\acute{r}a \), peacock feathers, bow, mirror, \( t\acute{a}r\acute{j}ani \), bell and umbrella-shaped \( d\acute{h}v\acute{o}ja \).

60. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in \( \tilde{a}l\acute{i}\acute{d}h\acute{a}s\acute{a}na \) with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The head of the demon has been struck off and is not to be seen. The main pair of hands of the goddess carries the spear which pierces the chest of the demon, while the main left hand holds the \( \tilde{s}\acute{a}nk\acute{h}ka \) as well as the right hand of the demon. The next pair of hands carries the axe and skull-cup. The remaining right hands carry goad, \( v\acute{a}j\acute{r}a \), arrow, \( \tilde{s}\acute{a}nk\acute{h}ka \), \( t\acute{r}\acute{i}\acute{s}\acute{\=u}la \), and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, \( c\acute{h}ak\acute{r}a \), peacock feathers, bow, bell and \( p\acute{a}\acute{s}a \).

61. This is the main image which is larger than others and represents five-headed and eighteen-armed \( C\acute{h}\acute{a}nd\acute{\i} \) standing in \( \tilde{a}l\acute{i}\acute{d}h\acute{a}s\acute{a}na \) with her feet resting on the lion and lotus. With the first pair of hands she holds the bowl and \( v\acute{i}ndu-m\acute{u}d\acute{r}\acute{\=a} \). With the next pair of hands she holds the tail-ends of the two snakes which have tightly gripped the waists of the two aides of the demon standing in \( \tilde{a}l\acute{i}\acute{d}h\acute{a}s\acute{a}na \) at the two ends. The third pair of hands carries \( \tilde{d}\acute{o}ma\acute{r}u \) and \( k\acute{h}\acute{a}t\acute{\=v}\acute{\=a}\acute{\=\=\=}\acute{\=g}a \). The remaining right hands carry \( t\acute{r}\acute{i}\acute{s}\acute{\=u}la \) with which the demon has been gored, \( v\acute{a}r\acute{a}\acute{d}a \), goad, \( v\acute{a}j\acute{r}a \), arrow and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, bow, bell, \( p\acute{a}\acute{s}a \), \( a\acute{b}h\acute{a}\acute{y}a \) and the tuft of the demon. In the upper field she is flanked by \( \tilde{S}\acute{\=u}\acute{\=r}\acute{\=y}a \) riding a chariot of seven horses complete with \( A\acute{r}\acute{u}\acute{n}a \), \( U\acute{s}\acute{\=h}\acute{\=a} \) and \( P\acute{r}\acute{a}t\acute{y}\acute{\=u}\acute{\=s}\acute{\=h}\acute{\=a} \). On the corresponding left we have Chandra riding a chariot of seven geese.

62. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in \( \tilde{a}l\acute{i}\acute{d}h\acute{a}s\acute{a}na \) with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The main pair of hands carries goad and \( p\acute{a}\acute{s}a \) as well as the tuft of the demon. The next pair carries axe and skull-cup. The remaining right hands carry \( g\acute{a}d\acute{\=a} \), \( v\acute{a}j\acute{r}a \), arrow, \( \tilde{s}\acute{a}nk\acute{h}ka \), \( t\acute{r}\acute{i}\acute{s}\acute{\=u}la \) and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, \( c\acute{h}ak\acute{r}a \), \( s\acute{\=a}\acute{k}\acute{t}\acute{i} \), bow, bell and \( k\acute{a}\acute{\=l}\acute{\=a}\acute{\=s}a \).

63. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in \( \tilde{a}l\acute{i}\acute{d}h\acute{a}s\acute{a}na \) with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The main pair of hands carries \( t\acute{r}\acute{i}\acute{s}\acute{\=u}la \) which pierces the buttocks of the demon and the skull-cup. The next pair carries \( \tilde{s}\acute{a}nk\acute{h}ka \) and peacock feathers. The remaining right hands carry goad, arrow, serpent, small spear and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, \( t\acute{r}\acute{i}\acute{s}\acute{\=u}la \), \( c\acute{h}ak\acute{r}a \), \( k\acute{a}\acute{\=l}\acute{\=a}\acute{\=s}a \) and \( p\acute{a}\acute{s}a \).
64. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in āliḍhāśana with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The main pair of hands carries spear which pierces the right arm of the demon and tarjāni. The next pair carrier goad and dhvaja. The remaining right hands carry chakra, vajra, arrow, peacock feathers, hammer and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, nara-munḍā (only the hair is shown), mirror, bow, bell and pāśa.

65. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in āliḍhāśana with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The main pair of hands carries triśūla which pierces the face of the demon and chakra. The next pair carries axe and sakti resembling peacock feathers, which end in a blade pointing downwards. The remaining right hands carry arrow, vajra, śaṅkha, small spear, goad and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, pāśa, skull-cup, kalaśa, bell and tuft of the demon.

66. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in āliḍhāśana with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The main pair of hands carries a long musala with which the demon has been struck at the shoulders and the tuft of the demon. The next pair carries goad and pāśa. The remaining right hands carry gadā, vajra, arrow, hammer, peacock feathers and sword. The remaining left hands carry nara-munḍā, lotus flower, mirror, umbrella-shaped dhvaja, bell and tarjāni. (The umbrella has been actually called dhvaja in the inscription).

67. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in āliḍhāśana with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The main pair of hands carries peacock feathers and the tuft of the demon. The next pair carries arrow and bow. The remaining right hands carry chakra, small spear, goad, vajra, hammer and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, mirror, bell, pāśa, tarjāni and flag.

68. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in āliḍhāśana with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The main pair of hands carries sword and shield. The next pair carries a gadā in each hand. The remaining right hands carry vajra, sakti, chakra, arrow, śaṅkha and spear. The remaining left hands carry shield, pāśa, bow, goad, axe and bell.

69. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in āliḍhāśana with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The main pair of hands carries peacock feathers and the tuft of the demon. The next pair carries chakra and pāśa. The remaining right hands carry arrow, goad, hammer, triśūla, spear, śaṅkha and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, mirror, bell, tarjāni, pāśa or dhvaja and bow.

70. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in āliḍhāśana with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The main pair of hands carries spears which pierces the chest of the demon and a rectangular shield. The next pair carries peacock feathers and axe. The remaining right hands carry gadā, vajra, arrow, chakra, śaṅkha and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, goad, pāśa, bow, bell and staff.

71. Five-headed and sixteen-armed Chamunḍā standing in āliḍhāśana with her feet resting on the lion and lotus. Her main pair of hands carries tufts of the severed heads of two mailed demons, one on either side of her. The next pair carries chakra and pāśa. The remaining right hands carry peacock feathers, small spear or śūla, arrow, goad, vajra and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, bell, flag, bow, mirror and tarjani.

72. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in ādiḥśāsana with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The main pair of hands carries chakra and the head of the demon which has been cut off. The next pair carries vajra and ghanṭā. The remaining right hands carry small spear, indistinct, goad, arrow, śākha and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, peacock feathers, serpent, pāśa, kalaśa and skull-cup.

73. Five-headed and sixteen-armed goddess standing in ādiḥśāsana with her feet resting on the lion and lotus and fighting a mailed demon. The main pair of hands carries the bowl and vindu-mudrā. The next pair carries chakra and gadā. This is the only case where the buffalo is also shown with the mailed demon in human form issuing from his decapitated head. The lowest right hand carries triśūla which pierces the chest of the demon and the lowest left carries the tail of the buffalo as well as the tuft of the demon. The remaining right hands carry ānār, varada, goad, vajra, crescent-headed arrow and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, bow, bell, pāśa, abhaya, khaṭvāṅga and tarjani.

Western face

Bottom row

74. Four-armed Hanumān standing in ādiḥśāsana on a pair of lotuses. The main pair of hands holds the bowl and varada-mudrā. The next pair carries ānār and triśūla.

75. Eight-armed god with terrific face and raised curls standing in ādiḥśāsana on the lion-mound. His two-armed Śakti stands in tribhāṅga carrying āṅgana and abhaya. The god wears patra-kuṇḍalas, torque, sarppavita, wristlets and anklets of snakes, muṇḍa-mālā and lower garment. The god stands on lion while his Śakti stands on peacock. The right hands carry kartari, ānār, triśūla and sword. The left hands carry shield, ghanṭā, khaṭvāṅga and āṅgana.

76. Eight-armed god with terrific face and raised curls standing in ādiḥśāsana on human and bull mounts. The right hands carry serpent(?), pāśa, ānār and triśūla. The left hands carry tarjani(?) khaṭvāṅga, rosary and gadā.

77. Eight-armed god with terrific face and raised curls standing in ādiḥśāsana on boar and peacock mounts. The Śakti dances in ardhaprayāṅkāsana with her left feet on peacock. The right hands carry varada, rosary, śakti? and vajra. The left hands carry goad, triśūla, serpent and śakti resembling peacock feathers.

78. Eight-armed god with terrific face and raised curls standing in ādiḥśāsana on a pair of Garuḍa figures as mounts. The god carries dumb-bell-shaped śakti, vajra, śākha and peacock feathers in right hands and goad, book, bell and vase-cum-āṅgana in the left hands.

79. Eight-armed god with terrific face and raised curls standing in ādiḥśāsana on the serpent and bull mounts. The Śakti is boar-headed dancing in ardhaprayāṅkāsana. Even the śakti wears muṇḍa-mālā. The god carries skull-cup, lotus, rosary and sword in the right hands; and shield, double vajra, chakra and āṅgana in the left hands.
80. Eight-armed god with terrific face and raised curls standing in ālīḍhāsana on the horse and elephant mounts. The god carries varada, lotus flower, pāśa and sword in the right hands; and shield, damaru, serpent and book in the left hands.

81. Eight-armed god with terrific face and raised curls standing in ālīḍhāsana on the bull and human mounts. His Śakti is Chāmunda dancing in ardha-paryāt-kāsana. Both of them wear muṇḍa-mālā. The god carries small spear, pāśa, rosary and sword in the right hands; and khaṭvāṅga, triśūla, serpent and Śakti resembling peacock feathers-cum-ālīṅgana in the left hands. He embraces his Śakti with the lowest left hand.

82. Eight-armed god with terrific face and raised curls standing in ālīḍhāsana on human and lion mounts. The god carries skull-cup, kartari, damaru and sword in the right hands and shield, khaṭvāṅga, nara-muṇḍa and abhaya-cum-ālīṅgana in the left hands.

83. Four-armed Hanumān standing in ālīḍhāsana on a pair of lotuses. The main pair of hands holds the bowl and vindu-mudrā. The next pair carries damaru and triśūla.

84. Five-headed and ten-armed Ganeśa standing in ālīḍhāsana with the right foot resting on lion and the left on a lotus flower. The main right hand carries tusk (ekarada). The remaining right hands carry nara-muṇḍa, hammer, viśva-vajra, abhaya and bowl of sweets, the last hand embracing the Śakti. The Śakti carries in both her hands a bowl of sweets which the god is taking. She is standing in tribhaṅga on a lotus.

85. Eight-armed god standing in ālīḍhāsana on a pair of lotuses. The Śakti also stands in tribhaṅga on lotus. The god is not shown in a terrific form and wears long garland. The right hands carry varada, rosary, crescent-headed arrow and spear. The left hands carry khaṭvāṅga, bow, bijapīraka and abhaya. The god wears jaṭāmukuta adorned with crescent and jewelled diadem, sarpa-kundaḷas, sarpopavita and anklets and wristlets of snakes and torque. He is three-eyed.

86. Eight-armed god standing in ālīḍhāsana on a pair of lotuses. His Śakti also stands in tribhaṅga on a lotus. The god is not shown in a terrific form and wears long garland. The right hands carry varada, rosary, arrow and śakti. The left hands carry khaṭvāṅga, bow, fruit and abhaya. The god wears jaṭāmukuta adorned with crescent and jewelled diadem, sarpa-kundaḷas, sarpopavita and anklets and wristlets of snakes and torque. He is three-eyed.

87. Eight-armed god standing in ālīḍhāsana on a pair of lotuses. The Śakti also stands in tribhaṅga on a lotus. The god is not shown in a terrific form and wears long garland. The god carries varada, spear, arrow and rosary in right hands and fruit, bow, khaṭvāṅga and abhaya in left hands. His head is slightly inclined towards his Śakti. The god wears jaṭāmukuta adorned by crescent and jewelled diadem, sarpa-kundaḷas, sarpopavita and anklets and wristlets of snakes and torque. He is three-eyed.

88. Eight-armed god standing in ālīḍhāsana on a pair of lotuses. His Śakti also stands in tribhaṅga on lotus. The god is not shown in a terrific form and wears long garland. The right hands carry varada, spear, rosary and arrow. The left hands carry bow, fruit, godā and abhaya.

89. Eight-armed god standing in ālīḍhāsana on a pair of lotuses. His Śakti also stands in tribhaṅga on a lotus. The god is not shown in a terrific form and wears long garland. The right hands carry varada, rosary, crescent-headed arrow and sword. The left hands carry long bow, curved staff, fruit and abhaya. Figures 88 to 90 wear a bicorne type of jatubhāra over the headdress.

90. Five-headed and ten-armed god standing in ālīḍhāsana on the bull and lion-mounts. His Śakti stands on lion. The right hands carry abhaya, damaru, vajra, sword and triśūla. The left hands carry serpent, pāśa, bell, kartari and goad-cum-ālinga. The god wears muṇḍa-mālā but the Śakti wears garland.

91. This is the main god of the row. His main right hand is held in abhaya. The remaining right hands carry damaru, khatvāṅga, sword and triśūla. The left hands carry serpent, pāśa, ghaṇṭā, fire and goad, the lowest hand being held in ālingana. This is a form of Śiva.

92-96. God standing in ālīḍhāsana on a pair of lotuses. Each is eight-armed and benevolent. All are alike.

97. Six-headed and twelve-armed Kumāra standing in ālīḍhāsana on the peacock and lotus. His Śakti also stands on a lotus. The right hands carry gadā, varada, rosary, arrow, small spear and sword. The left hands carry shield, cock, bow, rosary or serpent, abhaya and pāśa-cum-ālingana. All the heads wear jewelled diadem. The god also wears ratna-torque, hāra, ratnapavita, armlets, wristlets, pādāṅgadas, bell-anklets, long mālā and lower garment. The Śakti also wears long garland.

98. Three-headed and eight-armed Brahmā standing on the hānśa and lotus. His Śakti also stands on lotus. The principal head is bearded representing definitely Brahmā. The god carries varada, bowl, book and rosary in the right hands while the left hands carry tridanta, kamunḍalu, tripatākā and abhaya.

99. Eight-armed god standing in ālīḍhāsana on the elephant and lotus. His Śakti stands on a lotus. He is Indra wearing a very finely-carved kiriṭa-mukuta. The right hands carry varada, bowl, vajra, and chakra. The left hands carry triśūla, jewel, tripatākā and abhaya.

100. Eight-armed god standing in ālīḍhāsana on the stag and lotus. The Śakti also stands on lotus. The right hands carry varada, bowl, sruk and peacock feathers. The left hands carry spear, kamunḍalu, tripatākā and abhaya.

Eastern face

101. Eight-armed god standing in ālīḍhāsana on the bull and lotus. The right hands carry varada, bowl, gadā(?) and sword; the left hands carry saṅkha, lotus, tripatākā and abhaya.

102. Eight-armed god standing in ālīḍhāsana on a human mount and lotus. He has a terrific face showing third eye and wears muṇḍa-mālā. The right hands carry varada, bowl, nara-muṇḍa and sword. The left hands carry shield, bowl, tripatākā and abhaya. The Śakti stands as usual and wears garland.

103. Eight-armed Varuṇa standing in ālīḍhāsana on the crocodile and lotus under a canopy of serpent hoods. He carries in his right hands varada, bowl, saṅkha and goad and in the left hands pāśa, serpent, vinḍu-mudrā and abhaya. His Śakti also stands under a canopy of serpent hoods.

104. Eight-armed god standing in ālīḍhāsana on a bull and lotus. The right hands carry varada, skull-cup, gadā and umbrella. The left hands carry flag, chakra, vinḍu-mudrā and abhaya.
105. Eight-armed god standing in āḍiḥśāsana on a horse and lotus. The right hands carry varada, skull-cup, fruit and gadā. The left hands carrytriśūla, mongoose vomiting jewels, vindu-mudrā and abhaya. He might represent Kubera.

106. Eight-armed god standing in āḍiḥśāsana on the bull and lotus. The right hands carry varada, skull-cup, rosary and ādamaru. The left hands carrytriśūla, kamaṇḍalu, vindu-mudrā and abhaya. He is Śiva and wears jaṭābhāra, munḍa-mālā, etc.

107. Eight-armed god standing in āḍiḥśāsana on the Garuḍa and lotus. He carriesvarada, skull-cup, lotus flower and chakra in the right hands. The left hands carry gadā, śaṅkha, vindu-mudrā and abhaya. He may represent Vishṇu.

BRAHMANICAL TĀNTRIC IMAGES IN MAHADEVA TEMPLE, RANI POKHARI

The main shrine enshrines a Śiva-liṅga, but in the principal hind niche is kept an image of the consort of Hari-Śaṅkara.

The goddess Hari-Śaṅkari is six-headed and twelve-armed standing in āḍiḥśāsana with the right foot resting on Garuḍa shown with folded hands and the left one on couchant Nandi. The right hands pertaining to the Vishṇu aspect carryvarada, vaṭra-ghanī, padma, gadā, śaṅkha and chakra, while the left hands pertaining to the Śiva aspect carrytriśūla, utpala, khaṭṭoṅga, human head, ādamaru and abhaya. Each head wears a three-peaked diadem and shows the third eye. She also wearspatra-kunḍalas, torque, sarpa-ḥāra, munḍa-mālā, armlets, bangles, pādaṅgadas and bell-anklets, and is draped in lower garment fastened by a jewelled belt with a latticed apron. The stone image is datable to circa seventeenth century.

Inside the sanctum are also placed some other stone images.

One of them represents four-armed Sūrya seated with his Śakti on a chariot of seven horses with his usual associates viz. Uṣhā, Pratyūṣhā and Aruṇa. His main pair of hands carries lotus flowers, while of the other pair the right one is held inabhaya and the left one in āliṅgana. His Śakti, seated in lalitāsana on the left lap of her Lord is probably four-armed. Her principal pair of hands is held inanjali, the remaining hands carrying probably lotus flower are broken off. Sūrya is seated inpadmāsana. The image is datable to about the seventeenth century.

There is a stone image of five-headed and ten-armed Gaṇeśa seated with his Śakti. He is represented seated on Nandi. His right hands carry bowl of sweets, chakra, mudgara (hammer), triśūla and goad, while his left hands carrypāśa, tusk, bowl of sweets, axe, and āliṅgana. His Śakti, seated in lalitāsana, is four-armed. Her main pair of hands is held inanjali and of the other pair, the right one is held in āliṅgana and the left one inabhaya. This is a late and crude image, not earlier than the seventeenth century.

There are also about a dozen terracotta figures representing Bhū-varāha, Vishṇu, Narasimha, a three-headed Nāgī, Garuḍa and two figures of Chandra seated on crocodile. There is also a stone image of four-armed Vishṇu seated inpadmāsana on Garuḍa carrying lotus, chakra, gadā and śaṅkha.
In the four corners of this shrine are four subsidiary shrines each fitted with a terracotta doorway. Each represents a sīnḥadvāra flanked by two projecting vyālas and crowned by a kirttimukha. Above the pilasters the arch takes the form of makara-torana.

The north-east corner shrine shows an image of four-armed Bhairava standing in ālīḍhāsana on a serpent with his Śakti who also stands on the same serpent and is two-armed carrying varada and abhaya. The god has a terrific three-eyed face with raised curls, bulging eyes, knit eye-brows and moustaches and wears kunḍalas, armlets, wristlets, hāra and anklets of snakes, munḍa-mālā and a lower garment with central tassel. His right hands carry varada and triśūla, while the upper left hand carries vajra-ghanṭā and the lower left hand held in ālīṅgana rests on the waist of his Śakti and carries a blue lotus. The figure dates from circa seventeenth century.

The north-west corner shrine shows three-headed and six-armed goddess standing in ālīḍhāsana on a human corpse, flanked by a vulture on each side. She carries kartari, triśūla, sword, shield, mirror and skull-cup and wears munḍa-mālā and a lower garment with the usual latticed apron. The image dates from about the seventeenth century.

The south-east corner shrine shows an image of eighteen-armed Naṭarāja dancing in ardhaparyanāṅkāśana with his left foot resting on a skull-cup. His principal pair of hands carries the bowl and the vindu-mudrā. The second pair carries vajra and vajra-ghanṭā. The remaining right hands carry đamara, varada, lotus flower, gadā, mudgara (hammer), triśūla and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, goad, pāśa, śāṅkha, blue lotus, serpent and khaṭvāṅga. Curiously enough, his kiriṭa-mukta is flanked by flags which are usually associated with goddesses. He also wears patra-kunḍalas, torque, pearl necklace, munḍa-mālā, armlets, wristlets, bell anklets and a lower garment with a latticed apron. The third eye is represented on the forehead. This figure is datable to circa seventeenth century.

The south-west corner shrine is dedicated to ten-headed, ten-armed and ten-legged goddess standing in ālīḍhāsana. Her main pair of hands carries śāṅkha and a human head. The remaining right hands carry triśūla, gadā, arrow and sword. The remaining left hands carry shield, bow, pāśa and triśūla-cum-paraśu. The goddess has raised curls with third eye in each face and wears kunḍalas, torque, hāra, armlets and wristlets of snakes. She also wears munḍa-mālā and a lower garment with a latticed apron. The figure is datable to about the seventeenth century.
BUDDHIST IMAGES

YAKSHA—BODHISATTVA

The earliest image hitherto found in Nepal is the sandstone torso of a Yaksha—Bodhisattva\(^1\) which has only recently been brought to notice. Although the head, hands (except for some fingers of the left hand) and feet of the figure are missing, its stylistic affinity with the figures of early Indian Yaksha and Mathura Bodhisattvas leaves no doubt that it belongs to the same genre. The sculpture is fully carved in the round, though it is more sensitively modelled in the front than at the back. It stands in samabhanga and shows a sturdy build with broad shoulders, heaving chest, strong thighs and not too flabby a belly. It dons an ekānsika uttariya on the left shoulder, the gathered folds of the uttariya being held in the clenched left hand of which only the thumb and traces of some fingers have survived. The stance of the figure and the treatment of the uttariya and its folds, partly held in the left fist kept akimbo, are identical with the early Buddha—Bodhisattva images of the Mathura School. The rendering of the lower garment, however, differs from the said Mathura type in details and is shown as almost diaphanous, though the double-wound waist-band is again akin to the Bodhisattva figure from Maholi (Mathura). The modelling of the back is sketchy and follows the earlier tradition of the Yaksha figures. In fact the peculiar rendering of the buttocks, and the treatment of the kachchha of the dhoti and the looped and tasellated ends of the kānṭha-hāra at the back are strongly reminiscent of the statue of Manibhadra Yaksha from Pawaya.\(^2\)

Since our figure wears a kānṭha-hāra and a sakachchha dhoti, it is more likely to represent a Yaksha than a Buddha—Bodhisattva. But as already indicated, it imbibes certain stylistic mannerisms of the early Bodhisattva type of Mathura and in some respects improves thereon by making the upper part of the body less stocky and more proportionate and by delineating the lower garment as practically diaphanous. Besides being the earliest known sculpture from Nepal, this figure is thus remarkable for providing a link between the early Yaksha and Bodhisattva types and is assignable to circa first century AD.

BUDDHA FIGURES

The earliest Buddha images hitherto found in the Kathmandu Valley are the standing figures of Buddha from Chabel and Bangemura, which are both parts of the city of Kathmandu. While the former is made of greyish stone and has both hands mutilated and the prabhāvalī missing, the latter is made of dark grey limestone and is excellently

\(^1\) Ancient Nepal, No. 4, pp. 37-39, pl. V
\(^2\) Saga of Indian Sculpture (Bharatiya Vidya Bhawan, Bombay 1957), pl. 4 (b) preserved with its oval prabhāvali and two flanking figures of seated devotees with hands in āṅjalimudrā. Both are sculpted in the fifth century Gupta style of India and are heavily influenced by the Sarnath school in respect of the sensitive modelling, the posture of standing with the weight of the body borne on the right leg and the left leg slightly advanced and the diaphanous treatment of the drapery revealing the anatomy, particularly the two knee-joints, the bulging shoulder and the chest and the line of depression at the waist. The Bangamura figure which is well-preserved, shows the right hand of Buddha stretched in varada and the left hand half-stretched holding the gathered ends of the saṅghāṭi. A comparison of the two figures shows that the hands of the Chabel Buddha, in spite of their poor preservation, were held identically. The Chabel figure shows a more sensitive modelling and greater affinity with the Sarnath type, and is closely comparable with the standing Buddha figure from Sarnath Museum (DGA Neg. No. 189/63). The Bangamura Buddha, however, shows a distinctive oval prabhāvali, decorated with a design of minute triangular petals fringed by beads at the edges and is notable also for introducing the kneeling devotees at the flanks. This figure also shows a pair of holes on each side of the head similar to those found on the Tilaganga image of Viṣṇu Vikrānta dated in year 389 (AD 467) of king Mānadeva.

A poorly preserved and defaced standing Buddha image found from the ruins of a Buddhist Vihāra near Budha Nilakanthha appears to be of the same style and date as the two figures discussed above.

The only early inscribed Buddha image is a limestone relief from Chapatol, Patan, showing the Buddha seated (probably in bhūsparśa-mudrā), flanked on each side by a Bodhisattva carrying chāmara and padma and wearing unusually tall kiriṣṭa-mukuta. Artistically the relief is not of much significance, but the inscription, assignable to the late sixth century AD is historically important for its reference to a gandha-kuṭi (Buddhist shrine) and a bhikṣuṇi-saṅgha.

In the next stage the Buddha figures stand in graceful ābhanga with their right hand stretched in the varada-mudrā and the left hand raised shoulder high, holding the gathered ends of the saṅghāṭi. To circa seventh century are assignable two such standing Buddha images carved in two out of the four niches of the sarvatobhadra (prismatic) chaitya at Dhvaka Baha, Kathmandu, one showing Mathura type of drapery and the other the wet drapery of Sarnath, but both revealing the kaṭīśūtra with its knot and the looped scarf-ends. A cognate limestone figure of standing Buddha is known from a private collection at Law Form, Ramshah Path, Kathmandu, which is closer to Sarnath than any other sculpture from Nepal not only in respect of the treatment of drapery but also of refined modelling and delineation of facial features and meditative expression. The Dhvaka Baha figures, on the other hand, have a Nepalese physiognomical set and lack the luminous quality of the Ramshah Path Buddha. (It may be mentioned here that the figures in the remaining two niches of the Dhvaka Baha chaitya represent Vajrapāṇi and Padmapāṇi, while the four smaller niches on the medhi of its crowning stūpa show identical Buddha figures seated in dhyāna-sana, representing the beginning of the concept of the five Dhyānī-Buddhas.)

Another sarvatobhadra image kept in the hitī at Nag Bahal, Patan, shows standing figures of Padmapañi, Maitreya, Vajrapañi and Buddha, the last being a replica of the Dhvaka Baha Buddha donning the Sarnath drapery. That these figures are at least half a century later than those of Dhvaka Baha is indicated by their developed modelling and iconographical features and the fact that all of them have flame-fringed oval nimbus and prabhāvali. A loose Buddha figure of black limestone in the Nag Bahal shrine nearby also pertains to a comparable date and style with its body type and drapery derived from Sarnath and its largish ovoid head from Mathura.

There is a battered and defaced sarvatobhadra stele in a dried-up hiti at Kasai Tol, Patan, which is practically a replica of the Nag Bahal stele discussed above. The conventionalized treatment of figures including that of the Buddha and the presence of bead-and-flame borders for both the nimbus and the prabhāvali would indicate a ninth century date for it.

There is a prismatic late Lichchhavi chaitya in the The Bahil at Thamel, carved with standing figures of the Buddha wearing Mathura type of drapery on all the four sides of its lower portion. Two of them hold the right hand in the varada and the remaining two hold the same hand in the abhaya pose. But no two figures are alike and a variety is introduced by the divergent way in which the gathered ends of the saṅghāṭi are held in the left hand, which is either raised shoulder-high or stretched down in the danda-hasta. The drapery at the neck is, however, oddly depicted in all the figures which are stylistically assignable to the ninth century AD.

The next stage in the evolution of the Buddha image is marked by the 11 high-standing Buddha from Swayambhunātha which follows the iconographical type of the Buddha figure on the Nag Bahal stele derived from the Sarnath model, but its facial features and modelling as also its developed flame-fringed oval nimbus and prabhāvali approximate the style of the early Pāla Buddha figures of eastern India. The Buddha image lying half-buried on the Aṣṭagath resembles the Svyambhunātha image with this difference that its head is large and ovoid. These two Buddha figures are stylistically attributable to circa AD 900.

The Pāla style of seated as well as standing Buddha figures representing the Master in the varada, abhaya, vyākhyāna and bhūmispaṇḍa-mudrās and wearing the Sarnath type of wet drapery became stereotyped in Nepal and continued to be made here in limited quantity till circa seventeenth century. These are found in or around the Buddhist chaityas and vihāras and a fair number of them may be seen at such Buddhist establishments as the Swayambhunātha and the Mahabodhi Temple at Patan.

It is indeed easy to recognize the Buddha figures when they are represented as standing, but it is difficult to distinguish seated Buddha images from those of the Dhāyini-Buddhas which are indeed more popular in Nepal.

Sculptural representations of the life-scenes of the Buddha are relatively fewer in Nepal. Two sculptures of circa ninth century representing life-scenes, however, are remarkable for their elegant modelling and narrative vivacity. One of them from Yangal hiti, Kathmandu, now in the National Museum, Kathmandu, is a fragment of the scene of Māra's temptation, showing two charming daughters of Māra standing in seductive poses and trying to tempt the Master (portion broken off), with Māra's host comprising ferocious goblins, demons and yakshas including a skeletal figure resembling Chāmunḍā, a buffalo-headed demon and Gaṇeśa wielding axe, gesticulating and launching assaults on the Buddha. The other from Deo-Patan, now in the National Museum, Kathmandu represents the scene of Nativity and shows Māyādevī standing in a graceful tribhaṅga holding a branch of the tree which has bent down and quickened to her touch, with the infant Buddha standing on a lotus against an oval prabhāvali, represented on her right flank. The newly born Buddha is being bathed by a pair of flying celestial devotees with water mixed with lotus blossoms from upturned vases. While the first sculpture is reminiscent of the same scene depicted in Cave 26 at Ajanta and is suggestive of contacts with the art of Deccan, the other, with its supple modelling and mellifluous contours is inspired by the classical art traditions of Mathura and Magadha. Some representations are known also of the descent of the Buddha from the Trayastriṃśa heaven, flanked by Brahmā and Indra, the latter holding umbrella over the Master's head. These also date from the later Lichchhāvī times.

DHYĀNĪ-BUDDHAS

The Dhyāni-Buddhas are invariably represented dressed like the Buddha and seated in padmāsana or vajraparyāṅkāsana on a lotus with their hands held in one of the five mudrās (associated with the Buddha), often carrying also a bowl in the lap. Normally such seated figures should be identified with the Dhyāni-Buddhas who are indeed very popular in Nepal and are placed in the specified directions of a chaitya or stūpa. Thus, Akshobhya with bhūmisparśa-mudrā is assigned a place in the east, Ratnasambhava with the varada-mudrā in the south, Amitābha with the dhyāna-mudrā in the west and Amoghasiddhi with the abhaya-mudrā in the north. The place of Vairochana with the dharma-caktra-or vyākhyaṇa-mudrā being in the centre of the chaitya, he is generally not represented at all, but may sometimes be shown in the south-east between Akshobhya and Ratnasambhava. It is indeed easy enough to spot the Dhyāni-Buddhas when they are shown with their respective vāhanas or cognizance marks, viz. vajra for Akshobhya, ratna for Ratnasambhava, lotus for Amitābha, chakra for Vairochana and visvavajra for Amoghasiddhi. The last Dhyāni-Buddha is also distinguished by the canopy of serpent hoods under which he is often shown as seated.

Images of the five Dhyāni-Buddhas are very popular in Nepal and are found placed around the chaityas and stūpas in the appropriate directions. The lower tiers of the larger chaityas and stūpas also accommodate images of the Bodhisattvas relating to the respective Dhyāni-Buddhas. Since the concept of the Dhyāni-Buddhas gained popularity after the eighth century, their images found in Nepal are obviously later and generally post-date the eleventh century and gain greater vogue under Vajrayāna.

OTHER BUDDHIST GODS

Besides the Buddha and the Dhyāni-Buddhas, many of the gods and goddesses affiliated to them received adoration in Nepal. Of the Bodhisattvas the most popular was
Buddhist Images

Padmapāni Avalokiteśvara, who in due course became fused with Lokeśvara with numerous forms. Padmapāni was also identified with Matsyendrenātha who together with Paśupatinātha constituted the national gods of Nepal, adored alike by the Buddhists and the Hindus. Maitreyya, the future Buddha and an emanation of the Dhyānī-Buddha Vairochana, and Bodhisattva Mañjuśrī as the presiding god of wisdom and learning, ranked next in popularity to Padmapāni.

Among other gods who receive popular worship in Nepal, prominent were Jambhala and Vighnāntaka, the Buddhist versions respectively of Kubera and Gañeśa, Heruka, Hevajra, Samvara, Chaṇḍaroshana and Hayagrīva.

Tārā, the Śakti of the Dhyānī-Buddha Amoghasiddhi, was pre-eminent among the female divinities and has numerous forms. Other popular goddesses were Bṛihkti, Jānguli, Ekaṭā, Nairātmā, Mārīchi, Vasudhārā, Prajñāpāramitā, Kurukullā and the five deities of the Pañcharakṣhī group.

Bodhisattvas

Lokeśvara

Bodhisattva Avalokiteśvara, also called Padmapāni, is the most popular Buddhist divinity of Nepal where he is commonly known as Lokeśvara. Avalokiteśvara is well known in the Mahāyāna pantheon as a Bodhisattva of Dhyānī Buddha Amitābha who rules over the present kalpa. He is specially popular as the god par excellence of compassion who refused nirvāṇa until all created beings had attained salvation.

Of all Bodhisattvas, Lokeśvara Padmapāni is the earliest to be represented in Nepal. There is a highly artistic inscribed image of the god labelled as Bhagavata Aryāvalokiteśvaranātha at a dry hiti at Gana Baha near the Central Jail, Kathmandu. The god is represented standing in elegant tribhanga with the right hand stretched in varada and the left holding a lotus stalk bent like a bow. Made of lime-stone, the image bears a crest-figure of Amitābha and is flanked on proper right by a kneeling male devotee (with head mutilated) carrying a bunch of lotus flowers. Palaeographically and stylistically this image is assignable to the sixth century and is the earliest representation of the god in the Valley. His figure appears on the prismatic chaitya at Dhvaka Baha, Kathmandu (pls. 93, 100B) (circa seventh century) where he is standing in elegant abhanga with his right hand stretched in the varada-mudrā and the left hand, placed on the knot of his scarf, holding a winding lotus stalk. Padmapāni is flanked on the right by a kneeling female devotee.

From the ninth century, however, Lokeśvara Padmapāni is flanked by two female attendants, instead of one, with their hands held in the añjali-mudrā and their divine status indicated by the nimbate heads and their lotus seats which often emanate from the same stalk as the larger lotus over which Lokeśvara stands. Further, the mukuta of Padmapāni now bears normally an effigy of the presiding Dhyāni-Buddha Amitābha. Thus the figures from Kathesimbhu, Kathmandu and Gahiti near Yampi Bahā, Patan, belonging to circa ninth century, bear effigies of Amitābha on the crest, while a contemporary figure from Yangu Baha, Patan, omits the crest figure. A similar image from Changu Narayana, without the crest figure, is obviously later and may belong to circa eleventh century.

1 At the time of restoration the inscribed pedestal has been fixed below the standing figure of Buddha (face mutilated) dating from circa eighth century.

The bronze figure of Lokēśvara Lokanātha, seated in padmāsana, from the Hiraṇyavarṇa Mahāvihāra,1 Patan, may be identified as such from the figure of Amitābha on the crest, even though the lotus stalk is missing from the left hand. With its handsomely proportioned body and well-chiselled oval face with aquiline nose, thick lower lip, half-closed eyes and expression of compassionate grace and meditative calm, this bronze ranks among the masterpieces of Nepalese art and is assignable to circa eleventh-twelfth century.

Two standing bronze figures of Padmapañi, one assigned by Kramrisch2 to the ninth-tenth century and the other3 attributed to the tenth-eleventh century, are of fairly ornate style showing the right hand in the varada-mudrā and the left holding the lotus stalk, but these do not appear to be earlier than the twelfth century. Another standing bronze Padmapañi4 is even more ornate and has been correctly dated to the twelfth-thirteenth century and is comparable with an equally ornate and almost contemporary figure of the god illustrated by Kramrisch.5

Two inscribed sculptures labelled as Lokesvara, one dated NS 720 (AD 1599) and the other dated NS 797 (AD 1676) come from Śvayambhūnātha. The former shows the usual type of standing Padmapañi unaccompanied by any attendant but with Amitābha shown on the crest. The latter shows Padmapañi flanked by two seated female divinities of which the right one represents four-armed Śaṇḍakshāri in vajra-paryankāsana with the main pair of hands in the aṇjali-mudrā and the remaining hands holding rosary and lotus flower. The goddess represented on the left flank is two-armed Tārā seated in lalitāsana with the hands held in the varada and abhaya, carrying a lotus stalk each.

A figure of Lokesvara-Lokanātha, seated in padmāsana, with the right hand in the varada-mudrā and the left kept on the left thigh and each hand holding a lotus stalk, comes from Kirtipur. This sculpture is assignable to the seventeenth century and is comparable iconographically with an inscribed image of seated ‘Lokesvara’ from a chaitya behind the Rudra-varanā Mahāvihāra at Patan, which with its flamboyant background may date from the eighteenth century.

We also have Lokesvara sculptures accompanied by figures of Tārā. One such from Kirtipur of circa seventeenth century represents standing Lokesvara flanked on each side by a figure of Tārā seated in lalitāsana and carrying varada and abhaya with the blue lotus

---

1 Stella Kramrisch, Art of Nepal, fig. 20, frontispiece
2 Ibid., fig. 12
3 Art of India and Nepal: Nasli and A. Heeramanick Collection (October, House Inc., New York, 1967), fig. 83
4 Ibid., fig. 89
5 Stella Kramrisch, op. cit., fig. 19
held in each hand by the stalk. An elaborate stele from Thahiti Bazar, Kathmandu, assignable to circa sixteenth-seventeenth century represents standing Lokesvara accompanied by five figures. In the upper field two inscribed female figures flank the diademmed head of the god and are seen seated in lalitásana. The right one is Tārā labelled as Pratisara, carrying the usual varada and abhaya with the lotus stalk. The left figure is exactly identical with the right one and bears an illegible inscription. In the lower field the god is flanked by two male attendants, each standing in svastika-pāda. The right attendant holds the hands in the vyākhya-mudrā, carrying also a blue lotus by the stalk. The left one holds a vajra with both hands and may represent Vajrapāṇi. Above the halo of the god is represented Dhyāni-Buddha Amitābha seated on a projecting lotus pedestal.

There is an unusual sculpture of Lokesvara from Godavari showing the god bearing an effigy of Amitābha on the crest and standing in samabhakṣa on a lotus-seat with both hands stretched down in the varada-mudrā. Four pot-bellied Suchimukhas are represented flanking the feet and the lotus pedestal of the deity, receiving currents of amrita flowing from the two hands and the two feet of the god. This interesting sculpture is assignable to circa eighteenth century.

Lastly, we may notice a wooden stele representing a Lokesvara figure with his Śakti. Lokesvara here is four-armed and carries varada, chakra, triśūla and padma, the lower left hand being kept on the thigh of his Śakti (Tārā) who carries varada and abhaya. The divine couple is flanked by a female divinity carrying varada and abhaya on the right and by Mañjuśrī carrying sword and book on the left. The halo is flanked by a Vidyādhāri carrying garland. Above the halo is represented Dhyāni-Buddha Amitābha seated on a projecting lotus pedestal and canopied by a crown. This wooden figure, now in the National Museum, Kathmandu, may date from circa sixteenth century.

The Sādhanaśāstra has furnished thirty-eight sādhanas describing a variety of forms of Avalokiteśvara from which the following forms are available in Nepal:—

1. Shaḍakshari Lokesvara: The images of this god independently as well as in groups abound in Nepal but one of these dates earlier than the twelfth century. The god, represented as four-armed with his principal pair of hands in the aṅjali-mudrā and carrying in the remaining hands rosary and lotus flower, may be accompanied by a male and female companion with similar attributes. An independent coloured image of this divinity of a late date bearing Amitābha on the crest, occurs at Bodhnath.¹

2. Siṃhanāḍa Lokesvara: This god is fairly popular in Nepal and the important monasteries at Patan have two images of this divinity on either side of the staircase leading to the sanctum. According to the sādhana (Sādhanaśāstra, p. 63) he is two-armed and without ornaments and is seated on a lion in mahāraja-līlāsana. On his right there is a trident entwined by a snake, while from his left hand rises a lotus on which there is a sword burning like fire.

A large bronze image of circa eighteenth century set up in the courtyard of the Machhindranath Temple, Kathmandu, conforms to the sādhana but replaces the triśūla by tridanda. A smaller bronze image of the deity from Nepal\(^1\) is without the lion-mount, while a standing sculpture of the god from Patan\(^2\) is also known.

---

¹ B. Bhattacharyya, Buddhist Iconography (Calcutta 1924), first edition, pl. XIX, e

3. Lokanātha Lokeśvara: Four sādhana are devoted to this god in three of which he is represented alone, while in one he is accompanied by Tārā and Hayagrīva. He is represented as seated in lalita, paryaṇka or vajraparyaṇka and is two-armed carrying varada and lotus flower. The only difference between Lokeśvara and Lokanātha is that while Lokeśvara is depicted standing, Lokanātha is always represented in a seated attitude.

4. Hālāhala Lokeśvara: The Nepal images faithfully conform to the text (Sādhanamālā, pp. 65-66), and show this god with three faces and six hands seated in lalitasana and embracing with his lowest left hand Tārā who is seated in his lap. He carries varada and akshamalā in his two lower right hands and wields arrow with his upper right hand, while he holds bow and lotus flower in his two upper left hands, the lowest embracing his Śakti. There is a fine sculpture in the National Museum, Kathmandu, dated NS 838 (AD 1718) of the above description. A sculpture in Svayambhūnātha of a comparable date bearing an effigy of Amitābha on the crest even shows the trident entwined by a serpent on the right of the god as required in the text. A standing stone image of this god without Śakti is illustrated by Bhattacharyya.\(^3\)

5. Sukhāvatī Lokeśvara: This god is very popular in Nepal and has normally three faces and six arms and is seated in lalitasana with his Śakti. The iconography of this Lokeśvara differs from that of Hālāhala Lokeśvara only in respect of the attitude of one of the left hands. According to the text, one of the left hands (naturally the lowest one) should rest on the thigh of his Śakti (Tārā). In practice, however, one of the left hands (in most cases the uppermost one) of this god carries a book, while two others carry bow and lotus flower, like those of Hālāhala Lokeśvara.

In Nepal this Lokeśvara is often represented as eight-armed, the extra pair of hands being held in the aṅjali-mudrā. The other right hands hold varada, rosary and arrow, while the other left hands hold lotus, bow and book.

6. Hari-Hari-Hari-Vāhana: This image making a triple pun on the term Hari and showing superiority of Lokeśvara over Vishṇu is absent in India and is rare even in Nepal. There is only one sculpture at Svayambhūnātha and a bronze figure in a monastery at Patan and both of them follow the textual description (Sādhanamālā, page 77) faithfully. This Lokeśvara has one face and six arms and rides on Vishṇu (Hari) as Garuḍāsana. Garuḍa who is also called Hari is seated on a lion which is also known as Hari.

There is a modern bronze image of this deity in the National Museum, Kathmandu, which shows the god with the attributes different from those given in the text. In bronze the god is represented eight-armed, carrying abhaya, varada, tridanda and rosary in the four right hands and book, pāṣa, lotus flower and vase in the four left hands.

---

\(^1\) Ibid., pl. xx, a

\(^2\) Ibid., pl. xix, c

\(^3\) B. Bhattacharyya, op. cit., fig. 199
7. Rakta Lokeśvara: According to the text, this deity is red in colour and is four-armed, carrying pāsa and aṅkuśa and bow and arrow and is accompanied by two goddesses Tārā and Bhīrūkuti. Images of this deity are rare but a few have been found in the Kva Bahal at Patan.

8. Māyājalakrama Lokeśvara: This is the only fierce form of Lokeśvara known to the Indian Buddhists. According to the text (Sādhanaṃalā, page 86) he stands in pratyālīḍha attitude and has five faces and twelve arms, bearing mostly war weapons. His statue can be seen in Nepal at Syambhūnātha.

9. Nilakaṇṭha Lokeśvara: According to the text this god is represented without ornaments seated in vajra-paryāṭkāśana with his hands carrying a bowl of jewels and with the effigy of Amitābha on the crest. He is flanked by two serpents. A coloured image of this god is found in the Bodhnāth Temple in Nepal, where he is shown without serpents.

10. Sugatisandarśana: Representations of this god are rare in Nepal. According to the text (Sādhanaṃalā, page 88) he is to be represented as standing with six arms, carrying varada, abhaya and rosary in the three right hands and lotus, water-pot and tridāndī in the three left hands. It will be seen that these attributes are given also to Amoghapāśa Lokeśvara who is however shown with an extra pair of hands, one of them carrying the distinguishing attribute of pāsa.

11. Pretasantarppita: This god is very similar to Sugatisandarśana and is likewise six-armed exhibiting varada and abhaya poses in the first pair of hands; the jewel and the book in the second pair and the rosary and the tridāndī in the third pair. A bronze image of fourteenth century illustrated by Kramrisch1 and shown standing as six-armed, carrying varada, tridāndī and rosary in the right hands and lotus, water-pot and book in the left hands, may well represent this god.

12. Padmanarṭeśvara: True to the textual prescription, this god is represented on a sculpture in Swayambhūnātha dancing in ardhaparyāṭkāśana with one face and eighteen arms carrying a lotus flower in all the hands. The god is flanked by a kneeling devotee on the proper right with hands held in the aṅjali-mudrā and a god seated in sukhāsana on the left with the right hand held in the stuti-mudrā and the left hand holding what looks like a staff. This image is assignable to circa seventeenth century. Padmanarṭeśvara is only occasionally found in Nepal.

Sculptures of the following forms of Lokeśvara, which are not mentioned in the iconographical texts are also available in Nepal:—

Amoghapāśa Lokeśvara: Although no textual prescription is available for this god, he is quite popular in Nepal. Bhattacharyya thus describes the painted representation of this god at the Machhendra Bahal, Kathmandu:

"Amoghapāśa Lokeśvara. He is four-faced and eight-armed and stands on a lotus. He carries in his four right hands the vajra, the sword, the goad and the bow, while the four left carry the Ghanṭā, the Tridāndī, the noose and the arrow."2

---

1 Stella Kramisch, op. cit., fig. 25
2 B. Bhattacharyya, op. cit., p. 428, No. 71
The sculptural representations of this god found in Nepal, however, are different from Bhattacharyya’s description as will be clear from the following description of an inscribed image of the deity dated NS 722 (AD 1601) found at Swayambhūnātha.

“The god stands in ābhāṣya with his principal right hand held in the vyākhyāna-mudrā carrying a jewel (ratna). The remaining right hands carry varada, pāśa, and abhaya. The left hands hold pustaka, tridāṇḍi, kamala and kalaśa. He is flanked by a two-armed standing attendant on each side, that on the right carrying abhaya and bowl of offerings and that on the left having hands in the aṇjali-mudrā. Below the feet of the god is represented a two-armed figure depicted as flying or dancing in the posture of the terrific god Chandaroshana.”

Another sculpture of a comparable date from Swayambhūnātha replaces the tridāṇḍi held in the left hand by a bow.

A modern brass image of the deity exhibited in the National Museum, Kathmandu, not only replaces the tridāṇḍi by the bow but also replaces the ratna by the rosary and carries abhaya, in the first pair of hands; varada and lotus in the second pair; bow and pāśa in the third pair; and rosary and book in the fourth pair. It will be seen that in all the representations pāśa is invariably present and it may be due to this attribute that the god was called Amoghapāsa.

Chintāmani Lokeśvara: An inscribed image labelled Chintāmani assignable to circa eighteenth century is found in the Swayambhūnātha, representing Lokeśvara standing in svastika-pāda, with the right hand carrying a chakra and the left hand raised head high to clasp the foliage of a tree under which the god stands in the attitude of Māyādevī, in the Nativity scene. The god is flanked by two kneeling devotees. A painted representation of Chintāmani Lokeśvara, illustrated by Bhattacharyya from Machhendra Bahal, however, is different and shows the god holding a chaitya in the right hand and the left hand kept near his navel.

MAṆJUŚRĪ

MaṆjuśrī, considered as one of the most important Bodhisattvas, appears to have been a human personality who was deified in circa fourth century AD. According to the Svayambhū Purāṇa MaṆjuśrī was a great saint who came from China to pay homage to the self-born Ādibuddha who manifested himself as a flame of fire on a lotus in a large lake in Nepal. He succeeded in approaching the flame with great difficulty and to make the god accessible to all, he cleaved asunder with his sword the southern barrier of the waters and drained the lake, causing the formation of the Nepal Valley. MaṆjuśrī erected a temple over the flame of fire, identified as the Swayambhūnātha, and took his abode on an adjacent hill, now known as the MaṆjuśrīsthāna or Sarasvatīsthāna and after sometime returned home and attained Bodhisattvahood.

Be that as it may, MaṆjuśrī is one of the most prominent Bodhisattvas, who is alternately considered as an emanation of Dhyāni-Buddha Amitābha, Akshobhya or

---

1 B. Bhattacharyya, op. cit., p. 430, No. 94
all the five Dhyānī-Buddhas. Generally holding the sword and the book of Prajñāpāramitā as distinctive attributes, Mañjuśrī has 41 forms covered by as many Sādhanas. The following representations are more popular in Nepal:

Nāmasaṅgīti

The commonest variety of the god in Nepal is seated in Vajraparyāṇa and has one head and four hands holding sword and Prajñāpāramitā and bow and arrow. The sādhana, however, attributes to this god three heads which are rarely represented in Nepal.

Vāk or Amitābha Mañjuśrī

Showing allegiance to Dhyānī-Buddha Amitābha, this form of Mañjuśrī is two-armed and seated in dhyānāsana and differs from the representation of Amitābha only in being decked with ornaments.

Vāgīśvara

Widely worshipped in Nepal, this form is two-armed and seated in ardhaparyāṇa on a lion, holding blue lotus in the left hand and the right hand displayed artistically (in an image of Kathesimbhū this hand is held in abhaya). A Pāla sculpture in the Indian Museum shows this god seated on a lion-throne in place of lion, holding a bell in the right hand and a blue lotus in the left.

Mañjughoshā or Dharmadhātu-Vāgīśvara

He is the principal god in the Dharmadhātu-Vāgīśvara-maṇḍala (Nishpannyogāvali, p. 64) and is shown four-headed and eight-armed carrying dharmachakra-mudrā in the principal hands and the sword and the book, bow and arrow and vajra and bell in the remaining hands. A sculpture of this description is found at Kathesimbhū.

According to a dhyāna (Sādhanamālā p. 128) Dharmadhātu-Vāgīśvara sits in lalitāsana and is four-faced and eight-armed, holding bow and arrow, noose and goad, book and sword and bell and vajra. This differs from the previous form in replacing dharmachakra-mudrā by noose and goad.

Arapachana

This is by far the most popular form showing the god seated in vajraparyāṇa and two-armed holding the book and the sword. According to the sādhanas he is accompanied by four companions, Keśini, Upakeśini, Chandraprabha and Sūryaprabha, but these are generally omitted in Nepal.

Mañjuvara

This is also a two-armed form of god seated in lalita or ardhaparyāṇa with hands in the dharmachakra-mudrā, distinguished by the book on the lotus. The vāhana lion is optional. He may be accompanied by his wives Keśini and Upakeśini and sometimes by Sudhana-kumāra and Yamāntaka.

MAITREYA

Maitreya partakes of the nature of both a Bodhisattva and a Mortal Buddha though he is not yet a Buddha and is supposed to be passing the life of a Bodhisattva in the Tūshita heaven, preparatory to his descent to earth in the human form. Worshipped alike by the Hinayāna and Mahāyāna sects, his images are traced in India right from the Kushana period but in Nepal his representations are available only from the eighth century onwards.

Maitreya is normally represented as a princely figure holding a lotus stalk in the right hand and recognized by a chaitya shown on his crown. His hands are sometimes shown in the dharmachakra-mudrā and there is usually a vase or a stem of flowers (nāgakesara) supporting a vase. Alternately he may be depicted as a Buddha.

According to the Sādhanamālā, p. 560, Maitreya is three-faced and four-armed carrying dharmachakra-mudrā, varada and nāgakesara flower and is seated in vajraparyāṇka. This form is known to the Nepalese chitrakāras.¹

It is likely that of the two identically standing Buddha figures shown on the prismatic chaitya from Dhvaka Baha (seventh century), one represents Maitreya. There is, however, an undoubted representation of Maitreya as a Bodhisattva on the eighth century prismatic chaitya from Nag Baha, Patan showing the god standing in tribhanga wearing jaṭāmukūṭa adorned with a chaitya and holding rosary and a flask. An ornamented bronze figure of Maitreya of circa ninth century from the Heeramaneneck Collection shows the god standing in exaggerated tribhanga, holding vase in the left hand and the empty right hand (which may have held rosary), raised to the chest. A silver image of Maitreya in the collection of the National Museum, Kathmandu, which is assignable to a date not earlier than the twelfth century, depicts the god seated in ardhaparyāṇka, holding nāgakesara flower in the right hand and flask in the left hand, with the chaitya on his crown.

Images of Maitreya seated like the Buddha in pralambapāḍāsana are also known from the ninth century onwards.

MINOR BUDDHIST GODS

Images of the following Buddhist gods, mostly of the Tāntric forms, are also available in Nepal:

Chaṇḍaroshaṇa: According to the Sādhanamālā (p. 172) he is a fierce god represented as squint-eyed and two-armed carrying sword and tarjani-pāśa. According to the Nepalese Tāntric tradition he is to be represented in the yab-yum and worshipped in secret.

Heruka: He is a popular god worshipped singly as well as in yab-yum, the latter form known as Hevajra. He stands in dancing attitude in ardhaparyāṇka carrying vejra and kapāla. A khaṭvāṅga with flowing banner leans against his left shoulder.

Hevajra: Invariably accompanied by Prajnā, he is known in several forms. In two-armed form he holds vejra and kapāla and is accompanied by Nairātmā.

In four-armed form he holds vejra, sword, khaṭvāṅga and is accompanied by Vajravarāhī.

¹ B. Bhattacharya, op. cit., 1968, fig. 47

82
BUDDHIST IMAGES

In six-armed form with three faces he holds vajra, arrow and trident in the right hands and bell, bow and skull-cup in the left hands and is shown embracing Vajraśriñ-khalā carrying vajra and ghanṭā.

In sixteen-armed form with eight faces and four legs he crushes four Māras, viz. Skandha-māra (Brahmā), Kleśa-māra (Vishṇu), Mrityu-māra (Maheśa) and Devaputra-māra (Indra). His two legs are poised in the ardhaparyānka and the other two in ālidha. In this form he embraces his Śakti Nairātmā.

Sambara : Sambara, also embraced by his Śakti Vajra-vārāhi is another variety of Hevajra. He is shown as either two-armed or twelve-armed with four faces and both the forms carry vajra and ghanṭā and trample upon Bhairava and Kālarātri and stand in ālidha posture.

Jambhala : Much older than the Dhyāni-Buddhas, Jambhala was later affiliated to either Ratnasambhava, Akshobhya all the five Dhyāni-Buddhas, or even to Vajrasattva, the sixth Dhyāni-Buddha. His form varies to suit his Kuleśa, though essentially he is the Buddhist adaptation of Kubera yaksha.

The images of Jambhala found in Nepal mostly emanate from Ratnasambhava and represent the god as a corpulent seated figure holding citrus in one hand and mongoose, often emitting jewels, in the other.

The form affiliated to Akshobhya is fierce and known as Ucchushma Jambhala. He stands in ālidha, trampling upon Dhanada vomiting jewels and carries kapāla and mongoose.

An alternate variety of Jambhala affiliated to Akshobhya, embraces his Śakti and is shown with three faces and six arms carrying citrus, goad and arrow in the right hand and ālingaṇa, mongoose, and bow in the left hand.

Vighnāntaka : This god vanquishing Gaṇeṣa (Vighna) stands in pratyālidha and is two-armed, carrying vajra and tarjāni-pāśa.

Vajraḥusāra, Trailokyavijaya and Vajrajvalānalārka : Like Vighnāntaka there are other aggressive Buddhist gods, all standing in ālidha or pratyālidha. Thus Vajraḥusāra trampling on Śiva, is two-armed carrying bell and vajra in the hands locked in vajraḥusāra-mudrā, while Trailokyavijaya, trampling on Śiva and Pārvatī, has four faces and eight arms. Vajrajvalānalārka is also four-faced and eight-armed and tramples on Vishṇu and Lakṣmi. These gods, however, are seldom represented in Nepal.

Forms of Samvara : 1) four-headed and twelve-armed Sambara standing pratyālidhāsana with his Śakti in Yab-yum. The fourth head of the god is represented behind the back-slab. The first pair of hands carrying vajra and ghanṭā is held in vajraḥusāra-mudrā and embraces the Śakti. The second pair carries ḍamaru and khatpāṅga (broken); the third pair carries triśula and the three-faced head of Brahmā. The fourth-pair carries axe and pāśa. The fifth pair carries kartārī and kapāla. The sixth pair carries gaja-charma. The god tramples upon Kālarātri and Bhairava. Four-armed Bhairava is folded double and carries the bowl and vindu-mudrā in the first pair of hands and ḍamaru and khatpāṅga in the second pair. Kālarātri is stretched fully and is four-armed with a skeletal frame. This stone image of circa eighteenth century is exhibited in the National Museum.
2) Mahisha-Samvara: Bronze image from Hanuman Dhoka, Kathmandu, now in the National Museum, shows thirty-four-armed, sixteen-legged, nine-headed god with the principal head of a buffalo standing in āśīḍhāsana. The principal pair of hands carrying kartārī and kapāla is missing. The second pair carries bow (broken) and shield. The uppermost pair of hands holds elephant hide stretched full length at the back. The remaining left hands carry arm of a human victim, the three-faced head of Brahmā, a peculiar object which looks like a large shrunken leaf (could it represent a female organ?), human leg, Tantric triangle, pāśa, tuft of hair of nara-muṇḍa (the head being worn out), serpent, tarjani, bow, goad, vajra-ghanṭā and flag. All the heads are three-eyed and terrific with the hair secured by a fillet adorned with clasps of skulls, knit eye-brows, bulging eyes and gaping mouth with exposed teeth and whiskers. The god wears torque, muṇḍa-mālā, armlets, wristlets, bell-anklets, anklets and a mekhalā. He is nude and is shown as urdhva-medhra.

3) Mahisha-Samvara: Bronze image from Hanuman Dhoka, now in the National Museum, has thirty-four arms, four legs and nine heads, all horrific with the principal head of buffalo. He carries in his principal pair of hands kartārī and kapāla, in the second pair peacock feathers (śakti) and the three-faced head of Brahmā, and in the third pair bow and shield. The uppermost pair carries elephant hide stretched as a canopy. The remaining right hands carry goad, vajra, axe, iron nail, arrow, goad, peacock feathers, lotus flower, mirror, bow, double vajra, sickle and ḍamaru. The remaining left hands carry serpent, flag, tarjani, horn, fire, umbrella-like dhvaja, flat object resembling a pair of leaves, human arm, bow, vajra-ghanṭā, an animal head with a pair of arms, pāśa and human legs resembling those of the previous figure. He is shown as nude and urdhvarāetas, wearing patra-kuṇḍalas, torque and armlets. He also wears wristlets, anklets and hāra of snakes and a muṇḍa-mālā. Assignable to circa fourteenth century.

4) Narasiṁha-Samvara: Bronze image in the National Museum, has the head of Narasiṁha emitting fire. He is nude and urdhva-medhra and stands in āśīḍhāsana. He is sixteen-armed. The principal pair of hands carries rosary and human head. The remaining right hands carry kartārī, patakā-mudrā, goad, arrow (tip broken off), ḍamaru, trīśūla and sword. The remaining left hands carry pāśa, axe, serpent, bow, gadā, nakulaka and skull-cup. He wears torques and necklaces, armlets, wristlets, anklets, bell-anklets and muṇḍa-mālā.

TĀRĀ

Tārā is most popular among the goddesses and is worshipped in the following forms in Nepal:

Mahāchāna: Tārā: Mahāchāna-Tārā is also known in Buddhist Tāntric literature as Ugratārā who is worshipped as a popular deity in the Vajrayogini temple at Sankhu in Nepal. Incorporated in the Hindu pantheon under the name of Tārā, she is regarded as one of the ten Mahāvidyā goddesses. According to the Sādhanamālā she is the emanation of Akshobhya and is four-armed and stands in prayāśīḍhāsana with a terrific appearance.
She has a corpse as vāhana. According to the Tantrasāra, she should carry sword and blue lotus in the first pair of hands and kapāla and kartari in the other pair. In popular representations in Nepal, she is shown with the same attributes as recommended in the Tantrasāra.

Khadiravani Tārā: As an emanation of Amoghasiddhi, she is green in colour and is commonly known as Śyāmatārā. She is two-armed and may be represented either sitting or standing and carrying varada and blue lotus in the hands and accompanied by two companions, namely Aśokkāntā and Ekajatā.

Āryatārā: Āryatārā, also known as Vaśyatārā is an emanation of Amoghasiddhi and has the same attributes as Khadiravani Tārā with this difference that she is represented seated in pratambapādāsana.

Sitātārā: Sitatārā is six-armed and three-faced and should be represented seated in ardhaparyānkāsana. According to the Sādhanamālā she carries varada, rosary and arrow in the right hands and blue lotus, lotus and bow in the left hands. In Nepal she is frequently represented as seated in vajraprayānkāsana.

Dhanadatārā: She is also an emanation of Amoghasiddhi and according to the Sādhanamālā is shown seated with four arms carrying varada, rosary, blue lotus and the book. She is quite popular in Nepal, her representation tallying with that given in the Sādhanamālā.

Vajratārā: According to the Sādhanamālā and the Nishpana-yogāvali she is an emanation of Ratnasambhava and is four-faced and eight-armed, carrying vajra, pāśa, arrow and conch in the right hands and blue lotus, bow, goad and tarjani in the left hands. According to the Sādhanamālā she should be surrounded by Eight Mothers. An image of Vajratārā is under popular worship at the Saraswatisthān, close to the Swayambhū temple in Nepal.

Prasamatārā: She is also an emanation of Ratnasambhava and is represented with eight faces and sixteen arms. She carries in the right hands khaṭvāṅga, blue lotus, arrow, vajra, goad, staff, kartari and abhaya and in the left hands pāśa with tarjani, kapāla, bow, khaṭvāṅga, vajra, pāśa, head of Brahmā and ratnapātra.

Mahattaritārā: She is a variety of green Tārā and is distinguished by the vajraparyānkāsana in which she sits without any companions.

Other forms of Tārā: Besides the forms mentioned above, Jāngulī, an emanation of Akshobhya and Parṇaśabari, an emanation of Amoghasiddhi, are also counted among green Tārās. Similarly, Kurukullā, an emanation of Amitābha, and Jāngulī, an emanation of Akshobhya, are considered white Tārās.

Bhrīkuṭi, an emanation of Amitābha, is considered a yellow Tārā, just as Ekajatā, an emanation of Akshobhya, is considered a blue Tārā.
BIBLIOGRAPHY

Arts of India and Nepal, The Nasli and Alice Heeramanek Collection (Boston 1966)
Banerjee, N. R., Nepalese Art (An Introduction) (Kathmandu, 1966)

Nepalese Architecture (Delhi 1980)

“Parvati’s Penance as Revealed by the Eloquent Stones of Nepal”, Ancient Nepal, No. 2 (January 1968), pp. 27-38

A Journey of Literary and Archaeological Research in Nepal and Northern India During the Winter of 1884-85 (Cambridge 1886)

Bernier, Ronald M., A Bibliography of Nepalese Art (Kathmandu 1970)

The Nepalese Pagoda (New Delhi 1978)

Bhattacharyya, Benoytosh, The Indian Buddhist Iconography (Calcutta 1958)

Indian Architecture (Buddhist and Hindu Periods) (Bombay 1965)

Gnoli, R. (ed.), Nepalese Inscriptions in Gupta Characters, 2 Vols. (Rome 1956)

Hamilton, Francis, An Account of the Kingdom of Nepal (Edinburgh 1819)

Himachal Heritage, a special issue of Marg, Vol. 23, No. 2 (March 1970)

His Majesty’s Government of Nepal, The Physical Development Plan for the Kathmandu Valley (Kathmandu 1969)

Jayaswal, K. P., Chronology and History of Nepal from 600 BC to 800 AD (Patna 1937)
BIBLIOGRAPHY

Kirkpatrick, William J., An Account of the Kingdom of Nepal (Edinburgh 1819)

Le Nepal, 3 Vols. (Paris 1905-1908)

Nepal: Where the Gods are Young (New York 1975)

Vaiśnava Iconology in Nepal (Calcutta 1970)

The Medieval History of Nepal (c. 750-1480) (Rome 1958)

Regmi, Delli Raman, Ancient Nepal (Calcutta 1960)
Medieval Nepal, 3 Vols. (Calcutta 1965)

Preliminary Report on Two Scientific Expeditions in Nepal (Rome 1956)
Vajracarya, Dhanrajara, (ed.), Abhilekha-Sanghara, (Nepali) Vol. 1, No. 1

Lichavi Kāla Kā Abhilekha (Nepali) (Kathmandu VS 2030)

87
INDEX

A

abhaṅga-mudrā, 15, 32, 38, 72
abhaya, 30, 36, 40, 42, 44, 47, 53, 55, 56, 73, 76
abhaya-mudrā, 6, 18, 32, 39, 42, 45, 46, 49, 50, 57, 59-62, 64, 80, 85
Ādi Buddha, 5, 80
Ādiśeṣha, 20, 21, 25
Āditya (s), 27-29
Ādityasena, 2
Āditya-Viśnū, 6
Aghora Bhairava, 9, 31
Agni, 50
Akshobhya, 74, 80, 83-85
akṣa-mūlā, 20, 28, 32, 39, 79 āḍīṛhāsana, 30, 38, 39, 41, 47-52, 57-59, 61, 64-70 āḍīṅgana, 33, 41, 42, 44, 47, 55, 56, 59, 66, 69, 70, 83
Āḍīṅgana murti 10, 44
Amitābha, 5, 74-78, 85
Amogha-pāśa Lokesvara, 79
Amoghasiddhi, 74, 85
arjuni, 21, 23-26, 28, 41, 69, 75
Aparajitīta, 5
Arapachana, 81
Arḍhanārīśvara, 7, 10, 11, 31, 38 ardhaparyankāsana, 36, 40, 45, 47, 52, 66, 70, 82, 83
Arḍhasaurīśvara, 6
Arjuna, 25, 27
Aruna, 29, 64, 69
Aryaghat, 11, 16, 31, 73
Aryatārā, 85
Aśoka, 1, 3
asti-kuṇḍalas, 39
Avalokiteśvara, 75

B

Bhaktapur, 28-30, 32, 57, 59
Bhavani, 13, 60, 62, (inscribed), 61-63
bhikṣu-saṅgha, 72
Bhūdevi, 18, 22, 23, 25, 26
bhūmisparsa-mudrā, 72, 73
Bhū-Vārāha, 69

Buddha-Bodhisattva, 15, 71
Buddha Nilkanṭha, 20, 72

C

Chābel Buddha, 72
chaitya, 3, 4, 73, 76, 82
chakra, 20, 21, 33, 38, 39, 45, 53, 69 chāmara, 25, 28, 34, 60, 72
Chāmuṇḍā, 65, 67
Chandrāroshaṇa, 5, 75, 80, 82
Chandesa, 11
Chāṇḍī, 64
Chandraprabhā, 5, 81
Changu Narayana, 7, 12, 13, 16-20, 24, 76 chaturmukha-liṅga, 9-11, 31
Cheturviṁśatimūrtis, 7
Chintāmaṇi Lokesvara, 80

D

dāmaru, 39-49, 52, 56, 57, 60, 62, 64, 66-69, 83, 84
dāṇḍa, 24, 28
dāṇḍa-hasta pose, 23, 44, 63, 73
Deo-Patan, 1, 9-11, 18, 31, 38, 74
Dhanada, 83
Dhanada-Tārā, 6, 85
dharmachakra-mudrā, 5, 74, 81, 82
Dharamadhatu Vāgīśvara, 81
Dhavaka Bahla Buddha, 73
Dhum-Vārāha, 20
Dhum-Vārāhī, 7
dhyānāsana, 72
Dhyāni-Buddha Amitābha, 75-77, 80, 81
Dhyāni-Buddha Amoghasiddhi, 6, 75
Dhyāni-Buddha Akshobhya, 5
Dhyāni-Buddha Ratnasambhava, 5 dīkapāla, 34
dvārapāla, 24

E

Ekādaśa Rudras, 31
ekāvart, 23, 24, 26

88
INDEX

Ekajāta, 5, 75, 85
Ekaṭāda, 54
Ekaṭāda-Trimūrti, 11

G

gadā, 18-25, 39, 41, 42, 44, 46, 48, 49, 53, 56, 57, 61-63, 65, 66, 68, 84 gaja-charma, 57-59, 83
gaja-hasta, 40, 45, 47, 52
gaja-karṇa, 51
Gajāsura, 1
Gajāsura-vadhama-mūrti, 57
gana(s), 35, 37, 40, 45, 47, 51, 55
Ganapati, 10
Gāndiva, 25, 27
Ganesa, 12, 13, 35-37, 40, 46, 47, 52, 57, 59, 67, 75, 83
Gaṅgā, 10, 34-36
Gaṅgādhara, 10, 35, 37
Garuda, 6, 7, 17-19, 21, 23-25, 39, 41, 44, 45, 53, 55-57, 61-62, 66, 69, 78
garudāsana, 17, 78
Garuda-Nārāyaṇa, 6, 7, 13, 16, 17
ghaṇṭā karṇa, 35-36
Girija-Narasīṅha, 7, 24
Gokarna, 30, 32
gomakha, 41
grahas, 29
Guha Mata (inscribed), 61
Guhyesvarī, 13

H

hale, 25, 61
Halahala Lokeshvara, 78
hāṅsa, 46
Hanuman, 61, 66, 67
hāra, 68, 70, 84
Hara Siddhi, 13, 45
Hari, 7, 13, 41, 78
Hari-Hari-Hari Vāhana, 78
Hari-Hari-Hari Vāhana Lokeshvara, 13
Hari-Śaṅkara, 39, 69
Hari-Śaṅkari, 39
Hārīti, 13
Hayagrīva, 5, 75, 78
Heruka, 5, 75, 82

Hevajra, 75, 82
Hieun Tsang, 2
Hīnayāna, 3, 4, 82
Hiranyakaśipu, 24
Hiranyakavarna Mahāvīra, Patan, 76

I

Indrāṇi, 43, 48, 60
Isāna, 50
Isāna-Sadāśiva, 10, 31

J

Jalaśayana at Budha Nilkantha, 7
Jalaśayana Vishṇu, 20
Jagadīśvarī, 60
Jambhala, 6, 75, 83
Jambha Vān, 21-23
Janguli, 5, 75, 85
jatā-bhāra, 23, 24, 35, 37, 68, 69
jatā-mukuta, 25, 26, 31, 34, 38, 39, 41, 44, 47
Jvarahāresvara, 12

K

Kailāsa, 10, 32-34, 36
Kaiṭabha (inscribed), 62
Kālarātri, 83, 84
kalaśa, 54, 56, 58, 63-66, 80
Kāliya, 16, 20
Kāliyadamana, 6, 7, 17, 55
kalpa tree, 56
Kāmadeva, 55
Kamalāsau, 19, 39
kamanyalata, 24, 25, 28, 36, 38-40, 60, 68, 69
Kapakamuni Buddha, 1
Kanakeśvarī, 16
kaṇṭhi, 22, 33
Kapāla, 11, 36, 51, 52, 58, 59, 82-85
Kapāli 8
Kapālikas, 58
karanḍa-mukuta, 58, 59
Kārttikeya, 30, 34, 36, 40, 49
katapa pose, 37
Kathmandu, 1, 7, 15, 16, 20, 30, 31, 38, 39, 71-74, 76, 77, National Museum, 27, 32, 73, 74, 77, 78, 82, 83, valley, 9, 27, 71

89
INDEX

Nānyadeva, 2, 3
nara-muṣṭa, 47, 49-52, 54, 56, 57, 60, 65, 67, 84
Narasiṃha, 6, 17, 20, 24, 53, 55, 56, 69
Nārāyaṇa, 6, 7, 9, 29, 41, 44, 45
Naṭarāja, 11, 40, 45, 47, 70
Nepalese samvat, 2
Nirriti, 50
nirvāṇa, 4, 75

P

pādāṇgadas, 37, 39, 41, 42, 44-46, 48, 49, 52, 54, 68, 69
padma, 39, 44, 54, 72
padmāsana, 18, 29, 41-47, 50, 51, 54-56, 61, 62, 74, 76
Padmanārttēśvara, 79
Padmapāni, 5, 72, 73, 75, 76
Padmapaṇi Avalokiteśvara 75, Lokeśvara, 28
Pañccha-devopāśana, 6
Pañḍarā, 5
para, 6, 17, 18
Pāramitā(s), 6
Parāśu, 32
Parṇaśabari, 6, 85
Pārvati, 10, 12, 16, 31-36, 38-40, 55, 83
Pāsha, 8, 26, 41, 42, 44-46, 48-50, 52, 53, 56, 57, 61-66, 68, 70, 78
Pāśupatas, 8, 9
Pāśupati area, 10, 31, 38
Pāśupatinātha, 13, 30, 75
Pāśupati temple, 3, 9-12, 31, 39 patākā-mudrā, 21, 22
pātāla, 22
Patan, 1, 3, 11, 13, 16, 18, 19, 29, 32, 33, 39, 40, 72, 73, 76, 79 patra-kunḍala, 23, 24, 33, 34, 38, 39, 41-49, 52, 54, 57, 63, 70, 84 prabhāvali, 18, 25, 28, 39, 41, 71-74
Parhlāda, 24
Prajñāpāramitā, 5, 75
Prasanna Tārā, 85
Pratyusha, 29, 64, 69 pratyātāyāha, 11, 20, 24, 48
pratyātāyāhaśāsana, 16, 53, 59, 82, 85
Pretā (goblin), 57
pūrṇaghaṭa, 19
purusha, 9, 10
Purushottama, 42

R

Rakta Lokeśvara, 78
Rani Pokhari, Kathmandu, 1, 30, 38-40
Mahādeva temple, 70
Rati, 55
ratna-keyāra(s), 39
ratna-kunḍala(s), 10, 20, 22, 26, 34, 41, 42, 44, 49, 54-56 ratnā-maṇijāri, 51
ratna-mekhala, 41, 44
ratnopapita, 55, 68
Ratnapāni, 6
ratna-pātra, 85
Ratnasambhava, 74, 83, 85
Ravaṇānugraha panel, 33
Rudras, 11
Rudravāna Mahāvīra, 76

S

Sādhana(s), 4, 77, 78, 80
Sadyojata-Nandi, 31
Śakti, 4-6, 9, 10, 29, 41-47, 49, 52-55, 58, 59, 66-68, 70, 73, 75, 77, 78
Śakti (spear), 34, 36, 40, 50, 62, 63, 65-67
Śamanatbhadra, 5 samabhāṅga, 14, 15, 18, 19, 24, 25, 28, 32, 38, 50, 71, 77
śaṅghāti, 15, 72, 73
śaṅhāra (dissolution), 8, 11
Saṅkarṣaṇa, 25
Śani, 28
śaṅkha, 18-21, 23, 25, 38, 39, 41, 42, 44, 49, 54, 61-66
śaṅkha-kunḍala(s), 53
Sarasvatī, 37, 60
sarpa-hāra, 39, 56, 69
sarpa-keyāra(s), 38
sarpa-kunḍala(s), 26, 31-33, 38, 39, 41, 44, 45, 47, 52, 54, 56, 67, 69 sarpnopapita, 32, 39, 44, 46, 66, 67
Sarvatobhadra, 72, 73
Satyanārāyaṇa temple, 7
Śeshāṅga, 23, 24
Śeshaśept, 6, 27; Vishnu, 7, 25
Shaṅkeshari, 76
Sikhandaka type of head-dress, 34 siṅhha-mukha, 34, 36
siṅhāsana, 52
Siṃhavāhini, 60, Durga, 41
Śiva, 9-12, 25, 26, 28, 30-32, liṅga(s), 10, 11, 13, 19, 30, 51, 69
Śiva-Pārvatī, 10, 33-36, 53, 55
Skanda, 10, 12, 33, 35, 37, 47
Śrīdevi, 18
Śrīdhara, 7, 19, 20
Śrīstī (creation), 8
Śrūk, 45, 50
Śūpa, 3, 5, 51, 72, 74
stuti-mudrā, 21, 24, 79
Sūrya, 27-30, 35, 56, 57, 64, 69
stūchi-mukhas, 27
Sudhanakumāra, 81
sukhāsana, 33, 37, 79
Śukra, 28
Śukrachārya, 23
Śūla, 66
Svayambhū, 5 svayambhū-chaitanya, 3, 5
Svayambhūnātha, 13, 73, 76, 78-80 svastikāpāda, 80
Śyāma-tārā, 84

T

Tantrayāna, 4, 13
Tarjani, 21, 46, 49, 59, 61, 63, mudrā, 22, 23, pāsa, 82
Tārā, 2, 4-6, 75, 76, 84, 85
Tātpurūsha-Mahādeva, 9, 10 tripatākā-cum-āṅgana-mudrā, 43
Tripurāntaka, 21
triśūla, 26, 32, 33, 37-39, 48, 53, 57, 60-62, 64, 66, 69, 70, 77, 83
triśūla-cum-parāśā, 34, 70
Trivikrama, 6, 15-17, 20, 21, 23

U

Uchchushma-Jambhala, 6, 83
udara-bandha, 18, 20-22, 26, 28, 32, 34, 38
udīcchaya-vesha, 27
Ugra-Tārā, 13, 84
utāka-mukha, 34
Umā, 10, 31, 44, 47, 60
Umā-Mahēśvara, 10, 16, 31-33, 37
Umāprāśādana, 34, 35
Umāśahita-marī, 10, 32
upāsita 24, 46
ūrdhva-hasta, 45, 47, 52, 55 ūrdhva-kēśa, 42
ūrdhva-mēghra, 33, 84
ūrdhva-retas, 35, 56
Urvaśī, 26
Ushā, 29, 64, 69
Ushnishavijaya, 5
utpala, 37-39, 69
uttariya, 19, 20, 23, 32, 34, 38, 71

V

Vagīśvara, 81
Vāhana, 30, 41, 74, 81, 85
Vaijeyanti-mala, 24, 41, 42, 44, 54, 55
Vaiṣṇu, 42
Vairochana, 74
Vaiśnavi, 48, 51
vajra, 5, 13, 23, 24, 26, 32, 40-43, 45-50, 52, 53, 56, 58, 61-66, 74, 77, 81, 82, 84
Vajradhāra, 5
Vajradhātiśvari, 5
vajra-ghanṭā, 13, 39, 40, 45, 61, 62, 70, 84
vajrahumkāra-mudrā, 13, 83
Vajrapāṇi, 5, 72, 73
vajra-parakāsana, 74, 76, 78, 79, 81, 82, 85
Vajrasattva, 5, 72, 73
Vajra-Śrīkhala, 6, 83
Vajra-yoginis, temple, Sunkhu, 84
Vajra-Vārāhi, 5, 83
Vajrayāna, 4, 5, 13, 74
Vāmaṇa, 20-22
Vāmadeva, 10, 31
Vāmadeva-Uma, 9, 10, 31
Vānmanātā, 21, 38, 39
Vānara-mukha, 34, 36
varada-mudrā, 5, 15, 20, 25, 32-34, 39, 40, 42, 46, 49-53, 55-57, 59-61, 68, 72-74, 76, 77, 82, 85
Vāraṇa, 6, 7, 17, 20, 45, 55
Vāraṇa, 43, 48, 54
Varuṇa, 26, 30, 50, 68
Vasudhārā, 6, 75
Vāya-tārā, 1
Vidyādhara(s), 24, 35, 32
vidyādhari, 34, 77
Vighna, 12, 82
Vighnāntaka, 6, 13, 83
Vihāra, 72, 73
Vijāpatra (inscribed), 60

92
INDEX

Viṣṇu-purāṇa, 60, 61
Viṣṇā, 45, 46, 48, 61
Vindu-mudrā, 40, 42, 43, 45, 50-52, 56, 57
Virāja-rūpa, 27
Virupākṣha, 11, 31
Vishnū, 6, 7, 11, 13, 16-25, 27-29, 37-39, 41, 42, 56, 69, 82
Vishnū-Nārāyaṇa, 6
Vishnū-Vikránṭa, 6, 7, 72
Vishnū-Vikránṭamūrti, 21, 22
Viśvakāraṇa, 6
Viśvarūpa, 7, 16, 20, 25, 27
Viśouvajra, 6, 67, 74

Vyāha, 6, 27
Vyākyāna-mudrā, 23, 33, 37, 43, 50, 73, 77, 80

Y

Yab-yum posture, 5, 82, 83
Tajamāna, 22
Tajñopavita, 18, 19, 26, 32-34, 37, 38, 45
Takṣha(s), 4, 15, 16, 83
Takṣha-Bodhisattva, 4, 14, 71
Yamāntaka, 81
Yamāra, 5
Togapatṭa, 55, 56
Tāpa, 21, 23

71632

93
CATALOGUED.

Archaeological Memoirs - Nepal Images
Nepal Images - Archaeological Memoirs