PREFACE.

THE TÂRIKH-I-SORATH, or History of Sorath and Hâlâr, forming the western portion of Kâthiâwâd, was compiled by Ranchodji Amariji, Divân or prime minister of Junâgadh, about 1825, and gives a pretty circumstantial account of the factions and broils that disturbed these provinces during the lifetime of the author and his father. As a genuine native history, written by a man who took a leading part in most of the events he describes, and who was quite independent of English influence, it ought to possess some interest for all classes of readers.

The Persian MS. of the work was brought to my notice by the late Mr. Gokalji Jhâlâ, then Divân of Junâgadh, on my visit to that place in May 1869. Mr. Manilâl Govindrâm, now of the Bhâvanagar High School, also obtained for me a loan of a translation of it into Gujarâti, and made a careful version from it into English. When this was about complete I got a second Persian MS., and submitted both MSS. and the translation of the Gujarâti version to Mr. E. Rehatsek, who very kindly produced another translation, more in accordance with the Persian original than Mr. Manilâl's founded on the Gujarâti only. This lay past for some time, but a few years ago I began to print it, and Colonel J. W. Watson, of the Rājasthānik Court, Rājkot, whose knowledge of the country and its history as well as of the language of the original, eminently qualified him for doing so—very kindly agreed to revise the MS. and look over the proofs as the book passed through the press. The alterations he has made to bring it into accordance with the better copies of the original work in his possession, have been numerous and important.

It was intended to add a considerable amount of additional collateral information to the work as it passed through the press, but frequent—almost—constant—absence from the vicinity of any library, and the pressure of work which has frequently interrupted even the printing for long periods of time, have limited the additional matter to a brief introduction and a few notes scattered throughout the book, and amounting in all to about 57 pages.

I have only to add that it is to the offers of patronage of the work on the part of the Chiefs of Junāgaḍh and Bhāvanagar, that the publication of it is due.

INTRODUCTION.

The peninsula of Kāthiāwāḍ or Saurāshtra, lying between the gulfs of Kachh and Cambay or Khambhāt, and surrounded on the south and west by the Arabian Sea, is the holy land of Western India. It was known to the Greeks and Romans under the name of Saurastrēnē; the Muhammadans called it by the Prakritized name of Sorāṭh, and to this day a large district in the south-west, a hundred miles in length, still retains that name. Another district, quite as large, to the east of the centre, however, has long been known as Kāthiāwāḍ, from having been overrun by the Kāthīs, who entered the peninsula from Kachh, perhaps first in predatory bands in the thirteenth or fourteenth century; in the fifteenth the whole tribe was driven out of Kachh, and in that and the following century conquered a considerable territory. The Mārāṭhās, who came into contact with them in their forays, and were sometimes successfully repelled by them, extended the name of Kāthiāwāḍ to the whole province, and from them we have come to apply it in a similar wide sense, but by Brâhmins and the natives it is still spoken of as Saurâshtra.

The extreme length of the peninsula, from Goghâ in the east, to Jagator Dwârakâ in the west, is nearly 220 miles; its greatest breadth is about 165 miles, and its area 22,000 square miles, with an estimated population of about two and a half millions.

It is divided into 188 separate states, large and small, of which thirteen pay no tribute; ninety-six are tributary to the British Government, seventy to that of the Gaikwâd as the representative of the Marâthâs, and nine pay tribute to both; while of the latter three classes one hundred and thirty-two pay a tax called Zortalabi to the Nawâb of Junâgadh. The states are arranged in seven classes, with varying civil and criminal powers,—five of the larger belonging to the first class.

Kâthiâwâd is usually divided into ten provinces or prânts, of very unequal size:—

(1.) JHÂLÂWÂD, in the north, containing about fifty states, of which Dhrângadhâ, Limbdi, Wadhwan, Wankaner, Saelâ, Chudâ, and Thân-Laktar, are among the largest; originally it included Viramgaum, Mândal, and part of the Dhandhukâ district now under Ahmadâbâd.

(2.) MACHHUKÂNTHÂ, comprising Morbi and Mahâ, lies to the west of Jhâlâwâd.

(3.) HÂLÂR, in the north-west, derives its name from the Hâlâ branch of Jâdejs from Kachh, and embraces twenty-six states, of which Jāmnagar or Nawānagar is the largest; Rājkot, Gondal-Dhoraji, Dharol, Drāphā, &c., are smaller.

(4.) OKHĀMANDAL, in the extreme west, belongs to Barodā.*

(5.) BARADĀ or JETWĀṆ, along the south-west coast, is known also as Purbandar.

(6.) SORATH, in the south, is occupied by the Junāgaḍh State, and the two small holdings of Bāṇṭwā and Amrāpur; but the sea-coast from Māngrol to the island of Diu or Div is also known as Nāgher.

(7.) BĀBRIĀWĀṆ, so called from the Babriā tribe of Kolis, is a hilly tract in the south-east, divided into many very small states, or village holdings, and includes many villages belonging to the Gaikwāḍ of Barodā.

(8.) KĀTHIĀWĀṆ, near the middle, is a large district comprising Jetpur-Chital, Amreli, Jas-dhan, Choṭilā, Ānandapur, and fifty other smaller estates.

(9.) UND-SARVEYĀ, lying along the Śatruṅḡi river, and divided into small holdings.

(10.) GOHILWĀṆ, in the east, along the shore of the gulf of Cambay, is so named from the Gohil Rājputs, who are the ruling race in it. It comprises the Goghā district, belonging to the Ahmadābād Collectorate,—Bhaunagar, a first-class state, Pālitānā, Walā, Lāthl, and many others; and it includes the old division of the province called W ā l ā k.

Generally speaking, with the exception of the Thāṅgā and Māṇḍhav hills in the west of Jhālāwād, the Ālech and Dalāsā ranges in Hālār, the hill of Gop, and others, the northern portion of the country is flat; but in the south the Gīr range runs nearly parallel with the coast, and at a distance of about twenty miles from it, along the north of Bābriāwād and Sorath, turning northwards towards Gīrnār. Opposite this latter mountain, again, is the solitary Ośam hill, and then still further west is the Barādā group between Hālār and Barādā, running about twenty miles north and south, from Ghumli to Rāṇāwāv, near which iron ore was dug in early times. After the limits of Bābriāwād are passed a low range of hills succeeds the Gīr; these hills join those of Und Sarveya. There is also a fine cluster of granite peaks at Chamārdi, and the Śīhor and Khokhrā ranges in the south-eastern portion of Gohilwād.

The principal river is the Bhādar, which rises in the Māṇḍhav hills and flows south-west, falling into the sea at Navī-Bandar, in Barādā, after a course of about a hundred and fifteen miles in a direct line, everywhere marked by the lands near its banks being in a high state of cultivation. It is a saying in the districts through which it passes that it receives ninety-nine tributary streams. From the same hills rises another Bhādar, which flows eastwards past Rānpur and Dhandhukā into the gulf of Cambay or Khambhāt, and in its short course attains a considerable size.

The Âjī, perhaps the prettiest stream in the province, rises near Sardhār and runs northwards past Rājkot, receiving the Marī from the left, and falls into the gulf of Kachh near Dālabā, in Hālār. It is noted for the excellence of its water, and the gold dust found in small quantities in its bed.

The Machhu, from near Sardhār, flows north-west, through the district to which it gives name, past Wānkanār and Morbi, into the gulf of Kachh, near Māliā.

The Wadhvān and Limbdi Bhogāwās both rise in the Thāngā range, and flowing past Wadhvān and Limbdi respectively lose themselves in the Rāṇ to the north of the gulf of Cambay.

The Śātruñjī, from the Gīr range, receives a large number of tributaries, and passes Pali-tānā and Tālājā on its way to the entrance of the gulf of Khambhāt.

Saurāshtrā was doubtless at a very early period brought under the influence of Brāhmagical civilization, and, from its position at the extreme north of the coast line of Western India, it was the most accessible to influences from the West. As early as the reign of the great Aśoka of Magadha (B.C. 265-229) we find him inscribing his famous edicts upon the huge granite boulders at the entrance of the pass that leads from Junâgaḍh to Gīrnâr. If the reading in Strabo of Saraostos is really, as there is good reason to suppose, a corruption of some form of Saurâshtra, then it was included in the conquests of the Indo-Skythian kings, Demetrios the son of Euthydemos (B.C. cir. 190), and Menander (B.C. 144), who, he says, pushed their conquests eastwards and "got possession not only of Patalēnē, but of the kingdoms of Saraostos and Sigerdīs (or Sigertis) being the remainder of the coast."

Its shores were well known to the Alexandrian merchants of the first and second centuries, but there is considerable difficulty in identifying the places they mention. Dr. Vincent,[†] Lassen,[‡] and Col. Yule[§] have each attempted the task.

Lassen places the city of Surashtra at Junâgaḍh, and this is as probable a conjecture as perhaps any other that could be formed. Yule places it at Navi-bandar, which is very doubtful. If not Junâgaḍh or Vānthali, then Virâwal and Sīhor are the only two other sites that seem likely.

Bardaxima is located by Yule at Purbandar, perhaps from the resemblance of the name to Baraḍā; but Śrinagar, in the same district, is a much older place, and near it is a small village named Bardiyâ, which may possibly be a reminiscence of the Greek name.

Yule places the Barakê of Arrian at Jagat or Dwâarakâ; Lassen also identifies it with Dwâarakâ, which he places on the coast between Purbandar and Miyânî, near Śrînagar. Mula-Dwâarakâ, or the original site, was further east than this, but is variously placed near Mâdhupur, thirty-six miles north-west from Somanâth-Paṭṭan, or three miles south-west from Koḍinâr, and nineteen miles east of Somanâth. This last spot is called Mula Dwâarakâ to this day.

Astakapra, or Astakampura, Yule has quite recently identified with Hastakavapra, mentioned in a Valabhi copper-plate grant, and believed to be the old name of Hathab, to the south of Goghâ; at Gopnâth, Yule would have Papiké promontory.

The Horatæ are doubtless the people of Sorath, who have an inveterate propensity to sound the letter S as an H; and the Pandæ are the Pāṇḍava, dwelling in the north of the peninsula, in the district traditionally known as Panchâl or Deva-Panchâl, in which the chief town was Thâṇ, possibly the same as Theophila, which Yule places doubtfully a little further east, about Talsânâ, which, however, is situated in the sub-division of Jhâlâwâd known as the Nal Kânthâ, and not in Panohâla.

Piram island is probably rightly identified by Yule with the Baiones Insula of the ancients; Monoglosson he identifies with Mangrol.

Among the sacred places in the province, Prabhâsa Patṭan or Somanâth in the south, and Dwârakâ in the extreme west, are famous shrines of the Śaiva and Vaishṇava forms of Brâhmanism,—the former, one of the twelve great Śaiva Mahâlingas of India, and the account of whose destruction by Maḥmûd of Ghaznî is so familiar to every reader of history, is also the spot where tradition says the great Yâdava hero and demigod Kṛishṇa was slain; whilst Dwârakâ is one of his most celebrated shrines, where he is fabled to have saved the sacred books. Thâṇ, in the north, is an old site of sun-worship, and in the neighbourhood are several snake-shrines; and in the Gîris Tulasî Śyâm, a noted Hindû shrine, with a hot spring. There is also the shrine called Ghelâ Somanâth in Jasdan territory, which probably was the city of Somâpur said by Ferishtah to have been destroyed by Sultân Âhmad on his return to Gujarât after warring at Junâgaḍh.

Among their "high places" the Jains reckon Śatruñjaya as their great tîrtha or holy place, on the isolated mountain south of Pâlitânâ; Tâladhvaaja, commonly known as Tâlâjâ

T e k r i, the isolated hill at Tālājā; Ujjayanta or Raivata, the famous Mount Girnār in Sorath; and Dhañkā in Hālār. Perhaps the Lor or Lauhar hill in Bābriāwād is also intended by the Lauhitya of their sacred books. The Lonch and Kāmlo hills too in Und Sarveya are known to the Jains as Hastāgiri and Kadamgiri respectively, and are usually visited by pilgrims to Pālitanā.

Of the early history of the country we have but scanty notices. It was probably governed by satraps under Aśoka and the great Maurya kings. From coins that have been found pretty abundantly in different parts, it appears that for a period of about two centuries a dynasty known as the Kshatrapas, Sāhs, or Siñhas ruled,—perhaps at old Siñhor, Siñhur, or Siñhapura. Of this dynasty we learn from coins the names of some twenty-four princes, many of them with dates ranging from 72 to 250; the late Dr. Bhau Dāji, reckoning these dates from the Śaka era of A.D. 78, placed them between about A.D. 140 and 380.

Besides coins of the Kshatrapas, however, we have at least two inscriptions, unfortunately both somewhat defaced.

The first of these is on the famous rock between Junāgaḍh and Girnār, recording the repair of the dam there by Rāja Mahākshatrapa Rudra Dāman in the year 72 of their era. His father's name is obliterated, but that of his grandfather is given as Mahākshatrapa Chashtana.

The second is a short one on a pillar on the bank of the lake at Jasdhan, in the north of the Kāthiawād division. It has been translated by the late Dr. Bhau Dāji, and yields the names of five of the Sāh kings, viz. :—

1. Rāja Mahākshatrapa Bhadramukha Svāmī Chashtana;

2. Rāja Kshatrapa Svāmī Jayadāmān his son;

3. Rāja Mahākshatrapa . . . Rudra Dāmā, his son;

4. Rāja Mahākshatrapa Bhadramukha Svāmī Rudra Siñha, his son;

5. Rāja Mahākshatrapa Svāmī Rudra Sena, his son, ruling in 127.

Coins supply the remainder of our knowledge of these princes, but fortunately the first of them is mentioned in the inscriptions on some of the caves in the Bombay Presidency: as at Kārle, Nāsik, and Junnar.

From these materials Mr. Newton framed the subjoined Kshatrapa list of the kings, which is given, with the dates approved by Dr. Bhau Dāji, Professor Rāmkrishna G. Bhāṇḍārkar, and others :—

1. Nahapāna, A.D. 70.

2. The unknown king whose coin is given as figure 10 of the plate (p. 4, Jour. Bo. Br. R. As. Soc. vol. IX.).

3. (Syamo? tika.

23. Rudra Siṅha, son of Svāmī Jiva Dāmā, A.D. 328.
24. Yaśa Dāmā, son of Rudra Sāh.

25. Svāmī Rudra Sāh, son of Svāmī Satya Sāh.

From an inscription in the Buddha caves at Nāsik, it appears that the Kshatrapas were overthrown by Gautamīputra, the Andhrabhritya king of the Dekhan, about A.D. 330. Anarta or Saurāshtra must have belonged to them for a short time. But the Guptas of Kanauj were then rising into power.

"The bards relate that Rāma Rājā, son of Vāḷa Varsingji, reigned in Junāgaḍh and Vanthāl. . . . Rāma Rājā was of the Vāḷa race. It is said in Saurāshtra that, previous to the rise of the kingdom of Junāgaḍh-Vanthāl, Valabhīnagar was the capital of Gujarāt. The rise of Valabhī is thus told by the bards:—'The Gupta kings reigned between the Ganges and Jamunā rivers. One of these kings sent his son Kumārapāla Gupta to conquer Saurāshtra, and he placed his viceroy Chakrapalita or Chakrapāni, son of Parṇadatta or Prāṇdat, one of his Amīrs, to reign as provincial governor in the city of Vāmanasthāl (the modern Vanthāl). Kumārapāla now returned to his father's kingdom. His father reigned twenty-three years after the conquest of Saurāshtra and then died, and Kumārapāla ascended the throne. Kumārapāla Gupta reigned twenty years and then died, and was succeeded by Skanda Gupta, but this king was of weak intellect. His senāpati Bhatārka, who was of the Gehlotī race, taking a strong army, came into Surāshṭra, and made his rule firm there. Two years after this Skanda Gupta died. The senāpati now assumed the title of king of Saurāshṭra, and, having placed a governor at Vāmanasthālī, founded the city of Valabhīnagar. At this time the Gupta race were dethroned by foreign invaders."†

The Junāgaḍh inscription represents Parṇadatta as Skanda Gupta's viceroy; Chakrapālita as governor of a certain town, appointed to that place by his own father; and Bhaṭārka is mentioned in the Valabhī copper plates as Senāpati, while they represent Droṇa Siṅha, his second son, as having first assumed the title of king: Ind. Ant. vol. III. (1874).

The Guptas introduced an era of their own, usually regarded as commencing in A.D. 319, but possibly about A.D. 185-195. They doubtless arose to considerable power before they added Kāthiāwāḍ to their dominions: indeed, according to tradition, the conquest of the country was only effected by Kumārapāla Gupta early in the reign of his father. This was probably between 80 and 85 of the Gupta era.

Valabhī, identified with the buried city at Walā, in the east of the peninsula, eighteen miles north-west of Bhannagar, now became the capital of the new dynasty; and when the Gupta race were dethroned the Valabhi kings extended their sway "over Kachh, Lāt-deśa,* and Mālwa."

Bhaṭārka must have established himself at Valabhi about 160 Gupta Samvat; and of the dynasty he founded we have numerous copper plates, discovered at Walā and elsewhere in the peninsula, which, in recording grants to Brāhmanas and Bauddha ascetics, give also the genealogy of the family and important dates in their reigns. From such of these as have been translated† we gather that—

I. Bhaṭārka Senāpati was followed by four of his sons in succession.

II. Dharasena Senāpati, eldest son of Bhaṭārka.

III. Droṇasiṅha, Mahārāja, a second son of Bhaṭārka, "whose royal splendour was sanctified by the great gift, his solemn coronation performed in person by the Supreme Lord, the Lord Paramount of the whole earth."‡

IV. Dhruvasena I, a third brother, whose sister's daughter Duṇḍā was a Baud-dha devotee, and founded a monastery. The plate mentioning this is dated Samvat. 216 (evidently of the Gupta era), other two bear dates 207 and 210.

V. Dharapaṭṭa, the youngest son of Bhaṭārka, who was succeeded by—

VI. Guhasena, his son, of whom there are copper plates dated respectively 250, 256 (or 266), and 258. The second grants four villages to "the community of the reverend Śākya monks belonging to the eighteen schools [of the Hīnayāna], who have come from various directions — the great convent of Duḍḍā, built by the venerable Duḍḍā."

VII. Śrī Dharasena II., the son of Guhasena, of whom we have also grants, dated 272 and 277.

VIII. Śīlāditya (Dharmāditya) I., son of Dharasena, also made a grant to a Bauddha community dated G. 286.

IX. Kharagraha, his brother.

X. Śrī Dharasena III., son of Kharagraha.

XI. Dhruvasena II., younger son of Kharagraha.

XII. Śrī Dharasena (Balāditya) IV., second son of Dhruvasena, of whom there are two grants, both dated G. 326,—one to priests of the Mahāyāna school, belonging to a monastery erected by Divirapati Skandabhaṭṭa; and the other to Brāhmins of Śiṅha-pura,—the modern Sihor. A third grant is dated S. 329.

XIII. Dhruvasena III., the son of Derabhatta and grandson of Śīlāditya I.

XIV. Kharagraha II., the brother of Dhruvasena III.

XV. Śīlāditya II., son of Śīlāditya, the brother of Dhruvasena III. and Kharagraha II.

XVI. Śīlāditya III., his son, of whom there are two grants dated 356, and one 358.

XVII. Śīlāditya IV., son of Śīlāditya III., of whom a plate has been found dated S. 403.

XVIII. Śīlāditya V.

XIX. Śīlāditya VI.

It was either during the reign of Dhruvasena II., or of this last Śīlāditya, who was surnamed Dhruvabhatta, that the Chinese Bauddha pilgrim Hiwen-Tsang visited Western India, and apparently Valabhi itself (cir. A.D. 635-638). His account§ runs thus:—
 “The kingdom of Fa-lapi is about 6,000 li (1200 miles) in circuit; the capital has a circumference of 30 li (6 miles). As to the products of the soil, nature of the climate, the manners and character of the people, they are like those of Ma-la-p'o (Mālwa). The population is very numerous, and all the families live in wealth. There are a hundred whose wealth amounts to a million. The rarest merchandize from distant countries is found here in abundance. There are a hundred convents, where nearly 6,000 devotees live, who for the most part study the doctrines of the Ching-liang-pu (school or nikāya of the Sammatiyas) which adheres to the 'lesser translation' (Hinayāna).|| We count several hundred temples of the gods; and the heretics of various sects are exceedingly numerous.

"When the Tathāgata (Buddha) lived in the world he travelled often in this region. Wherefore in all the places where the Buddha rested King Aśoka raised pillars in honour of him, or constructed stūpas. We observe at intervals the monuments that mark the places where the three past Buddhas had sat, performed deeds, or preached the law.

"The kings of the present age are of Tsa-ti-li (Kshatriya) race; all are nephews of king Shi-lo'o-tie-to (Silāditya) of Mālva. At present (about A.D. 636) the son of king Silāditya of Kie-jo-ka-she (Kanyakubja), has a son-in-law called Tu-lu-p'o-po-tu,† Dhruvapaṇu.* He is of a quick and passionate nature, and his intellect is weak and narrow: still he believes sincerely in 'the three precious things.'† For seven days every year he holds a great assembly at which he distributes to the multitude of recluses choice dishes, the three garments, medicine, the seven precious things, and rare objects of great value. After giving all these in alms, he buys them back at double price. He esteems virtue and honours the sages, he reverences religion and values science. The most eminent holy men of distant countries are always objects of respect with him.

"At a little distance from the city there is a great convent, built long ago by the care of the Arhat Osh-lo (Āchāra). It was there that the Bodhisattvas Te-hoe (Guṇamati), and Kien-haei (Sthiramati) fixed their abode and composed several books which are all published with praise."

"On leaving this country he went about 700 li (140 miles) to the north-west, and arrived at the kingdom of O-nan-t'o-pu-lo. The kingdom of (O-nan-t'o-pu-lo) Ānandapura has a circuit of about 2,000 li (400 miles); the circumference of the capital is a score of li (5 miles). The population is very numerous, and all the families live in wealth. There is no (native) prince. The country is dependent on Ma-la-p'o (Mālwa), which it resembles in the products of its soil, nature of the climate, written character, and laws. There are a dozen convents, counting somewhat under a thousand devotees, who study the doctrine of the Ohing-liang-pu (nīkāya or school of the Sammatīyas) belonging to the

Such is the account of the Chinese pilgrim. The convent of 'Oohe-lo, which he mentions as being in the vicinity of Valabhi, Dr. Bühler has found mentioned in a grant of Dharaśena II., as founded by Atharya, not "Āchāra," as Julien has transliterated the Chinese name.

The Anandapura here mentioned is probably the same as that referred to in the Kalpā-Sūtra of the Jainas, as one of their early centres of learning, and where that work was composed by Śrī Bhadrabāhu Svāmī, in the year 980 of their era, during the reign of Dhruvasena II., who had just then been deeply afflicted by the loss of his beloved son Senāgaja. M. Vivien de Saint-Martin, following Stevenson, places it outside the peninsula—at Baḍnagar, or Vaḍanagar, in northern Gujarāt, about twenty miles east-south-east from Siddhpur. From the connection in which it occurs, however, we might expect it rather to be within the peninsula; and, though the distance does not agree with Hiwen-Thsang's, there is still a place called Ānandapura, fifty miles (250 li) north-west from Valabhi, which was very probably in early times the capital of a province including parts of the modern

Jhālāwād, Kāthiāwād, and Hālār. This gains support from the mention of Dhruvasena of Valabhī, who must have been closely connected with Ānandapura to lead the writer of the Kalpa-Sūtra to refer to his family afflictions; and the accuracy of the latter is corroborated by Dr. Barns's copper plate, stating that Śrī Dhara-sena IV. was Dhruvasena's second son.

How the Valabhī dynasty ended we do not exactly know. We see that in the eighth century it still held Sorath, and even northern Gujarat. Tradition is almost unanimous in asserting that a Śīlāditya was overthrown and slain by a foreign invader. Merutunga, the Jaina chronicler, gives a legendary account of its destruction. A Mārwāḍī, he says, from Pāli had settled at Valabhī and attained to great wealth. Śīlāditya forcibly took the jewelled comb of this man's daughter to give to his own daughter, which so offended the Mār-wāḍī that, to be revenged, he went to 'the Mlechha country' and offered the king an immense reward to destroy Valabhī. The Jaina priests had warning and took to flight, carrying their favourite idols with them, and by this Mlechha lord Valabhī was utterly destroyed in Samvat 375. But this date cannot be correct, whatever be the epoch from which it is reckoned. Moreover, Śīlāditya VI. may not have been the last of the dynasty, so that if Valabhi was destroyed by a foreign it was probably by a Muhammadan invader, from or through Sindh—not earlier than 750 A.D., and possibly later. In an inscription from Barodâ of Râja Karka II., dated Śaka 734, or A.D. 812, it is said that under Karka I. Saurâshtra had “lost its appellation of Saurâjya from the ruin that had fallen upon it.” This destruction of the country may refer to forays by the same invaders in the eighth century, about the time when Vana Râja founded the Châvaḍâ kingdom of Anhillavâḍa, in northern Gujarât.

— Tradition says that on the fall of Valabhi the Vâlâ governor of Vâmanasthali became independent. Râja Râma had no son, but his sister was married to the Râja of Nagar Thathâ, in Sindh, who was of the Sammâ tribe. This sister's son was named Râ Gârio, and Râma Râja bequeathed the kingdom of Junâgaḍh-Vanthali to this nephew, who was the first of the Chuḍâsamâ Râs of Junâgaḍh. This Râ Gârio, the grandson of Rai Chuḍa, is said to have extended his dominions into Upper India, conquering Kanauj, Gwâlior, and Dohad, in Mâlwa.

There were petty kingdoms, however, established in various parts of the peninsula, as at Dhank, Deva Pattan, &c., of the history of which we know but little. The Châvaḍâs and Solankis of Anhillavâḍa Pattan made frequent inroads against these chiefs, but do not seem to have ever permanently subjugated the western portions of the country, where the Jethvās and Chudāsamās held sway, the latter till the fifteenth century, when they were reduced by Mahmūd Begada in 1469-70.

The narrative of Ranchoḍji son of Amarji, the Diwān of Junāgaḍh about the commencement of the present century, begins at a much latter date, but cursorily notices the dynasty of the Chudāsamās. It is in reality a chronicle of his own times, and will be found not devoid of interest.

This poorest of Nāgars, Ranchodji, the son of Amarji Diwān, humbly informs those who examine histories and peruse chronocles that, as many accounts written concerning the Shāhs of India and of Gujarāt are well known, it seemed useless to repeat what has already been narrated. Accordingly, from a feeling of attachment to his native country, he will confine his account to the states of Junâgaḍh and Hāllār, and the affairs of other Rājās as it has come to his knowledge from the oral statements of intelligent men, and from written information.

DESCRIPTION OF THE SĪRKĀR OF JUNĀGAḌH.

The fort of Junâgaḍh is called in Sanskrit Karaṇa Kubja,* but as an account of it is given in the Prabhāsa Khaṇḍa of the Skanda Purāṇa I shall describe its present state only. The citadel, called U parkoṭ, is strongly built of stone, and is situated in a valley at the foot of Mount Gīrnār; it has eighty-four turrets, two gates, and two wāvs†—one of the latter called Aḍi, and the other called Chaḍi,—built by Rāja Nōnghān's slave-girls.‡ There is also a kuvo (or draw-well) excavated by Nōnghān and named after him. The stone dug out to form the fosse around the fort served for the construction of the towers and battlements; and, in case of a siege, there is a subterranean passage leading into the fort on the east side, which might be used to convey provisions to the garrison.

There is a tradition that the U parkoṭ, or fort, was built by the Yādava Rāja Ugarasena, § when he fled from Mathurā in dread of Kāla Yavana Shāh of Khorāsān, and came to the Sorath country. It is said that in Samvat 1507 (A.D. 1450) Rāja Maṇḍalik repaired the fort of Uparkoṭ. || Afterwards, in the reign of Shāh Akbar, A'isa Khān came from Sindh to be the Subāhdār, and built the wall of the city in Samvat 1690 (A.D. 1633) with a hundred and fourteen turrets and nine gates,—four of which § The Gujarāṭi translator, Maṇishaiṅkara Jataśaiṅkara Mujaṃundār, adds a note here, that 'he had learnt from Rāpi Magā, the Vahivanchās (or keeper of the genealogies) of the Chuḍāsamā kings, that at Junāgaḍh, on the Revatāchal, there ruled a king Revata, who gave his daughter Revati to Baladeva, the brother of Śrī Kṛishṇa, and bestowed this fort in kanyādān, or marriage dowry, on the Yādava Baladeva.' This was doubtless derived from the Harivamśa. It is there said that Ānartta was the son of Śaryāti, and Ānartta's son was Reva, who ruled the country of Ānartta—a part of Surāshṭra, 'bounded on one side by the sea and on the other by Arūpa, with Girivara (Girnār?) for its fortress.' Raivata Kakudmin was the eldest of the hundred children of Reva, and succeeded him on the throne of Kuśasthali. This prince went one day, accompanied by his daughter Revati, to the abode of Brāhma, where for a little while (of the gods, but really many human ages) he assisted at a concert of Gandharvās. On returning he found his capital occupied by the Yādavas and named Drāvaṭi. Raivata thereon gave his daughter to Balarāma and retired as a devotee to Mount Meru. (Harivamśa, ch. 10, 98, 111, 112, and 155.) As Raivata is the proper name of Girnār, this reads as if intended to be understood as an allegory.—ED.

were kept open, and five closed. In Samvat 1718 (A.D. 1661) the fort was renovated and improved by Mirzâ A'isa Tor Khân.

Round the city are tanks bearing the following names :—Khokhariyâ, Jhâbariâ, Pari, Setha, Vâgheśvari, Jamiyal, Śâ, Kunvâra, Varsâ, Vândrâvana, &c.; there are also kunḍs, as the Brahmakunḍ, Sarasvatikunḍ, [Dâmâkunḍ, Pâtâkunḍ,] Khâsi Kunḍ, and others.

The suburbs around the city are named Khamadrol, Harâ, Mâdapur, Jošipur, Daulatpur, Tenbawâḍi, Dhârâgar; there is also the place Bâra Shahîd, or graves of the twelve martyrs who fell in the battle with Râja Jayasîṅha† in the year S. 1395 (A.D. 1338). There are also gardens, such as the Baśâratbâgh, Sirdârbâgh, the Bahâdurbâgh, and others, which are always fresh, blooming, and noted for their excellent fruits, as rayanas,* custard-apples, guavas, and especially mangoes.

The Nâgar Brâhman, —who commit to memory the glorious Veda, study religious books, and, if so minded, are able by a single glance of protection to preserve others from destructive calamities, —in consequence of the vicissitudes of the times, the attacks of the Musalmân and the Dekhani armies, are themselves now fallen from —their former rank of zamindârs of Vadanagar, Viśalnagar, Tharād, Sāthodar, &c. to that of beggars. These, as well as the Brahmakhātris, who were as skilled with the sword as they themselves with the pen, were brought hither by the Rājās of Junāgaḍh. Both these castes enjoyed special privileges secured by pariwānds, and by a stone inscription set up in the middle of the bāzār, exempting them from paying various taxes. These rights are still continued, [but the stone inscription is not now to be seen].

In this country have been settled from time immemorial—Girnāra Brāhmaṇs, Ahers, Khānts, Kolis, Parmār Rājputs, Vāghelās, Vājā Rājputs, Chuḍāsamā Rājputs, Sarasvatī and Soratha Brāhmaṇs, as well as the Surthī people. There are also Lohānās and Bhāṭiās, whom king Noṅghan brought from Sindh. The governors and Nāibs of the Ahmadābād and Dihlī Sultāns maintained Sayyids, Baluchis, Lodis, and Afghāns in various offices, paying them salaries and pensions; but the cultivating classes immigrated from Gujarāt.

Mount Gīrnār lies to the east of the city: it vies with the sky in height, and its huge mass causes the earth to tremble under it:—

Its pinnacles touch heaven's lofty face,
 Its rocks the earth's foundation form;
 Ever in bloom are the bushes that wave on its sides,
 With fruits its trees are laden heavily.

The top of the mountain is adorned by the temple of Śrī Gīrnārī Nāth, which is visited by Hindus from all quarters. There are abundant springs of water, many fruits, and various and useful vegetables, as well as countless medicinal plants. The springs of Gaumukh and Kamandala vie with Kawther, and Bhimākunḍ Sākara-kuvo, and Hāthipaglā with the Salsabil of Paradise in sweetness.

The three temples opposite the fort or Devakot were erected by two Baniā brothers, Vastupāl and Tejahpāl. Tradition runs that a widow, on paying a visit to her guru, was told that she would give birth to two famous sons; but a person present objected that as she was a widow she could have no offspring. A camel-driver, however, who was sleeping near, happening to overhear the conversation, immediately got up, seated the woman on his camel, and took her to his home, where in due course of time she was delivered of two infants, one of whom was named Vastupāl, and the other Tejahpāl, who built these temples in Samvat 1288† (A.D. 1231).

The large temple near the Bhimākunḍ was built in Samvat 1519 (A.D. 1462), and consecrated on 15th Kārtik by Rāja Satarath. The fort and the chambers were built of black stone by Rāo Khengār of Junāgaḍh. He built also an idol-house with eighty-four diṣkhāns (small rooms) for pilgrims; and, though it cannot be called a house of God, no one is outside God's house.

It is said that five thousand years ago, when Nemināth† of the Yādu tribe heard the cries of the sheep, pigs, and buffaloes that had been collected for a banquet, he imagined they were calling for justice, and accordingly he set them at liberty, but himself retired from this wicked world to Mount Girnār, where he became an ascetic, on the spot where a temple was afterwards built in Sāṃvat 1333 (A.D. 1277), during the reign of Rāja Maṇḍalik.

From Jyṇāgaḍh to the Chillah of Datātri on the mountain, which pilgrims call Guru Datātri, and the Musalmāns the shrine of Shāh Madār, the Jogis the footprint of Gorakhnāth, the Śrāvaks the seat of Nemināth, and others that of Pārśvanāth, a road was constructed in Sāṃvat 1882§ (A.D. 1826) by a merchant of Diva (Diu) bandar named Sanghaji. From the gate of the fort up to the maṇḍap of Śrī Girnār Mātā there are 1096 stone steps, and from Gaumukh to Hanumāndvārā there are 968.

To the south of Girnār is the Chillah of Jamiyāl Shāh, which is visited by pilgrims from great distances, who profess to derive great benefits from their visit. The Sûrajkuṇḍ to the north, the cell of Kālikā, the Oghaḍ Pāduka, and the Maddhi Bhārathi on the east side, are noted for their miracles, and at each devotees sit like lions intent on hunting the gazelle of salvation.

• At the foot of the mountain on the west side, which may be compared to the approach to the throne for the constant worship of God, is the temple of Śrī Bhavanāth, Paithesvar, or Mahādeva, which is visited twice a year by bands of Atīts and pilgrims, who walk round it, and bring to the fair, as articles of trade, arms, shawls, jewels, and other goods.

There are various rest-houses for travellers along the ascent to the mountain, which are named Pāñchapāṇḍava, Chodiya Parab, Kāli Parab, Dholi Parab, Māli Parab, Suvāṇḍi Parab, so called because a female pilgrim was there delivered of a son, the name signifying "the Rest-house of good delivery."

To the west of Gīrnār are also situated the temples of Śrī Vāgeśvarī Mātā and Dāmōdar Rāya, with the Vageśvarī Kuṇḍ and Dāmōdar Kuṇḍ. In the latter the bones of corpses melt. The Revati Kuṇḍ is always full of water, and from the sands of the Suvarṇarekhā gold was washed in ancient times.* It flows from the mountain, and it is also the common belief that there exists on the mountain a spring concealed from human eyes, called Raskup, which possesses the property of changing everything into gold, and the following legend is told of it:— Not very many years ago, a Brâhman having lost his way, and being thirsty, tied his gourd to a rope when he arrived at this spring, intending to draw water, when all at once he heard the words "Bhar Raikâni nâmin," i.e. "Fill in the name of Raikâ." In spite of astonishment he quenched his thirst, again filled the gourd, went to the town, and, suspending it on a nail in the house of a blacksmith, an old acquaintance of his, who lived on the public way, he went off on some business. It happened that a few drops of the water fell on the anvil and hammer, which were beneath the gourd, and changed them into pure gold; whereupon the blacksmith made good use of so splendid an opportunity of bounty from the invisible world, by transmuting into gold every piece of iron he had in the shop. In this way he became as rich as Qârûn. ¶ When the Brâhman returned he perceived that his gourd was empty, but the house full of gold; and on asking the blacksmith for his name the reply was Raikâ. Accordingly he said, "Your deposit you have received."

* This belief probably arose from the reddish-yellow grains of mica with which the soil abounds.

Hemistich :—What is your fate will overtake you, sure!

¶ The Gujarâti has Kubera, the god of wealth.

It is said that the blacksmith gave a nugget of gold to the Brâhman; but God knows best.

In the fort there are two large cannon, taken with other spoils from the Portuguese of Diu; they were cast in Egypt A.H. 937; one of them is eleven, and the other nine cubits long.

On the top of the mountain the following localities also are remarkable:—Hanumândvârâ, the Pâduka of Râmânand, Bhairavajap, Borâdevî, Jata-Śaṅkara-Mahâdeva, Jadeśvara, Siddhakarani Mâtâ, Muchhakanda Râjrâjesvara Mahâdeva, and many others not necessary to mention.

During the lapse of time, the fort of Ūparkoṭ was deserted, but was taken possession of in Samvat 1804 (A.D. 1747) by Mânsiâ Khât, who became the source of much trouble. Afterwards it was made a choki, but was on several occasions occupied by Arabs, whom the Navâb Sâheb succeeded in expelling.

The length of this Subâh, from the port of Ghoghâ to Arâmrâ, is one hundred and two kos; and its breadth, from the port of Diva to Sardhâra, is seventy-two kos. Some say that the government of the Chuḍâsamâ Râjputs extended as far as the town of Burad, situated on the banks of the Sâbarmatî near Khambayat, and that it was called the government of Sorath.

In this Sirkâr there are 500 mâlguvâri villages (with 37,200 houses and 120,060 men), paying chauth, which are well established, and the neighbourhood of the fortress is also populous. The forts of Majewadi and Kadiâ are flanked by four towers. The revenue, including Bântwa, amounts to eight lākhs of rupees. In most of the mahāls the revenue was assessed by a rough guess (made by inspecting the standing crops), which system is in Hindi called dhāl; but in a few mahāls the Government share of the produce is taken in the grain-yard. Bero [vero, land-tax] is levied on every plough. Sipāhis and Sayyids and Nāgars pay no sakāt [customs dues]. The current *kori Nāgher Parganâ is the Ohândshâhi or Pādshâhi and the Divi rupee. The Parganâs are Sâlem, Bantthali, Kutianâ, Bhaḍ Mlârî, Aliah, Biârej, Chorvâḍ, Bandar Verâval, Patan Div, Sutrapâḍa, Kodiânâ, Una, Delwâḍâ, and collective Parganâs :—Mangrôl, Jetpur, Bandar Jhânâpoli, Rânpûr, Bagasrâ, Bilkhâ, Sil Bandar, Verâval, and Amreli.

[Junâgadh, 'the old fort,'†—anciently Girinagara,—is a place of great antiquity and historical interest. We find it visited in the seventh century by the indefatigable Chinese Buddhist traveller Hiwen Thsang,‡ whose journal runs thus :—

"Leaving the kingdom of Valabhi (near Bhaunagar), Hiwen Tshang went about 100 miles to the west, and reached the kingdom of Su-la-ch'a (Saurāshtra). This realm is nearly 800 miles in circuit. The capital has a circumference of six miles, and upon the west side (the country) touches the river Mo-hi (Mahi). Its inhabitants are very numerous, and all the families are wealthy. The country is subject to the kingdom of Valabhi. The soil is impregnated with salt, and its flowers and fruits are few. Though heat and cold are equally distributed over the year, storms of wind never cease. Indifference and coldness characterize the manners; the people are superficial, and do not care to cultivate learning (nor the arts). Some follow the true doctrine, and others are given to heresy. There are some fifty convents, where they count about three thousand recluses (the most part of the school Shang-tso-pu), who study the doctrines of the (Ārya) Sthavira sect, which holds by the 'greater translation' (Mahāyāna). There are a hundred temples of the gods (Devalayas), and the heretics of different sects live together. As this realm is on the way to the Western Sea, all the inhabitants profit by the advantages the sea affords, and give themselves to trade and barter."

"At a short distance from the (capital) city rises Mount Yeu-shen-ta (Ujjanta§) upon the top of which a monastery is established. The chambers and galleries have been mostly hollowed out in the face of a scarped peak. The mountain is covered with thick forests, and streams from the springs surround it on all sides.|| There holy men and sages walk and fix their abode, and thither resort crowds of Rishis endowed with divine faculties."

Of the Buddhist convents he speaks of there are still evidences. On the Uparkoṭ there is a very large half-ruined masjid, near which a curious excavation was discovered about ten years ago and opened up. It consists of a hall and a neat tank or bath, with a second story or galleries above. The hall has six principal pillars with very elaborate capitals ornamented with groups of human figures, mostly females. And again, outside the Uparkoṭ, both to the north and south, in the sandstone of which it is formed, there are numerous excavations of great age; whilst, at a short distance, the masjid at Mahi Ghaḍechi is built above a Buddhist cave-temple having still two pillars and two pilasters in front, with lions rampant as brackets outside the scarcely formed capitals. There are also numbers of Bauddha caves near Bâwâ Pyârâ's Maṭh.

But about half a mile to the westward of the town, at the entrance of the dell or valley leading in between two of the hills that girdle the mighty and sacred Girnâr, is the antiquity of Junâgadh—the rock inscribed with the edicts of Aśoka Skandagupta and Rudra Dâma. This remarkable lapidary monument of antiquity seems to have been first described by Colonel Tod, who saw it in 1822, and remarked the similarity of the characters upon it to those of the Dīlhi Lāt and the Buddhist caves; but his Travels were not published till 1839, and it was the Rev. Dr. J. Wilson who first obtained a transcript of it, a copy of which was forwarded to Mr. James Prinsep, of Calcutta, early in 1837, who translated it.

These inscriptions contain fourteen paragraphs, tablets, or 'edicts' of Aśoka, the great Buddhist emperor of India, who ruled about 262 to 226 B.C., and who constantly styles himself "Rāja Pñiyadarśi."

They have since been retranslated and commented on by Professors H. H. Wilson, E. Burnouf, C. Lassen, and Dr. H. Kern. The following are the best translations now available. Those who wish to see full transcripts, &c. must consult the Antiquities of Kāñhiāwād and Kachh (pp. 95 to 127), or Indian Antiquary (vol. V. pp. 257-276).

Translations of the Aśoka Edicts.

I. "This is the edict of the beloved of the gods, the Rāja Pñiyadasi. The putting to death of animals is to be entirely discontinued, and no convivial meeting is to be held: for the beloved of the gods, Rāja Pñiyadasi, remarks many faults in such assemblies. There is but one assembly, indeed, which is approved of by the Rāja Pñiyadasi, the beloved of the gods, which is that of the great kitchen of Rāja Pñiyadasi; every day hundreds of thousands of animals have been slaughtered for virtuous purposes; but now, although this pious edict is proclaimed, that animals may be killed for good purposes, and such is the practice, yet, as the practice is not determined, these presents are proclaimed, that hereafter they shall not be killed."¶

II. "In the whole dominion of king DevānāmpriyaPiyadarsin, as also in the adjacent countries, as Chola, Paṇḍya, Satyaputra, Keralaputra, as far as Tāmraparṇa, the kingdom of Antiochus the Grecian king, and of his neighbour kings, the system of caring for the sick, both of men and cattle, followed by King Devānāmpriya Piyadarsin, has been everywhere brought into practice; and at all places where useful healing herbs for men and cattle were wanting he has caused them to be brought and planted; and at all places where roots and fruits were wanting he has caused them to be brought and planted; also he has caused wells to be dug and trees to be planted on the roads, for the benefit of men and cattle."*

III. "King Piyadasisays: This was ordained by me when I had been twelve years inaugurated in the conquered country—that among those united in the law, whether strangers or my own subjects, quinquennial expiation shall be held for the enforcement of moral obligations, as duty to parents, friends, children, relations, Brāhmanas, and Śramanas. Liberality is good; non-injury of living creatures is good; and abstinence from prodigality and slander is good. The Assembly itself will instruct the faithful in the virtues here enumerated, both by explanation and by example."†

IV. "In past times, during many centuries, attacking animal life and inflicting suffering on the creatures, want of respect for Brāhman and Śramanas, have only grown greater. But now, when King Devānāmpriya Pṛiyadarśin practises righteousness, his kettledrum has become a summons to righteousness: while apparitions of chariots of the gods, and apparitions of celestial elephants, and fiery balls, and other signs in the heavens showed themselves to the people. In such a manner as has not been the case in many centuries previously, now, through the exhortation of King Devānāmpriya Pṛiyadarśin to cultivate righteousness, has the sparing of animal life, the gentle treatment of creatures, respect for relatives, respect for Brāhman and monks, obedience to father and mother, obedience to an elder, grown greater. This and many other kinds of virtuous practices have grown greater, and King Devānāmpriya Pṛiyadarśin shall cause this practice of virtue to increase still more, and the sons, grandsons, and great-grandsons of King Devānāmpriya Pṛiyadarśin shall also cause this culture of virtue to increase; standing steadfast in righteousness and morality until the destruction of the world, they shall exhort to righteousness; to exhort to righteousness is surely a very excellent work, while from him who is immoral no practice of righteousness is to be expected. Increase, therefore, in these things, and no diminution, is good; for this end has this been written; may they attend heartily to the increase hereof, and not aim at the diminution of it! King Devānāmpriya Priyadarśin has caused this to be written twelve years after his inauguration."†

V. "The beloved of the gods, King Priyadasi, thus proclaims: Virtue is difficult of performance, therefore much good is to be done by me, and my sons and grandsons, and other my posterity (will) conform to it for every age. So they who shall imitate them shall enjoy happiness, and those who cause the path to be abandoned shall suffer misfortune. Vice is easily committed; therefore Dharma Mahāmātra (or great officers of morals) are appointed by me, in the thirteenth year of my inauguration, for the purpose of presiding over morals among persons of all the religions, for the sake of the increase of virtue, and for the happiness of the virtuous, among the people of Kamboja, Gandhara, Rāshṭrika, and Pitenika. They shall also be spread among the warriors, the Brāhmins, the mendicants, the destitute, and others, without any obstruction, for the happiness of the well-disposed, in order to loosen the bonds of those who are bound, and liberate those who are confined, through the means of holy wisdom disseminated by pious teachers; and they will proceed to the outer cities and fortresses of my brother and sister, and wherever are any other of my kindred; and the ministers of morals, those who are appointed as superintendents of morals, shall, wherever the moral law is established, give encouragement to the charitable and those addicted to virtue. With this intent their edict is written, and let my people obey it."§

VI. "King Devānāmpriya Pṛiyadarśin saith: In past times there has never yet existed care for the (civil) interests, nor official superintendence; therefore have I instituted the same; all the time that I have been reigning there have been everywhere inspectors over the women, sanctuaries, travelling pilgrims(?), traders (or trade-markets), and parks for walking, in order to attend to the interests of my people.|| and in all respects I further the interests of my people;¶ and whatever I declare, or whatever the Mahāmātra shall declare, shall be referred to the council for decision. Thus shall reports be made to me. This have I everywhere, and in every place, commanded, for to me there is not satisfaction in the pursuit of worldly affairs; the most worthy pursuit is the prosperity of the whole world. My whole endeavour is to be blameless towards all creatures, to make them happy here below, and enable them hereafter to attain Svarga. With this view, this moral edict has been written : may it long endure, and may my sons, grandsons, and great-grandsons after me also labour for the universal good ! but this is difficult without extreme exertion."*

VII. "Pṛiyadasi, the king dear to the gods, desires that everywhere the ascetics of all persuasions should remain [in peace]; they all desire the regulation that they exercise upon themselves, and purity of the soul; but people have different opinions and different likings, [and] the ascetics obtain, whether the whole, or whether a part only [of what they ask]. Nevertheless, for himself, to whom there reaches not a large alms, the empire over himself, purity of mind, knowledge, and firm devotion which lasts for ever, this is good."†

VIII. "In past times the kings went out on journeys of pleasure; stag-hunting and other such-like recreations were in vogue. But king Devānāmpriya Pṛiyadarśin, ten years after his inauguration, came to the true insight. Therefore he began a walk of righteousness, which consists in this, that he sees at his house and bestows gifts upon Brāhmanas and monks, he sees at his house and presents elders with gold, he receives subjects of town and country, exhorts to righteousness and seeks righteousness. Since then, this is the greatest pleasure of king Devânâmpriya Priyadarśin in the period after his conversion."†

IX. "King Devânâmpriya Priyadarśin speaks thus: It is a fact that men do all kinds of things which are thought to assure luck, as well in sicknesses as at betrothals and marriages, at the getting of children, or at going from home. On these and other occasions men do all kinds of things which are thought to bring prosperity. But he is a great fool who does all those manifold, multifarious, vain, and useless things. This, however, does not indeed remove the necessity of a man's doing something which will bring prosperity, but such a kind as has been named is of little use, while of great use is true piety. To that belongs proper treatment of servants and subordinates, sincere reverence for elders and masters, sincere self-restraint towards living beings, sincere charity to Brâhmanas and monks. These and other such-like actions—that is called true piety. Every man must hold that forth to others, whether he is a father or a son, a brother, a lord; this is noble; this must a man do, as something that assures luck, until his aim has been fully attained. 'Mention was made just now of 'sincere charity:' now there is no charity, no affection to be compared to charity or affection springing from true piety. It is just this which a well-meaning friend, relative, or companion must, at every occurring opportunity, impress on another, that this is duty, this is proper. By doing all this a man can merit heaven; therefore let him who wishes to gain heaven for himself fulfil, above all things, these his duties."

X. "King Devānāmpriya Priyadarśin does not deem that renown and great name bring advantage greatly, if, at the same time, his people, for the present and afterwards, were not practising right obedience, and following exhortation to virtue. In so far only king Devānāmpriya Priyadarśin desires renown and great name. All, therefore, that King Devānāmpriya Priyadarśin strenuously strives after is for the life hereafter, so that he may be wholly and altogether free from blemish. Now blemish is the same as sinfulness. But such a thing is, indeed, difficult for anyone whatever, be he a person of low degree or of high station, unless with the utmost exertion of power, by sacrificing everything. But this is, indeed, most difficult for a person of high station."

XI. "King Devānāmpriya Priyadarśin speaks thus: There is no charity which equals right charity, or right conversation, or right liberality, or right relation. Under that is comprehended proper treatment of servants and subordinates, sincere obedience to father and mother, sincere charity towards friends and acquaintances, Brāhmanas and monks, the sparing of animal life. This is to be commended as good, whether by father or by sons, by brothers, by friends, acquaintances, and relatives, nay, even by neighbours: thus it is good; thus must men act. He who acts thus makes this world a friend to him, and hereafter a man obtains for himself an imperishable reward through all that true charity."

XII. "King Devânâmpriya Pñiyadarśin honours all sects, and orders of monks, and conditions of heads of families, and honours them with love-gifts and with marks of honour of all kinds. To be sure, Devânâmpriya does not attribute so much value to love-gifts or marks of honour as to this, that the good name and intrinsic worth of all sects may increase. Now intrinsic worth can grow greater in many ways, but the foundation thereof, in all its compass, is discretion in speaking, so that no man may praise his own sect, or condemn another sect, or despise it on unsuitable occasions; on all manner of occasions let respect be shown. Whatever of good, indeed, a man, from any motive, confers on any one of a different persuasion, tends to the advantage of his own sect and to the benefit of a different persuasion; by acting in an opposite manner a man injures his own sect and offends a different sect. Though every one who praises his own persuasion may perhaps do all that from attachment to his own sect, for the purpose of glorifying it, nevertheless he shall, by so doing, greatly injure his own persuasion. Therefore concord is best, so that all may know and willingly listen to each other's religion. Because it is the wish of Devânâmpriya that the members of all persuasions may be well instructed, and shall adhere to a doctrine of benevolence. And to them who are inclined to all that, let the assurance be given that Devânâmpriya does not attach so much value to love-gifts or show of reverence as to this, that all sects may increase in good name and intrinsic worth, and be revered. For this end sheriffs over legal proceedings, magistrates entrusted with the superintendence of the women, hospice-masters (P), and other bodies have been appointed. And the result of this is, that Devānāmpriya's persuasion has increased in prosperity, and that he causes the Righteousness to come forth in full splendour."

XIII. " Whose equality and exertion towards that object, exceeding activity, judicious conduct afterwards in the Kalinga provinces not to be obtained by wealth the decline of religion, murder and death, and unrestrained license of mankind; when flourished the (precious maxims) of Devānāmpriya comprising the essence of learning and of science: dutiful service to mother and father; dutiful service to spiritual teachers; the love of friend and child, (charity) to kinsfolk, to servants, (to Brāhmanas and Śramanas, &c., which) cleanse away the calamities of generations; further also in these things unceasing perseverance is fame. There is not in either class of the heretics of men, not, so to say, a procedure marked by such grace, nor so glorious nor friendly, nor even so extremely liberal as Devānāmpriya's injunction for the non-injury and content of living creatures and the Greek king besides, by whom the kings of Egypt, Ptolemaios and Antigonos, and Magas, Both here and in foreign (countries), everywhere the religious ordinances of Devānāmpriya effect conversion wherever they go; conquest is of every description; but, further, the conquest which bringeth joy springing from pleasant emotions becometh joy itself; the victory of virtue is happiness; the victory of happiness is not to be overcome; that which essentially possesses, a pledge of happiness,—such victory is desired in things of this world and things of the next world."§

XIV. "King Devānāmpriya Pṛiyadarśin has caused this righteousness-edict to be written, here concisely, there in moderate compass, in a third place again at full length; so that it is not found altogether everywhere worked out; for the kingdom is great, and what I have caused to be written, much. Repetitions occur also, in a certain measure, on account of the agreeableness of various points, in order that the people should in that way (the more willingly) receive it.

If sometimes the one or other is written incompletely or not in order, it is because care has not been taken to make a good transcript, or by the fault of the copyist (i.e. the stone-engraver)."||

In one place only, namely, the signature of the Girnār inscription, is Buddha referred to. Of this signature there remains—

[Neminâtha or Arishtanemi, who gives his name to one of the summits of Girnâr and to whom the Jainas consider the whole mount as sacred, is the twenty-second of their Tirthaṅkaras or deified saints,—men who, through successful austerities, they imagine, have entered nirvāṇa, and have done with the evils of existence. This one is the favourite object of worship with the Digambara or naked Jainas. His complexion, they say, was black, and most, if not all, of his images here are of that colour; like all the other Tirthaṅkaras, he was of royal descent, being the son of Samudravijaya, king of Śauryanagara or Soriyapuri, in the country of Kuśavarta, and of the Harivaṃśa race—his paternal uncle being Vasudeva, the father of the famous Kṛishṇa. At the age of three hundred he renounced the world, and leaving Dvārakā went to Girnâr to spend the remaining seven hundred years of his long life in asceticism; he received his 'Bodhi,' or highest knowledge, whilst meditating at Śeṣhavana, to the east of the Bhairava-jap, where footprints (pāḍāṅga) are also carved—some say Neminâtha's, others Rāmānanda's. His first convert was a king Dattātri, to whom he became guru, after which he gradually rose to the exalted rank of a Tirthaṅkara, and finally attained nirvāṇa on this lonely pinnacle of rock which retains his name. He had as tutelary goddess, or familiar devi, Ambikâ Mâtâ, the same to whom the old temple on the first summit is dedicated. The Mango tree is also appropriated to him by the Śrāvakas as his 'Bo-tree,' whilst the śankha or conch-shell is his cognizance. He is, in fact, the Kṛishna of the Jainas.

But it is not to them alone he is sacred here; the Vaishnavas who come from the pilgrimage to Dvārakâ consider they only reap the fruit of their toils when they have paid their respects to Guru Dattâtraya.]

MAHÂLS WHICH PAY ALL THE LAND AND CUSTOMS REVENUE RIGHTS TO JUNÂGADH.

Vanthali has two stone forts, washed on different sides by the rivers Ojhat and Opin. The palace of Vâmanrâja is in the town, as well as the Sûraj Kuṇḍ. The Tomb of Bhalla Shâh, with the Asrâm of Kapilamuni, is celebrated in this kasbâ. The kasbâtis, who in former times became Musalmâns, immigrated to this country from Naghor, and occupy themselves with cultivation.

Vanthali was for a long time known by the name of Patan, but Vahudipal Dhundhlimal the Yogi, who lived in the hills of Dhank, in his wrath pronounced the curse "Patan'so datan!" "Patan, be buried!" upon it; whereupon eighty-four towns bearing that name were swallowed up by the earth, and Patan shared the same fate, as may be seen even in our days, since, wherever excavations are made, foundations of buildings, and various things, are dug up. During the tenure of power of the author in this town, two stone horses, each one cubit high, were dug up, with a stone box in which they were, and also other more valuable things in Sainvat 1842 (A.D. 1785).

As the rivers swell greatly during the rains, it is difficult to cross them, and there is a great deal of mud, but the soil is good, and produces excellent sugar-cane, mangoes, and great quantities of guavas; they sow three times every year.

In the Sainvat year 1803 (A.D. 1746) Kahaji with the Navâb Fakhr-al-daulah unsuccessfully besieged the town, but in 1835 Jabbâr Khân treacherously obtained possession of the fort, which, however, was again taken from him after a siege by Divânji Amarji Sâleh; but again it fell into the possession of the Jamadârs Sharf-al-din and O'mar for some years, and was captured in 1851 (A.D. 1794) by Madhurâya Ben Khoshkhâl, to expel whom the author was called from Nâgar by the Navâb Sâheb Hâmed Khân, and he succeeded in doing so by negotiation in 1860 (A.D. 1803). Afterwards Madhurâya with Bâbâji Sâheb, the Kârbhâri of the Gaikvâd, again besieged it, but ineffectually.

THE KASBÂ OF KUTIÂNÂ.

This place has two stone forts, and is situated on the banks of the Bhâdar river. It is said that for a long time a Chârânî woman whose name was Kuntî used to pasture her cattle on this spot, which in course of time became a village. The governor, Kalidâs, who was a Baniâ and had built a fort for himself in the vicinity of Ahmadâbâd to which he gave his own name, constructed here also a square fort of considerable strength so as to control Purbandar and Hâllâr. During the government of the Musalmâns, Afghân Sipahis, Maliks, Khokhars, Jundrâns, &c., settled here, and gradually became so strong as to be independent, and appointed Nia'mat Khân Lodi as their governor; but afterwards, growing dissatisfied, they surrendered the fort to Rânâ Sultânji, from whom they likewise revolted, and gave it to Hâshem [Hasan] Khân, the adopted son of Navâb Bahâdur Khân, from whom it was taken by Amarji, the father of the author. In Samvat 1840 [A.D. 1783] the Divân Govindji rebelled, and the Navâb Sâheb, having besieged the fort for a month, afterwards made peace. In the year 1858 [A.D. 1801] Kaliyândâs Hirji, a Baniâ, revolted from the Navâb Sâheb, but after a month's contest the author took the fort from him.

The Khâgasri fort, which was formerly at the head of the Parganâ, with twenty-four villages, was given to Maluk Muḥammad Sindhi as a jāghîr, for his services as Qâzi, of which also the fort of Devara is an appanage from the time of the Divân Sâheb Amarji.

The temples of Vageśvarî Mâtâ and Amareśvara were built by Dalpatrâm, the younger brother of the author. The place of pilgrimage (mezâr) of Chaman Jellâl is the ornament of this town at a distance of about three kos from which also are Gokarnâtîrtha and Mahâdeva's Śivalaya. Most of the villages are joint property with Purbandar and Mângrol.

BÂNTWÂ.

Bântwâ has a strong fort, and the village of Manâr belongs to it; most of it at present belongs to Purbandar and Mângrol, and is inhabited by the Mehmans. Nawâb Sohrâb Khân, Governor of Khambâyat, waged war against Sher Zamân Khân and Diler Khan Bâbi, compelling them to evacuate Ghoghâ; but they obtained eighty [? 84] villages as a jâgir from the Nawâb Sâheb Bahâdar Khân in 1779 [? 1789], A.D. 1722.

THE KASRÂ OF MÂNGROL.

The port of Mângrol has two strong forts on the sea-shore with ditches, and is the residence of a governor or Hâkam. After annexing to Bântwâ eighty villages, two hundred and eighty-one still belong to Mângrol.

In ancient times Rânâ Bhân, Râja of Gumli, §

for some reason divorced his wife, and being desirous again to recall her he consulted learned men on the subject. They said that a dismissed wife might again be taken back if eighteen hundred virgins were given by him in marriage, he defraying the bridal expenses. Accordingly the Rānā built a bridal hall or chauri, of squared stone, in S. 1264, and gave these virgins in marriage, and this edifice existed for many years till the arrival of Shams Khān, the Nāib of the Sultān Firoz Shāh, who converted it into a Jamā'a mosque, and left Sikandar Khān as Thānādār, in Samvat 1350 (A.D. 1293). In this place Makhdūm Jehaniab with other saints are buried, and at the tomb the spears of A'li, the garment of the prophet, and a goblet brought from the fourth heaven are shown to pilgrims.

In former times the zamindārs of these places were Rājputs of the Vāghelā tribe, but gradually various others obtained lands, e.g. Qāzis, Maliks, Sayyids, &c., and who, becoming powerful, expelled the Vāghelās. These persons usually obeyed the governors of Junāgaḍh or Gujarāt.

Under the government of Śrīmant Peshvā Bāji Rāo, his Nāib Natāji distressed the Rayās so much that many of them emigrated to Junāgaḍh and other parts of the country. Natāji also gave much trouble to the Musalmāns and Jats on account of the Ekdāsī [11th of the Hindu month] fasting, and on account of the

Mondays, and the people in general were much dissatisfied with him; accordingly Shekh Miân, son of Qâzi Fakhr-ud-dîn, expelled Jâdav Jaswant, the Thânadâr of the Śrîmant Peshwâ, by the edge of the sword, in the year Samvat 1805 [A.D. 1748], and taking the government into his own hands, levied tribute|| from Kesod, Chorvâd, Koḍinâr, Pâtan, Purbandar, &c.; sometimes also he made raids into Kâthiâvâd, and carried away whatever property or cattle he could, from which he used to pay the wages of his Sipahîs; the Desâgiri allowance of these places, however, still belongs to the Nâgars, Baniâs, and Khâtrîs.

Prosperity increased during the rule of Shekh Badr-ud-dîn bin Nur-ud-dîn bin Shekh Miân, son of the Qâzi. He also kept up the dignity of his position by waging a successful war against Purbandar and Chorvâd; he died, however, on the 8th Vaiśâkh Śuddh of the Samvat year 1871 (A.D. 1814), and was succeeded by his son Abâ Miân.

The grandfather of the author was a god-worshipping man adorned with every good quality; his name was Kunwarji bin Prâgji bin Gopâlji bin Vekunth bin Śripat bin Śivâji, and he was the hereditary agent of the Chief, and possessed several pieces of land in this Kasbâ, partly irrigated from wells and partly by the rains, the produce whereof constituted his support. He worshipped the Linga of the lord Śrī Budhābāvā, which was a gift from the Sultān Farukhsiyar Shāh of Dihli, and with reference to it the following legend is current:—

It is related that one day when the Sultān Akbar was walking on the banks of the Jamunā he perceived two women going home from the river with full waterpots on their heads, when all of a sudden a mouse carried by a kite flying above them fell down; and one of the damsels immediately exclaimed disparagingly to her companion, "Just see what times of weakness have set in, when a kite is unable to carry such a little mouse! Four thousand eight hundred years ago, when the Kauravas and Pāṇḍavas were waging a great war against each other, I was a kite, and flew away with the arm of Rāja Jydrat, the Shāh of Sindhu, which had two armlets on it." The Sultān happened to overhear these words; accordingly he stopped; and to his inquiries the woman replied without further ceremony as follows:—
 "I had been created a kite, and having, after picking it up from the ground with my beak, flown away with the arm of Rāja Jydrat, which the arrow of Sātaki [Bhuri Śrava, a descendant of the Svātaki Yādavas] had severed from his shoulder, I sat down on the top of a tree. After I had consumed all the flesh, I dropped the bones, together with the gold, into the well beneath the tree ; and I dare say that if the heap of dirt which has accumulated on the spot during the lapse of ages were to be removed, the truth of my statement would be confirmed by the discovery of the bones and armlets." The Shâh despatched servants, who dug up the spot, and brought from the depth of the well two Śiva-līngas which were set in the gold armlets just mentioned. It is related that the arm-bone of that rāja was eight spans long. The two Śiva-līngas were kept in the Shâh's private apartments, and were day and night placed in contact with fragrant substances, such as attar and water of roses, sandal, saffron, and aloes ; camphor-lights, food, beverages, garments, and jewels were placed before them, and he secretly worshipped them, away from the eyes of weak-minded critics, as the Musalmāns had already become accustomed to accuse his majesty of idolatry and irreligiousness because he was in the habit of saying—

(Distich)—

"In idol forms I worship God,
Not idols separate from God."

This custom was kept up till the time of 'Azim Shâh ; but afterwards when the turn of the Shâhzâdâh Farukhsiyar came and he began to reign, he presented his Vazir, the Rāja Chabilârâm Bahâdur, who conquered the Dekhan and was a Nāgar, as a reward for his services, with the two Śiva-līngas, a dress of honour, and a Rudrākṣa rosary the beads of which were made of pearls. On this occasion he said with his own blessed tongue, "O Rāja Bahādur! This is Budhābāvā" (i.e. "old father," which is a metaphor for Eternal Creator), "worship it!" When he took the Līngas home, he gave one of them, which was of emerald colour, to Dayarām, who was a highly respected Nāgar and a jāgirdār in the parganā of Nāgināpūr and district of Mevāt. Some time afterwards the conquests of the Dekhanis, the dissensions of the Amirs, and the invasions of the Persian armies disturbed the comfort of the jāgirdārs and royal servants, so that Dayarām established himself at Banāras, where he became so intimate with the grandfather of the author that he betrothed to him his own daughter, and after a while, when they returned to Māngrol, the wedding was consummated there; on that occasion he presented his daughter also with the Śrī Budhābāvā as a portion of her dowry, which is the source of endless blessings and of divine favours. Then becoming a sanyāsi he went to Nāsik, and finally to Banāras, where he died, whilst the Mehtā kept and continued to worship the Śiva-līnga. Lastly, Sultān Zafar Khān and Tātār Khān came with troops from Māngrol, altered the Śūraj temple and called it the Rāvali mosque; they also spoilt the Rāvali Wāv. About two hundred years ago [1519], on the staircase of the Gomati Wāv, the image of Ranchod Rāya was found by Parbat Mehta, and is to this day worshipped in a Vaiṣṇava temple of Junāgaḍh.

Here are places of pilgrimage, such as that of Merān Shāh and others, and, at a distance of three kos, the temple of Kāmnātha or Kāmeśvara. In the town itself may be seen the temples of Kāśi Viśvanāth, Hātkeśvarā, Siddheśvara, Nilakaṇṭha, Mātā Hinglāj, Mangalāj, Appachharādevi, Navadurgā, Saptamātri, Ranchod Rāya, and Raghunātha Rāya.

In this zillā there is much garden cultivation, and fine water-melons and vāls [olivas] are produced. Here the Nāgars are Jāgirdārs, Kār bhārīs, Kanūngūis, Desāiyas, and they follow all the occupations in which penmanship is required; they were invited by the rājas and governors from all sides, and employed in civilizing the country.

Merchandise from Arabia, the Koṅkana, from Sindh, and from the coasts arrives in the port of Māngrol, and is the occasion of much trade. On a certain occasion some Bokhāri Sayyids entered the town in carts in the disguise of a marriage procession, and treacherously took possession of Māngrol, and fourteen wives of the Hākim of this place preferred being consumed by fire in the tower of Sakotri to losing their honour.

The parganā of Māngrol is the joint property of the Navāb of Junāgaḍh and of the Rāja of Māngrol. It contains the following forts with four towers, viz. Mahiārī, Bagasrā, Śil, Diwāsa, Sepa (?), Mesvāna (?), Lāthodrā, and Shergadh. Some of the lands are under cultivation, and others are neglected.

Note 3 on Ghumli or Bhumli, page 51.

[In the south of the Navānagara territory, and about forty miles west from Dhānk, is Ghumli, an old deserted capital of the Jēṭwās—now of Purbandar. It lies about four miles south of Bhanvād, in the last valley facing the north, in the north-eastern end of the Barādā hills, and concealed from the north by a low ridge, which bends round in front of the opening to the valley or dell, shutting up the town in a sort of cul-de-sac, open only through the narrow valley to the north-west, by which it is approached from the modern village of Mukhānā. Up both sides of the dell its ruined walls wind in various directions along the shelving ridges which overlook it, up to the summit of the mountain, where was a fortified citadel, still containing the walls of many of the houses in a tolerable state of preservation, but entirely deserted except by wild beasts. The very vertex is occupied by a small temple of Mātā Āsāpurī—a favourite object of superstitious reverence with the Jēṭwā Rājputs.

According to the traditions of the province, the earliest seat of the Jēṭwās was at Śrīnagara, a few miles from their present one of Purbandar. Soon afterwards it was at Bhimor or Mordvājpurī, now a ruined site opposite to Morvi and six generations later—probably early in the tenth century—G h u m l i or B h u m l i was made the capital, and adorned with imposing buildings by Rājā Śāl Kumāra; but in Samvat 1369 (A.D. 1313) it fell, after a desperate siege, by an army from Sindh. From Ghumli the Jēṭwā chief then removed to Chaya, near Parbandar,—the latter being its port, which has since supplanted Chaya.

This ruined and deserted capital was visited by the indefatigable Colonel Tod in 1822, and described by him in his Travels† in his usual glowing and exaggerated style. In 1837 Captain (now General Sir G.) Le Grand Jacob gave an account of a visit to it with much more accuracy and detail.*

“All is now jungle,” says the latter, “where once multitudes of human beings resided; within and without the ruined ramparts so thick is it as to make it difficult to trace them even from a height. The ground-plan of G h u m l i resembles a wide-spread fan, the two sides of which are formed by the gorge of the valley, leading up to the peak on which the fort is built, the circular portion being represented by the ramparts.”

“The extreme breadth from the eastern to the western wall,” he adds, “is about three-quarters of a mile; its length from the north wall to the narrow of the gorge less than half a mile; there are two flanks of about two hundred and fifty yards’ length, joining the northern face to the natural flanks offered by the hills; the eastern one with its semi-arched battlements, reaching halfway up the scoop of the hill, is in a tolerable state of preservation, but the remainder is in ruins, the bastions have fallen in, and are only faintly to be traced through the jungle. A ditch, of the usual Hindu dimensions, surrounds the wall; the masonry I was surprised to find for the major part of well-chiselled stone, dove-tailed grooves for clamps; the iron or lead which may have been used for this purpose has doubtless been long since pilfered. There were originally two gateways to the north and west." The last only was still standing till within a few years ago, and bears the name of Rāmapoḷa, but only a fragment of it now remains.

"The area contained within the limits I have above described is now tenanted only by wild beasts, and other jungle inhabitants; mounds or lines of rubbish faintly portray the lines of streets, though I am disposed to consider the houses were chiefly of frail materials; nothing remains as witness of its former state save an insignificant temple near the eastern wall, two small flat-roofed ones of the earlier age of Brāhmanism, a splendid well, itself worthy of description, and the ark or royal citadel, the contents of which peculiarly merit notice; wells of good masonry are sunk here and there, which the traveller should take heed not to stumble into. This ark occupies the centre of the area, and contains, originally guarded by a wall all round, the palace and its adjuncts; a large bathing-reservoir, surrounded with small apartments as is for dressing-rooms to the zanāna, if not the zanāna itself, is separated from the palace by a court."

Various accounts and dates are given of the destruction of this city; it seems most probable, however, that some time during the first half of the fourteenth century, Jām Unād invaded Baraḍā and besieged the Rānā in Ghumli. After a long contest, Unād, despairing of success, returned with his army to Kachh. Here, according to tradition, his son Bāmani,† ashamed of the disgraceful termination of his father's expedition, assumed the command of the army and conducted it back to Ghumli, which place he reduced after an obstinate siege of twelve months. The Sammās destroyed the city, which the Jēṭvās, from superstition, did not attempt to rebuild, but removed their capital to Chaya, near the sea-coast. Purbandar, said to be on the site of Sadamapura, mentioned in the Bhāgavata Purāna, was at first the port of Chaya, but has since become the seat of government of the Jēṭvā chief.§

Probably owing to the resistance made by the Baraḍā Rānās, the Sammās, after reducing Ghumli, returned to Kachh, without establishing their authority in the country. Jām Unād, however, is said to have given his territory in Sindh in charity to the Chārans before setting out to conquer another, and on Bāmani's arrival in Kachh on his way back he formed the design of establishing himself there, and succeeded in doing so.]]

KESOD.

This place is situated on the banks of the Kesod river, and has two strong forts. After the taking of Junâgadh, it together with Chorvâd became a jâgir of the Râizâdâhs. In this district the Râjpût Lâthias, Sarvaiyas, and others, who are descendants of the Chudâsamâ Râjpûts, originally Zamindârs of Sindh, hold jâgirs.

MÂLIÂ.

Mâliâ has a fort with towers, and is situated on the river Mekal. The Zamindârs are of the Hâthi tribe. The parganah is small, but abounds in mangoes.

CHORVÂD.

Chorvâd is situated near the sea-shore, and has two strong forts; and several villages belong to it. At a distance of one kos from Chôrâvâd the river Birjâmi falls into the sea, but though it is so near to the sea there is no bandar, on account of the paucity of inhabitants; there are, however, fine gardens and beautiful fields. Betel-leaves unequalled in agreeable taste and pungency are grown in this place, and are even exported to Hâlâr, Kachh, and Sorath; also all kinds of vegetables grow. The total revenue is 50,000 koḍis; there are thirteen villages under it. The forts with four towers of Kukasvād and Visāval are also on one side of Chorvād.

OF PATTAN DIVA.

This is a strong fort situated on the sea-shore, surrounded by a fosse full of water. The rivers Hiran, Sarasvatī, and Kapilā flow near the base of the fort. In ancient times the zamindāri of this place belonged to Parmār Rājput̃s. The slaughter of the Yādavas and of Śrī Kṛishṇa in this locality is recorded in the Prabhāsa Kathā. Here great quantities of mangoes, water-melons, and gunda fruits are produced, which are exported. Verāval is the seaport of this district. Nia'mat Khān Lodhi, an adherent of the Navāb Bahādur Khān, built a strong fort, which in the Samvat year 1824 (A.D. 1767) was repaired by the Divānji Sāheb Amarji, and was repaired for the second time in 1845 (A.D. 1788). Divān Raghunāth, son of Amarji and Dulabhaji, brother of Amarji, were besieged here by Rānā Sultānji of Purbandar in one of his warlike expeditions, as will be narrated in the proper place.

Śrī Sōmānāthā* of Pattan the adherents of Islām believe to have been brought from Mekka during the time of Abraham the Friend of God ; but the Hindus hold that it existed here from all eternity, as a Śiva-līnga by Chandramā.

* See Note 4 at page 68.

This place was devastated by Sultān Maḥmūd the Ghaznavide in the Sairwat year 1078 (A.D. 1021), by Shams Khān in 1375 (A.D. 1318), by Zufar Khān the Shāh of Gujarāt in 1568 (A.D. 1511), and by Tātar Khān bin Zafar Khān nine years later, who forcibly converted many persons to his own religion.

During the time of Sultān Maḥmūd the Ghaznavide, the Ghuri Pādishāhs, and the Sultāns of Gujarāt, nobody could prosper without adopting Islām. Accordingly many became Muhammadans here, as for instance the Kasbātis, who are to this day called Paṭṭani, and are mostly subject to the governor of Junāgaḍh, but they revolted often and erected forts, such as Sutrāpādā, Hirākot, Dhāmlej, Lodhvā, Pushnāvāra, Lāthi, &c., trying to assert their independence.

Gorakhmaḍi is a place belonging to the Kānphaṭā Yogis, and noted from ancient times in all parts for hospitality both to travellers and refugees, and its charitable daily meal (saddāvrāt) was well known throughout the country. It was for a long time under the protection of many successive governments; gradually, however, the Paṭṭanis began to drive away horses from the place and commit robberies, wherefore Madaninātha, who was the chief Yogi, buried himself alive. This event brought on the ruin of the Paṭṭanis, who commenced to live in discord among themselves and with the people whom they hated; accordingly they appointed Nia'mat Khân Lodi as their governor, from whom they afterwards again revolted, but he slew some of them, and then, at the invitation of the inhabitants, went to Kuṭiānā. The Lodhi tower is a monument of his rule. His history is this:—Nia'mat Khân used to live at Ahmadābād in Sheikpūra, on the bank of the river Sābarmati, and obtained Upletā,* Kuṭiānā, Paṭṭan, and Koḍinār as a jāgir from the Shāh of Gujarāt, and after he had properly settled the affairs of all those places he betook himself to Paṭṭan and peopled Verāval, which the Paṭṭanīs had laid waste, and there he also built a fort. Now, since the Paṭṭanīs would not suffer him to enter Paṭṭan, he removed in the space of seven months all the thorny bushes and trees which obstructed his movements between Paṭṭan and Verāval, and, commencing the war in earnest, established a thānah at Suṭrapāḍa. The Paṭṭanīs marched against him, but were put to flight after great slaughter, and compelled to submit to Nia'mat Khân's government. A few days afterwards Nia'mat Khân obtained a chance and marched with his troops into the town, and, having also obtained aid from Verāval, put many Paṭṭanīs to the sword, and on this occasion his Divān, Isvaradās, was wounded, but many Paṭṭanīs were beheaded by the executioner, and many thrown into the sea. Nevertheless the Paṭṭanīs again assembled to the number of three thousand men, and, under the leadership of Sayyid Miân, scaled the walls of the fort by means of ladders, but Nia'mat Khân routed them again, and after encountering much opposition remained ruling in the city. Some time afterwards Mânâji Ângriâ made a descent on Verâval in ships, and, after fighting during three days and nights, he made peace and received the gift of a horse as nazarânah. The Portuguese of Diva also made some attacks, but retired disappointed.

He plundered the villages of Kâlâwad and Bânt-wâ, in Hâlâr, and defeated his pursuers, and established a right to tribute over certain villages.

Sultâna Bibî, the paternal aunt of the Navâb Sâheb Mahâbat Khân, obtained possession of the fort, and ruled for sixteen years. After some time the Paṭṭanîs considering Shekh Miân—who was one of the Kasbâtis of Mângrol—a man of good disposition, allowed him to enter the fort, and he commenced to conduct the government. Seeing the pride and insolence of Pahâdji and Chand and Firoz Shâh, however, and, fearing lest they might expel him, he drove the Paṭṭanîs from their native country into hell and the flames, and made them food for alligators and jackals.

The temple of S o m a n â t h a, which the Musulmâns had converted into a mosque, was in ruin, and was not repaired till Samvat 1840 (A.D. 1783), during the government of Sheikh Miân [the successor of Nia'mat Khân], when it was rebuilt by a most excellent lady, Âhityâ Bâi,† the wife of the Holkar Malhâr Râo Bahâdur. After thirty years the Divân Viṭhal Râo Devâji, who was a Subahdâr of Kâthiâwâḍ under the government of the Gaikwâḍ, built high nagâra-khânas, travellers' houses, harams, and repaired the temples of the Jain and Kaneśvara and of Jânkiśvara.

The following are some of the temples in this city :—The temples of Daitśudan, Narsing, Mahâkâli, Anapurṇa, Gaṇapati, Shashi-Bhukhan, and Pragteśvara, which last was built by the Divân Raghunâthji [a brother of the author]. The Rânatalâo, Rudreśvara, Sûraj, Banésvara, and Hatkeśvara are some of the sacred places much visited by Hindus. Bhalkâkuṇḍ, Kadamkuṇḍ, Bangaṅgâ, Râma-Pushkara, Gaurikuṇḍ, Vishṇukuṇḍ, Brahmâkuṇḍ, Rndrakuṇḍ, Sûrajkuṇḍ, and Jalprabhâs are some of the sacred tanks where the people are cleansed from their sins.

The places of pilgrimage to Mângrol-Shâh, Chandkattâl, Maghrabi-Shâh, Mâhi-Hâjat and Godar-Shâh are noted. At a distance of five kos from Paṭṭan is the Prâchi Tîrtha, celebrated far and near, and visited by pilgrims from great distances ; here the śrâddha ceremonies are performed, whereby the spirits of the departed are propitiated and evil genii warded off.

In Saṁvat 1849 (A. D. 1792) the Navâb Sâheb Aḥmad Khân, with the aid of the Paṭtanis, scaled the walls of the fort during the night by means of ladders and expelled Sheikh Bedr-al-din.

This country, situated on the sea-shore, produces annually three crops, consisting of great quantities of red rice and vallānak [kāng], but unfit for the consumption of wealthy persons; from Purbandar as far as Mahwah and Sābar,† these crops are very abundant.

Without the fort of Sutrapāda the temples of Navadurgā, Bhavāni, the Sūrajkuṇḍ [Chāman-kuṇḍ], may be seen. In the same parganah also the tīrthas of Gayātrikuṇḍ, Brahmākuṇḍ, Viṣṇu-Gaya are celebrated places for ablation. The revenue amounts to three and a half lākhs of koḍis.

[Paṭṭan Somanāth, or Prabhāsa Paṭṭan, is a place full of interest to the antiquarian. It is a walled town of considerable size, famous in the annals of Hindu history on account of its temple containing one of the dvadśajoti lingas, or twelve symbols of Mahādeva, which, like the Ephesian Diana, were said to have fallen from heaven. It is one of the ratnani, or inestimable jewels, for which Surāshṭra is celebrated in the Purāṇas,—the other four being the river Gomati, beautiful women, good horses, and lastly Dvārakā. The fame of the great temple of Somaśvara fired the fanatic zeal of Mahmud of Ghazni, who led an army of thirty thousand men lightly equipped against it in 1025 A.D., and reduced the fort after an obstinate resistance on the part of the Hindu chiefs, who had leagued to defend their shrine. "Fifty thousand infidels and more," says the Rozat as-safa, "were slain round this temple, which was of vast dimensions." But at length Mahmud prevailed, destroyed the sacred linga by a fire lighted round it to break the hardness of the stone, plundered the temple of its immense wealth, and carried off its gates to Ghazni (to appear again in history after a lapse of more than eight centuries,—when gates were brought from Kâbul as trophies—believed by some to be those of Somanatha). The temple, it is said, was supported by fifty-six pillars, ornamented with rubies, emeralds, and other precious stones; and each of these pillars bore the name of a different king of India as its embellisher. Whether Mahmud destroyed the temple also we do not know, but it is pretty certain that not a vestige of it now remains, unless it be in the capitals and columns strewn all about and built into the walls of the present temple, of the town and its houses.

It was too profitable to the Brâhman, however, not to be soon restored by the Hindu princes under their influence. Among these its greatest benefactors were probably the Solanki princes of Anhilapattan, and accordingly there is evidence of its having been restored by Bhima Deva I. (A.D. 1021-1073). We find Siddha Râja (1093-1142) visiting it about a century after its desecration by Mahmud; and again, in A.D. 1168, the great Kumârapâla, in search of a way to manifest his piety, is advised by the wily Jaina Âchârya Hemachandra to restore the temple of Someśvara. And with this is connected a tale that is perhaps worth repeating:—In two years the restoration was completed, the temple “once more resembled Meru,” and the Brâhmans, jealous of the influence of the Âchârya over the king, tried to entrap him, proposing to Kumârapâla that he should accompany the royal retinue to the dedication. When the proposal was made, the Jaina at once replied, “What need of pressing the hungry to eat? Pilgrimage is the life of the ascetic; what need is there of an order from the king?” He then started on foot to visit the holy places of his own creed, and met Kumârapâla at Somanâtha. At the inauguration of the new temple the Jaina astonished the spectators by his devotions to Śiva. At the threshold of the temple he exclaimed, “In the splendour of this shrine Mahâdeva, who dwells in Kailâsa, is surely present.” Then entering and going through the prescribed gesticulations before the lînga, he said, “Thou existest, whatever be thy place, whatever be thy time, whatever be thy name, of whatsoever nature thou art. Thou art he in whom is no guilty act, no guiltiness consequent upon the act,—one only god. Praise be to thee! He who has destroyed the affections, which are the seeds that produce the bud of existence, be he Brahmâ, be he Vishṇu, be he Śiva, to him be praise!” Then falling flat on the ground he worshipped Śiva in the dandavata. All this was done with an object; and after the ceremonies were over, Kumârapâla and Hemachandra entered the shrine alone, closing the door behind them.

Here, the story says, the Āchārya made Someśvara reveal himself to the king and address him thus:—"O king, this monk is an incarnation of all the gods; he is free from deceit; to him it is given to behold the divinity as a pearl in his hand; he knows the past, present, and future; understand that the path he shall show you is, without doubt, the road, to liberation." The credulous king was caught, and there and then the Jaina administered to him a vow to abstain from animal food and fermented liquor to the end of his life. The temple of Somanātha was then left in charge of Vṛihaspati Gauḍa, a Kanaṇj Brāhmaṇ; but, perhaps chagrined at the victory of Hemachandra, he reviled the Jaina religion, for which he was deprived of his place, and only restored to it after making the most humble submission to the influential Āchārya.

If the remains that still exist are not those of the temple of Bhima Deva and Kumārapāla, it is difficult to say to whom we owe them. It seems probable that for more than a century after Kumārapāla's time it was unmolested; but the Muhammadan had cast his eyes on the rich province, and at length, in 1297, the Śūltān, Ālau' d-dīn Khilji, sent his brother Alaf Khān, and Nusrat Khān, his prime minister, to effect the conquest of Gujarāt. Then it was that the idol shrines suffered, and the famous idol of Somanātha was again destroyed. A century later, in 1395, Muzaffar Shāh I. led an expedition against Paṭtan, and, destroying all the Hindu temples, he built mosques in their places,—or more probably he converted them into mosques; and again, in 1413, Ferishtah tells us that his grandson and successor, Ahmad Shâh I., on his return from an expedition against the Râ of Junâgadh, "destroyed the temple of Somapur, wherein were found many valuable jewels and other property." Later still Mahmud Shâh I., surnamed Begara (1459-1511) is named by Hindu tradition as having sent an army to reduce the place, when he built a mosque on the site of the temple. The building, however, still attests that the Muslim only desecrated the Hindu temple, defaced its sculptures, and converted it into a place of worship for the followers of Islâm, but did not raze it.

This famous ruin occupies a rising ground, probably a rock with a coating of soil upon it, close to the sea-shore. It faces the east, and on the south side there are still considerable remains of the old Hindu sculptures, much resembling those at Amaranâth, near Kalyâna, but on a larger scale. On the other sides, the outer facing of the walls has been almost entirely removed; indeed, until a few years ago, this fine old ruin was used as a sort of quarry from which to obtain building-stones. The outer pyramidal roof of the mandapa and the great spire over the shrine had been destroyed by the Muhammadans, and hemispherical domes substituted in their place. Over the eastern entrance they erected two clumsy minarets, and threw arches in between the pillars of the central octagon which support the dome. The diameter of this octagon is about 33 feet, and the greatest width of the mandapa inside is 64 feet, its length up to the door of the shrine being nearly 70 feet. The shrine itself is 18 feet 9 inches square inside, and there has been a pradakshina round it; but behind this all is destroyed. The floor has been of polished black stone or marble, some fragments of which are still found. Both the domes are now open above, and the whole has evidently been for long the haunt of cattle rather than of devotees—Muslim or Hindu.

To compensate for its loss to her religion and its local attendants the Somapada Brâhmins, the famous Ahilyâ Bâi, widow of Khande Râo Holkar, built another temple—New Somanâtha—in the town; but if the hand of time only has to do with both, it will be a neglected ruin before its aged predecessor is greatly changed.

In the town is the Surya Kunda, as the Hindus call it,—a remarkable remnant of their architecture. It has been defaced, and patched, and altered now, but when first completed it must have been a work of much elegance, forming the colonnade round a large tank—long ago filled up except a small pond about nine yards square in one corner of the enclosure. This colonnade has had at least three rows of pillars on three of its sides, and seven on the fourth,—in which are five octagonal areas each about 20 feet across. The columns still standing, some of them imbedded in the outer walls, are about two hundred and fifty in number, and nearly all of them have been carved in the most elaborate style of Hindu art. A wall has been built in, connecting the outer row of pillars, and a mimbar and mihraab have been formed to adapt it to Muhammadan worship.

Near this is a plain building, its walls outside covered with plaster, and apparently an ordinary Muhammadan house with scarcely any windows ; inside, however, it proves to have been a Jaina temple of an interesting type, and said to have a cellar (bhoimorum) under it. It is now used as a storehouse by a Muhammadan, who says it has been in his family for at least a hundred and fifty years.

A little to the north of Paṭṭan Somanātha there is a large cluster of sacred places, many of them very unpretending in appearance, but each with its legend or associations. First is Triveni—‘three plaited locks’—the junction of the three rivers Hiranyā, Kapila, and Sarasvatī,—a ārtha for pilgrims bathing, and without a visit to which the pilgrimage to Dvārakā would scarcely be considered complete. Further out is the temple of Rudreśvara, built on the site of an older temple of Kedāreśvara destroyed by the Muhammadans,—some of the columns and sculptures of which, however, have been employed in the restored building. Beside it is the dargah of Muhammad Shāh ;—for Islāmite superstition is fond of thrusting itself into notice in the scenes where it has displayed its iconoclastic fanaticism. This dargah and that of Abbi Shāh, a little further out, are but miserable places, scarcely worth a visit, unless it be to half suffocate one’s self in the labyrinth of little cells at the back of the first. Beyond some quarries is the old temple of Śūrya Nārāyaṇa, whose dome and spire have suffered at the hands of violence, but have been plastered over to keep out the rain. Under it is a cellar or cave.

On the banks of the river Hiranyā we find Devasarga or Dehotsarga—an old pipal tree with a very small temple beside it, and some huts forming a monastery; this is a place of great sanctity, for under the pipal, of which the present one is a traditionary scion, Kṛishṇa lay down to rest at noon, when a Bhilla—mistaking his tawny coverlet for a deer, or the mark on his foot for the eyes of one—sped an arrow with such mortal force as bereft his godship of life. Islāmite devotion here consecrates a place of prayer for its votaries under their sacred tree, and desecrates its vicinity by making it a place of graves. The Hindus have, many a time since its erection, had the power to destroy the offensive and ugly wall, but they do not seem possessed of such aggressive and iconoclastic propensities. South from this are the small shrines of Koteśvara,—or the million lingas, containing only large fragments of the symbol,—and Bhimeśvara or Bhimanātha, now much dilapidated. Not far from these is Bhalka Kuṇḍa, a reservoir—empty at least in the dry season—in excellent repair, about three hundred and eighty yards in circumference, and forming a regular polygon of sixteen sides, with three oval apertures on one for the entrance of the water. To the west of Paṭṭan, the spire of the Śeshi Bhushan or Bhidiyo temple attracts the eye by its height—owing principally, however, to the higher level on which the temple stands: it is a restoration, rather than a renewal, of an old temple, and is of similar style to that of Śūrya Nārāyaṇa.

It is curious to find here remnants of the Brāhmanical monasteries. There are several of them in this neighbourhood, not apparently of any great extent, or with numerous inmates, nor are the buildings in any way pretentious—they are mere collections of huts. §

[Note 5:—on Ahilyā Bāī.]

The famous Ahilyā Bāī was born in 1735 of a family of the name of Sindhia, and was married to Malhār Rāo Holkar's only son Khande Rāo, who was killed at the siege of Kambhīr, near Dīg, in 1754. By him she had a son Malli Rāo, and a daughter Muktā Bāī. Malli Rāo succeeded his grandfather Malhār Rāo, but nine months after died mad, when Ahilyā Bāī succeeded to the administration of the Holkar government, 1765, and ruled with great wisdom, firmness, and talent till her death in 1795. She was a most devoted Hindu, and built sacred edifices at Jagannātha, Nāsik, Elurā, Nimār, Maheśvara, Somanātha, Dvārakā, Gāyā, Kedarnātha, Rameśvaram, &c. Her daughter Muktā Bāī became a sati with her husband, Yasvant Rāo Pansīya, and Ahilyā Bāī built a beautiful temple to her memory at Maheśvara, on the Narmadā.

ACCOUNT OF KORINÂR.

This town is the residence of a governor or hakam, and is situated on the banks of the Shingora. The temple of Muta Dvārakā and the port is on the sea-coast. The Bokhāri and Qāderi Sayyids obtained it in wazifah from the Amirs and Shāhs of Gujarāt, and dwell here; but in § Notes of a Visit to Kāthiawād in 1869, pp. 17 et seq.

Sāmvat 1780 the Dekhanīs [Marāthās] prevailed, and obtained a moiety of the revenue. In course of time a peshkash of five thousand rupees was paid through the management of the Divānji Sāheb Amarji, and the Gāikvāḍi official (mutasaddi) was not admitted to a share in the management, after whose death his younger brother the Divān Dulabhji paid a fixed sum by way of farm. Now, in Sāmvat 1871 (A.D. 1814), Govind Rāo Gāikvāḍ has, by the aid of the English Government, obtained possession of the whole parganah. In it is also situated Rudrākya, a place of ablution for Hindus.

The revenues amount to two lākhs of Jāmīs [2,00,000 koḍīs].

UNĀ AND DELVĀDĀ.

The forts of Unā and Delvāḍā, built of white stone, are two kos distant from each other.

The residence of the governor looks over the river Machundri. The Talāo and the Chāsheria Wāv were built in Sāmvat 1515 (A.D. 1458) by a Kāyat named Somanātha.

It is related that in ancient times, when this country was under the government of Brāhman, the Rāni of a Rāja whose name was Vejal, who was of the tribe of Wājā, happened to arrive on a visit to the temple of Sūraj, where the Musulmāns have a mosque at present, and that some Brāhman immodestly and boldly lifted up the curtain of her chariot, without any civility, and had a look at her beauty. This affront the Rājputs passed by at the time, but attacked the Brāhman on their great holiday, the 15th of Śrāvaṇa Śud [on which they put on the sacred thread], slew many, and took the fort. In course of time, however, the Kasbātis again expelled the Rājputs, and occasionally lived in independence, but at times acknowledged the supremacy of Muzaffarābād, or accepted a governor from Junāgaḍh; and for some time Manohardās and Somaji Jikār were the Mutasaddis in behalf of the Navāb Mahābat Khānji, whom they accepted as their ruler.

In Samvat 1825 (A.D. 1768) the Divān Sāheb Amarji levied a fixed tribute from Unā; afterwards, in Samvat 1827 (A.D. 1770-71), on account of the evil conduct of the Kasbātis, Latif Mian, a Sayyid of Delvādā, conquered the place from them, and they were banished from their vatan, but through the aid of the Divān Sāheb Amarji they were again reinstalled in their former holdings.

The temple of Dāmodhar, the place of pilgrimage of Hazrat-Shāh, Raghunāth, Guptaprāyāga, and Mahā Kāleśvara are the ornaments of this mahāl. Without the town is a tank of sweet water, and at a distance of twelve kos is the temple of Tulsī Syām, with a spring of hot water; and ten kos further, at Dohān, is a fine temple of Mahādeva. In the woods are many wild plantain trees.

The revenues amount to three lakhs of Jāmis.

ACCOUNT OF RÂNPUR.

This is a fort at the foot of Mount Girnâr, and is the jâgir of Muzaffar Khân II. Its produce amounts to thirty thousand Jâmis.

VISÂVADAR.

This is a fort with four towers. Most of this pargana is deserted, and on its frontier is nothing but jungle and forest of useful and of jungly trees. The Gir hills are forty kos in length and twenty-five in breadth; there is also cultivation in some parts.

The revenue of this pargana is 20,000 kodis.

MUZAFFARÂBÂD.

This country was colonized by Muzaffar Shâh Gujârâti in Samvat 1632 (A.D. 1575), who built the fort on the sea-shore and garrisoned it with Râjputs; they cultivate both dry and irrigated land.

The revenues amount to one lâkh of Jâmis.

THE ISLAND OF DIV, WHICH FORMERLY BELONGED TO JUNÂGADH.

In ancient times the zamindârs of this island were Vâghelâ Râjputs; but Shams-al-dîn Khân took it from Vaghelâ Jayasingh in the Samvat year 1387 (A.D. 1330) and established a thânah, and during the reign of Sultân Bahâdur Shâh the Mutasaddis of this place were Kavâm-al-mulk and Malik Tughân Ben Ayâz. In Sam-vat 1588 (A.D. 1531) some Portuguese arrived treacherously in the guise of merchants, but they were captured and surrendered to the Sultân, who made Musulmâns of them; on that occasion also several cannon were taken, and the two which are [in the U p a r k o t] at J u n â g a d h probably came from this place; afterwards, however, the Portuguese came into the possession of Div, and the manner in which this happened is as follows :—

When Bahâdur Shâh, who had come, on the second occasion, by way of Khambâyât to Div, the Portuguese who were there represented to him that they had brought three hundred mans of rose-water and of aṭar, which were in danger of being spoilt before merchants arrived from various parts to remove them, and requested to be allowed to build four walls. The Sultân agreed, but after his departure they erected a strong fort, which they provided with cannon and muskets, and prepared for war. When this news reached the Sultân, he determined to get possession of the fort by treachery and to expel the Portuguese; he arrived accordingly, but, being aware of his intention, they slew Sultân Bahâdur Shâh in Samvat 1593 (A.H. 943), and became masters of the island. The names of the six men who were killed together with Bahâdur Shâh are as follows :—Malik Amin, Shuja'et Khân, Lashkar Khân [Âlp Khân], Sikandar Khân, and Ganesh Rao the brother of Maidani

Rão. It is asserted that the fort of Divbandar and the buildings with gardens were all constructed by Malak Ayâz.

The revenues amount to one lăkh of Jâmîs (1,50,000 koḍîs).

ACCOUNT OF KĀTHIĀVĀḌ.

For some reason or other, KĀṭhîs of thirty different tribes emigrated to this country from Khorāsān, and some also from PĀVAR, a district in Kachh. The WĀLĀ KĀṭhîs are of the stock of the Rājput WĀlās, the lords of the district of Dhānk, one of whom married a KĀthiāni damsel, and was therefore expelled from the Rājput caste, and entered that of the KĀṭhîs. From this union resulted two sons, Kĥumān and Kĥāchar respectively, to whom the Rāja of Junāgaḍh granted a small territory. And when this territory became populous that zillā was called KĀṭhiāvāḍ.

It is related that Shams Khān slew the WĀLĀ Rāja in battle, and took possession of the town of Kileśvara, situated in the Baraḍā hills; and when he conquered Okhamāṇḍal he demolished the temple of Jagat, placed over the spot a sort of mosque, and returned. Chāmparāj, son of Ebhal the KĀṭhi, happened to have a daughter of wonderful beauty, whom Shams Khān coveted without having seen her, but Chāmparāj refused all his offers, as no marriage is to be contracted with persons following a different religion; accordingly he was attacked by Shams Khān and slain, with his daughter, and 1,800 adherents all of whom died fighting bravely.

Some time afterwards Verâ Wâlâ, a Kâthi, with the permission of the Navâb Bahâdur Khân, built the fort of Jetpur. The Kâthîs pay a great deal of tribute and annually one horse likewise to Junâgaḥ; but they live on plunder and make raids to the extreme limits of Gujarât.

The beauty of the Kâthî women was remarkable in former times, and the Khumân Kâthîs used to carry off by force handsome women from among the lower classes; now, however, Kâthî women are frightful to look at, like demons and ghûls. The Kâthîs are brave and hospitable, and their principal towns are the forts of Jetpur, Mendardâ, Bilkhâ, Bagasarâ, Kundalâ, Jasdân, Chital, Sudâmrâ, Ânandapur, Bhâdlâ, Dhândhalpur, and Pâliyâd [with large or small forts]. Gâḥarâ is also a fort, but not a strong one.

ACCOUNT OF AMRELI.

After the demise of the Navâb Sâheb Hâmid Khân, the Gâikvâḍ's Nâib Divân Sâheb Viṭhal Râo, by the aid of the English, took from his son the whole of Amreli, by way of nazarânah, though formerly the Gâikvâḍ had but a third-share in the revenue; now, however, in Samvat 1869 (A.D. 1812-13), the Gâikvâḍ took the whole parganah, and built a fort and ruled independently.

The revenues amount to six lākhs of Jāmīs (about Rs. 2,00,000).

ACCOUNT OF THE MAHĀLS WHICH PAY TRIBUTE TO JUNĀGADH.

Purbandar, situated on the sea-shore, has a well frequented port and a strong citadel. Here the zamindār is a Jēṭhvā Rājput who is a descendant of Mākaraḍhvāja, son of Hanumān. The town contains numerous gardens, and both sweet and brackish water; and the inhabitants, who trade with the ships, are Vāpiās and Bhāṭiās. The temples of Kēdār nātha Mahādeva, of Sudāma, of Verāvalimātā, of Porabhavāni, and the Kedārkuṇḍa, are much visited by the inhabitants.

The Rājas here bore the title of Rāṇā, and in ancient times the fort of Ghumli, || situated in the Baraḍā hills, was the capital of the state; it was, however, deserted seven hundred years ago, on account of the devastations committed by the army of the Jām which he had brought from Sindh, and which demolished the fort. The citadel of Bhānvār obtained its name from the Rāṇa Bhāna (Jēṭhvā).

The government of the Rāṇās extended as far as Nāgnah, founded by the Rāṇa Nāga, and the temple of Nāganātha is also one of his memorials. About three hundred years ago the Rāṇa was put to flight by the army of the Jām Rāval, and took refuge with the Mēr tribe.

The rule of the Jâm extended as far as Râṇâ Wâv and the creek of Bhokirah; but by his liberality, justice, and distribution of food the Râṇâ attached that wild tribe to himself, and they conquered for him with their swords the country on the west side of the Baraḍâ hills, and acknowledged him as their sovereign.

In course of time Nâgars from all sides were invited and settled at the places of Chhâya, Râṇâ Wâv, Mokâl, Dhebar, &c., which became their jâgirs; and the Râṇâ entrusted the management of his affairs to them, and to this day a tribe of Nâgars is called after the name of those villages.

In Samvat 1789 (A. D. 1722) Mubâriz-al-mulk made his appearance at Mâdhavpur in order to collect peshkash, and with the assistance of the Navâb Bahâdur Khân of Junâgadh the fort of Mâdhavpur was taken. In this contest [Ranchodâs] Nâgar, the Thânahdâr of the place, was slain, and after the locality had been plundered the inhabitants paid forty thousand Jâmi koḍîs as a ransom for the image of Pâras-nâtha.

It is related that there was a lady named Sôn, of the lineage of a râja of Bâlambhâ. She composed a hemistich in Hindî, and giving it to a Brâhman informed him that she would be ready to take any man for her husband who could compose the other hemistich. The Brâhman started on his journey according to her direction, but was disappointed until he arrived in Ghumli, where he met the Kunwar Halâman Jethvâ, the son of Sehyâ Rânâ, who wrote a hemistich as required, and handed it to the Brâhman. On his return the Brâhman delivered the line to Rânî Sôn, who, intent on keeping her promise, mounted a chariot and arrived in Ghumli; but alas! alas! for times in which females do not break their promises, but men in one hour turn away from their oaths and written obligations, like the revolving sphere! The Rânâ Sehyâ heard of the bride's beauty, and himself became enamoured of her and desired to obtain her favours; but he had apprehensions as to Halâman, and therefore immediately banished him for a term of twelve years from his realm. Halâman departed to Anjâr, a town in Kachh, where his paternal aunt dwelt; but Sôn likewise returned to her country, and Sehyâ Jethvâ reaped only sorrow and disappointment. One day, however, Halâman was rocking himself in a hammock slung to the branch of a tree, when some fairies perceived his beauty and took him up into the air; when they discovered, however, that he was only a human being, they dropped him to the ground. The fall almost killed Halâman, but as his aunt knew that his very life was bound up with his love for Sôn she despatched a ship with the news to her; and Sôn, whilst embarking in it, exclaimed—

“A ship I mount, O wind of mercy blow,
Perchance my love again will greet my sight!”

The ship arrived more quickly than the fleeting cloud, and when Sôn took Halâman into her arms he recovered consciousness, and although discarded by fairies he was soon joined to one as beautiful.

In 1790 (A.D. 1793) Mubâriz-al-mulk, the Subâh of Gujarât, and his commander of the forces, Safdar Khân Bâbi, arrived with an army at Purbandar, and the Rânâ, being unable to offer any resistance, fled and embarked everything he could, with his family, in ships and put to sea. The army took possession of seven cannon, with all the baggage which had been left behind, and was ready to demolish the fort, when the helpless Rânâ made his appearance and saved the fort from destruction by paying one lâkh and twenty-five thousand Jâmis.

In Samvat 1805 (A.D. 1748) Kuṭiânâ was taken by the Rânâ from the Qasbâtis, and held by him for ten years, after which time it fell into the power of Hâsham Khân, with the coöperation and aid of the Qasbâtis. In Samvat 1782 the Rânâ bought Mâdhavpur from the Desâis of Mângrol, and incorporated it with his possessions. In Samvat 1830 Sheikh Miân from Mângrol took, under cover of night, possession of the fort of Navi, situated on the sea-coast, by scaling its walls with ladders, but the Rânâ Sultânji called to his aid Jâdejâ Kumbhoji, Zamindâr of Gondal, who was a connection of his by marriage, and erected batteries against the fort, and Shekh Mian obtaining quarter surrendered the place.

In the Samvat year 1734 he built the fort of Bhetâli, on the limits of the country of Nagar (the borders of Hâllâr); it was beleaguered by Mehrâman, a Khavâs of the Jâm, for some time, with a native army. To make short work of the matter, he constructed a moveable fort called Rângadh, and making an assault reached the walls, against which he placed ladders; but the assailants had not ascended to the middle of them when such a fire of musketry poured upon them from the fort, and fiery projectiles were thrown upon the Musulmâns, that they became unwilling fire-worshippers and retreated, while burning the slain Hindus became superfluous. In spite of this disgraceful repulse, Mehrâman Khavâs did not raise the siege, and Thakar Premji Lohâna, Kâmdâr of Râna Sultânji, opened negotiations for aid through a paternal uncle of the author, whose name was Govindji, for a long time Faujdâr of Kuñjânâ. When the victorious army approached nearer, Mehrâman Khavâs raised the siege and made peace; whereupon the army marched from that place towards Okhâ to subdue the robbers of P o s i t a r â, who robbed the people by land and by sea, and those events have already been narrated. The account of this will be given in connection with Junâgadh.

In the Samvat year 1839 Thakar Premji,

Kāmdār of Purbandar, having become haughty and fat like a tumour; in the exuberance of his power, made an alliance with Mehrāman Khavās of Navānagar and Kumhāji of Gondal :—

A tree which has scarcely yet taken root

A strong brave man will soon eradicate ;

But if you leave it long to thrive and grow

No strength of windlass will pull up its root.

As the Divān Amarji, like the brilliant sun, was day by day prospering more, the three tālukdārs just mentioned attempted to break his power ; they attacked him, but were quickly put to flight with their troops.

In Samvat 1843 the Divān Amarji took Chorvād from Sanghāji Raizādāh, a relative of Rānā Sultānji, who, on account of his quarrels with Pithāyet Hāthi, the Zamindār of Mālya, was unable to pay the wages of his troops. After accomplishing this object, the army of Junāgadḥ marched to Verāval, held by the Jamadārs Rakhia Banhera and Ibrāhim Khān Pattani, who were disloyal towards the Navāb Sāheb ; the fort walls were scaled by ladders, and Diler Khān, the cowardly Thānādār, took to his heels ; so that the Divān Sāheb Raghunāthji was able in a very brief time to conquer both the forts.

In Samvat 1855 Kalyān Shet, the Divān of the Navāb Sāheb at Junāgadḥ, fled to Kutānā, where he raised the standard of revolt, and plundered the country of Drāphā, but the Râpâ Sultânji prepared an army to encounter him, and the author being in the Râpâ's service was appointed to march with cannon and troops to punish Kalyân Shet.

The beginning of Divân Ranchodji's remaining in the service of Râpâ Sultânji was as follows :— The author had taken his departure from Nagat to Mângrol with some horsemen to celebrate the wedding of his younger brother Dalpatrâm, whilst the Divân Sâheb Raghunâth had himself remained in Nagar; and Mehrâman Khavâs, perceiving the field free, and disregarding politeness, imprisoned the Nâgar Kârkuns of the tribe of Buj who dwelt in the same street as we did. The Divân Sâheb being helpless, the Sirbandi attached to the Divân's house having gone to Mângrol, despatched a letter to the author, which reached him whilst he was encamped at Devrâ, on his return journey from Mângrol; accordingly he sent all his men to Navânagar, and went himself to the Râpâ Sultânji at Purbandar.

In fine, when I arrived in the vicinity of Kuṭiânâ, Kalyân Shet, Jamadâr Nâsar bin Yamani, with Yahya and others, also Gangâsingh Parbhiâ with Qasbâti and other troopers, marched out to the sound of kettle-drums with banners and cannon, drawing their troops up in battle array near the Idgâh of Kuṭiânâ. On perceiving this display I slowly approached the foe with my troops till we could almost touch them with our swords and spears, but they ran like a herd of sheep from brave lions, and did not stop till they reached the bazar of the town, and their cannon and some of their men were taken. As a reward for this victory the Rânâ presented me with a necklace of pearls and a palanquin.

In Samvat 1864 [A. D. 1807] Hâlâji Kunvar made Jamadâr Omâr his secret partner, and by promises of gifts of pearls, &c. he obtained possession of the fort of Khirasrâ from Subadâr Khân Afghan. He then plundered Mâdhavpur and took possession of the fort of Navîbandar by scaling its walls with ladders in the darkness of the night; his intention was to take Purbandar also, but it was not fulfilled. Rânâ Sultânij called to his aid the Divânji Sâheb Viṭhal Râo, who, through the intervention of the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji, under whose protection Omâr the Jamadâr was, suppressed the rebellion by paying one lākḥ of Jâmîs [Koḍîs]. In the Samvat year 1865 (A. D. 1808) Hâlâji Kunvar, through the Divân Raghunâthji, under pretence of requiring protection, but in reality to capture his own father, had taken into his service the Jamadâr Murâd Khân, Faqir Muḥammad Mekrâni, and Sheikh Muḥammad Zobaidi the Arab, and again rebelled, but, being unable successfully to oppose the Rânâ, they fled to Kandornâ, which was in their possession, where they took refuge, but surrendered it after a few days to the Jâm Sâheb Jasâji, who promised them their former service and gave them the sum of one lākḥ of Jāmis [koḍīs]. Hālāji despatched his Vakils to implore assistance from the Huzār Alexander Walker Sāheb, who had accompanied the Subah of Kāthiāvād, Divān Sāheb Viṭhal Rāo, in aid of the Gāikvād, and who, levying tribute, had established their fear amongst the zamindārs. The noble-minded Sāheb immediately marched, took the fort in two hours, but granted pardon to the garrison; and, as Kuṭiānā was near, by order of the Divānji Sāheb Raghunāthji, the author was admitted to the honour of waiting on the Sāheb Bahādur, and offering as nazarānah a horse and a Yemani sword set with jewels; he met Ballantine Sāheb and Robertson Sāheb twice, and twice received a handsome dress. On that occasion the Colonel said, "You are well disposed towards the Sarkār Company Bahādur, and you will be much regarded. Be of good cheer, and if you come with me to Baroda you will obtain an honourable post in the Company's service." But, as I did not think proper to separate from the country of Kuṭiānā, I took leave at Pāl and returned.

On this occasion I had gone in the company of the Amir-like Alexander Walker to see the fort of Ghumli, but I saw only ruins, a burnt and fallen temple, a deep wāḍ full of limpid water, some ancient dilapidated edifices, two tanks, and a wall on the hill which is called the fort Ābāpurā.

In Samvat 1866 (A.D. 1809) the Rāja assigned a share in the revenues of Purbandar to the servants of the Sarkâr Company Bahâdur, and the farm of the revenue to Sundarji Khatri; Prathirâj Kuñvar resisted, but on aid coming from the Company Sarkâr the fort of Chhâyâ was evacuated in two hours and made over to Hâlâji. The Kuñvar, being wounded, was captured, with his wife, but the sipâhis were so greedy to have the golden anklets of his grandmother that they cut off her feet.

After the demise of Hâlâji the reign of Prathirâj began, and the old inhabitants, who were Lohânâs and Nâgars, emigrated. Rânâ Sultânji himself was, after the death of his son, received into the mercy of God in Samvat 1869.

The mandir of Mâdhavarâi is situated in the fort of Mâdhavpur, in the tâlukâ of Purbandar; and the kuṇḍa named Sita-mundri, which is very well known, is situated at a distance of two kos therefrom. In this zillâ—mung (pulse), ka-shiya (Phaseolus radiatus), and sugar-caness are produced; most of the soil is alluvial and produces three crops annually. The forts of Chhâyâ, Rânâwâv, Adwânâ, Miâni, Navî, Kandorna, and Mâdhavpur are dependencies of this mahâl; on the west is the sea; on the east are Kuṭiânâ, Mahiâri, and Mângrol; on the south the sea; and on the north the hills of Barâḍâ and the district of Hâlâr. There are two seaports, namely Purbandar and Navî, and the revenues amount to eight lākhs of koḍīs.

DESCRIPTION OF GONDAL.

This is a district of Hālār; it was deserted for some time, but Amīn Khān ben Tātār Khān Ghori took charge of it in 1647 (A.D. 1590), for Muzaffar the Sultān of Gujarāt, and cultivated it. Kuṇvar Vibhāji obtained it as jāgir from his father; but Kumbhāji bin Hālāji, by his good fortune and his cunning, having got the zamin-dāris of Dhorāji and Upletā from the Navāb Sāheb for service done and for a little money, and having taken Bhāyāvadar from the Desāis Govind Rāi and others, besides some villages from the Kāthīs and Rājputs, he built forts and established an independent rāj. His good and mild government was extensively praised. By the help of the army of the Gāikvād his own attacked Trimbakrāo with a number of Kāthīs and Girāsīs, firing some cannon at the fort of Navānagar; but the Nāgars of the vanguard of the army were slain. The fort in Gondal was built on the banks of the Gondli river in ancient times, and up to our days graves may be seen there. In the year 1828 the Marāṭhā army attacked that of Junāgaḍi, which was encamped at Majhevaḍi, and captured the Arab Jamadār Sālmīn, who was, however, afterwards released again.

The forts of Movīā, of Dhorāji, of Upletā, of Bhāyāvadar, of Ganod, of Analagaḍh, and of Mengni belong to Gondal, which is bounded on the west by Dhank, on the east by the parganah of Râjkôṭ, on the west by the parganah of Dhrol, on the south by the parganah of Jetpur. These were formerly the limits, and the revenue amounts to ten lākhs of Jāmīs.

DESCRIPTION OF RÂJKOT.

This is a dependency of Hālār, and was given as a jāgir to the holders by the Jām Rāval instead of Kālāwad. He bestowed Sardhār on Masūm A'li Khān, who treacherously slew the Kāṭhis that were the zamindārs of it. The fort of Râjkot was built of white stone by Lakhāji Jādeja on the banks of the river Aji. He divided scattered villages among his brothers, but Kotdā and Râjpura still belong to him. In Samvat 1875 (A.D. 1818) the English Sarkār, the paramount power in Kāthiāvād, built a handsome camp here. Râjkot is bounded on the east by the Panchāl, on the west by Pardhari, on the north by Wānkāner and Thān, and on the south by Kāthiāvād.

DESCRIPTION OF MORBI.

Morbi was given as an inām to Rao Bhārā by the Dehli Sultāns in Samvat 1627 [A.D. 1550], for his surrender of Sultān Muzaffar into the hands of Āzam Humaiyun. After Râyaji had been slain by his younger brother Kâyaji, the latter, much as he tried, could not obtain full power, and was obliged to be content with Morbi, Adhoi, and Wāgaḍ. In Samvat 1508 (A.D. 1451) the Faujdār on the part of the Shâh of Gujarât was Toghlaq Khân, who built a strong fort on the banks of the Machhu river. The revenue of this district amounts to three lākhs of Jāmīs; it produces good jowāri, and it is bounded on the east by Jhālavad, on the west by Dhol, on the north by the Salt Ran, and on the south by Wānkāner.

DESCRIPTION OF BHĀVANAGAR.

In ancient times most of the zillās of this region were in the possession of the Audich string-wearers (Brāhman̄s). Mokherāji, a Gohel Rājput, governed the island of Perim, and made a firm stand against the royal army which attacked him near Gundi. He obtained four chorāsīs, viz. those of Lāthi and others, from the Rāja of Junāgaḍh on account of the connection with his daughter. It is said that the Sultān of Gujarât, having taken the Rāja, kept him prisoner in a stable for horses. A potter having arrived there from Gohelvād was gratuitously supplying water during the fasting month (Ramazān) to the guards, who considered themselves obliged thereby; in the mornings and evenings they were engaged in breaking the fast; on such an occasion the potter took the Rāja, and, placing him on his donkey instead of the water-bag, carried him out of the town to a place where a party of Atīs was encamped, who received him in a handsome and kind way, dressed him as a jogī.

and took him to Sihor, where one of his cousins reigned. The Atits sent in their Vakil with the following message :—"We are travellers and are in the habit of waiting on râjas; we have brought arms, jewels, and shawls; if orders are issued we will display these things and also offer presents." The Râja, who had no experience, agreed, and the Atits, who entered the fort with their arms, seated the former Râja on the masnad and removed the new one. It is related that when the people saw the Râja in the state of a Darvaish, wearing red garments, they said, "This is a Râval," i.e. a darvaish; and from that day he obtained the title of Râval. I have also heard that when the Râja fled from this captivity he went to Dungarpur, where his maternal uncle was reigning, and where he remained for several years. As the Râja of Dungarpur was one of the brothers of the Râja of Udaipur and had the title of Râval, he bestowed it also on his nephew; but God knows best.

In Samvat 1779 (A.D. 1722) Bhâvasing Râval built the fort of Bhâvanagar, of which he assigned a part of the revenues to the English and to the Peshvâ on the 3rd Vaisâkh Sûd. After him his grandson, Vakhatsingji enlarged his territory by taking possession of some localities belonging to the Kolis and Kâthis, and obtained Goghâbarah and Râjula from the Navâb Sâheb Ahmad Khân, and became very strong and prosperous.

The tālukā Goghā was given by the Sultāns of Gujarāt to the Bābis, and afterwards, in Samvat 1810 (A.D. 1753) it came into the possession of Momin Khān, and then into that of the Śrīmant Peshvā. When in course of time Sohrāb Khān and Momin Khān removed Sher Zamān Khān from Goghā, it fell into the hands of Vakhatsingh, and he is still the joint possessor of it with the English.

The fort of Talājā was taken by the aid of the Divānji Sāheb Amarji; and, Samvat 1850 (A.D. 1793), Wakhatsinghji took Chital, which from the number of the Kāthīs, and the aid of the Navāb Sāheb Hāmid Khān Bahādur, was very strong, and he destroyed the fort of Jasdan. In the Samvat year 1852, after the fighting was over, the Navāb Sāheb granted a parvānā for Kundlā and other places on condition of paying tribute. The parganahs Māhuva, Talājā, Rājulā, Kundlā, Sihor, Dihor, Trāpaj, Umrālā, Pātānā, and Botād are dependencioes of Bhāvanagar. The fort of Śīhor is the capital, and is situated between two mountains. The temple of Roṃāpuri in Bhāvanagar is a celebrated one. The three ports are Māhuva, Goghā, and Bhāvanagar, to which numerous merchants resort in ships. Here fine āmbas (mangoes), gundās, and oleanders (kanār) are produced.

Pālitānā belongs to one of his bhāyād. The fort is situated at the foot of Mount Śatruñjaya, which contains many ancient temples visited by pilgrims from distant places. The limits of Bhâvanagar are the sea on the east, on the west the parganah of Amreli, on the north Jhâlâvâd and Srî Bhimnâth; on the south the parganah of Unâ Bâbriâvâd and of Muzaffarâbâd. The produce amounts to eight lākhs of rupees.

DESCRIPTION OF JHÂLÂVÂP.

This zillâ began to pay tribute during the time of the Divânji Sâheb Amarji, in Samvat 1832 (A.D. 1795); and was for some time the jâgir of Umdat-ul-Mulk. Chroniclers narrate that in Samvat 1320 (A.D. 1263) Siddhrâ o Jayasinhâ, the Râja of Gujarât, reigned in the capital city of Piran Patthan, who had a wife beautiful as a fairy; it happened that a Deva or Râkshasa fell in love with her, and had intercourse with her every night after tying the Râja her husband up in a corner.

Hemistich:—An uncongenial consort is great misery.

The Râja had a confidential and faithful servant, a Râjput of the Jhâlâ tribe, whose name was Makwânâ Harpâl Valad Kesar, and to whom he promised a fine jâgir if he would relieve him from this enemy. The said Râjput agreed, kept his word and removed the Bhut; the Râja on his part was also desirous to fulfil his promise, and asked the Râjput how he wished to be rewarded. The latter replied, "Let every village be mine where I can bind a toran or string of green leaves during one night." The Râja agreed, and in one night Jogini—whose devotee the Râjput was—tied 1799 torans to as many villages, but when the Râjput arrived at the gate of Digsar the morning began to dawn. Accordingly the Râja gave all the villages thus marked to the Jhâlâ Râjput, and seven villages to the Chârans. As the Jhâlâ had adopted the Râni of Râja Siddhrâo Jayasîūha to be his sister, he gave her the five hundred villages of the B h â l as a present, and kept the others for himself. H a l w a d and D h r â n g a d r a were constituted seats of government, and the other parganahs were distributed among his sons and cousins. In course of time such places as Limbadi, Sailâ, Vânkâner, Lakhtar, Vadhvân, Thân, Chudâ, and others became separate tâlukâs, and were adorned with strong forts. Pratâp-singh Râja, in order to aid Jâm Tamâchi bin Râi Singh, who was his nephew, had given his own daughter to Mubâriz-al-mulk, and the daughter of one of his cousins, who was the Zamindâr of Mâthak, to Salâbat Khân Bâbi, by whose support he seated the Jâm on the throne of Nagar.

Sadâsiv Râmchandra captured the fort of Halwad in Samvat 1816 (A.D. 1758) and captured Râja Bâbhâ, who paid ransom and was released. Mubâriz-al-mulk laid siege to the fort of V a d h v â n, which was so reduced by scarcity of water that by the intervention of Chatarsingh, Râja of Nârvar, an arrangement was come to by which a payment of peshkash or tribute was made in its behalf, so that Rāja Arjan Singh remained in safety. In Sāmvat 1862 (A.D. 1805) Bābāji Sāheb assailed the fort of Vādhvān with cannon and besieged it, but marched away disappointed. Fatch Singh Gāikvād besieged the fort of Limbādi in Sāmvat 1831 [1834], but the Divānji Sāheb Amarji sent an army from Junāgaḍh to the aid of the Rāja Harbhamji, whereupon Rāo Sāheb Fatch Sing thought proper to make peace and depart.

In this country there is a great deal of alluvial soil ; it produces good jowāri and cotton, but no trees except nim.

Vānkāner is a strong fort on the banks of the Machhu river. Here the Rāja Bhārāji Jhāla reigns, who was at first the tilāt (or heir to the throne) of Halwad. When his father died, Tilāt Sultānji went out of the town to perform the funeral ceremonies, but his brothers closed the gates and shut him out ; accordingly he went to Nagar, and with the aid of the Jām took possession of Vānkāner, Thān, and 108 villages belonging to Mahyas and Bābriās, and thence he ravaged Jhālāvād ; he was afterwards slain in the battle of Māthak, but his descendants still reign at Vānkāner. The Rājas of Halwad and Vānkāner unite in Chandra Singh, the fifteenth ancestor of their line.

This country is mountainous ; the temple of Jadesvara Mahādeva, which has been repaired by the Divānji Sâheb Viṭhalrâo, is a famous one. In the mountains green, white, and black stones are quarried, and the Panchâl parganah adjoins them. Jhâlâvâḍ contains some celebrated temples, among which is that of Śrî Bhimnâth, the Âtîts whereof are rich and esteemed, and also the temple of Somanâth.*

The total revenue of Jhâlâvâḍ is 5,00,000 rupees.

On the east of Jhâlâvâḍ are the parganahs of Pitlâḍ and Baroda, and on the west Morbi and Vânkâner, on the north Dhandhukâ and other parganahs and Virangâm, and on the south the parganahs of Bhâvanagar and Khambâlâ.

THE RÂJAS OF JUNÂGADH.

An account of Mount Gîr n â r, of the excellencies and blessings of the temples of Śrî Gîrnâr, of Bhâvanâth, of Mahâdeva, of Mṛigikuṇḍa, of Dâmodarkuṇḍa, &c. is given in the Prabhâsa-khaṇḍa, which is a portion of the Skandapurâṇa, a book of great authority among the Hindus. Be it known that the great Râjas of the Solar and of the Lunar race who have passed away are countless:—

Distich:—How many heroes buried under ground

On earth no vestige of them can be found!

During the space of 2350 years Junâgadh was governed by Chudâsamâ, i. e. Lunar

* This is Ghelo Somanâth, and not the one near Prabhâsa Pâṭṭan.

Rājputs who were descendants of Śrī Sadāśiv, and who are said to have come in former times from Sindh, the throne devolving in regular succession to nine men of the name of Naughan, ten of the name of Jakhrā, eleven of the name of Âlansingh, and to other individuals with various names, who became Rājes. As no chronicles exist of this dynasty of high lineage, and it would not be worth while to repeat mere tales, only a short account will here be given.

RĀO DAYAT AND KUVAR NAUGHAN.

A caravan of the Rāja of Gujarāt, whose capital was Pirān Pāṭṭan, happened to go on pilgrimage to Śrī Gīrnār and Dāmodarakuṇḍa, and arrived in Junāgaḍh. It so happened that on this occasion Rāo Dayat expressed his desire to marry the daughter of Rāja Siddha Rāo of Gujarāt, who was extremely beautiful, and wanted her to be surrendered to him in lieu of the tax which was to be levied from the travellers. When the leader of the caravan perceived that there was no other way of getting out of the difficulty than by stratagem, he proposed that permission should be given first to go to Pirān Pāṭṭan, and then to return for the wedding in due state and with the customary presents. In this manner the Rāja was deceived, and the caravan was allowed to depart.

When they had arrived in their own country, Rāja Siddha Rāo conceived the idea of getting possession of Junâgađh and of enjoying the pleasures of Mount Gîr nâr. Accordingly he took a girl of unparalleled beauty, clothed her in royal garments and placed her in a sumptuous chariot to represent his daughter the princess. She was accompanied by several young men dressed as females to attend upon her, as well as by five hundred carts supposed to be loaded with her dowry, but in reality each containing four valiant armed men. There was also a powerful vanguard preceding the large party, and announcing everywhere its arrival. Dayât, who suspected nothing, was so joyful that he adorned the city, opened his treasury liberally, and went out in great joy to meet his bride, in whose chariot he took his seat; when, however, this train entered the city, the gatekeeper, whose eyes were blind but whose mind was wide awake, exclaimed when he heard the heavy rattle of the carts, "The load of these wagons consists of able-bodied men, and not of tender girls." When the guards perceived that the secret was revealed, they quickly leaped out of the carts, shouting, "Boys, throw off your female garments! Use your swords; we are not women!" Accordingly they slew Dayât and took possession of the fort of Junâgađh.

On that frightful occasion a girl carried N a u g h a n K u n v a r, who was a small boy, to a place called Alidhar, in the parganah of K o đ i n â r, to the house of an Ahir called D e v â i t, who was the Mukaddam or Pâtîl of that place. In course of time certain scouts, glad to foment disturbances, informed the governor left by Siddha Râo at Junâgadh of this circumstance; accordingly men were despatched from Junâgadh to take Naughan forcibly away; but, as it is against the Hindu religion to surrender a person who has taken refuge in a house, Devâit preferred to give up his own son, whose head the malefactors immediately cut off, and Devâit exclaimed—

Hemistich:—If me you do not fear, fear God!

When the hard-hearted wretches were informed of their mistake, they shouted for Naughan, but Devâit brought another son, and another, until those butchers had killed all his seven sons; and, to his eternal honour, Devâit preserved the life of Naughan.

Distich:—He never dies who his religion keeps;

The moon is shining always in the world.

As it was the will of the omnipotent and most glorious Creator, the universal Benefactor, that the world-illuminating sun of Râja Naughan should rise with a horoscope of felicity, illuminating the world with the conquests and victories of his reign, and imparting eternal glory and freshness to the delightful country of Sindh, and to purge it from the thistles and chaff of rebellion, the executors of the divine commands had preserved his life from this wrathful dust of his cruel foes. In proof of this it may be stated that Devâit had a lovely daughter of tender age, for a long time the playmate of Kunvar Naughan; they lived with each other as sister and brother. When that girl, whose name was Jâsal, became of age, Devâit made a wedding feast for her on a large scale, but as the grief for his murdered sons was yet deep in his heart he invited all his tribe-fellows the Ahirs, who were extremely numerous, and consulted them on the subject; and they finally came to the determination to invite many of the followers of Siddha Râo and to slay them. Accordingly Devâit went to Junâgaḍh with great ceremony, and induced the Nâib of the Râja, with all the Amirs and grantees of the locality, to come to the wedding feast. The Râja himself was not aware of the proverb that it is folly to trust in the politeness of foes, and that the waves which lick the feet of the wall will overthrow it: accordingly they went; at the time of the repast Devâit caused them to sit in rows, and the Ahirs, at a signal from Râo Naughan, who had also the murder of his own father to deplore, fell upon the guests, all of whom were slain, and became themselves a splendid repast for the crows and vultures, whereas Naughan was carried to Junâgaḍh and placed on the throne in the Samvat year 874 (A.D. 817).

NAUGHAN CONQUERS SINDH.

There was a great famine in Samvat 895 (A.D. 838) in the country of Sorathâ, so that many persons died of hunger. The Ahirs, who had much cattle, heard that corn was cheap, and grass as well as water plentiful in Sindh, and went there; and among them also Devâit, with his beautiful daughter Jâsal, took up his abode in a beautiful fresh, pleasant, and green prairie. According to the hemistich:

The rose's beauties cannot be concealed.

Jâsal's attractions had reached the ears of Hamir Sumrâ, who, under pretence of hunting, went quite close to her dwelling.

Distich:—Not sight alone will love beget;

But speech will contribute to bliss.

He beheld a maiden beautiful beyond all description, and in comparison with whom even fairies would be plain-looking.

Verses:—Her form a palm, made by Mercy's hand;

The charms of grace her head adorned;

Her features Irem's garden's samples were,

With various hues of roses blooming;

Her chin so wonderfully beautiful,

Its dimple a well of immortality;

Her waist so slim and thin and accurate;

No one was ever born here beneath

To see her face and not to lose his heart.

At the sight of Jâsal's beauty the Sultân of love took possession of the Shâh's heart, and erected the flag of affection towards her in his breast, captivating him like a bird in the lasso of her curls.

The charms of love find entrance through the ear,

They rob the mind of peace, the heart of sense;

But sight makes grow the seed which speech has cast,—

Yes, hearing is but seeing's seed.

In short, the Shâh's passion was so fervent that he immediately asked for the hand of Jâsal, but the Ahir abhorred the uncongenial union of a Hindu maiden with a Muhammadan, and Hamir Sumrâ became angry.

Distich :—Patience abides not in a lover's heart,
Nor water in a sieve.

Accordingly he ordered the guards of the road to allow no one to pass in the direction of Sorathâ ; nevertheless Jâsal managed to send the following lines by means of a courier, who was quick as the lightning and rapid as the wind, secretly to her friend Naughan :—

Verses :—" My lord, have pity with my case :
I am in great calamity ;
I have no helper thee beside ;
Thou wilt distressed persons aid ;
My shame and honour do defend ;
Show me the road to our own land."

In conclusion, she besought Naughan to protect the honour of his adopted sister, in the same way as Śrī Kṛishṇa had protected Draupadi from her persecutors. As soon as Naughan had received these lines and perused them, he immediately collected an army consisting of Râjputs, Ahirs, Kolis, Kâthîs, Khânts, Bâbriâs, and Mers in order to punish the godless Sumrâ, and marched by the way of Kachh through Lakhpatnagar to Sindh.

Distich :—

His numbers of the army when they took
The coats of mail three lākhs they found to be.

Distich :—

His tongue he from his mouth protruded ;

His breath had missed the way, and fast it stuck.

He coiled himself up like a snake in his rage, and roared like a famished lion, and was impatiently expecting Naughan, who was meanwhile approaching with an army reaching from the boundary of Kâsmîr to the mountains of Mekrân, turbulent like the waves of the ocean, countless in numbers, with fire-vomiting cannon, lightning-throwing guns, blood-shedding muskets, and all sorts of engines. The battle was fought on a fine morning, and the forces of Sumrâ were so arranged that his left flank consisted of Sammâs and Sumrâs, whilst his right consisted of Kâbulîs and Kâsmîrîs ; with the van were Mir Behrâm, Ibrâhim Kulikhân, and Jangiz Khân, while Mirza Kuli, A'li Haidar the lord of the Subâh of Peshâwar, and Shâdâdkhân Ghaznavi who kindled the flames of war, were with the centre ; whilst on the opposite the foe-breaking Mahârâja Sakatsing and Jakatsing Jâdu, Nâg Jetwâ and others, with a multitude of Kâthîs, such as Harsur Khâchar, and Devsur Wâlâ, and Nâgdân Khumân, and Râo Nunsar and Bahru Lâkâ, and Hirâ Kachhân on the left, and Pâṇḍurang Apâ, and Ganpat Râo Nimbalkar, and Bhujang Râo Bhonslâ were placed in the van, and with crowds of Ghâṭîs and others pushed on to meet the foe. When the opposite lines were arranged, a brisk cannonade opened the battle from both sides, followed by musketry fire* according to the Faranghi fashion, which sent many to their eternal rest and brought numberless heads to the ground. Afterwards the mêlée began, in which spears and swords were used promiscuously with darts, clubs, and arrows. The battle lasted from morning till evening, and Sumrâ was put to flight with his Baluchis, leaving hills of corpses on the field. The Râjputs delivered Jâsal and took her, with all her friends, with many Lohânâs, Bhâtîâs, Khatrîs, Sarasvatis, and other Hindu castes, with some Sindhîs and Musulmâns, with their wives and children, whom they established in the country about Junâgaḍh. Chroniclers narrate that so many long-bearded but short-lived Sindhîs were slain that a bridge was made of their bodies across the Salt Raṇ, over which the army passed. Much plunder fell into the hands of the courtiers of the Râja, who obtained also a lākḥ of gold ingots from his invasion of Sindh, and used them in building the temple of Petha Devî in Hâlâr, but in lieu of one of them, which the brother-in-law of the Râja had kept back, his own head was inserted in the wall; God, however, knows best. Noghan Râja has passed away and left a good name.

RÂJA KHENGÂR, SON OF NAUGHAN.

Râo Khengâr ascended the throne in Samvat

* The author evidently forgot, when writing this, that firearms were not in use in Naughan's time.

916 (A.D. 859), and marched with a large army intending to raze the fort of Pàttan, in Gujarrât, to the ground; as Siddha Râo happened at that time to be away on some business and at a great distance, Khengâr made use of the opportunity to carry off some stones from that fort, wherewith he built the Kâlva gate at Junâgadh. To take vengeance for this insult the son of Siddha Râo afterwards invaded Junâgadh, and Khengâr being pursued by his foes the thread of his life was snapped in the vicinity of Bagasara, but Rânî Rânîk Devdî, his spouse, was captured, and the Amirs intended to make a present of her to the Mahârâja Siddha Râo. The Rânî, however, endued with a keen sense of modesty peculiar to the innocent, took refuge in the temple of Śankara, lord of the world, situated on the Bhogâvâ river and exclaimed,—

Hemistich :—

Thou modesty hast granted, preserve my honour !
All of a sudden the surface of the earth was opened by the will of that Concealer, and she leaped of her own accord into the gap, which thus became her grave.

Distich :—

The bosom of the earth was quickly opened ;
She entered, like the soul, the abode of dust.

Another account about Rânîk Devdî is that she was originally the daughter of Râja Siddha Râo, and that by the aid of their knowledge of stellar influences astrologers made the statement that she would be married to her own father. This information so distressed the Rāja that he exposed the infant girl in a lonely place to become the food of birds of prey. But, as everything decreed by fate must take place, it happened by the providence of God that a potter took the little maiden from the desert, and being much pleased brought her up; afterwards he happened to go to Sorāṭha, where he presented her to Rā Khengār, and informed her that she was the daughter of Rāja Siddha Rāo, lest she might become imbued with hatred towards her own father, on account of which she afterwards sacrificed her life, which event took place in Sāṃvat 952 (A.D. 895).

MULARĀJA AND NAUGHAN.

The reign of Khengār lasted thirty-six years; his son Mularāja ascended the throne in Sāṃvat 952, and reigned thirty-five years and six months. Rāja Jakhrā, son of Mularāja, began to reign in Sāṃvat 987, and he reigned for twenty-one years. Rāja Ganrāj, son of Jakhrā, became king in Sāṃvat 1009, and reigned for thirty-eight years and four months. Rāja Maṇḍalika, son of Ganrāj, mounted the throne of Sorāṭha in Sāṃvat 1047.

FIGHT OF RĀJA MAṆḌALIKA WITH MAHMUD GHAZNAVI.

The hateful Sultān Maḥmūd Ghaznavi marched with an army from Ghaznin to Gujarāt with the intention of carrying on a religious war. In Sarnvat 1078 (A.D. 1021, A.H. 414) he demolished the temple of Sri Somanāth and returned. This act so provoked the Mahārāja Maṇḍalika, who was a protector of his own religion, that he marched with Bhim Deva, the Rāja of Gujarāt, in pursuit :

They ran like fawns and leaped like onagers,
As lightning now, and now outvying wind !

The Muhammadans did not make a great stand, but fled ; many of them were slain by Hindu scymitars and prostrated by Rājput war-clubs, and when the sun of the Rāja's fortune culminated Shāh Maḥmūd took to his heels in dismay and saved his life, but many of his followers, of both sexes, were captured. Turkish, Afghān, and Moghul female prisoners were, if they happened to be virgins, considered pure according to their own belief, and were without any difficulty taken as wives ; the bowels of the others, however, were cleansed by means of emetics and purgatives, and the captives were after that disposed of according to the command, "The wicked women to the wicked men, and the good women to the good men" [Qorān, xxiv. 26] ; the low females were joined to low men. Respectable men were compelled to shave their beards, and were enrolled among the Shekāvāt and the Wādhel tribes of Rājputs ; whilst the lower kinds were allotted to the castes of Kolis, Khānts, Bābriās, and Mōrs. All, however, were allowed to retain the wedding and funeral ceremonies current among themselves, and to remain aloof from those of other classes ; but God knows best.

During the reign of Maṇḍalika, dharmaśālās, temples, tanks, bridges, and vāṭs were constructed, and it lasted forty-eight years and two months.

HAMIRA DEVA, VIJAYÂPÂLA, NAUGHAN, &c.

Râja Hamira Deva, the son of Râja Maṇḍalika, began to reign in Samvat 1095 ; he exercised both justice and equity, and the country prospered more than under his father ; he governed it during thirteen years and some days.

Râja Vijayâpâla, the son of Râja Hamira Deva, ascended the throne in Samvat 1108, and sat on it for fifty-four years and six months.

The reign of Râja Naughan, son of Râja Vijayâpâla, began in 1162, and lasted two years.

Râja Maṇḍalika, the son of Naughan, began to reign in 1184, and died eleven years afterwards.

Râja Alansingh, the son of Maṇḍalika, commenced to reign in Soratha in 1195, and his government lasted fourteen years.

Râja Dhaneśh, the son of Alansingh, became Râja in the year 1209, and reigned five* years.

Râja Naughan, son of Naughan, obtained the râj in 1214, and reigned nine years.

Râo Kheṅgâr came to the throne in 1224 (A.D. 1167), and reigned forty-six years.

* Some copies have ' nine.'

Rāja Maṇḍalika, son of Rāja Khengâr, placed the diadem of rāja-ship on his head in the Saṁvat year 1270, and reigned twenty-two* years three months and twenty-two days.

Rāja Maḥipâla, son of Maṇḍalika, began to reign in 1302; he reigned thirty-four† years five months and three days.

Rāja Kheṅgâr, the son of Maḥipâla, began to reign on the 12th Mâghasar in Saṁvat 1336 (A.D. 1279). He conquered eighteen islands such as Div Bhet, Śankhodar, and others, and repaired the temple of Somanâth, which the Musulmân Sultâns had destroyed; his reign lasted fifty-four years and thirteen days. During his time Shams Khân arrived, by order of Firôz Shâh, and took Junâgaḍh after a little struggle, whereupon Rāja Khengâr took refuge on Mount Girnâr, and thus saved his life, but the town was plundered.

JAYASINGH.

Jayasingh, son of Rāja Khengâr, became Rāja in Saṁvat 1390, and reigned eleven years eight months and eleven days.

Rāja Mugatsingh, son of Jayasingh, also called Mokalsingh, ascended the throne on the 6th Bhadrava in Saṁvat 1402, and retained it for fourteen years and thirteen days.

Rāja Madhupat, son of Mugatsingh, commenced to reign on the 4th of Ashvad in Samvat 1412.* He reigned five years one month and six days.

Rāja Maṇḍalika, son of Madhupat, began to reign on the 10th of Kārtika Śud in Samvat 1421. His reign lasted seventeen years six months and three days.

Rāja Melak, the brother of Maṇḍalika, who was the son of a slave-girl, began his reign in Samvat 1439, and it lasted eleven years eleven months and twenty-four days.

Rāja Jayasingh, the son of Melak, became king in the Samvat year 1468. He reigned for eighteen years three months and fourteen days. He took the fort of Zanjirah (?) from the Musulmāns, who, asking for and obtaining quarter, evacuated the place.

Rāja Khengār bin Jayasingh mounted the throne in Samvat 1486. When the Pādishāh Aḥmad Gujarāti marched his army to aid the Muhammadan religion and to overthrow the government of Junāgaḍh, Khengār, the son of Jayasingh, and his Divān, Hira Singh, who was a Nāgar, being unable to resist him, took refuge in the fort of Uparkoṭ, and remained there in safety in Samvat 1470, but eventually they died, and the town was plundered, and Sayyid Kāsam and Sayyid Abul-Khair, who were left with a thānah to collect the salāmi, bestowed jāgirs on the Muhamāmadans both in the city and pargana, and caused them to settle there, and also, with a view of advancing their own religion, they caused Musulmāns of the Sindhi, Baluch, and Jat tribes, as well as Khokhars, Maliks, Multānis, Khuraishis, Afghāns, and Ghoris to settle there, and made them solemnly promise to shave their beards, and not to kill cows, and keep in their mosques painted or carved figures of the Jalādhāris and of the Śiva-linga, which custom is still observed in those parts. At that time Toghlak Shāh, the Sultān of Dehli, also devastated the town. His reign lasted for twenty years.

SULTĀN MAHMUD CAPTURES RĀJA MAṆDALIKA.

He began to reign in Samvat 1489. Kiwamu'-l-Mulk, Āmir of Sultān Maḥmūd, ravaged the country of Junāgaḍh in Samvat 1520, and in Samvat 1524 took from the Rāja his gold umbrella, and after another two years had passed he again ravaged the city and country. Afterwards Sultān Maḥmūd Gujarāti conquered Junāgaḍh at the instigation of a Vāpiā named Visal, who was the Kāmdār of the Rāja. The Visal Wāv is a memorial of him. When the Sultān was about to invade Junāgaḍh, he ordered his treasurer to get ready five krors of rupees of ready cash consisting only of gold, the armourer to procure 1700 sword-hilts of Maghrabi, Yamāni, Egyptian, and Khorāsāni manufacture, each weighing from six śirs of gold, according to the weight of Gujarât, to four śirs ; again 3300 hilts of Ahmadâbâd made of silver, and of weights varying between four and five śirs ; 1700 large daggers, the hilt of each weighing from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 śirs of gold ; and the chief equerry to get ready 2000 Arab and Turkish horses, and thus equipped he arrived at Junâgadh and laid siege to the city.

The reason why Visal the Vâñiâ instigated Sultân Maḥmûd to come with an army was this :—The Vâñiâ Visal possessed a wife whose face was like that of a fairy, and whom to see was like beholding a hûri ; her waist was slim, her brows arched. Her name was Manmohan. One of her glances enfeathered the heart of Râja Maṇḍalika with the chains of her amber ringlets, so that he, captive as he was in the net of her musked curls, having by the tricks of a crafty procuress obtained access to his mistress, fully enjoyed himself with her. When Visal the Vâñiâ became aware that his conjugal happiness had been destroyed, he determined to avenge himself, and invited Sultân Maḥmûd Gujarâti to invade Junâgadh. The Sultân, who longed for such news as a fasting man longs for the sound “ Allah Akbar,” and who was desirous of this wealth which was to be got for nothing, at once marched in that direction with a powerful army. In a short time, by the advice of the base Visal, Râja Maṇḍalika fell captive into the Shâh’s hands. During the siege the Sultân bestowed on the sipâhîs five krors of gold, besides houses, farms, and dresses of honour, and after the Râja had embraced Islâm he bestowed on him the title of Khân Jahân, and his tomb is in the Mânikebok in the bâzâr of Ahmâdâbâd. The fortress of Junâgadh fell into the hands of Sultân Mahmud in Samvat 1527 (A.D. 1470), and after two years he restored the country to his offspring in jâgir. And another account of the destruction of the kingdom of the Râos, who are also known by the title of Râizâdahs, is this.

THE STORY OF MEHTA NARSI.

The fame of the god-knowing devotee, the walker in the paths of righteousness and abstemiousness, Mehtâ Sâheb Narsi, the Nâgar, is known from pole to pole, and also the miracles performed by him have spread abroad in all directions. Offended at the ill-humour of his brother's wife, Narsi one day left the house and went to the house of his god, as represented by the temple of Mahâdeva Gopinâth, where he spent several days in fasting, penance, and prayer. At last the ocean of boundless grace was seething, the cloud of divine favour thundering and an invisible angelic herald conveyed these words to the ear of Narsi:—"I have placed the enjoyment of corporal desire and the pleasures of this world at the disposal of the lord Śrî Kṛishna. You shall behold the spectacle of the Râs Mandali, the dancing and the singing of the Gopis, with your bodily eyes. Put into poetry and declare again what you have seen, in order that those who listen to your songs may obtain eternal salvation." Narsi Mehtâ complied; since that time nearly 370 years have elapsed, but high and low still sing his hymns, and thus accumulate provision for their final beatitude:—

Hemistich—The moon is always present in the world!

Narṣi Mehtâ was a man destitute of money, and associated with Vairâgîs and Bhaktîs, who tramp about the country; nevertheless when his son Sâmalâs was celebrating his wedding with the daughter of a Nâgar, Madanji of Vaḍanagar, he miraculously came into the possession of various kinds of chariots, horses with gold ornaments, rich clothes and jewels. Kuvarabâi, the daughter of Narsi Mehtâ, was married to the son of Śrî Ranga Mehtâ, an inhabitant of Ūnâ (under Junâgaḍh), in Jhaveripûra street. Afterwards Narsi appeared with his two ears and nose in Ūnâ to attend the ceremony of pregnancy, and said to his daughter, "Ask your mother-in-law to prepare a list of the garments called Mâmerâ in Hindi, that I may make arrangements for obtaining them." Kuvarabâi replied, with her eyes full of tears, her heart sad, and voice mournful, "In these bad times such a hope is impossible. Such things are at the disposal of wealthy people; be satisfied with having seen me, and depart in peace." Narsi Mehtâ replied, "Let not your heart be dismayed; the Most High will take care of us, and will not allow us to despair. Get the list quickly, and be not down-hearted." Kuvarabâi obeyed, and a list was mockingly prepared, to realize which would have been beyond the means even of wealthy people. On that occasion Kuvarabâi's father-in-law said, "Let them also write for two make-weight stones of gold, that the wind may not carry away the garments of Narsi Mehtâ." The list made by the mother-in-law was given to Narsi Mehtâ, who prayed to the eternal Benefactor and universal Giver; when, lo, a merchant from the invisible world, whose name was Dâmodar Shet, and his wife Lakhmi Bâi, arrived with several clerks and carts loaded with goods. This man exclaimed, "I am one of the Gumâstas of Narsi Mehtâ, and having selected from various countries the articles he wanted for the Mâmerâ, have brought them." The people of Śrī Ranga Mehtâ were amazed at what they saw, and at what was coming. The merchants proceeded immediately to open the packages, and to display to those who were present in the assembly more articles than had been written for, together with two golden stones, several suits of clothes, ornaments, and vessels, whereupon all praised the bounty of the universal Giver, and reviled the mockers and unbelievers. The women of the family had prepared water for the purposes of ablution before the repast, which was boiling hot; and as it was not possible to wash without the aid of cold water, which the unbelievers had removed by way of trial, such a rain began to pour, by the liberality of Śankara, that the water of shame was running down the countenances of the members of the family who had played this trick.

Once some jokers induced Narsi Mehtā to write a hundi for certain Vairāgis, who went with it to Dvārakā, but were, after a great deal of searching, disappointed in their inquiries after the banker to whom the hundi was addressed, and they began to revile Narsi, when, lo, a banker made his appearance, accompanied by two clerks, from the invisible world, and having taken the hundi from the Vairāgis counted out ready money to them.

In spite of beholding so many evident miracles, Rāja Maṇḍalika prohibited Narsi Mehtā from propagating the Vaishṇava sect; but, not being able to obtain compliance, he convoked a meeting of Sanyāsis, who sever all connections, and utter no other formula except "He is one and has no partner," as well as of Veda reading Brāhmaṇs, to decide the controversy. The Sanyāsis opened the meeting with the declaration of the unity, the adoration, and praise of the god, who exists from all eternity, and said, "Listen to the words of truth, and abandon the path of Vaishṇava; if you pay not attention to it, you will at last hear what no one has ever heard. Abandon the worship of idols, the playing on musical instruments, singing poems, and the praise of love and beauty, which lead carnal men into error." Narsi Mehtâ, however, replied :—

Distich :—

— "Each tribe its way, its faith and Qebla has.

To rosy cheeks my worship I address.

The way of lovers is unknown to angels, then what will be the case with you ? O ye wearers of red rags, who retail nonsense, are emaciated by poverty and distress, and who have learnt nothing beyond sitting in deserted places and smearing yourselves with loam, what can you know about the pleasures and ecstasies of image-worship ?

Distich :—

"Reflex of the Friend's face we see in cups !

O ye who do not know the bliss of wine !

What will these conversations about the Vedânta and arguments from the law avail you against those who are plunged in corporeal delights and carnal pleasures ?

Distich :—

"That bitter drink the Soft wicked calls

More sweetness gives to us than virgins' kisses."

By degrees the controversy went beyond mere words, and the disputants caught hold of each other's throats and hair, and Râja Maṇḍalika exclaimed, "What profit is there in this useless talk ? If Hazrat Dâmodar Râi, whom this Nâgar worships, stone as he is, will take off from his own neck a flower-garland and give it to this Nâgar, we will leave him to his own ways ; but if not, he is to be killed." Narsi Mehtā was brought to the idol of Dāmodar Rāi, whom he immediately began fervently to address, in fear of his life and of his honour, but at first ineffectually, because some delay had taken place in the bestowal of the garland. The reason was that Narsi had pledged the Rāg Kedārā, which he was to have sung for Dāmodar Rāi, to the Mehtā Dharanidās in the Qasbā of Talājā for eighty rupees, and therefore could not sing it on the present occasion. The Father of all goodness and succour of the needy was so bountiful as to assume the form of the debtor, i.e. of Mehtā Narsi, and to pay the above-mentioned amount to the creditor, in return for which he received the bond, which he threw from the sky in the presence of the whole meeting, whereupon Narsi Mehtā immediately began to sing the Rāg Kedārā, and obtained the garland of flowers, which the idol put upon Narsi. Some of the revilers became black in the face, whilst others felt their cheeks slapped. Mehtā Narsi obtained the garland in Samvat 1512, and for the crime of insulting so innocent a worshipper of the god the Maṇḍalika dynasty lost the throne for ever.

It is related that a Nāghi Chārani, who was a modest woman, dwelt in the village of Moniyā, in the parganah of Bagasarā and tālukā of Junāgaḍh, in a virtuous and retired manner. Rāja Maṇḍalika, who had heard of the beauty of her son Nāgājan's wife, betook himself to the chase of that gazelle-eyed maiden. This Chârani girl rose to see the Râja pass, but when he caught sight of the unveiled countenance of that fairy he removed the curtain of modesty from his own heart, and, obeying his lust and passion, attempted to place his hand on her breast, but she guessed his intention, and, turning away her face, cursed him saying, "The bride of your prosperity will turn from you as I do now, and will associate you with Musulmân Pâdishâhs;" and this was the second cause why Mahârâja Maṇḍalika lost the throne.

Distich :—

Wherefore attach your heart to this world's beauty ?
Of a thousand bridegrooms the bride she is.

It is said that Jamial the Darvaish,* whose takia or chapel is on the mountain, was present when this affair of the Nâghi Chârani took place. The duration of his reign was forty years; and for 128 years after Mahârâja Maṇḍalika, till the reign of Sultân Akbar, his descendants sometimes prospered and sometimes did not; sometimes they were conquered, at other times they were conquerors and reigned; at last, however, they obtained Chorvâḍ, Kesod, and other places as jâgirs, and became entirely tributary. Their names are here given :—

RÂJA BHUPAT SINGH BIN MAṆḌALIKA

Became Râja in Samvat 1529 [1528]. The

* This is Jamial Shâh, whose shrine is on the Dâtâr at Junâgadh.

Sultân kept him as a jâgirdâr at Junâgaḍh, but the Thânahdâr on behalf of the Pâdishâh was Tâtâr Khân bin Zafar Khân, the adopted son of Sultân Muḥammad, and he levied the salâmi (land-tax). The reign of Bhupat Sing lasted 31 years. Mirza Khalil likewise beat the drum of dominion, and founded the place Khalilpur, near Junâgaḍh.

RÂJA KHENGÂR, SON OF RÂJA BHUPAT SINGH.

He began to reign in Samvat 1560, and his râj lasted 22 years and 4 months; and the Thânahdârs of the Pâdishâh were Malik Ayâz and Tâtâr Khân Ghorî, who collected the salâmi.

RÂJA NAUGHAN, SON OF KHENGÂR.

He became Râja in Samvat 1581, and his râj lasted 28 years 11 months and 20 days; Sayyid Kâsam and Mujâhid Khân Behlim were the Pâdishâhi Thânahdârs.

RÂJA ŚRÎ SINGH, SON OF NAUGHAN.

He became Râja in Samvat 1608, and his râj lasted 34 years 1 month and 10 days. Khân Âzam Kokaltâsh, who became the Subahdâr of Ahmadâbâd in place of Khân Khânân, conquered Junâgaḍh in Samvat 1633.

RÂJA KHENGÂR, SON OF ŚRÎ SINGH.

He became Râja in Samvat 1642. In his time Sultân Maḥmûd and Bahâdur Shâh Gujarâti often came and sojourned at Junâgaḍh. In aid of Sultân Muzaffar Gujarâti this Râja raised confusion in Gujarât in 1647. That Shâh bestowed Junâgadh in jâgir on Âmin Khân, son of Tâtâr Khân Ghorî, Thânahdâr of Junâgadh, but he rebelled, whereupon Fateh Khân Shirwâni brought an army on the part of Mirza Khân, son of Bahrâm Khân, who had the title of Khân Khânân, and plundered the town of Junâgadh in Samvat 1633; but Fateh Khân himself died, while Âmin Khân remained safe under the protection of the fortress, which was, however, after the death of Fateh Khân, besieged by Khân Khânân, who led an army against it and erected batteries, but being unsuccessful he raised the siege and went to beleaguer Mângrol. Hereupon Âmin Khân sallied forth from the fort, and asking aid from Jâm Satarsâl marched to give battle; on this Mirza Khân raised the siege, and went forward and ravaged the Koḍinâr district, but his elephants were captured and carried off by Jâm Satarsâl's army. Âmin Khân bin Tâtâr Khân, and the untrustworthy Itimâd Khân, and the hapless Daulat Khân, had, in spite of their accepting a bribe of two lākhs of Jâmis from Sulṭân Akbar, resolved to join Muzaffar Shâh and Khengâr. They now summoned Jâm Satâji from Nagar to their aid, and rewarded him with thirty-six villages, as will be related in the chronicles of Nagar. The reign of Khengâr lasted for 22 years, and Tâtâr Khân was for thirteen years the imperial thânahdâr, together with the Chuḍâsamâ Râis.

Note.—On the Chudāsamā Dynast.

The reigns of the first four kings beginning with Navaghana I. extend over 151 years, and then a blank occurs of 22 years between Navaghana II. and his successor Maṇḍalika I. Otherwise the list is pretty consistent, and gains support from the inscription on Mount Girnār. I give it, corrected by the inscription, for what it is worth, inserting such additions from other sources, and conjectural corrections in the dates, as seem required. These corrections are applied only to the dates when converted into A.D., and where doubtful are marked with a (?).

904? Rā Dyās or Dyāchh, the third in descent from Rā Gāriyo, the grandson of Rā Chudāchand, and first of the Chudāsamās of Junāgaḍh. Rā Dyās was defeated and slain by the king of Paṭṭan, S. 874 (? 917 A.D.) (Ind. Ant. vol. II. pp. 312ff.) Some copies give S. 874 as the date of Naughan's accession, and allow 42 years for his reign. Tod (Travels, p. 469), counting Chudāchand as the fortieth prince before his own time, and the eighth before Jām Unaḍ, whom he places in S. 1110, assumes that Chudāchand must have lived about S. 960. Very little dependence, however, can be placed on such a computation. He says he was contemporary with Rām Kamār, the fourteenth prince of Ghumli.

* Amarji omits Naughana after Maṇḍalika, to whom he assigns a reign of 22 years 3½ months, beginning in S. 1270, and then makes Mahīpāla's reign begin in S. 1302, leaving 10 years unaccounted for, or about the same time as Navaghan IV. reigned.

part of the twelfth century, is meant. If this were the case, Amarji's chronology would be useless;—an interval of 200 years would occur between Siddharāja Jayasinha (d. 1142 A.D.) and his successor Mokalasinha or Magatsinha 1345 A.D.

* Amarji gives the three successors of Mugatsinha in the order—Madhupat, 5 years (S. 1416-1421); Maṇḍalika, 17½ years (S. 1421-1439); and Melakdeva, his illegitimate brother, 12 years (S. 1439-1450). This he probably derived from an inscription (of S. 1473) at the Revatikunḍa, which gives the genealogy thus:—Maṇḍalika III.; his son Mahipāla; his son Khangāra IV.; his son Jayasinha; his son Mugatsinha; his sons Maṇḍalika and Melak; and Jayasinha, son of Melak. The chronology in the text is confirmed by the Maṇḍalika Kāvya. I have allowed the dates S. 1421 and 1439 to stand, but probably they should be altered to 1428 and 1433.

- 1450 1393 Jayasimhadēva II. (apparently "the Rāt of Jehrend" or "Jiran" mentioned by Firishtah* as defeated by Muzaffar Khān of Gujarāt in A.D. 1411). He is said to have taken Zanjirah (Jbinjhira?) from the Muhammadans.

- 1489 1432 Maṇḍalika V. restored the Uparkoṭ in S. 1507; subdued by Maḥmūd Begarha in A.D. 1469-70.‡

After their subjugation to the Aḥmadābād kings the dynasty seems to have been preserved as tributary Jāghirdārs for another century; the list of these princes stands thus:—

- A.D. 1472, Bhupat, cousin of Maṇḍalika V., 32 years.
 „ 1503, Khangāra VI., son of Bhupat, 22 years.
 „ 1524, Naughana VI., son of Khangāra, 25 years.
 „ 1551, Śrī Sinha, 35 years; Gujarāt subdued by Akbar:
 „ 1585, Khangāra VII., till about 1609.

Rāja Raisingh, Abdullah Khān one year, and Tātār Khān Lodi thirteen years. Isā Tar Khān became in Samvat 1687 the Mutasaddi of this glorious country, Junāgaḍh, and built the town wall in 1690. The Sayyids, the Kāzīs, the Mōmans and Bohrās were introduced by Sultān Maḥmūd. Isā Tar Khān governed for ten years, and in his time the English established themselves in Hugli.

Mirza Khurram* ruled the first time for three years; Kutb-al-dīn Khān Kākar one year; Bhovāldās one year; Kamrān Bōg two years; Abu'l Kāsim one year; Sardār Khān one year; Mirzā Khurram for the second time one year; Sādu'llah Khān eight years, Bāgi Khān one year; Jabāngir Kuli Khān one year; Behrām Khān one year; Amir Khān one year; Sāleh Tar Khān two years; Shams Khān and Kutb-al-dīn Khān one year; the Shāhzādah Murād Bakhsh two years; Muḥammad Khān one year; Sardār Khān fifteen years. He was of a noble disposition, and laid out the Sardārbāgh in the west of Junāgaḍh, which contains a harem, a tank, baths, a mosque, an idgah, and tombs; this garden is the mole of beauty on the countenance of the town. The garden was laid out by Ghorī Pir, one of Sardār Khān's companions, and for some time—that is, till Samvat 1732—Zāhid Khan was Nāib on the part of Sardār Khān. The date of the Navāb

Sardâr Khân's demise [1732] is contained in the words

"An unparalleled rose departed from the garden of the world."

If from the words باغ عالم, the sum of which is A.H. 1144, the numerical value of گل 50 be subtracted, we obtain A.H. 1094, in which the Sardârbâgh was made, i.e. Samvat 1740.

Abel Patan governed three years; Mukim Khân three years; Mirza Khurram for the third time four years; Sad'ullah for the second time four years; Kutb-al-dîn Khân five years; Divân Sakhânand with Muhammad Beg five years; Ja'far Khân one year; Sardâr Khân two years; Sarbuland Khân one year in Samvat 1763; Sherafgan Khân two years; Pirsâheb and Divân Udyarâm one year. He became governor in Samvat 1764. Sangarâm Singh, the Nâib of the Mahârâja Ajitsingh and Divân Pratâpsingh, one year; Navâb Yâsin Khân and Kârbhârî Udyarâm one year; Dilâwar Khân and his Kârbhârî Jagatsingh nine months [or three years]; Pir Sâheb for the second time, and the Shâhzâdah's Divân, and Kâhandâs the Vâniâ for the second time, two years and three months; the Shâhzâdah and Divân Mukbil Khân four years Ma'sum Beg Khân three years and two months; * Jangli Khân one year; Kâzi A'bd-al Hamid two years; he required every night several women, and took forcible possession of the village of Mendarâ. In this manner during 106 years the governors who came from the Shâhs of Gujarât and Dehli spent their time dishonourably, like owls in a wilderness, and did nothing worthy of record.

Asad Kuli Khân was the Mutasaddi of Junâgadh in Samvat 1778, who plundered the country, and he kept also Salâbat Khân Bâbi and Sher Khân Bâbi as his Nâibs; and Sharfud'dîn was his treasurer. In his time Shujaat Khân arrived in this zillâ from Gujarât to collect the peshkash. His government lasted six years.

Ghulâm Mâhyau'd-dîn Khân, after the demise of his father, was appointed by the cabinet of Sultân Muḥammad Shâh to be Foujdâr of Junâgadh, in Samvat 1784; he on his part also made the above-mentioned Salâbat Muḥammad Bâbi his Nâib, who governed personally for a while, and then left his son Sher Khân, surnamed Bahâdur Khân, as his deputy, and went to Ahmadâbâd. Sher Khân obtained the ijarah or farm of the revenues of Junâgadh, for the sum of eighty thousand rupees, from Ghulâm Mâhyau'd-dîn.

In Samvat 1785 [1789] Mubâriz-al-mulk, surnamed Sarbuland Khân, accompanied by Sher Khân, arrived with an army and took the fort of Mâdbavpur; in this fight Ranchoddâs Nâgar, the Thânahdâr of the Rânâ Vikramâtji, was slain after a brave resistance, and the idol of Pârasnâth taken away; but afterwards ransomed for 40,000 Jāmīs [kodīs]. In Samvat 1787 Salābat Muḥammad Bābi departed this life, and in the same year Sher Khān, surnamed Bahādur Khān, was removed, and Mir Ismāil was appointed in his stead by Ghulām Māhyau'd-dīn; Pilāji Gaikvād also came the same year with an army to Sorath. In Samvat 1789 Mir Fakhr-al-dīn came with an army to take charge of Junāgaḍh as its Foujdār, but when he arrived in the plain of Amreli he was met and opposed by Mir Ismāil and his Divān Bhavānidās, a Vaiṣṇava Nāgar; and in that same zillā a battle was fought in which Mir Fakhr-al-dīn and Sayyid A'kali Khān were slain after a heroic battle; their camp was plundered, and Mir Ismāil returned victorious. In the same year Ghulām Māhyau'd-dīn died; his government lasted four years.

Nahr Khān, known as Hazabar Khān, son of Asad Kuli Khān, after the demise of his brother Ghulām Māhyau'd-dīn, obtained the sanad of Junāgaḍh from Muḥammad Shāh, and left Mir Ismāil in his former position. One year after this, the Navāb Sohrāb Khān, at the behest of Mahārāja Ajitsingh, the Subāh of Ahmadābād, ousted Sher Zemān Khān and Diler Khān from their jāgir of the port Goghā, and Mir Ismāil Khān from his post in Junāgaḍh, where, however, he still remained as a private person; but when the Navāb Sohrāb Khān took possession of the city he departed by sea to Thāthā. Junāgaḍh was taken in the year 1790 of the era of Vikrama.

In Samvat 1792 Sohrâb Khân, through Burhânu'l-mulk, obtained a sanad for Viramgâm from the cabinet of the Shâh, and went there with an army, leaving Sâdak 'Ali Khân in Junâgadh; but the latter was of so weak a disposition that he allowed robbers to plunder the shops of the bâzâr in broad daylight, and to carry off the people as captives. When Sohrâb Khân went from this place, he was prevented from entering Viramgâm by Ratan Sing Bhândâri, and by the commander of the troops, Safdar Khân Bâbi, against whom he fought for three days and then lost his life, but his maternal uncle lived in Junâgadh for some time longer, in poor circumstances.

In Samvat 1793 Hazabar Khân again arrived with a sanad, and Sâdak 'Ali Khân, being degraded from his position in Junâgadh, entered the service of the Navâb Momin Khân, whom he aided in besieging Ahmadâbâd; and, as a blood-ransom for Ânupsing, who was slain fighting with Sohrâb Khân, his son Bhairavasing obtained the parganah of Upletâ in inâm from Ahmadâbâd. In this year Nâdir Shâh of Irân conquered Muḥammad Shâh and plundered Dehli.

When Hazabar Khân arrived for the second time, he left Mir Dost A'li as his Nâib in Junâgadh; and the latter, being perplexed how to pay the sipâhîs, sent for Bahâdur Khân Bâbi, who was ruling the port of Goghâ on behalf of the Navâb Momin Khân, and surrendered to him the Subâh of Junâgadh without any further ado in Samvat 1794.

As good luck would have it, Hazabar Khân in that very year disappeared like a fox into the obscurity of destruction at Dehli.

NAVÂB SÂHER BAHÂDUR KHÂN BÂBÎ

Was the son of Salâbat Khân, who was the son of Safdar Khân, who was the son of Jâfar Khân,* who was the son of Sher Khân, the son of Bahâdur Khân Bâbi. As the author was in the service of this family, he conceived it incumbent upon himself to give some account of it.

Bahâdur Khân Bâbi the Afghân was for a long time at the court of the emperor Shâh Jahân, and became a favourite on account of his affable manners, his bravery, and his good family. He was presented with a jâgir in Gujarât, and when the star of his prosperity began to rise he obtained advancement from the governors and high officials of Ahmadâbâd. He farmed the revenues of the parganahs of Kardi, Viramgâm, Bijâpur, and other mahâls several times, sometimes from the Shâhi or imperial Subâdârs, and sometimes from the Sarkârs of the Śrimant Peshvâ and the Gaikvâd on his own responsibility; he used also to precede the army which came from Ahmadâbâd to receive the peshkash or tribute, and to stand security for the payments which the zamindârs of Gujarât and Sorâtha had to make; and some time afterwards the Mahârâja Ajitsingh, who was appointed to the Subâhdâri of Ahmadâbâd, bestowed upon him the title of Bahâdur, and Sarbuland Khân bestowed on him the title of Khân. In Samvat 1799 Kumâl-al-din Khân Bâbi was appointed Nâib of Ahmadâbâd, first on behalf of Makbûl A'âlam, and afterwards on the part of Fakhr-al-daulah ('Boast of the monarchy'), who was in reality Kharr-al-daula ('Ass of the monarchy'); he governed ten years at Ahmadâbâd, and in Samvat 1810 received the jâgirs of Khedâ, Wâdâsinor,* and Goghâ from the Śrimant Sâheb Peshvâ and from the Gaikvâd. From the Sarkâr of the Śrimant Peshvâ and from the Huzûr of Bâlâji Râo and Dâmâji Gaikvâd, when they took possession of Ahmadâbâd, he also obtained the following nine places:—Pirânpattan, Vadnagar, Visalnagar, Munjpur, Tharâd, Kherâlu, Bijâpûr, Sami. In course of time Pattan, Vadnagar, Visalnagar, and Bijâpûr were again taken, and Dâmâji Gaikvâd Shamsheer Bahâdur besieged Visalnagar for a year and a half till he was able to retake it, at which time Zorâvar Khân was slain, in Samvat 1819.

in Samvat 1787, and in the same year Bahādur Khān was dismissed from Junāgaḍh; in that year also Pilāji Gaikvād came with his troops to collect the jama' bandi or tribute of Sorāṭha, but they remained for two years in Junāgaḍh waiting for the payment of the chauth (fourth part of the revenue). By means of the intervention of Rāja Vakhatsingh, the brother of the Mahārāja, Sher Khān, surnamed Bahādur Khān, was admitted to pay his respects to the Mahārāja Ajitsingh, and presented him with an elephant, several horses, money, and dresses of honour, as a nazar, and was confirmed in his hereditary jāgir, and obtained a sanad for the jāgirdāri of Morbi, the title of Bahādur, earrings, and a yellow flag. In the second year he obtained from the Mahārāja Ajitsing the Foujdārship of the country of Baroda in partnership with Sarbuland Khān; but in course of time he was lucky enough to obtain, without the least trouble, the government of Junāgaḍh from Mir Dost 'Ali, and then Bahādur Khān afterwards again returned to the country of Gujarāt, where he was duly honoured by the authorities of the period; but, as this recital chiefly concerns the history of Junāgaḍh, it is not expedient to give more details about Gujarāt.

In former times Mir Dost 'Ali Khān and Sādak 'Ali Khān were joint rulers of Junāgaḍh, but could not manage the affairs of the State; for this reason the ryats and Desāis sent Dalpatrām, a Gujarāti Nāgar, whom the Navāb Bahādur

Khân had formerly brought from Vâdâsinor to Junâgaḍh, for the purpose of recalling the above-named Navâb from Baroda, which had fallen into the hands of the Gaikvâd; accordingly the said Navâb left his son Sardâr Khân at Vâdâsinor (i.e. Bâlasinor) and came to Junâgaḍh. In the same year the adopted son of Umâbâi, wife of the Senapati Khaṇḍerâo, arrived with an army of twenty thousand men in Sorathā for the purpose of collecting the tribute. The Navâb Bahâdur Khân brought with him from Baroda Muḥammad 'Alî Khân, 'Abdullah Khân Paṭani, Farid Khân Karâni, and Bulî Khân Yusufzai, Kâmesvara Pant, Karsanchand Bakhshi, Pitâambar Modi, and Gulâbrâi Nâgar.

In Sâmvat 1802 the army of Pîlâji Gaikvâd arrived with the intention of conquering Junâgaḍh, and encamped near the town in a garden called the Târvâḍi. Navâb Bahâdur Khân, seeing no other expedient but to make peace, managed by the stratagems of Mohanlâl Jikâr, a Nâgar, who was the Aristotle of the period, and whom he appointed his vakil for the occasion, to get the army sent off by flattery, and by presenting a nazarânâh of gold and a dress of honour of small value.

In Sâmvat 1803 Kânoji, taking with him Fakhr-al-daulâ for a make-believe, besieged the fort of Vānthali, under Junâgaḍh, but departed without having been able to take it; nevertheless Fakhr-al-daulah, by way of boast (fakhr), got golden keys prepared, and sent them with a nazarānah of twenty-one ashrafis to the exalted court of the Shāh of Dehli, with the message that they were the keys of the fort, and after this confusion had been quelled the Navāb went to Gujarāt.

On the 3rd Chaitra Vad of Sainvat 1804 the Divān Dalpatrām succeeded in expelling from the town Vasantrai Purbhiā, who was a foreigner but had obtained a footing in the town by employing a number of Arabs who plundered right and left. After his expulsion he became the companion of the robber Mānsiā Khānt, and with him and a number of others made a night attack on and captured the fort of Uparkoṭ, which had at that time no chauki, and thence these people used to sally out and plunder the whole neighbourhood; these depredations they carried on for thirteen months, but at last departed after a great deal of fighting. About this time also the Navāb Sāheb Bahādur Khān arrived in Junāgaḍh, and two years afterwards Divān Dalpatrām departed this life. Because his sons were ignorant, Jagannātha Jhālā, a Nāgar who was at first the Peshkār or manager for Dalpatrām, and also the Vakīl of the Arabs, carried on his government business also after his demise, with the aid of Sheikh 'Abdulla, who kept possession of the fort of Uparkoṭ. When the latter demanded his arrears of pay, the Navāb Sāheb came to the determination of crushing him;

accordingly he allured Jāgannātha to his party by prospects of gain, and by the promise to appoint him Divān in case he defeated the Arabs. Accordingly, when the Navāb and Jāgannātha proceeded with the army to Kāthiāvāḍ to collect the jama'bandi tax, Rudrāji, the brother of Jāgannātha, managed to carry away from the fort of Uparkoṭ the gunpowder and ammunition the Arabs trusted to in case of war, on pretence that it was old and useless for that purpose, and that therefore it ought to be sold and a fresh store bought in lieu of it; then he sent information to the army, and when the whole world was lulled to sleep in the citadel of darkness the Navāb Sāheb left the camp with Jāgannātha, entered the town, approached the Uparkoṭ, laid siege to it, and caused the Arabs outside [of the Navāb's party] to place ladders against the wall, dig a mine, and attack the Arabs who were within the fort, and after some fighting a compromise was made with Sheikh A'bdulla Zubaidi and others by pledging the village of Dhorāji to Jādeja Kumbhāji of Gondal and obtaining money from him, which being paid to the Arabs they departed from the town in Samvat 1810, but the Navāb Bahādur Khān died on the 25th of the month Bhādaravā in Samvat 1814, after having reigned thirty-six years in Junāgaḍh, reckoning from the beginning of his appointment as the Naib of Asad ('Alī) Kuli Khān and of Ghulām Māhyau'd-dīn Khān.

When the Navâb Sâheb Mahâbat Khân, after the demise of his father, perceived that the Divân Jagannâtha Jhâlâ, who had accumulated some property, and acted according to his own will in everything, he was displeased, and had him assassinated in the night by a negro slave or the name of Ballâl, near the Manjavaði gate, where the Gaikvâd's army was encamped, and where Jagannâtha was staying in a tent to keep an eye on the chauki. After that, his house was attacked, and at the instance of Jâderjâ Kumbhâji, Jamadâr Radvi Khân Rehên Dholkiyah, and of Sayyid Khalafshâh, who offered themselves as bail, his brother Rudrâji was allowed to depart safely to Purbandar with the family and property, and did not return to his country until a long time afterwards, through the intervention of the Divânji Sâheb Amarji, and on paying a small amount of money as nazarânah. After that Somji Jikâr became Divân, and after him Dayâl the Vâniâ, and again Somji Jikâr; but they were not liked, and obtained no firm footing.

In Samvat 1810 the news arrived that the fort of the bandar of Surat had been taken from Ahmad Khân and Sidi Masu'd by Captain Austin Shore under the command of General Butcher, and also that the English had by force occupied and taken from Surâju'd-daulâ a portion of Orissâ, the Subâh of Bihâr, and the Subâh of Bengal; and from Asafu'd-daulâ, governor of Oudh, the zillâ of Banâras or Kâsî; lastly, that Shâh A'âlam had bestowed the title of Divān on the English Sarkār.

In Samvat 1818 Alḥmad Shāh Abd'ali fought with an innumerable army of Marāṭhās and defeated it.* The total amount slain was nearly two lākhs, and among the killed were many Sardārs of Holkar, Sindhiā, the Bhonslā, and of the Gaikvād. Some fled and some were made prisoners; the latter met their death by being blown from cannon, and consisted not only of men, but also of females and children.

CAPTIVITY OF THE NAVĀB SĀHEB MAHĀBAT KHĀN.

In Samvat 1818 the Jamadār of the Arabs, Bāsalman by name, imprisoned the Navāb Sāheb Mahābat Khān in the Uparkoṭ, with the consent of the Bibī Sāhebah Sultān (the wife of the Navāb Bahādur Khānji), and made Muzaffar Khān bin Jāfar Khān Navāb of Junāgaḍh. When the Navāb Kamālu'd-dīn Khān, who was the uncle of Mahābat Khan, heard of this, he brought an army from Pirān Pāṭan under the pretence of liberating him, but in reality to give Junāgaḍh, in case he should be able to get it, to his own son Ghāzi-al-dīn Khān, and to convey Mahābat Khān to Rādhanpur. Accordingly he brought his troops during the night under the fort walls, which they attempted to scale by means of ladders; but by the watchfulness of the chaukidārs, and the good fortune of the Navâb Sâheb Mahâbat Khân, being unable to effect an entrance, and when the sun at dawn, the world's illuminating commander-in-chief, popped out his head from the citadel of the azure sky, the soldiers were put to flight and retired with shame. When Sadâsiv Pândâ Nâgar, uncle of the author, was made aware of this futile attempt of Kamâlû'd-dîn Khân, he became cooler in his partizanship, and the Navâb Kamâlû'd-dîn, seeing himself discomfited, beat the drum of departure in his disappointment.

After the army had marched about two stages from Junâgadh, Kumbhâji Jâdeja and other Zamindârs, through the intervention of Śivadâs Pândâ, made an arrangement with Sulimân the Jama'dâr, so that he released the Navâb Sâheb Mahâbat Khân from captivity, and the following arrangements were made:—The two brothers Muzaffar Khân and Fathyâb Khân obtained the jâgir of Rânpur and Dhandhusar with eighty-four villages as an inâm on their abandonment of all claims to participate in the rajd. The pargana Upletâ was [for the sum of 35,000 Jâmis (koḍīs) given as a bribe to the agents] bestowed upon Kumbhâji for a yearly peshkash of 5000 Jâmis (koḍīs). During two years Dayâl the Vâniâ became Kârbhâri twice, and was also removed twice.

The Navâb Sâheb Mahâbat Khânji used to plunder the surrounding country of Kâthiavâḍ in order to maintain himself and to pay his troops :

in several tâlukâs he collected a variable jama'bandi illegally. When he was pressed to pay his army, he used to flee with a select party of friends to the town under the shelter of night, to which he was tracked by the helpless sipâhîs, who were in a destitute condition from not having received any pay; but he generally expelled them with threats and by force from the town, in order to relieve them from the trouble of wandering about and from the misery of service, and to compel them to return to their homes, where they might take rest with their children; this went on until Mevalâl bin Jagjivandâs bin Sadânand, a Kâyath from Gujarât, became Divân, who, like his brother Sîvalâl, used to make a living as a munshi. He was a man who wrote a pleasing hand, had agreeable manners, and dressed well; and about this time Sher-zamân Khân Bâbi, the uncle of the Navâb Sâheb, who had formerly been expelled by Sohrâb Khân from Goghâ, and who had been reinstalled there and had come to Junâgadh and received in jâgir from the Navâb Sâheb the eighty-four villages of the Bânṭvâ parganah, carried on the business of Kârbhâri for about two years.

SHEKH MIYÂN TAKES VERÂVAL.

Sultân Bibî, sister of Navâb Bahâdur Khân, and spouse of Shahâmat Khân Bâbi, who had taken possession of Verâval, was forcibly deprived thereof by Kâzi Sheikh Miyân and by Mâlik Shahâb-al-din, and Sheikh Miyân ruled there with entire authority, and concluded a covenant of peace and friendship with Desâi Sundarji and other Nâgars.

THE DIVÂNSHIP OF DIVÂNJI SÂHEB AMARJI.

At the age of eighteen years Amarji left Mângrol and went in search of service to the court of the Navâb Sâheb Mahâbat Khânji, who was at that time besieging the fort of Uparkot, where the Arabs had taken refuge. The Navâb Sâheb said to Amarji, "If you could obtain possession of the Vâgésvari gate, which is in the possession of the Arabs of the fort, and could surrender it to the officials of the Sarkâr, you would establish a claim to enter my service." Accordingly he went to Purbandar, whence he brought an Arab Jamadâr named Sâlmân with a number of other Arabs, but as the Navâb Sâheb would not allow them to enter the town they remained outside, but assaulted the Vâgésvari gate in the night, slew some of its defenders, and finally handed it over to the servants of the Navâb Sâheb, whereupon the entire party was engaged to remain at the court, and they discharged well and ably whatever service was entrusted to them. Two years had not yet elapsed when the Divânji Sâheb conceived the idea of subjugating Verâval. Keeping a portion of the army with the Navâb Sâheb at Âdri, two kos from Verâval, Amarji, when the moon with her army of stars was ascending by means of the scaling ladders of degrees to the citadel of the firmament, proceeded to Verâval in the company of the Jamadâr, 'Abdu'lla Khân, and others, and planted their standard on the wall on the west of the town, and fell on the garrison suddenly like a calamity from heaven, and made them food for the sword. After that they attacked four or five hundred Arabs who were in the thânah, whom they put to flight; then Jamadâr Wâhdu'd-dîn entered the town with a detachment of Sindhis from the seaside, and great bloodshed took place, so that the conquered party lost heart, and, not caring for their honour, fled with Shekh Jahângir and Shekh Miân, and arrived safely at Patṭan Div, but Sundarji Desâi with his adherents was captured. In the morning the news of the conquest of the fort was conveyed to the Navâb Sâheb, who entered it with the joyful sounds of the kettle-drum, and the populace came out to welcome him. On this occasion Divânji Sâheb, the deceased Amarji, father of the author, succeeded in preserving the honour of the ladies of Sundarji Desâi from the Navâb Sâheb, who was addicted to pleasure. The Divânji Sâheb was not employed in the (mulaki) revenue and judicial branch, but merely superintended the (faujdarî) army administration of the state. According to the freaks of the times, Popaṭ Pârikh was Divân for three days, Jhavarchand for twenty days, and Mulchand Pârikh for one month, and their management was so confused and ruinous that they abandoned it in disgrace.

SHER ZAMÂN KHÂN ATTACKS JUNÂGADH.

In Samvat 1825 Sher Zamân Khân arrived from Bântwâ, with the vague intention of effecting a night surprise, with a company of vagabonds from the wilderness of misfortune, and took up a position in the Basârat Bâgh (a garden near the Majhâvâdi gate). In the morning, when the portal of light was opened, and also the town gate was to be unlocked, these vagabonds quickly approached it, and suddenly met the woodcutters and other inhabitants of the country, who were arriving on a pilgrimage to Pir Dâvalshâh, who is called Maidani; and when they reached the gate, it was shut upon them from within, and the people commenced to fight with them, whereupon Sher Zamân Khân fled like a gazelle and leaped like a hare, from terror and fright, in the direction of his own abode.

DEMOLITION OF DILKHÂNÎÂ.

In the same year the Kâthi Kumpâ Wâlâ asked for the Divânji's assistance and induced him to demolish Dilkhânîâ; and the said place, which was an asylum of highway robbers, was razed to the ground by the Divânji Sâheb Amarji, accompanied by the above-named Kâthi Kumpâ Wâlâ, who was a Grâsia of Chitalgâm.

ACQUISITION OF KUTÂNÂ FORT.

The troops of the Divân Sâheb were still in the zillâ of Dilkhânîâ when Pir Khân Shirvâni, Bhâvata, Khokhar, and other Kasbatis represented to him that they had made over the fort of Kutîânâ to Hâshim Khân Bâbi, a young son of the Navâb Sâheb Bahâdur Khân, and that he was severely oppressing the inhabitants of the country; and that if he should perchance be wheedled into parting with the fort to Rânâ Sultânji, whose Kâmdâr, Premaji Lohânâ [Thakkar] would be ready enough to buy strange property, it would be a difficult matter [to retake it].

Distich:—A pin can stop the water at its source;

When full, no elephants can pass it then.

As soon as he obtained this information the Divân immediately marched to Kutîânâ, where he began to carry on all the operations proper in a siege, and soon made use of mines, by which he blew a bastion into the air, which destroyed likewise all the chaukidârs of the garrison. Hâshim Khân, being thus rendered helpless, sued for peace, which was soon concluded; he lost the fort, but obtained in lieu thereof the village of Majhâvadi as a jâghir. When the Divân conquered the fort he installed therein his younger brother Govindji [in behalf of the Navâb], who remained there till his death in Samvat 1846, after which his son Mangalji kept it till Samvat 1849. Having terminated this affair, the Divân again unfurled his banners, to proceed on the Mulukgiri expedition.

CONQUEST OF THE FORT OF TALÂJA.

Vakhat Sing Râval, Râja of Bhâunagar, called to his aid the Divân, who being aware that it is the duty of governors to cherish their subjects, responded to the call, and when he arrived at Goghā, Vakhat Sing requested him to reduce the fort of Talājā. Accordingly he marched in person with his soldiers, who succeeded in scaling the wall of the fort; their antagonists, the Kolis, however, met them bravely, and severe fighting continued for some time, during which there was much bloodshed, and the Divānji himself was wounded in the leg by a musket-ball; but fortune favoured his party, their opponents were unable longer to resist, and were compelled to pay a large nazarānah. In course of time the fort came into the hands of the English, who gave it to Navāb Nur-al-dīn, the governor of Khambhāt, who in his turn sold it to Rāval Vakhat Sing, ruler of Bhavnagar, for 80,000 rupees. The Divānji Sāheb then returned to Junāgaḍh, but, in spite of the station he had attained, he did not desire to be addressed by the title of Divān; on this occasion, however, on the day of his bathing on recovery he was presented with the presents bestowed on a Divān, viz., a palanquin, a big drum, sword, dagger with golden hilt, chobdār, torches, and the other insignia.

CONQUEST OF FOUR FORTS OF MĀNGROL.

As Sheikh Miyaṇ of Māngrol excited a rebellion and would not submit, the victorious standards of the Divānji proceeded against him in Saimvat 1827, and the forts of Sil, Divāsa, Mahîârî, and Bagasrâ were forcibly taken from him. In the battle which was fought under the fort of Sil the horse ridden by the Divânji received no less than eleven wounds; but he himself, by the hand of the true Preserver, was kept from all harm. After chastising the Thânahdârs, the Divânji besieged Mângrol, but when the firing of his cannon began to take effect, Shekh Miyan lost heart, and despatched Jibhâi, the paternal uncle of the Divânji Sâheb, to intercede for him; thus he obtained pardon after surrendering the moiety of his parganah [to the Navâb]. During the same year, that mine of virtues Kuvârjî,—mercy be upon him,—the father of the Divânji Sâheb Âmarjî, after becoming a Sanyâsi (or Brâhman ascetic) became an inmate of Paradise.

LIBERATION OF THE MUTASIDIS OF KACHH BHUJ.

The Râo Sâheb Godjî had surrendered his ~~mutasidis~~ (darbâr officials) as securities to the custody of the Arab and other Jamâdârs, whose salaries he was unable to pay; but, as the delay was long, the Arabs, after exposing them to innumerable calamities, brought them to the district of Hâlâr. Their Jamâdâr, who was an honourable man, was so greatly distressed at their insubordination that he put on his coat of mail and threw himself into the river Aji. When the Divânji Sâheb, who was at that time collecting peśhkhāsh (tribute) in this zillah heard of it, he, for the sake of the honour of the Râo Sâheb, paid the debt, and released the Mutasadis. In return for this handsome act the Râo Sâheb for some time used to send the Divânji Sâheb all sorts of presents and gifts.

PUNISHMENT OF THE VÂGHARS AND MÂLIÂS.

Crowds of Vâghars were in the frequent habit of attacking the troops of the Śrimant Peshvâ, of the Gâekvâd, and of the Jâm, of spiking the cannon with iron nails, and of plundering the regions of Hâllâr, Jhâlâvâd [and Kachh]; accordingly the Divânji reduced them to obedience after some fighting, and caused them to pay a fine.

PUNISHMENT OF THE BÂBRIÂS AND OF THE UNÂ QASBÂTIS.

The Bâbriâs, who subsist on impure food, were sallying forth from the shelter of their thorn-bushes and hills to commit depredations in the villages of Nâgher, Kâthiâvâd, and Wâlâk. The army was sent against them; they stood the first shock, but

Distich:—An antelope which with a lion

Will soon the earth touch with its face.

They were soon ground to powder by the hoofs of the steeds of the victorious army, and compelled to cease from their deeds of rapine, and obliged to restore the plunder they had taken, and they moreover agreed to pay a yearly tribute. When the troops marched back, they passed through the town of Unâ, and the Qasbâtis of the place, confiding in the strength of their foot and the bravery of their men, attacked the artillery train, and Poi, the nephew of the author, who was in charge thereof, honourably sacrificed his life to preserve the train; and after hard fighting the people consented to pay a fine, and, as a security for the disbursement of it, the Divânji Sâheb carried off the son of Qasbâti Shekh Tâbir to Junâgadh.

KUMBHÂJI ATTACKS THE DIVÂNJI SÂHEB.

Jâdejjâ Kumbhâji of Gondal trusted much in his wealth and his Râjputs, and entertained for some time evil designs against Junâgadh. Accordingly when the Divânji Sâheb had left the troops to guard the frontiers and had himself returned to Junâgadh, Kumbhâji called the Marâthâ army of the Gâekvâd to his aid, and also privately consulted the Navâb Sâheb of Junâgadh, who entertained at that time a little spite against the authority of the Divânji, the breaking down of which, he conceived, would increase his own; wherefore he considered this a good opportunity, and connived with Kumbhâji, who was now encamped at Mâlâshamdi, a village four miles from Junâgadh, and was only waiting for any encouragement (from the Navâb) as an excuse for ruining the Divân, attacked the army, which fled; but Jamadâr Salmin, not being able to mount a horse, was captured by the Marâthâs, who, however, released him without injury. When the fugitives arrived in Junâgadh the Navâb Sâheb loaded them with reproaches, but the Divânji Sâheb marched with an army numerous as locusts, and pitched his camp opposite to that of the confederates. Kumbhâji now repented, separated from Bâmanioji, who was the instigator of this evil action, and agreed to pay a fine and to restore all the plunder he had taken. When peace was restored, the Divânji Sâheb, on his return, besieged the fort of Chatrâsah; and Bâmanioji, its proprietor, after paying a large fine in cash and in kind, again took the ring of obedience to Junâgadh into his ear.

IMPRISONMENT OF THE DIVÂNJI SÂHEB WITH
SÂLMIN THE ARAB.

Certain conspirators, such as Bhim Ebojah the vegetable seller, Gulâbrâi Mehta, Khushâl Râi, Magatrâm Bhagat, Jagjivan Kikani, and other Nagars, caused the Divânji Sâheb Amarji, with his brothers Dulabji and Govindji, to be cast into prison. The Navâb Sâheb Mahâbat Khân, owing to the statements of those calumniators, was displeased; nevertheless he secretly honoured the prisoners by his visits and consoled them. On the fourth day of Phâlgun in Sainvat 1829 the three persons just mentioned were imprisoned, and on the same day Sâlmîn the Jamadâr, their adherent, was summoned to the Rang Malāl (court), under the pretence that as Sheik Miyān of Māngrol had taken possession of the fort of Nāvī, in the pargana of Porbandar, and was plundering the parganas Chorvād and Kesoji, his services were required to repel these attacks. When he entered the door, slaves jumped from an ambush and slew him, but his follower Sayyid 'Alī Chāvush was quick enough to save his own life by striking out right and left at the slaves of the Sarkār, and escaped. This same Chāvush rose in course of time at Baroda to the dignity of a "sitter on an elephant," but was at last trampled to death by being tied to the feet of one. The Divānji Sāheb was set at liberty on the 7th of Śrāvṇa Vād, after a captivity of five months and three days, on the condition of paying a nazarānah of 40,000 Jāmi koḍīs, and until the payment thereof his eldest son, Raghnāthji, then ten years old, remained as a hostage; the Divānji himself, however, with his family, relatives, and followers, departed to the town of Jetpur.

THE NAVĀB SĀHEB MARCHES AGAINST MĀNGROL, AND RECALLS THE DIVĀNJI SĀHEB.

As Sheik Miyān was ravaging the country with a numerous array, and carrying off men and beasts, the Navāb Sāheb Mahābat Khān marched against him, but, being unable to cope with his foe, he encamped at a distance of seven kos from the town and spent his time in reconnoitring. He kept the Divān Raghunāthji at his court, and entrusted his education to Bibi Sardār Bakhtā (his favourite wife), the daughter of Kumah-al-dīn Khān, who treated the boy like a mother, and who likewise accompanied the Navāb. In course of time Sheik Miyān became so bold that he not only stole horses and camels, but also harassed the army itself, so that no one dared to go out of the camp; and the Navāb, being thus greatly pressed, called Bhim Khojah and the other calumniators into his presence, and addressed them as follows:—"The Divān Amarji, the like of whom no potentate ever had in his service, and who augmented the honour of the Darbār of Junāgadh, was by you removed from office without any fault of his own, and is at present living at Jetpur. He has received invitations from Kumbhāji of Gondal, from Rāval Vakhtsinghji of Bhāvnagar, from Kāthi Bhoka and Kānthad of Jetpur, from Rānā Sultānji of Porbandar, from Meroji of Rājpurā, from Lākhāji of Rājkot, from Hothiji of Kotrā, from Jām Jasāji of Navānagar, from Bhārāji Jhālā of Wānkāner, from Wāghji of Morbi, from Śeshāji of Sāclā, from Rāj Gajsinghji of Dhrāngdhra, from Jhālā Harbhamji of Limbdi, from Jasā Koli of Mahuwā, from Sheikh Miyān of Māngrol, from Rāizādah Singhji of Chorvād, from Daghoji Raizādah of Keso, from Mukhtār Khān and Ādil Khān of Bāṭwā, from Muzaffar Khān Bābi and Fathyab Khān of Rānpūr, from Sheikh Tahir of Unā, from Sayyid Latif of Delvâdâ, from the Faranghi Lewis Jhujhu of Divbandar, from Sidi Yaqub of Muzaffarâbâd, from Râo Sâheb Godji of Bhuj, from Lalubhâi of Bharuch, from the Navâb of Bandar Surat, and from Momin Khân of Khambhât, all of whom have sent him letters upon letters, presents in money, and kind messages with many compliments, and though he has no need of me, yet without him the state of Junâgadh is daily getting worse; if, therefore, you love your lives, you must obey the Divânji Sâheb and immediately recall him." Having obtained the orders of the Navâb Sâheb, those ill-natured men feigned repentance for what they had done, and gladly went to Jetpur, where they fell down at the blessed feet of the Divân Sâheb.

On the same occasion it happened that agents of the Râo Sâheb Godji had arrived with rich dresses of honour and splendid gifts and an invitation to the Divânji Sâheb to become the Divân of Kachh; they had been there for several days, but he gave them leave to depart, and thought proper to remember his old service and his duty of assisting the Navâb in this emergency. Accordingly he immediately joined the Navâb Sâheb, who restored to him the Divân Raghunâthji hitherto kept as a hostage, with a handsome present, and assigned to him the revenues of two villages for his private expenses. As soon as Sheikh Miyân heard of the arrival of the Divânji Sâheb, in spite of his bravery his heart failed him and he made his appearance with hands bound returned the property he had taken, paid a fine, and again became a vassal of Junâgadh.

CONQUEST OF SUTRÂPÂDÂ.

When the army departed from Mângrol, the rayats of the parganah of Pâtan complained that Chând Pâtani, the Zamindâr of Sutrâpâdâ, had reduced them to the last extremity of destitution. After hearing this complaint, the world-conquering banners of the Divânji Sâheb were unfurled; he besieged the fort, and the gunners kept up continual firing during a month, whereupon Chand came out with a grieved heart and a yellow face, suing for pardon, and having obtained a guarantee of his life and honour from the Divânji Sâheb, surrendered the fort to Mehta Gangârâm Lâlâbhâi, son of the Divânji's aunt.

Chând Pâtani had a virgin daughter, handsome like the brilliant moon, and as the Navâb Sâheb heard of her beauty, he dropped the reins of patience from his hands and desired to procure an interview with her; but as Chand refused to comply, he sent some persons to bring her by force. But the Divânji Sâheb kept his word, by which the honour and life of Chand were guaranteed, and accordingly he and his beautiful daughter were allowed to depart to Gorakhmađi, which is a sacred place of the Jogis.

CONQUEST OF THE FORT OF POSITRÂ.

Merâman Khavâs, the Kârbhâri of the Jâm Sâheb Jesâji, was greatly distressed by the depredations of Wâghars of Okhâmandal, accordingly he invited the Divânji Sâheb in Samvat 1830 to reduce the fort of Positrâ. The noble-minded Divânji Sâheb, who was constantly on the outlook for similar events, arrived in a short time in Okhâ and engaged in the siege of Positrâ, a fort never conquered by any one, but taken by the good fortune of the Divânji Sâheb in a single assault after exploding a gunpowder mine, and then mounting the breach. An amount of plunder considerable beyond all expectation was found, which those pirates had collected in the ports of the Dakhan, of Arabia, the Soahili coast, Maskât, Abyssinia, Sindh, and the Farang (Portuguese) settlements. On that occasion the doleful news arrived of the demise of the Navâb Sâheb Mahâbat Khân on the 14th Kartak Vad in Samvat 1831 [A. H. 1177]. The duration of his reign was 16 years 2 months and 2 days.

NAVAB SÂHEB HÂMED KHAN, SON OF MAHÂBAT KHÂN BAHÂDUR BÂBI.

After receiving this terrible news the Divânji Sâheb immediately left Okhâ, marched quickly to Junâgadh, and placed the Sâhib Zâdah of exalted fortune Hamid Khân, who was born of Sujân Kuivar, upon the masnad of his father, and started the army to collect the jamâbandi. In that year also the peshkash (tribute) for Jhâlâvâd was for the first time fixed. Whilst the army was at a distance, collecting peshkash, Bâbis Adil Khân and Mukhtâr Khân, the Jâgirdars of Bânṭwâ, formed an alliance with the Nâgoris and other Kasbâtis of the town of V a n t h a l i, and without difficulty took that fort. When this disastrous news reached the Divânji Sâheb, he quickly marched to Vanthali and beleaguered the fort on all sides. Most of the instigators of this rebellion now tried to divert the Bâi Sâhibah-Sujân-bâi from the path of her duty, and to bias her towards Mukhtâr Khân and Âdil Khân; and at this time, Âburâi Mahipâtrâo, the Subâh of A'hmadâbâd, happened to bring an army into the country to collect peshkash, and the malcontents bought his aid, but, owing to their fear of the Divânji Sâheb, they were unable to effect anything, and he kept up the siege and skirmished with the troops who approached his army. And when the Dakhanis perceived that they were unable to effect anything, they made peace with the Divânji and presented him with a dress of honour, and abstained from fighting, and entrusted to him the collection of the rest of their jamâbandi and returned. After getting rid of this interference the Divânji Sâheb pressed the fort more closely, so that Mukhtâr Khân sued for mercy, and was allowed to depart to Bânṭwâ, and the fort was occupied by the servants of the Navâb of Junâgaḍh.

VICTORY OVER THE SUBAHDARS OF THE

PESHVÂ AND GÂEKVÂḌ.

Amrat Râo and Thoban, Subahdârs of the Peshvâ and the Gâekvâḍ, arrived together whilst the army of the Divânji Sâheb was in the Panchâl district. These troops advanced with the intention of fighting under their valiant officers. The Divânji Sâheb, as then seemed best to him, and remembering his position as a Zamindâr, suffered them to be without molestation, but both the antagonistic armies were close to each other at Jetpur, and the warriors were anxious to fight. Accordingly at dawn, when the sovereign of day drew forth the scimitar of light from the scabbard of darkness, the command to attack was sounded on both sides by beating drums and blowing clarions noisy enough to cause an earthquake. The Dakhanis rushed forth with great ardour in large masses, carrying swords, guns, and lances, compelling the Divânji, who put his trust in the Lord of Girnâr, to defend himself with his infantry and cavalry and to open fire with his artillery. At last the fight became general, and in it a trooper wearing a coat of mail inflicted a blow with his sword on the shoulder of the Divânji Sâheb, which would have killed him had it not been rendered harmless by the armour he wore, and, turning swiftly round, at one spear-thrust he slew the trooper. The enemy left their dead on the battle-field and carried off their wounded; and, the Divânji Sâheb being victorious, the Marâthâs began the second day to treat for peace, and a meeting having been held, through the mediation of Jâdejjâ Kumbhoji and Wâlâ Kânthar, peace was finally concluded, with many compliments on both sides; when, however, Amrat Râo arrived in Ahmadâbâd, he was treacherously killed in the bazar by an Arab.

MARCH TO PÂLANSWÂ, IN THE COUNTRY OF VÂGAD.

At the request of Vâghji Râjâ of Morbi, the Divânji marched to Vâgâd, but some of his men died for want of water whilst crossing the Salt Ran; but the fort of Pâlanswâ and the town of Keriânagar were taken after considerable trouble, and countless booty fell into the Divânji's hands, and he returned to Junâgadh after receiving a large sum of money sent by the Râo Sâheb of Kachh to avert further misfortunes.

As the Jâm Sâheb Jasâji was besieging the fort of Bethâli, in the parganah of Porbandar, Râjâ Sultânji sued for assistance, as narrated in the account of that parganah, and it was granted. Peace was concluded, on condition that the fort of Bethâli should be demolished. On this occasion an attempt was made by Merâman Khawâs secretly to poison the Divânji Sâheb at an entertainment to which he was invited. But, as he was destined to live, he excused himself from accepting the invitation, on the pretext that Daftari Khushâlrâi had died at Junâgadh; and he ordered his army to march in that direction. Jivâji Sâmraj, Subah of the Gaikvâd, had come to collect the peshkash (tribute) of Kâthiâvâd, and, having stationed his army at Amreli, aimed at independence and the conquest of territory and caused much disturbance in the country. Accordingly the victorious army marched to coerce him, and after he was defeated in open battle he took shelter in Amreli, which place he was also forced to quit; the Divân Sâheb granted him pardon, and allowed him to depart to Gujarât, and razed the fort to the ground. At this time Sheikh Miyân caused a disturbance in Mângrôl, and the Divân Sâheb Amarji sent his younger brother Divân Dulabhji, who was a pillar of the government and wise like Aristotle, to punish him, and he took up his station at Sîl, where hostilities were being carried on with equal results, when, by the will of God, Khushâlbâi, mother of the author, and daughter of Dosâ Mehta Mânkad, expired on the 13th of Jeshta Vad in Samvat 1834 (A.D. 1777). She had given birth to three sons, the eldest of whom, Raghunâth, was born on the 11th of Asâd Shud Samvat 1819 [A.D. 1762]; the second, Ranchodji, was born on the 10th Aso Shud in Samvat 1824 [A.D. 1767]; and the third, Dalpatram, on the 2nd Bhâdarvâ Vad in Samvat 1829 [A.D. 1772]; her fourth child was a daughter Âmbâi, who was born in Samvat 1832 (A.D. 1775). Sheikh Miyân thought this a good opportunity, and came on the pretence of condolence to Junâgadh, and sat down with some of his companions in the large tent where the mourners were assembled, and sued for pardon, which the Divân Sâheb was thus obliged to grant.

At the close of Samvat 1834 the Râo Sâheb Fatehsing Gaikvâd, who reigned at Baroda, and who had heard of the expulsion of Jiwâji Sâmraj from the fort of Amreli, entered Sorath with a large army; when he arrived at Jetpur and encamped there, he heard how well the Divân Sâheb stood with his army, how liberal and how brave he was, and he saw that it would be a difficult matter to subdue him: accordingly through the mediation of some of the Zamindârs, he overlooked his injury, and presented the Divânji Sâheb with a dress of honour, and also bestowed on him the tribute which was in arrears, and returned. In Samvat 1835 the Gâekvâd went again on mulkgiri expedition to Kâthiâvâd, though it had been his intention to avenge the disaster of Jivâji Sâmraj, and to boast of his success; but his object was not accomplished.

By the advice and boldness of Premji Lohânâ, his Kâmdâr, the Râpâ Sultânji had employed all the Arabs he could enlist in his service on a higher monthly salary, and had thus become the source of disturbances. Accordingly the army was got ready to punish him, and when Premji saw his inability to resist in the field he began to tremble like a willow-leaf, and sent tribute in excess of the usual amount, as well as all the booty he had taken, and, in addition to this, costly presents obtained from the cargo of a ship sent by Navâb Hafdar 'Ali as presents to the Khalifah of Baghdâd, and which vessel had been wrecked on his coast, and sought forgiveness of his transgressions.

In the year Samvat 1836 [A.D. 1780] there was a slight famine, during which the Sindhis of Devrâ and Khâgasri, under the leadership of Malik Muhammad and other Sindhis, had collected their people from all quarters, and commenced to plunder the country of Kumbhâji, who complained to the Divân Sâheb. Accordingly the army marched, and was joined also by Divân Govindji with his forces from K u t i â n â; both forts were besieged and cannonaded, the garrisons fled, and they were taken possession of by the servants of the Junâgadh government.

The Thânadâr of K a n d o r n â, Jivâ Seth by name, an Amir of the Jâm Sâheb's darbâr, was a brave man who constantly kept his army fighting, and supported it by plunder. In Samvat 1837 he ravaged G a d h â l i, in the parganah of Bhâvnagar, in Gohelvâd, and captured Motibhâi, a Râjput Zamindâr who was the adopted uncle of the author, and imprisoned him in the fort of M e w â s â [under Kandornâ]. When this news reached the Divânji he quickly marched to Mewâsâ; on the road, however, he met certain men coming from D h r o l with the intention of aiding Jivâ Seth; most of these he killed, and then besieged the fort. When Jivâ Seth saw death staring him in the face and fortune abandoning him, he sent out Motibhâi with valuable presents, and thus escaped from the whirlpool of destruction. Meru Khavâs, although he had arrived with an army at K a n d o r n â to aid Jivâ Seth, had not the courage to do so, and halted there without engaging. Shekh Tâhir had formerly killed the half-brother of the Divân Sâheb Daghunâthji, by name Pipi, who was in charge of the artillery. To avenge this murder the Divânji marched against him in Sainvat 1838, and obtained the place without fighting, and bestowed on him one or two villages in inâm. Gangadâs, half-brother of the Divânji, and who formerly was Thânadâr of Delvâdâ, owing to disputes with Sayyid Latif and others came to Unâ and thence attacked D e l v â d â, but was killed by a musket-ball in the last-mentioned place; after that, Tuljârâm, the Divânji's own brother, was slain in a fight, and in his place Parbhâshankar Nânâbhâi, a Bânsvâdâ Nâgar, who was a good soldier and a brave man, was made Thânadâr of Unâ and Delvâdâ, and after great trouble he succeeded in subjugating the Bâbriâs, and the Habshi of Muzaffarâbâd and the Portuguese of Div feared him greatly.

On this joyful season of the Huli the Divânji Sâheb was desirous that the young Navâb H a m i d K h â n should preside over the festivities; accordingly within the camp many tents were pitched, and a spacious shâmianâh was erected, adorned with garlands, in which he was installed on a gorgeous throne of many hues, and numerous dancing girls were engaged for the occasion, and carried on their diversions with music and singing for a whole month.

VICTORY OVER THE JÂM SÂHEB JASÂJI, THE RÂNÂ SULTÂNJI, AND KUMBHOJI.

The JÂm JASÂji was JÂm in name only, as he was kept by Merâman and Bhowân Khavâs, the Karbhâris, under surveillance, like a parrot in a cage, whilst they reigned in Nagar according to their pleasure, and collected much gold and silver. To free her husband from this tutelage, Achubâ Rânî, wife of the Jâm, the daughter of Râja Gajsingh of Halwâd-Dhrângadhra, planned various stratagems. The Râja of Porbandar, Rânâ Sultânji, Kumbhoji the Râjâ of Gondal, and all the Zamindârs of those parts entered into an alliance, and after fighting some battles in the parganah of Kutîânâ in the month Maghsar Samvat 1838, encamped with their armies, which exceeded ants and locusts in numbers, on the banks of the river Bhâdar. To meet these foes the Divânji Sâheb marched with his glorious army, and pitched his tents near Jetpur. Merâman Khavâs discovered that he could not cross the river save by stratagem, and accordingly despatched Jagu Râval, a man whom he greatly trusted, with a humble message to the Divânji Sâheb to send over Rudrâji Chânya and Punjmal, a Bânsvâdâ Nâgar, that he might treat with them; when, however, these two men arrived in his tent, he addressed them in so overbearing a manner that they could scarcely endure it, and replied in their turn that he was wrong in placing too much confidence in the multitude of his troops, and to consider the Divânji Sâheb as a weak man, but rather to liken him unto a valiant lion who can put to flight a flock of goats, or a hungry wolf who would disperse them like a herd of antelopes. At these words Merâman became afraid, and in the dead of night, when both these Vakils were fast asleep, he crossed the river with all his troops. As soon as the Divânji Sâheb was apprised of this, he beat the drum to pursue the enemy, whom he overtook in the plain of Pâ nch pī plâ, where Meru had drawn up his army in battle array, and surrounded his camp with large and small artillery. When the two armies encountered each other, the cannonade began immediately.

Verses:—

Troops numerous were here assembled all,
 No one had ever seen the like before—
 Combatants more than locusts or large ants,
 All wielding dirks and fiery scimitars,
 And furious like to raging elephants,
 With poniards, spears, and arrows in their hands.
 The rush of troops so blocked the roads
 That earth's surface seemed too small for them.
 The din of war arose from all the troops,
 Black smoke confused the earth and sky in one.
 The yells produced anxiety of heart,
 They chased the sense from heads, and hues from cheeks.

The noise of kettle-drums, and laments of trumps,
 Made lions lose their way in deserts wide.
 The brazen roar, enough to split the stones,
 Distressed the Simurgh on Mount Qâf.
 The lamentation of the Trumpet sounds
 Produced quaking fear in hands and feet.
 The noise which the chiefs heard was such
 That you have said the resurrection trump had sounded.

The antagonists fell upon each other like the waves of the ocean, the Divânji Sâheb's army began to give way a little, but order was soon restored by the exertions of Muzafar Khân, Fatehyâb Khân Bâbi, 'Abdu'llah Khân, Abdul Rahim Khân (Karâni), Haiyât Khân Baloch, Harising Solankhi, Syad Karam 'Ali, Sayyid Gul Muhammad, Mulvi Ahmadu'llah, Omar Khân Khokhar, Himatlâl, Jitârâm, and Sampatrâm Nâgar and others, who restored the battle. Shekh Miân also arrived after the battle had commenced, and joined in it, and flashed like lightning on the threshing-floor of the enemies.

Verses :—

What battle lines did they arrange !
 Each champion looking for his rival foe.
 Both armies were amazingly confused,
 It seemed the sun and moon commingled were.
 On both sides streams of blood did flow ;
 The fathers for their sons did look,
 And all were waiting for the turn of fate.

At last the enemies were scattered like the stars of the Great Bear. Bhavân Khawâs, brother of Meru Khawâs, was wounded by a musket ball.

Meru, the commander-in-chief of Hállâr, fled with all the troops, which would have found no resting-place, had not the mantle of night screened them, and the Divânji Sâheb with much joy took possession of the enemy's camp, beating the shâdiliânâh drum of delight, and was applauded by everybody.

Merâman Khawâs, being thus foiled by this ill-luck, called to his aid the army of Sena Khâs Khel Shamsher Bahâdur Mânâji Gaikvâd, and the Divânji Sâheb, wishing to remain on good terms with the latter, returned to Junâgadh and encamped near the town. The Zamindârs and the army of the Gaikvâd dared not follow him, but beleaguered Devrá, which has four towers, and by cannonading it on all sides they demolished it after a week's siege; but the garrison, under Fakirchand Purbiah, Balkhair, an Arab Jamâdâr, and Abherâm the Nâgar, were allowed to depart with their arms and ammunition, and after this affair the army of the Gaikvâd returned to Baroda. Hereupon the Divânji Sâheb proceeded with his victorious army to punish the Zamindârs for their rebellious spirit, and invaded the country of the Râñâ Sultânji, with whom Merâman Khawâs had made an alliance, but, time-server as he was, he broke it and supplicated the Divânji Sâheb to pardon his transgressions.

Accordingly he joined the army; and after devastating the country of the Râñâ the Divânji Sâheb left a detachment to besiege the fort of Khirasrâ, and proceeded with the army to collect the jamâbandi (revenue) from the Khambhât, Dhandhukâ, and Limbdi frontier. The Rânâ, who was now helpless, agreed to pay a fine and heavy tribute, and to repair the fort of Devrâ, whereon he again obtained peace. During this year the parganah of Dâthâ came into the possession of the government of Junâgaḥ.

Verses :—

The night is dark, the storm so terrible,

MURDER OF THE DIVÂN SÂHEB AMARJI.

The Navâb Sâheb Hâmed Khân left the army, which was on a mulukgiri expedition, in Samvat 1840 [A.D. 1784], on pretence of sickness, and made a night's halt at Gondal on his journey; on this occasion Kumbhâji, who was always apprehensive that the Divân Sâheb might retake Dhorâji and Upletâ, spoke as follows to the Navâb :—"I will give you three lākhs of Jami koḍis if you will get rid of your Divân, who is an ambitious man and carries on the affairs of your state with a high hand, and if you effect this you will acquire independence and freedom from control, as well as full authority in your government." When the Navâb Sâheb entered Junâgaḥ he set about the execution of his plan, by alluring with abundant gifts and promises of high offices Manohardâs, son of Trikamdâs, a Nâgar of the Vaishṇava sect who was in the confidence of the Divân Sâheb, and Mehta Khân and Jubah Khân Gujarâti and Jivan Khân Afghân, all of whom were companions and guards of the Navâb, to aid him in the execution thereof. Accordingly, when the Divân Sâheb had returned from the collection of the peshkash [tribute] to Junâgadh during the Huli festival, and Bibî Sardâr Bakhtâ, widow of the deceased Navâb Mahâbat Khân, invited him to the palace on the pretence of showing him the trousseau she had prepared for the marriage of Bibî Kamâl Bakhtâ, daughter of Ghâzi-al-dîn Khân to the Navâb Hâmid Khân, and which consisted of garments, jewellery, with gold and silver ornaments, &c., they there put him to death. They who committed the deed acquired thereby eternal infamy. The murder was committed on the 11th Rabi II. A.H. 1198 (March 6th, A.D. 1784). On this occasion the author and Divân Dulabhji, with Desâi Sâmaldâs, and Rudraji the Gomashah, were thrown into prison, in spite of the aid of the Arab Jamadârs Sheikh Muhammad Zubaidi, and Mâsud, and Sâleh Abdullâ, and Hâdi, and the Sindhi Jamadârs Sharfud-dîn and Malhâr, and other Gujarâtis and Afghâns, but it availed nothing.

At this time the army of the Gaikvâd Morâr Râo Senâ Khân Khel Shamsheer Bahâdur was camped in the zillah of Gohelvâd, levying tribute. Rupaji Sindhia, who was a cousin of Mâdhavji Sindhia, the intimate friend of the murdered

Divân Sâheb, accompanied the Gaikvâd army. On hearing the melancholy news, he advanced by forced marches and encamped in the plain of Dhandusar, at a distance of four kos from Junâgaḍh, where he pitched his victorious tents. Thence he demanded from the Navâb Sâheb satisfaction for this wanton murder, and enjoined him to release the men whom he had imprisoned, as the Arabs had confined the Navâb to the Raug Mahâl until he should give proper securities; he therefore, perceiving the altered circumstances of the time,* released the prisoners after one month.

Râval Vakhatsingh, observing his opportunity, expelled the thânah of Junâgaḍh which had been recently placed at the port of Mâhuwâ, and gradually acquired possession of Loliânâ, Pâtṇâ, Saldî, and other places. The Navâb Sâheb, when he saw there was no other remedy, invested Raghunâthji, the excellent son of the late Divânji Sâheb Amarji, with the garb of minister. The date of this event has been found by Pânti Miân Chisti as follows :—

Verses :—

“When Raghunâthji received the robe of the ministry
Venus came dancing with joy at the sight,
And a joyful voice issued from the sky
‘The good fortune which has departed has again returned.’”*

* The numerical values of the letters amount to.....the year A. H. in which the event happened.

And the demands of the late Divânji Sâheb, which amounted to sixty lākhs of Jâmi koṭīs, were thus settled in the presence of the Gaikvâḍ, the ruler of the age.

The parganahs of Unâ, of Delvâḍâ, of Mângrol, of Sil, and of Divâsâ were mortgaged until the liquidation of the debt with interest was effected. This was arranged in Samvat 1840. The second agreement was that the four villages of Halyâḍ, Bhensân, Antaroli, and Akhodar, bestowed as a reward for the conquest of the forts of Verâval and Kutianâ, should be considered as a ransom for the murder of the Divân Sâheb, and his children should also receive five villages from the parganahs of Mângrol and Sutrâpâḍâ respectively. To this agreement Sayyid Ghulâm Mahi-al-dîn and Sayyid Ahmad Qâdari, with the Arab and Sindhi Jamadârs Haiyât Khân Baluch and Hari Sing Qasbâti, stood security. As, however, the army of the Gaikvâḍ would not move without the consent of the sons of the murdered Divân, the Divân Dulabhji despatched the author to that chief of exalted fortune Morâr Râo Gaikvâḍ to plead for the pardon of the Navâb Sâheb. When the author arrived at the tents, the Gaikvâḍ himself, with Râja Nârâyaṇ Râo Pândre, Jivâji Sâmraj, Rupâji Sindhiâ, and the Nimbâlkar, the Sardârs of Barôda and the Deshmukhs, and Jamadâr Hamid, and the Yemani Amirs Obayd, Qâsam, Hâra, &c. came to condole with him one by one, and each noble presented him with two shawls and an embroidered scarf and turban. In all they amounted to about a hundred. The Râo Sâheb advanced a hundred paces from his private tent and presented me with a palanquin and with the turban from his own blessed head, and directed that I should be appointed his Divân, and Superintendent of a pâgañ of 1500 horsemen according to the rules of Pândre; and the annual pay of all these men amounted to six lākhs and forty thousand rupees, and to defray this he assigned the revenues of the parganahs Mahudha, Amreli, Dâmnagar and Koḍinâr, but, as I was brought up in this country, and had my relatives here, I could not accept of this bounty.

Finally the fort of Kutianâ was given to the Divân Govindji, and Unâ and the Mângrol parganah to the Divân Dulabhji, Verâval to the Divân Raghunâthji, and Sutrapâdâ to Sâmalji Mânkaḍ, the maternal uncle of the author. In spite of his favours the Srimant Gaikvâḍ made a demand for these parganahs, but Divân Dulabhji, being faithful to his salt, refused to consent.

When the army of the Gaikvâḍ had marched away, Sayyid Sâlim, Abdu'llah bin Hamid, Omar bin Hamid, Ahmed Umar, Sheikh Muhammad Zubeid, and other Arabs kept the Navâb Sâheb Hâmed Khân for four months confined to his tents near the Vanthali Gate, to enforce payment of their arrears of salary. The Navâb, however, who was as cunning as Lokmân, sent for a covered carriage from the darbâr, and spread a rumour that his mother, the Bibî Sâhebah Sardâr Bakhtâ, whom he had not seen for several months, was coming to pay him a visit; the simple Arabs kept their guard without the tents, whilst the Navâb Sâheb made his servant Rahmat Khân lie down on his bed and represent him, whilst he left in the carriage in the assumed garb of a woman. As soon as he entered the Rang Mahal, he began to fire muskets and cannon upon the Arabs; when the Arabs saw that their scheme had failed, they took refuge in the Uparkoṭ; this, however, he also attacked, and after some more fighting peace was concluded on the condition that the Arabs should receive one-half of the wages due to them. The Divân Dulabhji and others, being tired of the perpetual fightings, emigrated to Jetpur with their families.

THE FORT OF VERÂVAL IS TAKEN FROM THE DIVÂN RAGHUNÂTHJI BY TREACHERY.

Since Samvat 1836 the fort of Verâval had belonged to the Divân Raghunâthji, but three confidential leaders of sibandi, namely, the Jama-dârs Rabyâ, Rakhyah, and Nebhor, and Tâj Muhammad Qamar, were decoyed by the Navâb to his own side from motives of gain, and they, forgetting the obligations under which they were to the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji, expelled him from the fort; accordingly he went by the way of Gorakhmadi first to Jetpur, and then after a lapse of several months to Junâgaḍh, during which interval Tâpidâs Vaishṇava and Manohar-dâs Jikâr, like reptiles of the earth, endeavoured to carry on the office of Divân, but were not tolerated longer than a week.

THE NAVÂB SÂHEB INSTIGATES THE ARABS AGAINST THE DIVÂNJI.

In this year there happened to be a partial famine; and Ibrâhim Khân, with Hânsoji and Atâji and Khânji, having obtained a favourable opportunity, expelled Sâmalji (Mânkaḍ) from Sutrâpâdâ, and took possession of the fort; accordingly the Divân Dulabhji sent Parbhâshan-kar Faujdâr from Unâ with troops to besiege it, whereupon the garrison, being helpless, accepted the author as their governor. The Divân Dulabhji had gone on a progress through the country, and leaving Junâgaḍh had reached Unâ when the Navâb Sâheb issued orders to have him killed, but was unsuccessful. Afterwards the Navâb instigated the Arab Jamadârs in Junâgaḍh who were in the employ of the Divân to abandon him; and Divân Govindji, with the Jamadâr Shekh Muhammad Zubeidi, Sâleh A'bdullah, and other Arabs, was besieged in the Uparkôt, but after some fighting an arrangement was made that the moiety of their wages should be paid to them. Then the Divân Govindji went to Jetpur; and the Divân Dulabhji, who was at Unâ, was joined by the Divân Ranchodji from Sutrâpâdâ, whence he had been expelled by Ibrâhim Khân Hânsoji Pathân and others who were in expectation of such work. The Navâb Sâheb appointed his servant Shekh Mahmûd Mângrolî to conquer Unâ, and he took up a position at Gupt Prâg; and it happened that Mehtâ Parbhâshankar—a Bâns-vâdâ Nâgar who had been a confidential servant of Divân Dulabhji, and had been employed by him for years, and who had been the Thânadâr of Unâ and Kodinâr, and who had subjugated the whole of Bâbriâvâd and Kâthiâvâd by his prowess, and whom the Governor of Muzaffarâbâd, (Jâfarâbâd) as well as the Portuguese of Diu feared—swerved from his loyalty in consequence of the events of the times, and instigated the Jamadârs of the Sirbandi, namely, Rayah (Rabi) and Puna, and Jesâ and Rahim, and Avud'Ali, to expel Dulabhji, which they did at the beginning of the rainy season. He now went to Delvâdâ, where also he was not allowed to remain, but the people there kept his son Morârji as their nominal Sardâr. The said Divân then stayed for a month at Dhorâji, where he paid off the Arabs who had been in his service, and went to Jetpur, and was hospitably entertained all this time by Jâdejâ Kumbhâji.

GUL KHÂN IS SLAIN. MARRIAGE OF THE
OF YEAR 1842.

The Sindhi Jamadârs kept forcible possession of the fort of Vanthali to enforce payment of their arrears, whilst Jamadârs Karamshâh and Othmân and others had established themselves firmly in the Rang Mahâl at Junâgadh; but the Navâb Sâheb, who in deceit and artifice excelled Kalilah and Dimnah, induced the Arabs to slay the Jamadâr Gul Khân in the middle of the bâzâr during the celebration of the Îd, and to expel the other Jamadârs from the city by force. These men, however, took refuge in Vanthali, whither the Navâb himself went to oust them, and called to his assistance also Premji Lohânâ from Porbandar, but after his arrival they could not agree, and he was obliged to return in disgrace. Now, since no one could carry on the work of Divân or subjugate the Sindhis, the Navâb found himself forced to go to Jetpur, where he remained fifteen days, and after a thousand supplications invested the Divân Raghunâthji with the official dress of Divân, and finally brought him to Junâgadh; during the same year he contracted a marriage with the daughter of Navâb Ghâzîal-din Khân, the Jâgirdâr of Sami, and Munjpur; the lady's name was Kamâl Bakhtâ, and the wedding was celebrated in the town of Morbi, on which occasion the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji and Dulabhji gave large sums to Châraus and singers.

CONQUEST OF THE FORT OF SUTRÂPÂDÂ.

After Ibrâhim and Hânsoji Pattani had expelled the author, they took possession of the whole parganah of Sutrâpâdâ; the Divânji therefore gave orders to Parbhâshankar to come from Unâ and chastise them; and he issuing from Unâ punished them and expelled them from the fort after a month's siege, and the author was installed there as Mutasaddi, and held the office for eight years.

Meanwhile the Navâb Sâheb carried on the government of Junâgadh in a wavering manner, various factions intrigued against each other, and the Divân^a Sâheb Raghunâthji again resigned his office; but as the Navâb Sâheb was unable alone to conduct affairs, he found himself under the necessity for six months of paying visits to the house of Raghunâthji to consult him, and finally he again persuaded him, whether he would or not, to accept the office of Divân.

Jâdejâ Kumbhâji, who was a shrewd man, at the time when a disagreement had taken place between the master and the servant, obtained a deed writing over permanently the jamâ of Gondal and of Jetalsar, Meli, Majethi, Lath, Bhimorâ, and the parganah of Sarsâi-Châmpardâ, on account of the three lākhs of Jâmis which he had advanced in Samvat 1840.

CONQUEST OF KESOJ.

The Râizâdah Dagoji, the Zamindâr of Kesoj, kept in his pay Arab Jamadârs and Masu'd, Omar, Salomi and others, as well as Bayi Khân the Makrâni, and plundered the villages of Bânṭvâ; accordingly Edal Khân and Mukhtâr Khân implored the aid of the Divân Raghunâthji. Divân Dulabhji, who considered himself as the X Nâib of the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji, sent the author with a force and artillery to the theatre of war. The first place sacked and burnt by the enemy was Agatrâi; and at the instance of the injured people I started, and fought a severe battle in the plain of the locality just mentioned, in which the Jamadâr Omar Salomi was killed, and on our side Mukhtâr Khân was wounded by a dagger-thrust, but slightly, as he wore a coat of mail. The second battle, in which about one hundred and fifty men on both sides were wounded, was fought near the village of Mavânâ; it lasted long, as the Arabs, under the protection of date-trees, firmly held their ground.

In this fight a personal attendant of the Divân Ranchodji, with Jamadâr Jân Muhammad and the Risûlâh of Omar, made great exertions, so that Dagoji agreed to pay a fine, as well as restore the plunder he had taken in the Bâptvâ parganah. A few months afterwards he became so embarrassed on account of the pay he owed his troops, that in Samvat 1844 he sold the fort of Kesoj to the Divân Dulabhji for a lākḥ of Jâmi koḍis.

DIVÂN RAGHUNÂTHJI TAKES THE FORTS OF
RÂNÂ SULTÂNJI.

As Sanghji Râizâdah, Zamindâr of Chorvâd, had lost his life in the battle at Mâliâ, and his survivors were perplexed how to pay the troops, they made over the fort of Chorvâd to Rânâ Sultânji of Porbandar, who took possession of it, and at the same time raised a quarrel with Mângrol, but the time blinded his eyes from seeing the future, and made his mind arrogant. Ibrahim Khân Pattani and other rebels from the Junâgadh government had joined him, and he had enlisted them in his service, and he took possession of the fort of Verâval by means of scaling-ladders during the night of the 13th Bhâdarvâ in Samvat 1814. Diler Khân and Thânahdâr Ghulâmi, the servants of the Navâb Sâheb, pulled off their shoes before they had even seen the water, and sued for quarter without having offered any resistance, and issued forth; however, Ghulâmi was killed. On that occasion the author, who had been for four years employed as Mutasaddi of Sutrâpâdâ, as soon as he heard what had taken place, marched at once to the fort, but before I arrived the cowardly Diler Khân had surrendered the fort. When this news reached Junâgadh, Divân Dulabhji, who considered news of this sort good tidings, exclaimed—

“Will dignity or gold avail a fool?

A kick is all that he requires!”

Divân Raghunâthji and Govindji managed the army, whilst Dulabhji, who suffered much from dropsy, remained in Junâgadh and sent to them the war material they required, and took care that the Sibandis were paid. Meanwhile the army besieged Chorvâd, and troops having assembled from all parts, Kumbhaji Jadeja was fortunate enough to serve there, and the gardens of Chorvâḍ were so devastated that cows and donkeys grazed on the celebrated* pân leaves, whilst the people crawled, under the shade of plantain trees.

Ibrahim Khân, who was the commander of the Rânâ's forces, one day led a sortie against the besiegers and was killed by a musket-ball, and finally on the day of Kârtak Sûd first, in Samvat 1845, the fort was assaulted on the side where it had been breached by the cannon on that occasion. The Navâb Sâheb and the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji mounted the breach as a bridegroom goes to meet the bride, and thus entered the city, and after applying scaling ladders, scaled the walls. O'mars Khokher and several other brave warriors showed much gallantry. Another assaulting party was led by Sâmaji Mânkar, the maternal uncle of the Divân, which entered the fort after a few musketry discharges from their Arabs, and the garrison after a slight resistance pleading for quarter saved their lives, and the family and children of Mokâji Râizâdah, the Zamindâr of Chorvâḍ, by the intervention of Kumbhaji Jadeja, were allowed to depart honourably to Dhoraji; and from this date the government of the Râizâdahs ceased to exist in Chorvâḍ.

After this victory the Navâb Sâheb marched with his victorious army to Verâval and laid siege to it. The Jemadars Rakhiah Karamshâh

* Chorvâḍ is celebrated for its pân gardens.

Malik Sultân Yahia Ben Mansur and Atâji and Dâwudji Kunwar defended the fort with a large garrison provisioned from the sea by way of Porbandar, and placing cannon on boats they cannonaded the camp, and also made a sharp attack on the besieging batteries, but eventually were repulsed. In those times Budhanâth, the abbot of Gorakmadi, who was very liberal and hospitable, happened to die, and the Navâb Sâheb Hâmed Khân despatched the author with Sheikh Mahmûd and Parbhashankar to condole with the family. In the same year also Divân Dulabhji died suddenly of the dropsy on Mâgsar Wad 2nd, and although the Navâb Sâheb and the army were much distressed at the news, the Divân Raghunâthji and Govindji put their trust in the mercy of God, and continued the siege. At last on Posh Wad 6th they allured to their side Ali Khân Atâji and Hansoji, and the Pattani Jamadârs, who from desire of their jâgirs and former service, turning from their allegiance joined the Navâb, and the following arrangement was made, that at midnight they should open the wicket in the gate and admit the Navâb's men. The Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji in person and Divân Govindji, with the commanders of the forces Parbâshankar and Sâmâji Mânkar, with 200 Arabs, 100 Sindhis and the Jamadârs Jiâ Jânkhâ, Syad Salim, Syad Ali, and others, entered the fort on the west side, which was as it were the rising east of the Navâb Sâheb's fortune. Immediately on their making their attack, the garrison stood to their arms, and fought with such constancy and unspeakable gallantry that the angels in heaven were compelled to applaud their prowess. And now that the sword play ceased, they still fought with knives and daggers and blows and pushes, till their coats of mail were all rent, and the grainyard of existence was in many cases entirely burned up. In this affair Dâwudji, who was one of the cousins of Rânâ Sultânji, was slain by a musket-ball, and the garrison losing courage, fled, under the cover of night. Most of them however died either of exhaustion after they had escaped and became a prey to vultures and crows, or were reduced to the most destitute condition by thieves and plunderers. In the morning, which is the time of the rising of the sun of fortune, they sent the good news to the Navâb Sâheb, who at once entered the city with great pomp and bestowed much praise on the Divân Sâheb.

After the conquest of Verâval the Navâb Sâheb proceeded with his army to collect peshkash, and then advancing by forced marches, replundered and ravaged the Rânâ's country, who being distressed to see his country thus harried, and alarmed also at the siege of the fort of Kandornâ by the Divân Govindji, who was the governor of Kutianâ, sued for peace, and agreed to pay a nozarânah and a fine, and on these terms peace was concluded in Samvat 1846.

The Arab Jamadârs Zobaidi, Sâlih-A'bdullah, Muhammad Abu Bakr, Hâmed Mohsin and Hâmed Nâsir with Naji had in various emergencies stood security to the troops for the payment of their wages by the Navâb, who was at present also unable to pay their own salaries. They accordingly kept him in close confinement at the Rang-Mahâl, and prevented him getting either food or water, nor would they listen to the intercession of the Divân Raghunâthji. One day, however, the Navâb Sâheb seeing his opportunity, took several of his guards into his counsel, and by a thousand artifices contrived to escape from his Arab guards. Like a flash of lightning he then collected the Khânts and Sindhis from the surrounding country, by whose aid he expelled the Arabs from the town with shame and ignominy, and in this fight Utamrâm Ghodâdra Nâgar, who was a peshkâr [agent] of mine, was slain. The Arab Jamadârs who had possessed the fort of Chorwâr for some little time now ravaged the country, and my maternal uncle Sâmalji encamped near Chorvâḍ with some sipahis to restrain their excesses. During this confusion [Divân] Govindji died, on the 10th of Mahasûd, in Sainvat 1846.

In Sainvat 1847 a great famine raged in the country, during which many persons of low caste became Musalmâns for the sake of bread, or emigrated, and Musalmâns became faithless. Grass became as precious as saffron, and grain was extremely dear ; nevertheless the rayats of the parganahs of Mângrol, Verâval, and Pâtan, suffered during this heaven-sent calamity a great deal from the Arabs, but their depredations were put a stop to by the end of the year, and they surrendered the fort of Chorvâd, which was entrusted to the author, and I undertook myself to defray the pay of the soldiery. On this occasion Mehta Vâsanji Bin Vâsanji, a Nâgar, who was my maternal uncle, and Divân to the Jâm Jasâji, being on his way to Prabhâs and Prâchi, was present. The Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji having made an arrangement with his brother Morârji to divide the administration with him, took an army into the district to levy peshkash, of which however on account of the famine not much could be collected. Jamâdâr Hamid Sindhi now arrived in the Haweli parganah of Junâgadh on behalf of the Gâekwâr to collect peshkash, and when tribute was refused he commenced to ravage the country and laid waste many villages of the district of Verâval. On his return march, when he was at a distance of four kos from Junâgadh, the Arabs and horsemen who were loyal turned to attack him, and he himself was killed by a musket-ball in the conflict. This happened in Samvat 1848.

Khushâlrainâgar, imprisoned the Divân Raghunâthji, with Bhai Morârji and their adherents Prabhashankar, Dayalji, and other Nâgars, in return for their excellent service in conquering the country, and their houses were also plundered and their treasure confiscated. When this misfortune befel the family of the Divân Sâheb Amarji, the author happened to be at Chorvâd, and Antaji, the brother of Morârji, was at Unâ; they both made strenuous efforts to effect the liberation of the prisoners, and attacked the Navâb's men on several occasions, and under the protection of Shri Budhâ Bâvâ [the linga of Shiva in the possession of the Divân's family] in the year 1869 plundered the forts of Ghoghâ, Sarasiâ, Mâliâ, Kâgwadar, and A'dri. On the 6th of Posh Wad I plundered the village of Shergaḍh, inhabited by the Maiyâs, and collected a great deal of booty. In the fight at Kodinâr, Bhai Antaji captured some of the Navâb Sâheb's jamâdars and dismissed them from thence, but a Sirdar of his army, and Wânio Mâdharji, the commander of their army, fell into a dry well and thus preserved the water of their lives.

In fine, on the 15th Posh Sud the Navâb Sâheb put to death Prabhashankar and Dayâlji, the chief agents of Divân Raghunâthji, whom he set at liberty on the 11th Mahâ Vad, and six months afterwards he released also Morârji without levying any fine, and by the decree of fate I happened on the same day to get possession of the fort of Pâtana, held in behalf of Shekh Badar-ud-din by Kâzi Abd-ul Khâlik and Shekh Mâhmud. Now as we three brothers had been expelled from the country, we did not remain at Junâgaḍh in spite of the attention and courtesy of the Navâb Sâheb Hâmid Khân, nor would we accept the offers of Shekh Badar-ud-din to stay at Mângrol, nor those of Dâji of Dhorâji to stay there, but yielded to the sincere wish of Mchrâwan Khavâs, the minister of Jâm Sâheb Jasâji, who had sent Mehtâ Adâbhâi with one hundred sowârs, a kettle-drum, and banner as far as Chorvâd to meet me, and went to Nawânagar, where I was presented with the parganahs of Pardhari and Atkôt in jāgir. As I did not return quickly, the fort of Pâtan remained without a master, and the Pâtanis, who have an old grudge towards the family of Shâik Myân [Shekh Badar-ud-din] occupying it on behalf of the Navâb Sâheb, expelled my Thânadâr Kâzi Abd-ul Khâlik from thence.

X Morârji, son of Divân Dulabhji, went to Bhâvnagar and obtained four villages in jāgir, and Mangalji, son of Divân Govindji, who was of tender age, had all his gold seized as a fine (by the Navâb); he remained for a short time in the service of Rânâ Sultânji and of the Jâm Sâheb Jasâji, with a pāga of horse. The Navâb now, whilst the office of Divân at Junâgaḍh was jointly held by Kalyân Seth and Madhurâi, son of Khushalrâi, exacted a fine of 10 lākhs of jāinis from the Somparâ and Nāgar Brāhmans.

In Samvat 1850 Râwal Wakhtsingh began to harass the Kâthis, who lived under the special protection of Junâgaḍh. Accordingly an army was sent from thence to aid them; Râwal Wakhtsingh attacked Chital, which is the residence and habitation of the Kâthis, and the force sent in aid under Jamâdâr Abdullah and Chotamlâl Nâgar evacuated the place.

On their return from a mulukgiri expedition, the Navâb Sâheb and Kâlyân Seth happened to meet Mehrâman Khawâs at Kâlâwad, on which occasion the Navâb Sâheb said to the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji with his own gracious mouth:—"I was wrong, I was wrong. Forgive what has passed; I give you the Divânship;" after that he placed the hand of the said Divân in that of Mehrâman Khawâs, saying, "this is a pledge on my behalf."

Madhurâi, a Gujarâthi Nâgar, who gave vent to his high aspirations after the departure of the Divân Raghunâthji, although he was a duftur-writer, considered himself able to discharge the functions of a Divân, and actually did so conjointly with Kalyân Seth, sharing equally in the profits. In a short time, however, according to the proverb that "ten Darveshes find room under one coverlet, but not two sovereigns in one kingdom," Kalyân Seth and Madhurâi quarrelled with each other, the former took refuge in the house of Syad Ghulâm-Mâhya-ud-din, and the latter, abandoning all hopes of safety, departed at midnight under the protection of the Jamâdârs Ahmed Qer, Sheikh Sâyd, Nâsir Yamani, and Musa Muharriz Arab, through a passage dug under the western wall, and arrived on foot with his family in Vanthali, after suffering a thousand indignities. To punish him, the Navâb dispatched an invitation to the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji, who sent the author from Nâgar with troops, whercon the Navâb Sâheb took his station beneath the fort, and Madhurâi, being alarmed, agreed to pay a ransom in cash and evacuated the fort. He went a few months afterwards from Gondal to Baroda with Bâbâji Saheb, who had come to this country to collect the jamâbandi, and in course of time his previous services were taken into consideration by the Navâb, who gave him the jâgir and office of daftari, and as he had no son, his son-in-law Keshavlâl received his appointment, which he still holds.

In Samvat 1851 Mâhâdâji Sindhia procured a vakil's appointment for Madhurâi by his influence to the Court of the Bâdshâh of Delhi, and obtained through his efforts a sanad prohibiting the slaughter of cows throughout Hindustan. On that occasion he received also a dress of honour, a turban plume of pearls, a bracelet studded with diamonds, and a necklace of the same kind; earrings, anklets, and inkstand and pentray, a seal, shield, sword, Arab horse, an elephant and howda, two elephants with drums and banners, and a palanquin. In the year St. 1851 also,

Prince Bahâdur Khân Bahâdur Bâbî, of exalted fortune, was born; of his mother Râjkunwarbâ on Jêth wad 12th, the date of his birth is embodied in the word بختاور May God grant him long life.

THE DIVÂNSHIP OF KALYÂN SETH.

When Madhurâi his rival disappeared, Kalyân Sêth, considering that the rose was now without a thorn, carried on the administration on his own responsibility. In Samvat 1852 Fatch Muham-mad Notyâr, minister of the Râo Sâheb, came from Bhuj with a numerous army and crossed the Râj with the intention of ravaging Hallâr. Accordingly Merâman Khawâs invited the aid of a band of Afghâns under Sher Jang Khân Alif Khân, Zulfikâr Khân, Anwar Khân, Karim-dâd Khân, and Sâheb Dâd Khân, who in the service of Malhâr Râo Gâekwâr, zamindar of Kadi, had acquired much fame when warring against Śrimant Râo Sâheb Govind Râo Gâekwâr, and agreed to pay 2 lākhs and 15,000 jâmis to them as remuneration for their services; he also obtained the alliance of the Navâb Sâheb, who marched with his Arab and Sindhi Regiments under Mukhtiâr Khân Bâbî, Jamâlkhân Balûch, Harising Solankhi the Grâsiâ of Bâlâ-gâm, the auxiliaries from Mangrol, the Qasbâtis of Kutianâ, the Kâthis, and the pâgadârs Azam Beg and Jamiat Khân, and joined the Nâgar army at the village of Dhensarâ, of the Âmbran parganah. Meanwhile the army of Bhuj encamped at a distance of about half a kos from us. I went with my brothers and a Risâlah of troops as a body-guard to the Navâb Sâheb; but after a while, Gajsing, the Râjah of Halwad and Dhrângadhrâ, who was a relative of the Râo, arrived, and by his mediation peace was concluded, the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji representing Nagar in the negotiation, and Kalyân Seth Junâgadh; a battle being thus averted, the armies separated.

MARCH OF THE NAVÂB SÂHEB AGAINST BHÂVNAGAR, AND THE UNSATISFACTORY RESULT.

The Navâb Sâheb marched with his army from Dhensarâ against Râwal Wakhtsingh, because the Râwal had conquered the fort of Kuṇḍala, of which place Morârji, son of Divân Dulabhji, was thânadâr, and had also taken the fort of Râjulâ. The Navâb Sâheb captured Kanyâji Gohel in the Goghâbârah, and ravaged the country of Bhâvnagar; thence he came and encamped at Chital, and collected a great number of Kâṭhis and ordered a march with the intention of destroying Bhâvnagar. On the other hand Râwal Wakhtsingh also came to meet him, with a large and well equipped army, and encamped in the Dhasâ plain, opposite to the Navâb's camp. For one whole day both armies were engaged and kept up a constant cannonade. The Navâb Sâheb, considering the cowardly character of Kalyân Seth, perceived that peace was the only means to escape from this calamity, and therefore concluded it with the approbation of all his advisers, and agreed to receive one lakh and fifteen thousand Rupees, and wrote parwânahs for the forts of Kuṇḍalâ and Râjulâ, and pardoned Wakhtsingh his past transgressions. To make his return to Junâgaḍh glorious, the Navâb first took possession of the fort of Mâliyâ, which he conquered from the grâsiâ Pithâyat Hâthi, after a siege of three days.

THE JAMÂDÂR ÂMIN CANNONADES
MANJÂVADI.

In Saṁvat 1854 Âmin Sâheb, a son of Jamâdâr Hamid, became the Subah of Kâthiâwâr on behalf of the Gâekwâr; and to avenge the blood of his father [killed by the Navâb of Junâgaḍh] made his appearance at Manjâvadi, the battlements of which place he broke down with his cannon, and after taking treble the amount of the usual jamâbandi according to the rules of of Śivram Gârdi, he departed.

Kalyân Seth, the Baniya who had formerly been the modi (purveyor) of the Divân Sâheb, not considering treachery unlawful, caused Parbâsankar and Dayâlji, confidential servants of the Divân, to be killed, and thus himself became Divân; afterwards however he was so much harassed by the soldiery, who clamoured for their pay which was in arrears, that he spent the whole rainy season under a thousand difficulties in the jungle of Kantoliâ, and desired in some way or other to lessen the glory of Junâgaḍh. With this view he incited the Navâb Sâheb to conquer the fort of Dhândhalpur, the zamindar whereof was the Kâthi Godaḍ Khavaḍ, but after a siege of two months, he was forced to retire unsuccessful. When he arrived in Junâgaḍh, the Arabs assaulted his house for the payment of their wages.

THE DIVÂN SÂHEB RAGHUNÂTHJI IS RECALLED FROM NAGAR.

When the Navâb Sâheb perceived that not one of the pillars of the State was able to extricate him from this difficulty, in Samvat 1857 he despatched some of them, such as Jamiat Khân Shirvâni, Mûlchand, Hayât Khân Baluch, Amarji Jhâlâ, and others to Nagar with letters to the Jâm Sâhib Jasâji, declaring that he would confer a great obligation upon the Navâb by sending back the Divân Raghunâthji; accordingly the latter, although aware of his master's fickle temper, and of the envy of Wâniâ Karsandâs, of Nâgar Kâhandâs, Âzam Beg Chelâ, and others, he took into account that sincere excuses had been made, and that it was his duty, whether he liked it or not, to comply with the wishes of his old master, and went to Junâgaḍh, where he collected an army and took up a position at Vanthali, with the intention of subjugating both Kutianâ and Bântwâ.

The author had been for two years at Porbandar, to which place Prabhudâs and Kamâl Chêla were sent to recall him ; and on the occasion of his departure the Rânâ presented him with a dress, a necklace of pearls, a palanquin, and a litter. When I arrived at Rânâwâv, the cultivators of the Mahiâri parganah complained that Kalyân Sêth had plundered them and carried off much property. To break his power I accordingly engaged the services of the Jamadârs Muhammad Nâsir Boraq, Shâkar Khân, Sardâr Khân, Gulbâz Khân, Muhammad Rafia, Morâd Thôr, Murâd Khân Mckrâni, and many others, and encamped at Meth-Kotađâ. Hereupon Mukhtâr Khân Bâbi lost heart and came to my tent, repenting, separated from Kalyân Sêth, made peace, left his son's wife to the Navâb, and departed for Bântwâ after receiving a safe conduct.

REDUCTION OF THE FORT OF KUTIÂNÂ.

During the 14th night of the dark half of Asu of Samvat 1857, I placed ladders against the north wall and entered the fort of Kutianâ with the Afghân and Arab Jamadârs and the Sipâh Sâlâr Prabhudâs Nâgar. Kalyân Sêth, however, came to meet us, was defeated and besieged in the Kâli-koṭah. Meanwhile the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji, who was stationed at Wanthali and passed his time between fear and hope, heard of what had taken place and advanced. As I was harassing the foe with artillery from the towers and house tops in various directions, and was not expecting or needing any assistance, he encamped with his force near the Bhâdar river. Three days after the Jamâdârs Yahya and Nâsir Yamânî, with Gangasingh and Khândân and Ghiga, Hâmad Sindhi, and many others, sued for mercy and came out. The Divân Sâheb left the settlement of this affair to myself, and marched off with his force to collect the jamâbandi, accompanied by Kûnwar Dewâji Jâdejâ, and levying peshkash as he proceeded, finally reached the Dhandhûkâ frontier, as his father had been in the habit of doing, and encamped in the Limbdi pargana, where he took up his quarters. Kalyân Seth, being distressed and reduced by the war, was taken prisoner with his wife and family on the 3rd of Mâgsar Sûd of Samvat 1858 and placed in confinement at Kandorâ; but Muharriz, the Arab Jamâdâr, held out in the fort, and was suffered to depart on being paid the sum of 22,000 Jami koris, which was due to him as wages. Kalyân Seth, with his whole family, was conveyed to Patan Div, where the Navâb Sâheb was at that time residing. He honoured me by marching one kos to meet me, and made enquiries about the conquest of Kutîânâ, which I narrated to him in the following terms :—" We beleaguered the citadel during a whole month from four sides, and poured fire into it from cannon and muskets, but as it was extremely strongly built of hewn stone, the cannon balls took no effect. Accordingly I dug a mine on the east and another on the west, and it so happened that the latter was on the same spot where formerly the Divân Sâheb Amarji had dug one when he besieged Hâshim-Khân; this mine I abandoned and filled the eastern mine with gunpowder, but got no chance to blow it up. For one night, Murâd Khân Makrâni set the gate of the fort on fire. Next day after battering down the battlements of the fort with my cannon, it was my intention to place ladders against the walls of the fort and to scale it. Kalyân Seth, however, being unable to hold out longer, hung out a flag of truce and surrendered himself with his whole family, whereon the fort came into the possession of this Sirkâr." On hearing this recited, the Navâb Sâheb was greatly pleased, and extolled my bravery and courage; Kalyân Seth was again delivered into my custody, and dying by the decree of God in prison, was requited for his works. The forts of Chorwâd and Unâ, held by Lakhmiprasâd, the son of Kalyân Seth, were then taken possession of and surrendered by me to the officers of the Navâb Sâheb; then I took leave, and proceeding by quick marches, and chastising Ânandpûr en route, I arrived at Limbdi and there met the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji. At that time (in Samvat 1858) the army of the Gaekwâr laid siege to Kâdi, and by the intervention of Mir Sâheb Kamâl-ud-dîn Hûsain, he obtained the aid of the English Government. Accordingly a general arrived from Bombay with cannon of dragon-like aspect and landed at Khambhât. At this time vakils arrived on the part of both Malhâr Râo and the Śrīmant Gaekwâr to ask for aid, but it so happened that in our doubt as to which would be successful, we ended by joining neither and marched back to Junâgadh. In a short time, after severe fighting, the army of the Gaekwâr conquered the fort of Kaḍi, Śivram, the commandant, and others who were in the service of Malhâr Râo, fled and dispersed in the surrounding districts, and when Malhâr Râo perceived that there was no way of escape for him, he went to the tent of the general and begged for quarter; his brother Hanmantrâo departed to the territories of Bhâj, and he himself received the parganah of Naḍiyâd from the Gaekwâr government. Nevertheless two years afterwards, in Samvat 1850, Malhâr Râo fled to Kâthiawâr, where he engaged the services of all the desperate characters out of employ, such as Jamâdâr Umar Hâmīd Umar, with other Arabs and Sindhis, and became the centre of rebellion and raised disturbances. He plundered the country, but the zamindârs did nothing to defend the honour of the Gaekwâr, and at last the army of the latter marched against him under the command of the Divân Sâheb Vithal Râo, and pursuing him closely captured him on the plain of Bhâvnagar and surrendered him to the English, who carried him to Bombay, where he died.

In Samvat 1859 I was collecting tribute in the parganahs which did not regularly pay tribute, and levied double the usual amount, when I was met in the vicinity of Dhrângdrâ by the army of Commandant Śivrâm and of Hanmant Râo, but they were unable to hinder me in any way. Mukand Râo Gâekwâr rebelled and raised a disturbance in the fort of Amrôli, and excited a great sedition in the country. He captured the Nâgar Desâyas of Wânsâwad and demanded from them a ransom. To punish him I marched by the command of the Navâb Sâheb with an army, and after a week's siege liberated the Dêsnis and expelled Mukand Râo, who marched away in repentance and distress. In Sainvat 1860 Bâbâji Sâheb, the Divân of the Gâekwâr, passed through this country with an army numerous as locusts, and levied thrice the amount of money Commandant Śivrâm had been in the habit of taking. Bâbâji also besieged the fort of Vanthali for two months ineffectually. Accordingly he marched off in great dudgeon and plundered the surrounding country as far as Patan Div, and hindered the pilgrims from visiting Śrî Somnâtha; the author followed him everywhere with a numerous army, fighting with him continually; finally obtained from him all the deeds of agreement to pay tribute which he had extorted from the people, and taking tribute only according to the custom of the country, he returned. From the time of Bâbâji Sâheb the tribute of this country was raised to thrice its former amount.

was away as far as Râjkoṭ and the Sarvaiya country to collect peshkash, Âzam Beg Chela, Karsandâs a Vaniyâ, and Kâhandâs induced the Navâb Sâheb to take part in carousals and drinking bouts, with music and dancing and singing, and administered the affairs of the state as they chose, and at their instigation the Navâb Sâheb mortgaged the parganah of Kutîânâ to the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji, as security for the new debt of ten lakhs of jâmis which he owed him.

In the year 1862 Khima, Bhojâ, Karnâ, and other mehtâs, being disgusted with the tyranny of Karsandâs, took refuge at Kutîânâ, but afterwards took up a position at Drâphâ, from which they made predatory incursions. At last, after paying a fine, they were allowed to return to their former posts.

Mehtâ Revâshankar bin Trikamdâs, with Dâyarâm Nâgar, administered the office of Divân for three or four years, but only in name and under the dictation of Karsandâs, and Âzam Beg led out the army to levy jamâbandi but did not even annoy an ant. This fitful and unpromising administration lasted two or three years, and from that time the marching out of armies from Junâgaḍh for the mulukgiri expeditions was put a stop to, and giving up the right of collecting the jamâbandi, they received a fixed amount from the English Government. In the year 1864 Mehtâ Revâshankar and Madhurâi arrived on the part of the Nâvab Sâheb at Kandornâ, whilst I was likewise there paying my respects to Colonel Alexander Walker. The Divân Sâheb Vithal Râo, who bore a grudge towards the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji, because he had hindered Bâbâji Sâheb from conquering the fort of Vantthali and from paying a visit to Somnâth, and because he himself aspired to obtain possession of Junâgaḍh and to turn out the said Divân, calumniated him to the Colonel Sâheb; the latter, however, being as it were the Nushirwân of the period, gave the following plain answer:—"An explanation will be asked about the sixty lakhs owing to the Divân by the Navâb as fixed by the Gâekwâr as a debt, as well as about the sixteen villages promised as blood ransom for the Divân Amarji's murder but treacherously taken away again from him in the year 1849. I will also attach all the country conquered by the efforts of the Divân Sâheb Amarji and will hand it over to his son Divân Raghunâthji; and by what sanad of the Sultân of Delhi is the Navâb in possession of the state of Junâgaḍh." When they had heard these words they became like flies in oil. On the festival (first) of January, Colonel Walker said to the Divânji Sâheb Vithal Râo and to the officers of the Navâb Sâheb in a public assembly—"You are the Divâns of the Gâekwâr Sarkâr and of the Navâb Sâheb, but this is the Divân and leader of our army, and whoever is his enemy is the enemy of the English Government." After that a fine was paid by the Junâgaḍh State for the goods the pirates of Nawâ Bandar had robbed from vessels bound to Surat and Bombay. Walker Sâheb Bahâdûr and Robertson Sâheb and Ballantyne Sâheb and others honoured the author by being present at nâches given by him. I have never seen a man so high and noble-minded as Alexander Walker, of little speech but great intelligence, acquainted with the affairs of government, versed in all political matters, and capable of appreciating men of worth. He conquered the fort of Kandorna in half an hour, and obtained a share in the Porbandar customs; he demolished the fort of Châyya and also put the Gâekwâr under obligations to him. At last he went to Europe and left a good name behind him.

On the 10th of Kârtak Śud in Samvat 1862, Hallaji, on account of his rebellious and perverse disposition, made a treaty with Colonel Alexander Walker after his return from an expedition to Okha, in consequence of which he ceded the moiety of the customs of that port, as well as the east and north gate to the English. I paid my respects to the Colonel and was presented with a dress of honour.

On the 4th of Phâlgûn of the year 1807, corresponding to A.H. 1226, the Navâb Sâheb, the qiblâh of the inhabitants of the world, the angelic tempered Hâmed Khân Bâbi departed this life. The duration of his reign was 36 years 3 months and 5 days; he was intelligent, sweet spoken, and faithful to his word, but apt to change with the times, ready to take offence, and slow in action. So excellent a sovereign is rarely seen in this world.

KHÂN BAHÂDUR BÂBI.

This young prince with his mother Râjkûnwar was kept at Patan, because on returning home after a certain marriage procession which he attended on foot in the town, an Abyssinian boy in his service placed an earthen pot full of fire-wood close to the Navâb's palace and setting fire to it fled. As the Navâb Sâheb experienced much inconvenience by this fire, he considered that the boy had been instructed to act thus by his mother and therefore removed the prince to Patan. After his father's death, however, he was brought back to Junâgadh by the Jamâdar Omar Mokhâsam, Âzam Beg Chelâh, Kahândâs Vaishnâv, Mugatrâm Bakshi, Jhinâ Mehta, and others, and ascended the throne in his 18th year, 9th of Phâgan Sud, Samvat 1867 (A.D. 1810).

The Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji had been living for seven years at Kûtiâna; he kept his family at Mângrol, and enjoyed the jâgir of Râmpur from Nagar. But now Omar Mokhâsam, Hâmid Amru, Sâlim Bin Hamid, Hasan Abu Bakr, Karsandâs the Baniab, Kahândâs Vaishnav, Mugatrâm Bakshi, Jhinâ Mehta, Vâghji Desai, and others, arrived in Kôtiâna, and with a hundred solicitations, promises, and oaths upon the Korân, and on Jamial Shâh Pir, carried him to Junâgaḍh to be Divân. On his arrival the Bâi Sâhibah Râjkûnwar, as well as the Navâb Sâheb Bahâdur Khân, received him with great kindness, but often repeated that in these times the power of the Gâekwad and of the English Sarkâr was greatly on the increase, moreover that the State was encumbered with a debt of a karôr of jâmis due partly to the army and partly to the mutasaddis, and that no other man except himself, whose family had occupied the Divânship for fifty years, could carry on the administration of the Government properly. The Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji, true to his salt, accepted the office in perpetuity for himself and his descendants.

In Samvat 1808 Carnac Sâheb and Gangâdhar Sâstri, who were both in appearance and in reality distinguished men of the period, arrived with an army and brought also Śrîmant Fatchsing Rao Gâekwar Sena Khâs Kheyl himself, with the Divân Sâheb Vithal Rao, the Jemadâr Amin Sâheb, Mir Sâheb Kamâlud-dîn Husain, &c. to attack Navânagar, because one of the Arab Chokidârs of the fort of Modpûr had unjustly killed one of the English Sâhebs; but the Jâm Sâheb of Nagar was so jealous of his own rights that he refused to give up the murderer in spite of the pressing demands of the English. When the army of the English and of the Gâekwad departed from Nagaz, they marched to Lâlwad, which is four kos distant from Junâgadh, and encamping there set forth their claim for a Nazarânah from Bahâdûr Khân on account of his succession to the throne. On that occasion the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji took care of the defences of Junâgadh, and the obstruction of the roads, the erecting of thorn-thickets, and the destruction of the water-courses as dictated by foresight; but the sequel proved that all precautions of this kind were useless, for Mr. Carnac was of a kind disposition, and enmity was soon turned into friendship. Gangâdhar Sâstri took the Divân Raghunâthji and the author to see the wedding of the daughter of Divânji Sâheb Vithal Râo at Amreli, where they assisted at the festivities usual among Amirs, and received presents of dresses, ornaments and food—every guest being presented with cash and other articles according to his position in society; also the mutasaddis of the Navâb Sâheb's private household made their appearance, and came to exchange presents, not suspecting any harm to their master's affairs, they had set on foot thousands of intrigues against us, and considered that if a settlement with the Navâb were to take place by the mediation of the Divân Raghunâthji, his family would rise in importance, which would be a loss to them. Accordingly they had brought letters from the Navâb Sâheb Bahâdûr Khan, addressed to the Divân Sâheb, to Vithal Râo, to Râjuba, and to Gangâdhar Sâstri, to this effect: "Now leave off negotiations, as you cannot obtain what you wish from the Divân Sâheb. I will think over your demands and at a future time obey your wishes." The Divânji being thus helpless, asked for leave. Carnac Sâheb and Gangâdhar Sâstri gave us much consolation and comforted us; and if we had at that time accompanied them to Baroda, we should no doubt have attained to a very exalted rank.

When we returned to Junâgadh we consulted with Râjkuñwarbâi whether we should agree or not to the Gâekwâr's order. She (at the instigation of her private advisers) said with a loud voice, "We will not give even a span's breadth of land, but have no objection to give a moderate nazarânâh in money."

The Divânji Sâheb Vithal Râo, considering that the field was now clear, held out promises of presents to Jamâdâr Omar Mokhâsam and the private Kârbhâris, and obtained a deed in writing giving over the parganahs of Kedinâr and Amreli to the Gâekwâr's government, and by degrees they also encroached and got several other tâlukâs also under their authority, and they completed the fortifications of Amreli, which had been commenced in the time of the late Navâb Hâmid Khân.

During Samvat 1869 (A.D. 1812-13) there was a severe famine; rain did not fall, and on account of the want of grass and grain many people died. During the preceding year, i.e. 1868, a comet was seen in the sky during four months; its tail looked like a broom turned upside down, and its length was eight cubits. In astronomical books its description is as follows :—

त्रिनागसेवां कुरुते वसुधरा.

Next year, that is to say in Samvat 1870, such a pestilence raged, that many who had survived the famine died of it. Sounds of wailing and lamentation issued from every house, and many corpses were left exposed in the midst of the bazar for two or three days, so that Hindus were unable to burn their dead, and Musalmans to shroud and bury theirs, and on the 6th of Mâgsar Sudha, also my brother, of blessed memory, who was a pillar of the state, and a shining light in the family of Divân Sâheb Amarji, whose name was Dalpatrâm, departed this life, and we two surviving brothers suffered much grief at his loss, but there is no remedy for what is past.

AFFAIRS OF THE JAMÂDÂR OMAR, AND HIS EXPULSION BY THE AID OF THE BRITISH.

Aspirations to the office of Divân inflamed the head of the Jamâdâr Omar Makhâsam, and he became ambitious and desirous of obtaining this exalted post, and therefore he enrolled the Jamâdâr Hasan Abu Bakr, Sâlih Bin Abud, Sâlim bin

Hamid, and others in his interests ; he obtained also aid and countenance from the Divânji Sâheb Vithal Râo, and carried on the administration of the Navâb Sâheb's government ; and got the control of all the thânahs into his own hands, but alienated the parganah of Amreli and Kodinâr to the Gâekwâr by way of securing his good graces, and with the aid and co-operation of the Divânji Sâheb Vithal Râo most ungratefully tried in every way he possibly could, to injure the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji.

THE TAKING OF KUTIÂNÂ.

The Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji went for the purpose of performing ablutions in the Godâvar-Gangâ at Nâsik Trimbak, whilst the author went on pilgrimage to Bêcharaji Mâtâ, Sidhpur and Ambâji. The Navâb Bandah Ali Khân, zamin-dâr of Khambhât, at Sidapet Bharoch, Resident Romer Sâheb, Agent at the port of Surat, with Carew Sâheb, who were all men of noble disposition, and the râjas of every locality, received the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji with honours, feasted him, and gave him escorts through their dominions. Carnac Sâheb, who had once been our guest at Kutîânâ, said at the second interview :—"O Divân Sâheb, you are attached to the Honourable Company Sarkâr, and you, as long as you live, and your children afterwards, may expect favours for a long time." In fine this Jâtrâ cost forty thousand Rupees. Gangâdhar Śâstri, who had formerly at Amreli kissed the feet of the Divân Sâheb Baghunâthji, and who had now gone as Vakil to the Court of Śrîmant Amratrâo at Pûna, sent him an invitation to come there, but no meeting could take place on account of the hot season, and Gangâdhar Śâstri himself was killed in that country. When we two brothers returned (from the pilgrimage) and arrived in Amrêli, we thanked the Divân Sâheb Vithalrâo for the hospitable treatment we had met with at Perân Pâtan from Nâgars Mûgatrâm and Motâlbhâi, and Nânâbhai the Majmûdâr, and from Bândûji the Mukâssahdâr, and from Bahâdûr Singh the wine seller.

The Divân Sâheb, unwilling to practice treachery, and out of regard to Jamâdâr Omar Mokhâsam, entered into negotiations with Ballantyne Sâheb; for we considered the English Government our protector. But he (Ballantyne Sâheb) did not act according to his own will, but his mind was entirely under the influence of Sûndarji Khatri, and he caused the parganahs which we held in mortgage for the sum of 10,000 jâmis and for the farm of which I had paid a sum of 70,000 jâmis, besides the ghanim verâ, to be restored to the Navâb. The Divân Sâheb, who relied on the favour of the English Government, when he saw Ballantyne Sâheb no longer showing kindness to him, became helpless, and was unable to offer any remonstrance.

Verse.

The fancied tyranny he did to us,
His neck it stuck to, over us it went.

And in exchange for those mahâls which the Navâb Sâheb had mortgaged to us, and on account of which 30 lākhs of jâmis were due, he caused to be written over to us in jâgir, on the security of the English and Gâekwâr Governments, the four villages of Khâgasri, Iswariâ, Meswânah, and Wâdâsârâ ; this was in Samvat 1871 (A.D. 1814-15).

MARRIAGE OF SÂMBHU PARSAD.

When the light of my eyes Sâmbhuprasâd, son of Dulpatrâm's wedding with the daughter of Âvalram Ambâidâs was solemnized, the Navâb Sâheb Bahâdur Khân honoured it with his presence and came to see the spectacle in which various performances by male and female actors, musicians and singers were going on, and the place was decorated with various sorts of lamps made of glass, mica, coloured paper and ware, which transformed day into night and night into day. The marriage procession was escorted by a thousand soldiers on horseback and foot, and was accompanied by numerous chariots, carts and elephants; but the Divânji Sâheb Vithal Râo and Ballantyne Sâheb, although they had sworn that they would come, remained away under the pretence that the impending siege of the fort of Kandornâ was engrossing their attention. After the Divân Sâheb Raghûnathji had completed the nuptials of his son and performed the Mâharudra Yagna, he retired from the world, and engaged in the worship of his God, but Jamâdâr Omâr Mokhâsam's enmity towards him did not abate.

DISMISSAL OF THE JAMÂDÂR OMAR.

The ingratitude of Jamâdâr Omar Mokâsam impelled him one day to rush with some Arab Jamâdârs into the Rang Mahâl, and to lay his hand on the waist of the Navâb Sâheb, but Jamâdârs Sâlim and Hasan, his faithful attendants, and excellent good fortune saved him, and thus Jamâdâr Omar's evil designs were frustrated, and he was expelled from the city with contumely and disgrace, and commenced to strengthen himself in the districts.

The Navâb Sâheb, when he saw the evil designs and foolish ambition of the Jamâdâr, began to fear for his life, and sought aid from the Divân Raghunâthji, both by promises and oaths, and accordingly the Divân Sâheb, whose heart was devoted to the Navâb's interests, betook himself to Ballantyne Sâheb without the knowledge of the Divân Vithal Râo, who was a firm friend of Jamâdâr Omar's. Now Sundarji Khatri, who was a resident of Kaehh and a dyer by caste, had emerged from poverty by the aid of the holy Râmeswar, and first became of note in the world by trading in horses with the English Government.

and had by degrees become the agent of Ballantyne Sâheb. And Ballantyne Sâheb had made his agent, as it were, a Shâh Bâlâ whom Hindus send in front of the bridal procession as it passes through a city, and send with him their sons and daughters in gorgeous array: nevertheless he derives no advantage from the office of Shâh Bâlâ nor from the borrowed clothes and jewels with which he is decked, except the name.

But this Sundarji assumed the title of Subah, and by false and lying representations had frightened or cajoled all the world, and thus collected much gold. Since he was a sincere friend of the Divân Sâheb, he made an ally of him in this matter, and accordingly the author of this book, and Mugatrâm and Amrullah, repaired to the camp to see Ballantyne Sâheb. At this time the Arâbs had been expelled from Nawânagar by order of the English Government, and then Ballantyne Sâheb, according to the agreement made, came to Junâgadh with his army, and Aston Sâheb, who was in command of the troops, entered the city with a body of soldiers and two guns, to expel Jamâdâr Omar. This Jamâdâr, whose prosperity was thus cut short, was thus expelled the city with concealed face and bare feet, and after a time the affairs of the Jamâdârs were settled through Ballantyne Sâheb, as follows.

Jamâdâr Omar was granted the villages of Timbdi and Piplâ, and one lakh and fifty thousand jâmis by fixed instalments. Hasan 'Abu Bakr received 40,000 Jâmis (koris); and Sâlim Hamîd obtained the village of Sângâwârâ, and they wrote bills of release for the moneys due to them as salaries, and their vakils took their leave. After this the Divânship of Junâgadh was again given to the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji, through the intervention of Ballantyne Sâheb, who informed the Navâb Sâheb that it was the order of the Sarkâr Company Bahâdur, that he should permanently fix the office of Divân in the family of the Divân Sâheb Amarji. In this year the English Government conquered the fort of Ânjâr, but after some time they restored it to the Râo Sâheb by way of form.

DISMISSAL OF DIVÂN RAGHUNÂTHJI, IMPRISONMENT AND SLAUGHTER OF ÂTITS.

Sundarji Khatri, who entertained ambitious designs, instilled into the Navâb's mind a desire for the recovery of the forts of Dhorâji, Upletâ, and Mângrol, the remission of a debt of fifty lakhs jamis (koris) due to the Mutasaddis, and the restoration of the jâgir of Bâlâsinor; in this manner he gained over the Navâb to his side and alienated his favour from the Divân Sâheb—

Whoever came built him a house,
Who likewise acted in the same manner,
So that the habitation belonged to no one.

In Samvat 1874 Shekh Amrullah, who was originally an indigo dyer, and who had been allowed by the deceased Divân Sâheb Amarji to establish himself in the town, and who had by his trade in rich Ahmedâbâdi cloths and all kinds of stuffs, gradually wormed himself into the Court of the Navâb Sâheb, and into the favour of the Masâhebah Râj Kunwar, succeeded at last in attaining the rank of companion (Musâheeb) to the Navâb Sâheb, and with Mugatrâm Bakhshi was despatched through Sândarji to Ballantyne Sâheb with a nazarana of twenty-five thousand rupees in order to obtain his permission to put some old Mutasaddis out of the way who were stumbling blocks to the new Divân, and in order that the full and untrammelled authority of Divân might devolve on Sândarji, and Ballantyne Sâheb, who was anxious to advance the interest of Sândarji by every means in his power, immediately consented, and on the arrival of Amrullah and Mugatrâm, the Navâb Sâheb threw Mehta Amarji Bin Radrâji Jhâlâ and Mulchand Hematrâm Nâgar into prison, on which the Sanyâsis of Śrî Trinetra Mahâdeva and the wine-sellers and Sayyids of Junâgadh who were their securities, issued forth from the city and commenced to sit in "dhornâ."* The Navâb Sâheb sent out Shekh Amrullah, Miân Abd-ul-Qâdr, and Jhinâ Mehta, with Mugatrâm Bakhshi, to satisfy their demands, but as they would not listen, he sent Shahâmat Khân Bâbi, Jamâl Khân Baluchi, and others, with armed men to the number of a hundred, to kill them. The Sayyids considered life sweet and honour bitter, accepted terms saying "we seek safety from God," but they shed the blood of the Sanyâsis and wine-sellers except one of them, a strict performer of penance, who was dragged to the Ūparkot and slain there.

In fine, since Ballantyne Sâheb was an accomplice in this evil action, he instituted no inquiries regarding it, although he came often to Junâgadh to make new arrangements; once he even invested Prabhûdâs Nâgar of Bânsârâ with the dress of Divân on his promise to pay one-half of the debt due to the mutasaddis in eight years, by twenty instalments; in the same way he caused the pay of the sipâhis to be liquidated, but Prabhudâs was likewise unable to keep the office longer than a week or two.

In Samvat 1875 (A.D. 1819), on the evening of the 9th Jesht Vâd, such an earthquake took place that high edifices fell down, the surface of the earth burst, and water gushed forth from it, many persons were buried under ruins; and the next day the earth again trembled, and it appears to have been an earthquake felt over the whole world.

The Navâb Sâheb entrusted for the second time Ratansi and Hansraj bin Jethâ Khatri with the collection of the jamabandi in the whole country of Kâthiâwâr, which had fallen into arrears for ten years, in return for their aid in expelling Jamâdâr Omar, though the Divân Raghunâthji had effected this at the cost only of a lakh and a half of rupees.

Sûndarji also, in his desire to obtain the office of Divân, caused an agreement to be made whereby a lakh of jâmis for vakil's expenses were settled as an annual payment to the English Government, and as security ten villages of Jetpûr and 63,000 jâmis ready money were respectively written over and paid, and the provisions in the bond regarding interest were expunged.

THE DIVÂNSHIP OF SÛNDARJI.

Sûndarji Shavji a Khatri had several times come with Ballantyne Sâheb to Junâgaḍh, and in Samvat 1876 he obtained the farm of all the parganahs from the Navâb Sâheb for a period of ten years, on condition of paying an annual sum of nine lakhs of jâmis, besides defraying the ghanim vero, and Ballantyne Sâheb stood security for him as to the Divâni, and although the said Sûndarji had formerly sworn that he would protect the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji, he on this occasion entirely omitted to do so, and even contributed to his being dismissed. Sûndarji left his nephew Hansraj at Junâgaḍh itself to conduct affairs, and administered the state under the protection of Ballantyne Sâheb. In this year the latter also issued a proclamation that the Sarkâr Company Bahâdur, after fighting with him, had extinguished the Government of Śrîmant Bâji Râo the Peshwâ, which had lasted during one hundred and twenty years at Pûnâ, and had on several occasions vanquished the imperial troops (of the Emperor of Delhi).

DEATH OF THE DIVÂN SÂHEB RAGHUNÂTHJI.

In Samvat 1875, on Âsso Sâd 10th, the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji, successor to the Divân Amarji, departed to Kailâsa, at the age of 56 years, and many persons who had enjoyed of his bounty for a long time were much distressed. He was a worshipper of Śankara, liberal, brave, upright, veracious, skilled in business, protector of the raiyats, in military affairs, in the mulukgiri expeditions, and in manœuvering the army he cannot be said to have been inferior to the late Amarji. The world bewails his loss, and at Benares several Sanyâsis subsist comfortably at his expense. He built the temple of Śrî Bûdhâbâwâ, mentioned in the account of Mângrol, as well as the bathing kûnd called Sarasvatî kûnd, and a dharamsâlâ at Pâtan, and he caused Gayatri purshachaus to be performed, and the pilgrims who resort to Benares enjoy the allowance of food he has made for them.

'WEDDING OF KESARBÂI.

In Samvat 1876 Kesarbâi, daughter of the Rao of Kachh and sister of Rao Sâheb Bhârâ, the Râja of Kachh-Bhuj, was married by the Navâb Sâheb Bahâdur Khân, Bahâdur Bâbi, on which occasion the gates of liberality were opened to the inhabitants of the world and presents were made to dancers, singers, courtesans, story-tellers, Bhâts, Chûrans, Faqirs, Sayyids and Sheiks of the surrounding districts. Everybody obtained more than he expected, and many presents consisted of ready money, goods, horses, camels, and rings for feet and hands, made of gold and jewels. Eatables were also distributed, with opium, (drinks) of various kinds and medical confections. Betelnuts, cardamoms, cloves, and spices were distributed in such quantities that the poor folk sold them in the bazâr. From Kachh, furniture was brought with a female elephant, horses, camels, chariots, cows, sheep, male and female slaves, clothing articles of gold embossed with jewels, some of cast and some of hammered gold, and the articles of furniture amounted in value to five lākhs jāmi koris.

After Ballantyne Sâheb, Barnwell Sâheb, with Chotâlâl, a Gujarâti Nâgar, who was his divân, came as Political Agent in Kâthiâwâr, and as he happened to be near Jetpûr, he came to the marriage-feast at Junâgadh on the invitation of the Navâb Sâheb, on which occasion Hansarâj

(GOVERNOR ELPHINSTONE).

In Samvat 1876 (A.D. 1820) the marriage of the daughter of Dalpatrâm was celebrated, as well as the vastu (opening) ceremonies, which were performed in the temple of Sarasvatî, at the gate of Hatakêswar Mahâdev and the four temples built around it. Since, however, I was vexed with the Navâb Sâheb, and as Hansrâj was my enemy, and as Ballantyne Sâheb connived at his conduct and did not reprove him, I went there with my full train to Goghâ. Therefore the author departed with his followers to meet Governor Elphinstone Sâheb, who had recently arrived there. The Governor Sâheb was so polite as to advance forty steps from his private tent to meet me, and on taking leave he accompanied me one hundred steps. Seven chairs were placed for my companions and vakils, and on three occasions he conversed privately with me in a separate apartment in the Persian language for three hours with great kindness and condescension. What words shall I use to express my thanks to so noble and exalted a personage, who was moreover wholly independent in the conduct of affairs, and the like of whom I never saw nor heard of. This world changeth and passeth away. He departed and left a good name behind him. When I went away he assured me of the friendly disposition of the English Sarkar, and told me to be under no apprehensions of injury from any of the rulers of this country, and presented me with costly dresses of honour. After my return to Junâgadh, I completed the marriage ceremonies of Kasibâ (the daughter of Dalpatrâm) together with the repast, she being weighed with gold and silver in the handsomest manner. This took place on Maha wad 7th, September 1877.

CAPTURE AND RELEASE OF GRANT SÂHEB.

When the Grasia prevailed, Bâwâ Walâ, a Kâthi, captured Grant Sâheb on the Koḍinâr road, and carried him off into the hills, whether he would or no, as his guest, and for several days took him about the forest and jungle. On that occasion (Major) Barnwell Sâheb, who was coming this way, wrote a letter from Ahmadâbâd to the author without any previous acquaintance, and merely on the strength of my friendship towards the Sarkâr Company Bahâdur, requesting me to effect the release of Grant Sâheb. I immediately despatched one or two men to the outlaws, and they brought me a letter from Grant Sâheb from that place, but as I possessed no acquaintance with the English language, I had recourse to Bhavânidâs, the Munshi of Ballantyne Sâheb, who informed his master of the matter. The Sâheb, afraid lest I should effect his release and thus gain renown, sent Hansrâj with numerous troops, both horse and foot, and obtained the release of Grant Sâheb from captivity in exchange for the parganah of Visâwadar, and in course of time Bâvawâlâ, son of Râning, himself was killed by some of his enemies and Visâwadar reverted to its lawful owners.

EXPULSION OF MR. ANDERSON FROM DWARKA, AND PUNISHMENT OF THE WAGHERS BY THE ENGLISH.

Handy Sâheb (Anderson) and Muhammad Âtâ Mûllah were the Thânahdârs of the Company at Dwarka and Beyt, but the Wâghers and Sangrâm Râja of Beyt rebelled and ignominiously expelled them from the fort. In vain did Muhammad Âtâ Mûllah shake his beard, the cow-worshipping Wâghers gave them no time to put their shoes on, plain daylight became as dark to them as a midnight of the rainy season, and without reflecting on the disgrace, both Handy Sâheb and Muhammad Âtâ Mûllah came and paid their respects to Ballantyne Sâheb at Junâgadh. Shortly afterwards the English army went and so chastised the Wâghers, that many of them were precipitated into the bottomless pit of annihilation. Râjâ Sangrâm was captured and safely brought to Surat, and was afterwards sent back to his country again with a small pension and bound over to keep the peace; and they slew Mûlû Mânîk and many other Wâghers in the Gomti river, and the survivors were treated mercifully and granted their former jâgirs, and this mahâl was bestowed anew on the Gâekwâr.

CHASTISEMENT OF THE KRUMÂN KÂTHIS by THE BRITISH.

Jogidas and Hâdo Khûmân and others had for a long time been in outlawry in the country of Râwal Wakhtsingh, who called the English army to his aid. It was under the command of Stanhope Sâheb, and although its movements were rapid, no stop could be put to the depredations of the rebels, who were at last subdued by the skill of Barnwell Sâheb. He being a man of experience, able to impart wisdom to Loqmân, he took into custody some Kâthis of Jetpûr, who were relations and securities of those outlaws, and Chelâ Khâchar of Jasdân and Harsûr Wâlâ of Bagasrâ, and Dânta Kotilâ the zamindar of Dedân, and imprisoned them and attached their estates. He also took possession of the fort of Jetpûr and compelled them to produce and surrender the Khûmâns, whom in Samvat 1882 he handed over to Râwal Wajesingh (of Bhâonagar), and then he restored Jetpûr, Bagasrâ and Jasdân to their former lords.

Barnwell Sâheb, one of whose innate qualities was to bestow favours, procured for the author in Samvat 1878, the farm of the tâlukâs of Râjkot and Sardâr, to be held for seven years (for a fixed rent), and in Samvat 1880 he procured for me the farm of Dhorâji and Upleta, and Mehtâ Amarlâl and Raghunâthji Vasâvaḍa were appointed managers on my behalf.

In Samvat 1879 Sândarji Khatri, who had just returned from a pilgrimage to Harḍwâr, died at the port of Mândvi in his own house. His nephews Hansrâj and Ratanî, who managed the affairs of Jumâgaḍh and of Bhûj, in the pride of their prosperity, cared very little for the Navâb Sâheb or the Jâm Sâheb, they sat on an equality with them in the darbâr, and tyrannically robbed the helpless raiyats of much gold, and despised the Nâgars now when their patron (Ballantyne Sâheb) was removed from Kâthiâwâr and obtained an appointment at Sâdrâ as Political Agent, and as the Navâb was not successful in regaining the jâgir of Bâlâsinor, of which Sândarji had held him out hopes, and on which account Sândarji had taken from him much cash, articles of value and beautiful horses; in consequence of this a great enmity sprang up between them and Leeson Sâheb, and Anderson Sâheb giving Hansrâj an agreement from the Navâb to pay his demands by instalments, expelled him from the town. On hearing this, his brother Ratanî came from Bhûj and spent much money, but could not make peace between them. And if the English had not been their securities, they would have fared ilk. Immediately after his expulsion from Junâ-gaḍh, Hansrâj obtained from the Jâm Sâheb the farm of the Nawânagar estate for a period of ten years, in consideration for an annual payment of seventeen lākhs and thirty thousand jâmi koris, and he received much assistance from Barnwell Sâheb. Hansrâj and Devshi claimed from the Jâm twenty-eight lakhs of jâmi koris on account of the nazarâna of eight lakhs and fifty thousand rupees which they had agreed to pay the English Government on account of Joḍia and Balambhâ.

In Samvat 1885, when Blane Sâheb was appointed Political Agent, who could not distinguish between truth and falsehood, and who was of a very harsh and self-willed disposition, Hansraj lost much both by the farm and his other accounts. In short, he was disgraced, and since he had been occupied in farming and managing districts, his private trade had passed to other hands. The crow, in trying to walk like the partridge, forgets his own mode of progression. Mr. Blane now rooted out all the Khatris and withdrew the security and promises of the Company Bahâdur both from them and others in the Kâthiâwâr zillah, who had been relying in safety on the English Government.

DEATH OF KESARABÂI, AND MURDER OF AHMAD KHÂN FAQIR.

Kesarabâi, the sister of the Râo Sâheb Bhârá and spouse of the Navâb Sâheb Bahâdur Khân, departed about this time to the regions of Paradise.

Ahmad Faqir, a disciple of Mohkim-ud-din Panjâbi, happened by the decree of God to ingratiate himself so much with the Navâb Sâheb that he began soon to address him as his spiritual director and his aiblah, politely bowing to him all the while in every conversation; by degrees however Makdhum Miân Chishti Ismail Khân, Sayyid Karwâ, and Fatch Khân entered into a conspiracy to ruin him. They brought Dêvasî bin Sundarji, who possessed the nature of a devil, with Sundarji Sangvi, who excelled Kalelah and Demnah in acuteness, and Sayyid Karwâ from Râjkoṭ to Junâgaḍh, and induced them to murder Ahmad Khân (because he had been concerned in the dismissal of Seth Sundarji from the Karbariship of Junâgaḍh). The murder of Ahmad Khân was perpetrated on the 4th Muharram A.H. 1240 (Samvat 1880), and as a punishment for it, Che-lâh Esmâyl Khân and Kadava were one year afterwards expelled from the town; Makhdûm Chisith was, after a captivity of one year, compelled to pay a fine of sixty thousand jami (koris), and after giving securities, was allowed to depart to Nagar; but Fateh Khân suffered capital punishment.

EVENTS OF SAMVAT 1880.

The General Sâheb met the Navâb Sâheb (in Samvat 1880) at Kâtharota, and as the author was farming the revenues of Dhorâji and Upletâ, he also obtained the felicity of an interview on the 14th of Mâhavad.

After the murder of Ahmad Khân, his son Yusuf Khân received two villages as an inâm from the Navâb Sâheb, and went to his watan, but Devâsî Seth returned unsuccessfully to Râjkot; but Miân Hasan bin Nathu Miân, who was also one of the disciples of Mohkim-ud-din, attained the dignity of spiritual director to the Navâb, and gained over Sundarji Sangvi to his side, and administered the affairs of State on his own account. Meanwhile Miân Kamar-ud-din, the successor of Barâ Sâheb, who had been the spiritual guide [pir] of the Bâbi dynasty, fell into neglect; and the Navâb Sâheb became very fond of listening to songs and music, of dancing, drinking, eating forbidden things, associating with rosy-cheeked women, and attending combats of buffaloes and rams; often changed his servants, and allowed Hasan Miyân and his vakils to administer the affairs of State sitting in some shop in the bazâr. Lastly, Lakshmidâs Seth, Khushâl Chamaurâi, and Bhûpat Râi Desâi, and Govardhan Seth and the sipâhis who were followers of Ahmad Khân, were kept for two months in prison.

Mehta Govindji bin Amârji bin Rûdraji Jhâlâ, a Nâgar, was formerly the Mutasaddi of Mân-grol and Kesod. Ahmad Khân, considering him a fit puppet, caused him to be appointed Divân in Samvat 1881, but he administered affairs dishonourably, and thought solely of amassing money.

Highway robbers from their haunts about Mount Girnâr, infested the parganahs of Hâlâr and Dhorâji, the inhabitants of which they plundered. They also ravaged the place of the Atits of Śrî Trinetra Mahâdêva, which from ancient times is the ornament and honour of this country, and under the direction of Ahmad Khân, Hamir the Sindhi robber got hold of many lakhs worth of plunder from the monastery. Kaliângar, the helpless mâhant of this monastery, being reduced to great distress by these depredations, preferred his complaints to Captain Barnwell, but the sowârs of the Navâb Sâheb, with several Atits who had a dispute about their hereditary property, pursued him and brought back Kaliângar, having captured him near Dhorâji.

These complaints Barnwell Sâheb sent me from Dhorâji. I at once sent a hundred men to their aid, and rescuing Kaliângar from Jamnâwar, where he was kept a prisoner, I sent him to Râjkot.

Barnwell Sâheb, being apprised of these disturbances, despatched Captain Wilson Sâheb with a regiment to overawe Junâgadh, in the vicinity whereof it remained encamped for two or three months, and at last the Navâb Sâheb went himself in person to W a n t h a l i, agreed to restore the property taken by the robbers (from the temple) and to pay a fine of six lakhs and eighty-five thousand jami koris.

At that time the news arrived that English troops from Madras and Calcutta were invading the K â m r u p country, known as Barmâ, and situated between Calcutta and China, where the inhabitants profess the Buddhist religion. At the first battle, the army took possession of R a n g u n, but on account of the great mountains, brambles, sorcery, epidemic diseases, and the consequent difficulty of carrying on war, they returned after having conquered a portion of that country.

Ranjit Singh the Sikh first conquered Multân and afterwards Kashmir and Âtak by the strength of the sword; he had also occupied Kâbul and Peshâwar, but was unable to keep them.

Some freebooters of the Miyânâ people of Sindh invaded Kachh under their commander Fateh Ali, who on hearing that the English Sarkâr intended to march troops against him, despatched his vakils to Bombay and sued for peace.

In Samvat 1881 so great a famine raged, that beasts went in search of grass to the meadows of the king of death, and many human beings died from want of bread and emaciation. In this year also the excellent and high-minded youth Śambhu-prasâd, who was the shining lamp of us three brothers, withered away from the fierce wind of death on 5th of Jêshth sudh; but man is unable to contend with fate.

In the year 1882 Govindji Jhâlâ (whom Ahmad Khân had always been in the habit of addressing insultingly and replying to reproachfully, and who had, moreover, fallen into disgrace and oblivion like an owl), now after the murder of Ahmad Khân, and through the recommendation of Barnwell and Blane Sâhebs, as well as by the good pleasure of the Navâb Sâheb, obtained for the second time a contract for the farm of the revenues of Junâgadh for ten years under the guarantee of the Company Bahâdur. Some time afterwards, however, the Navâb Sâheb was displeased because the raiyats were oppressed by Govindji Jhâlâ, and at the advice of Hasan Miân Darvesh, he despatched Latif Miyân Bûkhâri and Sayyid-walan Miyân from Kôdinâr as his vakils to Bombay, for the purpose of complaining and making the Sarkâr acquainted with all the doings of Govindji Jhâlâ, and the author was likewise sent for to the Navâb Sâheb's presence.

At the time of the marriage of Lakshmisankar, the light of my eyes and son of Sambhuprasâd, the Navâb Sâheb Bahâdur Khân conferred an everlasting honour on me by making his appearance in the assembly, and Langford Sâheb, although he had but recently arrived, was nevertheless, by his innate generosity, impelled to be present. Langford Sâheb was very painstaking, and so valiant that his mere arrival was sufficient to put a stop to robberies, and his praiseworthy behaviour is deserving of the thanks of all the people, whose unfortunate fate it was that he departed soon; but I heard that on account of the jealousy of some English Sâheb he did not prosper in the service of the Company Bahâdur.

In course of time Hasan Miyân again became reconciled to Jhâlâ Govindji, and he again made peace between him and the Navâb Sâheb.

After the death of the wife of Barnwell Sâheb he was much grieved and departed to the Cape, whence he proceeded in Samvat 1885 to England by the permission of Governor Malcolm, whilst Blane Sâheb, who had been a subordinate of his, took his place after he had departed, and substituted for the patience and good manners of Barnwell Sâheb, his own silly talk and ill-humour. At last, however, he had an attack of erysipelas, for the purpose of curing which—nay, rather to cure the heart-ache of the poor raiyats of Sorath—he departed to Surat, and thence to Europe.

In Samvat 1886, when Blane Sâheb became ruler over the country, he did not allow the justice of the English Sarkâr to take its course, so that the people were distressed and sent their complaints to Bombay, but on account of Newnham Sâheb's friendship for Blane Sâheb no one would listen to them, and on account of the departure of Governor Elphinstone Sâheb Bahâdur—may his prosperity endure for ever—also a great calamity befell those who sought redress for their grievances. Thus, for instance, the vakil of the author, although he had a personal interview with the Governor Malcolm Sâheb and wrote several petitions, yet never received any reply. However, what has happened has happened, and now I have but a short time to live.

On the occasion of the marriage of the Jâm Sâheb Rāṇmalji to the daughter of Râval Wajesingh, rājâ of Bhâvnagar, the author sent a troop of fifty sowârs and a chariot with Lakshmiśankar and Śankarprasâd, who were during two months and a half treated in the kindest manner by the Jâm Sâheb—may God increase his prosperity! Their return cheered my saddened heart. Now, oh Ranchorji, give up telling these idle tales. The world is nothing but a dream or passing thought. They who have died have left nothing behind them but a name. I also must die and leave all, and nothing but a good name endures for ever. Be satisfied, then, be satisfied with contemplating the perfections of that God who is everlasting, immoveable, and immortal.

End of the History of Junâgadh.

In Samvat 1885 Lâdunâth Jogi, whom the Râjâ Mânsinghji of Mârwar considered his spiritual preceptor, came to adore Gorakhnâth, accompanied by a band of three or four thousand horsemen and footmen and tents and cannon. He went to Gorakhnâth with 200 chosen camel sowars, and performed the requisite circumambulations of the shrine, and bringing Piârâth, the abbot of that place, with him to Junâgadh, he presented him with an elephant and then he returned to his own country; but when he reached the zillah of Becharâji on his way thither, he died.

In Samvat 1890 the Navâb Sâheb sent for Sadâshiv Râo, son of the Dakhani Divân, from Ahmadâbâd by means of Nânâ Miyan, and went to meet him on his arrival as far as the Sârdâr Bâgh and handed over to him the ministry. He also seated Sadâshiv Râo beside him on his own elephant, and in this year (Samvat 1890) Râjâ Vikmâtji came with his mother to perform the pilgrimage to Girnâr, and had an interview with the Navâb Sâheb and presented a horse as nazarânâh. The Navâb Sâheb also visited him at his house, which was that of Raghunâth Râi. And it so befell that the Navâb Sâheb died suddenly, from a carbuncle which appeared on his rump, on Wednesday, Vaisâkh vad 1st, Sam. 1896, corresponding to the 24th of Rabi-ul-Â'wal, A.H.

1256. He was an excellent man, and his reign lasted for 29 years and 22 days, and his age at his death was 44 years and 10 months and 22 days.

Note on p. 222.

The following is Captain Grant's own narrative of his captivity :—

" In 1813 I was appointed by the Bombay Government, at the request of Captain Carnac, Resident of Baroda, to the command of the naval force then established by His Highness the Gaikvād for the suppression of the Indian and Arabian pirates that infested the coasts of Kāṭhiāvād and Kachh. We captured and destroyed several ; and in 1820 they were so much reduced that the Gaikvād abolished his naval establishment, not considering it necessary to keep it up any longer. I then received orders to proceed inland from my station at Velan Bandar, or Diu Head, to Amrōli, to deliver over charge of my vessels to the Gaikvād's Sarsubha, or Diwān, in Kāṭhiāvād. On my way I was attacked by a bāharwati, or outlaw Kāṭhi, named Bāwāwallā, with thirty-five horsemen. My horsekeeper was killed ; my munshi severely wounded. I could not myself make any resistance, having only a riding whip.

" On first coming up, Bāwāwallā said that he wanted to consult me about his affairs, and on this pretext got me to dismount. My people being rendered helpless, I was forced to remount my horse and gallop off with the gang, who took me into a large jungle, called the Gīr, where I was kept prisoner on the top of a mountain for two months and seventeen days. During the whole of this time two armed men with swords drawn kept guard over me. I laid among the rocks drenched with rain night and day, with the exception of two nights, when the gang forced me to accompany them, and we stopped in a friendly village. In this expedition I was occasionally allowed to ride, but always surrounded by a strong band, that made all attempt to escape impossible. In one village, where the people favoured Bâwâwallâ, the women took my part and upbraided him and his men for my cruel treatment. Towards unfriendly villages the custom of the gang was to ride up to the gates and chop off the heads of little boys at play, and then go off rejoicing and laughing at their cursed exploits. When they returned to the encampment after a day's murdering foray, the young Kâthîs used to boast how many men they had killed; and one day I heard the old fellows questioning them rather particularly whether or not they were sure they had killed their victims. 'Yes,' they said; 'they had seen their spears through them, and were certain they were dead.' 'Ah!' remarked an old Kâthî, 'a human being is worse to kill than any other animal; never be sure they are dead till you see the body on one side of the road and the head on the other.'

"At times the Chief Bâwâwallâ, in a state of stupor from opium, would come and sit by my side, and holding his dagger over me, ask how many stabs it would take to kill me. I said I thought one would do, and I hoped he would put me out of misery. 'I suppose you think,' he would answer, 'that I won't kill you; I have killed as many human beings as ever fisherman killed fish, and I should think nothing of putting an end to you; but I shall keep you awhile yet, till I see if your Government will get me back my property; if so, I will let you off.'

"When not out plundering, the gang slept most of the day. At night the halter of each horse was tied to its master's arm. When the animals heard voices they tugged, and the men were up in an instant. Their meals consisted of bājri cakes with chillis, and milk when it could be got. I used to have the same. Once or twice my servant was allowed to come to me, and brought the rare treat of some curry and a bottle of claret from Captain Ballantine. The wine Bāwā-wallā seized on at once, thinking it was dāru, or spirits, but on tasting the liquor he changed his mind, and spitting it out declared it was poison, sent, no doubt, on purpose to kill him. By way of test, I was ordered to drink it, which I did with great pleasure, and finding me none the worse, he gave up his idea of poison.

"Among his people there were two young men who showed some feeling for me. One of these was shot on a pillaging raid shortly before my release. They used to try and cheer me up by telling me I should be set free. Occasionally, when opportunity offered, they would inform me how many people they had killed, and the method they pursued when rich travellers refused the sum demanded. This was to tie the poor wretches by their legs to a beam across a well, with their heads touching the water, and then to saw away at the rope until the tortured victims agreed to their demands, then the Kāṭhīs would haul them up, get from them a hundi or bill on some agent, and keep them prisoners till this was paid.

"Sometimes they told me of their master's intention to murder me, which was not pleasant. He and his men had many disputes about me, just as his hopes or fears of the consequence of my imprisonment prevailed.

"I can never forget one stormy night : they were all, sitting round a great fire ; I lay behind them. Lions and wild beasts roared around us, but did not prevent me overhearing a debate upon the subject of what should be done with me. The men complained that they had been two months in the jungle on my account ; their families were in the villages, very badly off for food, and that they would stay no longer. Their chief replied : ' Let us kill him, and flee to some other part of the country.' To this they objected, saying that the English would send troops and take their families prisoners and ill use them. So in the end it was agreed to keep me for the present.

"My release was effected at last through our Political Agent, Captain Ballantine, who prevailed on the Navâb of Junâgadh to use his influence to get another Kâthi who had forcibly taken Bâwâwallâ's pargana or district to restore it to him, and Bâwâwallâ thus having gained his object, set me free.

"My sufferings during confinement were almost beyond endurance, and I used to pray in the evening that I might never see another morning. I had my boots on my feet for the first month, not being able to get them off from the constant wet until I was reduced by sickness. Severe fever, with ague and inflammation of the liver, came on, and, with exposure to the open air, drove me delirious, so that when let go I was found wandering in the fields at night covered with vermin from head to foot. I shall never forget the heavenly sensation of the hot bath and clean clothes I got in the tent of the Navâb of Junâgadh's Divan, the officer who accomplished my release. The fever and ague, then contracted, continued on me for five years, and the ill effects still remain, my head being at times greatly troubled with giddiness, and I have severe fits of ague; my memory also is much affected, but I can never forget the foregoing incidents, though it is now upwards of fifty years since they occurred.*

CONCERNING THE HISTORY OF NAGAR.

Hâlâr is a separate country. Although it is not included among the tributaries of the Sorath Sarkâr, nevertheless the imperial functionaries came from Junâgaḍh to Nagar to levy the tribute and the Bâdshâhi vero. The tâlûkâs of Dhrol and Rajkot and the villages of the Gondal estate, pay khiraj, since the time of Sher Khân, who had the title of Bahâdur Khân, and the Divân Sâheb Amarji, and I will relate to those who care to listen to such histories some account of those places.

CONCERNING THE JÂM.

In past times the Khalifah of Bâghdâd, Hajjâj by name, led an army against Sindh in a religious war. In this campaign Dharasena, the Brâhman chief of the province of Thaṭhâ, was slain in battle, and the Muhammadan religion was established by force and violence throughout the country of Sindh. They who did not wish to adopt the new religion and yet were not sufficiently strong to oppose it, agreed to submit, and after the rule of the Sâmânîs, Anirâo Samâ became, in St. 1340 (A.D. 1283-84), the ruler of Sindh. Of these, the Jâdejâ Rajputs, who originally are of the Jâdav stock, entering the country of Kachh, conquered Bhuj by force of arms, and residing there, ruled the country and erected numerous forts in all directions, and one thousand, four hundred, and forty villages are within their rule. Jâm Lâkhan brought the whole of Kachh under his rule; but since I am the historian of H â l â r, I will begin with Jâm R â v a l, the founder of Nagar.

Jâm L â k h â crossed the Râp from Bhadrâ-yar, which was his capital, with a powerful army. The râjâ of S o r a ṭ h came to oppose him, but the Jâm defeated him and drove him back. At this time Sultân Bâhâdur Shâh summoned the Jâm to his presence, and placing him in command of his own army, sent him to conquer Pâwâgadh, which he did, and as a reward for it, was presented with the parganas of Kûnaḍ, Âmbaran, with 12 villages in each, and Morbi. The Jâm Lâkhâ offered for this a nazar of some Kachhi horses and one hundred Ashrafis, and marching back to his country was treacherously slain near a place called Ambaran, by the zamindar thereof, whose name was T â m â c h i D e d â, and who committed the deed like a robber by entering his tent in the middle of the night.

His son Jâm R â v a l, to avenge his death, slew Tamâchi and then killed Parmâl Châvadâ, and took Dhrol, and Haradhol, after slaying also Nâg Jethvâ, took possession of N â ḡ n a h, near N a v â n a g a r. Then he devoted himself during sixteen years to the cultivation and settlement of his country. He also conquered the town of B a k o t â.

On account of this wicked deed his subjects, amirs, and relatives hated him, and Rão K h e n g â r, the son of Hamîr, desirous to avenge the murder of his father, called to his aid Sultân Mahmud Gujarâti, which compelled Jâm R â v a l, when the Muhammadan army was approaching, to seek the protection of Ásûpûri Mâtâ. Hewas thinking of making an offering of his own head to the Mâtâ, whose shrine is as glorious as heaven, when he heard the voice of an invisible angel exclaim—

“To thee do I the land of Hâlâr give,
From thee the land of Kachh I take.”

Encouraged by this message, he collected his friends and followers, who amounted to nearly a hundred thousand and were of various Râjput tribes, such as J â ð e j â, L â d a k, D h u d h a n, D h e m a n, Ch â r a n, D a l, and W a g h e r, with whom he crossed the Salt-Rañ and encamped before Morbi, on this side of the Rañ, which had been given to his family on account of the conquest of Pâwâgadhi and the surrender of Sûltân Muzaffar by Rão Bhârâ, and advancing thence he halted in the parganahs of Âmbran, Bâlabhâ, and Jodiâ.

The whole of the province was in the hands of different râjâs. The Jêthwâs ruled as far as N â g n a h, distant about a kos from Nagar; the Dêdâs and Châvaða Râjputs prevailed as far as the Machhu River; and the rule of the V â d h e l Râjpûts, as zamindârs, extended to the village of Khambhâliya; and as far as Kâlâwad was possessed by Kâṭhîs under Jûnâgaḍh ; and all plundered in every direction for several years.

As all the zamindars united to oppose him, Jâm Râval marched against them, and drew up his van, centre, rear, and right and left wings in an excellent manner, and selecting a favourable moment to engage, he said to his comrades, " I will this day place my head under a crown or under a sword." Then after strenuous efforts and the display of great bravery and activity, he gained the day, driving back the Kâṭhîs to the river Bhâdar, and the Jethwâs to the salt creek of Bhokirâ, and the Dedâs and Châvadâs to the river Machhû, and he forced the Vâdhels to cross the Okhâ Raṇ, and thus obtained the country without any shareholder or partner.

whom God willeth,

And at this table both friend and enemy may partake."

FOUNDING OF THE CITY OF NAVÂNAGAR.

The city of Navânagar was founded on Wednesday, the 8th of the light half of Śrâvan, in Samvat 1596, on the banks of the Rangamati and Nâgamati rivers, at a distance of two kos from the ocean, during the reign of the Emperor Humâiyûn of Delhi and of Sultân Mahmûd bin Muhammad Shâh, of Gûjarât.

At that time Sultan A h m a d laid siege to J u n â g a d h; and Râo M â n d l i k, being occupied with his own troubles, was not able to attend to anything else. In course of time the city began to prosper, and all kinds of artisans crowded to it. At present it is celebrated for its various textile fabrics, such as turbans, head-dresses, dhotis, and petticoats, which are exported to different countries by merchants. Here also silk stuffs, like those made at Âhmadâbâd and Surat, called mashru, atlas, and pânc̣hpatâ, are produced. Here also painters, dyers, workers in shells, engravers, embroiderers, and tailors produce exquisite articles. This place abounds with kitchen and flower gardens; and in the latter also plants are reared from which essential oils and perfumes, e.g. attar and water of roses, champeli and moghara, are prepared and in great quantities exported to distant countries. In the bazâr all kinds of produce, green and dry, living and dead, is exposed for sale.

Here are Brâhmans who read the Vedas, and are distinguished by science, virtue, and kindness; they are preachers, readers of the Purânas, perform religious ceremonies, and the Agnihotri sacrifice. Among the other inhabitants the Bohoras, Khatris, and Bhâtias engage in their respective occupations, whilst the Setâs, Maliks, Râjput Jhâlas, and Sodhâ Vatandars constitute a most respectable portion of the community.

Hat-keśvar, Jāmnātha, Ranchoḍrāi, and Kālyānji, the monastery of the Gokali Gosāins, and the temples of the Jains and tombs of many Bohoras. The talāo called Jāmsār, to the west of the city, is always overflowing with sweet water. Four kos from the city on the seashore is the temple of Roji Mâtâ, which is both strong and famous.

The inhabitants all dress well, have a pleasing complexion, are intelligent, and the beauty of the women is so seductive, that even his lordship the Qâzi and the Sheikh-al-Mashâikh agitate their beards and sing the following Ghazal aloud :—

The dead why worship ? Purity is here ;
 Why doubt ? come to the Ka'bah, God is here ;
 The Kâbah, but of stone and loam you see,
 Now come, adore an idol : here it is,—
 I searched the world's book-case from leaf to leaf,
 I saw your mark, and said this is my hope.
 The Kâbah and the Zem-zem was a trope,
 Its truth a pure heart is, such is my hope.
 When God did give to man a shape, his own,
 He said :—How pure his heart, our place is here,
 In this garden I am each blossom's friend,
 Here hope to find the scent of amity,
 To this threshold bow your head, O Âhmad,
 Because each king a beggar here becomes.

According to the saying "the people follow the religion of their kings," the adherents of Islâm generally shave their beards, abandon the worship of tombs, throw about colour at the Holi, and use the Rām-Rām salutation. Lastly, the city of Nagar is the ornament of the whole State, and is under the special protection of Śankar, who is the giver of all good gifts, Hardholji, brother of Jām Rāval, who slew Dhamal Chāvaḍa, colonised the town of Dhrol.

JĀM RĀVAL BIN LĀKHĀ BIN HARDHOL.

This Jām was well known for his liberality, and reigned twenty-one years. His eldest son, Jayāji, lost his life by falling from a horse in the plain, near Roji Mātā's temple. Jayāji's son Lākhā, who was still a minor, received the parganah of Khilos in girās, and his uncle Vibhāji became rājā.

JĀM VIBHĀJI BIN JĀM RĀVAL.

This prince began to reign on the 11th Kartik sud, Sāmvat 1618 (A.D. 1561), and died seven years and three months afterwards.

JĀM SATRASĀL BIN VIBHĀJI.

Jām Satrasāl bin Vibhāji ascended the masnad of his father in Sāmvat 1625, on the 14th of Mahāvad, and was allowed to coin money by Sultān Muzaffar, whose name it bore; but he ordered it to be called Māhmudi, after his father. The permission was obtained in the following way:—On a certain occasion the Jām presented a rupee to the Sultān with a kori as nazarānah, and said:—“In the same way as the dignity of rājās is augmented by giving their daughters to His Majesty the Sultān, so I wed my ‘Kūnwari’ to this rupee in the hope that her honour will increase.” The Sultān was pleased with this sally, issued the permission for coining this money, and ordered it to be called kûnwarî in the Hindu language, and by the mispronunciation of the vulgar, it is now called kori. It is said that Jâm Satâji lived and ruled with independence, pomp, and splendour. During his time, Daulat Khân, son of Âmin Khân, the Mûtasaddi of Junâgaḍh, revolted from the Pâdshâh Akbar of Delhi, who despatched an army to coerce him, which arrived at the fort of Junâgaḍh, and when Daulat Khân was hard pressed he begged aid of Jâm Satarsâl. The Jâm Sâheb, whose fortune was in the ascendant, and who was desirous of an opportunity like this, sent his Kûnwar Bhârâji and Bhâiji Dal and Jasâ Vazir and Loma Khûmân the Kâṭhi, with 12,000 brave Râjpût horsemen to his aid. When the army of the Jâm had camped at Majevaḍi, about four kos from Jûnâgaḍh, Daulat Khân became alarmed, and began to think that it was not wise to trust to those who were desirous of gaining land, lest—God forbid—they should enter the city, and he should afterwards be unable to make them leave it. He therefore made apologies to his ally, whom he informed that he intended to negotiate for peace with the imperial army, and requested him to return to his own country. This news was most unpalatable to Kûnwar Bhârâji, who at once attacked the Delhi army on his own account, defeated it, and took a large booty, consisting of 52 elephants, 3,530 horses, 70 palanquins, many tents, cannon, and all kinds of arms. The next day he marched against Daulat Khân, who had broken his word, and who was so unable to offer resistance that he sued for peace through the Sayyids and Bhâts, and obtained it on giving up the parganahs of Chûr, Jodhpûr, and Bhod, containing 12 villages each. In this way he averted further misfortunes from himself. At this time Sultân Muzaffar Gûjarâti was fleeing from the Emperor Akbar's army and arrived in the country of Sorath, with a view of obtaining aid from Jâm Satâji, Daulat Khân, and Râjâ Khengâr, who was the zamindâr of Sorath; and raised an army from them of 30,000 cavalry and 20,000 infantry, and created confusion in the district near Ahmadâbâd. On this occasion the Khân Âzam Gokaltâsh was appointed in place of the Khân Khânân as the Subahdâr of Ahmadâbâd. He marched to encounter Muzaffar, and encamping at Viramgâm, he despatched Naurauz Khân with Sayyid Kâsim and troops to Morbi, whence they sent letters to the Jâm to the effect that he should expel Sultân Muzaffar from his country. The Jâm however had the honour of his army too much at heart to comply, but, on the contrary, began to harass the imperial army by cutting off its supplies, and by killing stragglers, and carrying off horses and elephants whenever he could, so that at last one ser of corn was sold for a rupee in the camp.

Now, however, the Khân Âzam, with his own special forces, joined the main body. On account of the rain, mud, and the inequality of the ground, the imperial army was deprived of the chance of fighting a pitched battle, accordingly it was determined to march on Nagar, because the Jâm kept all his stores there, and in trying to defend them would be compelled to offer battle. Accordingly the army was put in motion, and when it had arrived in the qasbâ of Dhról, the Jâm made his appearance with the auxiliary forces of Râo Bhârâji of Kachh, and several skirmishes were fought, in each of which the Jâm was victorious. Lomâ Khûmân the Kâthi had on a former occasion, in the campaign of Jûnâgadh, kept an elephant for himself, taken from the booty of the imperial army, and had on this account been much annoyed by Jasâ Vazir, and thus bore a grudge towards the Jâm, as was also the case with Daulat Khân of Junâgadh, whom the Jâm had now called to his aid, and who likewise fancied that he had suffered some wrong,—

If a man's evil day has arrived,

He will do what ought not to be done.

A fellow-feeling made these two individuals friends; accordingly they communicated with the Khân Âzam Gokaltâsh, and made an arrangement to bring the army of the Jâm into trouble by deserting it at the moment of onset. The enemy was greatly pleased with the news, and when the fight began, both Lomâ and Daulat Khân loosed the reins of their horses and fled. This sight so discouraged the Jâm, that he likewise alighted from his elephant, mounted a fleet horse, and fled for his life. Jasâ Vazir, however, succeeded with great trouble in maintaining his position till evening; he also guarded the household and the ladies of the Jâm, whom he placed in ships and despatched by sea, to escape being captured, and afterwards all returned to Nagar.

Preparations for the wedding feast of Kûnvar Ajâji were being made at Nagar, and therefore he had remained in the town. Being now vexed at his father's flight, he quickly mounted and joined the army in the field. On the second day, when the brilliant diadem of heaven shone from the firmament, the two armies encountered each other. The right wing of the imperial army was led by Sayyid Kâsim, Naurang, and Gûjar Khân; and the left by Muhammad Rafî, who was a celebrated general, with several imperial Amirs and Zamindars. Mirza Marhûm, son of Navâb Azim Humâyûn, commanded the centre, and before him Mirza Anwar and the Navâb himself took their post. The van of the army of the Jâm was commanded by Jasâ Vazir, Kûnvar Ajâji, and Mebrâmanji Dungarâni. A cannonade from both armies opened the combat, and the imperial warriors as well as the Râjputs fought so well that the angels of heaven applauded their bravery. Muhammad Rafî assailed the army of the Jâm with his battalions, whilst Gûjar Khân and Mirza Anwar, the Navâb of high dignity, attacked Kûnvar Ajâji, Jasâ Vazir, and a company of 1,300 Atits, who were going on pilgrimage to Hinglâj Dêvî, and who had on their way joined the army of the Jâm; and these fifteen hundred perished, together with Kûnvar Ajâji and Jasâ Vazir, whilst of the imperial army Muhammad Rafî, Sayyid Sharf-ud-dîn, Sayyid Kabir, Sayyid Ali Khân, and others, amounting to two hundred men, were slain and 500 wounded; and of the Jâm's army 700 horses were disabled and all the treasure plundered. This battle was fought on the 8th Áso sud, Samvat 1648, or the 6th Rajab A.H. 1001. After this unexpected victory, the imperial army also conquered Junâgaḥ, Patandev, Dwârkâ, and the island of Śankhodwârâ. The imperial army now took up the pursuit of Sultân Muzaffar, who had fled to the country of Kachh to Vastabandar when the imperial army had crossed the Raṇ Râo Bhârâ then surrendered Muzaffar to the imperial servants in exchange for the parganah of Morbi, but Sultân Muzaffar committed suicide by cutting his throat, and thus died.

The reign of Jâm Satrasâl alias Satâji lasted 47 years, 3 months, and 18 days. He gave Gondal to his younger (third) son, Vibhâji, which was lying waste, and Râjkoṭ in lieu of Kâlâwar; and Vibhâji's descendants are still called Vibhânis.

JÂM JASÂJI, SECOND SON OF JÂM SATÂJI.

Jâm Jasâji was for some time kept under surveillance in the capital of Dehli, because, after the death of Kânvar Ajâji, Jâm Satrasâl remained in Nâgar in a subordinate position, and an imperial deputy administered the government of Nâgar in concert with him. Jâm Jasâji, therefore, in the hope of winning the imperial favour and removing the annoyance of the deputy, went to Delhi, and by the protection and kindness of the Emperor's wife, Jahânârâ Begam, and the good offices of Raghunâthji Nâgar, the Bakhshi, was installed on the masnad of Navânagar on the 1st Phâlgun sud, in Sâmvat 1673, and in the year 1675, when Nûr-u'd-din Jahângir Pâdshâh visited Dohad, which is on the frontier of Gujarât, Jâm Jasâji obtained the honour of an audience. On this occasion he offered fifty Kachhi horses and 100 gold mohars to the emperor, from whom he received in return two elephants, two horses, and four rings set with diamonds. During his reign the Śrâvaks repaired a temple in the bazâr.

It happened that during a rainy night the Jâm was playing chess with his Jhâli Râûî, who was the daughter of Râjâ Chandrasingh, and displeased her in the game by taking a knight, whereon the râûî said :—"What manliness is there in taking a lifeless horse from the hands of a woman? Let him who boasts of his valour take a horse from my father!" This speech so vexed the Jâm that he immediately sent a large and well equipped army against the râjâ. The troops of the Jâm and of the Râjâ of Halawaḍ fought for six months with each other without any decisive result. Seeing he could effect nothing, the Jâm became helpless, and accordingly he despatched Śankardâs Nâgar, the Thânadâr of Rânâvâv, a brave soldier, to the seat of war, with the promise of a great reward if he could bring this affair to a happy end. Śankardâs went to Halawâd, and pretending to come on an errand of condolence to the rājâ, whose son had died, wrapped himself in a sheet, and made his entrance into Halawâd with 400 sowars during the evening repast of the chokidârs—a time when they are off their guard. He entered the apartment of the rājâ when he happened to be asleep, and putting a dagger to his breast, awoke him. The rājâ was in fear of his life; his mother, who was present, interceded with Śankardâs, but the latter carried him to the Jâm. When the rājâ arrived, the Jâm smiled and said:—"You are welcome." He replied "Śankardâs the Nâgar, who is a Brâhman, has outwitted me, and indeed it is no disgrace if we Râjputs are outwitted by Brâhman." It was the intention of the Jâm Sâheb to keep the rājâ prisoner, but Śankardâs, who had made a promise to his mother to bring him back, begged that he might be excused. Hereon the Jâm issued orders to kill Śankardâs, the son of Dâmodar. The latter, however, by his quickness and the force of his sword, succeeded with his followers in carrying the rājâ safely back to Halawâd, but was himself slain, with all his followers; and the truth of the proverb that the company of princes is like that of lions, was again confirmed. Jâm, J a s â j i spent much time in travelling. His reign lasted nominally for eight years, when his Jhâli Râñi gave him poison, and thus deprived him of both his crown and his life.

JÂM LÂKHA BIN AJÂJI.

He began to reign on the 30th Mahâvad, in Samvat 1681; he reigned 21 years, 1 month, and 10 days. In his time Sultân Nûr-u'd-din Jahângir ruled at Delhi.

JÂM RAÑMALJI BIN LÂKHÂ.

His reign commenced on the 10th of Chaitra sud in Samvat 1702. He was born on the 9th Śrâvan sud at dawn. The subjoined figure represents his horoscope* :—

* No explanation is given of this horoscope in the Persian MS., but persons unacquainted with astrology may be informed that the twelve areas of this diagram are assigned to Mercury, the Sun, Venus, Saturn, the Moon, Mars, Râhu, Jupiter, Ketu, respectively, which was the combination of planets at the prince's birth.

His adopted son S a t â j i was born of a daughter of the Râthod house of Jodhpur, and was expelled from the country after the demise of Raṇmalji, his father. He then went to the Court of Delhi and obtained the parganah of Kaḍi, in Gujarât, in jâgir, and I will now relate an account of what his father did.

One day Jâm Raṇmalji was hunting in the jungle and happened to perceive a Sanyâsi, reclining under a tree with a young and beautiful woman with arched eyebrows, whose charms captivated him; overcome by desire, he went and seated himself by her. When the Sanyâsi, overtaken by fate, had gone to bathe, the Jâm asked her who she was, and the lady spoke as follows:—"I am the wife of a Brâhman, and this godless Sanyâsi has inveigled me here by deceit; if you approve of me, I am at your service." "The Jâm ordered the Sanyâsi to be killed, and carried the woman away to his palace, but from his inordinate intercourse with her, he contracted a painful disease; and the pain becoming excessive he emasculated himself, but when he was healed, he married a Râthod lady, who became his Râni. When she found her husband impotent, she bought a fine infant from her own tribe, pretending that she had given birth to him; she also sent for her brother from Jodhpur, and enjoyed full authority over her husband. Some time afterwards, however, Jâm Raṇmalji, fearing her machinations, assembled his nobles and ministers of State, and addressed them thus : "I have been impotent for a long time, and this is not my son, and it is fitting that my younger brother Raisingh should succeed to the throne after me." Jām Raṇmalji lost his life some time afterwards with Sāngoji Hardhol, fighting against the force of the imperial army, whereupon Raisingh expelled by force the adopted son the Rāṇi had bought, with all the Rāthods, including also Govardhan Bhandāri and others, from Nagar. Raṇmalji's reign lasted 15 years, 3 months, and 18 days.

JĀM RĀISINGH BIN LĀKHĀJI.

By the agreement of the nobles and chief men, he was installed on the throne on the 13th Asād vad, Saṁvat 1717. At that time Sultān Qutbū'd-dīn arrived from Ahmadābād with a powerful army. The Jām hastened to meet him, and fighting a sanguinary battle on the plain of Shekpāt, he lost his life. Hereon the imperial army occupied the city, and named it Islām-nagar. A mosque was built in the bazār, and from that time the Bādshāhi vero began to be levied. Kūnwar Satāji (Prince Tamāchi) and several other survivors of the battle left Nagar, which had no strong fort, and by sheltering themselves in the cactus jungle escaped to Okhā. Jām Raisingh reigned 2 years and 25 days.

JĀM TAMĀCHI TAGADH BIN RĀISINGH.

On the 8th of Śrāvan vad, Saṁvat 1719, Tamāchi succeeded to the throne and distressed the Bâdshâhi Thânadârs and the râyats by the depredations he committed around Nagar, in such a manner that he obtained the cognomen T a g a d h (Reiver). Gradually, however, after the expiration of fully nine years, he was pardoned his offences through the kind offices of Mahârâja Jasvantsingh of Jodhpur, and Vizir Asad Ali Khân, Sûbahdâr of Gujarât, on whom, when he was yet a minor official, the Jâm had on some occasion or other bestowed his own horse; and in Samvat 1728 Nagar was restored to him, and he regained his throne, and the Qâzis and Muftis who had remained in the mosques were sent to hell. His reign lasted 27 years, 1 month, and 17 days. In those days Shâh Jahân Bâdshâh ruled at Dehli.

JÂM LÂKHÂJI BIN TAMÂCHI.

He obtained the masnad on the 10th Âso sud, Samvat 1746, and sat on it 19 years and 1 month.

JÂM RÂISINGH BIN LÂKHÂ.

His reign began on the 10th Kârtik, in Samvat 1765, but he was put to death by his brother Hardhol, the son of Hemâbâi Vâghelia Rajpûtanî, who held the parganah Hariânâ in girâs. He took possession of the throne, but fled for fear of the Mahârâja Jasvantsingh. The reign of both amounted to one year and two months.

JÂM TAMÂCHI BIN RÂISINGH.

He succeeded to the throne on the 11th of Bhâdrava sud, Samvat 1767. When he was yet very young, one of the slave girls of Jâm Tamâchi, who was his nurse, entertained fears that Hardhol might endanger his life, and putting him into a box, conveyed him to his maternal aunt, Bâi Ratnâji, at the Court of Bhûj, and begged her to protect him. His aunt spent large sums of money to promote his interests, and also wrote to her brother Râj Pratâpsingh to give his daughter in marriage to Mûbâriz-ûl-Mûlk, known also as Sarbûlând-khân, the Sûbahdâr of Gujarât, and the daughter of one of his cousins to Salâbat Muhammad Khân Bâbi, who was at the head of the army, and they, being thus gained over, expelled Hardbol from Nagar and installed Târnâchi on the masnad.

In consequence of his good services, the parganah of Hariânâ was given to the Râj of Halawâd. The villages of Charakhdi, Trâkûrâ, and Daiyâ were given as dowry with the sister of Jhâlâ Nâranji, who was married to Salâbat Khân. In course of time, however, the sons of the latter, i.e., Sherzamân Khân and Diler Khân, sold all three villages to Kûmbhâji of Gondal; and lastly, for the aid afforded by Râo Sâhêb Desalji of Bhûj, the fort of Bâlabhâ and several other mahals were mortgaged to him in Samvat 1775, and in 1792 the Râo Sâheb rebuilt the fort. Mûbâriz-ûl-Mûlk levied three lākhs of rupees the first year, and on coming the second year, after some dispute, through the intervention of Salâbat Khân, he obtained one lākhs as tribute.

Afterwards Mahârâja Ajitsingh, who became the Subah of Ahmadâbâd, arrived with an army at Nagar, planted a battery of artillery on a mound near the lake, and a sanguinary battle ensued, in which a great number on both sides drank the water of death. The Mahârâja returned unsuccessful, but the brother of the Jâm—Kâkâji by name—slew Jâm Tamâchi with the sword and sent him to Paradise. The reign of Tamâchi lasted thirty-two years and one month.

JÂM LÂKHÂJI BIN TAMÂCHI.

He came to the throne on the 11th Âso sud, Sainvat 1799, and died of small-pox, but some say by poison. He reigned 24 years, 9 months, and 10 days.

During his reign Nânji and Mehrâman Khavâs arrived from Halawad, with Bâi Depâbâi whom Jâm Lâkhâji had married; and since Mehrâman was an able man, by the assistance of Mehtâ Bhânji and Jagjivan Ojhâ, he assumed the administration of the State. This monopoly displeased the other courtiers, who accordingly slew Nânji, the brother of Mehrâman Khavâs, in the Râjmahâl. Mehrâman Khavâs being a valiant man, taking no account of the chokidârs and guards, hastened to the spot; but finding the doors locked and obtaining no entrance, he effected one by causing some men to stand on each other's shoulders, and using them as a ladder to scale the wall. Having in this manner entered the palace with a band of companions, he fought with the guards from morning till evening, slew several persons, and captured the person of Depâbâi. Afterwards the chokidârs and the townspeople, who were alarmed at the tumult which was going on, submitted to the sway of Mehrâman Khavâs, and from that day his authority became paramount.

JĀM JASĀJI BIN LĀKHĀJI.

He was a minor when placed on the throne on the 11th of Kārtik sud, in Sāṃvat 1824. The Khavâses, Mehrâman and Bhavân, kept him under surveillance, surrounded him with men of their own tribe, and their own creatures and relations as attendants and servants both in the zanânâ and the palace. Whilst Mehrâman ruled alone Shâh Ālam reigned at Delhi.

Râo Sâheb Gôḍji of Kachh crossed the Raṇ with a large army and much artillery in order to realize what had formerly been promised him. Mehrâman Khavâs therefore erected batteries against the fort of Bâlambhâ, which was in the possession of the Râo; and ere Râo Gôḍji had crossed the Raṇ, his thânahdârs were expelled with much ignominy, in Sāṃvat 1824.

The origin of this enmity was as follows :—

Great fear had been entertained lest Hardholji should kill Jām Tamâchi. Accordingly a female slave of Jām Tamâchi, who was then an infant, put him into a box and conveyed him over to his maternal aunt, Bâi Ratnâbâi, at Bhûj, and asked her for aid. This lady spent a great deal of money to promote his interests, and through her efforts her brother Pratâpsingh, who was Râja of Halawâd, wrote to Mûbâriz-âl-Mulk and gained him over, and through his aid brought Jâm Tamâchi from Bhûj and seated him on the throne, as has been recorded above in its proper place. In consequence of these expenses and services, Bâlam-bhâ was mortgaged to the Râo Sâheb G o d j i, who rebuilt the fort and received the revenues of the mortgaged mahâls. But now the fort fell into the hands of the Jâm, and the Râo was obliged to depart without being able to effect anything, and the munition of the fort and six field guns and the treasure remained in the hands of the Jâm.

Kâkâji, brother of the Jâm, was a man of violent temper, who had killed the râja of M o r b i and two or three âmir and a hundred common men and women with his own hand, and his hand and sword were alike always bloody. He, seeing an opportunity, slew Jâm T a m â c h i, and, rebelling, seized on the fort of Moḍpur, and thence ravaged the country. Mehrâman therefore closely besieged that place, and it fell out that as he was seated at the window of that fortress, a musket ball struck him on the neck so that he died.

Bâi Sâhib Depâbâi, who had formerly conducted all the affairs of the country, was much harassed by the arrogance of Mehrâman Khavâs, and departed on the pretence of a pilgrimage to Ś r i N â t h j i, but since she had been predestined to perish on a dunghill, she returned in obedience to her fate again to Nagar, and the wicked Mehrâman Khavâs sent an escort of Sipāhīs and musicians to meet and to receive her, but when she arrived at the city, on the pretence that the day was unlucky he caused her to alight for the night at the house of Chatturbhuj, instead of entering the city, and dismissed her attendants. When the chariot stopped in the street, the Bāl Sāheb wished to alight, and placed one foot on the ground, and whilst the other was yet on the chariot, a sipāhī named Chānd Ghorī, of hellish disposition, who was a disloyal wretch, struck her a terrible dagger thrust from behind the screen which the slave girls were holding out in order that she might alight, which passed right through her body. Thus this noble lady, wont to repose on soft velvet cushions, and to consider even rose-leaves almost as thorns, miserably perished in an unfrequented lane, where her body lay for two hours after her attendants had fled. At last, at the intercession of Jagjivan Ojhā and Mehtā Bhānji, they burned her on a pile of aloes and sandalwood.

In Sāmvat 1832 Mehrāman Khavās, being desirous of checking the dacoities of the people of Positra, resolved on conquering that strong fort and the country of Okha, and invited the Divān Sāheb Amarji to aid him. During the siege of the fort, they dug a mine under one of the bastions and blew it up. The Divān Sāheb, who had, with many others, taken up a position under the rampart, observed, when the smoke and dust caused by the explosion allowed of a free view, that a large breach had been opened, and that the garrison was manfully making a sally from a small door. Hereon muskets became useless and a hand-to-hand fight with the sword ensued, in which the garrison were defeated.

On this occasion Kâlû Mer, who had ere this treacherously come to Junâgaḍh and killed two Nâgar children and become liable to punishment, but had been suffered to depart under the protection of the Jamadâr Amran Arab and A'alam Khân Baluch, was now slain. The troops followed up the fugitives, and entering the fort at their heels, obtained possession of all the goods these freebooters had robbed from the ships of Arabia, Sindh, and the Dakhan, and of which there was great abundance. This news was communicated by the Divân Sâheb to Mehrâman Khavâs, who was greatly rejoiced thereat, and feigned to be highly thankful and obliged to the Divân, but being of a treacherous disposition and fearing that the bravery of the Divân might become dangerous to himself, he intended to poison him, and invited him for that purpose to a repast:—

When the army had returned and encamped at Khambhâliâ, the repast was to have taken place, but the Divân Sâheb refused the invitation on the pretence that he had just received the news of the death of Khushâl Râi Nâgar, the Duftari of the Nawâb Sâheb at Junâgaḍh.

In Samvat 1839 Mehrâman Khavâs made a league with Râna Sultânji and Kûmbhaji in order to ruin the Divân Sâheb Amarji, but was defeated in a battle fought at Pâñchpipla. After that he called the army of the Gaikwâd to his aid, and conquered the fort of Devrâ, but was unable to keep it, and after repairing its defences, which had been broken down, he returned. In Samvat 1844 he built the fort of Navânagar of white stone, with five gates and eight posterns and twenty-three towers.

In Samvat 1850 Jâdejâ Dâji of Gondal, Modaji of Dhrôl, Mehrâmanji of Râjkoṭ, and Rammalji of Khirasrâ, lighted the flame of rebellion by laying waste the province of Hâlâr; and to punish these men, Mehrâman Khavâs marched an army into the parganahs of Râjkoṭ and Sardhâr. It so happened that the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji, elder brother of the author, was at that time with me and my brother in Nagar with a large force.

The reason of the Divân's arrival at Nagar was as follows:—When the Divân Sâheb Raghunâthji had been imprisoned by the Navâb Sâheb Hâmid Khân, the fort of Chorwâd belonged to the author, whilst the fort of Sutrâpârû was in possession of his younger brother Dalpatrâm, and we were liberated by the strength of our own hands. As Mehrâman Khavâs had a feud with the surrounding rājās, he was in search of an experienced man, and thought our arrival would be a great assistance to him, and he therefore sent Mehta Adâbhâi, kamâviśdâr of the parganah of Kandornâ, with a hundred sowars, a drum, and a flag to Chorwad to recall the Divān. The Divān Sāheb, considering this a good omen, disregarded the pressing invitations to stay of Sheikh Badru'd-dīn, the Zamindār of Maṅgrol, as well as of the Navāb Sāheb Hāmid Khān, and the Zamindār of Gondal, and proceeded to Nagar, where he was received with much civility and politeness by Mehrāman Khawās, who obtained for him, from the Jām's government, the parganah of Pardhari and some villages in Kāthiā-vād in jāgir, together with the privilege of commanding the van of the army and certain other Sibandi commands. He received a seat opposite to, and on a level with, the Jām Sāheb's seat in darbār. Besides the Divāni Pāgah he had several Arab banners under him, namely, those of Jamādār Sheikh Zubaidi, Sālih Abd'ulla, Muhammad Abūbākr, Hāmid Mohsin, and Hāmid Nāsir, as well as other companies of Sindhis, such as those of the Jamādār O'mar Durā, of Rāṇa Rukan, amounting in all to nearly eight hundred men. Mehrāman Khawās regarded the Divān Sāheb as one of his own Āmīrs. At this period Farid Khān, Ali Khān, Khānbhai Seth, Bhagwānji Śodha, Gajasingh Jhālā, and Keshavji and Vasanji, the maternal uncle of the author Mehta Adābhā Nāgar, Keshar Thakar Lohāna, all of whom were jāgirdārs, joined the army with the Zamindārs of Hālār.

Gajsingh Jhālā from Halwad, Vakhtāji Desāi of Patḍi, and Bhupatsingh from Bhankodā

arrived with auxiliary troops, and in one week the whole parganah of Sardhâr [Hâlâr] was laid waste, and from several villages large sums of money were raised. At that time Vakhatsinghji Râval of Bhâvnagar, who with a large army had been warring against the Kâthis and had succeeded in wresting Chital from the auxiliaries of the Navâb Sâheb Hâmid Khân, came and encamped at Jasdan, and intended to conquer also the fort of Jetpûr. On this occasion, however, a meeting between him and Mehrâman Khawâs was arranged by the Divân Sâheb Baghûnâthji, and both armies approaching each other like two seas, remained stationary for twenty days. Vakhatsingh being related to Gondal, was, however, unwilling on that account to join Mehrâman in attacking that State; while Mehrâman on his part was unwilling that Vakhatsingh should continue his warfare against the plundering Kâthis. Hence they separated without coming to any mutual agreement.

On that very day Morârji bin Dûlabhji, the cousin of the Divân Sâheb, who had been deputy in place of his father at Jûnâgaḍh, and was also mûtasaddi for the parganahs of Mângrol, Koḍinâr, Unâ, and Delwâḍâ, having been liberated from his imprisonment by the Navâb, arrived with a troop of cavalry and a band of Arabs, Jamâdâr A'wad Ali and Nûru'd-dîn, and Jiya and O'mar, and other Sindhis. Râval Vakhatsingh bestowed on him a fitting jâgir, and took him into his service. Owing to the evil of the times, Mehti Vasanji Mânkad, maternal uncle of the Divân Sâheb, died this year at the camp of Magarvâdâ.

Jâdejâ Dâji, of Gondal, and Raṇmâlji, of Khiprasrâ, and other Jâdejâs invited Fateh Muhammad, the Kâmdâr of Râo Râyghan, to aid them in the plunder of Hâlâr, which was well cultivated and full of wealth. Now, as the Râo of Bhûj had an old grudge against Nagar, Fateh Muhammad, who was assisted by good fortune and possessed a good share of bravery, was waiting for an emergency of this kind, considering that it would be to the advantage of his fame; and accordingly he persuaded the Râo Sâheb that this would be a good opportunity to avenge the ancient injuries inflicted by Jâm Râval, and crossed the Raṇ with a mighty army and a large quantity of artillery, and entered the province of Hâlâr. When Bhawân Khawâs, the younger brother of Mehrâman Khawâs, heard of this event, he hastened with an army to meet the foe, and encamped at the village of Khâkhrâbelâ. Fateh Muhammad Notiyâr, passing him by a flank movement, encamped his army in the plain of Pardharî. In the morning, after the sun, the Sûltân of the firmament, had dispersed the army of the stars, Bhawân proposed to retreat, but Purshotam Vâniâ came to the aid of his inexperience, and encouraged him by saying that no apprehensions were to be entertained of Kachhi troops, since in the games of the children of this country a boy is often heard to say : " Let me be alone on one side, and on the other all the Kachhis." Bhawân, the empty-headed, being thus puffed up by the bravado of Purshotam, like a leather bag full of wind, turned the army towards the enemy, and induced the Divân Sâheb Raghûnâthji and his two brothers to take the command of the vanguard.

When we three brothers joined the camp with our cavalry, Fateh Muhammad, although at the head of an army numerous as locusts and ants, on hearing our drums and seeing our banners, coiled himself up within his limits like a sleeping snake, and untwining himself like a half-burnt rope, as it were an elephant which has burst his chains, or a lion which has broken his bonds, and advanced his cannon and rockets and camel-swivels and muskets, and behind them followed 15,000 Kachhi infantry with Sindhis, Arabs, and Afghâns, 20,000 Râjpût and Sindhi cavalry, and 400 mail-clad men like elephants. As these successively advanced to attack us, the Gondal, Râjkot, and Raînmâlji's forces stood ready to engage on the right flank.

The cowardly Bhawân Khawâs, having never made war, was in a fright, and was like one who pulls off his shoes before he has reached the water ; he lost his presence of mind, and courage fled from his heart, and sought for some pretext to escape from this difficulty. He then said : " Let Râjâ Gajsingh of Halwad, who is related to both sides, begin negotiations of peace; to-day there is a truce, and Jhilriâ, which is at a distance of four kos to the west of this, will be our next camp." The troops on receiving this news were glad to get out of their dangerous position, and on the pretence that their leader had so ordered, they borrowed speed from the wind and lightning, and quickly departed from that place. The army had not retreated farther than half a kos, when the author overtook Bhawân Khawâs by order of the Divân Sâheb Raghûnâthji, on whose part he delivered to Bhawân the following message: "The enemy has now arrogantly advanced. If we now retire and show our backs, it will be a disgrace to the government of Nawânagar, and will be imperilling our lives for nothing." Accordingly Bhawân, with all the grandees of the State of Nagar, unwillingly determined that the army should retrace its steps, and said: "Tell the Divân Sâheb Raghûnâthji to form the right wing with his cavalry, whilst I take part in the battle on the left, with the whole army and artillery." The author hastened back quickly to my brother, the Divân Sâheb Raghûnâthji, and informed him of this, and he immediately marshalled his forces on the bank of the river in one line of infantry and one of cavalry, ready for battle, like a rampart of iron. The fight commenced with an attack by the enemy, who rushed upon us with seven thousand infantry, shouting "Ali! Ali!"

They attacked us boisterously like the waves of the stormy ocean, and the roaring of the artillery and the hissing of the rockets caused the earth to quake. The Divân Sâheb also attacked them like a lion with two hundred infantry and one hundred cavalry, shouting :— “Har Mâhâdev !” After firing one discharge of musketry at the enemy at close quarters, they closed and fought with swords, spears, knives, and daggers; then the antagonists came by degrees to fists and cuffs, striking each other on the cheeks and breasts with their hands. After many had been slain on both sides, all parties got fatigued, and the enemy retreated, whilst the Divân Sâheb departed victoriously amidst the sounds of joyful music to his post, leaving two hundred Kachhis killed or wounded on the battle-field. When Fatch Muhammad perceived his troops in this condition, he became greatly enraged, and advancing from his position poured his men on the troops of Bhawân Khawâs like a rain-cloud, breaking his array and dispersing his troops as a mountain torrent washes away pebbles. Bhawân Khawâs, with six sowârs, escaped thence by hard riding, and took refuge on the mound of Khâriwak. His carabineers became food for the sword, and the Gondal force plundered the Nawânagar camp, thus left destitute of guards and protectors, until nothing remained but the tents and cannon of the Divân Sâheb, which were in his own charge, whilst the army of Nagar

After Fateh Muhammad had defeated Bhawân Khawâs, he erected batteries against the Divân Sâheb. Artillery began to roar on both sides, and musketry also did its work ; Raj Gajsingh had withdrawn to one side, in the hope that as he was a relation of the Râo, Fateh Muhammad would not attack him, but was disappointed ; and the enemy, who were desirous to engage, attacked and charged them. But the brave men of his force withstood their charge and remained as firm as Mount Elburz, and did not give ground, and the Kachh troops, courage failing them, returned unsuccessfully to their own camp. Bhawân Khawâs, with a few trusted Khawâs adherents and others, reached Jâliâ weeping with only the clothes on their backs, whilst the Divân Sâheb remained on the battlefield, shrouded and buried the dead, and having loaded the wounded on camels, arrived in Nagar on the evening of the second day. But Fateh Muhammad, of victorious fortune, went on burning and plundering the surrounding villages as far as Khambhâliâ, and then, after levying ransoms from them, marched back.

RÂO SÂHEB BHÂNJI.

The Jâm Sâheb was so much distressed by the overbearing demeanour of Mehrâman Khawâs and the ambition of his sons, that he consulted the rich and the poor on the means of overthrowing his power; but Mehrâman Khawâs cut off the nose or the ears of every one who was discovered to have listened to the Jâm Sâheb, and some were lightened of their heads; and in this way several foolish persons were ruined, imprisoned, and put to death, and the plot spread so far that Bâi Achhûbâ, the Jâm Sâheb's wife, who was also much displeased with the state of affairs, held out to Shekh Muhammad Zubaidi, the commander of the Divâne Sâheb's Bisâlah, a bribe of one lākḥ of jāmis, but he excused himself by asserting that he was unwilling to do anything without the command of his master. Accordingly, at his suggestion, one night the Jâm Sâheb dressed himself as a female and entered the Divân Sâheb's house, and taking the author aside, said: "This Mehrâman is a thorn in my liver, or a pebble in my eye; if you will expel him by any means whatever, I will give you the parganah of Jodhpûr in perpetuity, as well as one-half of all the moveable and immoveable property of Mehrâman Khawâs, which amounts in value to nearly one krôr." When I communicated this proposal to my brother, he gave a plain answer as follows: "I will not, for greed of this world's goods, bring disgrace upon the family of the Divân Sâheb Amarji, and cannot commit a treacherous act towards Mehrâman, through whose influence I have come to Nagar, but I shall, as far as possible, endeavour to restore peace between both sides." When the Jâm Sâheb despaired of being able to effect anything with the Divân Sâheb or the inhabitants of the town, he secretly despatched messages to the Jâdejâ confederates and to the Râo Sâheb Bhânji, inviting them to plunder the district of Hâlâr with the villages which were in the hands of Mehrâman Khawâs, and granting them permission to do so. Accordingly they immediately commenced to hover about those places like vultures over a carcass, according to the saying:—

One should run with alacrity at the smallest signal of a friend."

ACCOUNT OF THE LAYING WASTE OF GONDAL
BY THE AID OF ÂBÂ SHELŪKAR.

Âbâ Shelûkar, who was the Sûbah of Âhmad-âbâd, arrived with a powerful army on the frontiers of Hâlâr, levying tribute in Samvat 1850, and he brought with him the cavalry of Malhâr Râo from Kadi, which was under the command of Hanumant Râo, and the army of Navâb Ghâziu'd-din from Sami-Mûnjpûr, on condition of defraying the monthly pay of their troops.

Mehrâman Khawâs, by agreeing to pay what they demanded, obtained a promise from them that they would ravage the parganah of Gondal.

As at that time one of the beloved children of the author was being married, and he was necessarily unable to be present, Pasu [Thakur] Lohānā, the Mutasaddi of the town of Kālāwad, who on account of the attachment between his mother and Mehrāman, considered himself as a son of Mehrāman Khawās, was appointed to act as deputy by Mehrāman during my absence, but being a man of no weight or standing he did not conduct matters well.

Ābā Shelūkar sent his Nāib Amratlāl Nāgar to Nagar to request the presence of the Divān Sābeb, as without him no business could be satisfactorily conducted; but the latter despatched the author, to receive whom Ābā Shelūkar ordered troops to march out, which escorted him with many demonstrations of honour to the camp, where he received for a whole month an honourable reception, and spent his time very pleasantly, seeing at night dancing girls perform and hearing songs and music, while the days were passed in the amusements of chess and card playing. After the expiration of a month after ravaging the parganah of Gondal and making it a grazing ground for wild beasts he returned.

It is related that Nānā Farnāvis, of Puṇā, was enamoured with the wife of Ābā Shelūkar, but as he was unable to obtain access to her alone and thus enjoy this rose without a thorn, he appointed Ābā Shelūkar to the Subāhdāri of Āhmadābād and farmed to him the revenues of that province for an annual sum of twelve and a half lākhs of rupees for the space of five years, and thus removed the snake from the treasure.

Âbâ Shelûkar was himself a voluptuary, and had intercourse with many Moghal, Afghân, and Hindû females. They have said, "He who stops the road of others, some one will stop his road." And it so happened to him that a cow entered his grain-yard. But, somehow or other, he became acquainted with the actions and conduct of his wife; whom hitherto he had imagined to be chaste, and, therefore, pretending that he wished to visit Dwârkâ, he brought his wife with him to Gûjarât.

I have myself beheld her on several occasions, and did not consider her to be very handsome; but as the verse says—

"You should see Laila with the eyes of Majnûn."

Verse :—

WITH MEHRÂMAN KHAWÂS AT KÂLÂWÂD.

When the Navâb Sâheb Hâmid Khân returned from the army, he had an interview with Mehrâman

Khawās at the Qasbah of Kālāwad, on which occasion the Navāb Sāheb took hold of the hand of the Divān Sāheb Raghūnāthji and that of the author, and placing them in those of Mehrāman, said :—"These are deposits of mine, treat them honourably and kindly, and consider them for a short time as your guests."*

CONCERNING THE WĀGHERS OF OKHĀ.

In Samvat 1851 Mehrāman marched an army to Okhā, in order to punish the Wāghers, and rased some of their villages to the ground.

The author having obtained leave, went on pilgrimage to Becharāji. On his way he encamped at Dhāndhalpūr, where he became the guest of Godaḍ Khayaḍ. At this time a band of sowārs in the service of the Zamindārs of Limbḍi, Wadhwan, Dhrāngadhrā, and Chūdā, carried off some of his cattle, but were pursued by the author, who recovered the cattle, after some fighting, at the village of Sejakpūr, but lost three men and horses. Again in the plain near Bājānā he met a band of accursed ones of Jatwārā, under their chief, a Vārāhi Jat, Nura by name, but after a little musketry fire we dispersed them, and afterwards all visited mother Becharāji. Bhāosingh Desāi, Zamindār of the town of Pātḍi, and his son

* This interview has already been alluded to before. Here, however, the translator from the Gūjarāthi writes that the Navāb said to Mehrāman that : "He had better treat them with the honour due to their rank."

Vakhatsingh and his brother Râsâji came to meet us with great civility.

FLIGHT OF THE JÂM SÂHEB JASÂJI.

In Samvat 1853, Sivrâm Kamedân arrived with an army on behalf of the Śrīmant Peshwâ and Gâekwâḍ Sarkârs, to collect tribute in Kâthiâwâḍ, and encamped at Pardhari. Mehrâman Khawâs despatched me with some followers to make arrangements about paying the jamâbandi, and Sivrâm himself came out about three miles riding on an elephant to meet us, and I stayed with him for a month and a half, and he treated me honourably. He seemed to me to be a man of great courage and ability.

Suddenly news arrived (in the camp) that the Jâm Sâheb with his brother Satâji had escaped by quick riding under cover of the night, and had encamped near the Kâlâwâḍ Gate. This happened as follows:—It had always been the intention of the Jâm Sâheb to overturn the power of Mehrâman Khawâs, therefore by promises of pay and service he allured the Arab Jamâdârs to his own side, and plotted with them; and they, to remove all suspicion, encamped at the village of Morkandâ and agreed to remain there waiting in ambush, till they heard the firing of a gun, on hearing which signal they were all to assemble at the Kâlâwâḍ Gate. Jamâdâr Sâlih, of evil fortune, who was on guard at the Kâlâwâḍ Gate, was admitted by them as an accomplice in this difficult undertaking. Accordingly at midnight on a dark night, considering the rain and clouds as an aid to his design, the Jām arrived at the gate and commenced a musketry fire in the direction of Mehru's mansion. Mehru, awaking from the sleep of carelessness, saw the aspect of affairs changed. He immediately sent for the Divān Sāheb Raghūnāthji, and commenced to surround and cannonade the gate and its defenders.

The Arabs, who were listening for the sound of firing as a fasting man for the sound of Allah Akbar, at once ran to arms; but owing to the good fortune of Mehru and the bad luck of the Jām, such violent rain fell that night that the two rivers were in full flood. The hopes of the Arabs were thus blasted, that is to say, they could not cross over, and owing to the non-arrival of their aid, the Jām and his adherents began to lose courage from the constant cannonade. Sālih and most of his men being wounded, waved a flag of surrender. Mehrāman, at the advice of his chief ministers, showed them quarter on condition that the Jām Sāheb should come to his (Mehru's) house, and live there at his ease like a parrot in a cage. And after obtaining in this matter the guarantee of the Divān Sāheb Raghūnāthji, of Māhādev Ojhā whose family is distinguished by a reputation for high birth and learning in the zillā of Hālār, of Muhammad Bārug and Nāsir Bārug, the Arabs, and of Mālik Farid Khān Śetha, the Jām Sāheb came down, and when his palankin arrived at the house of Mehrâman, which is on the main road, he was forcibly taken in and kept under strict surveillance, whilst Satâji, his brother, managed by swift running to escape to his own house. The securities could not, for fear of Mehrâman, forbid him thus carrying off the Jâm Sâheb, and the latter kept him in durance vile for two months without allowing him a change of clean clothes, or a barber to shave him, or the services of a washerman. The Divân Sâheb, who could no longer bear this state of matters, despatched the author to Mehrâman in order to effect the release of the Jâm Sâheb. Mehrâman, however, spoke so harshly and abusively that we both laid our hands on our daggers, but at last he suffered the Jâm Sâheb to depart to his palace. From that day, however, Mehrâman harboured great spite against the Divân Sâheb, and endeavoured to get him removed. In the same year also his brother Bhawân Khawâs died an unnatural death from a razor wound. He was Mehru's younger brother.

ARRIVAL OF FATEH MUHAMMAD.

In Samvat 1853 Fateh Muhammad Notiyâr again crossed the Raṇ with the desire of ravaging Hâlâr. Mehrâman Kbawâs elevated his standards against him, and entertained in his service the Afghân cavalry of Jamâdâr Sher Jang Khân and Alif Khân Sâhibdâd Khân, and Karimdâd Khân and Anwar Khân, who had been discharged by Malhâr Râo, the Zamindâr of Kañi, and promised the Navâb Sâheb Hâmid Khân two lākhs and fifteen thousand jâmis for his aid, and thus collected a very large force, and encamped at the village of Dhensarâ, of the Morbi Parganah, near the shore of the Rañ.

Fateh Muhammad, from his inborn valour, encamped his force at the distance of a cannon shot. Mehrâman Khawâs drew up his men in battle array in two lines with the forces of the Navâb Sâheb of Mukhtiâr Khân Bâbi, the Jâgirdâr of Bântwâ, and Shekh Mûrtazâ with his troops from Mângrol, and Jamâl Khân Balûch, Harisingh Pûrbiâ, and the Sindhis, and Pratâpsingh and Kesrisingh, grâsiâs of Bâlâgâm. Fateh Muhammad, giving up all idea of fighting, offered to treat for peace through Gajsingh, and made peace on condition that both sides should agree to whatever should be settled during the next months by the Divân Sâheb Raghûnâthji on behalf of Nagar and Kaliân Hirji on behalf of Jûnâgadh, and Karsanji Jhâlâ on behalf of Râj Gajsingh, the Shâ Shâvji on behalf of the Râo Sâheb, and thus by a treacherous peace he evaded all evil.

RÂO SÂHEB RÂIDHANJI COMES TO NAGAR AND RETURNS DISAPPOINTED.

In Samvat 1854, Râo Sâheb Râidhanji arrived with (his Kâmdâr) Fateh Muhammad and an army more numerous than ants and locusts, accompanied by fire-raining artillery, and encamped in the plain of Navânagar, near the temple of Śrī Nāganātha Māhādeva.

Mehrāman Khawās, being on bad terms, not only with his master the Jām, but also with the ryots and qasbātis, had no other friends except the Divān Sāheb, and did not consider Alif Khān, Zûlfikar Khān, and other Arab Jamādārs friendly to him. Accordingly he built up the fort gates with bricks and placed two or three heavy guns in position, and stood ready to oppose them, but some who were within the town, such as Mālik Farid Khān, Ali Khān, Daulat Khān, and other qasbātis, colluded with Fateh Muhammad, and informed him that as the wall of the fort on the side of the talāv was not strong, that he ought to make his attack on that side, and that as soon as he had placed his scaling ladders against it they would make an attack from the inside, and thus fighting on both sides, they hoped to repulse the Afghāns, who were not furnished with firearms, and Fateh Muhammad accordingly did so. It happened, however, that Mehrāman Khawās came at sunrise to inspect the batteries just as an angel alights from heaven. Accordingly, when the sovereign of the firmament ascended with his rays into the azure vault, and the Kachhi troops had placed ladders against the fort wall, some of them were slain and others thrown down. An assault was also made on the Khambhāliā Gate, and many attacked the Divān Sāheb Raghunāthji, whose position was at the Nāganātha Gate. The thunder of the artillery and the confusion shook the earth, and in the tumult among the townspeople, during which the author happened to be on the mound near the talāv, his horse was killed under him by a musket-ball, and hastened to the posture of non-existence. In fine, by the protection of Nāganātha, who is the tutelary deity of this country, Mehrāman Khawās gained the victory, and Fateh Muhammad, several of whose men were slain or wounded, retired and laid siege to Khambhālā, where he met with the same honours he had earned in Nagar.

In Śaṁvat 1855, Āmin Sāheb [son of Jemādār Hāmid] arrived from Barodā to collect tribute in Kāthiāwād. When he was encamped at Wānkāner the author was despatched by Mehrāman Khawās for the purpose of settling with him the sum to be paid by Nagar, and was courteously met by Jamādār Nēhāl Khān and Jamādār Bachā, by Mādhar Rāi Nāgar, and by Raghūnāth Modi, and it was settled that tribute should be levied at the rates of Śivrām Kamidān, from whose time treble tribute was imposed on Kāthiāwād. This amount Mehrāman afterwards extorted by force from the Nāgars of Nagar.

ATTACK OF THE TOWN OF BHĀNWAD.

Mehrāman Khawās sent the author in Śaṁvat 1855 with a powerful army and two guns to subdue the fort of Bhānwād, because the Rājputs of the districts of Hālār and Bardā and Dalâsâ, the auxiliaries of the disappointed and conquered Fateh Muhammad, caused great confusion by their depredations. The siege was carried on during four months, and no pains were spared by Mûsâ Jân Farangi, who was afterwards executed by Abâ Shelûkar at Âhmadâbâd, and by the Afghân, Arab, and Sindhi troops, but the fort could not be conquered on account of the evil destiny of Mehrâman, the cowardice of Keshavji Kâmdhâr, and the bullet wound the author had received in his right arm.

Meanwhile Fateh Muhammad had, with the intention of raising this siege, arrived from Kachh and encamped in the vicinity of Nagar, and Mehrâman Khawâs, considering this a good opportunity, sent the Divânji Sâheb Raghûnâthji with Keshavji and an army by sea to aid Shâ Shâvji, who was fighting with the Râo Sâheb at Mândvi, but Shâvji, mistrusting the people of Nagar, declined their assistance and made peace.

At that time Śivram Kâmedân was collecting peshkash in the zillah of Panchâl, and Mehrâman sent the Divân Sâheb Raghûnâthji to make arrangements for the proper payment of the sum to be paid for his aid, and he accordingly departed to bring him to their assistance. The Divânji Sâheb arranged this matter with Śivram at the camp of Bhâdlâ and returned with him to Nagar. Meanwhile, ill-disposed persons instilled doubts into the heart of Mehrâman by telling him that the intentions of the Divân Sâheb were unknown, and that he might, by taking the side of the Jām Sâheb, bring trouble on all parties. This fear impelled Mehrâman Khawâs to arrange an interview at Dhûmâo with Fateh Muhammad, and there concluded peace with him. When the army of Śivrâm approached, Mehrâman receded from his agreement and informed him by letter that as the business regarding which he had invited his aid was fortunately terminated, he need not take the trouble of coming; accordingly he returned.

Since the Divân Sâheb had concluded the negotiation himself, he was unable to make any excuse to Śivrâm. He therefore took upon himself to convoke the pâtels of the neighbouring districts, and levying from them the money (to pay the army), gave it to Śivrâm Kamedân. Mehrâman Khawâs became still more displeased with the Divân Sâheb than before. Accordingly the latter went away from Nagar, and took up his abode at Dhrol, whence he carried on a secret correspondence with the Jām Sâheb.

In Samvat 1856 Mehrâman Khawâs took leave of this world after a short illness, but as his children were by a Musalmân woman, they could not inherit his property, which was given to the sons of Bhawân Khawâs, i. e., Sangrâm and Prâgji. They could not, however, remain in Nagar without molestation; accordingly they betook themselves to their jâgir, which consisted of the three forts of Joḍiâ, Bâlabhâ, and Âmran, with thirty-six villages. They took with them all the cash, but were unable to take with them thousands of kalsis of jowâri which they had buried underground; accordingly they lost this.

After these men had departed to these places, the Divân Sâheb was often politely invited to join them, but he always declined to do so. He gave this information also to the author who returned to Nagar after having accomplished half the journey to Jûnâgadh, and after reaching the fort of Devrâ, as has been already related in the account of Porbandar recorded in the description of it. The author's younger brother Dalpatrâm was sent to Harisingh the Râjâ [Thakor] of Limbdi, between whose father Harbhâmji and the Divân Amarji great friendship existed. Here he remained eight months, until the Jâm Sâheb invited the Divân Sâheb in a most complimentary and kind way to his court, and gave him the parganah of Rânpûr in jâgir and enrolled him among the nobles of his State.

THE JÂM SÂHEB COLLECTS ASPVERÂ (HORSE-TAX) FROM KÂTHIÂVÂD AND OTHER DISTRICTS.

When the Jâm Sâheb had satisfied his mind by the expulsion of Mehrâman's family, he marched with a large army to collect aspverâ (horse-tax) both from the mahâls where it was usually levied and also from other mahâls where this levy had not previously been made. In Samvat 1857 he demolished the fort of Jasdan. Now the Navâb Sâheb Hâmid Khân had despatched Jamiât Khân Shirwâni and the Jamâdâr Umar to Nagar a month previously, to invite the Divân Sâheb Raghûnâthji to Jûnâgadh, and requested him to come speedily. Accordingly he went to that place [but through the evil advice of Karsandâs Wâniâ and Âzambeg Chelâ he was dismissed] and returned again, but the Navâb paid his expenses, and restored him his four hereditary villages. On his return, when the Divân Sâheb reached the town of Dhorâji, the Jâm Sâheb sent for him to join his army. He therefore advanced quickly and joined the Jâm at the camp of Kândni, and he levied from each village of Jhâlâwâd as large a contribution as they could afford to pay, and he also sent a force to the Goghâbârah Parganah, which had never before been subject to his exactions and extorted what he could. On his return he displayed his victorious standards as far almost as the Girnâr Mountain. He collected a small tribute also from the villages of the Kâthhis subject to Junâgadh, and he left a thâna in Jasdan, but it was unable to stay there. He now returned joyful and successful.

THE CAPTURE OF THE FORT OF KANDORNÂ.

Now, since the Jâm Sâheb was much elated by the greatness of his army and the abundance of his treasure, he persuaded Mûrâd Khân and Fakir Muhammad Makrâni, who were displeased with the Rânâ, to hand over to him the fort of Kandornâ, a dependency of Porbandar, in consideration of a payment to them of a lākḥ of jāmis and being granted their former service, but in Samvat 1864 Colonel Sâheb Alexander Walker conquered it from him [in two hours], and handed it over to the Râñâ Sûltânji's minister. The eye of the age never saw and the ear of the time never heard a man more true to his word or of such lofty courage and such beneficent views.

THE ENGLISH AND GÂEKWÂḌ GOVERNMENTS
SEND ARMIES TO NAGAR.

In Samvat 1868 (A. D. 1812) an Arab without cause slew one of the English Sâhebs and took refuge in the fort of Moḍpûr, and the Jâm Sâheb, although strongly pressed and commanded, would not, as is customary with Râjâs—jealous of their honour—surrender the man who had fled to him for protection. The English Government had therefore a strong reason for acting against him.

Accordingly English troops arrived like waves of the stormy ocean, with Captain Carnac Sâheb and Gangâdhar Shâstri and Fatehsingh GâekwâḌ Senâ-Khâs-khel Shamsheer Bahâdûr and Mir Sâhib Kamâlû'd-din Hûsain, Mir Sarfaraz Âli Amin Sâheb and the Divân Vithalrao, and laid siege to Nagar.

The first day when the artillery began to play, several horses and sipâhis were killed, and on the second day the English guns entirely silenced those of the fort : their roar spread mortal fear among the townspeople ; the Rājput troops lost courage, but nevertheless the Divān Sāheb Raghūnāthji and Jamādār Fakir Muhammad fought one day with one of the English regiments. As neither party gave way, the conflict only ceased with night.

The lion-hearted Jām Sāheb perceived that his Rājputs could not hold their ground, and accordingly made overtures for peace, and reproached his Rājputs saying : "On the first day when the Divānji Sāheb Raghūnāthji desired to negotiate for peace you said that he had not a brave heart, and that as we are Rājputs we shall listen to overtures of peace only after we have drunk the blood of our foes. All that was mere empty boasting." The Rājputs and Gosain Govardhanji and the Māhājans, after consultation, made proposals to the Jām, agreeing to conclude peace. Accordingly by the order of the Jām Sāheb peace was afterwards concluded with the English through the Divān Sāheb Raghūnāthji, on condition of the Jām's paying to them a lākh of jāmis [koris] annually for a period of ten years towards the costs of the war, and it was also settled that he should pay thirteen lākhs of jāmi koris, which were claimed by the Kachh Darbār. The army then returned.

A KACHH ARMY CROSSES OVER TO HĀLĀR.

In Samvat 1869, Fateh Muhammad crossed the Ran and came over with a numerous army to Hālār. On hearing this news, the Jām

Sâheb called the Divân Sâheb Raghûnâthji from Kûtiânâ to his aid, in order to oppose the enemy. Agreeably to my brother's order, I, the author, set out at the head of 300 horse and foot and one cannon, and by marching continuously reached Nagar and encamped near the fort. The Jâm Sâheb Jasâji condescended to come to the author's tent and kindly praising him, said aloud in the presence of the whole company:—

“O Ranchodji,

Of Rûstam I have heard, but you, I see,
Can, hearing, be ever like seeing?

In this age, in which we meet with nothing but treachery, there is no man faithful except the Divân Raghûnâthji among my dependants, or who would jeopardize his life in my service. As I found no one worthy to undertake this difficult negotiation, I have invited him to take it on himself. To-day the army of Fateh Muhammad, which possesses thirteen cannons and other warlike engines, and in strength exceeds 20,000 men, will encamp in, and begin to devastate one of my crown parganahs. You should therefore set out at once and attack them with your cavalry near Hariânâ, where they will not have the shelter of a fort.” Accordingly, the author pronounced the victory-giving name of Śankar, and mounted his charger, and encamped the same evening at Hariânâ. Meanwhile Fateh Muhammad erected his standards at the distance of a kos. The Jâm Sâheb, however, had the foresight to send me, within the space of two days, a reinforcement of one thousand infantry and four hundred cavalry with two cannons.

Some men at the court, however, were envious, and conceived themselves dishonoured by our recall; and Gokal Khawās, Gajasingh Jhālā, and others brought neither arrows, guns, bullets, provisions, nor eatables, and a discontented soldiery, so that for two days the army was but half fed, and some men remained altogether hungry; nevertheless the author, trusting in God's help, and giving up all reliance on the aid of Gokal Khawās and Gajasingh, went forth with a select company of one hundred Turkish (Rūmi) infantry and one hundred Masqātis at dawn and attacked the camp of the enemy, who being, as it were, yet drowned in the sleep of carelessness, offered scarcely any resistance, and suffered our muskets to be fired into the tents; when lo! Sūndarji Khatri, Saudāgar, who on account of his selling horses to the English was connected with them, and who as a resident of Kachh had accompanied Fateh Muhammad, hung out a flag of truce! As soon as the firing had ceased, he alighted from his carriage and produced a letter from the Resident of Barodā, Carnac Sāheb, which enjoined a cessation of hostilities. I considered it incumbent upon me to obey so exalted an order, and Sūndarji obtained from me a truce of three days as well as a promise of safety as to the life of Jamādār Fateh Muhammad, and he agreed to the restoration of everything plundered and compensation for everything burnt. As the safety of Fateh Muhammad was in jeopardy, he was determined to save his life by vulpine cunning, and thus obtained to aid him the influence of Sūndārji, who was the Dimnah of the period, and the order of the powerful English. Then he borrowed celerity from the lightning and fled in the moonlight, which is the foe of nocturnal thieves, without beat of drum. But the author followed (in spite of the prohibition of Sūndārji) at his heels at the distance of an arrow-shot, and captured all the carts and baggage which he left behind, until Fateh Muhammad recrossed the Raṇ after suffering a hundred disgraces.

The next day Colonel Cruchley Sāheb arrived at the request of Pingalshi Bhāt* and Vithal Rāo who came with the army of the Gāekwād, and pursued him nearly to Kotāriā. Here Fateh Muhammad was, for his honour's sake, obliged to fight, and after they had taken prisoners, some 30 horsemen with their horses, they returned.

The author, agreeably to the wish of the Divān Raghūnāthji, came and encamped in the parganah of Bālabhā, but as the Divān Sāheb Vithal Rao harboured a grudge against me, the Jām Saheb now made over the command of his army to Kâmdhâr Jasrâj and Gokal Khawâs, and sent for me to court under the pretence of wishing the pleasure of my company. The Divân Sâheb Vithal Rao now returned to his country, and two months afterwards, viz., in the month of Muharram, Jasrâj and Gokal returned unsuccessfully to Nagar.

As it is the law of this perishing world that we must all abandon it with sorrow, so the Jâm Sâheb Jasâji departed from it by a natural death on the 5th of Śrâvan in Samvat 1870 (A.D. 1814), after a reign of forty-six years, nine months, and nine days. His younger brother, by name Satâji, who had before this been offended with him and fled to the Khawâses, and after that had taken refuge with the Gâekwâd Government at Amreli, was by the advice of the same, in concert with the English, installed after the lapse of one year, in the parganah of Rânpur, which had been the Jâgir of the Divân Sâheb Raghûnâthji, and now he returned to the city and sat on the throne.

JÂM SATÂJI BIN LÂKHÂJI.

Jâm Satâji was always sick, and also had no children, and had a weak, feeble body. Achhubâ Râni, the widow of Jâm Jasâji, with much foresight, adopted a son named Raṇmâlji from Jâḍejâ Jasâji, the Zamindâr of Bhânwad, and gradually paid two lākhs of rupees on this account to the two Governments [the Gâekwâd and the English], and it was agreed that he should succeed to the gâdi after the death of Jâm Satâji, who was in a dying state.

Satâji made a will, testified to by the nobles of his State, that the Kâmdhâr Jagjivan Devji, who had inherited this position since several generations, should be confirmed in the post; but Motirâm Bûch, the Nâgar, who aspired to it, with the consent of Achhubâ Râni, threw obstacles in his way by exciting the Arab Jamâdârs of Masqât, who were in the forts of Pardhari and Kandornâ. to rebellion, through Wâniâ Andarji, a vakil of Jâm Satâji. These men committed great depredations and much confusion ensued, but Jagjivan, on the strength of his previous connections with the Divân Sâheb Vithal Râo, Nâyib of the Gâekwâd Government, requested him to expel the Arabs from the abovementioned two forts, and promised to pay his expenses. Accordingly Vithal Râo began by introducing several Arab regiments into Nagar under the command of Bodar Khatri and others, whilst Sûndarji Khatri, the Nâyib of Ballantine Sâheb, on the other hand, as well as the new Sibandis who had always been desirous of obtaining employment, all contributed to drain the treasury of the Jâm Sâheb, and succeeded, on account of the misunderstanding between Jagjivan and Motirâm, in emptying it. In fine, the Divânji Sâheb Vithal Râo and Ballantine Sâheb and Sûndarji Khatri, on the agreement that their expenses should be paid, joined the Jâm with about one thousand men.

In Sainvat 1872 they commenced, under the command of Hendly Sâheb, to besiege and batter the fort of Kandornâ. Both Jagjivan and Motirâm unmercifully squandered the money which did not belong to them, and after a protracted siege the Divân Sâheb Vithal Râo and Govind Râi mounted to chastise the accursed Masqâtis, who foolishly, miscalculating their strength, issued forth and commenced a musketry fire, and were ignorant that "the monkey who plays with the lion will defile the ground with his own blood." When a large number of the accursed ones were drawn up in order of battle, the victorious army of the English and Vithal Râo attacked them like a sudden misfortune, and dashed them beneath the iron hoofs of the horsemen, and by the thrusts of their buckler-piercing swords sent them to hell. They who escaped from the sword begged for quarter, and surrendered the forts to the servants of the Jâm Sâheb. After concluding this affair, the army marched to Pardhari and expelled the Masqâti Arabs from thence. They, however, took refuge in the fort of Jodiâ, with Sangrâm Khawâs. The Jâm Sâheb who had long been seeking a cause of offence against Sangrâm Khawâs, made the shelter of these rebels his excuse, and the English and Gâekwad armies reached the place in the middle of the rainy season. Sûndarji, whose fortune was in the ascendant, and whose patron was Ballantine

Sāheb, consulted with the Rāpi Achhubā, and collected an army to wrest the tālūkās from the Khawāses, and agreed to pay 8½ lākhs of rupees for the aid of the English army, which sum was to be payable by eight instalments. When the army arrived near the fort of Joḍiā, Sangrām Khawās and the garrison were alarmed at the shining muskets and waving banners, and lost heart. Sangrām, pale and trembling, came quickly to the Commander of the army, and asked for quarter, and surrendered the fort with all its artillery and ammunition, and all his property, but his family departed under British protection to Morbi. Afterwards, however, by bribing the English officers of Barodā and making friends with Sūndarji Khatri and the Divān Sāheb Vithal Rāo, Sangrām obtained the parganah of Āmbran in jāgir from the Jām Sāheb, who was compelled to give it, whether he liked or not. Sūndarji Khatri, who was the agent and Nāyib of the English, obtained the farm of the parganah of Joḍiā-Bālabhā for one lākh and fifteen thousand jāmis, whereas its revenue exceeds two and a half lākhs, for a term of eight years. This favour he obtained through the intervention of Motirām, who was jealous of Jagjivan Devji, who was a connection of the author's, and who obtained for himself the towns of Rāwal and Āsodar, the revenue whereof amounts to sixty thousand jāmis. When the English army returned, Sūndarji and Ballantine Sāheb, on the pretence of inquiring into the bad government of the Navânagar State, returned and made a false accusation against Jagjivan Devji, between whom and Motirâm there was much enmity, and hence Jagjivan was much annoyed and fell sick.

In Samvat 1875 I wished to go on a pilgrimage to the Narmadâ, and after going to Jodîâ, to have an interview with Ballantine Sâheb, I spent several days at Nagar to make preparations for the journey. On this occasion the Bai Sâheb Achhubâ Râñî kindly gave me employment in her pâgah, and borrowed from me seventy-five thousand rupees on the security of the Kandornâ Parganah. But in Samvat 1880 Barnwell Sâheb becoming himself responsible for the payment of this sum, handed over that parganah to Hansrâj Sêth; but when Barnwell Sâheb left this country with a sad heart on account of the loss of his wife, whom he loved dearer than life, Wilson Sâheb, who remained but a short time in power, was inimical to me, because I aided the Navâb in all matters and opposed the management of the Khattris and the Jhâlâs, who were protected by him. He therefore wrote what he pleased in the records, and then left. After him Blane Sâheb, who had cotton in his ears towards the voice of justice, rejected my claim for my money, which amounted to nearly eight lākhs of jāmîs, and caused me great loss. And he, not regarding the pledge of the English Government, abased whomsoever Barnwell Sâheb had exalted. In Saivvat 1876, on the ekâdasi-day (eleventh of the light half) of the month of Phâlgûn, the Jâm Sâheb Satâji departed to the next world. The length of his reign was 5 years and 6 months and fifteen days, and he was succeeded by Jâm Ranmâlji, son of Jâdejâ Jasâji, and the adopted son of the Jâm Sâheb Jasâji.

JÂM RANMÂLJI.

In Saivvat 1880 Barnwell Sâheb, who was a man able to appreciate respectable persons favourably disposed towards the Government of the Company Bahâdûr, and who much resembled Alexander Walker in this matter, in order to keep under subjection the Jâm Sâheb Ranmâlji, who was an impetuous young man, impatient of any kind of restraint, conferred the farm of the whole country of Nagar for a period of ten years for an annual sum of seventeen lākhs and thirty thousand jâmis upon Hansrâj Seth, nephew of Sândarji Khatri, who had already a claim of twenty-six lākhs of jâmis against this State; but afterwards, on account of the disagreement of both parties, and on account of the disapproval of Wilson Sâheb and Blane Sâheb, the contract was annulled by the Jâm Sâheb without considering the seal of the English guarantee, but following the advice of counsellors like minded with himself, thus he dissolved the farm and dismissed Hansrâj.

After the departure of Wilson Sâheb, who was not worthy to govern, and knew not black from white, Blane Sâheb carried on matters con

But went again and left it to another,
Who also entertained crude designs,
So that the habitation no one used!

In Samvat 1883 (A.D. 1827) the people of this country again fell into misery; the Nāgars and Sipāhis are without watan, the living have no bread, and the dead no shroud.

In Samvat 1885, on the 5th of the light half of the month of Māha, the wedding of the Jām Sāheb Ranmālji with the daughter of Rāwal Wajesingh, the Rājā of Bhāvnagar, was celebrated with great pomp. Gold was given freely, colour was scattered, and largesses bestowed. At the invitation of the Jām Sāheb, the author sent to the wedding his children Lakhmīsankar, Śankarparsād, Manīsankar, and Revāsankar, with 50 sowārs, and they were highly delighted.

Oh Ranchodji, whence did you come, and whither have you arrived? Where did you live and whither have you emerged?

If you write the history of each country at such length, it will be necessary to write another book. Enough! Enough! for life is short and this history very long.

In short, this State of Nagar contains three ports and fourteen inhabited mahāls, governed independently and prosperously. The etiquette in use is that formerly in vogue among Moghuls of the courts of Dehli and Âḥmadâbâd. The mahâls are : Khambhâliâ, Lâlpûr, Rânpûr, Bhânwaḍ, Moḍpûr, Jodhpûr, Kandornâ, Kâlâwaḍ, Pardhari, Joḍiâ, Bâlabmhâ, Âmran, Hariânâ, and Kâthiâ-wâḍ ; and the ports are Nagar, Joḍiâ, and Salâyâ, and pearls are found in the sea at Sachânâ. The Kâthiâwâḍ mahâls are four, viz., Âtkot, Barwâlâ, Bhâdlâ, and Sânthli, and there is an iron mine in the Khambhâliâ Parganah. The mahâls of the brethren of the Jâm are as follows: Dalâsâ, Dhrol, Khirasrâ, Râjkot, Sardhâr, and Gondal. The whole revenue of the Jâm's country amounts to thirty-five lākhs of jâmis, but in former times it was double this amount.

ACCOUNT OF OKHÂ.

Five thousand years ago Śrī Kṛishṇa with all the Jâdavas, who consisted of fifty-six tribes, and whose number was incalculable, came to live here fleeing from the city of Mathurâ through fear of Kâl Yavan, Râjâ of Kandahâr, and founded the city of Dwârkâ in that island and dwelt there. After the lapse of several years, the Jâdavas came to Patan Deva to bathe at Prâchi and perform adoration to Somanâth ; but in the drunkenness of wine, which is the mother of evil, the whole tribe fell to fighting amongst themselves, and most of them drank of the goblet of death, and Śrī Kṛishṇa himself also, being pierced by the arrow of a hunter, departed to adorn the throne of Vaikūṇṭh. The Wâdhel Râjpûts, though originally belonging to this tribe, had been captured in former times, both men and women, by Sûltân Mahmûd Ghaznavi, and then again adopting the religion of the glorious Veda were re-admitted to the Hindu community. They and the Wâghers, who plunder both by land and sea, dwell here and inhabit this country. In Samvat 1370 Shams Khân built a mosque in the city, and in Samvat 1547 Sûltân Mahmûd Gûjarâti laid waste the country. In Samvat 1648, Khân Khânân led an army here in pursuit of Sûltân Muzaffar, but Sangrâm and Śawâ Wâdhel conveyed Muzaffar over to the country of Kaohh. In Samvat 1526 Malik Toghân was the thâpâdâr here on behalf of Sûltân Mahmûd, and at that time Râjâ Bhim was taken prisoner. In Samvat 1858 English ships arrived, which cannonaded the fort of Beyt, and several brave men of the English troops landed and made an assault, but by the aid of Śri Dwârkânâth they were unsuccessful and retired. But they burned all the piratical craft of both Dwârkâ and Beyt, in which piracies were constantly committed. At that time the author happened to go on a pilgrimage to Śri Ranchoḍ Râi with a caravan of sixty wagons and one hundred sowârs. Mûlû Mânîk and Vairsi Mânîk came as far as Gûrgadh to meet him, and showed him many civilities; and at Dwârkâ the vakils of Bâwâ Sâdârâm, the manager of the temples of Trikamji and Lakhmiji, came to invite him, so the author went to Beyt in a ship, and there paid his vows to Śrī Ranchoḍ Râi, Trikam Râi, Mâdhû Râi, Purshotam Râi, and Kaliân Râi, and to Deokoji and Kûscēwar Mâhâdeva, and the costs of this pilgrimage amounted to sixty thousand jâmis.

In this country are situated Śankhar Nârâyaṇ, Âd Nârâyaṇ, and Chakra Nârâyaṇ, and Śankhar Talâv; and the temples of Kûscēwar and Kapi-leśwar and Gaṇapati, and the shrine of Hâji Kirmâni and others in this city are of much benefit both to the better classes and to the commonalty; what more shall I say?

The temple of Jagat, which was built by Râjâ Vajranâbh, is very lofty, and bathing in the Gomti is famous in every country. As my pen can go no further, my readers will no longer be fatigued.

In Samvat 1735 (A.D. 1679), on account of fear of the Mûsalmâns, the idols were conveyed to the island of Beyt. In Samvat 1781, Kâkâbhâi and Hâlâbhâi repaired many of the temples at Beyt.

In Samvat 1864 the English army, under the command of Colonel Alexander Walker, conquered Positra; and in the year 1875 the English Sarkâr established a ṭhâṇâ, but two years afterwards Hendly Sâheb and Muhammad Atâ, who were the Ṭhâṇâdârs, after a short struggle were expelled by the Wâghers. Now the abovementioned Hendly Sâheb was of a peaceful and gentle disposition, never injured an ant or killed a fly, nor did he spend a charge of powder or fire a single arrow, but withdrew himself from Okhâ safely without in the least caring for his honour.

In Sainvat 1876 a powerful English army came and attacked Okhâ both by sea and land and stormed the fort of Dwârkâ. On this occasion many of the Okhâ Wâghers, such as Mûlû Mânîk, Vairsi Mânîk, and others, and most of the tribe of Mânîk numbering in all nearly two hundred and fifty persons, perished in the waters of the Gomti, and an English garrison was placed there. However, according to the policy of the time, they handed this place over to the Gâekwâḍ, who at once posted Bâbâ Wasîkar there as his deputy, with a garrison of two hundred Arabs and Mak-rânîs.

There is scarcely any water in this country, and on account of the paucity of the inhabitants and abundance of prickly-pear, but little cultivation exists. The Wâghers used to support themselves by committing robberies both by sea and land, and there is nothing here except small shells and chakras (a shell also), and the earth called Gopi-chandan, and a pleasant green appearance, and certain small shells which these jungly folk burn before the dying. Their income is derived from the fees levied from the bands of pilgrims which come to worship Dwârkânâth, and these suffice for the ministrants at the shrine, the Râjâ, and the Wâghers. In this zillâ there are good camels and brave men.

The Râjâ of Kachh built Kachhigadh to repress

the plunderers of Okhâ, but God knows the truth.

What I have seen or heard from historians that I have consigned to writing as a memorial of this perishable life, and this book I have called وقایع سورتہ—History of Sorath, and I wrote it for the perusal of my beloved and intelligent son Sankarprasâd. X
