

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA
ARCHÆOLOGICAL SURVEY OF INDIA
ARCHÆOLOGICAL
LIBRARY

ACCESSION NO. 9420

CALL No. 915.431/P08

WESTERN INDIA

IN 1838.

View of the Valley of the River of the Holy Spirit, Malabar.

A. M. K. 1848

TO BE GIVEN TO WHOM THE V.P. IS PLEASED TO GIVE

Given, Sep. 1848, by the Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society

25. 10

S. 110

WESTERN INDIA

IN 1838.

AN 6453

9420

BY MRS. POSTANS,

AUTHOR OF "CUTCH."

IN TWO VOLUMES.

VOL II.

915.431

Pos

LONDON

SAUNDERS AND OTLEY, CONDUIT STREET.

1839.

CENTRAL ARCHAEOLOGICAL LIBRARY, NEW DELHI.

Acc. No. 9420.
Date. 14.8.57
Call No. 915.431
Pos

LONDON:

BLATCH AND LAMPERT, PRINTERS, GROVE PLACE, BROMPTON.

X m 19

WESTERN INDIA

IN 1838.

CHAPTER I.

VISIT TO THE SURASHTRA* PENINSULA.

Temple of Somnāth.

"Look on its broken arch, its ruined wall,
Its chambers desolate, and portals foul."

CHILDE HAROLD.

THE learned, and elegantly minded author of "Rajasthan," has denominated the Peninsula of Guzzerat, "classic ground." Previous to the recent discoveries made in the ancient languages of the province, this term might have appeared to many, a mere fanciful application, and the result of enthusiasm, arising from gratified research into the legends and mythology of an ancient and interesting people. It is now, however, clearly demonstrated to be correct, and Surashtra, with its rich remains of Buddhist worship, its temples of the sun, its sacred mounts, inscribed rocks, and phallic emblems, acquires fresh lustre from the evident connection of its fables, with the history of the western world.

* Surashtra, the most westernly side of the province of Guzzerat; the Syrrastra vicus of Plotemv.

My long cherished wish having been, to become acquainted with some of the sacred places belonging to the heterodox Jains,* I eagerly availed myself of the first opportunity of visiting the "holy hill" of Girnar, in the Surashtra Peninsula.

* The mounts considered sacred by the Jains, in Western India, are five in number; Girnar, Palitana, and Tallijah in Surashtra, Abu, near Deesa, and Sakur; about whose locality, exists much doubt; the Jains themselves speak of it, as far to the eastward.

In the beginning of May 1838, we embarked from Mandavie, in a Cutch Kotia, intending to make Pore-bunder, or whatever part of the Kattiwar coast, seemed most convenient for our plans. After a day's buffeting in the Gulf of Cutch, and wondering no longer at the distaste and dread, said to have been entertained by the Greek navigators for this particular part of the world of waters, our boat made the Island of Bate,* known to the ancients as Sankha-dhara, the City of Shells.† This was the first point of our Indu-classic tour, as Hindoo sacred legends assert, that from this spot, the serpent (Budda) is said to have escaped with the books of the Vedas, stolen by a celestial nymph from the lips of Brahma; by this graceful allegory of the flight of wisdom, conveying the supposed fact, that from hence learning was carried away by the Arabs and Egyptians from the shores of India, Bate having been long the great mart of commerce for other nations, both from the east and south.

* On the opposite shore of the Gulf of Cutch.

† The "shunk," a large shell, which after being pierced, is used as a horn, by Gosaens, all over India, is procured at Bate, and is an article of extensive commerce, even with Calcutta.

Bate, is a low island of inconsiderable size, forming the extreme northerly point of the Surashtra peninsula. A small town, a pretty clump of cocoa nut palms, and two clusters of temples, decorated with red flags, is all that can be seen from the sea. The inhabitants dislike the landing of strangers; which is not always practicable however, from heavy surf, and strong currents running near shore. The sands are firm and extensive, and beyond them stretch low rocks, covered with fine coral, and great varieties of scarce and beautiful shells, offering great inducements to conchologists, and rendering very intelligible, the ancient title of Sankha-dhara.

An island to the right of Bate appears treeless and deserted. One temple only, dedicated to Mātā, the goddess of small pox, remains; it is in charge of a few Gosaens, but receives little veneration in modern times. Opposite Bate are the cliffs which afford the sacred chalk, so highly prized at Dwaka.* These form headlands to the peninsula; and with Bate, present a safe and calm roadstead, usually filled with boats of small burthen, waiting a favourable wind, for the prosecution of their voyages.

Early as the Greek invasion, was this spot famous as a nest of daring and reckless pirates, known as the "Sangars of Bate: men who, steeped in crime, and hardened in defiance of all human law, yet professed a purity of religious faith, and were the devoted worshippers of Budda Trivicrama, the original deity of the neighbouring Dwaka-nath.*

* Particularly used by the Gosaens, to mark the trisool, or emblem of Siva, on their bodies.

* Budda, as an incarnation of Vishnu the preserver,

The moon had risen, and shed a beautiful halo of coloured light upon the fleecy clouds, which floated round, half threatening to obscure her brightness, as our little craft anchored amongst the fleet. The shore, a low, sandy line of coast, covered with stunted milk bush, looked sadly uninviting; but to remain in a deckless boat, swarming with rats, and redolent of a mingled stench of fish and bilge water, was impossible; we determined therefore to brave its inhospitable looks, and despatching our servants in a small canoe, arrangements for a bivouac were soon concluded.

The dense jungle around us, which we found extended the distance of ten miles, to Dwaka, gave me some apprehension lest our rest should be disturbed by the seemed a fitting object of worship to men, whose vocation was one of constant danger. This deity remained the chief object of adoration at Dwaka, until the deification of Crishna, who, as an exiled prince, built the city, and reigned there.

untimely visit of some of its inhabitants; we escaped, however, with only the shrieks and barks of a few packs of hungry jackals, who swept past our tents in search of their usual food.

In the morning, our locality looked little less desolate; and discovering neither tea-trees, nor coffee-berries, we despatched a peon to Bate, in search of some materials for a breakfast. Despite the authority of his red belt, our messenger returned empty handed; he had made five poojas to "Runchorjee,"* and for his part was in the very courts of Indra;—for ourselves, all remonstrance being useless, we could but devour our tasteless apps,† and lament the surpassing holiness of the Vishnuvies.

* The name under which Crishna is worshipped at Bate.

† Cakes made of flour and water, baked on tin plates, generally used to supply the want of bread, which is only procurable at European stations. In any place of peculiar sanctity, it is often impossible to obtain any supplies, and an egg is even denied, as containing the germ of animal life.

A strong land-wind, making it impossible to enter the roadstead of Dwaka, (which we wished to have done,) we continued our voyage along the coast, and the next day passed Mangrole,* of old famous for its manufacture of fine linen cloths.

From this spot is first seen, the distant peaks of the sacred Girnar, and the fine Junagarh hills, softened by the mists of distance, rising into and mingling with the clouds, which hang around their summits.

On one of these hills is a spot, sacred to a great Mohammedan saint, named Jemial Shah, and our crew being good Moslems, hastened to show all due respect, and availing themselves of simple and ready means, cast a few pieces of cocoa-nut towards the shore, with prayers and genuflections.

The town of Mangrole appeared small, but surrounded with clusters of foliage—fine mangoe trees flourish in the neighbourhood, bearing rich fruit, nearly equal, in colour and flavour, to the far-famed growth of Bombay. It is curious, that however the mangoe is cultivated elsewhere, even in a congenial soil and from Bombay plants, the produce rapidly deteriorates, becoming stringy, pale, and tasteless.

* The "Monoglossum Emporium" of Ptolemy.

Weary of boating, the next evening we made "Verawul Puttun;" this name I afterwards discovered to be composite, including both the old and new town, the first being Puttun, the last Verawul.

Our point of interest being the old town, we were disappointed to find ourselves at Verawul, and two miles distant from the great temple of the Somnâth; the people were, however, particularly courteous and attentive, which spoke well for the friendly and hospitable disposition of his highness the Nuwaub of Junagarh, whose territories we had now entered.

The following morning we proceeded to Puttun, the great scene of Mahmoud's*

* Mahmoud of Ghizni.

intolerance. The road lies through a large Mohammedan cemetery. Beautiful cenotaphs, with domed roofs, supported on light pilasters, musjids with tall minarets and richly sculptured pulpits, wells overgrown with rich verdure, and surrounded with covered verandahs, affording at once rest and refreshment to the weary traveller, surrounded us, whilst any intermediate ground was occupied by the simple tombs of humble believers, the head of each decorated with a column, supporting the richly sculptured semblance of a Moslem turban.

At the largest well, my Hummall called a halt, and each, with a little tobacco rolled in a fresh leaf, originated a simple but refreshing cigar.

A burning mid-day sun being yet in the ascendant, I was invited to rest in the house of the acting magistrate of Puttun, a chelah,* or favourite of the Nuwaub. The Syud Abdoola, was indeed a most splendid person, the beau ideal of an Arab dandy. His age was probably thirty; he had the finest black beard, the sweetest smile, and the largest and most lustrous black eyes imaginable. His attire consisted of a fine white muslin ankrika, confined at the waist by a scarf, edged with pale pink, entwined with rich gold and silver kincaub waistbands, whose ends depending, concealed within their folds, a richly decorated sword and dagger. A turban of fine muslin, curiously folded over a cap of gold embroidery, and a gold and pearl-set comb, put jauntily in on the left side, completed his gay and becoming costume. The minor arts of the toilette also met deserving attention, and the handsome Abdoola had not disdained to add additional softness to his full eyes, by the use of soormay, or to apply the delicate tints of the henna to his well-formed hands.

* Chelah, literally adopted.

Syud Abdoola received me under the shaded gateway of his house, surrounded by his sons ;* behind us, an open room was occupied by Arab guards, and its well-whitened walls were decorated with groups of picturesque arms, swords, shields, and matchlocks.

While enjoying the charming coolness of this retreat, the report of a matchlock resounded from the outer court ; this is the usual Arab salutation, expressing at once joy, respect, and good wishes to the inmates of the dwelling. After a few seconds, a soldier entered fully accoutred, his matchlock in his hand, and a crowd of deadly weapons bound around his waist, with a band of blue and pink checked linen, the favourite scarf of the Arab soldiery. Approaching the chief, our new arrival respectfully lifted his hand to his lips, offered the same token of homage to his sons, exchanged salutations and greeting with the retainers of Abdoola, and stated his having left Girnar two days before, with packets from his highness the Nuwaub.

* The gateway of a native house is considered the place of honour.

The handsome Jemeedar accompanied us with an escort of horse, to the temple of Somnâth.* The situation of this great fane of Hindooism, is as imposing as it is itself magnificent, as a structure of other times. Crowning a bold promontory, the thundering and eternal surges lash the walls which protect it, and a wild expanse of ocean begirts the cliff on which it stands. The exterior is richly adorned with finely chiselled sculpture, on which, unfortunately, the wing of time has not flapped harmlessly, or the alternation of seasons left untouched. Those parts of the curious carvings which yet remain encrusted on the noble building, are certainly very beautiful, and the whole is a gem of exquisite, although mutilated art. The roof of the Somnâth originally supported five domes, of which two only remain; from either side of the front entrance rise slender columns of stone, each crowned at its tapering summit, with a pine-shaped Kullus.* In form, and proportion to the mass of the building, these columns resemble the horns of a beetle, and one of them is so much curved outwards, as to threaten a rapid descent. The interior of the temple consists of a spacious hall, the domed roof of the centre supported by an octagon of arches, rising from square and richly carved pillars. The floor is paved with a hard black stone, and strewn with fragments of the fallen domes. The entrance doorways are of the Egyptian form, narrow at the top, and gradually increasing in width towards the base. They are adorned on the exterior, by a broad, and richly ornamented border.

* Somnâth, Lord of the Moon.

The sanctum, a small square room, is situated at the extreme end of the hall, immediately facing the principal entrance. It is unoccupied; and a small stone ledge runs round the wall, about half way from the ground. From the ruins of the building, a flight of steps has been piled up on one side, which enables the visitor to command, from the roof, a beautiful and extensive view. On one side, is seen the ocean, and cliffs of Verawul, half concealed with the white foam of the angry waves ; on the other, the old Hindoo town of Puttun, girt with the graceful tombs and cenotaphs of its Moslem conquerors, reposing amongst the rich foliage of the aloe, the sita phul, and almond trees.

* The ornament which in Hindoo architecture forms the apex of a dome or column.

Such is now the great temple of the Somnâth ; scarcely a vestige remaining of the wealth and importance which, under the veil of religious zeal, tempted the cupidity of its Moslem defacer.

Lieutenant Kittoe, a gentleman of much research, connected with the antiquarian interest of India, has given an abridgment of a very amusing tale, containing the adventures of the poet Sadi, at the Temple of Somnâth. The accomplished Persian lived two hundred years after the destroyer, Mahmud of Ghizni; and the original anecdote forms a portion of the celebrated Bostan. It commences,—

“ I saw an idol of ivory at Somnâth, jewelled like the idol Munat, in the days of superstition and ignorance,” &c. The story is illustrative of the state of the temple, and of manners, and may therefore be told with advantage. Sadi, wondering at the folly of live people paying their adoration to a material without sense or motion, ventures to express his sentiments to an attendant priest, with whom he has some acquaintance. The priest turns upon him in a rage, and excites a commotion, which endangers Sadi's life. Whereupon, he throws himself upon the mercy of the chief priest, stating that, although he had ventured to express a doubt, it was merely because he desired conviction. The priest tells him he is a man of sense and judgment, and shall be convinced that this idol is superior to all others, and deserving of adoration. If he will abide in worship all night, he promises him to see the idol raise its arm in the morning in adoration. Sadi consents, and gives an amusing account of the inconvenience he experienced from the pressure of the unwashed, unsavoury crowd. Just before sunrise, the image, at the sounding of a bell, raises its arm, to the delight of the worshipping thousands. Sadi assures the chief priest of his perfect conviction, flatters him, and obtains his intimacy, till, finding an opportunity, when the temple is empty, he gets behind the image, and there discovers a servitor concealed, with the rope in his hand, for raising the idol's arm. The man runs, and Sadi follows, trips him up, and throws him into a well ; then, to make quite sure, he drops heavy stones upon him, feeling that his own life would assuredly be sacrificed, if his discovery was known, and quaintly remarking, "Dead men tell no more tales." He then hurries away from Somnâth, and returns to Persia, through Hindostan, by a route of great danger and difficulty; "the troubles of which," he says, "he shall remember to his dying day."

Such is the story; and, as Lieutenant Kittoe remarks, it shows the temple to have been restored, as a place of Hindoo worship, after its destruction by Mahmoud, and to have remained as such, with something like its former renown, for two hundred years after that conquest. It is evident, from its present appearance, that it has since yielded to other spoilers, and has been even, at one period, converted into a musjid.

The original worship of the Temple of Somnâth, was, I conclude, Buddistical. The Lord of the Moon appears to have been succeeded by a deity, known under the title of Swayam-Nath,* or the Self-

* This religion was, of old, common to Arabia and India; and there is reason for believing, what the early Mohammedan authorities assert, that Lât, worshipped by the idolaters of Mecca, was a similar existent. On this, again, was grafted the worship of Mahadeo, or Siva. The following description, from native records, may afford some idea of the splendour which, in ancient times, surrounded the deity presiding in the temple of the Somnâth.

“ The idol formed of cut stone, five cubits in height ; of which three cubits were visible, and two were below the surface. The Hindus venerated the idol more than any other ; the attendants washed it daily, with water brought from the Ganges ; the revenue of ten thousand villages was assigned for the support of its temple ; two thousand dancing women, with three hundred musicians, were ready to perform before it ; many smaller images of gold and deity to the Swayam Nath of the Hindoos.—Vide History of Guzzerat, translated by Dr. Bird.

The Pundits say, that there is nothing in the vedas, puranas, and other Brahminical text-books, to illustrate the origin and history of the Somnâth Temple.

silver in the temple surrounded this, the greatest of the gods ; and three hundred barbers were in waiting to shave the devotees, who sought admittance to the holy place. Such was the popularity of this obscene worship, that the princes of Hindostan devoted their daughters to the service of the temple ; and, at the occurrence of an eclipse, sometimes as many as a thousand individuals came to perform their devotions."

To subdue Puttun, was the last great object of Mahmoud of Ghizni. The poor Hindus, when attacked by the Mohammedan invaders, seem to have made desperate resistance ; but the arrows of the Moslems dispersed them. Two days the siege continued ; the third, the banners of Islam floated triumphant from the walls ; and five thousand of the inhabitants were slain. Mahmoud, it is said, on entering the temple, observed a covered apartment, whose roof was supported by six pillars, set with jewels. Here stood the idol ; the latter was cloven in twain by the king's own hand; and from the body rolled gems, coins, ornaments, and treasure incalculable. The priests prayed and wept, but vain was the appeal; they were slain by the infuriated soldiery; and the king commanded that the fragments of the idol should be carried to Ghizni, and there cast before the great mosque, in honour of the triumph of Islam.*

Thus fell the splendid idol of Puttun; and such the intolerance which led to the wanton defacement of its beautiful temple. The solidity of its materials,† and the favourable climate of the east, have preserved some remnants of its architectural beauty;

* The destruction of the Temple of Somnâth occurred during the tenth and last expedition of Mahmud, A. D. 1022. Heg. 413.

† As some proof of this, I may mention that, until very lately, the roof of the Somnâth was used as a battery for several large pieces of ordnance, placed there by the Nuwaub, to protect the neighbourhood of his Harbour of Puttun from pirates.

but the jewelled columns, the golden idols, the dancing girls, and the voice of melody, are replaced by heaps of unsightly rubbish ; the chirp of the bat is heard from the sancetum, and the owl has found a nest amongst its richly sculptured cornices. Time, more destructive than even the sword of Mahmoud, has levelled it with all common things, and the great temple of the Self-Existent has become a sheltering place for cattle, a resting spot for the travelling goat-herd.

Leaning over the wall of the fort, which is built on the shore, and close to the temple, I was amused at seeing a tall Rajpoot leading a quiet-looking cow along the water's edge ; he was armed cap-à-pie, with sword, shield, and buckler ; and the contrast of his pastoral occupation, with his warlike equipment, struck me as curious. Oppression teaches the necessity for defence ; and that which owes its origin to an era of danger and defiance, commonly outlives the occasion, and becomes grafted on the habits of peaceful life.

Guzzerat was long inhabited by Rajpoots and coolies, two classes of people famed for discord. Independent chieftainship fomented division, and supported despotic injustice ; when the poor man, oppressed in the struggle for individual aggrandizement, found " his vineyard desolate, blasted before the dun, hot breath of war," he was fain to assert his rights, and himself become a warrior, to preserve his little property from the rude hand of the destroyer.

Some hours were delightfully passed in taking numerous drawings of the temple, and its remaining ornaments. And then came the necessity for refreshment, before proceeding on our journey of research in Puttun antiquities. The baskets produced, we asked our cicerone, the graceful Abdoola, to join us. This he declined, but showed many symptoms of curiosity, on the appearance of a bottle of Hodgson's ale. After a thousand protestations that it contained no alcohol, or aught else forbidden to a good Mohammedan, the Syud consented to make a trial of its virtues. Abdoola raised the tumbler to his lips, and, after two sips, with a long-drawn inspiration between each, fairly emptied it at a draught, making a sufficient number of wry faces, in conclusion, and charging his sons not to touch the obnoxious beverage. Of the sincerity of his facial distortions, we had a future opportunity of judging. Mohammedans fancy all wine, of whatever growth, must be Madeira; of which scandal asserts their inordinate fondness. Abdoola denied having any in his cellar, but confessed to the possession of brandy, which he used, he said, to steep his gun caps in.*

When the heat abated, Abdoola, curvetting along upon his handsome, and gaily caparisoned Katty mare, led us through the town, along a good road, skirting the shore. The ride was delightful. The fresh sea-breeze came with invigorating influence from one side, while, on the other, smiled a richly-cultivated country, studded with curious and beautiful temples; some having the massive pyramidal domes of Hindoo architecture; others, the light pilasters and graceful arches of Moslem art.

* To account for a Mahomedan Jemeedar's possession of gun caps, I must observe, that Abdoola had received, as a present, a very excellent English gun, of which he was not a little proud.

An hour's ride, brought us to a sweet, shady spot, canopied with the broad leaves of numerous sacred trees, between whose leafy coverts, glimpses might be caught of the cool waters. It was a retreat, a Hamadryad might have envied. The early Buddhists of Puttun had probably anticipated us in our admiration of this quiet and secluded spot. We found near it, two caves; one almost too small to admit the most attenuated ascetic. To the other, the descent is by three low steps, which lead to a dark apartment, containing a rudely-sculptured image of Devi. The first cave, we understood, led to a succession of small chambers, each descending lower than the other.

Its darkness was impenetrable; yet I felt considerable anxiety to fathom its mysteries.

A lad, bearing a small light, floating in a saucer of oil, with difficulty entered the cave; and Abdoola, with infinite compression of his fashionable attire, followed him, with a gallant desire of satisfying my curiosity by his personal observations. On his reëpearance, gasping and half suffocated, I anxiously enquired what he had seen. "Jehannum,"*—was the curt, monosyllabic answer; "A name we never mention—never to ears polite." On enquiry, I found the only idol of this dark and dank receptacle, was a circle of stone, resting on what seemed intended to personify a pair of human legs. Whether this circle had, originally, any reference to the worship of the Lord of the Moon, in ancient Puttun, would be difficult to determine.

* A Hindostannee word, which expresses, in three syllables, that which, in our English tongue, is conveyed by one, in speaking of the infernal kingdom.

Turning from the cave-temples, we came on a valuable relic,—from its position, evidently removed from its original resting place. This was a figure of Buddha, seated on a circular stone, and leaning against a low column. The face of the idol was mutilated, and the arms destroyed. The head was ornamented with flowing hair, descending in full curls on the shoulders. The gaddee, or stone, on which the figure was seated, was richly carved with beautiful female figures, sculptured in fine alto relievo. The whole, a block of evident antiquity, probably removed from the small cave-temple, to make way for the more modern idol of the polytheists.

From hence, we followed Abdoola, over many narrow and rugged paths, to a spot, regarded with peculiar reverence. Here, overshadowed by luxurious banian and peepul trees, a ghât descends to a broad and placid river, winding far away, amidst the varied tints of the rich foliage, which hang over its lovely waters. The banks, rich in grasses of the sunniest hues, were studded with fine cattle ; and the scene was as pastoral as the far-famed grove of Vrij.* On this favoured spot, the Sun God, Heri, is said to have gathered the last lotus-flower of earthly joys, and to have sprung all radiant to the courts of Indra. The true tale, I believe, is, that this river, which is called the Rin-Nakshee, was a favourite resort of Crishna, while reigning prince of Dwaka, who, hunting here with his brother, Vali, laid himself down, weary with sport, beneath the shade of a large tree, and, covering himself with a saffron-coloured cloth, fell asleep : his brother saw him, but, mistaking his colour for that of a deer, fixed an arrow in his bow, and shot him.

Brahmins here mark with the lotus-iron, as at Dwaka ; and pilgrims, from all parts of India, travel hither to worship the radiant deity, and recall bright visions of their god, as he sported on the fragrance-breathing shores of the Blue Yamuna.*

* The birth-place of Crishna.

The river abounds with fish, sacred to Vishnu. A lad, attending on the spot, brought flour and bread, to feed them; and large numbers immediately appeared round the ghât.

Abdoola, notwithstanding the sacred character of these waters, keeps a little boat moored amongst the trees, in which he recreates himself and family; and his little slave-boys pass the noontide hours, dancing, swimming, and frisking in the cool river.

Returning through the town of Puttun, I was surprised by the number of fine almond trees flourishing so well near the sea. In every court, a magnificent specimen shades the portals of the dwelling, affording impervious shelter to the inhabi-

* Another holy spot, named Prachee, is not far distant; it is sacred to Mahadeo, and situated on the river Siriswuttee, which joins the Rin-Nackshee, near Puttun.

bitants, who lounge or sleep about the doors.

The palace of his highness, the Nuwanb, is in the centre of the town; it is a fine mansion, three stories high, with a terraced roof. The windows, or rather air holes, are of fine stone fret-work, carved in varied and elegant designs. The outer walls of the palace are decorated with niches, filled with ornamental sculpture: one, which I remarked as very beautifully finished, represented a group of sunflowers, united by a finely-wrought-chain,—the ends depending.

The walls of the town are formed of black, square, uncemented stones, about nine feet in thickness; it has thirty-six round towers, and two gates. Puttun is now completely Mohammedanized, yet bears about it abundant evidence of its origin character, as the capital of an extensive Hindoo territory. Its walls and gates are rich in the remains of Hindoo architecture; and the magnificently-chiselled shrines of Hindooism form the bases of the finest musjids, now used by the followers of the prophet.

The successors of Mahmoud laboured strenuously to eradicate every trace of a religion and people they so fearfully detested, but in vain: the present architectural beauty of modern Puttun is but an inferior graft on its original magnificence; and the proud Moslem is content to prostrate himself before altars, once sacred to the mysterious rites of Maha-deo and Siva.

Having seen and admired all the wonders of Puttun, we took leave of the graceful and courteous Abdoola, with mutual expressions of regard and remembrance, and returned to Verawul.

We had scarcely retired, when an Arab horseman galloped up to our tents, with "Syud Abdoola Sahib's salaam, the ale had proved so extremely serviceable to his health, he should feel grateful for any we could spare."

Unfortunately, our canteen was en route; but, with all sorts of good wishes, we promised an early compliance with the Jemeedar's request.

CHAPTER II.

THE SACRED MOUNT OF GIRNAR, WITH THE ROCK OF THE ANCIENT INSCRIPTIONS.

Monastic Zitza ! from thy shady brow,
Thou small, but favoured spot of holy ground,
Where'er we gaze,—around, above, below,
What rainbow tints, what magic charms are found;
Rock, river, forest, mountain, all abound,
And bluest skies, that harmonize the whole.

CHILDE HAROLD.

ARRIVING at the city of Junagarh,*
about a week after leaving Puttun, the

* Junagarh, is a large Mohammedan town, about forty miles from Puttun, and situated at the foot of the Girnar Mount. It is the residence of his highness the Nuwaub, and capital of his territories.

cloud-clapt summit of Girnar towered above us, rich in the records of an ancient people, of fanes dedicated to the purest worship known in India, and of the "demonstrated relics of the classical period of our Indian literature."

In olden times, mounts seem to have been favourite spots for religious worship: the Jews, the Persians, and even the early Christians, selected them; and there is something just, as well as poetic, in the choice,—which, exalting man above the hum of worldly things, concentrated his thoughts, secured them from distracting influences, and fixed them upon the Deity, in whose more immediate presence he might seem to stand.

The Mount of Girnar is of granite formation, situated on an extensive plain, at an elevation of about two thousand five hundred feet above the level of the sea. The summit, a bare scarp rock, becomes richly wooded towards the base, blending with a deep ravine, clothed with forest-trees, and intersected by rivers, swollen by the mountain torrents. From either side of the Girnar, spurs strike out into a lower range of hills, their ridges fringed with the feathery beauty of the bamboo, and their sides clothed with various jungle-plants; from which shelter, huge blocks of granite jut out, in the most rugged and fantastic forms. On a small table-land, near the summit, are the walls of a fort, enclosing the group of Jain temples, which give to this spot, its odour of peculiar sanctity.

The day succeeding our arrival at Junagarh, our party commenced the ascent of the sacred mount. Leaving the city about an hour before sunset, we soon reached a portal entering on a wide and well-built causeway, flanked on one side by huge blocks of gray granite; on the other, by a broad and deep ravine, richly wooded with tamarind and mangoe trees. Immediately before us, rose the majestic peaks of the Girnar, its temples barely distinguishable, and the whole scene closed in by side hills, glowing with the brilliant rays of a departing sun.

About fifty yards from the entrance of the causeway, surrounded by huge blocks of the same material, stands a granite rock, bearing somewhat the form of a flattened cone, about twenty feet in height, and seventy in circumference. It is distinguished from those near it, by the surface being graven with numerous deep but small characters, divided by longitudinal lines. Towards the base of the eastern side, it is slightly defaced, the effect of blasting, the neighbouring rocks having been used to form the pavement of the causeway. Insignificant as this block of granite might appear, if considered simply as a feature in the bold scenery around, it nevertheless formed the great object of our pilgrimage, as the celebrated rock of the ancient inscriptions, and the great monument of Buddhism, in the Surashtra peninsula.

To us, its small, but mystic characters, were indued with absorbing interest ; at a distance of many hundred miles, we had read, and pondered on their wondrous history, and it was with no common feeling of satisfied curiosity, that we saw them before us, chiselled in the living rock, with their quaint, and Egyptian-looking forms.

To awaken any degree of sympathy with this interest, I must entreat the reader to pause with me on the causeway, while I endeavour to explain the history and objects of the graven rock.

The hill of Girnar is known as one of the five mounts sacred to the Jain sect, its dagobs, caves, and ancient temples, incline to the belief, of its owing its origin to the early ages of Buddhism, and confirmation of this opinion, seems lately to have been afforded, by the discovery of the history attached to the graven tablets of the Girnar rock.

The history of religious sectarianism in India proves, that the followers of Buddha were grievously persecuted by the Brahmins, and that the Hindoo princes inflicted on them every description of merciless torture, regarding them as infidels, and their religion as an unpardonable heresy.

About the year 546 B. C., arose a reformer, in the person of the virtuous ascetic Sakia, who endeavoured to found regulations and laws among the Buddists, which should exalt the character of their magistrates and pontiffs, and render them somewhat independent of oppression; in 319, B. C. a celebrated king called Asoka, reigned at Palibothra,* and became a convert to the tenets of Buddhism. This prince, who after his consecration was styled Piya-dasi, was inspired with the strongest zeal for proselytism, and in furtherance of his designs, allowed convocations to be held, missionaries to be entertained, and every method adopted which could tend to render general, those opinions which the king now considered to form the only true faith.

* Considered as the modern Patna.

Piyadasi appears also to have desired to gain over to his measures, not only his great ally, Antiochus, the Syrian, but also the Macedonian prince, Antigonos, and one of the Ptolemies of Egypt.* Still unsatisfied with these general means of grafting new opinions upon the prejudices of the people, and of introducing Buddhism by means of missionaries and commerce, into the empires of the east, the royal convert, caused to be disseminated, by means not liable to decay, the tenets he had himself so lately learned to venerate. On the rocks of Girnar, and of Dhauli in Cuttack, on the pillars, or láts, of Delhi and Allahabad, the king caused to be graven, edicts containing the leading maxims of Buddhism, and thus published them to the people, in the vernacular idiom, and in the most opposite parts of his great empire of India. The edicts appear to have been in substance duplicates, but bearing various dates subsequent to the consecration of Asoka.

* Ptolemy Philadelphus.

The great object of the king appears to have been general conversion; of his people first, and of all the nations with whom he had communication or alliance. A knowledge of the high moral tone, and metaphysical subtilities of Buddhism, leads to the conclusion, that Asoka must have been richly endowed by nature with a mind capable of appreciating a faith so far purer than the Brahminical, yet one he had doubtless been instructed to despise. When Alexander the Great arrived on the banks of the classic Indus, Buddhism was in its most flourishing condition in Western India; its pontiffs were protected, its tenets published by missionaries both abroad and at home, and the wealthy, and the great, interested in its support. It is difficult to learn, how its great enemies, the Brahmins, gradually undermined its influence, and regained their sway; but as years passed on, the power of Buddhism dwindled, its holy places were forsaken, the images of the Jains were set upon the ancient altars of "the supreme intelligence," (so the monotheistic Buddhists termed their deity) and the remnant of believers in this pure and moral creed, became again oppressed with external opposition, and torn by internal schism, until their existence became lost in the fluctuation of opinion, and their power superseded by the growing strength of the two great sects of Western India, the Jains, and the Vishnuvies.

Such is a brief sketch of the circumstances which led to the engraving of the Girnar rock, by the command of king Asoka; for bringing the history of which to light, and decyphering its ancient characters, the learned and literary community, is indebted to James Prinsep, Esq., of Calcutta, who has lately made the ancient character and language of Surashtra, the object of his most arduous labours.

The Girnar rock bears three inscriptions. The most ancient, which occupies the eastern side, are the edicts of King Asoka. These celebrated edicts are very perfect, and are divided by longitudinal lines. Of the other inscriptions, one occupies the western, the other, the northern face of the rock; the former, except where a large portion of the stone is broken away, are also perfect. The characters of these last, differ from those which contain the edicts of Asoka, and are of a more modern date. They refer to the original building of a bridge on the way to Girnar, commenced, as it appears, in the time of Chandra-Gupta, (Sandra-Cottus) the grandfather of Asoka, and repaired, and completed at various subsequent periods.

These inscriptions are all graven in the Sanskrit language, but the character has become obsolete; by recent researches, it has been ascertained, that such was the written Sanskrit in the time of king Asoka, but in the course of two thousand years, its character has undergone no fewer than nine distinct alterations and modifications, until known as the modern Devi-Nagari.

The edicts of Asoka, are fourteen in number, and include mention of the great king's allies, Ptolemy, Antigonus, and Antiochus. To trace the name of a Hindoo sovereign, united with that of a Greek prince of Syria, is sufficiently startling ; but it becomes even more curious, when we note the expansive benevolence of Asoka, seeking to apostolize Egypt, and to introduce the religion of Buddha to the land of the Ptolemies, transplanting it from the glowing land of India, to the fertile banks of the Nile.

These remarkable edicts, caused by the the royal convert to be graven on the rock by the way side, that all who passed up to the sacred mount, might be instructed in religious wisdom, contain the enforcement of the great Buddistical virtues,—honor to parents, charity to kindred, humanity to animals, temperance and sobriety in living, with commands to obliterate religious controversy, to provide a system of medical aid, suited to men and animals, to keep the tongue from evil speaking, and to support missionaries, who might spread abroad among the people these truths, and according to the words of the edict, "release them from the fetters of sin, and bring them unto the salvation which passeth understanding."

Such was the spirit of the great Dharma, or law, promulgated by Piyadasi to his loving subjects. The poorest and most unlearned amongst them could not plead ignorance of its precepts, for they were stored, not in the archives of temples, nor in the colleges of the Buddhists, neither in the tomes of learned pundits, but were graven on a rock by the way side, to bless the humblest pilgrim with their wisdom.

Twenty-one centuries have elapsed since these pure maxims of ethics first enriched the sacred mount, concealed by the mystifying changes of language and religion in the Surashtra, and the characters on the Girnar rock, remained long a source of wonder to the people, and a puzzle to the deepest researches into Hindoo classic lore.

It was reserved for the present era of antiquarian learning, to crown all past investigations, with the triumph of arranging an alphabet, by whose means the ancient characters might be rendered intelligible, and form the data so much desiderated to correct the wildness of Hindoo chronologists. The edicts of Piyadasi, so lately discovered in an obscure spot of Western India, now connect the legends of the east with the histories of the western world, and throw light upon the most interesting historical, religious, and philological discussions of modern times.

Generation after generation has passed away; the power of Buddhism has faded before the increasing strength of the heterodox Jains; the original Sanskrit, as the written language of Girnar, has been superseded by the modern Pali; the Egyptian and Greek dynasties are unknown to the present annals of Surashtra history ; yet, despite the great power of change, the rock of the sacred edicts, stands fresh as from the chisel of the graver. By the indefatigable zeal of a single individual, it has poured forth its hidden springs of wisdom ; and I doubt not, but that the same learning, which discovered a key to the mystery which baffled the genius of a Jones, a Wilford, and a Tod, will perfect the work, and throw a halo of classic interest around the rude block of the Girnar causeway, such as the most enthusiastic orientalist have not dared even to anticipate.*

To the Jain pilgrims of the sacred mount, the rock of edification is no longer a sealed page in their country's wisdom ; the words of the "heaven-beloved king" plead to them, as to their ancestors, in a strain of mercy and benevolence,

† I refer to James Prinsep, Esq., whose learned and very interesting disquisitions on the rock edicts of Girnar, appear in the 75th, and following numbers of the "Bengal Asiatic Society's Journal."

An Engraving by W. H. W. from a sketch by the artist.

ROCK AND ANCIENT INScriptions NEAR BROWN.

Engraved by W. H. W. from a sketch by the artist.

W. H. W. del.

which neither the Israelite or the Christian can condemn.*

The transcript and translation of these remarkable characters, open a wide field for enquiry and gratification to all who are interested in Indian classics. The most unlearned traveller, once acquainted with its history and objects, could not pass this simple rock, on his way to the Jain temples of Girnar, without laying up, if not a store for speculation, at least a deep, and heart-stirring moral.

Waving historical association, to me the old stone presented peculiar attractions; some of our party being engaged in taking the necessary and much required fac-similes, after the approved method of Monsieur Jaquet of Paris.

The extreme heat of the season, rendered it necessary to erect a gay parti-colored awning, over the summit of the rock; and small ladders were placed against its sides, for the convenience of transcribers. The people of Junagarh, attracted by the preparation, came in curious groups, to watch the progress of the work. With some pigment left on a previous occasion, the native workmen had daubed a resemblance to Huniman, on an opposite rock, and set up little flags, in honor of their favorite, the monkey God. I suspect to many, this little distorted image of red ochre, was an object of more real veneration than the black and time-stained rock of King Asoka's edicts.

* "Thus spake the Heaven-beloved King," is the usual exordium to the edicts of Piyadasi.

After satisfying the curiosity of a few enquirers, we continued to travel onwards upon the causeway, which is itself a very splendid work, carried into execution by a rich merchant of the Soonderjee family, a name well known in Guzzerat.

The way led through a luxuriant jungle of teemree, jambu,* corenda, wild fig, ficus religiosa, and mangoe trees. Bees seemed abundant; and after the rains, large quantities of fine honey are procured for consumption in the jungles of Junagarh. Numerous monkeys, for which Guzzerat is famous, were merrily frisking about the woods, skipping from tree to tree, and peeping slyly at us between the branches, as if triumphing in their bright and leafy homes.

* From the jambu is extracted a very fine plum-coloured dye, much used in the province; both the jambu and the Teemree bear a pleasant sub-acid fruit.

The steep and rugged ascent, soon compelled us to dismount, and quit our horses for a more safe means of travelling. This we found in little vehicles, called doleys, which consist of a small square seat, suspended by side ropes to a pair of short poles borne on the shoulders of four bearers. This appeared but a crazy and comfortless conveyance; but the steepness of the path, its extreme narrowness, the sharp turnings of the road, the huge blocks of granite lying across it, and the precipices on either side, readily convinced us, that an ascent by any other means, would have been impracticable.

Once past the lower range of hills, our bearers paused to rest at a small Dhurum Saulah, erected on a shoulder of the first ascent. Long as our way had seemed, the summit of Girnar still towered above us, a perpendicular scarp, appearing to oppose our further progress. The early pilgrims, must indeed have found it a toilsome thing to scale the rugged heights of the sacred mount; but in later times, religious zeal has provided a succession of steps, guarded by a low parapet wall, which, winding round the angles of the rock, permit a safe, and comparatively easy ascent:* with the assurance of these means being sufficient protection from any actual danger, the journey is very trying to the nerves, the dooly bearers being sorely pressed for room in which to turn their little crazy expedient, where, at the angles of the road, the parapet wall, scarce a foot in height, crowns steep precipices, which descend in fearful suddenness to the wooded depths of the ravine.

* The expence of forming these steps was enormous; for a third only of the whole distance, 12,000 rupees was expended on materials and labour. The distance traversed from the commencement of the ascent to the summit of Girnar, is two miles, five furlongs, and seventy-one yards.

The rich natives always adopt the use of a dooly ; and one often meets a set of bearers, groaning under the weight of a fat Banian, who sits cross-legged in wealthy indolence, while the poorer pilgrims trudge onwards, with only the assistance of a slight bamboo, and, not unfrequently, encumbered with the charge of an infant, while the emaciated mother toils after them, laden with the water gourd, or a few sticks. For the refreshment of these poor folks, charitable Gosaens daily place jars of water on convenient spots, as a work of considerable merit, appreciated by the temple deities.

The fleecy clouds, and heavy mists of evening, had enveloped the summits of Girnar as we entered the fort, and the night-dew descending heavily upon our garments, constrained us to take shelter in a verandah, commonly used by strangers, as a durrum saulah, there being no level spot on the mount, of sufficient extent to allow the pitching of tents.

Early on the following morning, the whole range of scene, above and below us, was enveloped in clouds. The valley we had passed the preceding evening, and thought so sunny and so bright, lay below us, like a sea of thick-ribbed ice, and beautiful were the effects of varied light, as the mists, whirled rapidly along by the morning breeze, and becoming more and more transparent, as the newly-risen sun shed his warm beams upon them, revealed, at intervals, the richly-wooded knolls of the surrounding hills, and the bluffs of cold gray granite, as the bright rays divided into masses the fleecy clouds, and the breeze rolled them rapidly past.

Beautiful as was the view of the natural features of Girnar, from the bastions, the interior of the fort possessed greater attractions; and I turned with eagerness to the magnificent temples grouped around, once the great fanes of the purest religion ever known in Western India, and now, the monumental records of the growth of a heterodox faith, and the incalculable wealth of Surashtra Banians.*

The fort contains seven temples, belonging to the Shrawuk Jains, who seem to have succeeded the Buddhists, in the possession of Girnar. The temples are in the care of Bhāts,† and only one priest or Goorjee, was at this time present. This man, whose manners savoured much of self-esteem, came, actuated perhaps more by curiosity than courtesy, to see us, and consented to our examination of the temples, if we would enter them without our shoes. Having agreed to this point of etiquette, the Goorjee proceeded to act as cicerone ; he wore full white linen raiment, and carried the usual brush and water vessel in his hand ; but his head was unshaven, neither did he wear the linen screen before his lips, which I had observed with the priests of the rival sect.

* The temples of Girnar were doubtless of Buddhist origin. The word Buddha, signifies universal holiness; and his disciples seem to have been untinged by idol worship, until the apotheosis of Crishna, about 1200 B. C.

† Bhāts, the bards, and great repositories of legendary lore.

The Jains are divided into the Shrawuks, and the Lunkas ; the Shrawuks worship the images of the twenty-four deified saints, called Trithacars ; the Lunkas abhor idols, and are more strict than the Shrawuks, in their laws against the destruction of animal life. Their Doondees, or priests, are the filthiest people imaginable, never either washing or changing their garments, until become rotten or unserviceable from continued use. It is remarkable, that these sects intermarry ; the wife, it is said, becoming speedily converted to the opinions of her husband.

The first temple we entered, and the principal resort of pilgrims and devotees, is dedicated to Neemnathjee, who ranks as the twenty-second of the Jain Trithacars. It is built in the usual style of Hindoo architecture, and occupies the centre of a large court, surrounded by closed galleries. These galleries contain a great number of white marble images, of Parṣwanath, the twenty-fourth Trithacar; they are about two feet high, finely polished, and ranged in niches on a slab, which runs along one side of the gallery. The other is richly carved, with open fretwork, which admits light and air, into the building. The Gaddee on which each image is seated, bears the recorded name of the Banian donor, with the date of its presentation; over the head of each, projects a hood of the cobra capel, the emblem of Parswanath's power.*

Little domes on the roofs of these gal-

* The Trithacars have each their wahun, or emblem, as Parswanath the cobra, Neemnath, a shunk or shell, Rikhubdeo, a Nandi, and so on.

leries, mark the position and number of the images, a dome being built over every niche.

The temple itself is built solely of granite, and contains four apartments; the centre one, has a large domed roof, richly and curiously painted, and surrounded by sixteen female figures, each supported by crouching caryatides, which form the cornice. The figures are attired in a cholah or boddice, and trowsers; the raiment colored, the necklaces, ear-rings, anklets, &c. richly gilt. The dome is supported by triple marble pillars; the floor below it, being formed of finely tessellated, brown and white marbles. The sanctum, contains a large black image of Neemnathjee, seated on a rich gaddee, and holding between his feet a small golden image; the forehead and breast of the saint, are ornamented with gold, and the head covered with bright silver bosses; below the gaddee, are some sculptures of charging elephants, wrought in black marble; and on the floor of the sanctum, the symbol of Vishnu, inlaid in yellow marble, surrounded by a mosaic border. Over the head of the image, is stretched a large square of rich purple satin, bordered with gold, and inscribed with golden letters in the Sanskrit character, an encomium, I understood, on the virtues of the saint; from the ceiling are suspended two large bells, and a lamp containing sacred oil; the doors are of black stone, richly carved, bound and bossed with brass.

Without the sanctum, but facing the idol, stands a painted elephant, with a howdah and trappings, manufactured at Surat, and placed here for Neemnath's especial service.

The third apartment of the temple, contains two octagonal blocks of marble, surmounted with square slabs of granite, divided into small compartments, each containing the carved resemblance of a miniature pair of human feet; steps of proportionate size, are cut on the sides of these blocks, and at their base, miniature baths.* These 1452 feet, are said to represent those of all the distinguished disciples of the Jain Trithacars. From the dome of the temple, on the exterior, rises a tall pole, gaily painted, and supporting a platform, hung with little brass bells; small tongues of iron being so placed, that the slightest breeze causes a merry jingle. This is called a ghunt, and adorns most of the temples within the fort.

* The forms of these blocks reminded me at once of the Jewish altars, drawings of which appear in Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible.

The temples all contain curious and exquisite sculpture. The columns are peculiarly beautiful, from the fineness of their proportions, which gives them a lightness and elegance of effect, I have never seen surpassed, even by the finest specimens of Grecian art. The same remark may be made of the figures, which prove a correct knowledge of the rules of art, and of the characteristic graces of the male and female figure, which awakens the highest admiration. Many of the designs are singularly ingenious, and as varied as they are curious. A circular compartment in the roof of one temple, appeared to be peculiarly remarkable, and well deserving notice. The centre represented a small head, wearing a cap or coronet, resembling those seen in the drawings of Henry the eighth, and from this radiated five distinct, and exquisitely formed figures in graceful attitudes, adorned with anklets, girdles, and flowing scarfs.

On many of the cornices, are exquisite sculptures of infinite variety; some representing processions of women, as if in attendance on a sacrificial ceremony; amongst the groups, cars drawn by bulls appear, and warriors on prancing steeds, surrounded by dancers and musicians.

One curious group, represents a Trithacar, seated in the usual position, with a pair of wings projecting from the head. At the side of this figure are musicians, with cymbals, horns, and other instruments.

Behind the sanctum of Neemnath, I discovered a cloister, closed with much secrecy ; being alone in the temple, I one day persuaded a Bhát to allow me to enter, by submitting to the usual etiquette of bare-foot enquiry.

I found this place filled with numerous images of Parswanath, some simply seated on Gaddees, others enshrined in miniature temples of fine white marble, and one or two large blocks, sculptured with small images of the whole twenty-four Trichatars.

Having casually heard of the existence of a cave, near, or in, the temple of Neemnath, I made enquiries on the subject, but the Bháts stoutly denied the alleged fact; however, having obtained a clue to its position, we despatched one of our people in search of it; succeeding in finding the place, he reported it to be a small excavation, leading from an enclosed gallery, and containing a very old image of Parswanath. The peculiar sanctity of the holy person, consisting, in the asserted fact of his "being always in a perspiration;" we could not hear any other reason for the reverence shown to this particular image, or for the evident dread of the Bhâts, lest it should be polluted by our presence.

Without the large temple of the Neem-nath, are the beautiful columns of an unroofed sacred building; and the eye travelling between them, rests upon one of the most remarkable features of this magnificent scene. From a perpendicular scarp which rises from the plain to the very summit of Girnar, juts a single block of granite, slightly inclining towards the precipice. As the Bhiru Jhup,* or "leap of death," this is the chosen spot, from which zealous devotees cast themselves, in the assured hope of the doctrine of transmigration, that they will enter their next state of being, in the enviable rank of powerful Rajahs.

* Bhiru, the son of time.

The ascent to this fatal point, is made from the back of the rock ; but its steepness renders it apparently inaccessible. The poor devotee, however, determined upon self-destruction, climbs from point to point of the slippery granite, grasping every irregularity to assist his progress, when, having gained the summit, he places a cocoa-nut (unstable support), with mantras,* upon the rock, and standing on it for an instant, with outstretched arms, leaps joyfully to his doom. But a few days before our arrival, a devotee had cast himself from this spot, into the ravine, where his body was found, nearly devoured by eagles and beasts of prey.

Fearful is the height and position of the Jhup, considered as a spot marked for self-sacrifice. But magnificent is its fine and clearly-distinguished outline, as it appears in bold relief against a calm blue sky, or is crowned with a lurid and glowing thunder-cloud, when the torrents rush down from the mountains, and the roar of falling waters mixes with the wild scream of the soaring eagles. As if to contrast with the rugged and defined outline of the "leap," two small and fairy-like temples crown the height immediately behind, surmounted with gaily-streaming flags. Below it is a well, celebrated for the purity of the water, called the Hasti Pat, or Elephant's Foot. This name is derived from an octagonal stone in the centre, bearing some faint resemblance to this substantial member. A few plantain trees are planted near it, and flourish well amidst the blocks of granite.

* Prayers.

To describe, in detail, the beauties of the great temples of Girnar, would be tedious, as they vary little. All contain colossal images of a saint, and the galleries are filled with marble idols, as I have described. When any of these images, or muruts, as they are called, become defaced, they are no longer worshipped.

Girnar has not escaped the devastating effects of Mohammedan intolerance. The solidity of the materials of which the old Buddhist temples are built, tended much to their preservation ; but the Bháts assured us, much injury had been committed by Allab-deen Khonee, or the Bloody, a Moslem prince of Delhi.

The whole of the Banian population of Surashtra are employing their wealth in repairing the temples ; but it says much for the decrease of native art, that sandstone is the material used, as the masons possess no tools of sufficient temper to cut the granite. From a reference to the books of the Chargé-d'affaires of the Shrawuk Banians, it appears, fifty rupees is the usual sum paid for a small image, and that two thousand five hundred rupees are expended yearly in ghee, sandal wood, flowers, &c. for the lights and offerings of the temple.

The well-chunamed walls of the verandah, which formed our abode, was scrawled over, in European taste, with native names and sketches, with here and there an attempt at caricature. As, in an idle hour, I looked over these evidences of unoccupied vanity, my eye caught some pencil scribbling in the English character, and, with considerable difficulty, I decyphered the following, which I thought too beautiful to be easily forgotten.

" This mountain, tow'ring midst the clouds on high,
Now crowned with many gods of vanities,
And lies, that neither know, nor hear, nor help,
Their ardent devotees, who prostrate fall,
And praises loud recite within their shrines,
Shall be a ' hill of holiness ' to him
Whose potent hand doth weigh it in the scale,
And less than nought its gravity esteem.
Its statues, hewn as the strange device
Of those, with darkened eye, and erring heart,
Who view the soul of man, not as the work,
But essence, of the Deity Supreme,
Shall doubtless be destroyed, or seen by all
As monuments of folly and of sin.
The saint devout its airy heights shall tread,
And upward cast his eyes to God the Lord,
Who framed and peopled the wide firmament,
And numbereth all its worlds, with their vast hosts.

*His honour he will celebrate, in lays Indited by the word of inspiration sure;
The valleys shall reëcho to his voice,
And from the western sea to Cambay's strand,
The song of Christ shall rise, who hath received
The heathen, as his heritage beloved,
And over them shall reign, while sun endures.
I hail that day: O, may it soon appear!
Haste, Lord, thy work, and shed abroad thy fear."

After passing two days in admiring the exquisite beauty of the Jain temples, I commenced, by means of a little dooly, the farther ascent of Girnar. From the fort to the summit of the mount, every half mile bears testimony to its sacred character. Inscriptions abound, both upon the rocks themselves, and on the sides, and doorways of the older temples. Little rude figures of Budda are chiselled upon the blocks of granite, at almost every angle; and small, upright stones, on which are sculptured a male and female figure, point the road to the several water springs, while the head of the sacred bull presides over the fount itself.

* These lines, I found afterwards, had been written by Dr. Wilson, and published in the Oriental Christian Spectator, for 1835.

The steps, we found, continued over the various irregularities of the hill ; and halts, to relieve the bearers, were made at the several beautiful temples, which crown the level spots. An agreeable appearance of freshness and verdure is given to the mount, by immense numbers of corinda bushes, whose subacid fruit is a welcome relief to the wayworn devotee. Two peaks form the summits of Girnar. On the first, we found a small temple erected over a pair of gigantic feet, in commemoration of an ascent having been made from hence, by one of the Trithacars.

About one hundred and fifty yards from this point, rises the Guru Dattara, the highest peak of the Girnar. A succession of blocks of granite, rising one above the other, are crowned by a small white temple, decorated with flags. A fearful depth intervenes between the first peak, and the Guru Dattara, which shoots up, all bare and rugged, into the glowing sky.

The magnificent view from this point at sunrise, well repays the fatigue of the ascent. The rich vale below, its brilliant hues, mellowed and mingled, is now hidden, and now revealed, by the misty shrouds suspended midway between the towering peak and the plain from which it rises. Bright and iris-coloured rays, gild the blocks of cold gray granite, and stream in rich luxuriance upon the glades below. Here, the early sun-light smiles upon the side of a wooded knoll, and there, rests on the sculptured angle of a time-worn temple, and then, escaping from the shade of an intercepting rock, pours its rich, full radiance upon all around, and reveals the surpassing beauty of this lovely scene.

Its influence on the mind is probably increased by the deep, still silence; removed so far above the hum of common life, scarce "a floating whisper o'er the hill " breaks in upon that contemplative mood, which mountain scenery usually engenders, and the imaginative mind may freely indulge its purest aspirations, while gazing on a design of nature, wrought in one of her sublimest moods.

A Gosaen inhabits the temple, at the summit of the Guru Dattara; but, notwithstanding the steps are continued, the ascent was considered too dangerous to be attempted by our party, who were more particularly disinclined, by a knowledge of the fact, that only five days before, the body of a pilgrim was seen, who had fallen in an attempt to gain the temple. A little grain was found, tied in a cloth, about his waist, the only store for his long journey; his body was sadly macerated, and too much decayed for removal. The Gosaen said, he was alone, when ascending the peak, and fell from near the summit. Notwithstanding the danger of the ascent, and its fatal results, pilgrims may be seen, crowding the way towards the Guru Dat-tara, from all parts of the Peninsula of India. A small tablet, let into the side of the temple, records that the steps were the work of a wealthy Banian, from the town of Boondée, in Rajpootana.

Below the first peak, is a valley, rich in wild mangoe-trees. Amongst their leafy coverts, rises a temple sacred to Huniman; and the attendant Gosaen feeds flocks of monkeys, who, morning and evening, with all the appetite of mountaineers, literally cover the dome of the temple. Charity, however, is not confined to the monkey tribe of Girnar; near the temple of Neemnath, is a Sadowut,* or store, from which pilgrims receive a gratuity of half a pound of parched grain each. A Surashtra Banian subscribes three hundred rupees annually to this benevolent object. Many of the poor devotees, who visit Girnar, depend upon this, as their only sustenance, combined with wild figs, and a berry, of pungent quality, which grows on the wild peepul tree. The natives sometimes complain of this berry producing headache; and the corinda is usually eaten with it, as a corrective.

* The word Sadowut, literally means, universal charity.

The Girnar is the resort of numerous ascetics, who, resigning the world, pass years in its still solitudes. Hearing, in one of my walks, the shrill sound of a Shunk,* I looked long on the scene around me, ere I could observe the player. At length, my eye caught a naked ascetic, perched upon a projecting rock, immediately in front of a small cave, hewn in the granite scarp. His name, he told me, was Ramdasjee: he had lately travelled alone, to Girnar, from Juggernath, in Orissa; he intended to remain on the sacred mount during the monsoon, and should then travel onwards, he knew not where, but "wherever it pleased God." I enquired whether he had no personal wishes connected with the matter, and he said, none; his wishes were, to act in accordance with the commands of God. This poor creature, offered a very enviable instance of resignation and contentment. A few roots, piled in a corner of the cave, sufficed for his provision; a lotah, for water, and a little firewood, gathered in the jungle, comprised his property; and when he, at any time, received trifling alms, he himself contributed to the Sadowut of the fort.

* Shunk is a shell, which, being bored, produces a wild note, resembling that of a horn. Always used by Gosaens.

Another ascetic resides near the Bhiru Jhup, with a brother hermit, lately arrived from Dwakanath. The forehead of this man is marked with the trisool of Siva, in the sacred chalk of Bate. His long black hair is plaited curiously with Tulsi beads, and his arms bear marks of the sacred lotus, bestowed by Surashtra brahmins. All this religious array causes him to be regarded as an individual of especial sanctity, and having acquired a little sum by begging, he had laid his property out in flour, and established a minor sadowut for the benefit of his poorer brethren. This man is a Gooroo,* or teacher of his sect, and during my visit to him, a Chelah came to make his offerings. Setting a few grains of rice upon the threshold of the temple, he blew a large shunk, made pooja to his Gooroo, and departed with a blessing.

Returning one evening, at a late hour, from the smaller temples on the mount, I encountered a young Gosaen, setting out for mount Aboo.† His body was smeared with ashes, his hair matted with clay, a linen rag girt about his waist, and over it a thick black rope, from which depended a brass bell, to a considerable length; he carried, as the only provision for his arduous journey, a gourd of water, and a little bang. Imagining that the object of the suspended bell, must be to scare wild animals from his path, while passing through dense jungles, he corrected me by saying, he cared for neither man nor beast; should it be his fate to meet the latter, the goddess Mátá, who watched over him, would either conceal him, or metamorphose him into a similar beast to that he encountered, which would secure him from injury. This poor enthusiast had already travelled from the Deckan, and was about to wander through dense jungles, and trackless wastes, to visit the sacred mount.

* The Gosaens are divided into two great classes, the Gooroos, or teachers, and their Chelaha, or disciples.

† Sacred to the Jains, and situated near Deesa.

The miseries this class of devotees undergo, is often terrible. Exposed to cold, to miasma, to the attacks of beasts of prey, to disease, in all the forms common to a tropic clime, friendless and alone, many doubtless die, in their search for religious fame. That all are hypocrites is improbable; many, on the contrary, perhaps, are warm enthusiasts, and the strength of their superstition, united with a desire for the distinction, which is originated by a reputation for unusual sanctity, may shield their minds from the apprehension of danger, and afford a sufficient motive for the endurance of every hardship.

In addition to these religious classes, the Junagarh hills afford protection to a wild tribe of Kolies, and to a description of outlaws, called Bharwatteeahs;* in former times, these men were powerful and numerous, much feared by the peasantry, upon whose villages they made forays for the purposes of plunder. It is said, that some years since, a chief of this tribe became enamoured of the daughter of a Nuwanb of Junagarh, and on her being doomed to perform Suttee, on her husband's death, rescued her from the flames, and carried her in triumph to the fastnesses of the sacred mount. A few of these robbers are now occasionally encountered; and at night, when the clouds gather round the hills, the gleam of a little fire on the mountain-side, may tell of their where-about.

* Literally, from Bhar-out-wat; a way.

The people of the neighbourhood, with all the superstition common to those who dwell surrounded by mountain-fastnesses, state, that the unfrequented passes of the hills are inhabited by cannibals, whom, curiously enough, they entitle Ogres. I could not discover, how the belief, or the word, had originated.

Caves of natural formation, abound on the Girnar, which would suggest its fitness as a place of refuge and protection for the lawless tribes of a country so long oppressed by divided rule, and imperfect government, as the province of Guzzerat. Some excavations are attached also to the temples, and considered peculiarly sacred. A cave at a little distance from the fort, contains a female figure, clad in gay, parti-coloured marble raiment, who represents the intended wife of the great saint Neem-nathjee. The story goes, that the saint, greatly desiring the society of a helpmate, fixed his choice upon the daughter of a Hindoo Rajah of Junagarh, distinguished for her wisdom and beauty. Being bidden to the wedding, he found crowds of relatives assembled to honour the occasion, and hecatombs of bulls and sheep provided for feasting and sacrifice. Enquiring whether these preparations were considered necessary, and being assured that they were so, the prejudices of the holy Jain were aroused, and his benevolencesorely wounded; the struggle was great, but at length, he stated his determination to resign the princess, rather than incur the loss of so many lives, and so much useless expenditure.

The betrothed of Neemnath, is the inmate of but a poor harem, while her promised husband sits in state within the neighbouring temple; the cave is small, and its mouth so closed up by large stones, that an entrance can only be effected upon the hands and knees.

Large numbers of Banians, pilgrims, devotees, and travellers, daily ascend the sacred mount; but in February, a religious assembly, or Jattrah, is held, when thousands of people attend, and put the Sadowut to heavy charges.

We passed a week very agreeably upon Girnar, enjoying the pure, cool air, and taking drawings of the various objects of particular interest. Supplies are brought daily, by means of bigarries from Junagarh, the prejudices of the Jains being so powerful, as to induce them to object even to the milking a goat upon the sacred hill.

Girnar, is perhaps the most interesting and beautiful spot in Western India; Aboo and Palitana, are both, comparatively speaking, very modern, and advancing no claim to a Buddhist origin. The sacred mount is almost equally interesting, whether considered with reference to its magnificent remains of art, and its historical claims, or to the great beauty of its wild scenery, and the reckless tribes who seek its shelter. Outlaws and religionists are the inhabitants of Girnar; those, who like the Jains, practise a system of such extensive benevolence, that it includes even all tribes of animated nature, from the elephant to the ant; and such, whose hand is against every man, and who, defying their country's laws, exist only by the merciless pillage of their fellow men.

The scenery of the sacred mount is unequalled, even by the celebrated Ghauts of the Deckan. To the painter, and the poet, it must ever prove a source of inspiration; to the antiquarian and philosopher, a scene for speculation; and to the Christian visitor, a cause of deep regret, that so much which is beautiful both in nature and art, should be desecrated to the purposes of a false and misguiding faith. It is impossible to leave the temples, filled with huge idols of this pagan worship, and standing upon one of the peaks of the sacred mount, allow the eye to fall upon the magnificent scene around, without a feeling of something like wonder arising, that men who first scaled this mighty eminence, and trod its pathless solitudes, should have been the builders of "Idol dwellings;" while every tree, and rock, and cloud in nature's realms, might, in this wild spot, have inspired a purer worship, and taught, that the prayers of man would be most suitably poured forth, amidst the glories of an unwall'd temple,

———"There to seek
The spirit, in whose honour shrines are weak
Upreared of human hands."

A Girnar Dooly.

CHAPTER III.

COURT OF HIS HIGHNESS THE NUWAUB.

——“Dwarfs, and blacks, and such like things that gain
Their bread as ministers and favourites — mingled there
As plentiful as in a court, or fair.

BYRON.

DURING our residence at Junagarh, we occupied a Serai, appropriated by his Highness the Nuwaub, for the reception of strangers. The principal bungalow is large, and commands an extensive view. The centre apartment is built in the native taste, without windows, whose necessity is replaced by wooden folding doors, opening upon small stone verandahs. This plan is peculiarly inconvenient, as the inhabitant is compelled to remain exposed to either rain, cold, or hot wind, or exclude both light and air from the apartment. Fortunately, the sleeping-rooms, in addition to low clumsy doors, possess small square windows with iron gratings, which admit a sufficient circulation of both these great necessities of life. Curious native paintings cover the walls of the apartments; and to judge by the profuse display of jewelled Rajahs by the native artist, princes must have been at a discount in the town of Junagarh. The court-yard, and verandahs of the Serai, we found fully occupied by travellers, Arab guards, and horsemen. The confusion commonly inseparable from a native crowd, increased by strings of frolicsome horses, picketted below the windows. These overfed animals, indulging fully in the dolce far niente, were in the acting capacity of mohsuls, or fines; during the imposition of a mohsul, his highness the Nuwaub is constrained to pay whatever sum per diem may be deemed sufficient, to urge his conformance with the wishes of our government.

The windows of the serai, look on a large garden, much resorted to by the towns-people, and the whole country appears like a rich forest, being thickly planted with fine mangoe trees, which, during our stay, were laden with their luxuriant fruit.*

Junagarh is a Mohammedan town, containing about sixteen thousand inhabitants; the streets are narrow, and dirty, and the houses ill-built. It forms the capital of the territories of a Mohammedan independent prince, who oppresses his subjects, and drains the resources of a fine country, to support bands of Natchwomen, musicians, and mummers of every variety. The Nuwaub only quits his couch at sunset, and passes the night in the most degrading dissipation. His Highness has only four wives, which is the allowed complement of Mohammedan connubiality, but a seraglio of about fifty ladies.

* May, is the mangoe season.

The character of a prince, gives its tone to the court, and the ministers pander to their master's vices ; in addition, the Nuwaub entertains a large number of Chelahs, or favourite attendants, all worthless and dissipated men. A party of these people, attired in the first style of Mohammedan dandyism, made their salaams to us the day after our arrival, and offered all sorts of attention and service, conveying also the request of his highness, that we would attend his Durbar the same evening, when I should be afforded the much desired gratification of an introduction to the harem.

The situation of Junagarh, renders it very little visited by strangers ; the native society, therefore, retains its most peculiar habits, unmodified by foreign intercourse ; I consequently considered myself fortunate, in the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the manners of its inhabitants in private life.

About nine in the evening, a party of the Nuwaub's attendants, torch bearers and others, accompanied us to the palace, which is situated in the centre of the town. After passing the Arabs, guarding the entrance, we were introduced to a verandah on the ground floor, where sat his Highness the Nuwaub, surrounded by crowds of Mohammedan courtiers, torch bearers, and chob-dars, the last, loudly rehearsing the qualities and dignity of the Prince.

The Nuwaub, a short stout man of about forty years of age, with a peculiarly fair complexion, slightly marked with small-pox, was simply attired in a fine white muslin turban and ankrika.

His heir, the young Prince Ahmed Shah Bawamere, a fine intelligent looking boy of twelve years old, sat on a cushion at his father's feet; and with his sword smartly sheathed in green velvet, his crimson and gold turban, and a military swagger, which his attendants had laboured to produce, he really appeared a miniature Prince of considerable promise. The Nuwaub placed me on his right hand; but the heat, the glare, and the din of Natchwomen and attendants, was altogether so overpowering, that I could with difficulty understand the dignity of my position.

A Natchwoman of considerable skill, but most particularly hideous, was, with a voice "which clove through all the din," screaming out some verses of a Persian song, in most discordant, and ear-piercing tones. However; as the perfection of good natching consists, in the perfect unity preserved between the feet and hands of the dancer, and the time of her accompaniment, and as it was in this case admirable, the danseuse gained proportionate applause.

After an hour passed amidst the stunning diversions of his Highness' Durbar, I requested permission to enter the harem.

Emerging from the verandah into the open court-yard, a slave conducted me up a flight of steps, into a room, fitted up to resemble a tent, and from thence into the apartments appropriated to the harem. The first, was a spacious hall, surrounded with lights, but otherwise unfurnished; and from this, I was ushered upon a spacious terrace prepared for my reception. The floor was covered with fine scarlet cloth, and the low parapet wall hung with Persian carpets. Chairs were ranged along the centre, and slaves bearing torches, stood upon the edge of the carpet. The wives of his Highness advanced to meet me, magnificently dressed, and blazing with innumerable jewels. Seating me upon the centre chair, they drew the others round, and began to chat on various subjects, with great good nature, and much courteousness of manner. The principal wife, the Rahit Bucktè, was good-looking, and about four-and-twenty years of age; her manner was lively, her conversation unusually intelligent, and her round fat face irradiated with good humour. The second lady, the Dosie Beebee, had the airs of a coquettish and spoilt beauty, her dark languishing eyes rendered still more attractive by a very judicious application of the radiance-giving Soormay,* and her henna tinted, and delicate little feet, appearing to sustain with difficulty, the weight of her pearl-embroidered slippers. The Ameer Bucktè was a staid person, richly dressed, but without any personal attractions; and the Beebee Bhoe, was absolutely frightful.

The ladies were attired in a similar costume, of Kincaub trowsers, tight at the ancle; a full, richly embroidered satin petticoat, with a little cholah or boddice, and a saree of coloured gauze, embroidered with gold flowers. Their glossy hair, simply braided across the forehead, was adorned with strings of fine pearl: about a dozen costly necklaces hung over the cholah's of each, and the ear-rings, toe-rings, nose-rings, bracelets, and anklets, were innumerable.

* Antimony.

The Beebees had not, on any previous occasion, met a European lady, and they perplexed me with questions upon our manners and habits of passing time. They expressed particular interest about our fancy works, of which Mohammedan ladies are great admirers. The Rahit Bucktè desired her slave girls to bring some cholahs of her own embroidering, which displayed great ingenuity, neatness and taste. After chatting for some time, I suggested the necessity of a return to my party, who I concluded were weary of the Nuwaub's method of shewing them attention. On this hint, pân suparree appeared, upon superbly chased silver trays, covered with crimson and purple velvet napkins, embroidered with gold, and edged with a deep gold fringe.

The usual quantity of dry suparree nut, pân leaves, and spice, having been deposited on my lap, and my luckless apparel deluged with sandal oil and rose water, each of the ladies threw a wreath of Mogree flowers on my neck, and pressed me to visit them on the following day, proposing to accompany me to the Nuwaub's favorite garden, at the foot of the Girnar.

Anxious of course to cultivate the acquaintance of my gentle friends, I readily acquiesced, and descending to join my party in Durbar, we all returned, gratified, and fatigued, to the Serai.

The following morning at eleven, Sheik Mahmoud, the favorite Chelah of his Highness, summoned me to the harem, and was accompanied by an attendant, laden with fine mangoes, as an offering from the Nuwaub. On entering the palace, I did not as before visit the public reception rooms, but was received by the Rahit Buckté at the door of her own apartments. Her attire was little less splendid than that worn in the evening, for the ladies of the east, only happy in being well attired, have not any nice distinctions between the fitness of particular toilettes ; the ease, and simple beauty of a morning deshabille, which distinguishes our English taste, is unappreciated ; and a mid-day sun, whose beams pierce the jalousies of an eastern harem, blazes on glittering jewels, which with us, are considered fit only for the glare of festal lamps.

Surrounded by slave girls, all chatting merrily together, and some with their infants in their arms, we proceeded through a suit of several apartments to the Beebee's sitting room. There was an air of privacy and quietness, about this little Mohammedan boudoir, particularly inviting ; and while its arrangement promised an unusual degree of comfort, a free circulation of air was insured by its height. Numerous windows of wrought stone work which surrounded it, afforded the fair inmate a charming view of the sacred mount, and the fine minarets of the neighbouring musjids, towering above the majestic trees which skirt the town.

Seated next the Rahit Buckté, I had full opportunity for admiring the taste with which her apartment was adorned. The floor was covered with crimson cloth, over which was tightly strained linen of spotless purity; and the ceiling concealed by a fine white cloth, embroidered with gold stars, the produce of the celebrated looms of Ahmedabad. A rich border wrought in gold represented a cornice, to the edge of which was attached a flounce of crimson and green silk. From the corners depended green glass lamps; and on one side of the floor, rested a pile of cushions, covered with a Palampore, or coverlid, of Tyrian purple, brodered and fringed with gold. The colours, though so varied, were harmonious, and the combined effect was one of richness, rather than gaudy display. The walls of the apartment, beautifully whitened, were decorated with Chinese paintings, and looking-glasses in gilt frames, while the spaces were occupied with little gold and silver Golaubdanis,* and enamelled lotahs, suspended in bead nets.

As the Beebee's Mehtah or steward was present, a fine gray-bearded intelligent looking man, I ventured to enquire what were her pecuniary resources, as I felt a little anxious on the matter of Mohammedan husbands' generosity, and the weighty affair of pin money.

The Rahit Buckté most unreservedly explained, that on her marriage, the Nuwaub had bestowed on her a gras or estate, consisting of eight villages, which she farms on her own account. The chief produce consisted of mangoes, but the value of the villages varied; the whole seemed to average, about three hundred rupees, or thirty pounds, a month.

The Rahit Buckté proved herself during our conversation, to be a good woman of business, quite au fait on the subject of grain, ploughs, mangoe trees, et cetera, from which her revenue is derived; large ledgers, written in the Guzzeratee character, were produced, and particular pages readily referred to, in explanation of the subject. Her estate, the Beebee told me, was situated between Junagarh and the sea, where the country, from its natural fertility, was called the Neil Nagir, or land of the blue waters. The Rahit Buckté is considered a miracle of learning by the inhabitants of the harem; she reads and writes Persian, Guzzeratee, and Hindostanee, which she acquired from her father's priest or peer, when a little girl. The Nuwaub had married her as a widow, which is a very unusual circumstance in Mohammedan families.

* Rose-water sprinklers.

Fully aware of the strict system of seclusion which forms the etiquette of the harem, I was surprised to find her Melitah admitted to her presence; but she said, with the Nuwaub's family, it was usual to receive personal attendants of either sex ; but that the servitors of one Beebee, were excluded from the apartments of the rest, if of the forbidden sex.

The Beebee chattered a great deal, and made many enquiries into our customs of marriage, baptism, and dress. Her great curiosity, however, seemed to be awakened on the peculiarity of our owning the rule of a female sovereign ; and she desired to know whether our queen's power was great ; whether she sat supreme upon the gaddee, or throne of England ; whether she rode on horseback, as I assured her was customary amongst English women ; and whether her Majesty showed herself in open durbar amongst the men. She seemed a little incredulous when I told her the power of our queen far exceeded that of Alia Bhye, and that she was more learned, more beautiful, and more wise than the celebrated Noor Jehan. The Rahit Buckté then enquired what jewels our great Ranee wore. And when I described the countless diamonds which adorn the royal crown and stomacher, the Beebee, the slave girls, and the grey-bearded Metah, all, with one impulse, lifted up their hands, exclaiming "Allah Kureem! rast ust?" (God is merciful! but can this be?) The Beebee's surprise subsiding, she insisted upon writing the queen's name in the fly-leaf of her Koran; but the Guzzeratee language not possessing the necessary V, a W became the acting capital, and our royal lady's name most grievously transformed.

The Rahit Buckté accompanied me to the apartments of the languid, but pretty, Dossie Beebee. It is well arranged that the wives of the Nuwaub have all separate apartments; which prevents domestic bickering, and the exhibition of many of those little arts, practised by ladies, whose leisure affords them abundant time to become proficient in the science of ingeniously tormenting. Here the fair rivals never meet, or even hear of each other, unless from the prattling of slaves. I asked the Rahit Buckté, on our way to the Dosie Beebee's apartments, whether she liked, or was intimate with, any of the other ladies; but she said, "No; they were too idle and illiterate to be agreeable friends."

On our entrance, we found the beauty seated upon a silver swing, in the centre of her apartment, reclining on a pile of cushions, and smoking a rich silver hookah. The swing was suspended by silver chains to the ceiling, and an old slave, squatted on the floor, kept it in gentle, but perpetual motion. The Beebee's attire, was composed of a petticoat of fine Dacca muslin, embroidered with gold flowers; a crimson gauze saree shaded her soft cheeks; and a row of large pearl was entwined with the knot of glossy, black hair, gathered low, in the Greek style. From this, a double line of smaller pearls fell over the parting of the front hair, and supported a dazzling jewel, called a Tika,

Tika—true size.

formed with large diamonds and uncut pearls. The Nutt, or nose jewel, was composed of gems of the finest water, to match the Tika, and beautifully set in fine Venetian gold. A string of pearls was attached to this ponderous ornament, which, crossing the left cheek, hooked into the hair by means of a small golden hook above the ear, and relieved the wearer from its unpleasant weight. When this jewel is withdrawn, a small peg of black wood is placed in the aperture of the nose, to prevent its closing.

Nose Jewel—true size.

A very becoming ornament, worn by the Dosie Beebee, on her pretty hands, is a bracelet of diamonds, rubies, and emeralds; to which a double chain suspends a large star, which rests upon the back of the hand: to this is attached chains, which support elegant and prettily designed rings, worn upon the first, third, and little fingers, leaving the second unadorned. A similar ornament is worn upon the feet; each is valued at seven hundred rupees.

Hand Jewel.

The mother of Ahmed Shah Bawamere was present. She was engaged in tenderly nursing a pretty baby, about four months old, its little face dimpling with smiles, as if excited by the embryo vanity of being gaily decked with an azure velvet cap, embroidered with gems.

This lady, whose manners are particularly soft and attractive, is not the wife of the Nuwaub, but, as the mother of his acknowledged heir, meets with great respect and consideration.

The Beebees are unblessed with offspring; and a ladye love of the fickle Nuwaub's, endeavours to enlist his feelings in favour of a child, whom she desires should succeed to the Gaddee, to the prejudice of Bawamere. The court is thus torn by intrigues, in which the priesthood take an active part; fortunately, the Beebees espouse the cause of Ahmed Shah, and his interest is strengthened by a betrothment having taken place between him and a pretty little maiden, the favourite niece of the Dosie Beebee.

An incident, peculiarly calculated to interest an imaginative mind, occurred on this visit. The hour of noontide prayer was approaching, but all were yet engaged in their secular affairs. The Rahit Buckté was eating pân leaves, a never-failing resource to a native lady; the Dosie Beebee was chatting with me on all sorts of mirthful matters; the little Bawamere, seated at his mother's feet, was cultivating the incessant chucklings of his baby brother; half the slave girls had lain down, oppressed with the noontide heat, and the rest were listening to the light tinklings of a sitarr, when the call of the Mowuzzin resounded from a neighbouring minaret. A momentary hush succeeded; all rose, and, standing with hands meekly folded over their bosoms, a chorus of soft voices responded throughout the harem, "Allah il Ukbar,"—God is merciful.*

Sheik Mahmoud having informed us of the readiness of the escort to accompany us to our fête champêtre in the royal garden, we descended to the court-yard; the Rahit Bucktè, the Dosie Beebee, and Dada Bhoë, all scuffling along, as rapidly as the prospect of an agreeable visit could induce them to do, despite the inconvenience of toe-rings, anklets, and high-heeled slippers.

* The Mohammedans have five forms of prayer used during the twenty-four hours. "Allah il Ukbar," are the words proper to be used at noon, and are repeated four times.

Awaiting us, was a Rutt, and a gaily-painted Palankeen. Dada Bhoe, with her infant, occupied the palkee; and the Beebees, with Bhawamere, took possession of the Rutt, bestowing themselves upon piles of cushions. The Rutt is a small description of cart, without springs, commonly used by native women in travelling. The Beebee's, however, was an unusually splendid equipage. Its covering was of crimson cloth, embroidered in white silk. The bullocks, pure white, and of the gigantic Guzzerat breed, were in the highest order; and the already enormous horns of each, lengthened by silver tips, from which depended bunches of silver bells. Silver peacocks surmounted their broad foreheads, and their bridles were bossed with plates of the same metal; each leg was surrounded by a bangle of silver bells, and large sheets of crimson satin, embroidered with gold, covered them from the shoulders to the tail, and descended nearly to the ground.

All this splendour was admirable to behold ; but I did not envy the curtained occupants of the Rutt, as I saw its springless frame jolted over the huge stones lying across the road, whilst I reclined commodiously in my little travelling palankeen, borne rapidly along by the hummalls or bhoies of the Nuwaub.

Arab guards, horsemen, chob-dars, and musicians, formed our escort ; and glad, indeed, was I, when etiquette forbade the advance of these people farther than the entrance of the garden. The Rutt and palankeen entered, and were received by the chief eunuch, a handsome African, richly dressed, who is said to enjoy, to an eminent degree, the favour of his prince.

Beautifully situated, the garden is laid out, with fine mangoe and guava trees, vines, and pomegranates; the sweet mogree uniting with roses and the fragrant chumpa, to give sweetness to the air. Streams of water, flowing through the garden, afford to the eye a sense of delightful coolness, and, by constant irrigation, preserve in perpetual freshness the rare plants of the parterre.

Beneath a widely-spreading mangoe tree, laden with its golden-looking fruit, was spread a crimson cloth, on which were placed baskets of the finest fruits. Pomegranates, with their rough and ruddy skin, guavas of a pale and tender green, bursting from excess of ripeness, plantains, in large and heavy bunches, water melons, and the dark and glossy jambu, surmounted by wreaths of the pure white mogree, linked with the jonquil-coloured chumpa, and the gaudy blossom of the red pomegranate. Interspersed with these choicely-laden baskets, were jewelled hookahs, Kincaub cushions, silver ewers, and drinking cups.

The Beebees, enchanted with the freedom they enjoyed, amused themselves with wreathing blossoms, which they threw on my neck, and twined in their own dark and glossy hair. Wearying of this simple pastime, they chatted playfully together, adorned me with their jewels, and then laughed heartily at my encumbered looks; listened to the songs of a slave, accompanying herself on the vina, and then inhaled the smoke of richly-adorned hookahs, whose delicately-scented goracco was tempered by the finest rose water. An oriental Boccaccio would have been inspired, by the luxurious beauty of the scene.

On returning to the Serai, I found the Nuwaub's bird-catcher in waiting, to make his salaam. His Highness patronises all artistes of this description, and delights in the exhibition of their skill. Fighting rams, buffaloes, and even exasperated birds, form the usual amusement of this dissipated prince, before the closing in of evening, introduces his Taifahs,* musicians, and players.

The bird-catcher brought a cage full of fighting partridges, and a little paroquet of very finished education. As we desired to see what really were the accomplishments of the little bird, and whether the feathered tribes of Junagarh were addicted to gambling, and played dominos and piquet as well as those of Germany, I begged the exhibitor to afford us a proof of his pupils' skill.

Placing the paroquet upon the cross perch of a small stand, the bird catcher offered him a rod, with a wick attached to either end. This the bird grasped in the centre, with his beak, and suffered the wicks to be lighted, closing his eyes during the process, to avoid the glare. Holding the rod firmly, he began to turn his head slowly from side to side, as if to ascertain the correctness of the balance. At length quickening the motion, he twirled the rod so rapidly, that its form became lost to the eye, and nothing was distinguishable, but a circle of revolving light playing round the head of the bird. It was cleverly done, but the man assured me that a month's practice was sufficient to perfect any parrot of moderate capacity.

* Taifah, a band; commonly applied to Natch-women, and their attendants.

I had never before seen so mischievous a little creature, as a paroquet, deserving to be classed with either the educated, or the industrious working classes; their gay plumage, their clamorous voices, and the gay sunny life, these little plunderers lead, among the richest fruit trees of the country, mark them as the most luxurious idlers of the feathered tribe.

His Highness the Nuwaub expressed his intention of returning our visit in state; and an evening being fixed on for the occasion, the large room of the Serai was prepared for his reception, by removing from it every article of our marching furniture but the chairs, which were arranged in a single line, opposite the grand entrance. At nine o'clock, the firing of guns, and beating of tom-toms, the squeaking of trumpets, and chattering of people, assured us His Highness had quitted the palace; in a few minutes, half a dozen breathless Chelahs announced that the arrival of the Nuwaub might be momentarily expected, and the room was instantly filled, by a general rush of ministers, torch-bearers, courtiers, and chob-dars.

State Palanquin.

His Highness arrived in his state palan-keen, surrounded by horsemen, and followed by half the population of Junagarh. A rich golden chair was placed in the centre of our line of a humbler material, and amid the roars of chob-dars within, and the din of tom-toms without, the Nuwaub took his seat, with great ceremony. I had the honor to find myself between His Highness and the brother of the Dosie Beebee, a wild young chief of Natar.* The ministers, Chelahs, and attendants, ranged themselves in double sitting files along the room, leaving an avenue between His Highness and the door. We requested the company of the little prince Ahmed Shah Bawamere, and after a short delay, he arrived. Richly dressed, with crimson velvet slippers, abundance of "Barbaric pearl and gold," and gracefully holding his little sword, the boy walked up the crowded room, with an easy nonchalant air, heralded by a chob-dar, loudly repeating his praises, and titles; the men on either side rose as he passed on, and joined in an affirmative chorus. The young prince gracefully salaamed to his father, to the Dewanjee or prime minister, and to the principal people present, after which he took his seat, with the most graceful self-possession.

* A town situated about fifty miles from Junagarh.

A Taifah of Natchwomen next exercised their skill for our amusement. The premiere danseuse, a tall and graceful girl, acquitted herself well, and sung some Persian songs in exquisite time and tune, with a pleasing modulation of voice, which was novel, tone being commonly sacrificed to noise. The girl was a native of Hyderabad, in the Deckan, and is entertained as a first-rate performer; and certainly this was the first time I ever felt amused by the exhibition of native dancing.

A much more novel entertainment, however awaited us—a theatrical exhibition by four accomplished Thespians. Scenery or stage effect we had none; but the whole was in the very height of comic humour. The story of the farce selected was, that a rich Patan chief, leading a peaceful and happy life, with a single occupant of his harem, feels an irresistible desire to travel, and leaves his tender wife, half heart-broken, but somewhat reassured by his vows of eternal fidelity; mounting his fiery steed, the chief sets out, and after a long and safe journey, he meets a lady weeping on the road side, and as a widow, imploring his sympathy and protection. The Patan declares himself a bachelor, about to seek his fortune, and not caring to be encumbered; but honied words prevail—he marries the widow, and seating her behind him, returns to his own house. In the recesses of the harem, we see his first wife sitting desolate on the ground, her saree drawn closely over her face to conceal her grief, and lamenting, in tones of sadness, the absence of her beloved lord. A servant rushes in, and announces his return; the wife springs up, and the faithless husband enters, carefully concealing his recent acquisition behind the folds of his travelling dress.

A dish of rice (represented by a turban) is brought in, and the husband and wife sit down, on the most loving terms, and commence their feast. A most absurd, and characteristic dialogue follows, in which the Patan, with all the empty boasting of a class, notorious for their Falstaff-like cowardice, relates the imminent escapes of his journey, how he was attacked by robbers, and how the spear of their chief produced a dangerous wound, ere his sabre levelled him with the dust; and how princes and chiefs rivalled each other to do him honour, for his valiant bearing, essaying as he told his vaunting tale, to conceal his starving companion, who sits crouching at his back, and whom he contrives to feed, by raising his hand in violent affirmation of his story, and dropping some grains of rice into her open mouth.

At length, discovery takes place; violent reproach follows; the first wife pushes her husband against the second, and the second returns him to the first, and thus the poor man is made to rebound between his fair companions, until he falls to the ground exhausted, and the audience, amidst roars of laughter, discover the moral, which is somewhat singular for a Mohammedan farce—the evil of a duplicate of wives.

The hero of this petite comédie, who was really a mimic of considerable talent, albeit the ugliest, and almost the dirtiest man I have ever seen, next gave imitations of birds, after the manner of a ziffleur, and that, most admirably.

Seated upon the ground, with a saree over his head, he mimicked the Minar, with its conceited attempt at song; the Colah, or Mangoe bird; the Copper-smith, with its single, sharp, tapping note; the sweet gurgle of the Bulbul, and the caw of an excited and angry Crow.

Again, the same actor commenced a series of laughable caricatures of native manners, and with no other aid than a long red scarf, and his own talent as a drôle, he carried you at once with him into the scenes he represented. We saw a proud Patan chief set out upon a restive Kattiawar steed for Ahmedabad; a Rajah smoking his hookah in full durbar; a horse-dealer puffing a bad steed; a dissipated chief, bargaining with a Shroff,* for the disbursement of his debts; all equally just, as delineations of native character.

The witching hour of night stole on, almost unperceived by us, amused with the novelties of the scene; but the Nuwaub, to whom all pleasure now brought speedy satiety as the punishment of undue indulgence, called for his Kusumba†. It appeared in a golden vessel, and was presented in a costly spoon of the same metal. Silver cups, filled with the favourite sedative, were handed to the courtiers; but native etiquette demands, that every one should serve his neighbour, rather than himself, and the warmest friendship is shewn, by obliging him to swallow more than he feels convenient.

* A native banker, a usurer. † Liquefied opium.

On the present occasion, every one dosed his neighbour in the politest manner. The mode of supplying the Kusumba, is also prescribed in the code of Mohammedan etiquette. It requires, that the hand of the man highest in rank, should be formed into a hollow shape, and filled with the liquid, which is then poured down the throat of the inferior, who exposes himself to the imputation of being both an ill-bred, and an ungrateful man, if he swallows less than three hand-fulls.

About one o'clock, Pân Suparree announced the Nuwaub's departure; and the Taifahs, the minstrels, and the players, left us to the rare enjoyment of peaceful silence.

Our Junagarh gaieties were not yet concluded. The following day brought me an invitation to a buffaloe-fight, which I declined; but visited the Beebees daily, every evening bringing me sweet garlands of mogrées, and piled baskets of delicious fruit. We received visits constantly from the people of the town, and the ministers of his Highness; amongst these I distinguished a fine Nagir Brahmin, the late Dewan of the Nuwaub. I have seldom met with any Hindoo so liberal in his opinions as Runchorjee, or so well acquainted with points of Eastern history, unconnected with legendary trash.

In manner, the Dewanjee is a well-bred courtier, dignified, graceful, and intelligent. His figure is tall, his complexion remarkably fair, and his skin possesses that peculiar transparency, which in advanced age, so commonly accompanies high birth and gentle breeding. Of Mr. Elphinstone, Runchorjee spoke with enthusiasm; and as a Persian scholar, appreciated fully the oriental learning of both this gentleman, and Sir John Malcolm, who was also personally known to him. Although himself a Nagir, the highest class of the Brahmi-nical priesthood, Runchorjee possessed a grasp of intellect, which, while he preserved inviolate the strictest observances of his religion, induced him to admit the evidence of nature, and consider many of the legendary tales of the priesthood, as cunningly devised fables.

Speaking of the great blow the boasted antiquity of Brahminical chronology had so lately received, in the decyphered inscriptions of Girnar, Runchorjee observed; "The rocks, the trees, the rivers I behold, and in them I see the hand of God; but for the vedas, the puranas, or any of the written works of man, who can trust them? My religion consists in doing my duty to my Creator, and acting benevolently to my fellow men; who does this, does well, be he Moslem, Hindoo, Buddhist, or Christian."

Here, then, was Runchorjee, arrived at the same point of philosophy, the same condition for admitting external evidence, as they of old, who reared a temple, and de-dedicated it, "to the unknown God." The light of reason taught him to distinguish error, but truth was yet hidden from his view. My conversations with my intelligent friend, induced me to admire, yet half regret, that his mind was of such a calibre. When unusual faculties impel an individual intellect to outstrip the opinions of the times and people among whom it is cast, little good can arise, unless its productions anticipate the race of progress, and become a beacon to light men onwards. Runchorjee is surrounded by circumstances, all opposed to such a result; by reflection, study, and early intercourse with a few distinguished Europeans, he has acquired a respect for learning, a taste for the society of learned men, and some knowledge of the laws of governments and societies; yet as a Nagir Brahmin, he is bound to support the prejudices of the people, and to conform, both personally, and in his family arrangements, with the strictest rules of his caste. In Junaghar he is without any society but that of his inferiors, both in rank and intellect; without any attendant circumstances, to alleviate a seclusion from all sources of general information. His family are of course totally ignorant; and Runchorjee's purity, and high-mindedness, does not permit him to compound for a paucity of general interest and recreation, by luxurious self-indulgence. Thus Runchorjee remains, admired by his superiors, solitary amongst his equals; renouncing evil, but unable to discover truth; his opinions warped by his prejudices, at the same time that his intellect warns him of their falseness.

As my present visitor was morally great, the next was physically small; in truth, a most good-natured little specimen of abbreviated nature. Our people had discovered and introduced him, knowing my love of curiosities, whether architectural or human. My little visitor's name was Ramjee; his figure was free from all defects, his countenance agreeable, and his head well-proportioned ; his age forty-five, his height three-feet-eight, the length of his foot seven inches, and his hand four and a half. His parents he described as tall, and his family consisted of five brothers and sisters, who died in infancy. He was born at Elichpoor in the Deckan, and had travelled on pilgrimage to Dwaka; his caste was that of a Salee, or weaver, and he stated his capacity for eating a very excellent dinner, and of walking the enormous distance of seventeen coss, about thirty-five miles, a day.

The next party given in our honour, was held at the house of Dada Bhoe, where we were to meet his Highness the Nuwaub. We were received in an open court, spread with crimson cloth, and brilliantly lighted. After remaining here a short time, I was summoned to the private apartments. Dada Bhoe was simply attired in a crimson silk saree, with no other ornament than a richly jewelled nose-ring. It is curious, that the Beebees only, are permitted, with the exception of the Nutt, to wear jewels set; the rank of the wearer being distinguished by peculiar styles of personal ornament. Dada Bhoe, presented me with abundance of sweet blossoms, tastefully wreathed, as punkahs, necklaces, bracelets, balls, and even rings. The little prince was seated at his mother's feet, and his fine eyes swam with tears of tenderness, as she smiled at the eagerness of his remarks.

Poor woman!—the sensual and capricious Nuwaub had treated her, of late, with coldness and contumely; he allowed her a pittance of two hundred rupees a month, but refused to see her, or provide for her infant child. The Chelahs intrigued to ruin her still more in his Highness's opinion, and, but for the protection of the Beebees, she would have been heart-stricken indeed. Gentle, loving, and patient, as she seemed, rouse but the mother's feelings in the heart of Dada Bhoe, and her large eyes' sparkling glance, told, that the spirit of a bereaved tigress would be meek, compared to the energy with which she would nerve herself to support the birthright of her beloved son. Her great hope seemed to rest in the protection of the British government, whose influence with the Nuwaub, should be paramount.

On returning to the court yard, I found it filled with minstrels; and a man called Nusseer Khan, singing some Persian love songs very admirably. He accompanied them upon the vina; but also played with great taste and execution upon another instrument, resembling a large Neapolitan guitar, but played with a bow. The bowls of these instruments were formed of gigantic gourds, painted green, and richly gilt. The figure-board of one, was curved upwards, and finished with a large figure of a peacock, with its fan extended. The instruments were splendid, and the artiste's skill worthy of them; Nusseer Khan, was certainly the Huerta of Junagarh.

I had decided, that my last visit should be paid to the family of my fine old friend, Runchorjee Dewan. As my own palan-keen had been sent a march in advance, he courteously sent his own for my conveyance. It was a roomy and well-cushioned affair, gorgeously decorated; and between the front windows, was an image of "Ganesa the Sublime," with a favourite rat, as his emblem of superior wisdom. Runchorjee received me at the entrance to his house, and conducted me into an inner court, shaded with trellis, which supported fine vines, whose rich fruit depended in em-purpled clusters; between the leaves, were cages of loories, and gaily plumaged parrots, doubtless sadly tantalized with the ripe feast, from which their prison bars restrained them. As the luscious gifts of nature thus formed our canopy, the fine produce of the carpet looms of Iran, were spread beneath our feet, and mummers and musicians collected for our amusement.

Among the crowd of friends who had gathered round Runchorjee on this occasion, I thought he appeared particularly misplaced. His intelligent, and high-bred look; his graceful manners, dignified, and full of repose, yet softened by an inexpressible sweetness; his fair face, slightly furrowed with age; and his large black eyes, lustrous as burning lamps, illumined by the fire of intellect within, made him appear to me, more like one of the fine old Italian paintings of the papal priesthood, than, as he was, the head of a sect of ignorant Brahmins; and more suited to shine as the acknowledged patron of poets, men of science, and literary genius, than to be the minister of a bigoted and profligate barbarian.

The door of the court, in which we were all assembled, communicated with another, which divided it from the private apartments. The Nagir-Brahmins are eminently strict in all that regards religious tenets and observances—the quality of their food, their rules of intercourse with strangers, and the seclusion of their women; I therefore considered it a very great privilege to be permitted an entrée into the harem of a Nagir family.

On entering the court, where the women had long assembled, with the most anxious curiosity, to see a being differing so completely in complexion, dress and manner, from themselves ; I was instantly surrounded by four generations of the Dewanjee's family—his wife, his daughters, his grand-children, and his great grand-children ; the Juru, * a fine old lady of seventy, had been a bride at ten years old, and the youngest of the family had not yet seen the revolution of a month.

The women were all gentle—a surpassing charm in womankind ; and some, very fair and lovely. They were attired in bodices, petticoats, and sarees of their own embroidering ; and it struck me, that mazarine blue, seemed their favourite colour. Their jewels were costly, and all wore the Tika and Nutt. The children were all smiles and good-nature ; and there was something affectionate, even in the touch of their tiny soft hands. Their state seemed one of primitive innocence; they knew nothing to regret; the earth might have its flowers, and the heavens its stars, and the spirit of man might be tossed with the thousand doubts and fears that society bears on it, but they knew it not; these gentle beings lived only in the exercise of the simplest domestic affections, and living so, were blest. The young mothers, and the smiling maidens, had never crossed the threshold of their father's house; and the venerable Juru had grown, from a sunny-haired bride to a tottering matron, surrounded by the walls of her husband's home. No pleasures distract them, no cares appal—their ideas of the world and its society, are bounded by the towering summits of Girnar, and the cordon of their domestic circle. Their mode of living, is simple as their thoughts. They sleep on mats, spread upon native bedsteads of the commonest construction;

* A Nagir marries but one wife, who is styled Juru.

parched grain is their daily food, and water their only beverage.

Humility, it would be imagined, would be the leading principle, in minds educated by simplicity and abstinence. Not so; the pride of caste in the Nagir women is predominant, and prevents their visiting the wives of their prince, whom, as Moham-medans, they consider to be immeasurably their inferiors. All learning they are ignorant of; it is enough that they are Brahmin women, and of the family of a Nagir; in this distinction, is concentrated every thought. They can imagine nothing wiser, greater, or better, in the universe; and pride of birth to them, is the one thing needful, the abundant satisfaction.

It has been my good fortune to have seen much of native society amongst the gentler sex; but I have never met with such total absence of both information and curiosity, as in the family of Runchorjee. They are degraded indeed to a state of mere animal existence, the only luxury of which, is the limited exercise of domestic affection. Their ignorance probably appeared more striking, as compared with the refined tastes of the Dewanjee himself; and it was truly grievous to observe, that the prejudices of sect and country, should erect such powerful barriers against family sympathy, and so humiliatingly degrade one sex, as even to render them incapable of understanding, that the other could possess wisdom.

I found it a hopeless task to endeavour to interest beings whose lives were so primitive, in any of the customs of the world about them; a certain number of simple ideas must exist in the mind, before complex ones can be introduced, or formed; and even these, of the quality I required, were wanting; so, in my own defence, I commenced tea-making, endeavouring to afford a practical illustration of the distinctions between the chemical processes of decoction, and infusion. The Dewanjee had, when on a visit to us, expressed a wish for some tea, which I sent him; and he complained that it did not at all resemble in taste some which he had taken on the recommendation of Sir John Malcolm. I fancied my friend's capacity for enjoying this pleasant beverage, had been lost in the lapse of time, until I discovered that his daughter, having put a handful of my pekoe into a cooking utensil, with sugar, milk, cloves and ginger, had boiled it for an hour together, and presented it to her father, in a wine-glass, without straining!

This sufficiently explained the mystery; and having obtained a teapot, banished the ginger and cloves, and substituted a cup for a wine-glass, Runchorjee had again the supreme felicity of enjoying "the cups which cheer, but not inebriate."

As I was about to leave the harem, the Dewanjee's daughters crowded round me, seizing my hands, and using every term of sisterly endearment; and the poor old Juru laid her trembling hands upon my head, and bade me, as her daughter, visit them again. I was much touched by the gentle sweetness of this simple family ; and on returning to the Dewanjee, I expressed the gratification I had felt in observing so many of the purest feelings of the female heart, in full exercise amongst his family, notwithstanding the limitation incident to their secluded state.

A conviction of the sacred duty of paying honour to parents, is characteristic of the natives of the East ; yet the generality of a virtue, does not conduce to render individual graces less pleasing ; the mingled tenderness and respect, therefore, observed by all the members of the Dewanjee's family towards his poor old wife, struck me as peculiarly charming.

In the outer court, some players were introduced, but they were mere buffoons, and the appearance of Pân Suparree, soon afforded me permission to depart.

In returning through the town, I found the bazaars brilliantly lighted, and a bustling market held, noisy, with all the chafering of good chapmanship. Cooks had established themselves in the centre of the streets, and the air was redolent of well-spiced currys, kabobs, and other Indu-gastronomic delicacies ; a hungry stranger might enjoy an excellent feast amongst the itinerant restaurants of Junaghar.

CHAPTER IV.

THE UPAH KÔTE AND HILL OF THE DATAR.

" There is a temple in ruin stands,
Fashioned by long forgotten hands ;
Two or three columns, and many a stone,
Marble and granite, with grass o'er grown."

BYRON.

PEEPING from amidst the luxuriant foliage which clothes the suburbs of Junagarh, may be seen the time-stained walls of an ancient Rajpoot citadel, which, bearing the title of the Upah Kôte, is invested with considerable interest. Erected upon a sandstone rock, at an elevation more considerable than the modern city, this fort is not only itself a picturesque object, but commands a magnificent view of Girnar, and the neighbouring country. The rock on which it stands, was originally excavated to form the walls, which are connected by substantial bastions, one of which is sixty feet in height. It is defended by a ditch, to the west and north; and is, on the whole, a very fine specimen of eastern fortification. Little is known of the early history of the Upah Kôte; yet that little, is replete with the legendary lore so charming in Indian story. It is said, that about A.D. 1467, Mandalik Rajah, a Rajpoot Prince, supposed to be the last of the race, who had possessed dominions in Surashtra for nineteen hundred years, resided at a town distant about ten miles from Junagarh. A servant of this prince, a simple woodcutter, prowling, axe in hand, about the forests of Girnar, discovered, to his astonishment, a fine fort, with bastions, moat, and gates, but uninhabited. Relating this strange matter to the Prince, Mandalik hastened to ascertain its truth, and indeed found, as his servant had reported, a wonderful fortification upon the western side of mount Girnar, in which were vestiges of human habitations, and four wells, two of immense proportions. Mandalik determined to make it his seat of government; and ignorant of its previous history, styled it simply, Junagarh, or the old town. The prince did not, however, long enjoy his new possession: in A.D. 1472, sultan Mahmoud Bigarraha became infatuated with the desire of capturing Girnar and Junagarh; and after a great exhibition of power, compelled the submission of Mandalik, and obliged him to become a convert to the faith of Islam. Charmed with the exquisite beauty of the spot, the sultan determined to make it his favorite hunting seat, and built a new city, which he entitled Mustafabad, since known as the modern Junagarh. In process of time, the fort of the woodcutter became deserted, and received its present name of the Upah Kôte, or upper fort.

The keys of the fort are, as a matter of ceremony, in the charge of his Highness the Nuwaub; but he obligingly sent them, with an order for our admission. Time, with its lichens, grass, and clay, had hermetically sealed the larger gates, against the intrusion of the stranger; but a small side doorway, afforded egress to an avenue, guarded by Mohammedan soldiery. The first object which claimed our attention, was a huge image of Ganesa, smeared with coarse red pigment; and as if the sculptor had considered mirth to be an attribute of wisdom, the Hindoo Janus is represented in a state of considerable, and happy inebriation; his goodly proportions, strangely contrasting with the emaciated appearance of the guards. High walls, which flank the avenue, exclude all circulation of air; nature takes her revenge, and few appearances can be more horrible, than the pallid hue, the skeleton frames, and the protruding eyes of the men, who pass their days in this unhealthy spot.

Even in this trifling instance, the apathy of the eastern character is observable. The sufferers are fully aware, that a few minutes' walk to the higher ground, would be repaid by the enjoyment of an invigorating breeze; but they prefer wasting life, to making the necessary exertion.

The fort contains numerous remains of its ancient habitations; stones differing from the soil, strew the ground, or lie in separate and considerable heaps; but the whole is tangled with jungle plants, and overgrown with leafless trees of the Sita Phul, or custard apple, whose small and stunted fruit, impoverished for lack of irrigation, resemble rather the ivory imitations for which Surat is famous, than the living and luscious burthen of this highly estimated contributor to a Mohammedan dessert.

On the highest point of ground, remains a fine Jumma musjid, or Friday mosque; the roof supported by lofty pillars, and the interior adorned with highly polished, and richly chiselled marble crypts. The terraced roof commands an extensive view; and from it, rise graceful minarets, twenty feet in height.

This prospect is indeed lovely; the wide plain of Kattiwar, stretching away far as the eye can reach, intersected by sunny streams, and Topes* of luxuriant trees; the temple-crowned hill of Girnar, its richly wooded ravines, winding causeway, and sacred rock; while below, rests the modern city, stirring with life, and surrounded by rich and productive gardens.

The only remaining object yet traceable in their original forms, are the wells mentioned by the Surashtra historians, and a cannon seventeen feet long, and five in circumference, which bears the tolerant Arabic inscription, that "This gun was made, for the extinction of all infidels."

The wells are curious, and distinguished as the Krore, and the Bhowree. The Krore is excavated to a depth, it is dangerous to contemplate; a shaft runs round it, from the mouth to the base, with windows looking into the well. Apertures are bored in its sides, for the accommodation of pigeons; and the disposition of the surrounding ground, induces the opinion, that this spot was, in olden times, planted and adorned for the pleasurable recreation of the Mohammedan princes of the Upah Kôte. A fine basin, which is excavated here, and adorned with richly carved edges, is said to have been used on festive occasions, to mix the favourite Kusumba in; its size however, would better suit it for a bathing place, than an oriental punch bowl.

* Topes; small plantations, or clumps of trees.

The Bhowree is a well of the usual form, with a handsome flight of steps leading down to it. Its walls are laced and garlanded with luxuriant verdure; but the water is still esteemed for its purity and sweetness.

The relics of antiquity in the Upah Kôte are few; but its locale and early history, legendary and obscure as it is, sheds on the darkened walls, and ruined stones of this old fortress, associations, which, connected with the discoveries of modern times, are rife with interest.

Another spot worthy record, in the neighbourhood of Junagarh, is held sacred by the Mohammedans, as the hill of the Datar, or giver. The saint whose reputed acts, cast over it this odour of sanctity, has been, under the title of Jemial Shah, honoured with cenotaphs in various parts of India, although of Sindhian origin, and his canonized remains, reposing in fact, at Tattá. The worshippers of the Datar, relate, however, that Jemial Shah, travelling through Kattiwar, was charmed with the beauty of their sacred hill, and became anxious to build a hut, and establish himself on it, as his future residence. A party of Fakirs reproached, and ill-treated the holy man, who, weary of a world containing so little benevolence, determined to abandon it. Leaving his garments at the mouth, the saint entered a cave on the summit of the hill, from whence he has never since emerged. Conscience-stricken at this event, the offending Fakirs built a small, but handsome cenotaph, to the memory of the injured saint, and laying his garments in order, worshipped him with the usual ceremonies. On the evening I had selected for my pilgrimage to the hill of the Datar, the sun was setting when we arrived at the cenotaph. Numerous torches cast a full glare of light over the interior decorations of the holy place; the gilding, the looking-glasses, the painted eggs, and the garments of the saint, shone with unwonted brilliancy, and crowds of Mohammedans, were engaged in offering up their evening prayers. As each individual ascended, they bent the knee, and prest their lips to the steps of the venerated building; which service was rewarded, by the presentation to each, of a morsel of cocoa-nut, rendered sacred, by a momentary abiding on the apparent tomb of the Datar. On the exterior of the cenotaph, are suspended bunches of various toys ; these, purchased by Mohammedan mothers, are supposed to ensure the well-being of their offspring.

Facing the cenotaph of Jemial Shah, and resembling it in form, is an enclosed tomb called the "Datar Chelah,"* surmounted by a richly gilt ornament, and flanked by an exquisitely wrought musjid. Surprised that the worshipping crowd paid it no homage, and that neither the odours of frankincense, nor the glare of torches, marked it as a venerated spot, I advanced to the steps, and over the richly chiselled entrance, observed a black marble tablet, inscribed as "Sacred to the memory of Joseph Dykes, infant son of Major N. D. Ballantine." The tomb, and musjid, are expensive, ornate, and singular monuments of the ostentatious, and peculiar feeling of a European father, selecting this mode of conciliating native opinion. For twelve years, an allowance of two rupees a month is said to have been made, for flowers, oil, and frankincense; and during this period, the tomb of Colonel Ballantine's son shared consideration with the cenotaph of the saint, but both largess and worship have since been discontinued.

* Literally the adopted, or favorite of the Datar or Giver.

Datar Chelah.

The power of the Datar, is supposed to be peculiarly shown upon this spot; and his aid is here, it is believed, most successfully entreated. Numerous poor people, from all parts of Western India, when afflicted with leprosy, travel hither, and enter into vows to remain, until the merciful Datar vouchsafes a cure. If their sufferings from this cruel disease are of long continuance, suicide is commonly the result; the belief being general, that in the event of a leper dying a natural death, the disease descends to his posterity. A few days before we visited the sacred hill, an aged leper desired permission from the British authorities, to cast himself into the sea at Mangrole; this being refused, he left Junagarh, and about three miles from the city, the aged sufferer caused himself to be buried alive; his only son, for whose immediate sake the act was committed, covering the grey hairs of his afflicted parent, with an earthen water vessel.

As the shades of evening fall over the wooded heights of the sacred hill of the Datar, it is a touching sight, to see numbers of unclad lepers, with streaming hair, and firmly clasped hands, seated near the narrow pathways, their emaciated bodies rocking to and fro in the fervency of the act, and a murmured, but earnest prayer breaking forth, that "the merciful and good Datar would restore them to their children, and to their beloved, but far distant homes." In many cases, twenty years has witnessed the same petition, yet healing comes not. Hundreds perish from cold, and disease, and many become the prey of wild beasts, who haunt the jungles of the mount. Lions are numerous, and may constantly be seen, during early morning, or shortly after sunset, crossing the most frequented paths.

The gentlemen of our party, visiting the Mount on a hunting expedition, in search of Sambur, encountered a lion of unusual size, near the cenotaph of Jemial Shah, close, in fact, to the public road. The noble brute paused to survey the group, and no symptom of intended attack being apparent, moved slowly and majestically onwards, and was lost in the thick underwood of the neighbouring jungle.

The Sambur, which abound in the Gir-

nar and Datar Hills, are very beautiful, but singularly timid animals; the natives sometimes stalk them, as the huntsmen of the Highlands do the red deer of their native wilds; but the method adopted by European sportsmen, is, to go late in the evening of a moonlight night, to the vicinity of some clear mountain stream, and there, having previously erected a bower of leaves beneath the shelter of a widely-spreading tree, await the thirsting animals, when a well-directed shot is sometimes successful. In this manner of conducting the sport, great precaution is necessary, as the slightest sound, even the click of a trigger, if not muffled, will send the whole herd of Sambur bounding back to the fastnesses of their mountain home, and the mortified sportsman is constrained to be content for the rest of his eager watch, to see a sounder of wild hog, or a few unwieldy Neil Ghye, quench their thirst at the borders of the fair stream, whose attractions promised him superior sport.

The horns of the Sambur, which are sometimes found by the peasants in the jungles, are highly prized, and sold for a considerable price. Very few European gentlemen visit these hills for the purposes of sport ; as the Cooli tribes, who inhabit them, are sometimes roused by the report of a gun, and salute the stranger from a distance, with a very unfriendly discharge of matchlocks, as he leaves his lair in the early morning.

The favourite amusement in Kattiwar, is lion-hunting, and the noblest of these brutes frequent the plains. Hunting elephants are kept by such as can afford the immense attendant expences of food and keepers ; but a reward offered by government for the destruction of both lions and Cheetahs in the province, has considerably diminished their numbers.

A notable elephant, now in Kattiwar, has had four lions slain from its back, without the removal of the howdah ; it has been severely wounded in many engagements, and is now, by all lovers of this noble sport, appreciated as a sort of hero in his way.

The elephant is, perhaps, the strongest instance to be found in the animal kingdom, of the power of fear in controuling the will. The Mahout governs a trained elephant, simply by means of a small iron crook, which, when he requires the animal to turn, he presses against the opposite ear. If he intends the elephant to stop, the driver presses the instrument on the centre of his head; and the regulated force of this action, comprises his power. Of the docility and instinct of the animal, many anecdotes are recorded, and I shall enlarge them by one, for whose authenticity, I have the authority of the owner of the intelligent creature, of whom the story was told. My friend, an officer in the Bengal service, possessed a handsome elephant, which he was accustomed to see fed with a certain allowance of grain daily; business requiring his absence, he confided the care of his favourite to a worthless keeper, who, in the interim, stole and appropriated a large proportion of the grain, intended for the elephant's use. The poor animal daily grew more spare and feeble, missing at his usual feeding-time, the abundant feast supplied by his kind and generous master. My friend returned, hastened to his stable, observed the emaciated state of his favourite, and having had no previous reason to suspect the honesty of the servant, was at a loss to discover a cause for the evident alteration. The poor elephant, delighted at his master's return, trumpeted his welcome, raised his trunk as a salaam, and moved about, affording in his mute but expressive manner, every demonstration of joy. His feeding-time approached, and the full allowance of grain was placed at his feet by his dishonest and cruel keeper. The elephant, satisfied of his master's attention, industriously separated it into two distinct heaps, and having eagerly devoured the one, left that which remained, and quietly walked to the opposite side of his stable. The truth thus conveyed by the gestures of the intelligent brute, flashed upon the mind of his master; the keeper, on being accused of the theft, and finding his unworthiness exposed, fell at the feet of his employer, acknowledging the aggression.

An elephant belonging to his Highness the Nuwaub of Junagarh, was usually driven daily, into the neighbouring jungles of Girnar, to collect green boughs to serve for fodder; with these, the animal would return to the court-yard of the Serai, and carefully unloading himself, pack them together for use, in the smallest and most compact manner. If his stable-door remained closed after the labour was concluded, he would pick up again one of the lightest and freshest boughs, and continue waving it in his trunk, to protect himself from the attacks of the numerous flies and mosquitoes buzzing around.

The Mahout who had the care of this intelligent and docile creature, frequently placed a little infant, about four-months old, at the elephant's feet, with the injunction of "Kubber dah," (take care), and the command was never disregarded. The animal would wave a bough over the little child, as it laid smiling on the ground; and if attempting to roll away beyond the spot where the father had placed it, the elephant would gently move it back again with his trunk, menacing meanwhile every creature who approached.

The native keepers of elephants, will not allow that the animals are influenced by the passion of fear; but declare their obedience to be an impulse of gratitude, and believe them to possess the reason peculiar to human nature.

A gentleman, late in command of the Bheel Corps of Guzzerat, possessed a fine elephant, to which the Mahout was accustomed to relate Bhàts, as they are called, or long stories, which he declared his favourite animal understood, as perfectly as himself. The natives are celebrated for their talents as raconteurs ; and since the time of Scheherazade, this seems to have been the favourite Indian, as well as “Arabian Nights’ entertainment.”

All native princes entertain Bhàts, as our sovereigns of olden time did Jesters ; and among the labouring classes, it is common to see half-a-dozen half-nude people, with bare backs, but gaudy turbans, squatted, cowering round a bright wood fire, telling Bhàts to each other, until gun-fire in the morning. The most absurd legends are remembered for the occasion, and if these fail, the hiatus is filled up with treasured anecdotes of the “Saib Logue,” a fertile source of raconting to such of the peasants as may have been brought into communion with European residents. Gossip is certainly one of the dearest privileges of the natives of India.

One of the most uncommon pets I have heard of, during my residence in the East, was a young lion, which my friend, Capt. S——, found as a cub in the jungles of Kattiwar. As the little creature grew in stature and beauty, he displayed so large a portion of gentleness and affection, that no means were used to restrain him; and wandering about the Bungalow and compound as a domestic favourite, he won the attachment and confidence of every one around him. True, a stranger sometimes started, on being ushered alone into the drawing-room, and observing a young lion quietly reposing upon the Persian rug; but his character was soon known, and all admired the gentle qualities of the noble brute. On occasions of defection, and backsliding, in his usual behaviour, Capt. S—— would strike him slightly with a little riding-whip, on which the poor creature would rush into the dressing-room of his mistress, and cling round her feet for protection. When Capt. and Mrs. S—— were returning from their evening drive, “Snap” would spring forward and leap into the buggy, half-mad with the delight of a reunion. A little bull-puppy was an especial favourite with Snap; yet sometimes, as they both lay basking in the sun, the little lion would lift his royal paw, and administer the same to the poor pup, with an empressment which sent him rolling along the grass. Thus matters remained until the highly favored native of the jungle wastes, attained some eighteen months of age; when his master, having occasion to leave the station of Malligaum, directed "Snap" to be secured on a cart with luggage. Poor little fellow!—unfortunately, a few miles from the camp, Captain S. in his buggy, passed him, and the attached and excited little creature, springing forward to follow him, hung himself in his securing chain.

Cheetahs abound in Kattiwar, and the Shikarries frequently bring them while very young into the camp of Rajcote, where they are sometimes kept as pets.

A nest of four were brought to me on one occasion, by a native huntsman, who had discovered the little creatures in the Jungle depths, during the temporary absence of their mother. The captured animals were about the size of a large Persian cat, were very sleek, handsome in form, and beautifully marked; and as they lay rolling and playing together on the carpet, few attitudes could have been more graceful, than those displayed by the free, muscular, and finely formed limbs of these noble and (young though they were) majestic-looking little brutes. The Cheetah, as is well known, is of the same genus as the royal tiger, and although much smaller, has a similar nobleness of deportment. Hunting Cheetahs usually form part of the recreative establishment of a native prince, and the animals are capable of being trained to great activity and intelligence in the pursuit of prey. It is said, on native authority, that hunting Cheetahs have the same taste for flattery, common to other Nimrods of the day. Sometimes the Cheetah loses his prey, and when this is the case, he becomes ferocious and dangerous to those about him; when this occurs, the keeper stands afar off, and exhorts him in a loud voice to be patient and contented; and as the Cheetah chafes at his disappointments, the huntsman vociferatingly lauds his exploits, and those of his maternal and paternal ancestry, with all of the Cheetah genus generally, assuring the foiled hunter of better success in future, and soothing him with the gratifying assertion, that Cheetahs of such famed prowess as his own, can afford now and then, to lose even important game. The Shikarries say, these well introduced encomiums always produce the desired effect, and the flattered Cheetah, thus subdued, suffers his hoodwink to be replaced, and himself led quietly homewards. It should be added, however, that as a trifling addition to his passion for fame, the Cheetah, possesses a considerable appetite, which, while the bard recites his deeds of valour, receives plentiful gratification from a large supply of raw meat, provided to meet these emergencies of chance disappointment, on a hunting day.

It is curious that while Kattiwar abounds with the tiger and lion species, Cutch, the neighbouring province, should be free from this terrible infliction. The Rao of Cutch, at one period, had several dens filled with wild beasts ; but finding them troublesome in the palace stables, he proposed turning them loose in the adjacent jungles of Wagur ; fortunately, good advice on the matter was offered to his Highness, and in preference to visiting the peasantry with such a justly dreaded source of terror, he despatched his menagerie to Bombay, where the beasts arrived, to be a source of harmless and amusing interest.

CHAPTER IV.

HINDOO FESTIVALS.

THE DUSRAH, OR DOORGA POOJAH.

"In so enlightened an age as the present, I shall perhaps be ridiculed if I hint as my opinion, that the observance of certain festivals is something more than a mere political institution."

HORACE WALPOLE.

FACTS, perhaps, will not bear us out in the opinion, that idolatrous nations have all in turn, adopted the same objects of worship, under different titles; yet nature, as the primeval source of religious impulse, would, in all rude times, suggest the necessity of revering particular objects, varied only by the effects of climate and position, on the passions and pursuits of men. Thus resemblances exist between the mythologies of the ancient world, presenting interesting materials for curious investigation, and possessing so many features in common, that an enthusiast may be forgiven, for assigning to them one broad origin, tracing their variations to the genius of nations, their climate, and their temperament. In considering the affinity which appears to exist between the characters, titles, and attributes of the gods of pagan nations, and the festivals originated in their honour, and waiving the disputed question, of whether the gods of Greece, Egypt, or Hindostan, were the most ancient deities, it is satisfactory to believe, that all may have been symbolical of the powers of nature, and have originated in the gratitude and reverence of man.

But a few years have passed, since England herself retained many gay and poetical celebrations, whose mystical ceremonies may be traced to an age of darkness and idolatry. It is unnecessary to exaggerate the effects of civilization in refining the festivals of modern times ; yet I believe that through the veil of distance, we may readily trace a shadowy origin to ceremonies, whose character of idolatrous mysticism has long been exchanged for the mirthful and innocent gaieties of a free and happy people. The merry frolics of our rustics, in the sweet season of May, their superstitions on Hallow-e'en, and their quips and cranks on All-fool's day, may find their prototypes in a ruder age, and be traced so far back even, as to the mystical ceremonies of the isle of Anglesey, where, according to our earliest historian, the Druids celebrated their mysterious rites on the altars of their sacred groves, deluging them with the blood of human sacrifice.*

Since our conquest of Poonah, and the successful termination of the Mahratta war,

* See Life of Agricola, by Tacitus.

the Hindoo festivals of Western India, have, year by year, lost much of their mysterious ceremonial; but the vestiges of Brahminical craft are still apparent, although circumstances have restrained their cruel and disgusting orgies.

The Dusrah, the most important celebration of the Hindoo year, is an autumnal festival, in honour of the many-titled mountain goddess. Doorga is poetically represented, as the daughter of old father Himalaya, and her temples are usually erected on the summits of the highest hills. She has been considered as resembling the Grecian Juno; and it is a curious coincidence in the parallel, that the peacock is sacred to Doorga, and in Hindoo sculptures, and paintings, she is represented as attended by one of these birds, who stands watchfully on her right hand; also, that as the Indian goddess of victory, she is worshipped under the title of Sverga Rádni Devi, or the Queen of Heaven. The most fearful of the incarnations of Doorga, is that of Mahi Cali,* in which she commands sacrifices of animals, and even human victims, as seen in the Calica Puran, an ancient work, much valued by the Hindoos.

The festival of the Dusrah continues ten nights, as the word Dus-rah implies. On the tenth night only, offerings are made to the goddess in her form of Doorga, as during the preceding nine, distinguished as the Now-ratee, the goddess is supposed to be preparing and adorning herself, and is worshipped under the form of Bhowanee.† On the sixth day, she is awakened by sports and music, as she was supposed to have been originally aroused by Brahma, during a night of the gods.

Doorga, according to Brahminical au-

* Cali signifies black, and its root, cal, implies devouring; whence it is used as expressive of the destructive powers of the goddess.

† “Bhowanee,” the origin of fertility, and the wife of Siva, the Creator, resembling, according to Sir William Jones, the Venus Urania of the Greeks.

thority, is said to have been formed from the brilliant glances which radiated from the eyes of the assembled gods. Her form was of exquisite beauty, and the deities from whom she was derived, bestowed on her a variety of armour and ornaments, and sent her forth with power to conquer vice, and exterminate the race of Rakhust, or demons, from the earth. On the departure of the great goddess, after many successful enterprises, from the scene of her victories, she enjoined her followers to propitiate her power on certain days, promising to secure them health, wealth, and good fortune. The festival of the Dusrah, is now celebrated on the days appointed by the goddess, and is solemnized with prayers, sports, and warlike exercises. In Western India, the Dusrah is most strictly kept at Poonah, where, during the Peishwa's time, the priesthood exercised the highest influence. A very superb temple, erected on a considerable elevation, and commanding a magnificent view of Poonah, called Parbuttee, is sacred to Doorga ; but I was also shown a spot particularly dedicated by the Brahmins to the performance of ceremonies, attendant on the celebration of the Dusrah festival. It is enclosed by a high wall, and strictly guarded from all chance of contamination from without ; to this sacred spot, the Brahmins repair from all parts of Western India, and during the ten nights of the festival, celebrate their orgies secretly, and by torch-light.

Strangers are of course never admitted to witness these mysteries, as the very glance of a Christian, or an outcast, would steep the actors in them in impurity, which years of penance could not expunge ; however, from intelligent Hindoos, and various sources of information, I was enabled to gain some curious particulars, of the observances which prevail.

On the first night of the festival, the Kalusa, or sacred-water jar, is cleansed, and consecrated by the officiating Brahmins; this vessel being considered as a symbol of the goddess, forms the principal object of worship during the Dusrah, and bears three curious signs, according to the three principal castes of Brahmins; these are hieroglyphic figures, denoting the character and attributes of Doorga; and so truly are their forms Egyptian, that many learned writers have engaged, from their coincidence, to prove the identity of the Hindoo ceremonies of the Dusrah, with those which celebrate the inundations of the Nile.

On the same night, offerings of attire, food, and sweetmeats, are made to the wives and daughters of Brahmins; and are continued during the whole of the Now-ratee, although specific gifts are particularly proper to each. Amongst these offerings, oils and perfumes, henna, antimony, cosmetics, sandal-wood, flowers, and a variety of unguents, supposed to enhance female beauty, are most conspicuous. On the sixth day, the Tulsi-tree, and Cusa-grass, is worshipped; the Cusa is considered particularly sacred, and is daily used in the ceremonies of ablution; it is said to have sprung up soon after the deluge, and is believed to be the bristly hair of the boar, which the Hindoos affirm to have once supported the world.

On the seventh day, honour is paid to the goddess Suruswatee, the patroness of learning and the arts; and on the last day, pooj is made to all things, animate and inanimate. The soldier prays to, and praises his sword; the native artillery-man anoints the mouth of his cannon, smears it with a pigment of oil and turpentine, and decorates it with wreaths of red and white blossoms.

The gardener makes pooj to his implements of agriculture; and every artisan, to the particular tools in common use in his vocation. The native servants of Europeans observe the same custom, and each decorates the object of his care in a similar manner. The Gorawaller, or horse-keeper, takes his master's horse to the river, and after washing him, ornaments his head and neck with fragrant wreaths of the Mogree and the Chumpa, and parades him round the camp. The Mussaul decorates the candlesticks with bunches of gaudy blossoms, and the Hummaulls festoon the palanquin, with the same floral emblems; the Sepoy twines them round his musket; and the Dirzi binds graceful garlands on his turban, and in his cummerbund. The air is richly laden with sweetness, and the bright blossoms so liberally dispersed, give an air of continental gaiety to the scene. The love of Asiatics for flowers, is carried to a very remarkable extent, and forms a pleasing trait in their general habits. *

* On the last day of the month, in which the Dusrah is kept, the Hindoos have a legend, which promises wealth to those who remain awake during the twenty-four hours; they therefore commonly pass the night in playing Pachecsee.

In return for the offerings made during the Dusrah, the worthy servitors expect some more substantial recompense, than oils, or cosmetics; a rupee, however, satisfies them, and they leave the donor a world of good-wishes and salaams.

All gifts and payments are considered peculiarly fortunate on this day, as also the realization of any hopes of success. Every man who follows the profession of arms should form part of a procession from his own village to a sacred tree called the Sami, and after shooting an arrow at it, each warrior placing a leaf in his turban, returns with songs and rejoicing to his house; by this act, the people hope to propitiate the goddess of small pox, who is an object of peculiar terror to the Hindoos.*

Feasting during this festival, is the principal enjoyment of the people, at all times the one great satisfaction of the Hindoos; the quality of the food is simple and unstimulative, but the quantity consumed, remarkable. During the Dusrah, servants and dependants of all denominations, request money from their employers to purchase a sheep for sacrifice; and as the custom furnishes them with a good dinner, the ceremony is seldom omitted.

* The ancient German warriors had a somewhat similar custom; that of crowning their javelins with coronals of leaves from the sacred trees.

Sacrifices of buffaloe and sheep by the Brahmins, are usual during the festival; in the Calica Puran, various oblations are commanded to be made to Doorga in her form of Cali; but the pleasure the goddess derives from them, is said to be of very unequal duration. It is truly horrible, to peruse the code of forms commanded to be observed, for the sacrifices, which are said to afford the sanguinary goddess the highest gratification. They are remarkable however; more particularly those affecting human sacrifices, as they eminently display the cunning and personal care of their ecclesiastical framers. A woman or a Brahmin, it appears, may not be sacrificed ; neither the aged, the crippled, nor the diseased ; but the victim must be of good appearance, and be prepared by ablution, and purifying ceremonies. On the day preceding the sacrifice, he must be adorned with flowers, anointed with oil, and smeared with red sandal wood. The sacrificer is commanded to worship his victim, and after the death blow is given, auguries are drawn of prosperity or otherwise to the sacrificer. A human sacrifice must only be made after the victim has attained his twenty-fifth year, extreme youth being unwelcome to the goddess.

Such are a few of the horrible laws which have been allowed to govern the ceremonies of these appalling rites. Yet fearful as they are, when the dreadful penances, startling superstitions, and authorized religious cruelties which pervaded the ancient world, are considered by the light of reason, it is scarcely subject for surprise, that fanaticism should complete the catalogue of terrors, by demanding human victims for the propitiation of its deities.

The subject of human sacrifice, is one which possesses interest of the deepest nature; and to the religious or philosophical enquirer into the history of nations, it presents material for study and reflection, unequalled by any other. Startling and appalling to human contemplation, as those institutes appear which prescribed Murder, as a rite acceptable to the deities, it is necessary to inspect and to review the whole fabric of the religious tenets of their pagan practisers, before the character of such oblations can be distinctly and rightly understood.

The doctrine of metempsychosis deprives self-sacrifice, which is yet common among Hindoo devotees, of the most fear-inspiring, and mysterious terrors attendant upon death; and the belief that the sins of a being, sacrificed to the terrible Cali, are forgiven, and the spirit of the victim received into the courts of heaven, as the first drop of his warm blood falls at the altar's foot, removed, doubtless, from the mind of the sacrificer, those dreadful and overpowering emotions of horror which now oppress the enquirer on a mere contemplation of these dark and terrible rites.*

Happily, these blood-stained oblations have ceased in Western India; and the last of which I remember to have heard, was amongst the Brahmins of the Deckan, who long preserved the custom of yearly sacrificing an aged woman, on the occasion of the Rajah of Sattara's visit, to the fort of Purtabghur.

Sir John Malcolm states, that a sect of Kurradee Brahmins had a custom, at Poonah, of annually sacrificing to their infernal deities (Sactis), a young Brahmin; and as, according to the sacred books, if the victim is unwilling, the sacrifice is forbidden, to prevent the possibility of such an occurrence, the unsuspecting, but devoted one, is frequently the stranger, who for months or perhaps a year, has shared the hospitality of his murderer. The discontinuance of this custom is said to have arisen from the following circumstance, which forms a most touching melodrama of domestic horror.

* I would refer the reader who may desire information on the rites of sacrifice, to the volumes of the Asiatic Researches, and to Mr. Ward's valuable work on the Hindoos.

A Carnatic Brahmin, oppressed with travel, sat to rest himself in the cool and shaded verandah of a Kurradee Brahmin, resident in Poonah. The host, perceiving the youth was a stranger, invited him to repose under his roof, and recover his fatigue. The unsuspecting traveller gratefully accepted this apparently kind invitation, and being domesticated in the family, and having seen and admired the Brahmin's beautiful daughter, as she bore her water vessels from the neighbouring well, he sought, and obtained her in marriage. Calmly and blissfully passed the hours, until the near approach of the great festival, when the Kurradee Brahmin determined to sacrifice his son-in-law to the terrible Cali; remorseless and unchangeable in his cruel purpose, a dish of rice, prepared with drugs, was the selected means for accomplishing his object. His graceful and gentle daughter, however, perceived her father's terrible design, and devoted to her young and handsome lord, her bosom torn with agonizing and conflicting passions, she watched her opportunity, and as a last resource, placed the poisoned dish before her only brother, who, eating of its spiced contents, before the expiration of the feast fell senseless to the earth. The miserable father, well knowing the nature of the poison, despairing of his son's recovery, and firmly believing in the virtue of the sacrifice, as an expiation for the crimes of both himself and his victim, bore him to the temple, slew him at the altar's foot, and made his goddess an offering of his blood.

The young Brahmin, learning these dreadful facts from his half-frenzied wife, rushed to the court, fell at the Peishwah's feet, and related the whole affair. As, according to Hindoo law, if a human sacrifice is performed without the consent of the Prince, the performer commits sin, orders were issued for the apprehension of the Kurradee Brahmin and his family, who themselves were put to death, whilst every priest of the sect was expelled from the city of Poonah, and their return forbidden by the heaviest penalties.

The Brahmins still sacrifice buffaloes on the festival of the Dusrah, and adorn them with flowers, gaily coloured cloths, and a preparation of red and yellow pigment; but during my own observation of the festival at Poonah, it seemed little more than a simple merry-making among the people, in which feasting and mirth, quite overpowered the influence of religious observance. This probably arose from the weakened power of the priesthood, which has gradually declined since the fall of the Peishwah, and the establishment of British power in his dominions; and the chances are many, that in a few years, nothing will remain of the Dusrah, but its garlands and feasting; and the blood-stained rites of the sanguinary goddess will be remembered only, as a tale of other days.

CHAPTER V.

THE DEWALLI, OR KALEE POOJA.

"He looked and saw what numbers, numberless,
The city gates outpoured."

PARADISE REGAINED.

THE feast of lights, as the word Dewalli implies, is a very favourite festival, held on the commencement of the Hindoo lunar year; its celebration continues four days, and is the period fixed for the settlement of all debts and accounts.

On the first day of the Dewalli, the whole population of an Indian city bear branches of the Sami, Tulsi, and other sacred trees, in procession; and walking round all the temples in the neighbourhood, offer salutation and prayer to their country's gods, in their several incarnations. * These ceremonies are incomplete, unless offerings of money, rice, and suparree nuts, are made to the officiating Brahmins. On the day following, prayers are made to the sacred books, the Vedas, and Puranas; to money, horses, account-books, and elephants; also to miscellaneous objects of respect, whether local or general.

* Each of the Dii Majorii of the Hindoos, claim a peculiar tree. The Bur, Ficus Indicus, is sacred to Siva. The Peepul, Ficus Religiosa, to Vishnu. And the Dawk, Butea Frondosa, to Brahma. The Israelites had a custom curiously in accordance with the Hindoo practice of bearing trees on appointed days, as appears from the command given in the 23rd chap. of Leviticus and the 40th verse; "And ye shall take you on the first day, the boughs of goodly trees, branches of palm trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and the willows of the brook; and ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God, seven days."

It is considered unfortunate, to pay money during the period of this festival, as any sum thus parted with, will, it is supposed, be lost to the trader, during the whole of the ensuing year.

The objects of the Dewalli would suggest, that wealth, and money as its symbol, being a source of the distinctions most coveted by men, in an ignorant state of society, should be considered worthy propitiation in the character of a divinity, whose favour might be secured by prayers and solicitation. This being, in fact, the case, a curious custom obtains, which has reference to this superstitious veneration.

The bankers, or Shroffs, of Indian cities, are in the habit of burying their wealth in some convenient spot, usually selected on the site of their dwellings; on any large draughts being made on them, the coins produced appear partially stained, or encrusted by a red pigment, acquired by the following practice.

On the second day of the Dewalli, the bankers, or Shroffs, disinter their treasure, with every provision for secrecy, and place it together in a convenient apartment; the owner sprinkles it with a mixture of red lead and oil; a chafing dish, containing Loban, or frankincense, is placed near it; the worshipper prostrates himself, and with hands joined over the ascending smoke, invokes the Spirit of Wealth in the following terms,—

“Oh, Wealth! be thou propitious to my house, and keep adversity from my gate;—oh, money! depart not from me, and I will take care of thee, and worship thee, if for this year thou wilt dwell with me, and make me prosperous in all my business.”

After this invocation, the banker replaces his treasure, rejoicing in the certain hope of the ensuing year's prosperity; as, whatever is invoked on this day of the festival, will, it is supposed, be propitiated for the remaining portion of the year.

The last days of the Dewalli, are devoted to feasting, gaiety, and mirth; at the last celebration of this festival, in the province of Cutch, I was fortunately present at the principal exhibition of national rejoicing, honoured, according to ancient usage, with the presence of the reigning prince.

A fine plain, near the walls of the city of Bhooj, was the space appointed for the display of races and fireworks, the only public amusements which appear agreeable to native taste. The situation was judiciously chosen, and the general effect produced, remarkably picturesque. In the distance, appeared the irregular elevation of the walls of the hill fort, with the military camp reposing at its foot; while nearer the plain, lay the native city, embowered in luxuriant foliage, amongst whose leafy screens, rose here and there, a Hindoo temple, or a Mohammedan musjid, contrasting well with the cloudless sky, then glowing with the departing radiance of a tropic sun.

The bright green sward at our feet, was animated by crowds of natives, arrayed in all those brilliant colours in which the gala costume of Asiatics is so peculiarly rich. Many were on foot, others mounted on elephants and camels, whilst a few of the white-bearded elders had taken refuge with the women and children, in little clumsy two-wheeled bullock-carts, covered with gaudy draperies of scarlet and yellow cloth.

His Highness the Rao, was mounted on a large grey horse of the celebrated Kattiwar breed, decorated with crimson housings, silken reins, and silver necklaces; but, as if all this bravery was insufficient for the notable occasion, the good steed's tail was dyed a most brilliant carmine colour, to complete the effect of a grand toilette; fortunately, the care bestowed by his Highness's grooms, seemed fully appreciated by the delighted spectators.

The Rao was attired in a superb green and gold turban, a Doputta, or body-cloth of rich Kinkaub, a magnificent sword, bossed with Venetian gold, and a variety of valuable and dazzling ornaments. He was attended by his prime minister Ambaram, a very stout pleasant-looking personage; his Arab guards, and the principal men of the city; a company of Sepoys, under the command of an European officer, composing his guard of honour.

A space being cleared for the horses, the great exhibition of the day commenced; at a concerted signal, some dozen riders, very unequally mounted on huge Cutchee steeds, started together, the jockeys either holding each other's hands, or the corners of a handkerchief between them; this, for a certain period, enabled them to keep neck and neck, after which, à corps perdu, each strove lustily for precedence, kicking his bare heels against the horse's flanks, and rolling about in the well-stuffed saddles, with a system of jockeyship, as unlike running for the "Derby," as can be well imagined. The horses, untrained, and fed to repletion, used considerable speed for the first hundred yards, but, after this, their best efforts degenerated to an exercise canter, interspersed with divers kicks and plunges, as the administration of the heel, or a rhinoceros horn-wand, advised them of their lazy backsliding. The riders wore their usual dress, consisting of huge turbans weighing some fifteen pounds each, with a waistband to match, in addition to which enormity, the saddles were composed of huge frames of wood and iron, covered with wadding, satin, and embroidered cloth, the stirrups and ornaments of silver, unpolished, and of the most clumsy workmanship.

At the conclusion of the races, rockets were thrown up; and some tastefully arranged, and very innocent-looking bunches of coloured paper, disposed on tall bamboos near the course, were fired. An enemy, however, lurked within; the papers were filled with highly sonorous crackers, and other combustible matter, and although the lagging day-light diminished their effect to the spectators, the horses, camels, and elephants seemed considerably excited by the display, performing a variety of facetious antics, which kept their immediate neighbours continually on the alert, lest he, she, or it, might suffer from the natching of the surrounding quadrupeds.

One tall, white, wall-eyed, Cutchee horse, with a pink tail, and a peculiarly sinister expression of visage, did succeed, after a variety of evolutions, in putting his off hind leg, completely over a poor, humble, unassuming-looking, little, saffron-coloured poney, which had stood hanging its head, and blinking by the side of its tall companion, during the whole exhibition; the catastrophe threatened to be serious, but, happily, the long-legged offender recovered himself with wonderful dexterity, and the apathetic-looking victim did not appear either surprised at, or grateful for his escape.

The fire-works having flashed, and crackled, and showered their last, the picturesque-looking crowd dispersed, to enjoy the natching, and other diversions to be found in the houses of the richer portion of the populace; and every one who could afford to do so, illumined his dwelling with a floating light in a little oil saucer, or with English wax candles, if his means allowed it.

Returning to camp, the temples we observed were all brilliantly illuminated, the glancing lights casting out, in bold relief, the black stone idols, which seemed more than usually hideous, from the garlands and red pigment with which they had been recently decorated, in honour of the festival. Before each idol, burned a little chafing dish of frankincense, tended by an officiating Brahmin, the only animated object discernible, by the great blaze of light which so glaringly revealed the mysteries of the Adytum.

The Mohammedans, in courtesy to the Hindoos, had also observed the ceremony of illumination; and as we passed their cemetery, hundreds of lights were burning amongst the tombs, half hidden by the foliage and brushwood which commonly shroud the resting-places of the followers of the prophet; whilst it might be seen, that under every sacred tree of the Hindoos, the little stone niche containing its rudely-sculptured idol, had also its garlands, its floating lights, and its share of scarlet pigment.

On the steps of one of the largest temples, which skirted the road side, was a Fakir, whose general appearance arrested attention. For a moment, the immoveable expression of his countenance and figure, induced me to believe him an idol, more particularly, as his position was that common to the representations of Budda; his legs folded, showing the soles of his feet, and his open hands placed on his lap, the back of one, resting flatly on the palm of the other. His body was smeared with red paint, his hair descended in matted plaits to his waist, a huge necklace of Tulsi beads encircled his neck, and his eyes were fixed, in what he desired should seem an abstract contemplation of the deity.

This act of priestcraft is constantly practised during festivals, by these vicious impostors, who find the delusion of their fellow-men a very successful trade, and contrive to batten on the charity of the credulously pious. Astonished and misled by the apparent sanctity of this repulsive being, the poor people who pass the temple during the night, lay by his side, offerings of money, grain, &c., and although inwardly chuckling at his success, as the gifts of his admirers increase, he will retain perfect immobility until the neighbourhood is still, when he slinks back to the shelter of some miserable hut, to revel in filth, and abandon himself to the most disgusting licentiousness.

During the whole of the two last nights of the Dewalli, the constant discharge of guns and rockets, render all attempt at rest fruitless, for the residents near native habitations; the only remaining consolation, is the remembrance, that the Hindoos have no winter festivals, and the feast of lights once concluded, no similar excitement will occur, until the Mohammedan fast of the Mohurram, in the early spring.

The usual exhibitions of fireworks in India, are very mediocre, and ill-managed. The Chinese are, it is well known, adepts in their construction, but the artisans of the Celestial Empire set too high a value on these manufactures, to allow their general use on occasions of national rejoicing in India.

The want of skill, in the manufacture of fireworks, has its disadvantages increased by the bad taste of the exhibitors, who, ignorant of all the laws of contrast, either choose a moonlight night for their display, or run about, in real anxiety to develope the tortive graces of rockets and

catherine-wheels to the best advantage, by torch light.

Scarlet is the favourite colour for decorations of every kind; it is considered emblematic of pleasure and rejoicing; and on festal days, not only do little flags of this colour adorn every sacred tree, and float from the summit of every temple, but flowers which boast this favorite hue, are always selected in honor of the occasion.

The festivals of the East, are curious to the researcher into the manners of the ancient nations; and become interesting to the mere observer of the passing scene, from the circumstance of all restraint being banished from the manners of the people, and replaced by gaiety and good-feeling; at these seasons of national mirth, the oft seemingly timid, and gentle Hindoo, gives license to his genuine disposition, and laughs, sings, and adorns himself with garlands, as if he still inherited his native soil, in a happy state of constitutional freedom; it is at these periods, that his character may perhaps be best discerned. It is the peculiar effect of joyous impulses, to banish suspicion from the mind, and, as they open the flood-gates of natural feeling, to remove from the countenance all that forced, and assumed expression, which self-interest and cunning suggest, as necessary to be adopted by men, who have inherited oppression as their birth-right, and can hope for no sympathy from those, whom they have only learnt to recognise as the masters of that soil, which their forefathers once trod, in freedom and security.

The native population of India, are peculiarly reserved in their intercourse with us, and are perpetually supporting a character foreign to their nature, and the result of the circumstances which surround them. Their prejudices of caste, prevent our having any intercourse with them of a social nature; and their religious ceremonies are less known from personal observation, than from the communications of intelligent natives, which, after all we can acquire, little informs us on the real character, manners, and feelings of the people, when removed from the restraints of foreign espionage. It is therefore only on festive occasions, when the population of the towns seek the plains and neighbouring country, for the purpose of diversion, that they appear in a natural and unaffected character; and the result of the observation is, that the Hindoos are a peculiarly social people, delighting in raillery, and easily excited to gaiety and mirth. An Asiatic crowd unites a greater variety of picturesque effects than any other in the world, and the most perfect harmony and good-nature prevail among its members. The older persons gossip, and exchange jests on each other, not deficient in wit; and the younger parties stroll about, with their arms encircling each other's necks, exchanging the most gentle and endearing epithets, as they laugh and chat, on whatever may be the object of attraction ; unassailed by temptations to intemperance, its brutalizing effects never shade the pastimes of these inoffensive people ; good-nature supplies the place of the constable's baton, and every one is merry himself, without seeking his advantages at the price of a neighbour's inconvenience. The scene is one of amiable courtesy ; and if there is aught to regret, it is to be traced to the iniquity of the priesthood, who have demanded from these ignorant and credulous people, an observance of idolatrous ceremonies, whose antiquity, is sufficient to convince the people of their necessity and merit, and which, however degrading and demoralizing in their effects, must be regarded as the result of opinions and interests, formed by circumstances, in an early and barbarous stage of society ; thus considered, the poor submissive believers in their efficacy, cannot be held responsible, in any rational opinion, for conformance with prescribed ordinances, however horrible they may appear, viewed by the light of civilization, or compared with the simple ceremonies of a religion, which demands neither the blood of bulls nor of goats, but the free will offerings of a grateful nature.

Acquitted then, of all personal responsibility for the practical errors of their heathen creed, the Hindoos display, on festive occasions, many of the best feelings of social life, and entwine with their primitive observances, many poetic and graceful pleasures, which prove, that notwithstanding the ignorance in which the people are sunk, they still retain a taste for nature ; and our sympathy with them, at least on this single point, should be an incentive to hope, that in our present times of general improvement, India, morally as well as commercially, may share the advantages of our liberated opinions, and that the press and the steam engine, may originate a change in our calculations of the capabilities, and character of the Hindoos, which shall lay the cornerstone of reformation amongst them, banishing the idolatrous ceremonials of their festivals, and refining the expression of those natural and social graces, which even now, struggle forth amidst the huge mass of evil, shading the true spirit of these genial anniversaries.

CHAPTER VI.

THE HOOLI.

"It happened on a summer's holiday,
That to the greenwood sward he took his way."

CUMBERLAND.

THE Hindoos celebrate the burning of the Hooli, at the commencement of the vernal equinox, which has led, perhaps, to its comparison with the Hilaria of the Romans, instituted in honour of the goddess Cybele. In the east, this season is one of unmixed and boundless rejoicing; all restraint is cast aside, and both sexes indulge in every description of sportive mirth. Masquerading processions are common ; and the principal actors in the Carnival, disguise themselves as elephants, tigers, goddesses, or Rajahs, as fancy may decide, all dancing, singing, playing, and fencing vigorously together, without the least reference to assumed character. They delight also in playing personal tricks, similar to those common on our "All-fool's day," deceiving their simple-minded companions, with false messages and news. The evenings are devoted to natchés, juggling, and fireworks ; but it is considered most particularly jocose, to throw handful of a red [powder, called "Abir,"* over one another, as an imitation of vernal flowers. This, the most mischievous mix with alum and oil, and sprinkle on their neighbours' clothes, to the great injury of the said apparel. The lord of misrule alone reigns paramount at the Hooli ; all distinction of ranks is lost in its general license ; a woman of respectability dare not leave her house, and even a European officer is not secure from a constrained participation in its frolics. The native officers of the regiments, erect a large tent at the extreme end of their lines, where they indulge in the pleasures of a Natch ; not only Natch-girls, but boys, habited as such, frequently exhibit on these occasions, but it is not considered a very polished entertainment. The Sepoys consider it a point of etiquette, to invite their European officers ; who, in their turn, always attend, and return with their white jackets plentifully sprinkled with red dust, as an evidence of the sportive pleasantries of their inviters. If an officer is peculiarly strict, or feared by the natives at other times, they now take an innocent revenge, an instance of which I remember to have occurred a short time since. An unpopular officer, being as usual invited to the Sepoys' Natch, which took place at a tent, about a quarter of a mile from his Bungalow, he walked down to the lines at the usual time, late in the evening. The natives, it appeared, had concerted to plague him ; for after being seated, and the usual wreath of mogree blossoms cast over his neck by the première danseuse of the evening, he soon found that the showers of red dust which assailed him, were momentarily becoming more and more stifling : accordingly, he watched his opportunity, and rushed from the tent, rejoicing at so easy an escape ; but alas ! his triumph was of short duration ; at every turn, handfulls of red powder from unseen enemies saluted his eyes and mouth, and unable to avoid scores of tormentors, lying perdue at their posts, he arrived suffocated and breathless at his house, his face and hair plastered with red powder, and his whole figure bearing evidence to the zeal of the attackers. Crimson blossoms, or others of the most brilliant hues, are in great favour for personal decoration ; and when nature provides none, sufficiently gaudy to suit their taste, the people place one blossom within the other, to produce the gay contrast they admire. The yellow Chumpā is placed within the crimson Oleander, and formed into wreaths, which are worn as necklaces, or looped in fantastic forms, over the many-coloured turbans. The natives never intersperse leaves with their garlands or bouquets, but strip them carefully from the flower-stems, using those blossoms only which are most fragrant or gaudy.

* Cinnabar. A somewhat similar custom, according to Mr. Southey, exists in Portugal, on the Sunday and Monday preceding Lent, of throwing water over, and in the face of passengers.

The festivities of the Hooli, continue for five, or more days, according to the wealth of those who celebrate its anniversary; but its established ceremonies, or the simple worship of earth and fire, occupy but one.

A spot of ground being selected, it is purified by a superficial layer of cow-dung and water, and the fire being placed on it, in an earthen vessel, rice, cocoa-nuts, flowers, seeds, and various offerings are made to it, with prayers and invocations;

this is called "Burning the Hooli." The earth seems worshipped, as the productive source of fruits, and flowers; and fire, as the vivifying origin of the genial warmth which ripens and perfects its various gifts. It is in the spirit of these ceremonies, that the Hooli appears to bear a curious resemblance to the Roman rites, as described by the poets of ancient days.

Parties of Natchwomen, jugglers, and other itinerant exhibitors, travel from station to station during the Hooli, and find it a very profitable season. The only theatrical attempt I remember, was from Bengal, and consisted of a corps dramatique of puppets (Pootlees), as they are called in India. The dolls had a theatre, suited to their size, and were well dressed, and admirably managed. One scene represented a native court, or Durbar, to which all the neighbouring Rajahs were supposed to make their salaams to the reigning prince, for whose decoration all the valuable "properties" had evidently been expended.

As each Rajah was introduced, with due observance of native etiquette, the stage manager would call out "è con hi?" (whom have we here?) in a tone of such mingled surprise and admiration, as, considering the good gentleman's acquaintance with his actors, was exquisitely ludicrous; in another moment he solved the doubt, with "Oh! è Bundeleund Ke Rajah hi!" (he is the Rajah of Bundeleund.) And as his puppet finished his salaam, the exhibitor shuffled him off with a "Be quick! be quick!" which seemed sufficiently disrespectful to an acting prince, albeit a man of straw. Another scene represented a fencing match, in which, a native being killed, two out-cast natives drag off the dead body. Another, was intended as a satire upon our European troops, and represented a regiment on parade, all the officers being attired in cocked hats. This was ridiculous enough; but our native servants seemed most particularly delighted with the wit of this part of the entertainment. The best point, however, by far, was the management of a little puppet, attired as a Natch-girl, accompanied by two puppets, who attended her movements with the Tom-tom and Siringa. The costume of the danseuse was perfect; her nose-rings, anklets, and bangles, tinkled as she moved, and the grace and exactness of her motions, were really admirable. Now, she would raise her arms, and, extending her veil far over her brows, gently turn slowly round; then, gradually bending, until her form almost reclined upon the ground, she would gracefully recover herself, and commence a rapid and coquettish movement, receding and advancing with her musicians, until, apparently wearied, she gracefully salaamed to the spectators. The whole was admirably governed; and I never saw even figures in the Italian fantoccini move more easily, or with more of what would seem, personal volition. This exhibition concluded, the proprietor got up a little monologue of his own, and in a hideous mask, with a saree and a staff, represented a withered crone; and, in the character of that garrulous personage, began to tell numerous facetious stories: of this, however, we soon wearied, his skill as a Raconteur being very mediocre. He soon reentered as a tiger, and evidently intended to masquerade it through the whole animal world; but, the lights waxing dim, we dismissed our entertainer with a present, which he seemed duly to appreciate; for native payments are singularly scanty.

On the last day of the Hooli, bands of women, in their best attire, go round from house to house, in expectation of a trifling present; and it is not unusual for them to complement the donor with a shower of red dust, as a grateful offering; in short, mirth and frolic prevail: and, whatever this tricksome pair suggest, must be taken in good part, according to the spirit of this sunny holiday, which doubtless was originated as a commemoration of the genial spring time, when nature wears her brightest smiles, and the earth itself, with her bursting blossoms and jocund freshness, seems to suggest the idea of a blithe and universal carnival.

It is remarkable, to find a people so commonly sedate, as the Hindoos appear in their intercourse with strangers, capable of enjoying such "quips, and cranks, and wanton wiles," as mark the celebration of the Hooli. The Hindoo character is highly deserving minute study; for I know no other people who resemble them, or any known principles to which their peculiarities can be referred. The Hindoo has a most perfect and enviable command of countenance: whether in joy or sorrow, he never betrays feelings he may desire to conceal; and the calm and serene appearance of his features, would induce an observer to believe him an apathetic being, whom the ordinary passions of our nature could not assail. Yet, how superficial is this judgment! See him in his temples, joining in some of the wild and startling ceremonies of his idol worship, his eye kindling with enthusiasm, and his form writhing with excitement before the altars of his gods; see him at his festivals, garlanded with flowers, covered with unguents and perfumes, half mad with mirth, shouting and feasting in these joyous saturnalias; and then wonder, as we must, at the calm eye, and quiet aspect of the Hindoo, in his usual and public bearing.

European countenances are observed to retain the impression of highly-excited feeling long after the exciting cause has ceased; and it is by a triumph of practice, which men of the world well know the value of, that true expression may be supplied by a feigned one of the moment; but it would be found, even by a master in the art of physiognomical expression, an easier task to veil one passion, by the semblance of another, than to smooth the features into a cloudless mirror, of mere placidity. The Hindoo possesses this valuable power as the gift of nature, which, while it costs him nothing, is available for both small and great occasions. Often have I been amused to see a servant, who has passed night after night, during the Hooli, in the maddest abandonment to mirth, return to his duty in the morning, with a countenance as sedate and unmoved, as if he had passed the hours in sleep, or in abstract meditation on the attributes of his gods.

It is this skilful ease, with which a Hindoo countenance baffles the closest scrutiny, that renders it so difficult to decide in a criminal case among them; the offender never fails to look so placidly innocent, that the inexperienced judge is often disposed to question the truth of evidence, which militates against the character of any individual, who displays so much conscientious self-possession.

Hindoo holidays interfere sadly with the labours of the working classes; for, however poor and needy the people may be, they still neglect their general vocation, and, closing their houses, and arraying themselves in their best attire, hie away to the scene of festivity. Tailors, shoemakers, silversmiths, workers of tin, potters, basket makers, carpenters, carvers, and all the labouring population of a native town, are, on these days, only to be found without the walls, laughing, gossiping, and feasting together. Unrestrained by any dread of losing their customary employment, no amount of bribery will induce a workman to forego the gratifications of idleness and liberty on these appointed feasts, more particularly during the Hooli, which, like an Easter holiday, the very poorest find means to enjoy.

CHAPTER VI.

FORTUNE HUNTING IN INDIA.

" Riches and the life of man are as transient as drops of water upon a leaf of the lotus."

HINDOO STANZAS.

MANY of the members of our social community in India, are in the habit of considering a residence in the East as a state of exile ; their only imaginable compensation for this irksome position, being the anticipated harvest of those pecuniary advantages, which shall entitle them to the future enjoyment of all the luxuries of their native land.

The time is past for fortune-making in India; with the Mahratta war, ended the rapid promotion, the valuable plunder, and those rich divisions of jewels and prize-money, which sent men home, still in the vigour of life, to enjoy the dolce far niente, with a Lac of Rupees, and patronage in the "Direction."

The change which has taken place in Indian affairs, has not yet brought a corresponding and necessary change in the habits of our military society. It has not taught them the necessity of economising limited resources, or of discovering means for escaping that listless tedium, incident to a life void of exciting influences; yet it cannot escape the observation of any, who reflect upon the matter at all, that

" These fantastic errors of our dream, Lead us to solid wrong."

Men still come to India, actuated by the single motive of becoming speedily their own masters, and retiring, if possible, on a handsome fortune, after a residence of, perhaps, five-and-thirty years, in a tropical climate. The chances against this desired result are many and startling; and, supposing the advantage gained, the amount of benefit is sadly incommensurate with the sacrifices made for its attainment.

An officer in the Company's service, commonly commences his Indian career at the early age of eighteen; thus if we allow even "three-score years and ten," as the probable duration of his earthly pilgrimage, but a poor remnant of life remains, for the enjoyment of the halycon days to which he looks. While wasting the fine energies of a vigorous youth, in apathy towards the circumstances which surround him, and in vain aspirations for the future, the anxious fortune-hunter too probably forgets, that "ere the silver cord be loosed or the golden bowl be broken," nature must bend beneath infirmity, and that which most truly endears the remembrance of his country, must inevitably yield to the general law. The fond parent, whose heart has for weary years, yearned for the voice of his beloved son ; the companion of his youth, who would gladly have rejoiced in his success, can wait for him no longer ; the wanderer may indeed return, but the scenes of his youth look dark, and his spirit cannot then rejoice in the longed-for greeting of unchanged affection, or the well remembered smiles of once dear, and familiar faces. Meanwhile, the sojourner in the east, has himself acquired a weight of years, ill calculated to aid pleasurable enjoyment ; his views, all subtending towards the distances of life, have afforded little pleasure to the passing hours, have garnered few self satisfactions to gild his declining age ; and the fruition of such hopes, too frequently bring little in their train, but querulous repining, unrelished self-indulgence, and a distaste for, and depreciation of the rational pleasures of existence.

This picture, dark as its features may appear, is, I think, not too highly coloured. That it possesses truth of delineation, must be a subject of deep regret to all who feel, and think rightly, upon its self-induced deformities. The Indian service offers important advantages to all among its officers, who have the moral courage to cherish and cultivate their talents, rather than yield themselves inglorious prisoners to these witching temptations to idleness, extravagance, and dissipation, which unhappily assail them on their first arrival in the country. Some indeed there are, whose brilliancy of talent, and moral worth, render them well fitted to support the British name in India, whose well earned fame rests on a basis of their own establishment, and such will, I am sure, concur readily in the opinion, that a life passed in the east is far from being necessarily a blank, or otherwise than rife with matters of the highest interest.

The age at which young officers enter the Indian service, is that in which their characters are most pliant, while an unfinished education, leaves unconfirmed the tastes and habits of the individual. The certainty of provision afforded by the military pay office, permits mental exertion to remain a matter of choice, and the newly attached ensign, but late a "whining school boy," suddenly finds himself in a position of authority, the owner of a sword and epaulette, with money at his command, and self-will his only monitor. Moreover, the youthful aspirant for military honors is soon surrounded by cringing natives, who, while they cheat and plunder, administer freely to his gratifications; and by companions of a similiar standing in the service, thoughtless as himself, and anxious to seduce him into their own vortex of reckless dissipation and expenditure. It is to this system, that many owe the breaking up of an originally fine and vigorous constitution; it does the work of the destroyer, far more certainly than any fatigues of military duty; and to this is India indebted for the libels heaped upon its climate, when it is spoken of, as little better than a vast arena, its air impregnated with disease, its soil gaping for renewed victims.

It is easy to trace the proximate causes, producing many of the evils, common to a military life in India, and equally so, to imagine their extent. A brief sketch of the common temptations to which young candidates for distinction, either in the military, or even the civil service in India, are exposed, may partially lay bare the root of a great mischief, and ought certainly to excite regret, that such circumstances exist.

The young cadet, on his arrival in the country, discovers himself to be placed in a position at once novel and displeasing. The habits and tastes of those around him are at variance with any to which he has been accustomed. He meets no kind, familiar faces — none, who appear to sympathise in the feelings, which agitate him with fond regrets; and thus, with none to care for or advise him, he is thrown into the society of strangers, and dependant on himself for counsel and resource. The immediate result of these uncongenial circumstances is, to create in the mind of the young cadet, unbounded disgust for the climate and natives of India, and to induce false opinions, highly prejudicial to his future respectability.

Servants who make the robbery of griffins their profession, claim the newly arrived cadet as their natural prey ; Parsee traders, scarcely more honest, impose on him bad goods and high charges ; at length deeply involved for mere articles of boyish fancy, the poor lad finds himself in a state of grievous embarrassment, consequent on an expenditure disproportioned to his means. Unable to meet the demands of traders, whose wares have tempted his inexperience, the sufferer gives notes of hand for horses, saddlery, perfumes, and knickknacks, consenting to pay usurious interests on his creditor's accounts, as the sole means of extrication from their importunate demands. This done, the poor victim feels happy and relieved, little imagining, that he has laid the sure foundation for a pile of difficulties, which, if not altogether insurmountable, will tend for many weary years, to oppress him with the harrassing sense of pecuniary obligation.

On joining his regiment as an ensign, the expenses of his mess, and many inducements to extravagance, involve the young officer yet more deeply ; for it may be observed, there is unhappily no due gradation in the expenses of Indian military life, agreeing with the differences of rank and pay.

The ensign keeps his hunters, and drinks his beer, on the same scale with the captain of his company, and his finances suffer accordingly. Immersed in difficulty, the hapless subaltern too often seeks his only resources, in conviviality and sport ; hog-hunting becomes the serious business of his life ; and as his embarrassments increase, and the hope of revisiting his native land diminishes with each succeeding year, existence becomes doubly a dream, and its worthiest desires graduate into visionary fallacies, which daily become less animating, less productive of moral restraint.

After thus passing the early years of his life, in the acquirement of habits much disproportioned to his means, the subaltern in India seldom cares to allow an idea of future provision to abridge his pleasures, until he finds himself a Brevet Captain.

Being considered eligible at this period, he probably marries; and by the growth of olive branches round his table, finds his expenses considerably increased.

His wife requires a carriage, horses, and Ayahs. Mercers' bills draw deeply upon his allowances; his subscription to the military fund is more than doubled, and as years pass on, his children are sent to England in search of health and education. Little now is to be saved; and "he that hath his quiver full of them," is often constrained to struggle on, against failing health and increasing age, for the sake of the sons and daughters, thus torn from him in their infancy. Should strength of constitution befriended the Eastern sojourner, he must gradually rise through the several grades of the service; until, as a nervous, querulous old Colonel, he may command a station by right of his seniority; or may betake the tattered remnants of his existence, to be patched up for a few years longer, by the congenial climate of his fatherland; where the "old Indian," shivers in the wholesome breeze, clings to his eastern habits, finds himself a century behind the world—seeks in vain for a companion who remembers the friends of his youth; and so sinks into the grave, his death scarcely noticed, but by the congratulations of struggling juniors, who, as they receive news of "another line step," count over their chances of promotion, and rejoice, that old "so and so," is gone at last.

On the other hand, the Indian Obituary points its warning evidence, by the recorded fate of many, self-sacrificed to the "one year too long in India."

The very questionable expediency of desiring, at three-score years, to increase a provision for the future, has been long and frequently attested; but the moral to be adduced from the fact, that

—"At such years
Death gives short notice," is seldom practically applied to individual cases; neither does the truth yet appear to be accepted, that a green old age is a better possession than a lac of rupees, if accompanied by blighted feelings, or a constitution worn full of chinks.

As an honorable provision for the sons of our British gentry, the Indian service would increase ten fold in value, if the temptations which it offers to indolence and dissipation, were removed.

Observation suggests, that the origin of much which possesses a very mischievous tendency, may be explained by the consideration of a few facts, all bearing an intimate connection with each other. Among these may be particularly noticed, the youth and inexperience of Cadets, at the time of their entering the service; the temptations and crafty impositions to which they are exposed, on first arriving in the country; the disproportionate expenditure of the various grades in the service, and the habits of extravagance, induced and cherished, by an indolence arising from the supposed absence of subjects possessing sufficient interest to offer a strong mental stimulus.

A very important remedy for the existence of the first of the above-mentioned evils, would be found in the establishment of Barracks, and a mess for Cadets arriving at the Presidency, which should be placed under the superintendence of a respectable and efficient officer; this advantage would at least serve to protect an inexperienced lad from being victimised on his first arrival, both by roguish servants, and professional thieves.

In defiance of police regulations and corrections, there still exists in Bombay, a clique of dexterous plunderers, whose principal haunt is on the particular portion of the Esplanade, where are pitched the unguarded tents of these unfortunate Cadets; and the vagabonds, by watching an opportunity, skilfully remove the portable possessions of the unwary inmates.*

Not less systematic, are the robberies committed by servants, who really seem to possess a patent for the ingenious devices by which they garner and apply the floating capital of a hapless griffin. As I have

* This is frequently compassed during the night, by casting long hooks into the tents, which fasten on the loose articles, and are readily withdrawn. An individual placing his apparel on the chair beside his bed, when retiring to rest, has frequently found them stolen during the night.

before observed, on the first landing of a Cadet on the Bundah, these fellows, who are usually Mohammedans, run along by the side of the Palankeen, into which the new arrival has with difficulty packed himself, calling out in mutilated English, which is however music, to the ears of the half-distracted occupant: "I master's servant—I plenty gentlemen's servant—I got good character—I get master every thing." The half-stunned Cadet, delighted to find, in the unpromising garb of a cotton Ank-rika and Turban, any creature who can understand his wants, engages the most eager of the group forthwith; and the rascal runs off to the Thieves' Bazaar, to "get master every thing," chairs, table, tent, bed, and the usual etceteras for a bachelor's housekeeping. After a ruinous sojourn in Bombay, the Cadet is posted to a regiment; and when on board a cotton boat, about to weigh anchor, and proceed to a far distant station, his single-minded Mohammedan servant stands before his master, and with folded arms, and down-cast eyes, addresses his employer thus: "Very sorry not go with master, but poor mother very sick; suppose stay in Bombay just now—will come very quick after master—suppose poor mother get well." The helpless Cadet proceeds, and the attendant canoe bears away his accomplished "help," to make merry with his companions, and lie in wait for fresh victims.

It is to be regretted, that some means are not enforced to check the freedom with which Borahs, horse-dealers, and other traders, invite young men to incur heavy debts, which must eventually betray them into difficulty and disgrace; or that some arrangement is not made to protect young officers, freshly arrived in India, from the dangerous artifices of wily natives, and afford them the advantages of a home and respectable attendance, as strangers in a foreign land; the absence of which comforts, I have heard many feelingly deplore, as a primary cause of much of the embarrassment of their subsequent career.

The disproportionate expenditure of Subalterns in the Indian service, is the offspring of custom and opinion. It is, consequently, only by an alteration in both, that the evil can be checked. The individuals who compose our Anglo-Indian society, are placed by circumstances, in a position essentially artificial. None of the usual excitements of a busy world offer an escape from the tedium and monotony incident to any portion of life passed in an out-station cantonment, far more wearisome than can be well imagined, even by a sojourner in that microcosm of dulness, yclept, "Country Quarters." The circle of Indian amusements is circumscribed indeed; and such as exist, are expensive to command. Hunting, and the turf, appropriate the energies of the aggregate of military men; and the means and appliances required for these exciting objects, but ill suit the half Batta allowances, of a subaltern in a marching regiment.

“ Yet still in sooth, they tempt each youth
To forget his failing purse,
To laugh at his debts, and the bailiff's threats,
While his pay grows worse and worse.”

The inferred absurdity, of expecting men on the receipt of 180 rupees a month, to support the style of a scion of nobility, or to live at the same rate as officers of high standing, requires no comment. Facts, however, prove this to be a very constant habit among individuals, who are known to be unpossessed of any other means, than such as are drawn from the military pay-office. In the olden times, while the “Gold Mohur” trees of Hindostan still put forth fresh blossoms, encouraging the searchers after wealth, to hope that a lac of rupees would eventually prove a commensurate return for a few shades of oriental tinting, the communication between India and Europe, was so limited, and so tedious, that men were happy to avail themselves of any sources of occupation or excitement; and the most readily attainable, were those of hunting, racing, brandy and drinking, and cheroots. In those days, marriages were uncommon in the Indian army; many stations were altogether without female society; and if an officer by chance became a Benedict, the lady of his choice was probably an Indo-Briton, or a person of inferior birth, uncompanionable and illiterate.

An important change is gaining ground, which will doubtless exert its improving influences on the British, as well as the native community of India. Novel ideas will be constantly afforded; and resources of a useful nature, will replace such as are merely frivolous, or injudiciously expensive. The lower steps in the great ladder of improvement, are secured by the capabilities of steam navigation. Bombay is now a mart for every convenience and luxury required by European residents; professors of the fine arts are beginning to establish themselves in the island, and the resources of literature may be commanded by means of excellent libraries, supported at most of the Mofussil stations.

One of the greatest errors we commit in India, is that of sacrificing all interest in the present, to the sole enjoyment of a future return to the homes of our native land; committing, meanwhile, the most grievous injustice to these hopes, by living at a rate of expenditure, which can afford but little opportunity for garnering the pecuniary independence necessary to secure the desired object.

An officer in the Company's service, seldom retires at the expiration of twenty-two years; and even supposing that unusual good fortune permits him this advantage, the best period of his existence will yet have been passed in India. Happily may the time have flown, should his energies have been well engaged; but if otherwise, alas! the remembrance of it forms but a tissue of disappointed hopes, wasted talents, and pecuniary embarrassment. Knowing nothing of the country, but in its reputation for sport, and nothing of the natives, but in the character of servants, money-lenders, and traders, these hapless individuals speak in terms of severity of the whole population of India, of whose customs, manners, opinions, rights, and peculiarities, they are totally ignorant.

An indolent mind will find all barren; yet much remains in India, which as hidden treasure, awaits research alone, most richly to reward diligent investigation. It is perfectly erroneous to suppose, that military duty in the East must inevitably prove a dull routine, requiring neither energetic endeavour, or active mental exercise, to achieve the distinction which all must secretly desire. Regimental promotion is, indeed, but a simple waiting for events, the offspring of particular chances; but without reference to the immediate satisfactions which accompany the stirring interests of original research and active enterprize, there is yet held out, an offer of additional reward in the good allowances of many staff and other lucrative appointments, to which officers are usually appointed, who evidence particular zeal and talent, in matters of general and important interest. Individual merit is now a better recommendation than extensive patronage; and indolence can no longer claim the apology of inutility for its pernicious self-indulgence.

Reasons exist no longer, by which an Indian sojourner can urge his right to despond as an exile from his country, since reforming time has deprived that word of its darkest meanings. Though on a foreign soil, the interests of his native land, and her political advancement, may now employ the constant attention of the temporary absentee, while that ardency of expectation, excited by just and benevolent views connected with the country in which so large a portion of his life must pass, will elevate the tone of his pursuits and pleasures, and originate a relish for research, into whatever objects may tend most to advance the general good, according to the particular condition of the people, whose improvement forms the purest aim of the true philanthropist.

Thus, while the amusements necessary for health, are enjoyed as subordinate to higher objects, the resident in the East can no longer feel himself an exiled, or a useless man; and although he may not possess wealth, garnered at the expense of integrity, he will feel that neither his talents or energies are wasting, that his heart is neither hardened by dissipation, or his mind subdued by sloth; but on the contrary, the present is cheered by useful occupation, tending to advance the good fame of the individual in his chosen career, and secure for him a self-satisfaction, which will shed hope and contentment on his declining years.

It has been remarked, that every individual in the Company's service, has power to strengthen the respect of the natives of India for the British character. This is strictly true, throughout every grade of the service. The authority which implies the force of rule, originates in the government of British India; but the influence which must continue an ascendancy over the minds of its people, requires for its support, the reasonable approval of that people.

Burke has remarked, that the influence of France as a republic was equal to a war; the strongest observation on the power of influence, as distinct from authority, which could readily be adduced.

The influence of Britain should be equally potent; and it becomes the duty of every British officer, as the delegate of his country, to strengthen her dominion over the minds and opinions of the natives of the East, by a diligent practice of her moral and political virtues. Rendered loquacious by circumstances, the Sepoys, Peons, and native servants of every description, who surround European officers, have a propensity to recapitulate their private acts and expressions to each other; until by degrees, the information reaches the ears of a superior class, and leads the native gentry to form opinions of general character from individual examples, which are, unhappily, sometimes such as tend to create repugnance and disaffection.

Prompt as the people are to depreciate manners which are not only opposed to their own prejudices, but criminal according to all codes of humanity and justice, they are at all times ready to cede approval to public and private virtue; personal courage, wise administration of public affairs, equity in our dealings, and courteousness in our bearing towards themselves, have ever awakened feelings of the highest respect and admiration among the people; and the same men who once nailed on a bastion of their city the hand of an European officer, who boasted that it had never been raised to return the salute of a native, would speak with tears of gratitude, of the virtues of an Elphinstone, a Malcolm, or a Munro, and of many, too,

“By fortune's aid who rose, Ev'n from the basest grade through circumstance and foes.”

The British officer who feels, amid the privations of a foreign clime, how dear to him is still the glory and interest of his father-land, would secure the wisest solace for years of absence, by an endeavour to cultivate the respect and affection of the people around him, and advance, by his own example and influence, the noble scheme of Asiatic civilization.

To engraft liberal views on ancient prejudice, it is necessary to study the character of the people to be improved, and to become acquainted with the true spirit of their institutions and observances.

These enquiries, as applied to India, are redolent in interest. “Science alike, and sage Philosophy," must lend their aid in the research; the antique cave must be sought; the fractured inscription, albeit but dimly visible, be carefully decyphered; and the character of that wisdom be duly weighed, whose record is stamped in granite scroll of ancient character, or on the crumbling columns of a forgotten age.

The mythology of the Hindoos, rich in all the subtleties of poetic allegory; the costly temples and richly-sculptured palaces; the stores of learning yet encased in the casket of Sanskrit literature, offer a high reward to the industrious researcher into the history of an ancient people; and the pen and pencil may with equal advantage be devoted to a work, which, however laborious in its commencement, will richly repay the most sedulous investigation. Learned orientalists, who have made these interesting studies the business of a life, "hoping to raise, or benefit mankind," are rapidly diminishing, and little is yet known of the most ancient nation in the world.

Time, and partial innovation, has weakened the almost unimaginable influence of the Brahminical priesthood, and the natives of India will more readily communicate the information they possess. A mere research into ancient manners may not afford much of a useful nature, if undirected by philosophic views; yet is in some degree necessary, to develop the origin of prejudices, and consequently to suggest the most ready means for their removal.

Every encouragement is offered by the local government, to literary and scientific research; and branch societies now exist in Bombay, having for their immediate object, the collection of geographical, and generally statistical information, on the natural resources of Western India.

CHAPTER VIII.

SCENES IN THE DECKAN.

“ Rich in the brilliance of the balmiest light,
These scenes repose.”

POLWHELE.

THE cantonment of Poonah, justly considered the finest station in Western India, forms a delightful resort during the rainy season, when it becomes a nucleus of gaiety and attraction to its Bombay visitors. On leaving the Presidency, a Bunder boat is required to convey the traveller across the Bay, to the Panwell river; a very lovely sail, the water being studded with little islets, on which innumerable huts peep forth among the tufted trees, the whole enlivened with groups of natives, whose dark skins and richly-coloured garments blend exquisitely with the sapphire glow of the scene around. Panwell itself, is a small, hot, and dirty village, including a Bungalow kept by a Parsee, for the shelter certainly, rather than for the accommodation of travellers. Government Bungalows, which afford the single convenience of rendering the carriage of tents unnecessary, have been erected at distances of ten miles, between Panwell and Poonah, on the splendid road over the Ghauts, cut under the direction of Sir John Malcolm, when Governor of Bombay; but the dirt of these edifices is really disgraceful, and their equipments miserably incomplete. The furniture consists, simply, of a rude teak wood table, three chairs, and a marching cot, commonly abundantly supplied by many specimens of that dusky creature, by the Americans delicately termed Chintzes; while a Cooja and pie dish supply the absence of a basin and ewer ; and the beams of the roof tremble from the devastations of innumerable white ants, who, with the bats, love to dwell together, upon the high places. If the traveller happen to be neither a poet or a painter, his sole resource, during the hours passed in these solitary and comfortless retreats, is found in turning over the traveller's book, and noting the arrival and departure of those who, like himself, have been immured in a similar position ;* or in availing himself of the talents of the chief cuisinier of the neighbouring Parsee's Bobajee Khana ;† members of this speculative class never omitting any opportunity

* Some individuals indulge in facetious remarks, recorded for the amusement of fresh comers. At Chôke a remark was entered, that — found the Bungalow in a most filthy condition, the floor being literally covered with cow dung. It is scarcely necessary to remark, that this forms the flooring of all houses in India which are not chumamed.

† Literally, the Hall of Cooks.

of placing themselves in positions where aught is to be garnered. A great improvement has lately taken place in the mode of travelling on this road. The old system allowed only the alternative of horseback or of dāk, both possessing inconveniences to many. But a roomy and comfortable phaeton may be now engaged, which travels speedily, and is well driven. From Panwell the route lies through Chôke, a dirty, desolate place, to Candala, justly esteemed the Montpelier of Western India. From the back of the traveller's Bungalow, (which is rather better than its brethren on the road,) a superb view of the Ghauts arrests the traveller's wondering admiration. And here I would observe, how few among persons who have witnessed splendid natural effects, but must have deplored the inability of the pen to afford an adequate idea of that which is seen, to the mind of the absent. The description of such natural and varied grandeur can be limited only by each individual's power of graphic portraiture, all however, far below the truth, and weak to the imagination of the poetic reader. From the site I contemplated the glorious scenes of this magnificent Ghaut,—mountain above mountain rose, their bare and ragged summits towering among the fleecy clouds; while half way down, in richest beauty, thick woods of brightest green were garlanded with blossoming creepers of every hue, with here and there, masses of dark rock jutting from among the brilliant verdure. Above, below, dense clouds and fleecy vapours swept across the bold scarp of the mountain side; while on those spots, illumined by the sapphire glow of the bright morning's sun, a mountain torrent foamed and sparkled down its self-worn channel, sometimes hidden by the clustering foliage, then rushing with sudden violence over the broken rocks which partially intercepted its downward course, until it murmuringly stole away, among the rich culture and quiet scenes of the still valley, which lay sprinkled with sheltered hamlets at the mountain's base.

The temple caves of Carlee are situated near Candala; and strange, beautiful, and wondrous as they are, they have been too well, and too frequently remarked upon, to require further description. Wherever Nature has been most prolific, wherever hill, and rock, and stream, and flower, are most grand, most beautiful, most bright, there the richly crusted sculptures of a Pagan temple may be ever seen, and religion beckons willing votaries to its shrine. The Caves of Elephanta lie half shrouded on an island, whose position is, perhaps, the loveliest in the world. The Caves of Kanaree enrich the shaded labyrinths and flowery jungles of Salsette. The Temples of Aboo and Girnar, look on scenes where imagination herself is weak in picturing their beauties; and from the dark Caves of Carlee, the early worshipper of its gigantic idols, might have looked around upon a scene, which, in later days, falling upon the stranger's eye, excites his wondering surprise, that man should seek for other agents than the scene around, to raise his thoughts to Heaven.

The vast solitudes of Candala abound with wild beasts of various descriptions ; and royal tigers have been known to pay very unceremonious visits to the traveller's Bungalow. A gentleman, but a short time since, was awaiting the arrival of a friend, whom he expected immediately from Bombay ; at midnight, imagining he heard the Hummalls' measured tread, as they would ascend the road leading to the entrance, he sallied forth, impatient for the greeting. No friendly face was there ; but as the pale moonbeams shone across his path, the stately form of a royal tiger, stood forth in shadowy but bold relief, three feet from where he stood. Confronted thus with startling suddenness, each gazed for a moment steadfastly on the other, when the stately brute, turning slowly round, descended with the same heavy tread, which, from the enjoyment of quiet slumber, had brought forth to this position of peril, his misjudging and half-scared vis-à-vis.

From Candala, the next station is Girgaum, an uninteresting place, from which the traveller is anxious to escape to Panowlee, and thence to Poonah, when a distance is completed of seventy-five miles, on a superb road, and through the most beautiful scenery in Western India. The most advantageous period for travelling on this road is certainly during the rainy season; the splendid effects of light and shade being heightened by the changing hues of the thunder-charged clouds; and the numerous cataracts, falling over the bold scarps of the towering Ghauts, being swelled by the force of the mountain torrents.

Poonah is an excellent and delightful cantonment. The roads about it are good, the society hospitable and gay. An amateur theatre affords a very material source of amusement in the station, and is admirably supported. The building is pretty and well lighted, the stage small, but the scenery and drop curtain excellently painted, good limners being usually found among the European soldiery. A good orchestra, occupied by the best military band, completes the arrangements; and the whole is a fertile source of general entertainment. Several officers of the 40th regiment, some short time since stationed at Poonah, were admirable as amateurs of the histrionic art; and I have seen the School for Scandal, the Rivals, the Critic, and many of our best English comedies, performed in a manner which would have been creditable to actors by profession. These amusements are commonly terminated by a supper, which the amateurs either enjoy in character on the stage, or adjourn to do full justice to, at the neighbouring bungalow of some hospitable patron of the comic muse. On the occasions of a dress rehearsal, the soldiers and their families have an entrée, and as is frequently remarked of the galleries of an English theatre, this rank of society appear almost more capable of appreciating a witty saying, or a moral sentiment, than their wealthier and more sophisticated neighbours. Fancy balls, are also a source of considerable amusement to the social circle, as well as of pecuniary advantage to the Borah and Dirzi tribes, the first being persecuted by applications for tinsel and coloured satins, and the latter puzzled to clip and fit such garments, as offer a task quite unrivalled in difficulty, by any of their common avocations. To fashion the grey coat of Napoleon, or adorn the ribaned hat of Massaniello, are comparatively simple duties; but the full dress uniform of an Austrian officer, the picturesque costume of a Swiss peasant, or the drooping beaver of Robin Hood, plunges them in dismay. The effect of an Indian ball-room, on these particular festivities, really affords a proof of very considerable genius, in producing results so admirable, out of the very scanty means, commonly alone procurable, in the Borah stores of a native bazaar.

The desired costume is usually well arranged, and the groups which comprize the festive scene are varied, striking, and well adorned. Sultans, Sultanas, Greeks, Neapolitans, Spanish Cavaliers, throng the assembly ; while here, a Dr. Syntax may be seen in search of the picturesque, or a court dress of the last century will win admiration, on the superior gracefulness of a modern antique. The gentlemen of Poonah find their principal amusement in hog-hunting pic-nics, which until a late order, were usually enjoyed on consecutive Thursdays. In a tropical climate, hog-hunting is productive of almost necessary excitement, and is a most agreeable variety to the monotony of camp existence. The dawn of an appointed day sees the ardent sportsman far on his way to the distant spot, where horse and friends await him. Here the tents are pitched, and the fluttering flag bears the wild boar for its ensign. After capital riding, over a fine and lovely country, the sport once past, spears lost and won, the wild boars dragged in triumph home, the beaters wearied and exhausted, reposing on the ground, the party, "all good fellows," adjourn to their encampment, open their stores of welcome and required refreshment, then

"Take the cup,
And drain it up,
To snaffle, spur and spear."

The evening sees them on their tats, returning into camp, all with renewed health, good spirits, and good-feeling. The Deckan generally, abounds with game; but the country is dangerous, and difficult to ride over, a circumstance, however, which seems rather to encrease than diminish the sportsman's zeal. From the good riding required, and personal peril incurred by a hog-hunter, this sport deservedly ranks higher than any other.

In a moral point of view, it likewise does so. The vigour and fierceness of the animal renders the contest a very equal one. The wild boar strikes fear into his opponent, and even the horse, "who paweth in the valley and rejoiceth in his strength," trembles before him. Again, hog-hunting promotes good fellowship, without incurring the gross vice of intemperance. An intemperate man cannot be a good sportsman; the effect of intemperance is to relax the fibres, to weaken the energies, to exhaust the system. The necessities of hog-hunting call all a man's mental and bodily powers into full action; or, in the continual danger of the sport, his life would be the sacrifice. The Ghauts which the wild hog usually infest, are of immense height, and in parts nearly perpendicular, formed of ledges of scarp rock, down which the sportsman must not hesitate to push his steed, urging the noble Arab to spring from point to point, heedless of all save the object of his speed;

then, and not till then, when the spear of the hunter is dyed in the blood of the grim grey boar, and his steed, with streaming sides and expanded nostril, is panting by his side, does he review the ground he has passed in moments of excitement, and the Nimrod of the day trembles at the danger he so late defied.

The Governor's bungalow at Dapourie, is a beautiful residence, situated but a mile or two from Poonah. It has the advantage of possessing a good botanical garden, filled with the choicest Oriental and exotic plants. The soil of the Deckan, is remarkable, I think, for its congeniality to the growth of geraniums, the scarlet description flourishing most luxuriantly in the gardens of the cantonment.

The Poonah Auxiliary Horse, as a body of irregular cavalry, form a well-drilled and valuable local corps. They carry a spear, instead of the more common match-lock, and wear the Mahratta Puggree, or Turban, secured below the chin. This dress is easy, yet has an air of military compactness about it, which accords well with the handsome figures, and soldierlike bearing of the wearers.

Much has been said for and against the policy of organizing local and provincial corps, and of draining the regular army for European officers to command them. They have been stated to prove of little aid in times of general warfare, inasmuch as their removal on active service, may be considered as a breach of faith. This is a subject more suited to a military, than a woman's pen; I would only remark, as the result of personal observation, that the services of a portion of the Poonah irregulars, long stationed in Cutch, have been found highly valuable; and that at present, one detachment from Poonah, are actively employed with the advanced army in our north-western frontier, and another, with the reserve force of the Indus in Lower Sindh. They have been ever found to be a subordinate, intelligent, useful class of men; and while available for foreign duty, as their present position proves, are eminently valuable in times of local excitement, from their geographical knowledge of a province, and the resources, habits, and retreats of its inhabitants.

The natives of Poonah mould curious little toys of clay, descriptive of Hindoo castes, and the several employments of the people. The groups are characteristic, of good proportions, and well coloured ; and the figures being suitably attired, afford an admirable idea of native costume, and general appearance. The Palankeen and its Hindostan bearers—the women grinding the corn for family consumption—the Ayah nursing a European infant—and the Borah displaying his varied goods, are among the best specimens of the plastic art, as it is practised by the Poonah artists. Baskets and screens, woven of the sweet scented Kuskos grass, and adorned with gold and crimson velvet, and the emerald beetle-wing, are also pretty articles of fancy commerce ; together with bracelets and necklaces, carved ingeniously from odorous woods, linked with gold beads and ornamental wire.

The native city of Poonah, is of considerable extent, but its wealth and power are no more ; since its conquest by British arms, and the consequent humiliation of the Peishwah, the former splendour of this once important seat of Mahratta sovereignty has been lowered, until it now bears only the character of a common bazaar, filled with the articles in usual demand amongst the people. The power of the Brahminical priesthood has been humbled with that of their prince ; and even the splendid temple of Parbuttee, retains but few vestiges of its original splendour. The situation, however, of this temple of the Mountain Goddess,* is eminently beautiful, looking down from a lofty hill, on the smooth waters of a tank shining immediately at its foot, and surrounded by luxuriant gardens, rich in the empurpled clustres of the Deckan vine, and the dusky fruit of the sweet-juiced pomegranate. The neighbourhood of Poonah is deficient in subjects of interest ; the principal, perhaps, is a grove of beautiful mango trees, planted by the Peishwah, in expiation of the murder of his brother ; and the Ketuah Baug, a country seat of the same prince, situated about four miles from the city. This beautiful spot, is at present occupied by Signor Mutti, and is devoted to the production and culture of the Italian mulberry, intended as a nursery for the delicate and useful silk-worm. The dwelling-house itself is a beautiful building, supported on handsome Saracenic arches ; while the lovely grounds are adorned with cool Kiosks, and numerous jets of sparkling water. Signor Mutti's introduction of the silk-worm, is likely to effect considerable improvement in the condition of the Deckan Ryots ; and experience has already proved the quality of the silk produced, to be well adapted for manufactures of the finest texture. First, however, in the character of an energetic and scientific experimentalist, eagerly engaged in testing the agricultural capabilities of the Deckan, must be noticed Mr. Sundt, a gentleman by birth a Swede, and the protégé of Sir John Malcolm, with whom he travelled much, more particularly during his embassy to Persia. This talented individual possesses grants of land for the purposes already mentioned; and in most cases, his energy has been rewarded by complete success. Mr. Sundt has found, that three descriptions of cotton flourish admirably on the Deckan soil; these are the American, the Guzzeratee, and the Maltese. His grapes and exotic vegetables, are also very far superior to any produce of other grounds, and his experiments have proved that the American cochineal flourishes admirably; but on plants of the smooth description of Cactus only. The interest of the British public is now partially awakened, towards the condition of the Agricultural classes of their fellow-subjects in the East; and I trust that a freedom from prejudice, and a knowledge of facts, will ere long induce many to follow the admirable system of Mr. Sundt, and that Government will second their endeavours, until the wild rapacious Bheel shall become a peaceful cultivator—the dense jungles of towering bramble be cleared for useful produce, and the rich valleys, yield forth their golden crops.

* Parvati.

The condition of the Indian farmer, deserves our warmest commiseration; and sympathy will best be shewn in an earnest and well directed endeavour to elevate his character, and to relieve his wants. In olden times, sack, burn, and destroy, were our military watchwords; we endeavoured to enslave, or to exterminate the rebel spirits, whom necessity and outrage had awakened to the forlorn hope of defending their natural rights, against the alien and the stranger; but a system necessary at one period in the history of a conquered people, may be rendered dangerous in its application, when the social and moral condition of that people undergo varieties of change. In the case of British India, therefore, wisdom and observation instruct us, that the plough will support our interests and our cause, better than the sword; and the blessings of the former, once disseminated throughout the glowing land of our richest, and most fertile colony, the weapon of the warrior may rest in peace, and the teeming soil be rich in the seeds of harvest, rather than red with the blood of her slaughtered people. Then shall the rich valleys of the Concan, under the rule of a merciful and enlightened Government, look trustingly up to the embattled Fortress, and the mighty Ghaut; no longer fearing the devastating force of barbarous power; but hailing from the one, refreshment for her crops, and from the other, sure protection for her labouring peasants.

The recollection of Mr. Sundt, and his interesting objects, have betrayed me into a digression from the subject, which was a simple description of the beauties and peculiarities of Poonah, and its immediate neighbourhood. Having, therefore, with almost involuntary earnestness, sympathised in the objects of the general patriot, I may be allowed an attempt to interest the antiquarian, in a slight description of a very curious and ancient temple, little known, I believe, to the visitors of the Deckan.

Between the bridge of the Sungum, near Poonah, and the cantonment of Kirkee, a distance of about two miles, is an extensive plain, on which Sir Arthur Wellesley pitched his camp, during the celebrated battle of Kirkee. In riding across this plain on one occasion, my horse suddenly stopped at the edge of what appeared a simple excavation; dismounting, however, I discovered a singular cave temple, cut in the limestone rock. In the centre, a circle of rude columns, in the simplest style of Hindoo architecture, supported a block of the solid rock, below which knelt the sacred Nandi,* rough-hewn, and uncapparisoned. On either side of the outer circle, were two small cells, probably the abode of priests; and at the farther end, cutting off, as it were, a segment of the circle, a succession of square pillars, supporting the roof, formed a sort of cloistered avenue, about sixty feet long, terminating in a wall of evidently modern erection, concealing, probably, the sanctum of the god; the whole a rude and simple excavation, yet eminently curious, and well deserving the investigation of the antiquary. Few persons in Poonah are aware of the existence of such a temple, and I think it not impossible, that some graven date, or sculptured evidence of the past, might be found, wherewith to reward the labourer's research.

The great military road between the cantonments of Kirkee and Poonah, is excellent, and forms the pleasantest ride in the neighbourhood; the Sungum bridge, and the bank scenery of the river, is unusually pretty; and the varied groups of native peasantry, interest the observer in those pursuits of active life, without which, the fairest landscape is dull and incomplete.

* The sacred Bull of Siva.

Kirkee is a small but pretty cantonment, long the station of her Majesty's fourth dragoons, a corps whose social qualities among the officers, and excellent conduct of the men, can never permit their leaving India without the deep regret of every individual, who may have been associated with them, either as friends, or fellow-soldiers. A short time since, a small sum was raised by subscription, and the dragoons were given the permission of either building a church, or erecting a theatre, at Kirkee. The interests of the drama prevailed, and a very neat little edifice, decorated with appropriate scenery, and all the necessaries for stage effect, soon became a source of considerable amusement at the station. While the officers contributed their talents to the theatre at Poonah, the men tore passion to very rags at Kirkee; and a gaunt, red-whiskered sergeant of dragoons, might be seen attired in very appropriate female costume, melting in sentimental grief, over the pangs of unrequited love, or the heart-breaking miseries of perjured faith. Tragic and touching scenes having the preference, bathos reigned supreme; and some becoming authors, as well as actors, (their early lack of education compelling the employment of an amanuensis,) those who possessed a sense of the ridiculous in any great degree, would have found eminent amusement at the Kirkee theatre; while the multifarious duties of the orchestral band, really demanded sympathy, the practising energies of the performers, being equally divided between the arduous duties arising from a desire of excellence in three departments—military music, theatrical accompaniment, and gravest psalmody. The Dead March in Saul, might be equally required with the overture to Tom Thumb, or the hundredth psalm ; thus the melody of each was prudently poured forth in turn, a singular melange of incongruous subject.

During the hot season, a fine hill fort, called Singhur (or the lion's hold), situated about ten miles from Poonah, affords a cool and salubrious retreat from the scorching winds of the plain ; but possessing no accommodation beyond pitching ground for tents, the Mahabuleshwar hills is a more general resort. From Poonah, a dāk of bearers can be laid in any direction the traveller may desire, and as the road to the Ghauts does not allow the passage of a carriage, a Palkee forms the usual conveyance. The only station on the road is that of Sattara, whose heat and monotony have obtained for it the common sobriquet of "Sleepy Hollow." The cantonment is small, but beautifully situated, in a lovely vale, surrounded by towering Ghauts, the summits of several crowned with majestic and impregnable forts. The scene, unmarked by the usual characteristic of Indian landscape (the tall cocoa-nut tree), is fertile and richly-cultivated, the plain in many parts being enclosed with rich hedgerows. The fine roads leading through avenues of bright tamarind trees; the scattered bungalows, with their thatched roofs and flowery gardens, and the quiet herds feeding beneath the shade, would induce the traveller to believe he trod the soil of Devon's sunny vales, did not the grotesque ornament of the neighbouring temples, and the various incidents of the scene, shackle his imagination with the realities of a tropic scene. The Rajah of Sattara, an individual possessing considerable intelligence, has established an English school in the city, and has devoted much of his attention to the education of his daughter, on whose ceremonies of betrothment, he is said to have expended upwards of three lacs of rupees. *

* This Prince must be now spoken of as the ex-Rajah, having been lately dethroned by order of the British government.

The Dâk traveller, leaving Sattara in the evening, dawn sees him at the foot of the stupendous Ghauts, on which has been cut the road leading to the Mahabuleshwar Hills. Winding along the steep brows of lesser Ghauts, piled as it were to oppose the desecrating foot of man, the scene becomes rich in its features of sublime and fertile loveliness; each Ghaut being thickly wooded, from its pale purple and sunlit brow, to where the gathering and snowlike wreaths of fleecy clouds conceals its union with the Lowlands. On either side of the curving pathway, rich and graceful trees, festooned with a variety of blooming creepers, charm the eye; while about their knarled roots, as if hurled by the thunder-armed power of the giant storm, lie massive fragments of time-stained rocks, crushing the verdure on which they fell, until time has again, with tenderest touch, encouraged fragile and flowery weeds to spring from their dark clefts, and sun their sweet heads in the passing breeze.

Continuing onwards, increased heights sink to insignificant effects; magnificent views increase in their glorious wonders; successions of towering mountains, varied and fantastic, bearing fresh and glowing verdure, here crowned with thin vapour, there resting on the azure sky in bold relief, fascinate the traveller's attention, until he attains the summit of the Mahabuleshwar Hills, and an atmosphere cold, clear, and most invigoratingly delightful.

The spot chosen for residence, is computed to be four thousand five hundred feet above the level of the sea. Pretty Bungalows are erected, on eminences which command the most splendid combinations of scenery; and are interspersed with tents, the independent residences of many among the bachelor visitants to the Mahabuleshwar Hills. A Sanitarium affords comfortable accommodation to invalid officers, such persons being allowed the use of two apartments in it, at a monthly rent of twenty-five rupees. Near this spot, a simple obelisk has been raised to perpetuate the memory of Sir Sidney Beckwith, many years commander-in-chief of the Bombay Army. The domestic virtues of this amiable man, are eulogized in a few touching and appropriate lines, written by his widow.

The level ground of the Mahabuleshwar Hills, is covered with a tangled verdure, consisting principally of plants of fern and arrow root, which latter has somewhat the appearance of a tall white lily, with large, smooth, and bright green leaves. The jungle abounds with tigers, buffaloe, neil ghye, bears, wolves, elk, and every description of game; but hunting in these wild solitudes, is often attended with great danger, and sometimes with fatal results. Sydney and Elphinstone Points, are immense bluffs of rock, from which the most extensive and magnificent views are obtained of the rich Concan scenery, and its beautiful fortresses, crowning the summits of surrounding Ghauts. The sea is visible at a distance of thirty miles ; and the lovely gorges of the mountain-sides sparkle with innumerable cataracts, rushing with headlong violence to the placid streams, which wind among the rich pasturage of the sunny plains. About four miles from the Sanitarium, is the village of Mahabuleshwar, the source of the far-famed and very holy River Khrishna. The word Mahabuleshwar, in its divisions, signifies " the great and good God !" And over the sacred waters (which have two distinct sources) are large and curious temples, arched and columned, singular specimens of Hindoo architecture. In each, the stream issuing from the mouth of the Nandi,* is received into a tank of inconsiderable size, whence it flows in a serpentine course through a beautiful and fertile valley, until, joined by the various waters which flow down the wooded gorges of the neighbouring hills, it swells into a rapid and scarcely fordable river.

* Sacred Bull.

Few scenes are more lovely than the beautiful Valley of the Khrishna, as seen from the open Temples of Mahabuleshwar. The smooth and brightly gleaming waters, like a silvery thread, wind their quiet way between the richly wooded hills, which form a vista of fertile shelter to the grassy banks ; while the herds, feeding peacefully beside the sacred river, complete the scene, and afford a glimpse of pastoral beauty, the more fair and sweet, perhaps, as contrasted with the sublime mountain solitudes of the immediate neighbourhood.

The necessary supplies of life, are readily procured upon the hills, from a good bazaar, stocked with European articles ; the soil is highly favourable to cultivation, and several Chinamen possess gardens well stocked with English vegetables ; the potatoes, more particularly, being nearly equal to those of the Neilgherry hills ; the beef and mutton are also of superior quality, the latter fine-grained, and of the most excellent flavour.

The climate of Mahabuleshwar is frequently sufficiently cold to render fires necessary, and is found highly renovating to constitutions exhausted by a long residence in the sultry plains. Fogs, in the autumn months, are prevalent, but are not found to produce either unpleasant or dangerous effects.

The walks and drives about the hills, are numerous and beautiful; long avenues, shaded by magnificent forest trees, afford noon-tide shelter, and permit the visitor the unusual and safe indulgence, of a mid-day stroll beneath their shade; while here and there an opening in the rich foliage, affords a glimpse of the superb mountain-scenery around, arresting the step in admiration of its sublime and varied wonders. Bold peaks, towering and cloud-capt Ghauts, sparkling cascades, hill-forts, deep straths, and wooded glens, blend their magnificent effects in a succession of rich and glowing pictures, more wondrous and more grand, than even Italy with her bold Alps and smiling Pyrenees, can charm the traveller's eye withal. No snowy peaks, 'tis true, blushing in the rays of the sun-lit sky, form backgrounds to the scene; but veils of fleecy vapour, with mazy indistinctness, shroud the towering scarps of the eternal hills, while the clear atmosphere around, permits the eye to revel in the full majesty of these stupendous scenes, revealing the sun-lit valleys, and the quiet occupation of their peasants, as clearly as it does the dense jungle of the mountain side, crowded with its wild and savage denizens.

To the resident in Western India, the Mahabuleshwar hills are of incalculable value. They afford an invigorating retreat during the exhausting heat of the summer months; and the keen cold air of this delightful spot, re-strings the failing nerves, and plants fresh roses on the pallid cheek. The mind loses its presentiments of evil, and all the sad train of nervous and hypochondriac depressions, are over-powered by the new vigour of recovered health.

The finest fort in the Deckan, is the strong-hold of Purtabghur, situated on the summit of a Ghaut, over-looking the Mahabuleshwar hills, and the splendid scenery of the Southern Concan. Within the fort, is a temple of considerable sanctity, annually visited by the Rajah of Sattara. On the occasion of this spot being made a place of royal pilgrimage, it was, until a few years past, customary to offer up a human sacrifice to the dreaded goddess of destruction. The history connected with the fort is singular and horrible. Sevajee, the licentious son of a Mahratta chief, chafing at paternal control, abandoned his father's dependants, and gathering an armed force, scoured the valleys of the Concan, in search of plunder; opposed at length by the prince Abdullah Khan, Sevajee built and fortified Purtabghur, taking refuge in it for himself and followers. Abdullah encamped below its frowning battlements, trusting to force the submission of his antagonist; famine, as anticipated by his enemy, proving destructive to his troops.

Sevajee demanded an armistice, and pledging a warrior's faith, requested that Abdullah would alone and unarmed ascend into the fort, and grant the besieged a personal parley. Sevajee, attended only by his minister, awaited the approach of Abdullah at the portcullis of the fort. Apparently unarmed, the chieftain advanced, and courteously greeting Abdullah, requested permission to salute him after the fashion of his country. The wily traitor, armed with mailed gloves, folded his enemy in his arms, and with the power of a Hercules, rent him asunder. The followers of Sevajee, with loud cheers, then dragged the mutilated body of Abdullah to the temple, where he was at once beheaded on the altar of the sanguinary goddess, and his head elevated above the ramparts of the fort, to give notice to his troops of the horrible catastrophe. They, robbed of their leader, abandoned the siege, and many enlisted under the banner of the murderer, the most cunning or the strongest man among Pagan warriors, being ever the most approved.

The fort of Purtabghur is now abandoned, its European conquerors having left only a few Sepoys in charge, and some Brahmins being retained by the Rajah of Sattara, for the service of the temple. Fearful was the night in which we left the fortress of Purtabghur, after having arrived at this particular point in the tour, whose features I have faintly endeavoured to describe; dark rolled the thunder round the lofty hill, and bright was the minutest sculpture with the lightning's vivid blaze. After vainly endeavouring to proceed, we were constrained to pass the night in a Durrum Saulah, or house of accommodation for travellers, situated about seven miles from the fort. This place, indeed, like most others of its kind, accommodates the wayfarer with the shelter of four high walls, and a dirty floor ; but for all else he must trust to "time and chance,"—the time of his servants' arrival, and the chance of their bringing anything to eat, drink, or sleep on.

In due course, however, we arrived at the village of "Mahar," from thence intending to take boat to Bombay. Here it became necessary to embark in a Patamar, a crazy craft, about the size of a small fishing boat, with a deck artificially constructed by a partial flooring of bamboos, tied together and protected by an arched roof of the same, plaited with date leaves. Nails are unused in the manufacture of these boats, which are tied ingeniously together with coir ropes made from the fibres of the cocoa-nut tree. At the mouth of the Mahar river, we made Bancoute, a singular place, with fine sands and a pretty bay ; the travellers' Bungalow being erected on an elevated site, commanding a bold and extensive view. The rooms were large and clean; and the windows curiously formed of talc, which is found in the neighbourhood in great abundance, and is at once cheaper and more durable than glass.* From Bancoute, a sail of a few hours again landed us on the Bunder of Bombay, after an agreeable tour through the most interesting and beautiful scenery of the Deckan.

* Where talc is not procurable, oyster shells are frequently used for the windows of the Concan Bungalows; the effect is gloomy indeed, during the rainy season, a sufficient degree of transparency never being produced; however, as the windows are at other periods seldom closed, the oyster-shell arrangement is at least preferable to the matted frames which are sometimes used, to the exclusion of every ray of comfortable light.

CHAPTER IX.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE CONDITION OF WESTERN INDIA.

UNQUESTIONABLY, the present is the most interesting era in the history of our British possessions in India. The day of affected ignorance of their importance is past, and our political and commercial connection with the destinies of this great nation, commands the careful attention, not only of every philanthropist, but of every Patriot who desires the continued superiority of his country's power. Rapid intercourse, the result of improved science and political arrangement, has now drawn India (as it were) nearer to the shores of Europe ; and instead of months—long tedious months—passed like a blank in life's short course, a brief excursion through pleasant France, on the sunny waters of the Mediterranean, and among the ancient relics of gorgeous Egypt, carries the traveller at once to the palm-tasselled strands of glowing Ind. Day by day, therefore, does this intimate connection between the countries, make it more important, that the British public should learn to estimate the full value of this our richest colony ; and by means of intellectual and moral improvement, render the resources of India more available, by increasing the allegiance of its soldiery, and the attachment of the native people.

The capacity for agricultural production in India, cannot, I think, be doubted ; but the development of that capacity, must depend upon the intelligence of the community, and upon the industry which would be excited, by a liberal encouragement of its labouring peasants.

Notwithstanding all disadvantageous circumstances, India has now arrived at a point of civilization and improvement, which must progress. Our energetic support, our judicious guidance, would produce high advantages indeed to India, combined with valuable safety to ourselves; but, if our policy be to withhold this aid, her enlightenment may tend but to render her rebellious and independent;—a result eminently dissatisfactory, after the free expenditure of Britain's life and treasure, in her appropriation of the Eastern Empire.

Yet it is certain—and to those who think upon the matter at all, evident—that the increased information of the native gentry of the Presidency, the enterprise of the Parsee merchants, and the education of the youthful branches of native families of rank, will force, ere long, (if not freely yielded) that consideration, to which, as an important portion of the great human family, the injured natives of India have so undeniable a right.

Many of our advantages have been hitherto derived from the ignorance of the people of India; these advantages can only be continued, by our application of their intelligence. It will, therefore, be our best interest to direct that improvement which has now commenced, to render it available to our commercial objects, and to secure the alliance of an enlightened and grateful people, whom we shall have taught to recognise and to enjoy the blessings of civilization.

Our present position in India, as considered with reference to the general history of conquering nations, is a very peculiar one. The death of the great ruler of the Punjab, our military occupation of Sindh, together with the reduction of Kaubul and its neighbouring dependencies, have given us the prospect of extensive and important territorial acquisitions, in the richest portions of Upper Asia. Political affairs in the east, have, in fact, very lately undergone remarkable and unlooked-for variations. "Wars, and rumours of wars;" marchings, and counter-marchings; local treachery, and threats of distant invasion, have succeeded to long and "piping times of peace." The river Indus, hitherto considered the great natural boundary of our eastern possessions, has been now passed; our cantonments will soon, like the altars of Alexander, mark the scene of our triumphant advance; and the noble river, celebrated by the historians of a classic age, may, ere long, when the clash of arms has ceased, become the great channel of wealth and civilization, not only to the barren lands which skirt its shores, but also between the interior of Asia and the peninsula of India; while British influence may arouse, guide, and cherish agricultural and commercial industry, under the auspices of a peaceful, wise, and liberal form of government.

The "glory" of subduing thousands, is light in the scale of utility, when compared with the glory of rendering the conquered of our colonies a free and happy people; of giving them influence and knowledge, of securing to them the means of improvement in their condition; and of grafting on ancient prejudices, with a view to their ultimate removal, an acquaintance with useful arts, in connection with the moral principles and national creed of those, by whose force of arms India has not only been subdued, but rifled of her gold, her liberty, and her dearest hopes.

Never perhaps, was there a trust involving so great, and so heavy a responsibility upon any nation, as that which attaches to the British dominion in India; and daily is this country becoming more responsible, as our territorial conquest increases, and the happiness, politically and morally, of increasing thousands, is placed within our power. Apathy, to an incomprehensible degree, yet exists in England on this momentous subject ; although some few, and those foremost in the ranks of pure philanthropy, exert their voices to advocate the cause of degraded India. The power of opinion once preponderating in support of the improved condition of our fellow-subjects in the east, the result is certain ; this power alone has emancipated the Negroes, and it will also achieve the emancipation of the Hindoos. The one has been an exemption from the lash, and from the taskmaster—the other must be a deliverance from oppression, from tyranny, from ignorance, and from idolatry. England boasts now her “British Indian Society,” her “Aborigines Protection Society,” and other associations, advocating the extended scheme of universal benevolence ; the heart of every wise politician, and of every right-minded individual in the world, must respond to the sentiments which form their basis ; but unfortunately, the condition of India, the character of her people, the capacity of her soil, the fertilizing power of her noble rivers, are not yet fully appreciated, nor in general understood. She is spoken of, indeed, as "the brightest jewel in the British crown," but the incrustation on the jewel is not noted. The time is at hand, however, when our own safety will demand that this jewel should be polished; and were this not the fact, the spirit of conquest alone, we would hope, could not, in a Christian country, so far absorb all human sympathies, as to render us indifferent to the fate of those we conquer. British troops will ere long be subsidized in Sindh; and that in the midst of a starving population, on the banks of a noble river, flowing through a tract of more than 1700 miles in extent, and through a soil which with the least exertion, would produce abundantly, both for the support of its inhabitants and for foreign export; and yet, at present there is no agriculture, no knowledge of the arts of peace, and no stimulus of interest among the people. Can we permit the continuance of such a state of things as this? Can we, for example, note the mouldering state of the ancient Pattala?—can we see it in the occupation of British troops, and not seek to restore its manufacturing greatness? Can we throw open the highway from the fine port of Currachee, to the great mart of Skikarpoor, with its cashmeres, its indigo, its cotton, and its opium, and not labour for the civilization of the surrounding chiefs? Surely, none but enemies to humanity and mankind, could imagine any trust so grossly abused, or remain so totally insensible to every demand of justice and philanthropy. Our interest and our policy, alike require the adap-

*The modern Táltá. A city once celebrated among the cities of the world, for the beauty of its fine silks and woven garments, for its rich sculptures, and well stocked libraries; now a cluster of desolate ruins, of poor and miserable huts, where the art of the weaver, is confined to the manufacture of fabrics of the coarsest material.

tation of wise and efficient measures to the present condition of the people of India; inasmuch as while we move onwards, flushed with success, repelling encroachment, and securing territory; in tracts which we leave slightly guarded, the people of India are thinking for themselves, are overcoming prejudice, and are gaining knowledge. This progress is dangerous to our supremacy, unless we endeavour to assimilate the native community more and more to ourselves; to give them influence, and security; to rule them with mildness; to attach them by interest; and to admit them to a participation in the advantages we possess. Our rule in India, hitherto, has been by the sword; there exist no ties between ourselves and the Indian people calculated to attach them to us by the indissoluble bonds of either religious or political union. Could we, however, but identify their interests with our own in the government of their country, could we induce them to adopt a purer faith, then indeed should we be the benefactors of the conquered, and rulers to whom they would be bound by every sentiment of gratitude and affection.

The question of conversion to Christianity, is one to be treated of with great delicacy, and requires grave consideration on the part of all. The labours of the Missionaries engaged in Western India, (however distinguished for their piety and zeal,) have, I fear, but a very limited success, the causes of which it may be somewhat difficult to explain; but probably it is not venturing too much, when it is said that the bare announcement of the true religion is not sufficient to break down the mass of superstition which, from ancient times, has degraded the Hindoo character. Founded as our religion is upon miracles, and involving mysteries too deep for the human mind to grasp, it is scarcely to be expected that we, as conquerors, preaching to them those truths, should obtain at once a conscientious acquiescence in their belief of their divine origin. On the contrary, we find them maintaining a religion full of mysteries, in their estimation much more sacred, and older than our own: and at present, it does not appear that they are qualified, either by education, habit, or mental power, to examine that chain of testimony by which the truth of Christianity is proved, and by means of which other nations have become believers. The first emissaries of our religion had to contend, in many places, with difficulties not unlike those of India; but, as Dr. Paley has observed, "they possessed means of conviction which we have not, and had proofs to appeal to, which we want." We have only the bare statement of facts, true indeed in themselves, but unable to compel belief on the simple exhibition of them, because no miracles are wrought at the time, whereby to shew divine agency, and the power of divine authority, to overturn ancient superstitions. Everything presented to the mind on religious subjects now, requires time, and thought, and diligent investigation ; first, as to the historical testimony of the facts, and secondly, as to the fitness of the morality inculcated as coming from a divine source. We preach our religion before an ignorant and superstitious people, and expect almost instantaneous conversion : while experience testifies, that the great truths of natural religion must first be believed, respected, and applied, before the truths of revelation can make any satisfactory progress.

There is, I fear, reason to apprehend that in numerous cases wherein conversion is reported, the same is more among the lowest caste as the result of interest, than amongst those of higher caste, who have influence in society ; all of whom raise a barrier of outraged and excited prejudice against the preacher, instead of receiving his doctrines with candour and respect. The opinions of the learned Rammohun Roy, of Mr. Adam (himself a Missionary), of the gentle, benevolent, and intelligent Abbé Dubois, (also a Roman Catholic Missionary,) afford evidence of a similar nature, tending to prove that the task of conversion, in the present condition of the people of India, is hopeless; and that the efforts already made have failed to produce any general or enlarged effects. I believe that education alone will produce this good—that ignorance and prejudice must be assailed by intelligence—that their rank weeds must be cleared away by natural truth, and that the soil must be prepared to receive an exotic plant, ere we can hope to see it flourish and naturalize itself in a foreign clime. Were a sensible florist desirous of transplanting a rare and curious shrub to a distant spot, were his first labour not to clear that spot—to carry mould of a proper quality to improve the soil, so as to render it congenial to the plant, he could never hope that it would grow and flourish there. Is the human mind to be less tenderly treated than a delicate exotic? Can we expect novel tenets to take root and flourish in a soil choked with weeds? or the seed of God's truth to grow when scattered on a stony ground? Shall we not seek first to remove the obstacles which exist, and then to introduce the benefit desired?

Let us enlarge the means of intellectual improvement amongst the people of India; let us inform them on matters of science, of art, of literature, and of taste; let the English language be spoken in their schools; let English masters lead them in the paths of knowledge; let us attach them to us by gentleness, benevolence, and equity; and then, when superstition totters to its base, and the Pagan temples are forsaken by their votaries, the labours of the Missionary may crown the good work of native civilization; and India will indeed be the brightest jewel in the British crown, unsullied by a spot to dim its lustre. Unfortunately, it has been found, that the division of castes among the Hindoo people, has been the perpetual check to all union between them; and consequently the great support of the stranger's power. To enlighten the people would be to destroy this important advantage; consequently her conquerors have hesitated to do so. But we must now think and legislate for India in her future relations with us; and therefore on a more enlarged scale of policy. She will not always consent to be thus chained to our chariot wheels; her people will learn, and will assume attitudes of importance; progressive civilization will inevitably be the result of a more general and rapid communication with the shores of England; and with it the passive, the gentle, the enduring Hindoo, will demand his rights; and Britain will never have completed her duty, until the people of India shall be as free, as intelligent, and as industrious.

as those on our happier island, to whom the poor Hindoo, with justice, looks for protection and for hope.

Were any opinion that I could offer likely to be of the smallest weight, I would say that every native of the large territory of India should possess the advantages of an extensive national education—the means of producing which desirable end, appear to be the organization of a university in the Presidency, with subordinate schools, under the superintendence of a committee, selected and adapted for the responsible duties of such a vocation. Branch district schools should be established, where a system of education, suited to the wants and condition of the people, should be pursued; and where native teachers should preside, chosen from among the scholars of the college classes. Rewards of honourable distinction should be made the incentives to study, and no other discipline be exercised but that which affects the mind, and excites laudable exertion, arising from a proper spirit of necessary emulation.

The details of the system, the establishment of rules to secure respect for the prejudices of caste, until enlightenment shall render those rules unnecessary, may be easily arranged; * and then, day by day, (were such means employed,) prejudices would crumble beneath the progress of intelligence, our labour would be lightened, and the chain of native degradation loosened in every link.

Happily, the beautiful country of India, and its gentle inhabitants, have found some generous defenders; and the time is at hand, when we may justly hope that knowledge and wisdom, the equal right, if not the equal inheritance, of every portion of the human family, shall be shed abroad in India; and, as that glowing land has been long celebrated in the commerce of the world, for the natural treasures of her red gold and orient produce, so shall she become again great among the nations ; as distinguished for her commercial energy, her enlightened influence, her fidelity, her principles of morals, and her wisdom of legislation. The civilization of India will be a monument to British power, which will endure throughout the ages of the world ; not perishable as graven records, not crumbling as the pomp of sculptured art—" for the aspirations of gratitude, sent forth by a happy people, are heard at a much greater distance than the hurrah's of a conquering army : " and the voices of the educated, civilized, and protected people of British India, may, in future times, resound to the praise of that nation, who, to its eternal honour, let it be said, rested not after the triumphs of conquest, until it had introduced and cherished among the conquered, that knowledge of the useful arts, the valuable sciences, and the pure and elevated faith, which dignify and distinguish its own liberal and enlightened institutions.

* A similar system to this has, I believe, been considerably worked out in Bishop's College, in Calcutta, and with excellent success.

THE END.

LONDON:

BLATCH AND LAMFORT, PRINTERS, GROVE PLACE, BRUMPTON.

N. 5
Cat.
V.R. 22/9/76

"A book that is shut is but a block"

CENTRAL ARCHAEOLOGICAL LIBRARY

GOVT. OF INDIA
Department of Archaeology
NEW DELHI

Please help us to keep the book
clean and moving.
